List of frequently cited authorities in WRC jurisprudence

As part of the WRC's mandate to provide information to the public and facilitate effective access to justice in relevant employment and equality matters, the following is a list of the case authorities from other tribunals and courts which are most frequently cited before the WRC.

The list below was generated by a tailored AI-based search of over 10,000 WRC decisions to establish the most commonly cited decisions from other courts and tribunals.

Please note that all of the WRC's own jurisprudence is available on the WRC's fully searchable website database.

In order to reduce the environmental impact of printing and sending large files to the WRC, Parties no longer need to send the WRC copies of cases upon which they rely if they appear in the list below which will be reviewed periodically. The full text of each case appears below and the index is hyperlinked.

However, parties must still explain why a case is relevant to their arguments and cite the relevant sections of the case authorities upon which they rely.

Please note that the list of authorities was last reviewed on the 6th June 2023

Judgment of Mr. Justice O'Donnell delivered on the 6th day of April, 2021.

I – Introduction

A. Background

1. These proceedings concern the constitutionality of the adjudicative process established under the Workplace Relations Act 2015 ("the 2015 Act"). The central issues raised are: whether that process amounts to the administration of justice required under the Constitution to be administered in courts; and, whether the statutory framework adequately vindicates a claimant's rights under the Constitution and the European Convention on Human Rights ("E.C.H.R.").

2. In a determination of the 28th of July, 2020, this court granted the appellant leave to appeal directly from the decision of the High Court (Simons J. – [2020] IEHC 178 (Unreported, High Court, Simons J., 21st of April, 2020)). The respondents cross-appeal in respect of certain findings of the trial judge and against the decision to award the appellant his costs ([2020] IEHC 226 (Unreported, High Court, Simons J., 21st of May, 2020)).

B. The Judgment of the High Court: [2020] IEHC 178

i. Facts

3. This case originated in the purported dismissal of the appellant by his former employer. The appellant then instituted two statutory claims:

(i.) a claim for unfair dismissal pursuant to the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 ("the 1977 Act" or "the Act of 1977"); and

(ii.) a claim for payment in lieu of notice pursuant to the Payment of Wages Act 1991 ("the 1991 Act").

Although each of these Acts provides for claims to be made for reliefs, the procedure for such claims is now provided for in the 2015 Act. It is that procedure which is challenged in this case.

4. The appellant's claims were referred by the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission ("W.R.C."), pursuant to s. 41 of the 2015 Act and s. 8 of the 1977 Act, to an adjudication officer with a hearing scheduled for the 26th of October, 2016. The hearing commenced on that date, and the adjudication officer received written submissions and other documentation from the parties. An application for an adjournment was then made on behalf of the employer. Before the High Court, the parties disagreed as to the precise purpose of such; the State respondents submitted that the adjournment was to allow a witness on behalf of the employer to attend and be cross-examined whilst the appellant maintained that the adjournment was to merely allow the witness to attend with no decision having been made on cross-examination. Simons J. noted that this disagreement was significant in relation to the appellant's contention that cross-examination was not available under the 2015 Act.

5. It is not in dispute that the hearing on the 26th of October only lasted for a few minutes with a further hearing scheduled for the 13th of December, 2016. The parties attended at the W.R.C.'s premises on that date but were informed by the adjudication officer that a decision had already issued in respect of the claim and that the hearing date had been scheduled in error. The adjudication officer informed the parties that the decision had already issued and the parties subsequently received a decision dated the 16th of December, 2016, which appeared to record that a full hearing did take place, after which a decision had been made dismissing the appellant's claim. The extraordinary circumstances have been set out in the judgment in the court below and in a previous judgment of this court on the locus standi issue, but it is necessary to repeat them here as they form an essential backdrop to the legal issues raised on this appeal.

6. Tomasz Zalewski worked in a Costcutter convenience store in North Strand, Dublin, between 2012 and April, 2016. He started as a security man and then became a supervisor. The shop was subject to regular shoplifting and was, on occasions, robbed.

In October, 2014, a most serious incident occurred when the shop was robbed with the use of pepper spray and a gun which was discharged. Mr. Zalewski commenced personal injury proceedings against his employer arising out of the incident. Later, in April, 2016, the manager of the shop, Mr. Brady, reprimanded Mr. Zalewski because he considered that there was a known shoplifter on the premises and that Mr. Zalewski ought to have excluded her. The conversation was heated. Mr. Zalewski went home and sought medical advice the following day. The management of the shop considered this to be misconduct.

7. Later, Mr. Zalewski was contacted by the owner's son, who apologised — and then asked him in for a meeting with him and the manager — and then, at the meeting, both apologised. However, when Mr. Zalewski returned from sick leave he was called to another meeting and told it was a continuation of the first meeting. He was informed that he was not doing his job acceptably, had not prevented shoplifting, and had organised legal and medical advice for other members of the staff in relation to the violent robbery incident. He was formally called to a disciplinary meeting. In a letter of the 26th of April, 2016, he was informed that he had not followed correct robbery prevention procedures, had undermined staff members' attempts to follow the procedures, and had denigrated the work ethic of other members of staff. Most seriously, he was informed that he had "associated with and used monies removed from the tills". He was summarily dismissed on grounds of gross misconduct. He appealed the decision, which was upheld by the shop owner, himself. He was told that there was no accusation of stealing, but that the accusation contained in the letter was something asserted by another member of staff. Otherwise, the dismissal was affirmed.

8. Mr. Zalewski consulted a solicitor and commenced proceedings for unfair dismissal, and a claim for pay in lieu of notice under the 1991 Act. Mr. Zalewski and his solicitor attended at Tom Johnson House on the 26th of October, 2016, and met a representative of a professional firm representing the employer. There was a brief hearing, and the adjudication officer enquired as to whether Mr. Zalewski was in receipt of social welfare payments and asked the solicitor to confirm that he was not in receipt of any illness benefit and to provide her with a letter or certificate from the Department of Social Welfare. The employer's representative then sought to hand in a booklet of documents to the adjudication officer. Mr. Zalewski's solicitor had emailed a brief submission to the Workplace Relations Commission relating to procedures. The submission objected to the taking of any evidence by written documentation, and sought to insist that any evidence would be given by witnesses. Accordingly, Mr. Zalewski's solicitor objected to the handing in of the booklet and stated that any factual evidence should be proved through an appropriate witness. At that point, the employer's representative requested an adjournment of the hearing because one of the witnesses needed was not present. Mr. Zalewski's solicitor indicated that he would not object to any such application, and the adjudication officer adjourned the hearing. The entire hearing took no more than ten minutes.

9. By letter of the 1st of November, the Workplace Relations Commission informed Mr. Zalewski that a hearing date of the 13th of December, 2016, had been assigned to the case, and that the hearing would take place at the W.R.C. offices at Lansdowne House, Ballsbridge. Mr. Zalewski's solicitor had obtained correspondence from the Department of Social Protection confirming that he had not been in receipt of any illness or occupational benefit during the relevant period. Mr. Zalewski attended at Lansdowne House together with his solicitor on the 13th of December. The solicitor then met the representative of the employer, who told him that she had been informed by the adjudication officer's receptionist that the adjudication officer had already issued her decision in relation to the complaints, and that the hearing had been scheduled in error. At that point, the adjudication officer walked into the corridor and met the solicitor and the employer's representative. She apologised and said that the hearing date had been assigned in error and that she had issued her decision the previous week. She appeared to consider that she had heard and determined the case on the previous occasion. The solicitor received a letter dated the 16th of December, 2016, from the W.R.C. containing a copy of the adjudication officer's decision dismissing the complaints. The decision stated that the adjudication officer had "enquired into the complaints and [given] the parties an opportunity to be heard … and to present … any evidence relevant to the complaints". The decision contained a summary of the employer's position which appeared to be extracted from the documentation submitted by the employer's representative and to which the solicitor had objected. The decision also stated that the applicant had been requested to provide a statement from the Department of Social Protection and had failed to do so.

10. An ex parte application for leave to apply for judicial review was made on the 20th of February, 2017, seeking a wide range of declaratory reliefs, including declarations that the 2015 Act was repugnant to the Constitution, together with an order of certiorari quashing the decision of the adjudication officer. The State respondents conceded that the defects in procedure meant that the decision of the adjudication offer was invalid and offered to consent to the making of an order of certiorari. When the appellant did not agree that this would resolve the matter, the State respondents issued a motion seeking to have the appellant's claim for declarations pursuant to the Constitution and the E.C.H.R. dismissed. The High Court agreed, but the decision was reversed by this court (Zalewski v. Adjudication Officer and The Workplace Relations Commission [2019] IESC 17, [2019] 2 I.L.R.M. 153). The matter then proceeded to a hearing on the broader issues.

ii. Legislative Overview

11. Prior to the 2015 Act, there was a range of statutory bodies having functions in relation to the field of industrial relations and employment law, and which had developed piecemeal, such as the Labour Court, the Labour Relations Commission (including the Rights Commissioners service), the Employment Appeals Tribunal ("E.A.T."), the Equality Tribunal, and the National Employment Rights Authority. In the specific field of adjudication alone, the Labour Court had functions under the Industrial Relations Act 1946, the E.A.T. had jurisdiction in relation to claims under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2003, the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973, the 1991 Act, and claims for unfair dismissal under the 1977 Act, and the Equality Tribunal had jurisdiction to hear and determine claims under the Employment Equality Act 1998 and the Equal Status Act 2000. The 2015 Act reduced the number of bodies having functions in the area to a W.R.C. having general jurisdiction and the Labour Court. In the specific field of adjudication and determination of statutory claims, with which this case is concerned, the 2015 Act streamlined the adjudicatory mechanism, providing for hearings in all cases under the legislation set out above before adjudication officers with a right of appeal thereafter to the Labour Court. This was essentially a procedural change and the substantive rights are still largely to be found in the original legislation. As Simons J. noted, however, the "procedural/substantive dichotomy" is not always observed.

12. Simons J. concluded that the appellant could not advance arguments on specific features of other pieces of legislation, such as the Employment Equality Act 1998, in respect of which he had not brought a claim before the W.R.C., and that he was confined to the operation of the statute insomuch as it concerned claims under the 1977 and 1991 Acts. However, any limitations arising from this approach to locus standi appeared to have had little practical effect on the determination of the constitutional challenge. Simons J. explained that this was because a claim under the 1977 Act is one of the more significant type of claims which can be brought within the jurisdiction of the decision-makers concerned and that the legislative history of the 1977 Act was directly relevant to the administration of justice question raised in this case. The argument in relation to locus standi loomed large in the High Court and was repeated in the written submissions, but did not figure strongly in oral argument. The appellant argued that it was necessary to consider the breadth of jurisdiction conferred by or collated in the 2015 Act in order to consider both whether it was an administration of justice under Article 34 and, if so, whether the W.R.C. could be said to be exercising limited powers and functions of a judicial nature under Article 37. However, it is not necessary to resolve the question of locus standi here. The Act of 1977 is a substantial piece of legislation and formed, perhaps, the most important aspect of the jurisdiction of the E.A.T. and the issues in this Act can be addressed, in principle, by reference to that Act in particular. It is necessary to keep in mind, however, that the W.R.C. and the Labour Court on appeal exercise jurisdiction in respect of claims in respect of redundancy and equality as well.

13. Simons J. set out the relevant aspects of the Act of 1977 (as amended):

(i.) First, a determination by the Employment Appeals Tribunal could not be directly enforced: under s. 10 of the 1977 Act, the Minister for Labour applied to the Circuit Court for an order that the employer make the appropriate redress to the employee. An express right to make such an application has since been conferred on an employee by s. 11 of the Unfair Dismissals (Amendment) Act 1993 ("the 1993 Act"). Originally, the application for enforcement under s. 10 of the 1977 Act involved a rehearing in the Circuit Court. However, s. 11 of the 1993 Act altered this to an ex parte application to the Circuit Court which, on proof that the determination had not been complied with, was obliged to make an enforcement order. If the relief granted was reinstatement or reengagement, the court could substitute an order for compensation (this was the model later adopted in the 2015 Act, albeit that application for enforcement under that Act is to be made to the District Court).

(ii.) Second, there was a statutory right of appeal from a decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal to the Circuit Court, pursuant to s. 10(4) of the 1977 Act, which, again, took the form of a full rehearing on oral evidence. There also appeared to be a further right of appeal to the High Court in accordance with the Courts of Justice Act 1936 (see J.V.C. Europe Ltd. v. Panisi [2011] IEHC 279 (Unreported, High Court, Charleton J., 27th of July, 2011)).

(iii.) Third, the Act did not remove the right of an employee to make a claim at common law for wrongful dismissal. However, once an employee gave notice in writing of a claim under the 1977 Act, s. 15 provided that he or she was not thereafter entitled to recover damages at common law.

14. Simons J. then considered how these provisions had been amended in subsequent legislation, culminating in the 2015 Act:

(i.) The manner in which parallel claims for unfair dismissal and wrongful dismissal were regulated was amended by the 1993 Act. Parallel claims could be pursued until such time as the hearing before either the Employment Appeals Tribunal or the court had commenced, but then the employee was confined to that specific remedy (s. 10 of the 1993 Act). By s. 80(1)(l) of the 2015 Act, an employee is now precluded from pursuing a claim of wrongful dismissal once a decision has been made by an adjudication officer under the 1977 Act and precluded from pursuing a claim for unfair dismissal once a hearing by a court of a claim for damages at common law has commenced.

(ii.) The 2015 Act transferred the jurisdiction exercised by the Rights Commissioners and Employment Appeals Tribunal — which had been carried out pursuant to s. 8 of the 1977 Act — to the adjudication officers and the Labour Court respectively, and removed the right of appeal to the Circuit Court. There is a right of appeal to the High Court on a point of law with no further appeal therefrom. However, Simons J. did note that an application to the Supreme Court for leave to appeal may be possible (Pepper Finance Corporation v. Cannon [2020] IESC 2, [2020] 2 I.L.R.M. 373).

(iii.) The enforcement mechanism of the decision is by application to the District Court pursuant to s. 43 of the 2015 Act. However, the powers of the court are limited. Under s. 43(2), where reinstatement or reengagement was ordered, the court could substitute an order for compensation. The application is made ex parte and the employer is not on notice of the application. Once it is established that the adjudication officer has made a determination and that it has not been satisfied within 56 days of the date of notification, then (subject only to the power to substitute damages for an award of reinstatement or reengagement) enforcement is mandatory:-

> "the District Court shall … without hearing the employer or any evidence … make an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms." (Emphasis added.)

15. Simons J. then considered the development of the procedure in respect of claims under the 1991 Act:

(i.) Under s. 5 of the 1991 Act, as defined by s. 1(1) of the 1991 Act, the employer is required to pay a sum in lieu of the appropriate prior notice of the termination of employment. Under the 2015 Act, a claim is now made in the first instance to an adjudication officer with a right of appeal thereafter to the Labour Court. Originally, a decision of a Rights Commissioner or a determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal under the 1991 Act could be enforced as if it were a court order. Now, a decision of an adjudication officer or the Labour Court must be enforced through an application to the District Court under s. 43 of the Act.

Simons J. then turned to the features of the 2015 Act that were common to claims under both Acts:

(ii.) Under the 2015 Act, an employee who wishes to advance a claim for unfair dismissal or the payment of wages in lieu of notice is required to present the claim to the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission. The Director General will then refer the claim to an adjudication officer pursuant to s. 8 of the 1977 Act in the case of a claim for unfair dismissal or pursuant to s. 41 of the 2015 Act for a claim for payment of wages in lieu of notice.

(iii.) Adjudication officers are appointed by the Minister for Jobs, Enterprise and Innovation (as defined in s. 2 of the 2015 Act) pursuant to s. 40 of the 2015 Act, with no formal qualifications prescribed. However, s. 40(2) of the 2015 Act provides that appointments as adjudication officer can only be made pursuant to the selection of that person for the role following a competition. The principal functions of an adjudication officer are set out in s. 41(5) of the 2015 Act. An adjudication officer has the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, but does not have an express power to administer an oath or affirmation.

(iv.) There is a right of appeal against the decision of an adjudication officer to the Labour Court under s. 44 of the 2015 Act. The Labour Court can take evidence on oath (s. 21 of the Industrial Relations Act 1946 (as amended by s. 74(a)(ii) of the 2015 Act)) and proceedings are conducted in public unless the Labour Court, upon the application of a party, determines that the proceedings should be conducted otherwise due to special circumstances (s. 44(7) of the 2015 Act). The Labour Court may refer a question of law to the High Court for determination (s. 44(6) of the 2015 Act). Under s. 45, decisions of the Labour Court can be enforced via an application to the District Court in the same way as determinations of an adjudication officer; failure to comply with an enforcement order made under either s. 43 or s. 45 is a criminal offence under s. 51.

iii. Administration of Justice

16. The appellant argued that the procedure under the Act amounted to the administration of justice as per Article 34.1 of the Constitution, which could only be carried out by a court. The starting point was the five-point test for the administration of justice set out in McDonald v. Bord na gCon [1965] I.R. 217 ("McDonald v. Bord na gCon" or "McDonald"), recently applied by this court in O'Connell v. The Turf Club [2015] IESC 57, [2017] 2 I.R. 43 ("O'Connell"):

(i.) a dispute or controversy as to the existence of legal rights or a violation of the law;

(ii.) the determination or ascertainment of the rights of parties or the imposition of liabilities or the infliction of a penalty;

(iii.) the final determination (subject to appeal) of legal rights or liabilities or the imposition of penalties;

(iv.) the enforcement of those rights or liabilities or the imposition of a penalty by the court or by the executive power of the State which is called in by the court to enforce its judgment;

(v.) the making of an order by the court which, as a matter of history, is an order characteristic of courts in this country.

17. The parties accepted that the determination of the two relevant claims exhibited the first three characteristics, but disputed whether the fourth and fifth characteristics were fulfilled.

18. Simons J. held that the fifth limb of the test required a consideration of whether the claims for redress which the appellant made were of a type which have historically been determined by a court. He reviewed the case law (In re The Solicitors Act 1954 [1960] I.R. 239 ("Re Solicitors Act 1954"); Cowan v. The Attorney General & Ors. [1961] I.R. 411 ("Cowan v. A.G."); Keady v. Commissioner of An Garda Síochána [1992] 2 I.R. 197 ("Keady"); and O'Connell) and concluded that that the fifth characteristic of the McDonald test will only assume importance in a small category of cases where there is a long-established tradition of a particular type of decision-making falling within or outwith the courts' jurisdiction. Determining claims for wrongful dismissal was the business of the courts for decades before the 2015 Act and the argument that such were matters of "industrial relations" was contradicted by the legislative history of the 1977 Act and the previous involvement of the Circuit Court. Employment legislation generally implied statutory terms into contracts of employment, and thus the issues for adjudication are not dissimilar to those that would arise in proceedings for breach of contract. The State respondents placed reliance on the jurisdiction in respect of equality claims discussed in Doherty v. South Dublin County Council (No. 2) [2007] IEHC 4, [2007] 2 I.R. 696 ("Doherty") and argued that, in effect, the 1977 Act created a new self-contained statutory jurisdiction which had never been part of the jurisdiction of the High Court. Simons J. rejected this argument. He did not consider that it was necessary to decide if the fifth limb in McDonald v. Bord na gCon could permit the State to put any newly created statutory right beyond the reach of the courts without infringing Article 34, although he doubted it. However, he considered that the very fact that, for almost 40 years, the Circuit Court had jurisdiction to hear and determine claims of unfair dismissal showed that the orders made by the W.R.C. were orders of a type historically made by courts. He considered that Doherty was addressed to a different point; in that case, it had been sought to be argued that it was permissible to circumvent the statutory jurisdiction created by the Equal Status Act and commence a claim for relief under the Act in the High Court. The issue was whether the full and original jurisdiction of the High Court could be invoked notwithstanding the exclusive jurisdiction conferred under the Act. That did not address the question whether the orders made by the Equality Tribunal were of a type which, as a matter of history, were made by courts — indeed, the claim that the High Court had jurisdiction implied that such orders were orders capable of being made by the High Court.

19. Simons J. concluded that the hearing and determination of a claim for unfair dismissal and for the payment of wages in lieu of notice fulfils the fifth limb of the test in McDonald: the making of orders determining such claims was characteristic of the business of courts as carried out under the 1977 Act and the type of orders made pursuant to the common law jurisdiction for claims of wrongful dismissal.

20. In relation to the fourth limb, Simons J. noted that the ability of a decision-maker to enforce decisions is one of the essential characteristics of the administration of justice (Lynham v. Butler (No. 2) [1933] I.R. 74 ("Lynham v. Butler (No.2)")). It was not necessary that the decision-maker must be able to enforce its decisions itself; the executive power of the State may be called to aid in such enforcement. However, a decision to impose financial penalties was not the administration of justice where there is no process for converting such a decision into a judgment and the decision cannot be enforced of its own right and the monies must be recovered in litigation (O'Connell).

21. The legislative history of the 1977 and the 1991 Acts indicated that the Oireachtas intended a range of legislative devices to give effect to determinations of statutory bodies in respect of employment disputes. At one end, a determination may be enforced as if it were an order of the Circuit Court made in civil proceedings (s. 8 of the 1991 Act), and, at the other, a requirement to apply to the Circuit Court to enforce a determination where the Circuit Court has full jurisdiction to consider the merits of the underlying claim (s. 10 of the 1977 Act). Simons J. considered that the approach under the 2015 Act lay between these positions: an ex parte application must be made to the District Court to enforce a decision of an adjudication officer or the Labour Court and a failure to comply with the District Court order is an offence under s. 51 of the 2015 Act. Simons J. concluded that the necessity of having to make such an application for enforcement deprived the determinations of one of the essential characteristics of the administration of justice. Section 43(2) of the 2015 Act allowed the District Court to modify a determination if the redress ordered was reinstatement or reengagement by making an order that the employer pay compensation fixed by the court, but not exceeding 104 weeks' pay. Simons J. came to the conclusion on this issue "[w]ith some hesitation" at para. 77 of the judgment that:-

> "Whereas the function to be exercised by the District Court is a narrow one, it cannot be dismissed as a mere rubber-stamping of the earlier determination."

His reasoning on this aspect of the case was encapsulated at paras. 218 and 219 of his judgment:-

> "218. Crucially, however, the decision-making under the [2015 Act] lacks one of the essential characteristics of the administration of justice, namely the ability of a decision-maker to enforce its decisions. The necessity of having to make an application to the District Court to enforce a decision of an adjudication officer or the Labour Court deprives such determinations of one of the essential characteristics of the administration of justice. Whereas the function to be exercised by the District Court is a narrow one, it cannot be dismissed as a mere rubber-stamping of the earlier determination. The District Court's discretion to modify the form of redress represents a significant curtailment of the decision-making powers of the adjudication officers and the Labour Court. The District Court can, in effect, overrule their decision to direct that the employee be re-instated or re-engaged.

219. A decision-maker who is not only reliant on the parties invoking the judicial power to enforce its decisions, but whose decisions as to the form of relief are then vulnerable to being overruled as part of that process, cannot be said to be carrying out the administration of justice." (Emphasis in original.)

Accordingly, the fourth limb of the test was not satisfied.

iv. Relevance of Access to a Court of Law

22. Simons J. also considered the impact of a scheme not being exclusive in that it did not oust the right of access to the courts for claims in respect of wrongful dismissal. He noted that the orthodox position was that the existence of an appeal to the courts cannot restore constitutionality to a tribunal whose decisions, if unappealed, amount to an administration of justice (Re Solicitors Act 1954). Simons J. then referred to Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), holding that it appeared to be concerned with the division of administrative and judicial functions in a situation different to that under the 2015 Act where all issues in dispute are to be determined by an adjudication officer and the Labour Court.

23. Simons J. noted that it was anomalous that requiring the intervention of the District Court to enforce a determination of the Labour Court was sufficient to deprive it of one of the characteristics of the administration of justice but the existence of a full right of appeal against it to the Circuit Court would not. However, it may be that recourse to judicial power was always necessary to obtain an enforcement order, whereas a first-instance decision became final and conclusive in the absence of an appeal. With other statutory schemes, the legislation provided an alternative to legal proceedings, but did not displace a right of action. The 1977 Act did not oust the jurisdiction of the courts; the statutory right to make a claim for unfair dismissal was parallel to the common law right of action for wrongful dismissal.

24. However, the existence of a parallel jurisdiction under statute inhibits the common law. This is known as the "Johnson exclusion area" (Johnson v. Unisys Ltd. [2001] UKHL 13, [2003] 1 A.C. 518 ("Johnson")) where the House of Lords concluded that, by enacting the Employment Rights Act 1996, the Westminster Parliament had set up an entirely new system outside the ordinary courts and that to develop the common law in the area would run contrary to Parliament's intention. Both Johnson and the subsequent decision of Eastwood v. Magnox Electric p.l.c. [2004] UKHL 35, [2005] 1 A.C. 503 were applied by the High Court in this jurisdiction by Laffoy J. in Nolan v. Emo Oil Services Ltd. [2009] IEHC 15, [2010] 1 I.L.R.M. 228. Simons J. concluded, in this regard, that even if the preservation of a parallel right of action before the courts might be an answer to an allegation that a statutory decision-maker was carrying out the administration of justice, this could not apply in the context of employment legislation. He concluded, however, that the failure to satisfy the fourth limb of the McDonald test meant that the decision of the W.R.C. did not constitute the administration of justice for the purposes of Article 34.

v. Article 37 of the Constitution

25. In light of the finding that the determination of a claim for unfair dismissal and for the payment of wages in lieu of notice did not involve the administration of justice within the meaning of Article 34 of the Constitution, Simons J. found it unnecessary to consider arguments under Article 37. Having concluded, therefore, that the jurisdiction exercised by the W.R.C. did not amount to the administration of justice confined to courts under Article 34, Simons J. then turned to the arguments that the procedure adopted by the W.R.C. offended the Constitution.

vi. Article 40.3 of the Constitution

26. The appellant made four complaints under Article 40.3 of the Constitution:

(i.) there was no requirement that adjudication officers or members of the Labour Court have any legal qualifications, training, or experience;

(ii.) there was no provision for an adjudication officer to administer an oath or affirmation. There was no criminal sanction for a witness who gave false evidence before an adjudication officer;

(iii.) there was no express provision made for the cross-examination of witnesses; and

(iv.) the proceedings before an adjudication officer were held otherwise than in public.

27. The argument in relation to legal qualifications was made by analogy to the qualifications for appointment to judicial office. Simons J. held that this type of comparison was inappropriate; the argument started by assuming that the role of an adjudication officer was equivalent to that of a judge, but that could not be so given that he had held that decision-making under the 2015 Act did not involve the administration of justice.

28. The appellant presented affidavit evidence from a barrister and solicitor with wide experience in the field of employment law who pointed to the complexity of many of the issues of national and E.U. law that can arise in employment disputes. Both stated that, while it would be inappropriate to refer to individual cases, it was their experience that a number of adjudication officers and ordinary members of the Labour Court simply did not understand some of the more difficult questions that arise and that each had appeared in cases where they firmly believed the adjudication officer involved "quite simply did not have sufficient understanding to deal with the important matters before them". The appellant's solicitor referred to a published article which conducted a survey of users of the new system — including lawyers, representatives of employers' organisations, and trade union representatives, and others — which found that 49% were dissatisfied or very dissatisfied with the new system. It was argued that the evidence demonstrated that the absence of legal qualifications led to systemic problems with the use of adjudication officers to hear claims. Simons J. considered, however, that the generalised and vague nature of the evidence was such that it was not possible to find that there had been a systemic failure in the hearing and adjudication of claims. Whilst the circumstances in which the present appellant's claim came to be dealt with were regrettable, it was not possible to draw wider inferences of systemic failure from this particular set of circumstances.

29. Simons J. held that the structure of the 2015 Act indicated that it was a deliberate legislative choice that evidence would not be required to be given on oath. At one end of a spectrum requiring fair procedures was the criminal trial: close to the other end were disciplinary procedures against professionals where the final decision to strike off such a professional is reserved to the High Court. However, the heightened safeguards for professional persons whose capacity to earn a livelihood was at risk (Law Society of Ireland v. Coleman [2018] IESC 80 (Unreported, Supreme Court, McKechnie J., 21st of December, 2018)) could not necessarily be read across to other employment contexts. While procedures against other classes of employee can have great consequences, and it may be appropriate for there to be the hearing of evidence on oath or affirmation, appropriateness was not the same as a constitutional requirement.

30. When analysing decision-making, the full range of procedures open to a party must be examined (Crayden Fishing Co. v. Sea Fisheries Protection Authority [2017] IESC 74, [2017] 3 I.R. 785) and whilst the scheme under the 2015 Act was not unitary, a party who wishes to avail of evidence on oath or affirmation must take the trouble to bring an appeal to the Labour Court or the decision of the adjudication officer remains final. However, the existence of the safeguard of an appeal was an important factor.

31. Simons J. concluded that there was no constitutional requirement that decision-making of the type arising in a claim for unfair dismissal or for the payment of wages in lieu of notice must be performed on the basis of sworn evidence.

32. Simons J. considered that the complaint in respect of cross-examination reduced itself to one predicated on the absence of an express statutory power or duty to allow cross-examination. He considered that a power to allow cross-examination arose from the provisions of s. 41 of the 2015 Act and an adjudication officer was required to give the parties an opportunity to be heard and to present any relevant evidence. The appellant's argument that there should be an express requirement to allow cross-examination in all cases could not be reconciled with the presumption in East Donegal Co-Operative Livestock Mart Limited v. The Attorney General [1970] I.R. 317. In those cases where cross-examination was required, the adjudication officer was to be presumed to allow it; if there was a failure in this regard, then it would represent a good ground for judicial review.

33. The appellant also objected to the fact that that proceedings before an adjudication officer are held otherwise than in public (subss. 13 and 14 of s. 41 of the 2015 Act). However, Simons J. noted that the same subsections contained an express obligation to publish every decision and that proceedings in the Labour Court on appeal were conducted in public unless it determines otherwise upon the application of a party to the appeal pursuant to s. 44(7) of the 2015 Act. The appellant relied, variously, on Articles 34.1, 37, and 40.3 of the Constitution for a constitutional right to a public hearing before a statutory decision-maker, but no authority was cited in support. The appellant cited a number of cases illustrating the values underlying Article 34.1 (In Re R. Ltd. [1989] I.R. 126; Irish Times Ltd. v. Ireland [1998] 1 I.R. 359; and Gilchrist v. Sunday Newspapers Ltd. [2017] IESC 18, [2017] 2 I.R. 284). However, Simons J. held that it was not immediately apparent that such values could immediately be read across to non-judicial decision-makers. There were even exceptions to the constitutional requirement that justice be administered in public in the exercise of judicial power. Even if there was a presumption in favour of a public hearing, the requirements of the 2015 Act struck a balance when it was considered that employees may be disincentivised from bringing proceedings if first-instance hearings are in public and they could be perceived by prospective employers as troublemakers. Even if this was incorrect, Simons J. found that the provisions governing the Labour Court satisfied any requirement of a public hearing.

vii. E.C.H.R. (Article 6(1))

34. The determination of claims under the 1977 and 1991 Acts was the determination of civil rights under Article 6(1) of the Convention. However, a number of judgments of the European Court of Human Rights (Malhous v. The Czech Republic, App. No. 33071/96; Buterlevičiūtė v. Lithuania, App. No. 42139/08; and Ramos Nunes de Carvalho E Sá v. Portugal, App. Nos. 55391/13, 57728/13, and 74041/13) confirmed that a public hearing before an appellate court may remedy what would otherwise be a breach of Article 6(1) at a lower level subject to the requirement that the appellate court have "full jurisdiction". Appeals to the Labour Court are conducted de novo and thus this requirement was met.

II – Discussion

A. Development of Jurisprudence

35. While this case raises a difficult conceptual question as to the nature of the administration of justice, it might be thought the essential issue involves a consideration of a limited number of well-known cases (principally: Lynham v. Butler (No. 2); Re Solicitors Act 1954; and McDonald v. Bord na gCon) and a relatively narrow dispute about the application to this case of only two of the five criteria set out in McDonald. The appellant argues that the High Court was incorrect to hold that the fourth limb of the test (the enforcement of rights and liabilities or the imposition of penalties by the court or by the executive power of the State) was not satisfied. The State denies this and, also, argues that the High Court was wrong to conclude that the fifth limb of the test (the making of an order which, as matter of history, is an order characteristic of courts in this country) was satisfied. It will be necessary to consider the case law and legislation in closer detail, but it is useful, in my view, to try and locate this dispute in a wider context in relation to both history and jurisprudence.

36. Since the enactment in 1922 of Article 64 of the Irish Free State Constitution, it has been a fixed point in the constitutional order that justice is administered in courts by judges. Ireland has, since independence, been committed to a constitutional structure which recognises a separation of powers. The judicial power, although the weakest branch, is essential to the maintenance of that balance, particularly, perhaps, in a structure which provides for a parliamentary democracy in which the executive branch is part of, and largely controls, the legislative branch. In that sense, the independent existence of the judicial power which administers justice can be said to be the lynchpin of the constitutional order created first in 1922, and developed in 1937. But, the case law and commentary since 1922 have struggled to provide a satisfactory definition, or even description, of the field of the administration of justice. This is not, as it may be in other jurisdictions, a difficult though somewhat academic jurisprudential issue. As has been observed, "belief in the importance of protecting the judicial power from encroachment by the legislature or executive must at least invoke the idea that there is an appropriate area for its operation" (G. Marshall, Constitutional Theory (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971), p. 120, quoted in J. Casey, Constitutional Law of Ireland (Dublin: Round Hall, 2000), p. 255). The provisions of both the 1922 and 1937 constitutions make it clear that the administration of justice is consigned to courts as a matter of constitutional law which the courts are bound to uphold and enforce.

37. Ireland is by no means the only jurisdiction to struggle with the analysis of dispute resolution by administrative bodies outside courts in a system that distinguishes, even imperfectly, between executive, legislative, and judicial power. This issue has posed problems in many common law countries, particularly those with constitutions assigning the administration of justice to judges or courts or, perhaps, providing for the administration of justice in a federal system. A.V. Dicey's insistence that the common law did not conceive of any separate system akin to the civil law droit administratif was very influential within the common law world and meant that the burgeoning role of the administration in legal matters had to be addressed within the traditional structures and patterns of the common law.

38. The Industrial Revolution led to a significant increase in the role of the state and a demand for adjudication and resolution by bodies other than courts. In some cases, this was driven by the simple desire to have bodies with expertise in specific areas, as was the case in relation to issues such as the developing law of taxation or the rapid expansion of the railway system, which gave rise to novel and complex disputes thought to require particular expertise. In other cases, perhaps most notably in the field of industrial relations, there was a desire for resolution by bodies other than courts (which, particularly in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, were perceived as hostile to employees, trade unions, and collective action) and a preference for a system of low-cost, relatively informal non-judicial dispute resolution.

39. The expanded role of the State and the proliferation of administrative bodies outside the executive government led to concerns among some lawyers as to these developments. Perhaps most notably, the then Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales, Lord Hewart, a former government minister, published in 1929 a controversial, if somewhat intemperate, book entitled The New Despotism (London: Ernest Benn Limited, 1929). It criticised as constitutionally subversive the burgeoning practice of delegated legislation which, it was argued, allowed ministers, and therefore civil servants, to bypass Parliament, and the practice of assigning judicial power to specialist tribunals in breach, it was said, of Dicey's first principle of the Rule of Law. This uneasiness among lawyers was reflected in other jurisdictions and may be seen, perhaps, in the almost contemporaneous approach of the U.S. Supreme Court to the creation of a proliferation of administrative agencies under the New Deal. In the U.K., a high-powered Committee on Ministers' Powers, which included among its members Sir William Holdsworth and Harold Laski, reported on these matters in 1932. The Committee recommended that judicial decisions should "normally" be entrusted to the ordinary courts, but also considered there was nothing radically wrong in the practice of Parliament permitting the exercise of judicial powers by tribunals, recommending, however, that reasons should be given for decisions and there should be a right of appeal to the High Court on a point of law.

40. In the United Kingdom, the practice of creating administrative tribunals increased apace and led to a further review in the Franks Report in 1957 which rejected the contention that the tribunals were purely administrative in nature. It recognised that the functions performed were judicial, and, therefore, the tribunals should be considered to be provided by Parliament for adjudication rather than administration. Accordingly, the Report set out general principles for their operation by reference to familiar court-like concepts of openness, fairness, and impartiality. In the year 2000, the Leggatt Review reported on the further development of the tribunal system and recommended a comprehensive reorganisation. Subsequently, a two-level tribunal system was established with a first-tier tribunal and an upper tribunal both divided into specialist chambers by subject-matter and incorporated within the structure of the administration of justice. In this case, indeed, counsel for the appellant argued that this is the course which ought to have been taken, at least in the field of employment law, in the 2015 Act, and which, it was contended, was, moreover, constitutionally required. It was said that the logic of the judicialising of the employment relationship should lead to the conclusion that the decision-making body should have the role and status of judges under the Constitution, however unwieldy such a solution might be. One noteworthy feature of these developments is that, notwithstanding the concerns expressed by lawyers such as Hewart, the effect of the development of administrative bodies and tribunals was not the bypassing of the role of the courts. Instead, the development of robust judicial review has meant that the expansive role of the State has markedly increased the role and influence of the courts and the significance and impact of administrative law.

41. During this period, there were repeated attempts to establish a more precise definition of the judicial power and the concept of justiciability. This was not, it appears, an attempt to identify the essence of the judicial power in itself since, pace Hewart, there was little concern about legislative subtractions from the jurisdiction of the courts, but rather to cast light on the concept, popularised by the 1932 Committee, of administrative bodies carrying out "quasi-judicial" functions. This proved, however, a dispiriting (if revealing) exercise. In judicial terms, it resulted in a series of negative conclusions, most notably in the judgment of Lord Sankey L.C. in Shell Company of Australia v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation [1931] A.C. 275 ("Shell"), quoted by Haugh J. in Cowan v. A.G. at pp. 422 to 423 of the report of the latter case:-

> "It may be useful to enumerate some negative propositions on this subject: 1. A tribunal is not necessarily a Court in this strict sense because it gives a final decision. 2. Nor because it hears witnesses on oath. 3. Nor because two or more contending parties appear before it between whom it has to decide. 4. Nor because it gives decisions which affect the rights of subjects. 5. Nor because there is an appeal to the Court. 6. Nor because it is a body to which a matter is referred by another body."

42. In his 1957 Hamlyn Lectures, published as Protection from Power under English Law (London: Stevens & Sons Ltd., 1957), Lord MacDermott, the then Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, acknowledged the difficulty of drawing any clear line but suggested, at p. 52, that:-

"[a] judicial decision implies the presentation of their case by the parties to the dispute, the ascertainment of the relevant facts and of the relevant law and a decision which is reached by applying the relevant law to the relevant findings of fact".

Slightly later, however, in an essay, "Justiciability", in Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (A.G. Guest ed., Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961), the noted constitutional scholar Geoffrey Marshall asserted, bluntly, at pp. 277 to 278 that:-

"there are two interlocking questions involved in the notion of 'justiciability' when it functions as an appraising term: (1) How far is it possible to make the concept of 'judicial' methods precise? and (2) How far is it possible to specify situations or disputes which are inherently suitable to such methods? To the first question one answer seems clear: namely that it is not possible to construct from judicial materials a single set of reasonably unambiguous criteria for calling a procedure 'judicial'. Moreover many of the tests historically enunciated by the courts are now insufficiently precise to discriminate within a large penumbra of doubtful cases, and too great an element of chance enters into the question of classification where there is no specific guidance from by the Legislature. To the second question there seems an equally plain answer. No dispute is inherently justiciable or suited to judicial solution".

43. He concluded the essay with the clear, if bleak, observation at p. 287 that:-

"the characterisation of … issues as 'justiciable' or 'non justiciable' is a legislative job".

44. Nevertheless, Dr. Marshall did recognise that "a constitutional separation of powers raises the problem of characterising the judicial function in a direct and fundamental way". This neatly captures the difficulty which the courts must address in "the penumbra of doubtful cases" such as the present. There is no clear definite test capable of being constructed to distinguish the administration of justice from an administrative decision-making function bound to act judicially, but the Constitution assumes the distinction, asserts its importance, and requires the legislature to respect it and the courts to uphold it. In Ireland, and in any other jurisdiction which mandates the separation of powers, the characterisation of issues as justiciable, and falling within the province of the administration of justice, is, unavoidably, a judicial task. Even if it is true that there is no dispute that is inherently justiciable, the Constitution provides and requires that there be an area known as the administration of justice to be carried out by judges, subject only to Article 37. The courts have been appropriately cautious and have refrained from making overbold assertions of the proper scope of the administration of justice and have proceeded, instead, by way of part broad definition, part analogy, and part description.

45. The development of administrative law in Ireland has tended to reflect some of these influences, albeit with some significant differences. Dicey's teachings were, perhaps, never received as reverently here and, indeed, the constitutional developments of the early 20th century were a direct repudiation of some of the views he espoused. Nevertheless, the administration of justice required under Article 64 of the 1922 Constitution to be carried out in courts was the common law system and, therefore, the conceptual difficulties of fitting the development of adjudicative administrative bodies into the constitutional system remained. At the same time, large-scale administrative bodies did not meet with the same suspicion or scepticism in Ireland. The pre-independence land purchase schemes which were continued post-independence were massive administrative undertakings which transformed land ownership in Ireland in a way which was broadly successful. The major State enterprises established by statute in the aftermath of independence and given extensive statutory powers, like the Electricity Supply Board and Bord na Móna, tended to be viewed positively as symbols of the new State rather than as the encroachment of the administration in the field of individual enterprise. The field of industrial relations was certainly smaller than that in the neighbouring jurisdiction, and perhaps less fractious. It was, nevertheless, also affected by international developments and the increasing trend towards providing individuals with legally enforceable protection of employment. Irish law therefore showed some of the same strands as were discernible in other jurisdictions: the development of administrative agencies; the increased role of the State; a move towards individual dispute resolution in the industrial relations sector; and a significant expansion of the role of the judicial review. Nevertheless, there were differences of both detail and emphasis. More importantly, Ireland — in common with jurisdictions such as Canada and Australia — had adopted a constitution which required the administration of justice to be carried out in courts. The question, therefore, of how the proliferation of administrative agencies which required bodies to resolve disputes was to be reconciled with the fact that the administration of justice was to be carried out in courts and, at least by implication, nowhere else was something that had to be resolved as a matter of law rather than abstract theory. The foregoing is a necessarily broad-brush sketch of a number of complex developments in Ireland and elsewhere, but it may provide a useful backdrop against which to consider the developing case law and legislation.

46. While the question of the essential function of the administration of justice takes on a particular significance with the coming into force of the 1922 Constitution, a convenient starting point may be a decision in 1902: R. (Wexford County Council) v. Local Government Board for Ireland [1902] 2 I.R. 349. The case concerned the question of whether a body was amenable to certiorari, but in the course of his judgment, Palles C.B. said:-

> "I have always thought that to erect a tribunal into a "Court" or "jurisdiction," so as to make its determinations judicial, the essential element is that it should have power, by its determination within jurisdiction, to impose liability or affect rights. By this I mean that the liability is imposed, or the right affected by the determination only, and not by the fact determined, so that the liability will exist, or the right will be affected, although the determination be wrong in law or in fact. It is otherwise of a ministerial power." (Emphasis in original.)

47. This passage was much-quoted in a number of Australian cases on the judicial power, and captures one element, at least, of the administration of justice: the ability to make binding determinations affecting rights and imposing liabilities. Article 64 of the Irish Free State Constitution, enacted in 1922, provided:-

> "The judicial power of the Irish Free State (Saorstát Éireann) shall be exercised and justice administered in the public Courts established by the Oireachtas by judges appointed in manner hereinafter provided. These Courts shall comprise Courts of First Instance and a Court of Final Appeal to be called the Supreme Court. The Courts of First Instance shall include a High Court invested with full original jurisdiction in and power to determine all matters and questions whether of law or fact, civil or criminal, and also Courts of local and limited jurisdiction, with a right of appeal as determined by law."

48. These provisions fell to be analysed in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), which was a further round in the bitter struggle between the parties which had already generated a number of judgments of the Superior Courts and given rise to a real political crisis. The plaintiff was entitled to the fee simple estate in extensive lands at Mount Seskin, County Dublin, subject to a life estate in favour of one Mary MacInerney. Mrs. MacInerney had let the property to the Reverend Michael Butler at an annual rent for the duration of her estate, namely for her life. She died in 1924, and the plaintiff sought possession of the lands. The Reverend Dr. Butler contended, however, that as of the date of the passing of the Land Act 1923 — which was August, 1923, and thus predated the death of Mrs. MacInerney — he held the lands under a tenancy within the meaning of the Land Act 1923 and, accordingly, was entitled to the benefit of the Act which had the effect of divesting the landlord of his estate in favour of the occupying tenant. The Judicial Commissioner of the Land Commission (Wylie J.) had made an interim ruling that the lands constituted a holding to which the 1923 Act applied. The High Court dismissed the plaintiff's claim for ejectment, which decision was upheld by the Supreme Court ([1925] 2 I.R. 82 (High Court) and [1925] 2 I.R. 231 (Supreme Court)).

49. The plaintiff then sought to appeal to the Privy Council, which granted leave to appeal. This decision caused public consternation because it appeared inconsistent with the understanding of the Irish government of the terms of the Treaty negotiations and the circumstances in which appeal to the Privy Council would be permitted. The potential crisis was only averted by the stratagem of securing the passage by the Oireachtas of the Land Act 1926, confirming the interpretation of the 1923 Act adopted by the Supreme Court with the effect of rendering the appeal to the Privy Council moot. Viscount Cave L.C. was forced to acknowledge that the tactic was "ingenious and effective" and the appeal was withdrawn.

50. This much of the litigation has its own place in Irish history of the early 20th century (see e.g. T. Mohr, Guardian of the Treaty: The Privy Council Appeal and Irish Sovereignty (Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2016)). However, the dispute between Mr. Lynham and the Reverend Dr. Butler continued to rage. The Land Commission had published a provisional list of lands, including the lands in question, and Mr. Lynham had given notice of objection. The Lay Commissioners disallowed his objection. Mr. Lynham's appeal to the Judicial Commissioner was then postponed pending the outcome of the appeal to the Privy Council. In the aftermath of that episode, Mr. Lynham then raised an additional ground of objection: that the letting was one for temporary convenience and was not captured by the Land Act of 1923. In the words of Kennedy C.J. in the Supreme Court, Mr. Lynham had, up to this point, been uniformly unsuccessful in all his proceedings, but now a complete reversal of his fortunes took place. The Judicial Commissioner, Wylie

J., upheld the objection that the tenancy was a letting for temporary convenience, and that decision was, in turn, upheld by the Supreme Court. At that point, the Reverend Dr. Butler relinquished possession of the lands to Mr. Lynham.

51. However, even then, the dispute between the parties was not over. Mr. Lynham initiated further proceedings, Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), which sought to recover the sum of £1,600 being damages for trespass and mesne rates in respect of the occupation by the Reverend Dr. Butler of the lands between the expiration of the tenancy and the date upon which he had relinquished possession of the property. The Reverend Dr. Butler presponded by erecting a barrage of defences to this claim. For present purposes, however, the significance of the case is the claim made on his behalf that the Land Commission, other than the Judicial Commissioner, was an "illegal and unconstitutional tribunal and that the adjudication referred to was made wholly without jurisdiction and in violation of the Constitution of Saorstát Éireann" on the grounds that a decision of the Lay Commissioner was an administration of justice required under Article 64 to be carried out by a court. If so, it was contended, there could not be a valid appeal from an unconstitutional tribunal so that the orders of the Judicial Commissioner and the Supreme Court on appeal were also void.

52. It is of some significance that counsel advancing this argument was George Gavan Duffy S.C., a member of the Treaty delegation, and later to become President of the High Court. The argument of counsel is set out in some detail in the report. The exercise of judicial power and the administration of justice in Saorstát Éireann depended on the Constitution, and Article 64 imposed a personal and inalienable trust upon the judges appointed under Article 68 and they alone were authorised to exercise the judicial power of the State in the public courts established by the Oireachtas. The Lay Commissioners of the Land Commission could not be considered to be judges and, accordingly, could not exercise judicial power. Before the creation of Saorstát Éireann, the Land Commission was a court of record under the Land Law (Ireland) Act 1881 with full power to hear and determine all matters whether of law and fact, and was moreover immune from restraint by any court and from certiorari. The exercise of power by the Land Commission prior to the coming into force of the Free State Constitution had been described as an "exercise of judicial power" in R. (Lord Rossmore) v. Irish Land Commission [1894] 2 I.R. 394, and s. 24 of the Irish Land Act 1903 had been stated by Palles C.B. in In Re Talbot Crosbie's Estate [1905] 1 I.R. 570 to have conferred "a jurisdiction eminently judicial". Gavan Duffy argued that the Constitution of Saorstát Éireann created a wholly new constitutional position as regards the judiciary and the exercise of judicial power; the powers and duties of the Land Commission were merely transferred to commissioners appointed under the Land Law (Commission) Act 1923 and it became unconstitutional and illegal for the Land Commission to exercise many of their former powers. A divisional court of the High Court held that the plea was inadmissible on the grounds that the defendant could not be heard to impeach the validity of the order of the Supreme Court. The matter was appealed to the Supreme Court, which addressed the central argument in much greater detail, with each member of the court delivering a separate judgment.

53. The judgment most commonly cited is that of Kennedy C.J. He referred to Article 64 of the Free State Constitution and Article 3, s.1 of the U.S. Federal Constitution which provides that "[t]he judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish" which was, in turn, reflected in the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act (1900) 63 & 64 Vict. c. 12, s. 71 of which provided that "[t]he judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other federal courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with federal jurisdiction". Kennedy C.J. referred to some of the definitions of the judicial power contained in the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court and of the High Court of Australia. He put forward his own synthesis of the definitions which, nevertheless, he stated were "by way of description rather than of precise formula". A central passage of his judgment occurs at pp. 99 to 100:-

> "In the first place, the Judicial Power of the State is, like the Legislative Power and the Executive Power, one of the attributes of sovereignty, and a function of government. (See Article 2 of the Constitution.) It is one of the activities of the government of a civilised state by which it fulfils its purpose of social order and peace by determining in accordance with the laws of the State all controversies of a justiciable nature arising within the territory of the State, and for that purpose exercising the authority of the State over person and property. The controversies which fall to it for determination may be divided into two classes, criminal and civil. In relation to the former class of controversy, the Judicial Power is exercised in determining the guilt or innocence of persons charged with offences against the State itself and in determining the punishments to be inflicted upon persons found guilty of offences charged against them, which punishments it then becomes the obligation of the Executive Department of Government to carry into effect. In relation to justiciable controversies of the civil class, the Judicial Power is exercised in determining in a final manner, by definitive adjudication according to law, rights or obligations in dispute between citizen and citizen, or between citizens or the State, or between any parties whoever they be and in binding the parties by such determination which will be enforced if necessary with the authority of the State. Its characteristic public good in its civil aspect is finality and authority, the decisive ending of disputes and quarrels, and the avoidance of private methods of violence in asserting or resisting claims alleged or denied. It follows from its nature as I have described it that the exercise of the Judicial Power, which is coercive and must frequently act against the will of one of the parties to enforce its decision adverse to that party, requires of necessity that the Judicial Department of Government have compulsive authority over persons as, for instance, it must have authority to compel appearance of a party before it, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to order the execution of its judgments against persons and property. So much towards a definition of the term — "Judicial Power"."

54. It is of some importance that the approach taken by Kennedy C.J., while descriptive, drew upon the decisions of other common law jurisdictions. Thus, he quoted with approval, and echoed, the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Kansas v. Colorado (1907) 206 U.S. 46, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 655, that the judicial power "must be held to embrace all controversies of a justiciable nature arising within the territorial limits of the nation, no matter who may be the parties". He also referred with approval to a then-recent opinion of the Privy Council delivered by Lord Sankey L.C. in Shell Company of Australia Limited v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation [1931] A.C. 275, noting that the Chief Justice of Canada had been a member of the panel. Kennedy C.J. also quoted a number of decisions of Griffith C.J. in the Australian High Court, including the statement (itself approved in Shell) in Huddart, Parker & Co v. Moorhead (1908) 8 C.L.R. 330, 357:-

> "[T]hat the words "judicial power" … mean the power which every sovereign authority must of necessity have to decide controversies between its subjects, or between itself and its subjects, whether the rights relate to life, liberty or property. The exercise of this power does not begin until some tribunal which has power to give a binding and authoritative decision (whether subject to appeal or not) is called upon to take action."

55. Kennedy C.J. also quoted the observations of the same judge in The Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v. J.W. Alexander Limited (1918) 25 C.L.R. 434 that, without attempting an exhaustive definition of the term "judicial power", it nevertheless "includes the power to compel the appearance of persons before the tribunal in which it is vested to adjudicate between adverse parties as to legal claims, rights, and obligations, whatever their origin, and to order right to be done in the matter".

56. On the other hand, Kennedy C.J. also adopted the famous language of Lord Sankey L.C. that there may be ancillary bodies, tribunals, and even juries, who, even though they assume the style of tribunals or courts and sit on a dais adorned with the "trappings of Courts", nevertheless do not pretend to the judicial determination of "justiciable controversies". It is clear from these observations that Kennedy C.J. considered that the administration of justice involved the exercise of "the judicial power" and the determination of "justiciable controversies", and that his description of the judicial power under the Free State Constitution was consistent with the approach he discerned in other common law countries. His approach, admittedly descriptive, emphasised the determination of justiciable controversies in accordance with law by definitive and binding adjudication enforceable by the State and, for that purpose, a court must have the capacity to compel attendance of parties and witnesses and to order the execution of its judgments.

57. Turning then to the case at hand, Kennedy C.J. considered that the Land Commissioners performed functions which were largely administrative in nature. They were "primarily" administrative bodies with ministerial (administrative) duties to perform. Some duties may require to be performed judicially in such a way as not to offend the canons of natural justice, but that did not convert a ministerial (administrative) act into a judicial one. The judicial power of the State was only invoked when there was an appeal to the Judicial Commissioners, and it was irrelevant if that was described as an appeal or case stated, as Kennedy C.J. noted at p. 105:-

> "The Land Commissioners (other than the Judicial Commissioner) are, then, an administrative body of civil servants who are not Judges within the meaning of the Constitution and do not constitute a Court of Justice strictly so-called but who, in the performance of some of their duties, must act judicially, and who are always subject, in respect of any justiciable controversy arising in the course of their business, to the exercise of the Judicial Power of the State for the determination of such controversy by one of the Judges of the High Court that the State assigned to act as Judicial Commissioner for the purpose."

58. In later years Kennedy C.J.'s judgment has been regularly cited, but it is worth noting both FitzGibbon and Johnston JJ. delivered concurring judgments. FitzGibbon J. acknowledged Gavan Duffy's "devastating argument". FitzGibbon J. considered, in the first place, and somewhat controversially, that it was possible that the Land Act of 1923 could be deemed an implicit amendment of the Treaty permissible by way of ordinary legislation within eight years after the coming into force of the Constitution, as provided for by Article 50. However, he concluded that he was not satisfied that there was anything in the Act of 1923 which was repugnant to the Constitution; the distinction between the administrative functions of the Land Commission and the exercise of judicial power when the necessity for it arose was sufficiently observed by the legislation. The Land Commission must, of necessity, make decisions upon objections, but the safeguard of judicial authority was preserved by the right of appeal to the Judicial Commissioner. This was the exercise of giving a judicial decision upon a question which had been decided by the Land Commission and the exercise of its administrative functions. This bluntly pragmatic approach, that the judicial power is what the legislature says it is in any given case and it only arises in the context of the exercise of powers by the Land Commission when there is an appeal to the Judicial Commissioner, is nevertheless consistent with Kennedy C.J.'s conclusion.

59. Johnston J., for his part, laid emphasis on the fact that the adjudicative function of the Land Commission was only a part of its broader functions. He considered that the Land Commission was primarily and essentially an administrative body constituted for the purpose of carrying out great social work of the highest importance. It had, he considered, quasi-judicial powers merely ancillary to the administrative duties which it had been constituted to carry out. Having described the work of the Land Commission as "national work of creating a peasant propriety", he considered it to be "administrative work of the highest importance and of the greatest responsibility" and that the quasi-judicial powers which had been conferred upon the Commission as ancillary to and in aid of the main work were quite negligible in importance.

60. Johnston J. considered Article 64 as a provision which would be very useful in the future as a check on encroachments by the legislature and executive upon popular rights and was, he thought, derived from the provisions of the U.S. Constitution embodying, in turn, Blackstone's famous observation that "[i]n the distinct and separate existence of the judicial power … consists one main preservative of the public liberty, which cannot subsist long in any State, unless the administration of common justice be in some degree separated both from the legislative and also from the executive power". Johnston J. observed that Blackstone could not have foreseen "the enormous increase in the administrative work of the executive power which was come in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries". While the Constitution of the Irish Free State followed closely the concept of separation of powers, it had been found that this division of government functions could not "as a matter of practical polity, be carried out to its logical conclusion and can only take place as an approximation". He referred to Professor C.K. Allen, a writer "who is the most skilful of the assailants of the system or tendency in politics which is incorrectly and rather unfairly called "bureaucracy"", but who was, nevertheless, forced to admit that it was "quite illusory" to ask courts to judge, at first instance, every minor matter of dispute, arising out of our "greatly extended and reticulated administration". Johnston J. was clearly aware of the contemporary debate occurring in the United Kingdom in which Hewart and Allen were participants, and, while acknowledging the importance of maintaining the separate function of the judicial branch, nevertheless took a more nuanced view which sought to emphasise that the exercise of the powers of the Land Commission which involved the determination of legal disputes was ancillary to the overall project which was, undoubtedly, administrative in nature. This was a somewhat different approach to that taken by Kennedy C.J.

61. Johnston J. concluded that the work of carrying out the Land Purchase Code was an administrative task of national importance and of colossal magnitude. Part of that procedure required a form of ascertainment of lands to which the Acts applied. This must necessarily be left in the hands of the body or tribunal which was constituted to perform the entire task. He did not think that any other course was possible and was "absolutely satisfied that such ascertainment of the land is not, in any sense, an exercise of judicial power within the meaning of Article 64 of the Constitution. Any other result would have a most paralysing effect upon the whole work of Land Commission".

62. There was, of course, little merit in the contentions made on the Reverend Dr. Butler's behalf which involved a challenge to a jurisdiction which he had willingly invoked, participated in, and been prepared to benefit from, and in which he had even gone to the length of acquiescing in an unfavourable decision without raising any objection until the point when damages were sought. Furthermore, if his challenge was upheld, it would have led to another round in the already extended, bitter, and decade-long litigation between the parties, while significantly disrupting the work of the Land Commission. The judgments are important and useful attempts to address a difficult problem not unique to Ireland. However, it is possible to detect some uneasiness in the judgments with the analysis. In particular, there seems to be a tension between the suggestion in Kennedy C.J.'s judgment that all justiciable controversies are the preserve of the judicial power (p. 97) and his acknowledgment that a justiciable controversy may arise in the course of the business of the Land Commission (p. 105), and his later assertion that the issue only becomes a justiciable controversy when it is appealed to the Judicial Commissioner, thus invoking the jurisdiction of the courts (p. 105). The particular issue in the case involved the nature of the tenancy between the Reverend Dr. Butler and the life tenant. It is true that it was addressed for the first time before the Judicial Commissioner, but that was merely a consequence of the procedural development in the case. There was no doubt that it could have been raised before the Land Commissioners and have been determined by them. In any event, the fundamental issue of whether the land in question fell within the scope of the Land Commission's powers was determined by the Land Commission and appealed to the Judicial Commissioners. It might be thought that there is some difficulty in reconciling the expansive definition of judicial power, and justiciable controversies, with the conclusion that these issues may be determined by the Land Commission, and which is not necessarily resolved by observing that it is a small part of the general business of the Land Commission. Of course, such a tension would not have posed a particular difficulty prior to 1922 since, as Johnston J. pointed out, there was no equivalent constitutional provision in the unwritten British constitution and, in any event, that constitution was capable of encompassing a number of anomalies such as the curial power of Parliament or the position of the Lord Chancellor. It was however, a more difficult question under the terms of the 1922 Constitution.

63. The uneasiness with the task of reconciling the rigid terms of a constitution which distinguished sharply between judicial and administrative powers and consigned the former exclusively to judges, with the practical requirements of a developing administrative state, could be detected in the inclusion of Article 37 in the new Constitution providing for the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature in non-criminal matters by persons other than judges or courts. This was widely understood as being directed towards settling the doubts in relation to the Land Commission, itself, and other substantial state bodies, such as the Revenue Commissioners, which exercised important functions in the new State (see, G. Hogan Origins of the Irish Constitution (Dublin: Royal Irish Academy, 2012) pp. 41 to 42). Indeed, Gavan Duffy appears to have had some involvement in the discussions on the new Constitution, and may have expressed views on this issue as well.

64. While the objective of Article 37 may have been clear, the language is not entirely helpful. It does not suggest a different category of power, but implies, instead, the continued existence of a distinction between the executive and judicial power, and merely provides, negatively, that nothing in the Constitution will invalidate the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature. However, the breadth and significance of the powers of the Land Commission itself, "a task of national importance and of colossal magnitude", might suggest that Article 37 was of potentially broad application. Even if the powers and functions of a judicial nature exercised by the Land Commission which were henceforth to be validated by Article 37 were viewed only as a decision on the application of the relevant legislation, then such decisions were still of enormous significance for those involved, as the lengthy dispute between Mr. Lynham and the Reverend Dr. Butler, itself, testified.

65. Article 37 was applied at first instance in the decision Re Solicitors Act 1954. The Solicitors Act of 1954 had set up a new system for the disciplining of solicitors. A disciplinary committee of the Incorporated Law Society was to be established, whose members were to be approved by the Chief Justice, with power to strike off a solicitor and to order the solicitor to make restitution and satisfaction to an injured party as the committee should think fit. Traditionally, the power to strike off a solicitor had been a power exercised by the High Court in exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction over the profession. The High Court retained the power to strike off a solicitor in the aftermath of the 1954 Act. Maguire C.J., sitting in the High Court, held that the decision to strike off a solicitor was the determination of a justiciable controversy. However, as the power was limited in scope to the solicitors' profession, and there was an appeal to the High Court, he considered the powers could be said to be of a limited nature and permissible under Article 37.

66. The Supreme Court reversed this decision, upholding the decision that the disciplinary committee was, indeed, exercising powers of a judicial nature, but concluding that they were not limited and saved by Article 37. While, as a matter of history, the discipline of members of the solicitors' profession had traditionally been a matter for courts — and this, indeed, was the basis upon which later courts and commentators considered that the decision could be justified — the judgment of Kingsmill Moore J. took a notably broader approach. The power to strike off was a disciplinary and punitive power with the consequence that a struck-off solicitor committed a criminal offence if he or she practised thereafter. Striking off was, he considered, a more severe penalty, therefore, than imprisonment. By the same token, restitution and satisfaction could only be made in respect of something in the nature of misconduct which could include fraud and negligence. To that extent, Kingsmill Moore J. considered that it was impossible to distinguish the powers and functions of a committee to determine whether such misconduct had taken place and to order restitution and satisfaction from those of a court trying an action for fraud and negligence, unless, indeed, it was that the functions of the committee were broader. Accordingly, he considered that the committee was exercising a judicial power.

67. Moreover, Kingsmill Moore J. disagreed that the power of the committee could be saved by the provisions of Article 37. In an important passage in the judgment, at pp. 263 to 264, he said:-

matter. Limited jurisdictions are specially dealt with in Article 34, 3, 4°. It is the "powers and functions" which must "limited," not the ambit of their exercise. Nor is the test of limitation to be sought in the number of powers and functions which are exercised. The Constitution does not say "powers and functions limited in number." Again it must be emphasised that it is the powers and functions which are in their own nature to be limited. A tribunal having but a few powers and functions but those are far-reaching effect and importance could not properly be regarded as exercising "limited" powers and functions. The judicial power of the State is by Article 34 of the Constitution lodged in the Courts, and the provisions of Article 37 do not admit of that power being trenched upon, or of its being withdrawn piecemeal from the Courts. The test is to whether a power is or is not "limited" in the opinion of the Court, lies in the effect of the assigned power when exercised. If the exercise of the assigned powers and functions is calculated ordinarily to affect in the most profound and far-reaching way the lives, liberties, fortunes or reputations of those against whom they are exercised they cannot properly be described as "limited"."

"Eventually the question whether any particular tribunal is unconstitutional must depend on whether the congeries that the powers and functions conferred on the tribunal or any particular power or function is such as to involve the pronouncement of decisions, the making of orders, and the doing of acts, which on the true intendment of the Constitution are preserved for judges as being properly regarded as part of the administration of justice, and not of the limited character validated by Article 37."

Thus, the decision gave a broad reading to the judicial power under Article 34 in considering that the court should have regard to the nature of the power being exercised, rather than its form, but a very narrow reading to Article 37.

68. Cowan v. A.G. concerned an election petition which was brought in respect of a member of Dublin City Council. Under the Municipal Corporations Act 1882 and the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act 1884, judges nominated a practising barrister to be the election court to try the petition. The plaintiff sought a declaration that such an assignment was unconstitutional. Haugh J. referred to the provisions of the Adoption Act 1952, the Social Welfare Act 1952, the Air Navigation and Transport Act 1936, and the Tribunals of Enquiry (Evidence) Act 1921, all of which had authority to compel the attendance of witnesses and determine issues in accordance with law. He considered that there were many other tribunals of a similar nature. That was bound to be so, he considered, as "Article 37 of the Constitution expressly allows the existence of such tribunals provided they do not adjudicate on criminal matters", and acknowledged that if it had it not been for the decision in Re Solicitors Act 1954, then the Disciplinary Committee of the Incorporated Law Society might also have been referred to as an example of an Article 37 tribunal. Haugh J. considered that, following the decision in Re Solicitors Act 1954, however, an election court could similarly be said to exercise far-reaching powers affecting the lives, liberties, fortunes, or reputations of those against whom they were exercised and, accordingly, could not be considered as limited functions and powers allowable by Article 37. The significance of this finding is, however, lessened by the fact that Haugh J. acknowledged that the election court could, at any point, investigate and try a person on a charge of an illegal or corrupt practice. Thus, it was a body which exercised powers in criminal matters assigned to it, which was something expressly prohibited by Article 37. Accordingly, he concluded that the election court, when presided over by a practising barrister, was unconstitutional as the administration of justice by a body other than a court, and by a person other than a judge.

69. The decisions in Re Solicitors Act 1954 and Cowan v. A.G. might have been expected to raise further questions in relation to the compatibility with the Constitution of a range of statutory bodies, and to suggest that the courts would take a much stricter approach to the provisions of Article 34 of the Constitution. However, as it transpired, the decisions marked a high-water mark from which subsequent cases have retreated.

70. In State (Shanahan) v. Attorney General [1964] I.R. 239 ("State (Shanahan)"), Davitt P. returned to the general question of the definition of the judicial power and observed, at p. 247:-

> "I have certainly no intention of rushing in where so many eminent jurists have feared to tread, and attempting a definition of judicial power; but it does seem to me there can be gleaned from the authorities certain essential elements of that power. It would appear that they include 1, the right to decide as between parties disputed issues of law or fact, either of civil or criminal nature or both; 2, the right by such decision to determine what are the legal rights of the parties as to the matters in dispute; 3, the right, by calling in aid the executive power of the State, to compel the attendance of the necessary parties and witnesses; 4, the right to give effect to and force such decision, again by calling in aid the executive power of the State. Any tribunal which has and exercises such rights and powers seems to me to exercising the judicial power of the State."

This approach did not, however, gain traction in the decided cases. Instead, a somewhat different test was formulated in the decision of McDonald v. Bord na gCon and which has tended to be the focus of subsequent cases.

71. The Greyhound Industry Act of 1958 ("the 1958 Act") empowered the newly established Bord na gCon with the consent of the Irish Coursing Club, after the making of an inquiry, to make an exclusion order in relation to any person. That had the effect of excluding a person from being at a greyhound race track or authorised coursing meeting or any public sale of greyhounds. In the High Court, Kenny J. held that the effect of such an exclusion order was to give to the licensee of a racecourse the powers of an occupier, and to override the terms of the contract under which the person had gained access and prohibit entry upon a greyhound race track or authorised coursing meetings or of public sales of greyhounds. In form, it corresponded to an injunction which was a form of order made by courts as a matter of history, although it was not enforced by the executive power of the State. It deprived the person against whom it was made of the contractual right which he acquired otherwise by paying for admission to the track or meeting and imposed a penalty which Kenny J. considered was similar to that which the courts may impose, for it seemed there was a similarity between an exclusion order and a disqualification order made under the Road Traffic Acts.

72. Turning to the argument that the making of an exclusion order constituted an administration of justice, he said at pp. 230 to 231:-

> "It seems to me that the administration of justice has these characteristic features:
> (1) a dispute or controversy as to the existence of legal rights or a violation of the law;
> (2) The determination or ascertainment of the rights of parties or the imposition of liabilities or the infliction of a penalty;
> (3) The final determination (subject to appeal) of legal rights or liabilities or the imposition of penalties;
> (4) The enforcement of those rights or liabilities or the imposition of a penalty by the Court or by the executive power of the State which is called in by the Court to enforce its judgment;

(5) The making of an order by the Court which is a matter of history is an order characteristic of Courts in this country."

This formulation has obvious points of similarity to that offered by Davitt P. in State (Shanahan) and, indeed, the earlier discussion in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2) but has some points of difference. McDonald v. Bord na gCon introduces the question of the historical usage of the courts as a test of the judicial function, which is not mentioned in State (Shanahan), whereas the latter case includes consideration of the power to compel the attendance of witnesses as a feature of the administration of justice, which was also referred to in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2) and the cases considered therein, but does not figure in the McDonald v. Bord na gCon formulation.

73. Returning to the facts of the case, Kenny J. concluded that an exclusion order under s. 47 of the 1958 Act possessed all of the characteristics of the administration of justice. An exclusion order was made only when Bord na gCon was satisfied that some violation of the code of conduct had occurred. It was in the nature of the imposition of a liability and involved a determination that the person was guilty of some disreputable behaviour or conduct. Finally, an exclusion order seemed similar in form and effect to an injunction against trespass, and such an injunction was an order characteristic of the courts. Kenny J. acknowledged that the powers of the board were limited in the sense that it had no power to summon witnesses or administer an oath, and the refusal of witness to attend was not a contempt matter. Its functions were limited to those specified in the Act, but those considerations were irrelevant because of the test set out in Re Solicitors Act 1954: namely, that the question of whether a power was limited or not was determined by the effect of the assigned powers and if the exercise of those powers was calculated, ordinarily, to affect in the most profound and far-reaching way the lives, liberties, fortunes, or reputations of those against whom they are exercised, then they could not be described as limited.

74. The approach taken by Kenny J. in McDonald v. Bord na gCon is consistent with that taken in Re Solicitors Act 1954 in that it is broad in its approach to the question of whether the functions and powers exercised are judicial in nature. The many evident differences of power and procedure between proceedings under the Act and court proceedings were not considered relevant. By contrast, a narrow view of Article 37 was taken. Instead, the effect of an exclusion order was considered to be far-reaching and akin to an order of a civil court. However, the Supreme Court took a different view. While accepting the characteristics of judicial function set out by Kenny J., the Supreme Court concluded that the 1958 Act did not satisfy any of the requirements. At p. 244, Walsh J. said:-

> "In the Court's view the bodies or persons conducting the investigations under ss. 43 or 44, while bound to act judicially, are not constituted judicial persons or bodies nor do they exercise powers of a judicial nature within the meaning of Article 37 of the Constitution. This is an essential difference between the judgment of this Court and the judgment of Mr. Justice Kenny. Accepting the characteristic features of a judicial body set out by Mr. Justice Kenny these investigating authorities do not satisfy any of those requirements. In particular it is to be noted that the investigating authorities do not themselves by virtue of anything in ss. 43 or 44 affect any right or impose any penalty or liability on anybody. So far as the Board is concerned in the exercise of its powers under s. 47, or the Club in the exercise of its powers under the section, they are not constituted judicial bodies or do not exercise powers of a judicial nature as they would only satisfy one of the tests referred to. In the opinion of the Court the submissions that the Act in s. 47 violates the provisions of Articles, 34, 37, and 38 of the Constitution fails."

75. It is somewhat surprising that the five-part test outlined by Kenny J. in McDonald v. Bord na gCon has come to be treated as a canonical checklist for the identification of the administration of justice to the exclusion of the discussion in the prior case law. The endorsement by the Supreme Court of the test in the judgment of Walsh J. did not involve any extensive consideration of it, or the case law, and, moreover, involved the paradox that the application of the test in the Supreme Court led to an almost polar opposite conclusion to that to which it had led the court which had advanced and constructed it. Indeed, it appears that Kenny J., as the chairman for the Report of the Committee on the Price of Building Land (1974), participated in the majority report, expressing the view that a function need not satisfy the McDonald test, but could still be the administration of justice under Article 34. This view appeared to underpin the recommendation in the report that the decision on inclusion of land in a designated area was a function which was required to be performed by the High Court.

76. Nevertheless, the five-part test in McDonald v. Bord na gCon has been repeated in a number of subsequent cases, albeit that there are few (if any) examples of legislative provisions which have fallen foul of it. Indeed, it may be that the decision of Kenny J. on the 1958 Greyhound Industry Act, so rapidly overturned by the Supreme Court, is one of the very few. It may be that the merit of the test (if it is such) was found to lie in its restrictive effect rather than any jurisprudential precision. It is, moreover, significant that this was not the only issue decided in McDonald v. Bord na gCon nor the proposition for which it is most commonly cited. In the Supreme Court, Walsh J. held that the exercise of the statutory power carried with it the obligation that the investigation be objective and carried out in accordance with the dictates of natural justice. This illustrates the fact that the development of the law in relation to the nature of the judicial power must be seen against the background of the increasing extent to which the law found that, even if the procedure fell outside the area of the administration of justice, the actions of administrative bodies in question were subject to judicial review which, over the succeeding decades, has become increasingly searching.

77. A further important case in the sequence is Keady. The plaintiff was subject to disciplinary proceedings under the Garda Disciplinary Regulations 1971, and the Commissioner decided to dismiss him from the force. The plaintiff challenged the decision on a number of grounds, including an argument in reliance on the decision Re Solicitors Act 1954 and the far-reaching effect test. It was argued that the decision to dismiss the plaintiff was a judicial function. Counsel argued that the decision to dismiss the plaintiff amounted to the administration of justice within the meaning of Article 34 and Article 37 and, because of its far-reaching consequences, it could not be considered to be the exercise of a limited function or power under Article 37. Only the State, by means of the courts being an organ of the State, could dismiss a member from An Garda Síochána. Significantly, counsel for the State argued in reply that such an argument would put at risk a number of bodies, e.g.: the Valuation Tribunal; the decision-making procedures within the Department of Social Welfare; the decisions of the Legal Aid Board; and, notably in the present context, the decisions of the Employment Appeals Tribunal. The Supreme Court unanimously dismissed the claim. McCarthy J. considered that dismissal from An Garda Síochána did not satisfy the McDonald v. Bord na gCon test. He also observed that it was hardly intended by the court in McDonald v. Bord na gCon to exclude the matters identified by Kennedy C.J. in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), or indeed Davitt P. in State (Shanahan). He was reluctant to attempt a definition of judicial power and considered it easier, if less intellectually satisfying, to say in a given incidence whether or not the procedure was an exercise of such power rather than to identify a comprehensive checklist for that purpose save, however, that the requirement to act judicially was not an indicator of an exercise of the judicial power. This approach harked back to the descriptive approach of Kennedy C.J. in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2). McCarthy J. referred, in this regard, to the role of the court as a matter of history in the supervision and disciplining of solicitors. O'Flaherty J., concurring, went further. He considered that the case of solicitors "must be regarded as exceptional and, perhaps, anomalous and owes a great deal to the historic fact that judges were always responsible for the decision to strike solicitors off the roll".

78. Keady represents, therefore, a significant retreat from the rigorous and demanding approach exemplified by Re Solicitors Act 1954 and the judgment of Kenny J. in McDonald v. Bord na gCon. The McDonald v. Bord na gCon test was treated as one guide to the identification of the judicial function which was, in any event, largely a matter of impression. The decision in Re Solicitors Act 1954 was confined to its own facts and treated as somewhat anomalous. Part of the justification for this more relaxed attitude to the significant decision-making functions of non-judicial bodies may, perhaps, be detected in the reference by O'Flaherty J. to the line of authority establishing that:-

> "there is now in place a well-charted system of administrative law which requires decision-makers to render justice in the cases brought before them and sets out the procedures that should be followed, which procedures will vary from case to case and from one type of tribunal to another; and which, of course, are subject to judicial review".

B. The Act of 1977

79. While Keady post-dates the enactment of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, it represents a point in the trajectory of the law that was already discernible in 1977. The question of employment law dealt with in that statute, and the wider context of industrial relations law, raises, in particular, issues in the context of the distinction between judicial bodies and administrative tribunals. The history of the interaction of the common law and the field of industrial relations is particularly strained. The individual, contractual, focus of what was at one time called the Law of Master and Servant was not easily reconciled with the collectivist approach of the developing trade union movement. Trade unions, with some justification, were resentful of the decisions of the common law courts in the U.K. of the late 19th and early 20th century, and tended to favour the use of their developing political power to obtain statutory amendments designed to reverse unfavourable decisions and strengthen the role of unions and their capacity to protect workers by collective action. In that respect, the Trade Disputes Act of 1906 was a response to and reversal of cases like the Taff Vale Case (Taff Vale Railway Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants [1901] 1 K.B. 170) and others. The difficulties caused by industrial disputes were to be addressed by negotiation, arbitration, and conciliation, and if the law was to be involved, it was to establish specialist bodies to assist in that task, such, indeed, as the Labour Court established by the Industrial Relations Act 1946.

80. However, during the 20th century, there was an increasing international trend towards providing individual remedies for employees in respect of disputes concerning employment which would be binding and enforceable as a matter of right. This was obviously in the interest of employees, but was perceived as of general benefit to employers, and the public also, in that it tended to reduce the possibility that individual disputes about employment could create damaging general industrial disputes. As D. Ryan, Redmond on Dismissal Law (3rd edn., Dublin: Bloomsbury Professional, 2017) pp. 267 to 270 noted, recommendations of the International Labour Organisation and developments in the law of what was then the E.E.C. influenced the development of Irish law towards providing individual legally enforceable remedies for employment disputes, particularly relating to redundancy and dismissal.

81. The development of statutory bodies for the resolution of disputes, and the particular question of bodies having powers to provide remedies for individual employees in respect of redundancy and dismissal, poses obvious problems with the common law which distinguishes sharply between the judicial function for the determination of individual disputes and the performance of functions described as administrative, albeit that such functions may have been required to be performed judicially. Many of the cases from common law countries, including the Australian cases, some of which were noted in the judgments in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), that considered the extent to which certain industrial relations bodies could be considered to exercise judicial power arose in this precise context.

82. Two cases which reached the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council during this period illustrate the type of issues which arose, and the developing international trend towards remedies provided by statute which could be enforced before non-judicial tribunals. In Saskatchewan Labour Relations Board v. John East Ironworks [1949] A.C. 134, the Privy Council reversed the finding of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan and held that a labour board empowered to order reinstatement of an employee, but to do so not just by the application of legal principles to ascertained facts, but by considerations of policy, was an administrative tribunal rather than a court. The Privy Council considered that there was "no better approach than to ask whether the dispute was of the sort that required determination by judges". This was to find an echo in McCarthy J.'s observation in Keady that the matter is really one of impression rather than definition. Later again, in United Engineers Workers' Union v. Devanayagam [1968] A.C. 356, the Privy Council, by a narrow majority, overturned the decision of the Supreme Court of Ceylon that a labour commissioner with power to order reinstatement of a dismissed employee was exercising the judicial power and ought to have been appointed by the judicial services commission. In significant contrast to the provisions of the Act of 1977, the commissioner was empowered to make such order as he considered just and equitable and the majority, while acknowledging the matter was not free from difficulty, considered that the general function of the Act was the resolving of industrial disputes rather than to give effect to legal rights. In an interesting judgment, the minority (Lord Guest and Lord Devlin) considered that judicial power was a concept capable of clear delineation and had to be since it was the basis of a constitutional requirement. Relying in part on the Australian cases of Huddart, Parker & Co v. Moorhead (1908) 8 C.L.R. 330 and The Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v. J.W. Alexander Limited (1918) 25 C.L.R. 434, referred to in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2) set out at paras. 54 and 55 above, they concluded that the judicial power was concerned with "the ascertainment, declaration and enforcement of the rights and liabilities as they exist or are deemed to exist at the moment the proceedings are instituted", whereas the arbitral power in industrial disputes was to enforce what, in the opinion of the arbitrator, ought to be the respective rights and liabilities of the parties, which test they considered was satisfied. These cases illustrate the fact that the resolution of employment disputes in the field of industrial relations poses particular difficulties of definition and, moreover, that no clearer approach has emerged in the international jurisprudence than is to be found in the Irish case law.

83. The Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 was a significant development in Irish law. While it followed the precedent of the Redundancy Payments Act 1967 and, indeed, transferred the jurisdiction of the Redundancy Appeals Tribunal created by that Act to the Employment Appeals Tribunal created by the 1977 Act, it was of much wider impact. The Rights Commissioners and the Employment Appeals Tribunal had power to resolve disputes under the Redundancy Payments Act 1967, the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973, and the 1977 Act itself. The Act defined unfair dismissal and provided for redress by way of reinstatement, reengagement, or compensation not exceeding 104 weeks' remuneration. Regulations could be made governing the procedure to be followed before the tribunal, the representation of parties attending, and the making of an award by the tribunal of costs and expenses. Section 10(4) of the Act provided for an appeal to the Circuit Court from a determination of the tribunal. Section 15 of the Act maintained the right of a person to recover damages at common law for unfair dismissal, but also provided that the initiation of a claim under the Act barred an entitlement to recover damages at common law and that proceedings at common law, similarly, precluded a claim for redress under the Act. Proceedings before a Rights Commissioner were to be conducted other than in public (s. 8(6)) but the E.A.T. was to sit in public. By the incorporation of the provisions of s. 21(2) of the Industrial Relations Act 1946, and s. 39(17) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1967, the E.A.T. was given power to summon witnesses and to order them to produce documents and was given power to take evidence on oath, and a failure or refusal to give evidence was an offence. Witnesses before the E.A.T. had the same privileges and immunity as a witness before the High Court.

84. For present purposes, the most noteworthy feature of the Act was its procedure for enforcing the determinations of the tribunal. Section 10(1) of the 1977 Act provided for the procedure that, if an employer failed to carry out a determination of the tribunal within six weeks from the date the determination had been communicated, the Minister for Labour could, if he or she thought it appropriate, institute and bring proceedings to the Circuit Court for redress under the Act. Such proceedings would be a de novo hearing, and the Circuit Court was free to make such order as it thought fit within the jurisdiction created by the Act. Subsequently, however, s. 11(3) of the Unfair Dismissals (Amendment) Act 1993 provided for enforcement of a determination of the tribunal by application to the Circuit Court, by either the employee or the Minister and it was provided that the court:-

> "shall, on application to it in that behalf … without hearing the employer or any evidence (other than in relation to the matters aforesaid) make — (I) an order directing the employer to carry out the determination in accordance with its terms".

If the determination directed reinstatement or reengagement, and the court considered it appropriate to do so, the court could make an order of compensation in lieu. The "matters aforesaid" referred to were that a determination had been made and had not been complied with within the statutory period. This mechanism, with the substitution of the District Court for the Circuit Court, appears to be the precedent for the procedure applicable generally under the 2015 Act.

85. It should be noted that, since its enactment, questions have been raised about the compatibility of the 1977 Act with the Constitution, both in the terms of the Act as originally drafted, and as amended in 1993. Thus, the most recent edition of Kelly: The Irish Constitution (5th edn., G.W. Hogan, G.F. Whyte, D. Kenny, & R. Walsh eds., Dublin: Bloomsbury Professional, 2018) ("Kelly"), at para. 6.4.100, states:-

> "The former Employment Appeals Tribunal (which was not composed of judges) was established by s 39 of the Redundancy Act 1967 as an amended by s 18 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977. Under the latter Act, the Tribunal was empowered, inter alia, to award compensation to dismissed employees up to a maximum sum of an amount representing two years' salary. The tribunal would appear to have been administering justice and it must be an open question as to whether its powers were 'limited' within the meaning of Article 37. In Government of Canada v Employment Appeals Tribunal, McKenzie J drew attention to these potential constitutional difficulties and given that the powers of the Employment Appeals Tribunal are now exercised by adjudication officers pursuant to the Workplace Relations Act 2015, it might be thought that similar constitutional concerns may exist in relation to the powers of these officers."

86. Professor James Casey's Constitutional Law of Ireland, noted that the possible constitutional difficulties appear to have influenced the form of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977. He considered that the power conferred on the E.A.T. appeared judicial, and plainly analogous to the courts' traditional jurisdiction over contracts, and that it was open to question that it could be said to be limited. However, the machinery for enforcement involved an application to the Circuit Court. The Circuit Court was not bound by the

E.A.T.'s determination either as to entitlement to redress or the form it should take. These observations, it should be said, do not appear to have taken account of the terms of the Unfair Dismissals (Amendment) Act 1993. However, he went on to consider the jurisdiction of the Labour Court under the Employment Equality Act 1977. The Labour Court was empowered to make an order for the enforcement of an earlier determination and failure to carry out such an order was a criminal offence. He commented that it was yet to be determined if the limitation on the power of the E.A.T. to make binding orders rendered it constitutional.

87. A similar analysis was offered in D.G. Morgan, The Separation of Powers in the Irish Constitution (Dublin: Round Hall Sweet & Maxwell, 1997). Professor Morgan considered that the provisions of s. 10 of the 1977 Act requiring enforcement by the Circuit Court at the suit of the Minister where the Circuit Court was free to make its own decision, after a full hearing, was sufficient to "probably make it constitutional". Again, this passage does not address the effect of the amendment made in 1993. By contrast, however, he considered (at p. 106) that the Labour Court's authority under the Employment Equality Act 1977 may fail the essential test (which is whether the non-court's initial decision is final or whether it can be re-agitated or reheard before a court) and concluded that it was quite possible that the making of an order such as that authorised by the Employment Equality Act 1977 by a body other than a court was unconstitutional.

88. It is somewhat puzzling that different methods of enforcement were provided for under closely-related legislation operating in the same field, and more surprising, perhaps, that the evolution of the legislation has been towards reducing almost to vanishing point the degree to which the determinations of the respective tribunals in the field of labour law were capable of review or appeal to a court, even though those features had been identified as probably essential to the constitutional validity of the structure. The view expressed by these distinguished authors has not been doubted in any of the subsequent case law, and no decision can be pointed to which suggests a different analysis. Nevertheless, the legislative evolution has been consistently to expel from the structure any possibility of review or confirmation by a court until, eventually, the 2015 Act adopted a single minimalist structure of a decision by an authorised officer capable of appeal to the Labour Court (with an appeal on a point of law to the High Court), enforceable by ex parte application to the District Court, whose powers were limited to considering if the determination had indeed been made and not complied with within 56 days of notification and, in cases of where reinstatement or reengagement had been ordered, considering whether compensation should be ordered instead. It is this feature of the Act, however, alone, which the High Court found meant that the procedure did not satisfy the fourth limb of the McDonald v. Bord na gCon test and thus was not repugnant to the Constitution.

C. The McDonald v. Bord na gCon Test

89. Much of the recent case law has involved a close, if unrewarding, analysis of the five-part test in McDonald v. Bord na gCon, and this case was argued both in the High Court and in this court by reference to it. But it is, I believe, helpful to look at the issue in a much broader perspective. The Irish Constitution has, since 1922, entrenched a tripartite separation of powers. However, although Montesquieu drew on what he believed to be the example provided by the British system, that system, large elements of which we inherited in 1922 and maintained thereafter, did not have a clear-cut separation between the powers of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches, and the system established under the Irish Constitution, although more rigorous, has nevertheless provided for an interaction and interdependence between the branches. In our system, where the executive sits in parliament, the executive normally controls the legislature and has the power of appointment of the judiciary. Legislation, for its part, can alter the common law and amend or abolish causes of action or create new ones. Neither the 1937 Constitution nor its predecessor contained any definition of the judicial power (or, indeed, the executive or legislative powers) and has not been interpreted in such a way that each branch may only exercise powers defined as appropriate for that branch. Courts sometimes perform tasks which can be considered administrative, such as licensing, or wardship, or certain functions under the Companies Acts. For example, under s. 54(7) of the Fisheries Act 1980, it was possible to appeal to the High Court from an order of the Minister for the Marine designating an area as suitable for aquaculture if he considered it in the public interest to do so, which does not appear to be an intrinsically judicial task or one which gives rise to any issue of law: Courtney v. Minister for the Marine (Unreported, High Court, O'Hanlon J., 21st of December, 1988). On the other hand, bodies established by legislation or by the executive may be required to perform functions apparently judicial in nature, or at least be required to act judicially in certain circumstances. There are areas which move between the branches. Originally, the questions of restrictive practices and monopolies were seen as administrative functions requiring economic and policy expertise. With the passage of the Competition Act 1991, such matters have become justiciable.

90. In Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), Kennedy C.J. stated that the constitutional assignment of the administration of justice of the courts and judges would be jealously guarded. However, the subsequent decisions of the courts have produced few examples of legislation being struck down as a wrongful exercise of or interference with the judicial power, and the case law has shown little enthusiasm for an expansive reading of that power. Increasingly, the decision in Re Solicitors Act 1954 appears as an outlier rather than establishing a principle. By the same token, the fears expressed, even in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), that the other branches would seek to remove or whittle away the courts' jurisdiction have not been realised either. As counsel for the Attorney General pointed out, the 20th century has seen a steady expansion of the reach of the law and, accordingly, of the courts. The great expansion in the role of the State in the 20th century, and the transfer by the legislature of functions, which previously might have been considered to be matters for the executive branch alone, to newly-created statutory bodies, and the concurrent general expansion of the power of judicial review of administrative action, has meant that the boundaries of law's empire, as it were, extend much further than might have been contemplated in 1922 or 1937. Looked at functionally, therefore, rather than from the perspective of legal theory, the decisions of the courts in this field have tended to a pragmatic outcome in which the assignment of the administration of justice to the judicial branch has not operated to hinder these developments, even if that has not been achieved by reasoning which, to borrow the language of McCarthy J. in Keady, is not always necessarily intellectually satisfying or elegant, although, in that regard, it must be said that the approach of the case law is firmly in line with international comparators.

91. It is worth recalling that Kenny J., in setting out the test in the High Court in McDonald v. Bord na gCon, would have applied it in a very broad way to find that the powers of Bord na gCon to investigate complaints and make an exclusion order enforceable by a racecourse operator nevertheless constituted the administration of justice. However, almost from the time of the decision of the Supreme Court in that case, the test, while remaining in a form identical to that advanced by Kenny J., has been interpreted and applied narrowly, with the effect that few, if any, provisions have fallen foul of it. To that extent, it perhaps owes its longevity to the fact that, by emphasising the historical, it tends to exclude novelty and thus achieves a desired balance and avoids any undue restriction on the capacity of the State to provide for a range of decision-making functions with particular expertise, or informal procedures, or both. However, the treatment of the criteria in McDonald as a checklist which must be minutely and precisely complied with risks missing the wood for the trees. It also encourages an approach to drafting that could remove proceedings from the field of the administration of justice because of some small, and in truth insignificant, deviation from the checklist. That would be a triumph of form over substance. But, whatever the conceptual difficulties of delineating the precise borders of the judicial function, the Constitution requires that there be an area that is and will remain the exclusive domain of the administration of justice in courts by judges, or in Article 37 tribunals. It is important to apply any test, therefore, with an understanding of the substance it is meant to determine.

92. It may be preferable, therefore, as indicated by McCarthy J. in Keady, to treat McDonald v. Bord na gCon as part of a general approach to the issue alongside, rather than replacing, the observations in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2) and those in State (Shanahan), and as indicating general features which tend to show the administration of justice, rather than as a definite and prescriptive test. As one commentator observed of the test, it:-

> "provides only a descriptive summary of the everyday workload of the contemporary court. An ex post facto overview of the average judicial caseload, it does not offer a suitably prescriptive analysis of the core concepts of the judicial function. The logic of Kenny J.'s position is hopelessly circular, relying on the current nature of the court's activities to define its function into the future. The McDonald criteria reflect the judge's estimation only of what the courts do, rather than what they ought to do. In this, it owes more to historical happenstance than conceptual coherence." (E. Carolan, The New Separation of Powers: A Theory for the Modern State, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009)).

93. The features in McDonald v. Bord na gCon are closely linked and, to some extent, overlap. They do identify something central to the administration of justice and may be understood as indicating features of importance rather than establishing a statutory checklist. Some, indeed, of the features may be more important than others, and it may also be relevant to consider not merely whether the provision satisfies the particular heading, but also to assess the extent to which it does so.

94. The first, second, and third features are closely related since they identify a dispute about legal rights, its resolution, and determination. The fourth is a logical extension of the third, since the resolution of the dispute must not be dependent upon the agreement of the parties, but must be capable of enforcement in cases of refusal of the losing party to comply. The fifth feature is, however, quite different. Viewed and applied narrowly, it has the effect of confining judicial power to the areas of the traditional causes of action and proceedings and fossilising the administration of justice in the form of the business of courts in the mid-20th century. The novelty of any new provision (which is, after all, the raison d'être of any new scheme) becomes a shield against challenge, no matter how completely the provision might fit the preceding limbs of the test. This feature can give rise to a rather sterile debate as to the extent to which it is necessary that the order made must be characteristic of the courts of this country. In this case, for example, it might be argued that an order for reinstatement is merely a type of order of specific performance, which is a characteristic feature of the courts of equity. On the other hand, it is argued that such an order is a clear departure from the traditional law, which held that, almost without exception, a contract of service could not be made the subject of an order for specific performance. It is difficult to see either argument as compelling.

95. I think this feature is best understood in a broader sense and as emphasising the importance of the existing jurisdiction of the courts, and that any provision subtracting from that jurisdiction, or creating a parallel jurisdiction which might render the courts' traditional jurisdiction defunct, is one which should be closely scrutinised by the courts for compatibility with the Constitution. A distinctive feature of the courts system established by the Irish Constitution is that there is no structural distinction between administrative courts and the ordinary courts. The ordinary courts system, moreover, deals with every type of dispute, whether as to breaches of the criminal law, public law, or private law issues. It is noteworthy that, although in 1937 there were Continental models which were considered and available, the Constitution did not create a constitutional court to exercise the jurisdiction explicitly conferred under the Constitution to declare acts of legislation void, but — deliberately, it seems — assigned that role to the ordinary courts, which dealt with the full range of disputes, both public and private, and which, indeed, had full and original jurisdiction. It may be speculated that this assignment of jurisdiction in respect of possible repugnancy was, in part, a recognition that the legal and analytical skills, and courtroom procedures, utilised to resolve disputes of public and private law were considered to be beneficial, and that respect for the decisions of the courts on such common law matters cross-subsidised, as it were, the constitutional adjudication and, perhaps, vice versa. There is, moreover, a critical mass required for the functioning of the courts system, which normally involves a breadth of subject matter. It is not surprising, therefore, that subtraction from such jurisdiction would be scrutinised closely, not just because of the fear of the incremental whittling away of the jurisdiction of the courts, and thus the administration of justice, to which Kennedy C.J. alluded in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), but also because of the possible limitation of the capacity of the courts to perform the role assigned to them by the Constitution and which involves a range of jurisidictions. While there has never been a suggestion that the whittling away of court jurisdiction was desired by the legislative or executive branches, constitutional provisions, like constitutional rights, as Ó Dálaigh C.J. put it in McMahon v. A.G. [1972] I.R. 69, are established not merely to deal with the problems of the past, but also to guard against the improbable — but not to be overlooked — perils of the future.

96. The administration of justice is not, however, to be defined by, or limited to, those areas traditionally dealt with by the courts. The proper scope of the administration of justice is not determined simply by analogy with what was done by the courts as a matter of history, and still less by the form of orders traditionally made by them. It may be possible to say, even if no single test can be advanced, that an area is something intrinsically within the scope of the administration of justice. The existence of boundary disputes does not prevent agreement that some areas are definitively within one country or another. In any event, the Constitution establishes an area which is the administration of justice, and the courts must uphold that command. Even if it is considered an impossible task, as a matter of pure theory, to define with precision the exact boundaries of the administration of justice or to offer a single infallible litmus test, we can still identify areas which can be agreed to be part of the administration of justice. That is what the first four features of the McDonald v. Bord na gCon test, and the broader observations in Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), and State (Shanahan) are directed towards. It would be a narrow and self-defeating approach, however, to find that a provision that comprehensively satisfied these features was nevertheless not the administration of justice because the form of order made in the proceedings was something novel. I would, therefore, be reluctant to give decisive weight to this feature, and would, in any event, take a reasonably broad view of what it requires.

97. Turning to this case, it is appropriate to deal, at this point, with the cross-appeal of the Attorney General, which sought to overturn Simons J.'s finding that the fifth limb of the McDonald v. Bord na gCon test was satisfied in this case. It was argued that the reliefs available under the 2015 Act incorporating the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 left intact the traditional common law action for wrongful dismissal, and created a remedy that was entirely novel and independent of the contract of employment. The relief available was not merely innovative but included reliefs which, as a matter of common law, could not be ordered in the context of an employment relationship.

98. This issue is one of focus and degree. Looked at up close, the differences between a claim for unfair dismissals in the W.R.C. and an action in court are significant. But, this risks elevating the unsurprising fact that new legislation effects a change in the pre-existing law into a decisive test. If we view the picture with some distance and perspective, it appears to me that Simons J. was correct. First, it is necessary to recall that the parties agree that the first three limbs of the McDonald v. Bord na gCon test are satisfied. A jurisdiction is established to make binding determinations of legal disputes between private parties according to law. That, in itself, is normally a core business of the courts. Once invoked by a claimant, the jurisdiction is established. An employer is not free to decline to participate, and if he or she refused to participate, that does not prevent the case proceeding or a decision being made. The adjudication officer is, by statute, independent in the performance of his or her functions (s. 40(8)), has power to compel the attendance of witnesses to give evidence (s. 41(10)), or provide documents, and failure to comply is an offence (s. 41(12)). The adjudication officer gives the parties an opportunity to "be heard" and to "present … any evidence relevant to the complaint or dispute" (s. 41(5)), and makes "a decision" in relation to the complaint "in accordance with the relevant redress provision" (s. 41(5)). A complaint may be either that there has been a "contravention of a provision" specified in Part 1 or 2 of Schedule 5 or a dispute as "to the entitlements of the employee under an enactment specified in Part 3 of Schedule 5" (s. 41(2)). (All emphases added.) The decision of the adjudicating officer is binding on the parties, and there is mechanism for enforcement under s. 43(1) to which it will be necessary to return. These provisions create a machinery for the determination and decision by an independent body of complaints seeking relief, as a matter of law, and which permits the adjudication officer to make a binding decision on such complaint which can be enforced against the losing party. In these respects, the process is indistinguishable from the determination of a legal dispute before a court. Indeed, it was accepted in these proceedings that the proceedings in the W.R.C. amounted to a "determination of … civil rights and obligations" for the purposes of Article 6 of the E.C.H.R. In that context, the fact that the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, for example, provides for the remedy of reinstatement and reengagement does not take this procedure outside the category of administration of justice. In the first place, an order of compensation under the Act is an order which, as a matter of history, was made by courts, and redress by way of reinstatement or reengagement is akin to an order of specific performance which is a familiar type of order made by the courts, even if, as a matter of common law, it would rarely — if at all — be made in the context of an employment relationship. If, for example, the 1977 Act had merely implied into all contracts of employment an entitlement not to be unfairly dismissed, and permitted a court to make orders of reinstatement or reengagement, such proceedings could not be said to be incompatible with or alien to the functions of a court. The form of order made by a decision pursuant to the 2015 Act is a final order determining the dispute and awarding redress of a kind known to the courts. That is, in my view, sufficient to comply with what is addressed under the fifth limb of the McDonald v. Bord na gCon criteria.

99. I would not, however, place much reliance on the fact that, under the 1977 Act, all these orders may be made by the Circuit Court on appeal, or by the District Court on an application for enforcement. This, perhaps, does show that there is nothing fundamentally incompatible with the traditional forms of court procedure in permitting such orders to be made. But, it does not show that these orders were orders which, as a matter of history, were traditionally made by courts. I think that inquiry must be made outside the Act giving power to make the orders. Otherwise, it would lead to the somewhat curious conclusion that the Act did not satisfy this aspect of the test in 1977 just after it was enacted, but did at some later point. As already indicated, I do not think this aspect of the criteria should be applied with undue precision. In Cowan v. A.G., Haugh J. was prepared to find that provision satisfied by the fact that the election court hearing a claim under the Municipal Corporations Act 1882 was doing the same work as the High Court had when hearing election petitions prior to 1882. However, as has been pointed out, jurisdiction to hear and determine election petitions was, itself, only conferred on the High Court in 1868; prior to that, all claims were heard by Parliament itself. The historical test is not, therefore, an infallible guide to what is or is not intrinsically a judicial function and the test must be applied with some flexibility. I consider that Simons J. was correct to conclude that it was satisfied here.

100. This brings us to the ground upon which Simons J., not without some doubt, found that a proceeding such as a claim for unfair dismissal under the 2015 Act did not constitute the administration of justice because of the provisions of ss. 43 and 45 in relation to enforcement. Section 43, it will be recalled, provided that if an employer failed to carry out the decision of the adjudication officer within 56 days from the date on which notice of the decision was given to the parties, the District Court, on the application to it by either the employee or the commission or with the consent of the employee, shall:-

The only matters to be established before the District Court in such an application would be the making of the decision and the fact that such a decision had been made and notified in writing to the parties more than 56 days before the application. If these matters were established, then the District Court is obliged to make the order sought. The only discretion available to the court is that under s. 43(2), whereby in a case where reinstatement or reengagement had been made, the District Court could, in lieu of an order directing the employer to carry out that decision in accordance with the terms, make an order directing the employer to pay compensation of such amount as was just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances.

101. It is clear that this procedure is quite different from the enforcement mechanism available in relation to a court judgment. The decision of the authorised officer/W.R.C. is not enforceable of its own force. An application must be made to another entity — the District Court — to render the decision an order capable of being enforced, and it becomes enforceable, then, as an order of that court. Furthermore, the application for enforcement can be made by someone other than the party who obtains the decision, such as a trade union or, indeed, the Commission itself. While the decision of the authorised officer/W.R.C. becomes enforceable almost automatically, it is still necessary to satisfy certain proofs and, in the case of redress in the nature of reinstatement or reengagement, the District Court has certain discretion, although normally, it seems, in ease of an employee dealing with a recalcitrant employer, rather than designed to provide any assistance to the defaulting employer, who, after all, does not receive notice of the proceedings, and cannot attend or make submissions. Nevertheless, such an application may involve some evidence and independent decision-making, although the District Court cannot alter the determination of liability but may only select a different method of redress and assess that compensation. These are important features, although it must be said that the procedure is very far removed from the original enforcement provisions in the 1977 Act which required, in effect, a full rehearing before the Circuit Court. This, it will be recalled, was the feature which, at least in the view of academic commentators, was important in saving the provision from unconstitutionality.

102. Sections 43 and 45 can be usefully compared with the original procedure provided by s. 10 of the 1977 Act. The superficial structure of enforcement by separate court proceedings is retained, but in substance almost all capacity for independent decision-making has been removed, and, instead, an enforcement mechanism established that is as close to automatic as possible. Indeed, in doing so, the Act may create a certain problem. If the proceedings in the W.R.C. are not an administration of justice, then the proceedings in the District Court under ss. 43 and 45 may be viewed as a separate and distinct administration of justice. It is not impossible to have proceedings where the issues to be determined are narrow, and where, on proof of a very limited number of matters, an order may even be mandatory. For instance, in Dublin Corporation v. Hamilton [1999] 2 I.R. 486, Geoghegan J. found s. 62 of the Housing Act 1966 — which limited District Court intervention in an eviction from a local authority property to verifying that the local authority had furnished the requisite proofs — to be constitutional. However, it is unusual to permit such an order to be made adverse to another party on an ex parte basis with no capacity for the party affected to challenge or dispute the claim, or even know about it. See, in this regard, the judgment of this court in D.K. v. Crowley [2002] 2 I.R. 744, where the court held that the provisions of s. 4(3) of the Domestic Violence Act 1996 were unconstitutional in that the section permitted barring orders to be made ex parte and continued without a hearing, a system which breached the subject of the barring order's constitutional rights to fair procedures. In V.P.G. Inc. v. Insurco International Ltd. [1995] 2 I.L.R.M. 145, McCracken J. held that a power under the Rules of the Superior Courts to make an order ex parte had to be understood as giving a right to the affected party to seek to set it aside, even if there was no express provision in the Rules to that effect. See also: Adams v. D.P.P. [2001] 1 I.R. 47; and Adam v. Minister for Justice [2001] 3 I.R. 53. The ex parte nature of the enforcement procedure is certainly problematic, but the Act was not challenged on that basis. Instead, reliance was placed on the fact that the procedure was so automatic that, although a court procedure was provided for, that did not permit the affected party to participate.

103. If this issue was whether the enforcement procedures under ss. 43 and 45 were analogous to the method of enforcement of a court decision, then the distinctions identified above could be of importance and, perhaps, decisive. However, the issue to which this heading of the criteria is addressed has to be seen in the broader context of the function sought to be defined, or at least described, by it. The question of enforceability of a decision is, indeed, a significant clue to its legal nature, since a decision which depends for its enforcement on the agreement of the parties, or on the decision of another body (indeed, a court) which can, moreover, decide whether or not to enforce it depending on whether it is, itself, satisfied that the decision is correct is a significant distance from the type of automatic enforceability a litigant achieves when they succeed in court. Even then, a pragmatist might observe that the vast majority of E.A.T. decisions pre-1993 determined disputes and were complied with without any formal enforcement, and, to that extent, were similar — if not indistinguishable — from court decisions.

104. The enforcement procedure provided under ss. 43 and 45 requires careful analysis. Structurally, it maintains the feature of resort to court for enforcement of the decision in the case of a failure to comply. However, enforcement is almost automatic, does not permit involvement by the losing party, and, on the presentation of formal proofs, is mandatory. While a court is the vehicle for enforcement, it is not employed for its capacity to administer justice fairly between opposing parties by reference to the law, but, rather, for access to the enforcement mechanism. The court process is conscripted in aid of enforcement of the decision of the W.R.C. In In Re Haughey [1971] I.R. 217 ("Re Haughey"), the Supreme Court had to address provisions of the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act 1970 which appeared to permit the Dáil Public Accounts Committee to find a witness guilty of contempt and send him forward to the High Court for punishment. The Supreme Court held that such a reading of the Act could not be consistent with the Constitution because, in the words of Ó Dálaigh C.J., "under the Constitution the Courts cannot be used as appendages or auxiliaries to enforce the purported convictions of other tribunals" and the same must apply to non-criminal determinations by other tribunals.

105. Looked at in this broader context, I do not think that anyone other than a lawyer, and perhaps a pedantic one at that, would consider the details of the process significant in understanding the nature of the proceedings before the W.R.C. An unsuccessful party who had received an adverse decision from the W.R.C. would, I think, consider themselves in no different a position to a party emerging from the District Court or Circuit Court having lost a case. They would consider that, unless appealed, they would have to comply with the decision, and nearly all would. The evidence on behalf of the respondents was, indeed, that 90% of W.R.C. orders were complied with and only 10% were appealed. A losing party would know that if they did not comply of their own volition, they could be forced to do so by the power of the State. Most importantly of all, they would know that the legal consequences of their actions had been determined and that, unless appealed, that determination was the definitive decision by a body provided by the State and backed by it and which, as a matter of law, had determined their rights and responsibilities in respect of the matter in dispute. The fact that the decision of the W.R.C can be described accurately as a determination is of importance here. The State acknowledges that it is, moreover, a "determination of...civil rights and obligations" to which Article 6 of the E.C.H.R. applies. Determination here connotes decision-making which is definitive. It is the decision of the W.R.C. which is decisive of the legal rights of the parties.

106. I appreciate that Simons J. considered himself bound by precedent to conclude, albeit with evident reluctance, that the limited discretionary power available to the District Court to substitute an award of compensation for an award of reinstatement or reengagement meant that the decision of the W.R.C. was not to be considered an administration of justice but rather, presumably, an administrative function, although one bound to be performed judicially. The separation of powers is a vital feature of the Constitution and has shown its values in the years since independence. It is, nevertheless, a difficult concept and both the borderline between the respective powers and the area of overlap between them is sometimes blurred and indistinct. In particular, the experience under the Constitution of 1922 showed that a rigid and exclusive definition of the judicial power would, if anything, make more difficult the functioning of the separation of powers, and would not be consistent with the structure of the society established under that Constitution. This is an area where the wisdom of the observation of Oliver Wendell Holmes that, in a constitution, there must be some play at the joints, has particular value. It was in the context of the analysis of the full and original jurisdiction of the High Court that Henchy J. set out the principle of harmonious interpretation of the Constitution and rejected a rigid and literal interpretation of Article 34 in Tormey v. Ireland [1985] I.R. 289. The experience of many judges and writers has shown that it is difficult and often impossible to offer a clear prescriptive definition of the nature of the judicial power or, indeed, the executive or legislative powers. However, that does not mean that it does not have some independent content. I consider that if it was possible to conclude that the procedure to determine an unfair dismissal case under the provisions of the 2015 Act did not constitute an administration of justice for the purposes of the Irish Constitution, solely because of these features of the enforcement process, it would be to almost empty the concept of the administration of justice of any independent meaning, and render it an almost formal and circular concept: the administration of justice which is consigned so solemnly to courts established under the Constitution and to judges appointed under it would be no more than business which from time to time is done in those courts.

107. Again taking a broad perspective, it is apparent that the development in 1977 (building on the example of the Redundancy Payments Act) and establishing a separate code of unfair dismissal, and conferring jurisdiction upon an Employment Appeals Tribunal, was a decisive shift. In the field of industrial relations, it was a move from the collective claim to an assertion of individual rights, and from resolution of disputes by collective action, arbitration, and conciliation, to a form of State-enforced official judicial determination of individual disputes. The issue to be decided was not a matter of discretion, or what was advisable or desirable in the future for industrial peace or good employer/employee relations: it was, rather, a determination of the legal rights of parties in relation to the past events. The deciding body had power to determine, for the purpose of its decision, the facts which had occurred, and to apply the law to such facts. Indeed, if the tribunal failed to do so correctly, it would be open to correction, not because the decision it had reached was unwise or inadvisable, but simply because it was wrong or impermissible as a matter of law. It had power to exercise jurisdiction against the will of a party and ensure that its orders were enforced by the State. It could compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents and failure to comply was an offence. It had power to determine disputes according to law and, in the words of Griffith C.J., quoted by Kennedy C.J. in Lynham, to "order right to be done in the matter".

108. The Blueprint to Deliver a World-Class Workplace Relations Service (2012) which preceded the enactment of the 2015 Act, and which was exhibited in the proceedings, states that the decisions of the adjudication officers would include the issues identified as relevant to the claim, an explanation why any such issue was not determined, the findings of fact relevant to the issues, a concise statement of the applicable law, the application of that law to the facts found, and the decision (including any award). This is precisely the task of any court required to resolve a justiciable controversy. The fact that, since 1977, a determination in respect of a claim for unfair dismissal, whether favourable or not, precludes pursuit of a claim for wrongful dismissal (and vice versa) is a clear illustration of the fact that the respective processes were understood to occupy the same ground. Furthermore, the fact that the existence of an unfair dismissals jurisdiction is understood to preclude development of the common law of dismissals demonstrates the function the unfair dismissals regime is understood to perform. Approaching the issue with a degree of caution and flexibility consistent with the case law, it is appropriate to acknowledge that not one of these features, on its own, is determinative and it is possible to have many of these features but yet conclude that the process does not amount to the administration of justice. However, here, it is an unavoidable conclusion, in my view, that what was designed and sought to be implemented was a judicial process which was intended to resolve justiciable controversies according to law.

109. A valuable contemporary book written from the perspective of the Trade Union movement, N. Wayne, Labour Law in Ireland: A Guide to Workers' Rights (Dublin: ITGWU/Kincora Press, 1980), makes the point very clearly. At p. 98, it is observed that:-

> "unlike the Labour Court and the Rights Commissioner the [E.A.T.] is exclusively concerned with issuing legal rulings." (Emphasis in original.)

At p. 103, it is said:-

> "[t]hough the [Rights] Commissioners are required to implement the Unfair Dismissals Act, in practice they have come to be regarded as having a broader function – that of settling disputes… By contrast the [E.A.T.] will operate strictly in accordance with legal principles." (Emphasis added.)

In my view, this is a correct analysis. In terms of the nature of the process, the procedure to be followed, the issue to be determined, and the manner in which it was to be determined, whether viewed from the perspective of abstract legal analysis, or the more pragmatic and functional vantage point of the persons made subject to it, it is plain that the process set out was intended to be a judicial process. The question of the method of enforcement becomes critical therefore. Under the 1977 Act, there was a cumbersome process which allowed not just for a full appeal to the Circuit Court, but, moreover, required such a rehearing even in cases where there had been a refusal to comply with the determination of the tribunal. Such a procedure cannot be explained as required by considerations of efficiency, and it seems plain, as the commentators observed, that the purpose of the enforcement procedure, initially at the instance of the Minister, was to establish a marked distinction from the administration of justice, and protect against constitutional frailty. Whether or not the extended enforcement procedure under the 1977 Act had the effect that the entire procedure was not the administration of justice (something on which I express no view), I do not think that the almost automatic enforcement procedure under the 2015 Act can have the same effect. Instead of interposing a full hearing by a court with the effect, and reality, that the order enforced is that of the Circuit Court and not that of the tribunal, the court process is commandeered to provide for near-automatic enforcement of the determination of the adjudication officer or Labour Court. In my view, the function of the W.R.C., and the Labour Court on appeal, is the administration of justice. It is not coincidental that the parallel jurisdiction in the U.K. is conferred upon a tribunal understood to be performing a judicial function and part of the judicial system.

D. Limited Functions and Powers

110. The fact that the exercise of the jurisdiction by the W.R.C. constitutes an administration of justice does not, however, mean that it must be performed by a court. Article 37 is framed in negative terms:-

> "nothing in this Constitution shall operate to invalidate the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature."

Although the Article does not define either the area of administration of justice or the subset covered by this saver, it is, in my view, clear that justice may be administered by bodies which are not courts, and by persons other than judges in non-criminal cases. However, such exercise must constitute the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature. The only judicial consideration is that contained in the judgment of Kingsmill Moore J. in Re Solicitors Act 1954 set out at para. 67 above.

111. These observations have not been the subject of much, if any, judicial scrutiny for the subsequent half-century and more, and have had the effect of significantly limiting the scope of Article 37, with the result that much of the case law has been determined by reference to the basic distinction between the administration of justice and administrative functions. It is, perhaps, somewhat surprising that it has been accepted uncritically, given that the decision of the Supreme Court in Re Solicitors Act 1954 has been treated as increasingly anomalous. However, this narrow conception of the scope of Article 37 was analysed and criticised by Professor James Casey in 'The Judicial Power under Irish Constitutional Law' (1975) I.C.L.Q. 305 as follows:-

> "This exegesis of the word "limited" is one of the crucial aspects of the case, yet no real reasons are offered in support of it. One might think it possible to hold that the context suggests a different meaning, viz. "restricted in number or as to subject-matter". This construction would give the Oireachtas wider scope for experiment."

Referring to the reference to Article 34.3.4°, Casey notes, at p. 322:-

> "The precise meaning of "limited" in this context has not yet been settled by judicial decision. Consequently the Supreme Court's assertion that "limited jurisdiction" necessarily means something quite different from "limited functions and powers" is difficult to accept."

112. Taken in isolation, there is no doubt that the interpretation of Article 37 accepted as in Re Solicitors Act 1954 is a possible interpretation of the text alone. It is, however, also possible to interpret the terms of Article 37 more broadly, as argued for by Professor Casey. There are a number of reasons why, in my view, a broader interpretation should, indeed, be taken. First, the plain function of Article 37 is to provide a saver to permit the exercise of some functions and powers by persons and bodies who are neither judges nor courts under the Constitution. What is required to be performed in courts by judges is the administration of justice under Article 34. It is, and has always been, accepted that there are administrative functions which can be carried out by non-judicial bodies, albeit that they may be required to act judicially and are bound by the rules of constitutional justice. Article 37 was not required to render such functions and powers constitutional. It follows, necessarily, that what Article 37 validates is something which, in the absence of the Article, would be considered an administration of justice and exclusively consigned to the courts, and not a mere component of the administration of justice such as, for example, the right to hear evidence or require the attendance of witnesses. In broad terms, therefore, what Article 37 permits is a State-mandated decision-making function to be exercised by persons other than judges, which suggests a capacity to determine some disputes, at least, conclusively. Whatever Article 37 permits, it must be capable of being the administration of justice which means, at a minimum, a State-supported decision-making function capable of delivering a binding and enforceable decision.

113. Second, the background to Article 37 points to a broader understanding of the text. If the exercise of the powers of the Land Commission and the Revenue Commissioners, to take two of the extant examples considered in 1937, could nevertheless be considered to be "limited" functions and powers capable of being validated by Article 37, then that suggests a significantly broader scope for the application of the Article, and argues against a narrow reading.

114. Third, the test of far-reaching effect is both relativist and impressionistic. In any event, it can be said that any change in the law is intended to have some effect, and most contested decisions made by any official decision-making body will be keenly felt by the parties to it. It seems likely that Mr. Lynham considered the original decision of the Land Commission, that the valuable lands to which he was about to become entitled were to be compulsorily transferred to the Reverend Dr. Butler, was a decision having far-reaching effect, and no doubt the Reverend Dr. Butler felt the same when that decision was later reversed. A decision by the Revenue Commissioners in relation to tax may be of enormous, even ruinous, impact on a person or a company. Far-reaching does not, therefore, supply a useful basis for identifying the area covered by Article 37, but it does have the unhelpful effect of suggesting that Article 37 bodies must have a very limited scope, and excludes, or at least inhibits, the possibility of conferring decision-making jurisdiction in important areas on bodies with particular expertise in that limited area.

115. Finally, contrasting Article 37 with Article 34.3.4° and the local and limited jurisdiction of courts, and excluding from limited powers and functions under Article 37 anything which can be said to limit a court's jurisdiction for the purposes of Article 34, is not persuasive. Indeed, a different lesson might be drawn from the text. It seems at least arguable that both Article 37 and Article 34.3.4° are to be contrasted not with each other, but, rather, with Article 34.3.1° and "the full original jurisdiction" of the High Court, and the power to determine all matters and questions, whether of fact or law, civil or criminal. On this approach, the limitations on jurisdictions of local and limited courts under Article 34.3.4° may indeed provide some insight as to the type of limitation contemplated by Article 37. There is, in my view, no necessary reason to conclude that the fact that inferior courts may have limits to their jurisdiction should exclude the possibility of similar limits being taken into account when considering the operation of non-judicial bodies under Article 37.

116. Looked at in this way, there are a number of ways in which the functions and powers of the W.R.C. can be said to be "limited". First, and most obviously, it is limited by subject matter to those areas of employment law specifically identified in the Act. It has no inherent jurisdiction, and no jurisdiction under, or in relation to, common law. Furthermore, it does not have jurisdiction to deal with any other type of dispute. This, in itself, is, in normal language, a significant limitation and, moreover, something that distinguishes such a body from courts established under the Constitution having general jurisdiction. Second, there is a limitation on awards which can be made by the W.R.C. which, for example, in cases of unfair dismissals, is limited to an award of compensation of 104 weeks' remuneration. In some cases, this can, of course, be a substantial sum, but it may equally in some cases fall short of the loss suffered by the applicant. It is, in any event, a limitation on the powers of the W.R.C. The Circuit Court has, for example, a limitation on equitable jurisdiction by reference to rateable valuation which captures some very valuable property, but that it is still a court of limited jurisdiction when dealing with such matters is undeniable. Third, there is the (much reduced) limitation on enforceability coupled with the limited capacity of the District Court to substitute compensation for redress by way of reinstatement or reengagement. Fourth, the decision of the W.R.C. is subject to appeal. While the question of appeal or confirmation by the court has tended to be approached under the heading of the enforceability of the order made by the deciding body, it is also, and perhaps more, relevant when considering the question of limitation on the powers and functions of a non-judicial body under Article 37. A requirement that a decision be confirmed by a court, or which makes it subject to a full de novo appeal in a court, is necessarily a limitation on the powers of the body giving the decision. Here, the decision by an adjudication officer is subject, firstly, to a full appeal on a matter of fact to the Labour Court. That body is, in turn, subject to appeal on a point of law to the High Court. These appeals are available as of right, and do not require permission from either body or the court itself. Thus, the correctness of the conclusion of the W.R.C. on matters of fact or law may be reviewed and, insomuch as a decision made by the Labour Court is a matter of law (as it can involve the application of law to the facts), it is reviewable, in turn, by the High Court.

117. Finally, in this regard, I think it is appropriate to have regard to the limitation imposed by the fact that the W.R.C. is a body subject to judicial review. While this might be said to be common to any body exercising a power or function under public law today, that does not mean that it is not a significant limitation on the exercise of the powers and functions of such a body. It is worth recalling that the extensive exercise of the jurisdiction of the High Court by way of judicial review for jurisdiction, error of law and, to some extent at least, of fact, unreasonableness, proportionality, the taking into account of irrelevant considerations, or failing to consider relevant considerations, compliance with the Constitution and the E.C.H.R., and much more, is largely a feature of the development of the law in the latter part of the 20th century. At the time of the decision in Re Solicitors Act 1954, for example, the first edition of De Smith's Judicial Review of Administrative Action (London: Stevens & Sons, 1959), and Wade's Administrative Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961), had not been published, and it would be more than a quarter of a century before the first edition of Hogan and Morgan's Administrative Law in Ireland (Dublin: Round Hall, 1986) in this jurisdiction. It is useful to consider if, for example, the Solicitors Act of 1954 had provided by statute for the extensive review which is now available under the supervisory jurisdiction of the High Court, how such a review would have been analysed when considering limitations on the powers of the tribunal. A decision of an adjudication officer is limited in subject matter, and may be appealed, both in relation to fact to the Labour Court, and in relation to law through the Labour Court to the High Court, and, in addition, may be reviewed not merely for what it has done but, as this case illustrates, how it has done it. In my view, when these matters are considered cumulatively, I would conclude that the W.R.C. is exercising limited powers and functions of judicial nature, which exercise of power is therefore covered by Article 37 and does not, therefore, offend the Constitution.

118. I appreciate that some of my colleagues take a different view of what is, on any view, a difficult case. Charleton J. would find that the absence of an appeal to the Circuit Court (or, presumably, any court) means that the jurisdiction of the W.R.C. and Labour Court is the administration of justice and is not saved by Article 37. I recognise that the possibility of appeal has been considered important from the time of Lynham v. Butler (No. 2), but I have difficulty in agreeing that an adjudication loses its character as the administration of justice if the selfsame issue may be decided by a court on appeal, which is the administration of justice. The third limb of the McDonald test acknowledges that the existence of an appeal does not deprive an adjudication of its character as the administration of justice. The decision of a court is no less the administration of justice because it is subject to appeal and I cannot see, therefore, why a final and binding adjudication by a non-judicial body is not the administration of justice because the issue can be the subject of appeal. Nor, if the availability of an appeal is viewed as a limitation bringing the jurisdiction within Article 37, can I see that there is a fundamental constitutional distinction between an appeal, the form of review provided for under the Residential Tenancies Act 2004, for example, which limited a court to considerations of whether there was a want of procedural fairness or a manifestly erroneous decision, and the type of appeal and review which applies in this case, particularly when the review of what is a limited administration of justice can be expected to be rigorous.

119. I have also had the opportunity of reading the judgment, to be delivered, of MacMenamin J. in its draft form. I recognise the scholarship displayed, and the important and real concerns which lead him to a different conclusion to that which I have come. I hope to set out, relatively briefly, some of the principal reasons why, however, I respectfully disagree.

120. The logic of the analysis advanced by MacMenamin J. is that the exercise of jurisdiction by adjudication officers and the Labour Court under the 1977 Act and related legislation is the administration of justice reserved to courts and judges under Article 34 and is, accordingly, incompatible with the Constitution; however, that, he considers, could be remedied by the provision of an appeal to a court established under the Constitution. However, the conclusion that the exercise of jurisdiction is the administration of justice leads to the further conclusion that the personal rights of a citizen under Article 40.3 of the Constitution are engaged. On this basis, the procedures provided for under the 2015 Act in relation to hearings in private, the inability to require evidence to be given on oath, the absence of a specific provision provided for cross-examination, and the inability to provide for suitably qualified decision-makers for cases with a significant legal dimension are, also, separate and distinct items of unconstitutionality.

121. It is something of a paradox that what is described as a cautious and narrow approach leads, nevertheless, to a wholesale invalidation of the Act and the procedures adopted under it. MacMenamin J., however, disagrees that the jurisdiction can be covered by Article 37, partly for reasons of history, and more fundamentally because he considers that the combined effect of the W.R.C.'s power to prosecute offences under the Act and the fact that the failure to comply with an enforcement order made by the District Court is an offence under s. 51 of the Act means, in his view, that the jurisdiction is, at least in part, criminal and thus outside the potential scope of Article 37. Alternatively, it is said that the power of the W.R.C. to disapply national law incompatible with E.U. law, which power the Court of Justice of the European Union ("the C.J.E.U.") established, in Case C-378/17 Minister for Justice and Equality & Anor. v. The Workplace Relations Commission ECLI:EU:C:2018:979, ("Minister for Justice v. W.R.C. (C.J.E.U.)") and Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform v. The Workplace Relations Commission [2017] IESC 43 (Unreported, Supreme Court, Clarke J. (as he then was), 15th of June, 2017) could not be considered a limited function or power and which accordingly, again, has the effect of preventing the jurisidiction of the W.R.C. and Labour Court under the 2015 Act from being capable of benefitting from the protection of Article 37.

122. First, if it is correct that the adjudication officer and/or the Labour Court is engaged in the administration of justice when making decisions pursuant to the procedures of the 2015 Act in relation to questions of unfair dismissal and payment of wages (and I agree that it is), then, as already discussed, I doubt that the elaborate machinery of the 2015 Act could be rendered a non-judicial administrative function merely by providing for an appeal to a court. Those cases in which recourse to a court has been found to have the effect of rescuing an adjudicatory function from unconstitutionality involve an application to court for a determination or confirmation of a determination with the full capacity of the court to come to its own conclusion on the merits so that, indeed, the court could be said to be the "effective decision-making tribunal" and making the "vital decisions" in a real sense, as explained by Finlay C.J. in C.K. v. An Bord Altranais [1990] 2 I.R. 396, 403. Indeed, the third limb of the McDonald test recognises that a decision-making function can be the administration of justice if it comes to final and binding decisions, even if those decisions are subject to appeal.

123. While it is a matter for others to judge in due course, I do not consider or intend that my judgment should involve any radical departure from precedent in the shape of the McDonald test. Indeed, since I reach the same conclusion as my colleagues by reference to the test, such differences of approach, if any, might be thought to be minimal rather than radical.

124. In my view, the circumstances here are also entirely distinguishable from the situation identified in Cowan v. A.G. There, an electoral court established under the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act 1884 was to be presided over by a barrister, and had jurisdiction not only to try issues in relation to a disputed election, but also to try a person on a criminal charge of an illegal or corrupt electoral practice, which on conviction carried a sentence of up to 6 months' imprisonment. By contrast, if, under the 2015 Act, a party fails to comply with an enforcement order made under s. 44 or s. 45, such non-compliance may constitute a criminal offence triable in the District Court. In such circumstances, however, it would be the District Court which was administering justice in a criminal matter. The function of prosecuting the offence, if carried out by the W.R.C., would not thereby mean that the W.R.C. was invested with any jurisdiction to administer justice in criminal matters. Article 37 provides a limited saver in respect of functions which otherwise would have to be carried out by judges under Article 34: the prosecution of criminal offences has never been a judicial function.

125. The decision in Minister for Justice v. W.R.C. (C.J.E.U.) is certainly striking, but that case was decided explicitly on the basis that the obligation to disapply national law considered to be inconsistent with E.U. law was an obligation that lay on any body, whether judicial or administrative, which had the obligation to apply or enforce law. Indeed, the case itself was decided on the basis that the W.R.C. was an administrative, and not a judicial, body. The disapplication of national law and the enforcement of law was not treated by the C.J.E.U. as a judicial function, but instead an obligation on any body applying the law. If, indeed, all the bodies subject to that obligation were to become thereby bodies administering justice under Article 34, and not entitled to benefit from the saver in Article 37, then the unconstitutionality would sweep very far indeed. Indeed, the logic of MacMenamin J.'s approach would appear to lead not only to the conclusion that the functions currently performed by the W.R.C. are the administration of justice which can only be carried out by a court, but also to a finding that only the High Court could do so, since he considers the disapplication of national law a judicial function which could not be carried out by a court of local and limited jurisdiction. In fairness, it should be observed that neither this contention, made in reliance on the Minster for Justice v. W.R.C., nor the argument that the W.R.C. and or/the Labour Court are engaged in the exercise of a criminal jurisdiction (and thus excluded from Article 37) was advanced in argument or even touched on by either of the parties, and are not endorsed by any other member of the Court.

126. I do not agree, with respect, that the historical materials suggest that the drafters of the Constitution took an extremely narrow view of Article 37. The functions of the Land Commission, the Revenue Commissioners, and the Social Welfare Adjudicators are significant and important functions. They are limited functions, but only by subject matter and the possibility of appeal to, and review by, a court. They have far reaching effects on lives. Nor would I, for my part, consider that the judgments of Murnaghan and FitzGibbon JJ. in The State (Ryan) v. Lennon [1935] I.R. 170 were in any way akin to the tactic of legality discussed by MacMenamin J. One might, with equal, if not greater, justification question how a democratic society based on the separation of powers might have developed if the dissenting judgment of Kennedy C.J. had prevailed. The 1922 Constitution may, indeed, have had an Achilles heel, but if it did, it is not self-evident that it was part of the courts' function to purport to remedy that or any other perceived defects rather than to identify them. But, these matters are some distance from the issues arising in this case and I doubt that, even if it was appropriate to determine this case by these broad considerations, it would indeed be possible to do with any precision or accuracy. For example, if it is possible to remove an adjudicatory function from the field of the administration of justice by the simple device of allowing for a limited, rare, but expensive appeal to a court, with the consequence, it appears, that the obligation to adopt procedures required by Article 40.3 would also disappear, then it might be thought that the constitutional protection for the field of the administration of justice could be hollowed out. Similarly, while MacMenamin J. considers that the 5th limb of Mc Donald means that the principles of Article 34, as interpreted, would not stand in the way of other quasi-judicial bodies operating in new areas which were never the business of the courts,

I do not, with respect, understand how this squares with a conclusion that the W.R.C. in exercising statutorily-created jurisdiction in respect of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, the Employment Equality Act 1998, or the Equal Status Act 2000 – to mention only three – all of which would have been regarded as novel, if not indeed heretical, in 1937, is nevertheless administering justice reserved exclusively to courts by Article 34. If, moreover, it is possible to avoid Article 34 (and Article 37) entirely by creating new claims and causes of action, or forms of adjudication which may, however, render redundant common law actions, then it would be possible to circumvent the Constitution much more effectively and comprehensively than by the use of Article 37 that MacMenamin J. fears, since the resultant jurisdiction would be deemed administrative only, and subject to no requirement of limitation and reviewable only on the basis of unspecified fair procedures. This would be particularly troubling, since such new areas of adjudication are, almost by definition, areas considered to be of such relevance to the lives of citizens and their current concerns as to require statutory intervention. In the end, the only sure guide to our decision can be the terms of the Constitution understood in its context, and as interpreted by the courts. Accordingly, while acknowledging the important concerns raised in the judgment of my colleague, I cannot agree that Article 37 should be read so narrowly and restrictively, whether as a matter of interpretation or broader policy.

127. MacMenamin J. also quotes from my judgment in O'Connell, in which I acknowledged that there was no single unifying theory for the identification of the administration of justice, the area of the judicial function, or the nature of justiciable controversies. I hope the discussion earlier in this judgment explains why I still consider that it is not possible to identify a single infallible litmus test which will determine the existence of the administration of justice or, indeed, the limits of the area covered by Article 37. However, the Constitution and the case law make it clear that, while closely related, there are critical distinctions between: (i) administrative adjudication required to be carried out in accordance with fair procedures; (ii) the administration of justice by a judge under Article 34; and (iii) the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature under Article 37, each of which has different legal consequences. In this case, we are required to locate the jurisdiction exercised by adjudication officers and the Labour Court under the 2015 Act within that classification. We cannot avoid that task.

128. I fully accept that the boundaries between the areas are difficult and contestable. It is also emphatically the function of the court under the Constitution to determine, in any given case, how a particular jurisdiction is to be analysed and categorised. Indeed, it may be for future courts to revisit, revise, and refine the decisions made. It is to be expected that those courts will approach this task cautiously in the light, in particular, of the concerns expressed in this case by my colleagues and will be vigilant to ensure in the future, just as much as in the early part of the 20th century, that there is no whittling away of the function of the administration of justice. That is a foundation, indeed keystone, of the separation of powers and cannot be eroded without undermining the essential constitutional structure of the State.

129. This case is located at a difficult and indistinct frontier. But, decision-making is unavoidable and no course is free from difficulty. If Article 37 is shrunk almost to vanishing point as covering no more than adjectival and somewhat inconsequential functions not previously thought to potentially contravene Article 34, then the law would be faced with a stark binary choice between either the administration of justice required to be carried out by judges appointed under the Constitution or the performance of administrative functions by persons subject to appointment and removal by the executive and required only to comply with unspecified fair procedures. Such a stark divison is not attractive, particularly in an area where history shows that precision is impossible and some flexibility is required. I do not agree, therefore, that the case law shows a reluctance to invoke Article 37. On the contrary, as observed in this regard at para. 6.4.111 of Kelly:-

> "Subsequently, however, there was clear evidence of judicial unhappiness with the logical implications of the Solicitors Act case and nearly all the later cases show a tendency either to confine that case to its special facts or to refuse to apply the principle by analogy."

130. Thus, in Central Dublin Development Association v. The Attorney General (decided in 1969 but reported in (1975) 109 I.L.T.R. 69), Kenny J. held that the ministerial power exercisable under the Local Government (Planning and Development) Act 1963 to decide if a development was an exempted development was an administration of justice, but covered by Article 37, and the same principle must, it appears, apply to the later exercise of similar powers by An Bord Pleanála. In Madden v. Ireland (Unreported, High Court, McMahon J., 22nd of May, 1980), McMahon J. found that the power of the Lay Commissioners and the Appeal Tribunal of the Land Commission to fix the price of lands acquired was "the administration of justice and the exercise of judicial power", but was sanctioned by Article 37. He said, at para. 14:-

> "Experience has shown that modern Government can not be carried on without many regulatory Bodies and those Bodies can not function effectively under a rigid separation of powers. Article 37 had no counterpart in the Constitution of Saorstát Éireann and in my view introduction of it to the Constitution is to be attributed to a realisation of the needs of modern Government. The ascertainment of the market value of a holding of lands by an administrative Body with special experience appears to me to be the kind of judicial power contemplated by Article 37."

131. In The State (Calcul International Ltd. and Solatrex International Ltd.) v. The Appeal Commissioners & The Revenue Commissioners (Unreported, High Court, Barron J. 18th of December, 1986), Barron J. considered that the powers of the Appeal Commissioners in Revenue matters was not the administration of justice but, if it was considered to be such, then it clearly fell within Article 37. Most recently, in a monumental judgment in the High Court on multiple issues arising from the An Blascaod Mór National Historic Park Act 1989 (An Blascaod Mór Teo. & Ors. v. Commissioners of Public Works & Ors. [1998] IEHC 38 (Unreported, High Court, Budd J., 27th of February, 1998)), Budd J. found that the power of the property arbitrator to assess compensation under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act 1919 was an administration of justice, but permitted under Article 37. These are all substantial functions which cannot be considered incidental or adjectival. If anything can be said to be absent from the case law to date, at least until today, it is a finding that a function conferred by statute is the administration of justice being performed outside courts and not permitted by Article 37, and contrary to Article 34 .

132. I appreciate and accept that there are downstream risks which it is difficult to foresee or remove in advance, and that future courts may have to navigate those waters in the light of the developing case law. However, the paradox remains that if the jurisdiction of the Adjudication Officer and/or the Labour Court is seen as the administration of justice which is both limited, and must comply with the requirements of the administration of justice by an independent tribunal according to law under Aticle 37, that provides a structure for analysis, and greater assurance of fair outcomes. I am reluctant to accept that it should be viewed either as the administration of justice which can only be performed by a court, or the performance of an administrative function by a non-judicial body, in each case dependant only on the presence or absence of the fig leaf of a rarely used and expensive appeal to court, which the evidence in this case showed was little more than a statistical curiosity, and which accordingly provides little by way of guarantee of fairness throughout the process for the parties to employment disputes.

133. I have also had the opportunity to read a draft of the judgment which McKechnie J. delivers today. As I read it, he agrees that the function being performed under the 2015 Act constitutes the administration of justice under Article 34, and to that extent would apply the McDonald criteria with a degree of flexibility. However, he does not agree that the function can be considered to be covered by Article 37. This follows from his reading of the case law, rather than from the concerns which lead MacMenamin J. to his conclusions. He agrees with the conclusion I would come to in relation to procedures and the order I propose in that regard, and, unlike MacMenamin J., does not consider that there is any constitutional frailty in the provisions in relation to cross-examination or the absence of a requirement that ajudication officers or members of the Labour Court should possess legal qualifications. I acknowledge and respect the reasons which lead a valued colleague – whose last judgment this is – to his separate conclusions. His judgment does make it very clear that the question of appeal cannot be decisive, and accordingly the conclusion he would reach means, necessarily, that the functions currently being performed by adjudication officers and the Labour Court on appeal under the 2015 Act, and indeed any similar functions created by statute, can only be performed in courts, by judges appointed under the Constitution. The reasons why I differ, with respect, from him in this regard are, I hope, sufficiently apparent from the discussion set out above.

E. Procedures

134. The conclusion that the jurisdiction created by the 2015 Act is not an impermissible administration of justice, but rather falls under Article 37 of the Constitution, does not, however, dispose of this case. The appellant complains of the procedures adopted by the adjudication officer and the W.R.C. and relies, in this regard, on the evidence of both a solicitor, Mr. Ciarán O'Mara, and a barrister, Mr. Tom Mallon B.L., with considerable experience in employment matters acting for both employers and employees. The appellant also points to the extraordinary facts of this case as being the manifestation of systemic flaws in the organisation and procedures adopted by the W.R.C.

135. Taking this latter point first, the appellant criticises the evidence submitted on behalf of the respondent because no affidavit has been sworn by the individual officer with no explanation given by any witness for how the error in this case occurred. It should be said that, in making this point, the appellant does not seek to embarrass the individual adjudication officer, and agrees that it is not necessary to identify that officer by name in these proceedings. I agree, and would not wish to be unduly influenced by the startling, indeed calamitous, error in this case. The fact is that anyone can make a mistake which, in hindsight, appears both extraordinary and inexplicable. Given that the State is not seeking to defend the decision in any way, I do not consider the absence of an affidavit from the adjudication officer to be significant. What is relevant here, however, is what that error suggests for broader practice. It is not that the procedures under the 2015 Act necessarily lead to an adjudication officer deciding a case without hearing from the parties. It is, however, relevant, I think, that such an error could only occur, or at least could most readily occur, if it was commonplace to decide cases on documents submitted and with very limited or no oral hearings, and if such hearings take place in private.

136. In addition, I do not think that the evidence of the practising lawyers can be discounted as readily as the respondent suggests. It may well be the case that lawyers are only retained in a small minority of cases where the complexity and amounts at issue can justify their engagement and, therefore, the unsatisfactory experience they recount in such cases cannot necessarily be extrapolated to the majority of cases dealt with by the W.R.C. However, that does not address the criticism. As discussed above, the 2015 Act has, in effect, conferred a jurisdiction limited by subject matter upon the W.R.C. That jurisdiction extends, effectively, to all disputes arising in the course of, or in relation to, employment, and renders largely redundant the traditional common law remedies. The system established must, therefore, be capable of providing a satisfactory resolution for all the cases, whether complex or simple, and whether the awards are small or more substantial. Indeed, the individual employer and employee are entitled to no less than a competent resolution in any and every case. I consider it disturbing, therefore, that experienced practitioners would consider it necessary to express in a measured and responsible way the serious concerns which they have. Furthermore, if the hearings take place in private, then the only way in which evidence can become available as to the practices followed is if practitioners and representatives are prepared to provide evidence.

137. I wish, however, to make it absolutely clear that, in doing so, I do not criticise in any way the policy underlying the 2015 Act of providing a cheap, relatively informal, and efficient decision-making function, staffed by persons with expertise in the areas of employment law and with practical experience in industrial relations. The concept of speedy dispute resolution close to the workplace and in a manner not hidebound by either formality or procedure has much to recommend it, and I would reject unhesitatingly the contention that such a body must be staffed by people with formal legal training and sufficient legal experience to be appointed judges. I should also say that, in my limited experience, I have had the opportunity of considering a number of decisions made by adjudication officers which show a detailed understanding of the relevant law, and a careful and thoughtful assessment of the facts of the case. Courts and lawyers do not have a monopoly on fact-finding, or even the law's application, and cannot claim infallibility in either respect. If it were otherwise, there would be no need for an appellate system. There is no doubt that the range of decisions required to be made by the W.R.C. can involve very complex areas of law both national and European, but there is no justification for insisting that, as a matter of constitutional law, a law degree or experience as a practising lawyer is an essential qualification.

138. The logic of the conclusion that the W.R.C. is exercising functions covered by Article 37 is, however, instructive here. The exercise of jurisdiction captured by Article 37 is the administration of justice. The Article merely permits it to be carried out by a body other than a court and by a person other than a judge in a context that is non-criminal and limited. This has the consequence that, for example, a decision-maker is not required to make a declaration required by Article 34.6 to be appointed by the President, and is not prohibited from holding any other position of emolument. However, the function being performed and the power being exercised must comply with the fundamental components of independence, impartiality, dispassionate application of the law, openness, and, above all, fairness, which are understood to be the essence of the administration of justice. It might be said that this is encompassed in the requirement that any decision-maker act judicially and adhere to the principles of constitutional justice but, in my view, the acknowledgement that what is at issue here is the administration of justice, albeit by a body other than a court and a person other than a judge, provides a useful structure within which to consider the procedures established pursuant to the legislation. The standard of justice administered under Article 37 cannot be lower or less demanding than the justice administered in courts under Article 34.

139. The 2015 Act represents a number of different policies which are sought to be pursued in the field of labour law more generally. First, there is a comprehensive judicialising of disputes noted by the Franks Report in the United Kingdom which is, perhaps, its own unexpressed compliment to the virtues of the law and legal method resolution as a way of resolving disputes between individuals. Increasingly, in the latter part of the 20th century, citizens were given rights by statute, and the capacity to have those rights enforced as a matter of law. On the other hand, the 2015 Act seeks to pursue the desirable objective of having any disputes resolved as speedily, cheaply, and informally as possible, and without the aspects of court proceedings which might be considered unnecessary and, in some cases, intimidating and inhibitory. There is no necessary incompatibility between the two policies. However, if the policy of informality and the rejection of expensive and potentially cumbersome legal procedures becomes a rejection of the law and those features of procedure necessary for a fair determination, then there is an unavoidable, and fatal, clash. It might be thought that to be able to dispense with unnecessary and irrelevant procedures, but maintain the fundamental structure sufficient to permit a fair hearing and a proper application of the law, would require a very comprehensive understanding of what matters are central to the fair resolution of disputes and what matters, by contrast, can be safely discarded or modified. It has to be recognised that if it is desired to have legal disputes, sometimes involving complexity of fact and law, resolved satisfactorily outside the court system, it is necessary to respect the essence of the fact-finding processes and capacity for legal analysis that can be found in courtrooms. Wherever they are decided or by whom, it is not possible to have claims fairly determined in accordance with law in the absence of law and fair procedures.

140. The appellant points specifically to three further features of the 2015 Act which, it is contended, are incompatible with the Constitution. First, proceedings before the adjudication officer cannot be heard in public as s. 41(13) provides that "proceedings … before an adjudication officer shall be conducted otherwise than in public" (emphasis added); second, there is no possibility to take evidence on oath, and, consequently, no penalty for false evidence; and, third, there is no express provision for cross-examination, as s. 41(5) provides merely that the adjudication officer shall give to the parties an opportunity to be heard by the adjudication officer and to present evidence relevant to the complaint or dispute.

141. In response to these points, the respondent offers a number of different arguments. It is argued that the procedures adopted are consistent with the policy of ensuring that proceedings do not become excessively formal or intimidatory. It is pointed out that the prohibition on public hearings only applies before adjudication officers. Under s. 44(7), proceedings before the Labour Court on appeal shall be heard in public unless otherwise ordered. It is also argued that it is not necessary to have evidence on oath or have some other method of punishment for false evidence, and that it is permissible to pursue a policy of relative informality in proceedings. In relation to cross-examination, a different argument is advanced. It is said that the Act does not preclude cross-examination. The Act must be construed compatibly with the Constitution and, in such cases where constitutional fairness requires that evidence be capable of being directly challenged, then that must be permitted. There is nothing in the procedures set out in the Act which precludes this, and therefore the Act cannot be said to be unconstitutional. If, in any particular case, cross-examination ought to have been provided and was not, then that may be corrected by judicial review.

142. Approached through the lens of Article 37, I cannot accept that there is a justification for a blanket prohibition on hearings in public before the adjudication officer. Article 34.1 makes clear that public hearings are of the essence of the administration of justice. In some cases, this may be practically important because the publicity may bring forward further relevant evidence and witnesses, or because it will allow a party (whether an employee or employer) to achieve public vindication. It may, furthermore, have the general public benefit that it allows the public to see justice administered, which might, for example, make it easier for a judgement to be made on the fairness, competence, and efficiency of the decision-maker. However, the requirement for a public hearing does not require any functional justification: from time immemorial, it has been regarded as fundamental to the administration of justice, and as establishing a principle from which any exception must be justified. Jeremy Bentham said that:-

"[w]here there is no publicity there is no justice. Publicity is the very soul of justice. It is the keenest spur to exertion and the surest of all guards against improbity."

143. The rule established under the Constitution is not an absolute one, even for court proceedings, and is not expressly required under Article 37 in respect of the adjudicative processes covered by it. There is a justification for calm, quiet, and private resolution of many disputes which may be of particular sensitivity for the participants, and it may even be permissible to have a presumption in favour of private hearings at first instance, but it is not, in my view, possible to justify the absolute ban contained in s. 41(13), particularly when, on appeal, the opposite provision is made.

144. Similar arguments arise in relation to the absence of the possibility of ensuring that evidence is given on oath, and the consequential capacity to punish witnesses for deliberately false evidence. It should be said that the significance of evidence on oath is not because of any importance attached to the procedure itself, but because it triggers the power to punish for false evidence and thus provides an incentive to truthful testimony. Those who designed the system, and who may have some familiarity with the standard type of dispute and how they are best resolved, may have considered that it is preferable not to have the formality of an oath or the capacity to punish for false evidence, although no evidence was presented in this case as to any such conclusion, or any basis for it. It is, moreover, noteworthy that there is a power to administer an oath to witnesses before the Labour Court. See s.21(1)(b) of the 1946 Act as amended by s.74 of the 2015 Act. It is, moreover, difficult to square this approach with the fact that there is a capacity to summon witnesses to give evidence, and produce documents, and that such witnesses are given the same immunities and privileges as witnesses before the High Court, and that failure or refusal to give such evidence is a criminal offence. Though there may be few prosecutions for perjury, there seems little doubt that the structure created by the requirement to give evidence on oath, and the possibility of prosecution for false evidence, is an important part of ensuring that justice is done in cases where there is serious and direct conflict of evidence. Certainly, we have yet to find a better one. There is nothing in the Act which suggests that such conflicts cannot arise in the context of the jurisdictions exercised by the W.R.C. In such circumstances, I consider that the absence of at least a capacity to allow the adjudication officer to require that certain evidence be given on oath is inconsistent with the Constitution. I appreciate that one possible contention is that a blanket rule is easier to apply since, if the question of evidence on oath becomes a matter for discretion and only applicable in certain cases, it is an issue which may be raised in many cases, and, if an incorrect decision is made, may lead to the overall decision being quashed. This, in turn, might lead to adjudication officers feeling that the safest route is to concede the procedure even when it is not required, and possibly unhelpful, and leading, inevitably therefore, to greater and unnecessary formality in the proceedings. However, this type of problem is inevitable in any form of judicial decision-making and is a reason to have experienced decision-makers. Difficulty of decision-making cannot be designed out of a system intended to decide difficult disputes.

145. Finally, in this regard, it is striking that the Act sets out specific procedures for the adjudication officer (and the Labour Court) to follow. Section 41(5) requires the adjudication officer to permit the parties "to be heard" and "to present evidence". Given this enumeration of procedures, the absence of a reference to cross-examination might appear deliberate and directed towards discouraging cross-examination. The Act contemplates "evidence" being given by "witnesses" having the same privileges and immunities as witnesses in the High Court. As long ago as Re Haughey, these features of court proceedings, and, in particular, the ability to cross-examine the opposing party, were regarded as fundamental to fair procedures, and the right of cross-examination

> "could hope to make any adequate defence of his good name. To deny such rights is, in an ancestral adage, a classic case of clocha ceangailte agus madraí scaoilte. Article 40, s. 3, of the Constitution is a guarantee to the citizen of basic fairness of procedures. The Constitution guarantees such fairness, and it is the duty of the Court to underline that the words of Article 40, s. 3, are not political shibboleths but provide a positive protection for the citizen and his good name."

146. The arguments offered in defence of the statute effectively concede that cross-examination may be necessary in at least some of the cases coming before an adjudication officer and, it might be thought, in most, if not all, cases in which a witness attends and gives evidence which is not conceded. It is certainly unsatisfactory, in my view, that there is no express provision for this in the procedures set out in the Act, particularly when the Act is meant to be capable of being operated by persons without any knowledge of the law, and for decisions to be made by persons without any broader legal experience or training, even though they may have very detailed familiarity with the statutory code in the field of employment law. Mr. O'Mara, in his affidavit acknowledged the "tremendous advance" in establishment of a single system for adjudication, but observed that this had come at a cost:-

> "Although never specifically stated, there has been an underlying hostility to the involvement of the legal profession in acting for parties to employment litigation. We can all agree that there should not be a place for unnecessary formalism and lay litigants should not be discouraged. This should not mean that minimum standards of procedures … should not have a place".

The State respondents exhibited a paper prepared by the Registrar of the W.R.C. on "fair procedures in quasi judicial statutory bodies" which addressed, inter alia, the question of cross-examination. Quoting Wigmore's famous description of cross-examination as the greatest legal engine invented for the discovery of truth, the paper continues:-

> "whether courts are really concerned with the discovery of truth is a topic for another day. For the purposes of this presentation, it is worth emphasising that depriving a party to a hearing from their constitutionally entrenched right to confront and cross-examine his or her accusers could be deemed prejudicial, by the courts, in certain circumstances."

This seems to display a narrow and defensive conception of fair procedures. Cross-examination and any other procedure should be allowed because they contribute to a fair hearing, and not merely because refusal may lead to challenge. It is, however, the case that it is to be presumed that an Act will be operated consistently with the Constitution, and any procedures carried out under it will comply with constitutional requirements. I note that the W.R.C. has produced a Guidance Note for a WRC Adjudication Hearing which, at para. 6.4, expressly refers to the right to question and cross-examine witnesses. While the guidelines have no statutory force, they are an indication that the W.R.C. does not seek to preclude cross-examination where it is necessary. If cross-examination is wrongly refused, then a remedy is available. I cannot conclude that the absence of an express reference to the availability of cross-examination in this case renders the Act unconstitutional.

147. Finally, the issue of the independence of decision-makers was touched on in argument, although not itself a separate ground of challenge. Independence and impartiality are fundamental components of the capacity to administer justice. Under the Act, an authorised officer is appointed by the Minister, which appointment contemplates revocation of the appointment in accordance with s. 40. Section 40(7) merely provides that the Minister may revoke an appointment under the section, but does not specify the circumstances in which such revocation may, and, as importantly, may not, occur. While the section contemplates the possibility of appointment for a fixed term, it is not required. Section 40(8) does contain a guarantee that an adjudication officer "shall be independent in the performance of his or her functions". However, the Act does not reconcile this with the power under the preceding subsection which gives to the Minister unqualified power of revocation of appointment. This is troubling, particularly as it is likely that the adjudication officers will be civil servants in the Minister's department with other responsibilities where they will routinely be required to accept direction. It would seem, however, that, if the procedure is treated as an administration of justice permitted by Article 37, the power of revocation could not be exercised in a fashion that interfered with, or detracted from, the independence of the adjudication officer in the exercise of their functions. Membership of the Labour Court is not regulated by the 2015 Act but by the provisions of the Industrial Relations Act 1946, which provides for appointments for a fixed term and removal for stated reasons but does not contain any express statement of the independence of such members. These matters were not the subject of argument in this case but would, at a minimum , require careful scrutiny in the light of the conclusion of this Court that the functions being performed are functions of a judicial nature involving the administration of justice under the Constitution. These considerations are not peculiar to the Irish constitutional order: guaranteed impartiality and independence are also essential requirements for any adjudication within the scope of European law, or in accordance with Article 6 E.C.H.R. and the jurisprudence of the E.Ct.H.R.

III – Remedy

148. The features identified above which are I consider to be repugnant to the Constitution are not inevitable, or even central, to the operation of the 2015 Act. It is necessary to distinguish between the consequences of each finding. The terms of s. 41(13) require that all hearings shall be conducted otherwise than in public. It is appropriate to declare that provision repugnant to the Constitution. The effect is that the prohibition on public hearings is removed, and proceedings may, but not must, be heard in public. In relation to question of the administration of an oath, the unconstitutionality resides in the absence of something, rather than a positive provision in the statute. It would, in my view, be inappropriate to declare the statute as a whole unconstitutional because it does not make provision for this, particularly because, in many cases, an adjudication officer may properly decide that such a requirement is not necessary. Instead, I think it is appropriate to merely declare that the absence of provision for the administration of an oath, or any possibility of punishment for giving false evidence, is inconsistent with the Constitution.

149. These conclusions do not, moreover, appear to have any consequence for decisions already made in other cases under the 2015 Act, nor do they necessarily preclude current proceedings under the Act, even without amendment of the Act. The effect of this decision is that proceedings may be heard in public, and it would appear that it is only in those cases where an adjudication officer concludes that it is necessary that an oath be administered that the flaw in the Act would preclude proceedings pending any considered amendment of the Act. However, I would hear the parties further on the question of the precise remedy, and the order to be made.

1. Following the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, employees have the right not to be sacked, excepting substantial reasons of competence or qualifications. Up to the Workplace Relations Act 2015, unfair dismissals cases were heard by a tribunal with a right to a complete rehearing in the Circuit Court. This judgment concerns the constitutionality of the sections of the 2015 Act which abolished rights of appeal to a court, save for the referral of a point of law. Does the adjudication by a State official of unfair dismissal claims constitute an adjudication which Article 34.1 of the Constitution requires to "be administered in courts by judges appointed" as such, or are such adjudications, instead, "the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature" which are excepted by Article 37.1? Is, further, the issuing of a District Court order for enforcement as required by the 2015 Act consequent on such an adjudication such as to validate the process within the administration of justice by courts; or, as the Act demands, is a court order premised on a hearing excluding the employer unconstitutional?

Issue for adjudication

2. Correctly deciding what happened to Mr Zalewski to get him sacked from his job in Buywise Discount Stores in Dublin would tax the abilities of a professional judge. This unfair dismissal case does not involve any fine ruling as to points of precedent, law or statutory interpretation; adjudicating his case does require experience of how people behave, patience in listening to two starkly different sets of factual assertions and a determination to come to fair findings that will reflect as far as is possible the actual facts as drawn from a haze of contradictory assertion. Mr Zalewski had a job, but, as and when he applied to the Workplace Relations Commission for redress for unfair dismissal, he had become unemployed through having been summarily sacked for improper conduct, or so his employer claimed. His contract of employment has been repudiated. First at a brief hearing by his employer concluding he should be told to leave and then through that decision being affirmed by the decision maker's father on an internal workplace appeal. Where does this leave Mr Zalewski? Many decisions on fair procedures centre on the constitutionally protected right to enjoy one's reputation; In re Haughey [1971] IR 217, 265. To the ordinary working person, of more importance than reputation is being actually able to earn a living. Work bestows dignity. Work is a necessary part of psychic balance. It is work which puts bread on the table. And when that bread is earned through honest labour, it is properly a source of pride for those who have put effort into their livelihood: Imíonn an tuirse ach fanann an tairbhe. Those who work hard, who really try, are an asset to any employment for which they are qualified.

3. Having a contract of employment repudiated through dismissal makes the immediate future of the dismissed worker one of real uncertainty. The right to work is put in jeopardy. A new job has to be found. A new employer has to be convinced that the prospective employee will, firstly, knuckle down to the task with the competence or qualifications he or she possesses, be these experience or a formal diploma or natural physical attributes, and, secondly, enhance the workplace through the content of their character. Just as no one would wish to engage an incompetent or a sluggard, nor would any employer knowingly choose to engage a thief.

4. Yet, the reasons given by Buywise Discount Stores for the repudiation of Mr Zalewski's employment involve all those faults. If true, these are almost insurmountable obstacles to a working person's value in the marketplace. A dismissed worker ordinarily will need a reference. References come in various forms, even if not notifying summary dismissal: that a person has left of their own volition and after proper notice; that an employee was made redundant; that the employment terminated by mutual agreement. Each of these carry resonances beyond the skeletal appearance of language. Furthermore, many contemporary references are not in writing but constitute supplying contact details of former employers to prospective employers. Hence, what may follow is the exchange of open-ended information rather than a formal declaration, itself of limited value. This particular dismissed person is in a very bad situation. What is Mr Zalewski to do? He went to the Workplace Relations Commission seeking justice, that a true and fair adjudication be carried out as to the facts leading to his dismissal and as to who was in the right and who was in the wrong and as to whether emotion and supposition supplanted reasonableness in the mind of his employer Buywise Discount Stores. He was as badly let down by that appeal to justice as was possible. Yet, this was the only system from which he could seek redress, that mandated by the State since 2015 to deal with unfair dismissals, one with no appeal on the facts to any court. An luibh ná faightear is í a fhóireann.

Disputed circumstances

5. These are the basic circumstances. Mr Zalewski worked from March 2012 to April 2016 in a general shop trading under the Costcutter brand owned by Buywise Discount Store. The place was plagued by theft: shoplifting and robbery. He was a security guard initially, but attained the rank of supervisor from December 2014. A year later, he was provisionally promoted to assistant manager, but this did not work out. He was reverted to his former role. During this, he was present for robberies in the store: one using a knife and one using a firearm. Most seriously, in October 2014, both pepper spray and a gun were used in robbing the shop, the firearm being actually discharged. Mr Zalewski initiated a personal injuries action against his employer, presumably a negligence claim of an unsafe system or place of work, seeking damages for having been traumatised by being sprayed with a noxious substance and by a gun being discharged.

6. In April 2016, the manager of the shop became emotionally troubled over the presence in the store of a person he believed to be a repeat shoplifter and, apparently, by the fact that Mr Zalewski had not arrested her. He and another employee were subjected to a dressing down involving, it is claimed, the all-too-common use of expletives. Mr Zalewski got upset, went home and sought medical advice. This was regarded by his employer as gross misconduct. Matters seemed to calm and the manager invited Mr Zalewski in for a chat, apologising for the conduct of the meeting over the suspected shoplifter. But, on returning after a few days sick leave, he was called to another meeting. Apparently, he was told this was a continuation of the earlier one and informed of the employer's view that he was not doing his work, that the shop condition was unacceptable, that he was failing to protect the stock, that he was not preventing shoplifting, that he had organised legal and medical advice for other staff over the violent robbery and that this was insubordinate of the company.

7. A lot of this might be emotionally driven, but it would be the job of anyone assessing the case to decide if any of this had a factual basis. Perhaps some comments might have arisen from frustration over repeated criminal actions, a kind of lashing out in frustration perhaps. He was then formally called to a disciplinary meeting. After that, in a letter dated 26 April 2016, his employer claimed that he had not followed the robbery prevention policy and had undermined other staff who were attempting to follow it, had denigrated the work ethic of the store in the context of robberies and, most damagingly had "associated with and used money that had been removed from our tills". In consequence, the letter stated, Mr Zalewski was summarily dismissed for gross misconduct. He appealed. There followed an appeal hearing internally before the manager's father. During this process, Mr Zalewski was told that there was "absolutely nothing" in the dismissal letter stating that the management had "thought that you were ever robbing" and purporting to stress that this was somehow "an accusation made by another member of staff" but "at no time" did management "ever think or say that you were involved in stealing." The dismissal was affirmed.

The task

8. A professional judge dealing with this case would first of all note that under s 6 of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2015 the burden of proving that a reasonable employer would have regarded there as having been "substantial grounds for dismissal" rested on the employer Buywise Discount Store; s 6(1). There being no issue but that Mr Zalewski had been employed and then was dismissed, as opposed to being an independent contractor or working on a fixed-term contract which had expired, and that a valid termination of his contract of employment could only take place for reasons related to "the capability, competence or qualifications of the employee for performing work of the kind which he was employed by the employer to do". If the dismissal was substantially caused, or in the statutory language "resulted wholly or mainly", by the civil litigation claim arising out of the violent robbery or from Mr Zalewski being a likely witness in another employee's claim, it would be automatically unfair; s 6(2)(c).

9. It would be for the employer to prove substantial grounds for dismissal. Thus, a shop owner's frustration over the actions of criminal third parties is not enough to justify sacking an employee. A case has to be made out showing that the employee was not competent in the assigned duties or not capable of carrying out these duties or was lazy. This is not simple. It is not an easy task to go about sifting through even commonplace facts in search of the truth. Was there any connection with the employee and money stolen from the tills; or is that allegation being withdrawn and if so why was it made? What was the anti-robbery policy of the shop and what instructions or training was given to the employee? Was that policy such as to endanger employees so that it might justifiably not always be followed? Was there a policy on suspected shoplifters; were they to be banned or discouraged from the shop? How were they identified and was a list kept? Since under s 4 of the Criminal Justice Act 1984, a civilian, a non-police officer, may only arrest if, as a matter of hard fact and not of reasonable suspicion, an offence carrying a potential penalty of at least 5 years imprisonment had been committed, and reasonable suspicion attached to the person to be arrested, what was the policy on arresting suspected shoplifters? Was the shop left in disarray and if so when and how badly? Was company policy denigrated and if so how and to whom? What, if any, connection did civil litigation over the violent robbery have to the dismissal? If procedures were agreed which were more than the minimal procedure of putting the dismissal allegation to an employee and hearing a reply before making a decision, what were these procedures and were these followed?

10. The consequences for Mr Zalewski should his integrity not be vindicated would be to diminish his ability to find work. But that is only one side of the case. Dismissal litigation has serious ramifications for an employer as well. Any understanding of business must comprehend that it may be impossible for people to work together where trust in a person's competence has broken down. Where that happens, it is not unusual for a voluntary severance package to be offered, rather than risk litigation. In circumstances, however, of tight margins or of businesses being under strain, perhaps due to economic circumstances or loss through theft as can happen in retail, finding the money may be difficult. At the end of every hearing on unfair dismissal before what was the Employment Appeals Tribunal, which was the predecessor of the Workplace Relations Commission, the panel sitting would ask both sides what their preferred remedy was in the event of a finding for the employee whose employment had been terminated; the remedies being compensation for up to two years of salary, reengagement in the same or a similar post, or reinstatement so that whatever salary and benefits had been lost became immediately payable as if the employee had worked throughout. Thus s 7 of the 1977 Act, as amended, was given life in a procedure akin to that where a separate hearing takes place before a convicted person is sentenced. Both the entitlement to redress and the form thereof were concisely addressed by the employer and the employee. In that context, the provisions of the replacement legislation startle.

The Workplace Relations Commission

11. For 38 years, unfair dismissals claims were dealt with by the Employment Appeals Tribunal. That consisted of a barrister or solicitor as chair of each hearing accompanied by, and with equal decision-making power, a person nominated by employer's bodies and by trade unions. Generally, as in all tribunal hearings, strict rules of evidence were not followed but hearings focused on the essence of what led to the dismissal and written rulings followed. A rehearing was possible by appeal to the Circuit Court, which was a rehearing of all the evidence, and a further, and regrettable because it was unnecessary and expensive, appeal by rehearing to the High Court. If the matter had started, as was possible, before a rights commissioner under the 1977 Act, that in turn could be appealed to the Employment Appeals Tribunal, hence the name of the adjudicative tribunal, but both parties had to agree to the rights commissioner first dealing with the claim, otherwise the first instance hearing was before the Employment Appeals Tribunal. Four potential hearings by way of repeated first-instance examinations of evidence tended to favour appeals by the side with more resources, almost invariably the employer, and this system was judicially criticised; Panisi v JVC Ireland Ltd [2011] IEHC 179.

12. The Department of Jobs, Enterprise and Innovation in 2012 produced a report entitled, worryingly, "Legislating for a World-Class Workplace Relations Service: Submission to Oireachtas Committee on Jobs, Enterprise and Innovation". Since Ireland is a first-world country, such hyperbolic titles are unnecessary. But, the result was the Workplace Relations Act 2015. This set up the Workplace Relations Commission. Briefly, an employee can make a complaint to the Commission that the employer has contravened any scheduled provision. This schedule includes minimum notice of termination, conditions of employment, payment of wages, holiday pay, equal treatment and unfair dismissals. An employee or employer can also refer a dispute as to the employee's entitlements under other scheduled provisions. The kinds of application dealt with by the Commission are, statistically: pay issues, 28%; discrimination or inequality issues, 14%; unfair dismissals cases, 14%; working time issues, 13%; industrial relations and trade disputes, 9%; and conditions of employment disputes, 8%. While, on being dismissed, Mr Zalewski put in claims for minimum notice of termination and payment of wages, under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 to 2005 and the Payment of Wages Act 1991 as amended, the substantive case effectively concerns his dismissal.

13. Under s 47 of the 2015 Act, on receipt of a complaint, or referral of a dispute, the Director General of the Commission may inform the parties that it is intended, if there is no objection, to deal with it by written submissions only. Similarly, if there is no objection, a complaint can be referred for mediation. If successful, the agreed result of mediation becomes a binding contract that, if necessary, is litigated in court in the ordinary way. Most disputes are considered, as in this case, by an adjudication officer. Appointment of adjudication officers is by open State competition. A judge in a court requires a legal qualification as a barrister or solicitor and 10 years of practice before appointment to the District Court or Circuit Court, and 12 years in all other courts. Here, the evidence discloses that the Commission takes people who have experience of either personnel management or industrial relations or employment law. No minimum practice in those areas is specified. The job of such adjudication officer, under s 45, is to inquire into the complaint or dispute. Section 42 enables frivolous or vexatious claims to be dismissed straight away. The legislation specifies that the parties, who may be represented, must be given an opportunity to be heard and to present any evidence relevant to the complaint or dispute. No evidence is given on oath. Powers of compulsion are granted, breach of which is a summary offence, such as giving notice in writing to any person requiring their attendance at a specified time and place to give evidence or produce documents. A decision must be given in writing but mistakes of an administrative or clerical nature may be corrected by notice to the parties. Hearings are in private but all rulings are published, though anonymised. Regulations governing hearings are possible under s 41(17) as to "the presentation of a complaint, referral of a dispute or conduct of proceedings" but no such provisions have been passed. Hence, there is only informal guidance as to how those who have never run a case might conduct a hearing such as that brought by Mr Zalewski.

14. A ruling by an adjudication officer may be appealed by either side to the Labour Court, which is a tribunal not a court. Section 44 provides that the decision of the adjudication officer can be appealed by either party to the Labour Court within 42 days, but the Labour Court can extend time if satisfied that there are exceptional circumstances. Similarly at first instance, under s 47 the Labour Court may inform the parties that it intends, if there is no objection, to deal with the appeal by written submissions only. On this appeal the parties are statutorily entitled to be heard in the same way as at first instance. Proceedings are to be conducted in public unless the Labour Court decides that there are special circumstances. Decisions are given in writing, as at first instance. No appeal to a court, as envisaged by Articles 34, 35, 36 and 37 of the Constitution, is possible. This is in stark contrast to the 1977 Act; see Panisi. A point of law may be referred by the Labour Court to the High Court; meaning upon an appellate adjudication by the Labour Court, either party may appeal on a point of law to the High Court; s 46. This is not, however, in any sense an appeal based on the merits, that is, it is not a re-examination or re-adjudication on the facts.

15. Effectively, the order of the adjudication officer, or that of the Labour Court on appeal, has the same status as a court order. Both employer and employee are bound by law to obey such orders. But, there is possible further intervention, which is for an employee, not an employer, to go to the District Court; s 45. If an employer does not carry out the decision of the Labour Court within 42 days, and has not appealed a point of law to the High Court, or has abandoned the appeal, an application may be made to the District Court by the Commission or the employee, or trade union body acting on behalf of the employee only. The employer is entirely shut out. The employer may not be heard by the District Court other than in respect of the question whether the decision has been carried out, that is, has the employer paid compensation as ordered or re-engaged or re-instated the employee. This is merely a basic and uncontentious question of fact. The legislation provides, in flagrant breach of the constitutional principle that a court should hear from each side, or at least provide that opportunity, that the District Court shall not hear any evidence on any other issue, but shall make an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms. The District Court may order, under s 43(4), the payment of interest on the delayed implementation of the order if in all the circumstances this is considered appropriate, but without hearing from the employer. Apart from inability to pay, under s 51, it is an offence to fail to comply with a District Court order to pay compensation.

16. Section 43(2) provides that if the adjudication officer's decision had required the employer to re-engage or reinstate the employee, the District Court may instead order the employer to pay compensation "of such amount as is just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances". Even though the employer is entirely shut out from addressing the court, unlike the ordinary course of any court hearing where parties are entitled constitutionally to address the judge as to remedy, the result of a hearing may be altered in the absence of a party. This is not simply notice, there is a legislative requirement that the employer may not make any submissions, yet the employee can. It could be that 6 months has passed since a sacking and re-engagement is ordered by the Labour Court or adjudication officer, but the District Court faced with non-compliance could decide, in the absence of the employer, that instead two years salary as compensation be paid. Average wages now approach €50,000 per annum. Further, the adjudication of compensation has always depended on any contribution to the dismissal made by the employer. An award of €100,000 may cripple a small or medium sized enterprise. More importantly, it may also be unjust. How is a judge of the District Court to know what is the right order to make or whether, for instance, the dismissed employee has made no effort to mitigate unemployment without information from both sides? Even still, the law as set out in the 2015 Act gives the employer no rights. Well, the Constitution does.

Mr Zalewski's experience

17. Mr Zalewski's treatment by the Workplace Relations Commission was nothing short of dreadful. He engaged a solicitor. Both turned up for a hearing on 26 October 2016. The employer was represented but the person who made the decision to dismiss was not there due to a family event. Notwithstanding that, the employer had the burden of proving substantial reasons of competence or qualification to justify the dismissal, something impossible without the person who made the decision to dismiss; the employer's representative started outlining their case without calling any actual evidence. This was objected to on behalf of Mr Zalewski. The matter was adjourned by the adjudication officer who asked Mr Zalewski's representative to bring along certificates of social welfare payments for the next occasion. The new hearing date was notified by post for 13 December 2016. That day, both parties turned up and were represented, expecting a hearing. Instead, the adjudication officer met them in the corridor. It was announced that the decision in the case had already been made. A few days later that decision was received in the post. It stated that findings had been made on the basis of the "evidence and a written submission". There was no evidence of any kind. An order was made dismissing the case. The decision reads:

> On the basis of the evidence and my findings above I declare the respondent conducted the investigation, disciplinary and appeal hearings in accordance with the disciplinary procedures of the company…
> The complainant and his legal representative did not advance any argument or evidence at the hearing as to why they considered the dismissal "to be both procedurally and substantially unfair" as stated in the complaint form.
> The Complainant stated at the hearing that he was in receipt of jobseekers benefit from the Department of Social Protection since the date of his dismissal. He was requested to provide evidence of this but did not do so.
> In accordance with s. 8(1)(c) of that Act I declare the complaint of unfair dismissal is not well founded.

18. How did this happen? Not a single reference to fact is made in this template ruling. There is no reasoning. The document has every appearance of the unthinking use of a template. The chat in the corridor in purported remembrance of the case and stating that the parties had been called back by mistake indicates that there must have been some kind of deliberation. The State does not explain this. A suggestion during argument of a possible template confusion might be a possibility. It is not for the courts to speculate but it is, in the ordinary way, the normal thing for the State to explain; the relevant authorities are set out in Murphy & Others – The Role and Responsibility of the State in Litigation [2020] 01 IJSJ. Where did this leave the person who had sought justice? What about the allegation over complicity in theft, not preventing robbery, not following shoplifting policy, being insubordinate, walking off the job? No decision on anything was made: no reasons; no vindication of the case made by anyone; no basis for seeking fresh employment with a clean record; no basis for saying the dismissal was correct for some substantial reason related to competence or qualification.

19. By a decision, on consent, of Meenan J in the High Court, on these judicial review proceedings, on 8 February 2018, the adjudication officer's decision was quashed; [2018] IEHC 59. Meenan J also decided in the light of that decision that Mr Zalewski no longer had standing to bring the constitutional challenge with which this judgment is concerned. That decision was reversed by this Court on 18 March 2019; judgment of Finlay Geoghegan J [2019] IESC 17.

Approach to serious adjudications

20. According to Ciarán O'Meara solicitor and Tom Mallon barrister, both lifetime practitioners in employment law, what has just been described might reasonably, but unfortunately, be expected from the qualifications and experience required of those tasked by the Workplace Relations Commission to make important decisions on people's employment and reputation. Here the decision impacted directly on the future working life and on the reputation of Mr Zalewski. Yet, what has been described happened. The evidence from those practitioners is that some called upon to make such important decisions do not understand the more difficult questions that arise in employment law, including rights derived from European law. There is a hostility to representation by the legal profession, they assert. Those adjudication officers with more ability and experience tend to be assigned more serious cases, according to them, but where does that leave ordinary cases: are these to be assigned some less expert form of assessment? Their evidence is of a marked contrast to the professionalism of court adjudication. Furthermore, since the public is not admitted to view the activities of the Workplace Relations Commission, theirs is the only evidence of a disturbing situation that there is likely to be.

21. This evidence could not have come from any other source since the workings of administrators in deciding unfair dismissals, cases of fundamental moment to the reputation and marketability of working people, are closed to both the media and to the public. Of course, few enough members of the public wander into courts, but they are there when they come as of rights and are welcome. Usually, their place is taken by dedicated newspaper and electronic media reporters who have a crucial constitutional role in seeing that justice is administered soundly. As well as that evidence, an academic article indicating profound levels of dissatisfaction with this system under the 2015 Act is cited on behalf of Mr Zalewski; Barry – Surveying the Scene: How Representatives' Views Informed a New Era in Irish Workplace Dispute Resolution [2018] DULJ 41/4. The abstract reads:

> The Workplace Relations Act 2015 introduced a major overhaul of workplace dispute resolution bodies in Ireland, streamlining a complicated system for > resolving workplace disputes comprising multiple fora into a two-tier structure. The article describes and analyses the results of two surveys undertaken by the author of the views of employment law and industrial relations practitioners and other representatives in Ireland before the reforms in 2011 and after the reforms in 2016. This article describes the purpose, methodology and considers the results of both surveys. The 2011 survey informed the agenda for reforming the Irish workplace dispute resolution system in 2015. The 2016 survey informed the new workplace dispute resolution bodies where improvements could be made. The impact of these surveys will be considered in the context of recent developments in the operation of the new system.

22. While this relates to research from 2016, levels of dissatisfaction are then at 49%. The State's response is that this is inadmissible in evidence. Just that: dismissal out of hand of any criticism of a system that so markedly and in every fundamental respect failed Mr Zalewski. Of course, there are also affidavits about how much training is received, and how seriously matters are taken. But that does not explain this. The Court of Justice of the European Union would take no such attitude in dismissing an important academic contribution and, furthermore, much of what is concerned in the administration of the task of the Workplace Relations Commission is derived from this State's obligations in European law.

23. Evidence has been presented that the Workplace Relations Commission, in the kind of serious employment disputes that would tend to attract the services of practitioners such as Mr O'Meara and Mr Mallon, has a serious problem. The State response has been to point to the lack of specificity in citation and to emphasise a training regime for staff.

24. Success in any enterprise depends on people working hard. That is what an independent country is all about. Success in the administration of the State depends on every public servant approaching their task as a duty to the nation, regarding work as the means whereby this independent country's very existence is justified by the committed nature of what is done in the name of Ireland. All public servants are members of that team and all are required to give their best. While there is a separation of powers, the task of executive, government and judiciary are devoted to the public good and this cannot be achieved save through dedicated work and the unremitting exercise of good sense. It is not for this Court to reach a conclusion on whether the Workplace Relations Commission is a failure. That is not part of the case. The complaints made by practitioners are essentially in the context of competency and consequent effects on fairness of adjudication, especially where legal procedures worked out through experience have met with less than enthusiasm.

25. What can fairly be recorded beyond the example of this case, without ruling, is that there is much evidence of inadequacy. In the context of industries and forms of administration which have an immediate determination to find out the cause of any failure, and to seriously address why accidents or maladministration has occurred on the basis of objective appraisal, matters work better in the long run. Mistakes are corrected, people are expected to tell the truth as to any errors since the emphasis is not on punishment but the wider good of the organisation and those served by it, structures are changed where found inadequate and, above all, there is no carpet under which to sweep the evidence of malfunction. In contrast, where what is involved is a closed society intent on self-protection, a kind of secular priesthood, ranks will be closed, mistakes will be covered up or denied, the truth will be almost beyond reach and in consequence what is bad will institutionally become worse. This does not serve the Irish people. Matthew Syed in a book-length study contrasts the perpetuation of mistakes within contexts where this happens, as for instance where hospitals react with hostility to accusations of error, which can happen but does not always happen, and where attitudes may have changed, with the airline industry where travel safety is upheld through the objective recording of fact and later objective analysis of accidents, a determination to find causes and a consequent obligation to change for the better; Syed – Black Box Thinking: Why Most People Never Learn from Their Mistakes--But Some Do (London, 2015). It is possible, certainly it is to be hoped, that since the initial judicial review of this astonishing set of events that matters may have improved at the Workplace Relations Commission.

Compulsion absent representation

26. There are many instances in law where a citizen is bound by legal regulation which does not first of all give to him or her any right to speak or make representations to the contrary of what the law requires, this despite criminal sanction for disobedience. A prime instance is road traffic legislation as to who may be licenced to drive, what the speed limit is, obedience to signals, direction of travel and condition of vehicles. There, you simply obey and have no choice because there is nothing to argue or make representations about. Another may be public health legislation for the protection of the common good, which may perhaps override individual rights, but subject to exceptions. Yet another may involve deprivations of liberty because of mental illness, but with periodic reviews by independent experts. Those who are mentally ill may indeed speak before being confined to hospital but their representations may not be entirely grounded in reality. A change in planning law may alter the expectations of many and enhance the prospects of others. Central to a democratic society is participation through the free choice of representatives to speak to and thus have a hand in legislating for the entire community. With planning legislation, democratic consultation is added as a further tier as to zoning decisions, which can change tort liability for nuisance, and rights to notice and objection as to any proposed development.

27. Legislation is a function of representation, consideration of the solution to wide questions of policy and the furtherance of social order mandated by the Preamble to the Constitution. In a way, and the point should not be stretched, through democratic participation citizens join in law making or at the least designate the persons trusted or the policies hoped for. Courts are different. This is the forum where the citizens have reposed trust in those qualified for fair judgment, where the law is entitled to the evidence of all, and where all witnesses are bound through democratic obligation to the truth. Courts do not impose liabilities on those coming before the judicial process without notice. At the very least, in civil cases a statement of the case is proven to be served and left unanswered before liability can be established in the absence of a party and in summary criminal cases proof of service of being summonsed on particular charges to court is required before a court may proceed to possible conviction and the imposition of penalties. The more modern procedure, whether constitutionally mandated or not, is to issue a warrant of arrest before any serious conviction is imposed. When there is a conviction, there is a sentence hearing characterised by brief submissions as to the justice of the appropriate penalties.

28. Contrast such basic principles for the administration of a just system with s 43 of the 2015 Act:

> (1) If an employer in proceedings in relation to a complaint or dispute referred to an adjudication officer under section 41 fails to carry out the decision of the adjudication officer under that section in relation to the complaint or dispute in accordance with its terms before the expiration of 56 days from the date on which the notice in writing of the decision was given to the parties, the District Court shall—
> (a) on application to it in that behalf by the employee concerned or the Commission, or
> (b) on application to it in that behalf, with the consent of the employee, by any trade union or excepted body of which the employee is a member, without hearing the employer or any evidence (other than in relation to the matters aforesaid) make an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms.
> (2) Upon the hearing of an application under this section in relation to a decision of an adjudication officer requiring an employer to reinstate or reengage an employee, the District Court may, instead of making an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms, make an order directing the employer to pay to the employee compensation of such amount as is just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances but not exceeding 104 weeks' remuneration in respect of the employee's employment calculated in accordance with regulations under section 17 of the Act of 1977.
> (3) The reference in subsection (1) to a decision of an adjudication officer is a reference to such a decision in relation to which, at the expiration of the time for bringing an appeal against it, no such appeal has been brought, or if such an appeal has been brought it has been abandoned and the references to the date on which notice in writing of the decision was given to the parties shall, in a case where such an appeal is abandoned, be construed as a reference to the date of such abandonment.
> (4) The District Court may, in an order under this section, if in all the circumstances it considers it appropriate to do so, where the order relates to the payment of compensation, direct the employer concerned to pay to the employee concerned interest on the compensation at the rate referred to in section 22 of the Act of 1981, in respect of the whole or any part of the period beginning 42 days after the date on which the decision of the adjudication officer is given to the parties and ending on the date of the order.
> (5) An application under this section to the District Court shall be made to a judge of the District Court assigned to the District Court district in which the employer concerned ordinarily resides or carries on any profession, business or occupation.

29. Hence, interest may be charged upon a statutorily mandated unanswered representations from one side of a legal dispute. Here, however, the issue is limited to the time between the Workplace Relations Commission order and the court hearing. Even still, what if there is culpable delay by or on behalf of the only party entitled to speak to this, the employee or employee representative. Should there not be a chance to at least make that case?

30. More seriously, even, a re-engagement or re-instatement may be altered on hearing only one side to what may be a cripplingly expensive order of compensation for up to 104 weeks of salary. There may only have been absence from work for 25 weeks. There may have been no effort to mitigate the situation. This is hard to credit. The reason both sides are required in a legal dispute is that, as a matter of human nature, some will lie and need to be corrected by opposing testimony or submissions, but more will take a subjective view of what objective fact may disclose as an exaggeration or a mistake. Some mistakes are culpable, after all, in themselves and all too often mistakes, so called, are made in the direction of those it suits. So, even as a counsel of prudence, efforts should be made to hear both sides of a dispute. Is that not the experience of the human race since the time of the prophet Daniel? Yet here, a statute requires "without hearing the employer or any evidence" that a default of 56 days by the employer, what might merit re-engagement, which does not carry financial loss, may be turned by the District Court on not hearing that employer into damages against a firm or employer amounting to up to two years of salary. That can happen even though that might not be merited. After all, how is the District Court judge to know if limited to hearing only one side of the case? The employee may have immediately moved to a better rewarded engagement or might have just decided to not seek work at all. The 1977 Act makes that relevant: the 2015 Act shuts out the employer from making that case.

31. This is both relevant under the 1977 Act and is relevant too as a matter of ordinary sense. But how does the judge know what to do? The judge is prohibited from hearing evidence from an employer, save as to default in compliance with the order, and is compelled to consider submissions from only one side of the case. Yet, the result may be unjust and may be financially crippling. Furthermore, this approach flies in the face of the principle established by this Court in The State (Irish Pharmaceutical Union*) v Employment Appeals Tribunal* [1987] ILRM 36 and see Galway-Mayo Institute of Technology v Employment Appeals Tribunal [2007] IEHC 210. Those cases establish a duty on the Employment Appeals Tribunal to ask employers and employees at the end of a hearing into unfair dismissals what remedy they prefer; reengagement, reinstatement or compensation in salary of up to 104 weeks. This is simply normal procedure. If a party chooses a remedy, for instance damages, in an application, a court or tribunal may proceed to award that remedy after finding facts that justify that result. However, if there are variable statutory remedies, the parties must be allowed, even in brief terms, to address why one is to be regarded as appropriate over another. There is also the point from In Re Haughey, using the analysis of Ó Dálaigh CJ that "under the Constitution the Courts cannot be used as appendages or auxiliaries to enforce the purported convictions of other tribunals". But the point is even more fundamental: this is a denial of justice.

32. Section 43 offends the Constitution, is incompatible with a fair and impartial hearing and cannot be saved through any construction that does not do violence to the plain words of the legislation. Yet, in the High Court, it was this court's mandate, in reality the use of the courts system as a purported instrument of validation, which was held to save the overall scheme for the administration of unfair dismissal claims from being the administration of justice apart from those appointed as judges within the system of courts set up by the Constitution; Simons J [2020] IEHC 226.

Limitation of judicial powers by appeal

33. The Constitution Committee of 1934 had discussed a draft Article 64 providing that the "judicial power of the" State "shall be exercised and justice administered in the public courts established by the Oireachtas, by judges appointed" as regulated in the text. To that, a recommendation was added:

> We are of opinion that this Article should be regarded as fundamental. We suggest, however, that it should be carefully re-drafted so as to meet the present position > in which judicial or quasi-judicial functions are necessarily performed by persons who are not judges within the strict terms of the Constitution, e.g. Revenue Commissioners, Land Commissioners, Court Registrars, etc.

34. According to Gerard Hogan, The Origins of the Irish Constitution, 1928-1941 (Dublin, Royal Irish Academy, 2017) pages 40-44 and 84, this proviso was to remove doubts as to the powers of such bodies and, in addition to enable the more expeditious and economical administration of justice and transaction of public business, but that criminal trials should be specifically excluded. According to An Taoiseach, addressing Dáil Éireann, on the debates as to the 1937 Constitution, questions had arisen:

> about the Land Commission, as to whether their functions were of a judicial character or not … So as not to get tied in the knot of that judicial powers of functions could only be exercised by the ordinary courts, established here, you have a provision of that type.

35. Consideration as to the efficient dispatch of public business are ever more sharply in focus with the accretion of bodies designated to regulate financial business, to promote equality and to combat such evils as racism and hatred. We remain, nonetheless, with Article 34.1 as it emerged from the analysis as to where judicial power should be distributed in providing simply that: "Justice shall be administered in courts established by law by judges appointed in the manner provided by this Constitution" and generally in public, but that, outside of criminal trial, according to Article 37 this was not to "invalidate the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature … by any person or body of persons duly authorised by law" to so do "notwithstanding that such person or body of persons" is not a constitutionally appointed judge in a court. The line is a bright one, but difficult at times to draw, the Constitution being both imperative in commanding the separation of justice from administration, stating "Is i gcúirteanna a bhunaitear le dlí agus ag breithiúna … a riarfar ceart", and merely indicative as to what are "feidhmeanna agus cumhachtaí teoranta breithiúnais a oibriú" outside of that territory, which by reason of the second reference becomes less certain. Nor is there anything as to possible interaction as between the two spheres, supposedly administrative or executive but involving judicial-type decisions or orders, and the possible cure of any blurring of the usurpation of judicial power by enabling a corrective appeal to an actual court. What kind of appeal? That would be the question, and how could an appeal validate the trespass on a court function by enabling a court to review that decision as to fact and as to law and to intervene so as to reverse findings of fact or change the form of relief given on hearing both sides: unlike in s 43 of the 2015 Act which has no regard at all to this fundamental.

36. Apparently, the only statutory provision actually declaring that a quasi-judicial function is authorised is s 24 of the Courts and Court Officers Act 1995 in providing for Master of the High Court to be authorised "to exercise limited functions and powers of a judicial nature within the scope of Article 37 of the Constitution." As often declared, the Master has no judicial power; Permanent TSB v Carr [2019] IEHC 14. The Master prepares cases for the High Court, depending on the current state of the Rules of the Superior Courts may to make discovery orders, makes some preliminary orders as to trial preparation and can analyse papers and decide that elements of a potential defence are not disclosed whereby judgment may be entered straight away. Everything done in that court, however, is subject to appeal by way of the re-litigation of the order before a judge. In so far, therefore, as some judicial powers are exercised, the boundary there set, the teorann set out in Article 37, is that such power is limited because a litigant can immediately have it set to rights by an unfettered appeal to a judge who will reconsider matters not as an appeal but effectively as if nothing had ever happened; in other words, the decision being considered afresh. Sometimes startling provisions emerge from older statutes whereby it may be inferred that the legislature may have thought that because of the nature of the decision made that some exercise of judicial power may have been involved.

37. There the cure, again, was an unfettered appeal. For example s 33 of the Road Traffic Act 1961 enables learner drivers to be tested for their competence on the Rules of the Road and in practical skills by local authorities. A test may be deferred if the candidate does not show up with the right documentation, a provisional licence, proof of identity and a car properly authorised to be driven in public. But, as regards knowledge of rules and competency at driving, clearly the tester is making an assessment: does this person know what road signs mean, directive or advisory, and can the candidate safely drive a car or motorbike or bus or tractor or lorry? Is that adjudication judicial? Has it anything to do with the administration of justice? Is it such as to require that a court should hear about what happened at a particular junction or the engagement of gears? Apparently, according to s 33(6) which provides that:

> (a) A person aggrieved by a decision under subsection (4) of this section may appeal to a Justice of the District Court having jurisdiction in the place in which such person ordinarily resides, and the Justice may either refuse the appeal or, if satisfied that the test was not properly conducted, direct that the applicant shall be given a further test.
> (b) A decision under this subsection of a Justice of the District Court shall be final and not appealable.

38. Ostensibly on the basis of good measure, there can be no other reason, it is also provided that a decision by the examiner as to the propriety of candidate's papers and the authorisation of the vehicle to be on the public road are similarly appealable.

39. What the model does at least posit, if not establish, leaving aside the notion that a driving tester is exercising judicial functions, is that one limitation whereby a power of a judicial nature exercised outside of a court may accord with Article 37 is where, as with the Master, anything done may be rendered as nothing through a judge hearing the same issue again and without regard to any prior decision outside of the court. This is a blind rehearing whereby the judge is obliged to assess the issue with no regard to any prior administrative or quasi-judicial decision through embarking on the cause again and as if no decision, save one enabling the appeal through having been made outside of a court, had happened. But, the question in the first instance must be as to where the definition or adequate description of what is limited may lie. It is there that the boundary is set. The current editors of Kelly: The Irish Constitution (5th edition, Dublin, 2018) put the difficulties starkly at 6.4.101 in stating:

> Any statutory power, whether of a judicial or any other nature, is in one sense necessarily 'limited', since it can be exercised only within the four corners of the area, great or small, which the statute marks out and 'delimits'. It is not, however, in this sense that the courts have understood the word in the Article 36 Context, but rather in the senses of 'modest, 'not far reaching', 'confined to special situations'; in other words, in senses which leave much room for subjective judicial appraisal, since there appears to be no objective criterion for any of these notions.

Identifying limited judicial powers and functions

40. The challenge being thus set in Kelly's Constitutional Law, the case law enables at least three criteria that put matters into the sphere of what are limited functions and powers of a judicial nature to be identified with some security: technical matters; findings which do not have any result other than the public expression of an opinion with no consequent order; and provisional orders and findings subject to immediate appeal which are so limited until confirmed by a court that are of no lasting effect.

41. Technical matters, firstly. Tax is assessed on the basis of income, expenditure or expenses, allowable expenses or statutory allowances, transactions, profit and loss. In essence, while the taxation code can be complex, requiring huge resources of memory to turn acquaintance into expertise, and difficult concepts such as deliberate avoidance for no business purpose arise from time to time, what is involved is a technical calculation. The decision of liability to tax is the well from which the amount to be taken from the taxpayer is calculated. That calculation may be precisely titrated. The reasoning of Barron J in The State (Calcul International Ltd and Solatrex International Ltd) v Appeal Commissioners [1986] 12 JIC 1802, whereby the work of the Appeal Commissioners was described as technical, was criticised as being 'very questionable' by the editors of Kelly at 6.4.111-6.4.112. The assigned power was described by the High Court as being limited, even though there was not, nor sensibly could be, any monetary limit, such as that on Circuit Court orders in civil cases, on how much tax the taxpayer could made liable for. As Barron J stated:

> In reality, the decision has no effect on the fortune of the taxpayer, since the Appeal Commissioners do no more than decide the amount for which the taxpayer was always liable. Their decision may well affect the particular taxpayer adversely since he may be found liable to pay a sum for which he believes he was not liable. But this does not have far-reaching effects. The payment of Customs duty or Value-Added Tax is related proportionately to value of the goods concerned, whereas the payment of Income Tax and Corporation Tax is related proportionately to the relevant taxable income. Such payments cannot have far-reaching effects on the fortune of the taxpayer … since in each case the liability is relative, being proportionate either to his income or to his turnover as the case may be.

42. The validity of the reasoning, however, is to be seen in the accuracy of the description of what the essence of taxation is: the Appeal Commissioners cannot go beyond a calculation. What they do is to assess where in the balance liability tips, income or, as in VAT, turnover or in capital gains profit or in gift or inheritance tax degree of relatedness and amount, after taking into account all due allowances and relevant bands. This is not a judicial assessment. There may be an issue as to a fact, but there the burden is on the taxpayer to demonstrate an allowable expenditure or to set out a vouched account of income, since all relevant books must be kept. This is a technical matter. It is not of its essence about the truthfulness of the relating of an event, the assessment of damages so that an amount is arrived at which will compensate for tortious wrongs, or make up for a broken agreement, the motivation for actions or the general standards of conduct applicable within the community. In taxation there is no equity. All liabilities arise from statute and every sum payable is capable of precise calculation from the records that must be maintained. Certainly, as the editors of Kelly state, an incorrect calculation can have the effect of putting a taxpayer's financial stability into crisis, but the fundamental point is that what deviates from accuracy can be demonstrated as such.

43. A more fundamental point arises here. It is the effects of an order combined with the enforceability of what is ordered, its appealability and its susceptibility to remedy, which are part of the tapestry of description enabling a reading of whether what is done in a quasi-judicial way outside court is an unconstitutional usurpation of judicial function. Calculation is limited. Error in calculation, even if it be the case that appeals are confined to law, and in taxation there is an appeal to recheck facts possible to the Circuit Court under s 942 of the Taxes Consolidation Act 1997 as amended, such a mistake is identifiable and susceptible to judicial review since such a miscalculation will fly in the face of calculable reason; State (Keegan) v Stardust Tribunal [1986] 1 IR 642, O'Keeffe v An Bord Pleanála [1993] 1 IR 39 and Meadows v Minister for Justice [2010] 2 IR 701 at 173-174 imposing a proportionality dimension to what is rational in the decisions of non-judicial tribunals. What the remedy is and what it consists of is of its nature a limiting function on any tribunal. In the same way, while Mr Zalewski may have made complaints to the Workplace Relations Commission as to entitlement to holiday pay, minimum notice and the non-payment of wages due, these also are matters requiring assessment and calculation and not the exercise of any judicial consideration.

44. Secondly, there are public tribunals and commissions of inquiry, which can be held in public, where at the end of an examination of facts, often with live evidence, a report will be issued for public discussion. This will attach blame to individuals for such diverse matters as the sinking of a ship, portraying an innocent individual as a child abuser, misusing public funds, the abuse of political influence, failing to regulate money lending or any other controversy which the Oireachtas considers justifies the huge expenditure of time and money that such an inquiry entails. Tribunals of inquiry, set up under the Tribunals of Inquiry Acts 1921 to 2004 are public examinations of matter of great moment. Commissions of inquiry under the Commission of Investigations Act 2004, as amended, tend to be set up at a lesser temperature and generally are conducted in private. None of this legislation, whereby facts may be found by what is usually a judicial figure, or group of individuals chaired by a sitting or former judge, most often retired, have any implications beyond that such facts are declared after a trustworthy process by a trustworthy person. No tribunal can make any final order, beyond an order as to costs at the discretion of the chair, and other orders of compulsion as to attendance and the preservation and production of documents. These while mirroring, and in relation to the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921 expressly adopting to the tribunal the powers of the High Court as to necessary pre-trial and compulsion in aid of hearing orders, are limited. All that happens in the end is that an opinion is publicly expressed.

45. Of course, in many ways, and especially in the modern era where criminal law intrudes into European-inspired regulations and into areas of life outside those reserved in the past to behaviour against the community demanding penal sanction, what is to be investigated by a tribunal will easily overlap with liability in tort, as where an oil tanker is destroyed by negligence and people are killed, or the commission of crimes, as where the State is defrauded of public funds in dealing with economic subsidies or where life is lost through what may be very serious negligence. That trespass on the function of a court cannot matter because of the absence of consequence. What a tribunal does not do is make an order that any individual represented before it is liable to pay damages or that some person go to jail or be fined; Goodman International Ltd v Hamilton (No 1) [1992] 2 IR 542, [1992] ILRM 145. Hence, the limitation is in not going to where a court must go once a court makes findings of fact. A court makes an order: a tribunal expresses a view. Similarly, in M v Medical Council [1984] IR 485, a finding of misconduct as a doctor, or of unfitness to practice, was only regarded as the publication of an opinion since the final power of sanction through removal from the register of medical practitioners was reserved to the High Court. Admonishment, censure or advice were the limited options which the Medical Council could choose from without invoking the power of a court; similarly for nursing professionals see K v An Bord Altranais [1990] 2 IR 396 as to a similar scheme. Opposite to the approach of courts in not dealing with hypothetical situations, because judges pursue the finding of facts in order to make a final order, tribunals and commissions of inquiry find facts and make non-binding recommendations arising therefrom. This is nothing more than an opinion. Furthermore, any suggestions as to, for instance, reforming the police or as to pointing out that public servants of some particular kind are not providing value for the wages paid in attending to duties, are entirely capable of being ignored. In the cynical view, not shared here, inquiries push matters away from public attention, but in reality they push matters into public scrutiny provided they act quickly. Such enquiries have to be pushed on ruthlessly or they are a failure. Even still, a report may be shelved. That is not how courts operate with powers of compulsion up to imprisonment for breach of injunctions, damages enforceable by judgment mortgages over property and persons confined to prison for perhaps decades in condign punishment of misdeeds.

46. Thirdly, what is limited is what does not immediately bite: meaning that the tribunal can reach conclusions but these are of no effect until there is an appeal provided for to a court which each party declines and where the court, if an appeal is taken, causes a judge to re-examine the circumstances and reach an independent decision. Court orders have effect immediately. To that there are exceptions, but these are provided for by the Oireachtas as a matter of policy under the relevant Courts Acts. Hence, criminal convictions under appeal by way of complete rehearing from a District Court to a Circuit Court judge entitles an accused to lodge recognisances and achieve bail. Even still, the judge setting the conditions is acting judicially; recognisances may not be refused on a whim or because the evidence was thought to be overwhelming. Similarly, a civil liability finding by the Circuit Court or District Court may be appealed to, respectively, the High Court or the Circuit Court and it is only if on a complete reconsideration the order is affirmed that practical effect is initiated.

47. In the decisions, this identification of what is of no immediate practical effect is not thus well developed, but the concept is a clear influence on what is to be seen as a limitation which puts a quasi-judicial power on the constitutional side away from any unlawful usurpation of the administration of justice. Thus, in O'Mahony v Melia [1989] IR 335, at issue were the residual aspects of the powers of Peace Commissioners. While the order in question was only the remand of a suspect overnight in custody and while the judgment of Keane J referenced the prohibition on outsourcing any criminal business from the courts, the case exemplifies an order which had immediate effect in taking a suspect from his usual abode in consequence of a judicial assessment outside of the sphere of judges in courts and orders that a suspect should be locked up. From that there was no immediate relief; the order bit straightaway. What can be legitimate, but strongly dependant on an overall analysis, and on the historical nature of the power being exercised away from courts, is the exercise of powers which lead to an order but which do not prejudice a court hearing by a judge. The result of a tribunal giving an adjudication on a case is that an opinion is expressed which if not appealed within a statutory timeframe can result in the opinion becoming a binding order. But the parties have an absolute entitlement to seek a re-adjudication by a judge in a court. It might be protested that only one court hearing takes place and that there ought constitutionally be a further appeal. That is not necessary. There has been a hearing, before the tribunal out of court, and a complete rehearing by a judge. Nothing further is required. That is reflected in the existing court structure of hearings and appeals. Such a judge is "independent in the exercise of their judicial functions and subject only to the Constitution and the law" under Article 35.2 and have taken an oath to uphold that Constitution and those laws and to act "without fear or favour, affection or ill-will towards any" person under article 34.5.1°. There are many powers exercised by the High Court, for instance s 5 of the Illegal Immigrants (Trafficking) Act 2000 or s 50 of the Planning and Development Act 2000, which are subject to no appeal. Essentially, this is because the form of analysis undertaken by the High Court is effectively at second-instance, here a scrutiny of decisions as to status or as to suitability for sustainable development. Medical and solicitors' regulation cases illustrate how a tribunal reaching a conclusion but subject to appeal can sufficiently limit the powers and functions of a judicial nature so as to keep the interaction as one which by retaining the function of the courts passes muster. The former Employment Appeals Tribunal under the 1977 Act prior to amendment was another example: a tribunal makes an adjudication which is binding only if no party appeals, and on appeal there is a judicial hearing in a constitutionally mandated court.

48. The leading cases, Re Solicitors Act 1954 [1960] IR 239 and McDonald v Bord na gCon (No 2) [1965] IR 217, concern the delegation of what were regarded, respectively by the Supreme Court and by the High Court, as decisions, delegated to the Solicitors Disciplinary Committee and to the greyhound body, which would end a career. Kingsmill Moore J considered the Solicitors Act as engaging decisions of "far-reaching effect and importance". If the model followed, however, is one of a tribunal reaching a conclusion but, like a tribunal of inquiry, this being no more than an exercise in opinion, that a solicitor should be struck off or that a doctor's misconduct is so worthy of censure that a erasure from the register is appropriate, and where it is clear that where the final power of review vests in a court, that limitation brings the model onto a constitutionally permissible ground. This is also the analysis of MacMenamin J and, clearly, as he also states, that is dependent on the nature of the appeal. But nowhere in any decision where judicial functions are being exercised do any of the decisions cited by the majority allow judicial review to be a sufficient basis of court limitation of what is an administrator exercising judicial power in a fundamental area to the rights of citizens. It is not. It cannot be and in that regard the majority analysis is at odds with both the decisions and with principle.

Meaningful and technical appeal confounded

49. In this respect, the third criterion enabling a limitation on judicial powers and functions, a distinction must be drawn as between an appeal which has the effect of enabling the judicial function under Article 34 and one which disables it through partialness or which uses a court like a rubber stamp. Analysing the Calcul International case from this perspective is perhaps not profitable. While Barron J there held the powers of the Revenue Commissioners to be on the correct side of constitutionality because they had no power to make a final order themselves, in reality to draw a distinction as between an order that cannot be appealed as to amount or as to liability to tax but which is enforceable as a contract debt in court and an order which does not need the initiation of a summons in court to enforce it perhaps misses the essence of the distinction. When the Revenue Commissioners decide that a taxpayer is liable to tax and in a particular amount, that is apart from any appeal enabled by statute. What a court does with a Revenue debt is simply assess that it is due. A court is not analysing the validity of a tax return or engaging in any underlying assessment of taxability. It is the nature of the calculation and susceptibility to judicial review on reasonableness grounds that would provide a remedy.

50. Similarly, in the modern context, the idea may be unattractive that a grant or refusal of planning permission could be argued to be a judicial function, as Kenny J held in Central Dublin Development Association v AG (1975) 109 ILTR 69. What matters about that decision is that the High Court held that powers and functions of a judicial nature, because they affect "the fortunes of citizens in a profound way because of the results of the Minister's decision" are limited because that decision is appealable. Hence, Kenny J held for constitutionality because: "The Minister's decision does not decide finally that a particular development cannot be carried out; it decides only that permission is or is not required." It is not to be doubted that in Deighan v. Hearne [1986] 1 IR 603 at 615, Murphy J correctly declined to engage in a tax assessment of the plaintiff in favour of the administrative tribunal established in this regard; the jurisdiction of the High Court would only come into play in the most exceptional circumstances because legislation provided a constitutional procedure "competently staffed and efficiently operated to carry out that unpopular but very necessary task".

51. The model formerly adopted under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, but doubted as to its constitutionality even in that fully appealable format by the current editors of Kelly 6.4.100 citing remarks by McKenzie J in Government of Canada v Employment Appeals Tribunal [1992] 2 IR 484, was of vesting powers of a judicial nature in a body consisting of three persons, one legally qualified, with an appeal therefrom to the Circuit Court as an open rehearing unbound by any conclusion of that tribunal. That model is limited in function and is limited in power, and thus in conformity with Article 37, since its decision is of what is, in effect, a statutorily enforced and non-binding arbitration and is one where the judicial function within the court is completely unfettered by any conclusion reached. The model in the Workplace Relations Act 2015 is, on the other hand, to set the Constitution upside down. It is to treat the courts as limited, having only the power to decide such legal issues as may be referred, and as having no function save that which the parties or the Labour Court might choose to ask, with the final decision not in the courts but in the tribunal on receipt of the High Court's ruling as to law. It is to be remembered that the High Court is not entitled in exercising a function of ruling on referred points of law to actually instruct a tribunal as to what decision must be reached. Instead, the High Court decides a point of law and the application of that ruling is for the tribunal; Barry & Others v Minister for Agriculture & Food [2015] IESC 63.

52. There are many forms of appeal. This has been the subject of analysis by Clarke J in FitzGibbon v Law Society [2014] IESC 48 and it is not necessary to repeat that here. One quite popular one is to subject a tribunal to scrutiny on the basis of the proof by an appellant of a serious error, or a series of factual or legal errors mounting up to a significant error; see Fitzgibbon at paragraph 2. Another view is that judicial review is an adequate remedy in itself. That depends. Our form of judicial review is not the same as the kind of reconsideration of administrative decisions such as would be exercised by the Conseil d'État in France. There, a range of decisions from Covid 19 restrictions to austerity financial measures to the practice of euthanising elephants in public zoos are subjected to argument and reanalysis and a fresh decision results which is binding on the authority concerned. Our form of judicial review initiated as to the validity of a record and as to jurisdiction, which came to embrace serious legal errors disabling jurisdiction, developed as to process and through the theory that no administrative or quasi-judicial body has authority to make an unreasonable decision, enabled review of such decisions as flew in the face of fundamental reason and common sense, and embracing decisions so lacking in proportionality as to meet that criteria. On an order being quashed, the matter is taken up again by the tribunal or lower court or by the administration, applying the correct process to the reconsideration of the decision.

53. A judicial review is a supervisory function under the full and original jurisdiction granted to the High Court under Article 34.3.1° of the Constitution. While the majority judgment characterises current judicial review powers as unrecognisable from those exercised in practice by the High Court in the 1980s, that is not so. There is a continuity and notwithstanding development there continues to be a stark difference. Judicial review could always undermine a decision if it so flagrantly flew in the face of fundamental reason and common sense as to impugn jurisdiction. No tribunal and no body exercising quasi-judicial functions is empowered to come to a bizarre decision or one which turns the facts on its head. That is the continuity. To that is now added a proportionality analysis where appropriate as to what may have been reasonable about the decision. That changes some cases but not cases such as any judicial review of the findings of fact in this case might be. In addition, jurisdiction is now considered in the context of legal error, rather than legal error being considered as being within jurisdiction, it is more likely to demonstrate a trespassing outside the boundaries of jurisdiction. All through, the courts engaged judicial review as to errors of record but these considerations have become less important. What has become more important has been procedure but a truly wrong decision can be reached by excellent procedures. And here is the nub of the problem: the key difference that is absent from the majority judgment. An appeal to a court, such as the Circuit Court under the 1977 Act, will mean a judge will look at the actual evidence again and give a decision. What if, in this case, Mr Zalewski is condemned as a thief? Once there is any evidence to support that, judicial review is out. That could ruin his work prospects. That is not limited, technical or merely adjudicative of statutory rights: it is the very decision that must be made by a judge. That engages the fundamentals of justice and which frightened and apprehensive seekers after justice must surely be entitled to if not at first instance then, as a saver under Article 37.1, through a meaningful factual appeal. What if the employers here were stuck with a lazy person and a thief, surely a decision to that effect also cries out for judicial analysis. In neither case could the technical and procedural manoeuvrings of judicial review, divorced from the fundamentals that a bad decision was made, possibly make up for a factual reappraisal. It is not allowed in judicial review. The majority decision is thus not an enhancement of the fundamental drive of the Constitution. Judicial review cannot be adequate in this context. What is needed is justice. Either a very bad mistake was made by an employer in summarily dismissing Mr Zalewski for dishonesty or that decision was correct. To sort that out needs wisdom and experience applied to fact. This is the administration of justice according to the majority, but also according to the majority, merely looking at whether a decision was utterly unreasonable or weighing the procedure of an administrator in crucial cases of fact suffices to bring adjudication constitutionally outside the ambit of the courts. The only factor which might save such a process is a complete appeal and not the procedural focus of Order 84. Judicial review may be appropriate in some technical types of administrative decisions, such as planning, and the function is also appropriate in such technical analyses in preserving the full and original jurisdiction of the High Court in Article 34.3.1° of the Constitution; Tormey v. Ireland [1985] I.R. 289. This function also rightly relieves the courts of the matters touched on in Deighan v Hearn and in Doherty v South Dublin County Council (No. 2) [2007] 2 IR 696. What judicial review does not do, and cannot ever do, is remove a bad judicial decision and replace it with a fair hearing as to fact leading to a correct factual analysis that vindicates rights and points as to where the truth reposes. That is what Mr Zalewski is entitled to under the Constitution as is his former employer and that is what neither will get from proposed solution of judicial review. What is needed is at least the prospect of a full rehearing by an actual judge. In the FitzGibbon case, Clarke J's concurring judgment treats the forms of appeal which may result from an actual finding by a tribunal as being:

(a) A de novo appeal;
(b) An appeal on the record;
(c) An appeal against error, and
(d) An appeal on a point of law.

54. Each of these forms of appeal are described in the judgment of Clark J and that classification and analysis is here adopted. Assuming without deciding that what is already in the courts cannot be taken away, a working approach to statutory schemes and the constitutionality of the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature is to consider, firstly, the breadth of the power, secondly, the availability of an appeal to a judge in court, and thirdly, the extent of that appeal. It must depend upon how deeply the function and power tranches on the constitutional requirement in Article 34 as to how extensive an appeal must be. It must depend also upon the Constitution preserving in the courts the powers and functions which historically belong to the courts and not to the executive. In that regard, s 33 of the Road Traffic Act 1961 may be overdone; but that is within the choice of the legislature. That requires consideration of the nature of unfair dismissal since, in accordance with the interpretation of the Calcul International case, all that is involved in the technical award of holiday pay, minimum notice and redundancy payments, apart from that substantive issue of whether a dismissal was justified by substantial grounds related to competence or qualification, is a matter of calculation and not of judicial analysis. But, does unfair dismissal need an adjudication by a judge, even if only after a preliminary but non-binding unless appealed ruling by an administrator or tribunal? As a matter of justice and of close connection to contract law, the answer is yes.

Unfair dismissal and courts

55. For Mr Zalewski, and for those in his position, a finding such as that of the Workplace Relations Commission, later quashed by the High Court, is a potential disaster. It is more than disappointing how little serious effort was put into what is clearly the administration of justice by the Workplace Relations Commission. This is not only a personal fault but a profound structures, training and management issue. That want of application is exacerbated by being in private and thus out of the way of public scrutiny and media analysis as to approach. But it is made a denial of justice, of the right to justice, by leaving no avenue open save the sterile desert of procedure. Procedures can be gotten right but procedure alone solves no one's problem of being blocked from seeking justice in a court.

56. The idea that a worker must be protected in employment and not subject to arbitrary dismissal is not novel and in many respects fits within the historical aspect of litigation. Legal obligations to pursue the security of employment against unfairness in ending the employment contract arose from the International Labour Organisation's work on gaining acceptance of that idea on a convention basis. The first instrument specifically dealing with termination of employment was adopted as a recommendation in 1963, but subsequently, the Termination of Employment Convention was after Ireland had already passed the Unfair Dismissals Act in 1977, that is in 1982, entering into force on 24 November 1985 in circumstances where the State had already fulfilled its international obligations. Further work has been done internationally, including as to reasons which automatically render a termination of employment unfair, such as exercising a right to litigation, making disclosures as to dangerous practices and race relations. This has resulted in Convention No 158, which adopted the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982, replacing its predecessor. As of September 2008, there are 34 recommendations.

57. There is a well-developed line of authority that what is in the courts stays in the courts and that if new rights are developed to be decided by a statutory tribunal, it is to those that a rights-seeker must go, with perhaps judicial review being an adequate remedy or whereby a limited right of appeal to courts is enabled by the legislature. An example is equality legislation. This does not trespass on established torts or create a new civil wrong for adjudication in courts but constitutes a new form of entitlement with specifically designed forms of redress; see Doherty v South Dublin County Council (No 2). Nor is this kind of legislation necessarily the provision of safety rights for workers which are enforceable as a species of tort actions under the traditional heading of breach of statutory duty. One goes to a court if injured by a failure to fence a prime mover or to erect compliant scaffolding, to enforce a damages claim based on that tort heading but one goes to a tribunal to obtain redress for novel remedies and statutorily created entitlements. Thus, the case law is far-seeing in embracing the concept of what is within Article 34 as being what, as a matter of history, the courts have dealt with.

58. The test is well traversed in various cases. As Kelly notes, it is the application that is difficult; The Irish Constitution 6.1.5-6.1.20. The approach of turning all legal rules into definitions works well with many issues but in others a legal concept may be sufficiently delineated if described but not precisely bordered by precise words. This issue exemplifies that description is possible but, because of the multifaceted nature of decision-making binding citizens becoming increasingly the responsibility of new bodies enforcing new obligations or rights, definition is elusive. The standard five-point test derived from The State (Shanahan) v Attorney General [1964] IR 239 and that of Kenny J tentatively approved by this Court in McDonald v Bord na gCon (No 2) [1965] IR 217 at 244 succeeds in laying out an approach to predictably differentiate as between what is and what is not the administration of justice. Of the tests, many would be met by statutory tribunals or administrative bodies, most notably the compulsion of witnesses and evidence mentioned in Shanahan by Kennedy CJ and, besides, there has to be a practical aspect to this. The courts are not preciously to guard powers of compulsion of evidence simply because as a matter of history, judges exercised such powers almost, but not wholly, exclusively. This was, up to the majority judgment in this case, the test:

1. A dispute or controversy as to the existence of legal rights or a violation of the law;
2. the determination or ascertainment of the rights of parties or the imposition of liabilities or the infliction of a penalty;
3. the final determination (subject to appeal) of legal rights or liabilities or the imposition of penalties;
4. the enforcement of those rights or liabilities or the imposition of a penalty by the court or by the executive power of the State which is called in by the court to enforce its judgment;
5. the making of an order by the court which as a matter of history is an order characteristic of courts in this country.

59. Of the McDonald five-part test, unfair dismissal certainly involves a dispute as to the legal right to not loose one's job without substantial reason related to competence or qualification and this is not a merely technical matter or question of calculation based on statutory entitlements. Yet, that right derives from statute and the legislature fulfilled the classic model of moving outside courts with new rights through setting up a tribunal in 1977, but with a full right to appeal to a court. The second aspect of the test repeats that criterion and requires that a court make a determination. But, again, the right and the remedy are statutory. The third criterion is that the determination be final.

60. As a matter of recent history, for close to forty years, final decisions of the Employment Appeals Tribunal were not final because, as a matter of acceptance or rejection by the parties, either could appeal on a de novo hearing basis to the Circuit Court. There, and there alone, the later unnecessary appeal de novo to the High Court having been abolished after the JVC case, the determination became final and was so because the judicial power had intervened and had considered and given a ruling on the rights and wrongs involved. This scheme in the 2015 Act, in contrast, uses the courts as merely a port for the gaining, by no analysis or discretion, of an order that Simons J in the High Court incorrectly thought saved the scheme. It does not. Because nothing judicial happens in the District Court under the 2015 Act. Furthermore, in making a decision in the absence of one of the parties' rights to make submissions and in altering an order without evidence from an employer, a breach of age-old rights is wrongly endorsed and, even worse, mandated by statute. The fourth criterion as to enforcement through the executive power of the State cannot be said to be judicial unless there is a judicial involvement in so deciding. That takes assessment, evidence in some form, a consideration of the options legally open and a balancing of where best that compulsive power ought to be used as part of the functions of the judicial arm of government. The final criterion as to history protects the courts from being denuded of power by unscrupulous government and upholds the bedrock of citizens rights through the executive being checked in its power. Here, on behalf of the State, the Attorney General argued that forty odd years of doing something one way was not the establishment of exclusive jurisdiction under the 1977 Act for the courts; that what was meant by Kenny J was the historical aspects of the administration of justice. History is not what we were; it is also what we have become and it is what we have regarded over decades as the minimum of respect for the Constitution that is acceptable. That, however, is not all there is to it. A job is a contract. The courts enforce contracts. The 1977 Act added new rights to existing contracts.

61. In analysing where this lies, the peaks of resonance from the spectrum of cases tend to show up the preciousness of the courts being required to guard to themselves under Article 34 life-changing judicial decisions, since these are not of their nature limited. Preserving those areas of law within which as a matter of history the courts have discharged their duties; the maintenance of the sovereign power of the State within a system of separation of powers where the legislative and executive arms of government may not wrestle away from the courts decisions requiring the administration of rights through judicial skills and coercive orders in favour of devolving these onto non judges; and, finally, determining to keep within the courts decisions which require the independence which judges have sworn to uphold and which require the experience and qualifications that enable justice to be done.

62. It is argued by the Attorney General that unfair dismissal is both new and is a limited area of litigation. It might be wondered, however, how new what happened to Mr Zalewski and those in like positions is? Certainly, in the 1977 Act and under the 2015 Act, if an ex-employee opts for a remedy based on a failure to have substantial reasons for dismissal based on competence and qualifications, that is a remedy created by statute, inspired by the International Labour Organisation. If there is a period of notice appropriate by implication, or expressly set out in the contract of employment, that is justiciable as a matter of contract as wrongful dismissal in a court. Of course, the remedies are different and a choice must be made. But, there is more than an overlap. Mr Zalewski was simply told by his employer to get out, branded it seems as dishonest and given no back pay. That is the repudiation of a contract. It may be correct in terms of contract law or not but it is a matter of law for which injunctive relief is available, which is solely the preserve of the Circuit and High Courts and not of any tribunal. The claim of abuse of contract that he makes is as a matter of history closely tied up to equitable remedies and to the administration of disputes which are historically characteristic of courts. The legislature could have declared, as in consumer cases, an implied term not to be dismissed unfairly or granted injunctive relief as a matter of course in the courts. It is the substance that matters.

63. Dismissal in this manner with no recourse to a final analysis by a court leaves Mr Zalewski bereft of reputation, damaged in the marketplace for work and stripped of the human dignity of labour. This is a judicial controversy.

Under Article 37.1

64. In accordance with the analysis to which that conclusion led, it may be claimed, as counsel for Mr Zalewski sought to argue, and which counsel for the Attorney General persuasively opposed, that it follows that every adjudication official must be a judge. That is not so. Where a de novo appeal is possible, it may be argued that the parties have been put to bother for no good reason. That is not so. While failings are highlighted by the evidence, and will no doubt be addressed as real concerns, compulsory arbitration, because with a proper appeal that is what this is, of this kind of dispute is not wrong. Many parties after a first instance decision decide that the decision maker was probably right or that their case was insufficiently strong. For those who do not, however, the judicial power should be available and in unfettered form. That is only possible by a full rehearing appeal. That recourse was sparingly exercised under the 1977 Act and its availability limits, within the meaning of Article 37, the exercise by those other than judges of the powers and functions of a judicial nature which this exercise undoubtedly embraced. This may be considered by some to be akin to the solution in McNamee v Revenue Commissioners [2016] IESC 33 whereby an initial hearing of a very informal sort in the first round and with fair procedures in the second review suffices, but it is not. This is about ensuring that any deviation from the exclusive judicial function in Article 34.1 is only that permitted by Article 37.1 and that the function of the courts as an arm of government is protected.

Fair Procedures

65. Sympathy abounds for the proposition that disputes should not be turned into ceremonies akin to a State Trial, that pre-trial procedures should not be used to exhaust patience or finance, that questioning should only be used as an instrument of truth and as a polite exercise rather than as a strategic resort to confusion where a case lacks merit, that unnecessary costs be shunned and that peopling teams with abundant lawyers to do simple cases does not aid the administration of justice. That is what judicial case management, so necessary in larger cases, sets out to counter and counters successfully in jurisdictions which employ that method successfully. Judicial experience in making parties focus on what uncomplex but difficult cases are about is what saves costs; Talbot v Hermitage Golf Club [2014] IESC 57.

66. Fair procedures are not the answer to sense where the plain result of a case is that court-like formalities would have changed nothing. As recently as in Shatter v Guerin [2019] IESC 9, a consensus was reached that there is a minimum standard, derived from existing judgments of the Court, that examination by a single party with the circulation of a draft conclusion and supporting documentation for comment is possible and that only very rarely are full rights of information, or charge or notice of what is wrong, full relevant papers, representation, rights to cross examine and make submissions necessary. This is not such a case. The fundamental decision is that of Barrington J in Mooney v An Post [1998] 4 IR 288 at 298. More recently this was followed by Clarke J in Atlantean v Minister for Communications and Natural Resources [2007] IEHC 233. He there describes a floor of rights where "the minimum" is that a person affected as to their protected rights "is entitled to" some notice of what might be described as "the charge against him" or her. While cross-examination or a public hearing do not come into the question, necessarily, that person must "be given an opportunity to answer it and make submissions." Thus the basic right is fair notice and a chance to comment.

67. Secondly, there is the model where a person is appointed to investigate some issue and goes about by calling in individuals one by one and asking them what they have to offer. These persons, of course, may be ordinary witnesses to some public scandal or to a disaster or they may be those reasonably considered to be responsible. Even still, they are simply asked about their involvement. What then of notice, since cross examination is excluded, and a chance to make submissions? In this, which is the In re Pergamon Press Ltd [1971] Ch 388 model, when all evidence has been taken and gathered, such transcripts and documents as cause the enquirer to feel that a particular organisation or individual or people are responsible for something which has gone wrong, these are sent to them with a draft report set of preliminary findings and submissions are invited. On considering those submissions, there is sufficient of audi alteram partem, hearing the party potentially to be blamed, for the report to be finalised and published. This is a valuable model, one which has enabled important enquiries under s 14 of the Companies Act 1990: for instance the report of 30 July 1992 into Chestvale Properties Limited and Hoddle Investments Limited by John Glackin. This is now s 748 of the Companies Act 2014. This is a valuable model, of wide use and should not be unwittingly abolished by this specific analysis.

68. Without this model, those kind of enquiries would become as difficult as those now attending on public tribunals of inquiry. As this second model demonstrates, the kind of elaborate procedures identical to a criminal trial are not necessary to ensure a fair examination of even serious events whereby a public opinion be pronounced and one, at that, which potentially destroys the good name of a citizen.

69. What is emphasised by the will of the legislature in maintaining court appointed inspectors into companies, and by the case law generally upholding the Pergamum Press model, and by the establishment in Atlantean of sufficiency in notifying and hearing, is that there is no necessity to ensure a fair hearing through cross-examination and the kind of procedures characteristic of a murder trial. Here, the complaint is made that, without trial procedures, the administration of oaths or affirmations to witnesses, and a legally qualified judge, a hearing must be unfair. That is not so. Furthermore, accreting onto models already authorised by law a duty to follow trial procedures would destroy the entire legal basis whereby hearings may be conducted. As to legal qualification, that is desirable for State bodies which are determined to serve the working community by providing a level of expertise which is helpful. In some jurisdictions, notably magistrates in England, judges are chosen for good sense and not for legal qualifications. In others, judges on gaining a law degree enter a scheme of sitting immediately and without experience as a practitioner. What does perhaps matter is a judicial oath to emphasise and carry with those appointed the seriousness of the role undertaken. But, that again is not a legal requirement. Application to the task in hand and the availability of legal advice suffice. Where there is a conflict, but only in a matter as serious as this, being enabled to ask questions will assist in non-technical matters. The oath or affirmation may aid in the discovery of the truth but may strictly not be necessary.

70. What should not happen is that a clear breach of Article 34.1 not within the exception of Article 37.1 should be made to appear compliant with the Constitution through the accretion of procedures proper to courts. Acting like a court does not make an administrator a court. Good sense should not be overridden by recourse to the fallacy that procedures cure non-application to duty or that the appearance of fairness represents openness of mind and an independent determination to find the truth. Instead of a meaningful appeal, the majority judgment considers that enhanced procedures may cure what is a grim prospect for any litigant, employee or employer, seeking justice within the confines of the meaningful-appeal proof Workplace Relations Commission.

Concise summary

71. Firstly, a claim for unfair dismissal involves the administration of justice: the determination of who is right and who is wrong in a matter closely allied to contract law and involving decisions of fact in aid of uncovering truth. Such a decision carries that degree of moment that it is not within the limited range of decisions that could be regarded as technical or administrative. Any such judgment, that a person was unfairly dismissed, on substantial grounds, for incompetence, dishonesty or lack of qualification, is one where the very nature of a person is called into question and determined in core area of life. Protection of the right to work and of the entitlement of working men and women to their reputation is what should be at the heart of the administration of decisions which may ruin a career or devalue those individuals in the struggle to earn an honest living. Yet, this has been taken away from any recourse to the courts. That is constitutionally wrong. In not allowing any judicial determination even by way of an appeal on an unfair dismissal case, the Workplace Relations Act 2015 completely deprives a justiciable controversy of a judicial determination. In a complex modern environment where rights are often created by statute and administered by specialised bodies, it does not infringe the Constitution for these to be considered by non-judicial figures. Where, however, as is the case with unfair dismissal, those rights transcend what is limited or technical, but go to the very core of what defines a person in their social standing or conduct, there must be a choice to either the employee or the employer to seek justice in a court by way of a final factual appeal that requires a rehearing. Judicial review as a remedy, suitable for planning, tax, licencing, and other technical matters, is not an answer that makes such cases limited since the subject matter of unfair dismissal so embraces the essence of what courts are set up under the Constitution to do: to administer justice, to determine such fundamental rights as the entitlement of a working man or woman to hold their head high and to seek employment having been vindicated in the most core aspects as to honesty and competency by a judge. Under the majority decision, that constitutional entitlement is completely lost. A full appeal to a court from an administrative body has been abolished by the 2015 Act in favour of private hearings by administrators. Justice is about the truth coming out. Judicial review, which the majority consider limits this denial of recourse to a constitutionally established court, is about procedure, jurisdiction and reasonableness. Judicial review does not substitute a good judicial decision for an unwise or wrong-headed analysis by an administrator.

72. Secondly, the 2015 Act uses the District Court as a discretion-deprived adjunct to administration. In disabling one side of a case, excluding the employer from being heard, whereby the District Court may cause an order for re-engagement or re-instatement to be changed into an order for damages, being salary of up to two years, the Workplace Relations Act 2015 fundamentally violates the Constitution. The notion that courts would decide radically different remedies, which damages by way of salary for up to two years and reengagement and reinstatement into a job are as results to an unfair dismissals case, without hearing from the employer's side involves a statutory model that undermines all the existing principles of fair procedure.

73. Finally, the majority, by requiring a basic level of fairness of procedure, so notably and completely denied by the Workplace Relations Commission to Mr Zalewski, somehow genuinely seek that some improvement may come about in what is a sad reflection on application to duty and a denial of what the Constitution contemplates as the path to justice. Curiously, the one place where all of that fairness of procedure is to be found is in a court. But, that is also the path unconstitutionally blocked by this legislation to those who may have a fundamental need to be vindicated as to their honesty and their competence as working people who have to sell themselves in the cold and unforgiving marketplace.

APPELLANT

ADJUDICATION OFFICER, THE WORKPLACE RELATIONS COMMISSION, IRELAND AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

RESPONDENTS

Judgment of Mr. Justice John MacMenamin dated the 6th day of April, 2021

Section I

Introduction

1. This appeal arises from a judgment delivered by Simons J. in the High Court, regarding a claim brought by the appellant, Tomasz Zalewski, against the respondents. ([2020] IEHC 178). The issues in this case, at one level, concern an injustice done to Mr. Zalewski when he brought a claim before the Workplace Relations Commission, ("WRC"). At another, and more profound, level the questions raised concern as to the harmonious interpretation of the Constitution. Article 6 of the Constitution provides that all powers of government, legislative, executive and judicial, derive under God, from the People, whose right it is to designate the rulers of the State, and, in final appeal, to decide all questions of national policy, according to the requirements of the common good. The Constitution provides that the powers of government are exercisable only by, or on the authority of, the organs of State, established by this Constitution (Article 6.2). These powers of government are carefully balanced and based on a tripartite allocation of function and responsibility between the legislative, executive and judicial arms of the State. The functions and powers of the third arm, the judiciary, are laid down by Article 34 of the Constitution.

Background

2. The case arises in the following circumstances. At the time of the events, the appellant was a married man with a young child. He previously worked in Buywise/Costcutters Discount Store in the North Strand in Dublin. The shop where he worked was subject to a series of robberies, some of which were violent. He had a series of disagreements with his employers. He was accused of not doing enough to stop the thefts. He was also accused of having removed money from the till of the shop. Mr. Zalewski's case was that he was summarily dismissed from his employment. His view was that he had been unfairly dismissed, and that the procedures leading to his dismissal were a sham.

3. On the advice of his solicitor, Mr. O'Hanrahan, Mr. Zalewski brought a claim to the WRC, claiming unfair dismissal under the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977 ("UDA 1977"), and Payment of Wages Act, 1991 ("PWA 1991"). These were to be dealt with by an adjudication officer, appointed by the Minister under s.24 of the Workplace Relations Act, 2015 ("WRA 2015"), with the powers set out in s.40 of that Act.

4. In pursuing the claim, Mr. O'Hanrahan put in a written submission to the WRC. Later, in an email, he informed the Adjudication Officer, ("AO"), who had been designated to inquire into the claim, that, because of an anticipated conflict in the evidence, he wished to have an opportunity to cross-examine all witnesses appearing on behalf of Buywise. The solicitor said he would object to any hearing based exclusively on written submissions, although, in some circumstances, the WRA 2015 actually allows for such a procedure (s.47). The employers, too, put in a submission. They contended they had carried out an investigation in line with policies and procedures, and that all the requirements of natural justice had been observed. Mr. Zalewski disagreed. He considered that the original hearing before Mr. Alan Costello, Jnr., and the appeal before Mr. Alan Costello, Snr., the owners of the shop, were, effectively, a sham.

5. On the date assigned, 26th October, 2016, a brief hearing took place. The representative appearing for Buywise asked for an adjournment. Mr. Zalewski and his solicitor did not object. After a brief hearing, in which no evidence was heard, the matter was then set to be dealt with in December, 2016. By letter of the 1st November, 2016, the WRC informed Mr. O'Hanrahan that there was to be a new hearing date of the 13th December, 2016. Mr. O'Hanrahan so informed Mr. Zalewski. On the adjourned date, Mr. Zalewski and Mr. O'Hanrahan arrived for the hearing. They met the employers' representative. They began to talk. They were then briefly joined by the AO, who had been assigned. She had walked into the corridor at that moment.

6. What happened then can only be described as truly bizarre. Mr. O'Hanrahan was informed that a decision had already been made in his client's case. The AO apologised, saying the hearing had been given an adjourned date in error. She had issued her decision in the previous week, and the scheduling office had made an error in arranging a hearing for that morning. This situation became truly Kafkaesque, when a number of days later Mr. O'Hanrahan received a copy of what purported to be the AO's decision.

The Adjudication Officer's Decision

7. I deal briefly now with some of the statements contained in that decision. The AO said that, in compliance with the legislation, she had "inquired into the complaints", and given "the parties an opportunity to be heard by me and to present to me any evidence relevant to the complaints." The decision contained a "summary of complainant's position". This, too, gave the appearance that Mr. Zalewski had been given the opportunity to present his complaint, and make relevant submissions. It stated that Mr. Zalewski had been requested to provide a statement from the Department of Social Protection, and that he had not done so. There were then findings. The decision stated:

> "The complainant did not contradict the respondent's, (i.e. the employer's), evidence, that the meeting of the 12th April, 2016, was called by the respondent to discuss issues concerning the store, and his role as assistant manager".

8. Later, the unfair dismissal complaint was summarised in this way:

> "The complainant and his legal representative did not advance any argument or evidence at the hearing as to why they considered the dismissal to be both "procedurally and substantially unfair" as stated in the complaint form.
> The Complainant stated at the hearing that he was in receipt of jobseekers benefit from the Department of Social Protection since the date of his dismissal. He was requested to provide evidence of this but did not do so."

Explanations

9. In these proceedings, two affidavits were filed by the WRC, which sought to explain what had happened. The first of these stated:

> "The filing of the decision as a "decision to issue", and the issue of the decision in that further hearing was an administration error with their [sic] being no intent to conduct the hearing or issue the decision, other than in accordance with natural and constitutional justice and fair procedures."

10. Later, there was a second affidavit, sworn by a departmental official. This said:

> "In error, a decision was prepared in advance of the adjourned hearing proceeding, and it was for that reason that the presentation of evidence and the questioning of witnesses did not occur in this instance".

Inconsistencies

11. In what follows there is no criticism whatever intended of those who represented the respondents in this appeal. To the contrary, their submissions did justice to the importance of the case. My criticism, rather, must focus on the WRC itself. In any organisation mistakes will happen. There will be pressure of work, and confusion about cases. But what happened in this case could not simply be explained on the basis of "misfiling". Unfortunately, what is actually found in this "decision", however construed, does not allow for any conclusion other than, on its face, it was a prejudging of a hearing which had not even taken place. It contained a series of inaccuracies. It gave the impression to any reader that a hearing had taken place, where both sides had been given the opportunity of presenting their case. This was simply incorrect. It alleged the appellant had failed to file documentation. This, too, was incorrect. It was not simply that the decision contained errors concerning some aspects of a claim. That can happen. More seriously, it purported to give a full decision based on events and evidence which had simply never taken place at all. The AO who was responsible for this did not swear an affidavit. Instead, others sought to explain what had happened. I hope I will be forgiven for concluding that, when considered, the explanations tendered simply do not hang together.

12. Since that time, the WRC itself has chosen never to explain what happened. What occurred hangs like a pall over the entire case, where the appellant's claim involves allegations of systemic failure. The WRC has not informed anyone about what happened, or why it happened. That is not an acceptable situation. There is no indication of a systems-review in order to find out what happened. The Court is not told what occurred immediately after the AO met the parties on the "adjourned date". Surely then a question might have been prompted in someone's mind on the WRC side, as to whether there had been a mistake. But a filing mistake would not account for what was contained in the decision.

Mr. O'Hanrahan's Evidence concerning other hearings

13. In these proceedings, Mr. O'Hanrahan, Mr. Zalewski's solicitor, deposed that his experience had been that hearings of complaints before the WRC were often heard in a manner where there was no viva voce evidence, with no opportunity given to test that evidence by means of cross-examination. He had had previous experience of AOs hearing and deciding cases on the basis of written submissions, and brief and extremely informal hearings, where there had been no formal evidence, or an opportunity to properly test such evidence. He points out that the WRA 2015 does not make a clear provision for cross-examination. Nor does that Act make any provision for the taking of evidence on oath, or the other requirements necessary for ensuring fair procedures in complex matters, where there is a dispute on evidence. It is ironic that an organisation which was created in order to ensure fair and efficient hearings for parties, including workers who are deprived of rights to employment, should have acted in such a manner in relation to this worker, and then not explain what happened.

14. Mr. Zalewski brought High Court proceedings challenging the procedure, and the decision. Later, on the 4th April, 2017, the Chief State Solicitor wrote to Mr. O'Hanrahan, and gave an account, based on instructions, as to the circumstances which had led to the issuing of the decision. The letter stated the respondents would not stand over the decision of the AO, and that the respondents were willing to agree to the disposal of the proceedings on certain terms, namely, the making of an order of certiorari in respect of the decision, and the remittal of the complaint to the WRC, paying Mr. Zalewski's legal costs. Mr. Zalewski refused this offer, unless consent was forthcoming to the grant of all the reliefs which he had sought in the legal proceedings, including claims regarding the compatibility of certain sections of the WRA 2015 with Article 34 of the Constitution.

The Evidence of Experienced Legal Practitioners in Industrial Relations Law

15. In these proceedings, Mr. Tom Mallon, B.L., and Mr. Ciaran O'Mara, Solicitor, both swore supporting affidavits. It is no exaggeration to say both are lawyers pre-eminent in the field of industrial relations law. In his affidavit, sworn in 2019, Mr. Mallon deposed that, since the inception of the WRA 2015, he had been disturbed by a number of hearings which had taken place before AOs. He set out that many AOs, and indeed members of the Labour Court, had appropriate qualification and experience and were properly qualified for determining complaints under the UDA 1977, Employment Equality law, the Protected Disclosures Act, and other legislation. A number of AOs were qualified barristers or solicitors. He acknowledged that there were AOs who did not have legal qualifications, but, by reason of their experience and general knowledge, had great competence to conduct a hearing.

16. However, Mr. Mallon deposed that many AOs lacked competence to adjudicate issues of law which arose which might be complex. In a not insignificant proportion of cases in which he had appeared, AOs lacked sufficient qualifications or experience. In some cases, AOs were, in his view, incapable of exercising the full range of powers under the WRA 2015 and lacked the basic skill and ability to conduct a fair hearing. His concerns about qualifications and experience of AOs applied equally to some members of the Labour Court. Mr. Mallon deposed that, as time passed after the introduction of the WRA 2015, the facility to permit cross-examinations had become more common, but it was not yet granted in every single case. He believed that, in the early days, there had been a policy to deny cross-examination, and to reduce the time available for cases to a minimum. He maintained, however, that there continued to be serious issues regarding the administration of hearings, the assignment of limited time, and difficulties in obtaining second and subsequent hearing dates.

17. Mr. O'Mara deposed that it was his experience that a number of AOs simply did not understand some of the more difficult issues which arise. Very fairly, he considered it would be inappropriate for him to refer to any specific case. However, he stated that he had appeared before AOs in cases where he firmly believed that the officer quite simply did not have the sufficient understanding to deal with the important matters before them. These are serious allegations, and not to be readily disregarded.

Background to the WRA 2015

18. No issue was raised as to the admissibility of preparatory materials regarding the WRA 2015, (cf. Crilly v. Farrington [2001] 3 I.R.; s.5 Interpretation Act, 2005). I treat this material de bene esse. The defence in this case referred to the intent behind the WRA 2015. That intent was, in many respects, a laudable one. The aspiration was to create a system whereby disputes of this nature could be informally resolved without recourse to excessive reliance on legal procedures. Anyone can entirely sympathise with that view. The respondents referred to a number of impressive reviews and reports which ultimately provided for the basis of the WRA 2015 procedures, which partly superseded the UDA 1977. One review said there had been difficulties in enforcing awards under the UDA 1977 and its successor Act in 1993. Further, it was desirable that awards should be enforced through only one statutory body. The question of enforcement of awards is an important issue in this case, as will be seen later.

19. The respondents also referred to a document, "Legislating for a World Class Workplace Relations Service". This was a submission to the Oireachtas Committee on Jobs, Enterprise and Innovation in July, 2012. It set out some of the cumbersome aspects of the procedures under the UDA 1977. It stated that the appeals system (which included a potential for appeal to the courts) on the merits, might be exploited by an employer determined to force a complainant in an unfair dismissals action to endure several de novo hearings of his or her complaint. (page 57). The Court has not been informed about any consideration given to the legal or constitutional effect of adopting the procedures in the WRA 2015, which were quite radical. These included that the Labour Court would act as a court of final appeal for final adjudication decisions of the WRC, subject to the right of either party to bring a further appeal from a Labour Court determination to the High Court on a point of law only (page 58).

20. The respondents' case also referred to extensive WRC material, whereby AOs were sought to be trained in relation to fair procedures - and how to conduct hearings. There was a survey where questions were put to AOs as to the number of times they permitted questioning. Reference was made to a "guidance note", reflecting the terms of the WRA 2015: it stated that an AO was to take direct evidence from both parties, and all other relevant witnesses; that the other party, or the representative, would be given the opportunity to question the parties, and other witnesses, regarding the evidence they have given. When all the evidence had been taken, both parties were to be given the opportunity of providing a summing up of the case.

21. Taken together, these documents, whether or not admissible in evidence, provide a good picture of the intentions behind the intended legislation, which took statutory form in 2015. Many of these were good intentions and aspirations, but that alone cannot absolve the WRA 2015 from the same level of constitutional scrutiny as any other legislation. The Constitution applies to all legislation.

The High Court - Locus Standi

22. The judicial review proceeding first came before the High Court, where the respondent sought to raise issues as to locus standi of the appellant to pursue the constitutional claims. Meenan J. upheld those submissions, but sternly criticised the affidavits sworn by the respondents seeking to explain what had occurred as "lacking credibility". The appellant appealed to this Court, which held that the appellant had locus standi to pursue the constitutional claim.

The High Court: Simons J.

23. Ultimately, the matter came before Simons J., who delivered a judgment remarkable in its clarity and rigorous reasoning. As he outlined, the appellant's case involved contentions; (a) whether the proceedings in question involved the administration of justice within the meaning of Article 34 of the Constitution; (b) that relevant provisions of the WRA 2015 were invalid, having regard to Article 34 of the Constitution in that they conferred decision-making powers on a non-judicial body, namely, AOs appointed by the Minister. The judgment also outlined the two main defences relied on by the State respondents. These were (a) that a decision of an AO lacked the character of a binding determination, and that, if a claimant employee wished to enforce a decision, it was necessary to apply to the District Court in order to do so. This was said to be fatal to the argument that AOs were themselves carrying out the administration of justice; (b) the respondents contended that employment disputes had not traditionally been regarded as the business of the courts, or justiciable. Here, reliance was placed on the important decision of McDonald v. Bord na gCon [1965] I.R. 217, ("McDonald"). However, because Simons J. concluded that what was in issue was not an administration of justice, he did not consider it was necessary for him to consider an alternative case advanced by the respondents, which was based on Article 34, if necessary combined with Article 37, of the Constitution.

Articles 34 and 37 of the Constitution

24. Article 34.1 of the Constitution provides:

> "1. Justice shall be administered in courts established by law by judges appointed in the manner provided by this Constitution, and, save in such special and limited cases as may be prescribed by law, shall be administered in public."

This speaks to the constitutional purpose of the Article. Article 34.2 defines the courts in which justice should be administered as comprising (i) courts of first instance; (ii) a court of appeal, and (iii) a court of final appeal.

25. Article 34.3 provides that the Courts of First Instance "shall include a High Court invested with full original jurisdiction in and power to determine all matters and questions whether of law or fact, civil or criminal". Article 34.3.4 also provides for Courts of First Instance, including courts of local and limited jurisdiction, with a right of appeal as determined by law.

26. Article 37 can be seen as being in the nature of a saver. It provides:

> "1. Nothing in this Constitution shall operate to invalidate the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature, in matters other than criminal matters, by any person or body of persons duly authorised by law to exercise such functions and powers, notwithstanding that such person or such body of persons is not a judge or a court appointed or established as such under this Constitution." (Emphasis added)

I have emphasised a number of terms as they arise later for detailed consideration. In re The Solicitors Act 1954 [1960] I.R. 239, this Court applied the interpretative principle expressio unius est exclusio alterius to these two provisions, holding that the corollary of what was said in Article 34.1 was that justice should not be administered by persons who are not judges appointed in the manner provided by the Constitution, save in those cases specially excluded by other provisions of the Constitution (Kelly, at p.263).

Procedure under Part 4 of the WRA 2015

27. Part 4 of the WRA 2015 sets out the mechanisms whereby claims and disputes under various pieces of legislation, including employment legislation, are to be determined. The "first instance" hearing is to be by AOs, with a right of appeal thereafter to the Labour Court. Thus, the provisions of Part 4 might, as Simons J. pointed out, be regarded as setting out the procedure with the substantive rights to be found in other pieces of legislation, here, the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, and the Payment of Wages Act, 1991.

28. In the course of the judgment, Simons J. made many important observations, all of which should give cause for pause, and further reflection. Among these, he noted that one point made in the argument by counsel had been that, if legislative change of the type involved here could be done in one significant area of law, i.e. employment law, then, in principle, it could be done in relation to other areas of law, such as family law or commercial law. He observed that the sheer breadth of jurisdiction conferred upon AOs and the Labour Court might be relevant to arguments as to whether the exercise of the statutory jurisdiction involved the administration of justice under Article 34 of the Constitution, or the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature within the meaning of Article 37 of the Constitution. The High Court judge commented that the Payment of Wages Act, 1991, which dealt with payment in lieu of notice, might provide stronger grounds for an argument based in respect of Article 37 of the Constitution. This was because such a claim might be measured in hundreds rather than thousands of Euros. Under the UDA 1977, by contrast, award might include reinstatement – effectively a form of enforcement by way of mandatory injunction- and potential awards of redress up to 2 years loss of salary. The judge was well aware of the balance, or perhaps tension, between the spirit and letter of Article 34 and Article 37 of the Constitution.

29. Under the redress available under the UDA 1977 (as amended by the WRA 2015), AOs have the power to order (a) re-instatement; (b) re-engagement; (c) payment of compensation in respect of loss, not exceeding 104 weeks' remuneration; (d) compensation, not exceeding 4 weeks' remuneration, as might be just or equitable having regard to all the circumstances.

30. The WRA 2015, therefore, removed a number of provisions which had previously existed under the UDA 1977. The jurisdiction previously exercised by rights commissioners and the Employment Appeals Tribunal, ("EAT"), was transferred to AOs. Importantly, the right of appeal to the Circuit Court was removed, and replaced by a right of appeal from an AO to the Labour Court, and to the High Court, but only on a point of law.

31. The High Court judgment dealt with two main issues. The first of these was whether or not the legislation was compatible with Article 34 of the Constitution. For reasons set out presently, Simons J. ultimately held that it was. The second aspect, dealt with later in this judgment, deals with fair procedures.

Section 41(5) of the WRA 2015 and Article 34 of the Constitution

32. It is necessary to set out the procedure under s.41(5) of the 2015 Act:

> "(5)(a)An adjudication officer to whom a complaint or dispute is referred under this section shall -
>
> (i) inquire into the complaint or dispute,
>
> (ii) give the parties to the complaint or dispute an opportunity to—
>
> (I) be heard by the adjudication officer*, and*
>
> (II) present to the adjudication officer any evidence relevant to the complaint or dispute*,*
>
> (iii) make a decision in relation to the complaint or dispute in accordance with the relevant redress provision, and

(iv) give the parties to the complaint or dispute a copy of that decision in writing." (Emphasis added)

The words emphasised (above) indicate the number of procedural steps which were not taken by the AO assigned to Mr. Zalewski's case, prior to the issuing of the decision.

33. As can be seen from the text of s.41, an AO to whom a dispute is referred shall give the parties to the complaint or dispute an opportunity to be heard and to present to the AO any evidence relevant to the complaint or dispute, make a decision in relation to the complaint or dispute, in accordance with the relevant redress provision, and give the parties to the complaint or dispute a copy of that decision in writing. (s.41 (5) (a)(i), (ii), (iii), (iv) WRA 2015). While an AO has the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, (failure to attend can be an offence under the Act), he or she has no express power to administer an oath or affirmation. A right of appeal to the Labour Court is provided for in s.44 WRA 2015, as applied to a claim for unfair dismissal by s.8A of the UDA 1977. The Labour Court proceedings are to be conducted in public, unless the Labour Court, upon application of a party, determines that, due to the existence of special circumstances, the proceedings, or part thereof, should be conducted otherwise than in public (s.44(7) WRA 2015). The procedures there allow for a wider range of fair procedure requirements. The Labour Court may, in turn, refer a question of law to the High Court for determination (s.44(6) WRA 2015). Section 41(5) is quoted above. Whether it can be said that the law as it stands provides adequate provision for full independence of decision-makers at first or second level in the WRC must be open to question. The Minister retains considerable powers of appointment, and determination of persons appointed under s.10 Industrial Relations Act, 1946.

Enforcement: Section 43

34. Section 43 of the WRA 2015 is also central to this appeal. It is necessary to quote it in full.

"43(1) If an employer in proceedings in relation to a complaint or dispute referred to an adjudication officer under section 41 fails to carry out the decision of the adjudication officer under that section in relation to the complaint or dispute in accordance with its terms before the expiration of 56 days from the date on which the notice in writing of the decision was given to the parties*, the District Court shall -*

(a) on application to it in that behalf by the employee concerned or the Commission, or

(b) on application to it in that behalf, with the consent of the employee, by any trade union or excepted body of which the employee is a member,

without hearing the employer or any evidence (other than in relation to the matters aforesaid) make an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms.

(2) Upon the hearing of an application under this section in relation to a decision of an adjudication officer requiring an employer to reinstate or reengage an employee, the District Court may, instead of making an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms, make an order directing the employer to pay to the employee compensation of such amount as is just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances but not exceeding 104 weeks' remuneration in respect of the employee's employment calculated in accordance with regulations under section 17 of the Act of 1977.

(3) The reference in subsection (1) to a decision of an adjudication officer is a reference to such a decision in relation to which, at the expiration of the time for bringing an appeal against it, no such appeal has been brought, or if such an appeal has been brought it has been abandoned and the references to the date on which notice in writing of the decision was given to the parties shall, in a case where such an appeal is abandoned, be construed as a reference to the date of such abandonment.

(4) The District Court may, in an order under this section, if in all the circumstances it considers it appropriate to do so, where the order relates to the payment of compensation, direct the employer concerned to pay to the employee concerned interest on the compensation at the rate referred to in section 22 of the Act of 1981, in respect of the whole or any part of the period beginning 42 days after the date on which the decision of the adjudication officer is given to the parties and ending on the date of the order.

(5) An application under this section to the District Court shall be made to a judge of the District Court assigned to the District Court district in which the employer concerned

ordinarily resides or carries on any profession, business or occupation." (Emphasis added)

35. Thus, if an employer fails to carry out the decision of an AO in relation to a complaint or dispute, the District Court shall, on application to it by an employee or the Commission, or brought with the consent of the employee by any trade union or excepted body, "without hearing the employer or any evidence (other than in relation to the matters aforesaid) make an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms." The effect of s.43(1)(b) is to substantially and radically restrict the application of fair procedures in the District Court. The District Court is debarred from hearing a respondent employer, or any evidence, save in relation to the matters set out in s.43(1). The effect of sub-section (2) is that, when hearing an application in a case where an AO has required an employer to reinstate or re-engage an employee, the District Court may, instead of making an order directing the employer to carry out the decision, instead make an order directing the employer to pay compensation to the employee, as may be just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances within the statutory limitation provided for under the Act. But the section does not identify any basis upon which a District Court judge might exercise that limited discretion, other than what is set out. Under s.43(4), the District Court may also direct an employer to pay to the employee concerned interest on the compensation "at the rate referred to in section 22 of the Act of 1981". The question considered later are whether these provisions can be seen as vesting a court with true curial powers recognised under the Constitution, as protecting fair procedures.

36. Section 51 of the WRA Act, 2015, provides:

"51(1) It shall be an offence for a person to fail to comply with an order under section 43 or 45 directing an employer to pay compensation to an employee.

(2) It shall be a defence to proceedings for an offence under this section for the defendant to prove on the balance of probabilities that he or she was unable to comply with the order due to his or her financial circumstances.

(3) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a class A fine or imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or both."

37. The High Court judgment points out:

> "Crucially, it is not an offence for an employer to fail to comply with the decision of an adjudication officer or the Labour Court: the offence is the failure to comply with the order of the District Court."

38. But these are not the only enforcement provisions. As can be seen, under s.51 it is provided that it shall be an offence for a person to fail to comply with an order under s.43 made by an AO, or s.45 made by the Labour Court, directing an employer to pay compensation to an employee. As can be seen Section 51(3) provides:

39. The WRA 2015 contains other extensive enforcing powers. In each, the WRC is the prosecuting authority in a criminal prosecution, where courts may impose a fine and imprisonment against an employer who fails to comply with an order made by the District Court. But further prosecutor powers are provided for under s.7 of the Act in relation to other offences which may be committed by an employer. On summary conviction, these can involve a fine, imprisonment for not more than 6 months, or, on conviction on indictment, to a fine not exceeding €50,000, or imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 years, or both. In each instance, the WRC is the prosecuting authority of these offences, many of which relate to the power of inspectors to carry out inspections on premises in order to ensure compliance with working conditions.

Section 66 of the Act and Hearing Procedures

40. I also mention here s.66 of the WRA 2015, which provides for transfer of functions from the Employment Appeals Tribunal. Inter alia, it provides that references in any enactment, or instrument in enactment, to the Employment Appeals Tribunal, insofar as they related to a function transferred to the WRC, should be constructed as references to the Commission. In the case of the Redundancy Payments Act, 1967 and later the UDA 1977, S.I. 24/1968 provided that a party to an appeal by the Employment Appeals Tribunal might, (a) make an opening statement, (b) call witnesses, (c) cross-examine any witnesses called by any other party, (d) give evidence on his own behalf, and (e) address the Tribunal at the close of the evidence. The Employment Appeals Tribunal also had the power to administer an oath. (See Regulation 13, S.I. 24/1968; s.19 UDA 1977; Regulation 10, S.I. 286/1977; and Employment Law, Regan & Murphy, 2nd Edition, 2018. But see also s.26(2)(d) – (f) Interpretation Act, 2005).

McDonald v. Bord na gCon

41. The first question which Simons J. had to determine was whether or not these extensive powers were compatible with Article 34.1 of the Constitution. He applied the long-established "classic", five-pronged test, identifying whether or not there has been an administration of justice, contrary to Article 34.1, as first set out in McDonald v. Bord na gCon [1965] I.R. 217, ("McDonald"). These now long-established indicia are:

1. The resolution of dispute or controversy as to the existence of legal rights, or a violation of the law;

2. A process involving a determination or ascertainment of the rights of parties, or the imposition of liabilities, or the infliction of a penalty;

3. A final determination, (subject to appeal), of legal rights or liabilities, or the imposition of penalties;

4. The enforcement of those rights or liabilities, or the imposition of a penalty by the court, or by the executive power of the State, which is called in by the court to enforce its judgment;

5. The making of an order by the court which, as a matter of history, is an order characteristic of courts in this country.

Simons J.'s conclusion that the fourth limb of McDonald was not satisfied

42. In the High Court, and in this Court, there is broad agreement that the adjudicative role of the WRC satisfied the first three elements of the McDonald test. The brief summary which follows does scant justice to Simons J.'s fully reasoned judgment. In brief, he concluded that the decision-making process under s.43 WRA 2015 lacked one of the essential characteristics arising from the fourth test in McDonald, namely, the ability of a decision-maker to enforce its decisions. He held that the necessity of having to make an application to the District Court to enforce a decision of an AO, or the Labour Court, deprived determinations of one of these essential characteristics of the administration of justice. Given that the District Court's discretion to modify the form of redress represented a significant curtailment of the decision-making powers of AOs, and the Labour Court, the function exercised by the District Court could not be dismissed as a mere "rubber stamping" of the earlier determination. He held that the District Court could, in effect, overrule a decision made by an AO or the Labour Court to direct reinstatement or re-engagement. (para. 218) He concluded that a decision-maker, who was not only reliant on the parties invoking the judicial power to enforce its decision, but whose decisions as to the form of relief were then vulnerable to being overruled as part of that process, could not be said to be carrying out the administration of justice (para. 219).

43. The judgment noted what he called "the anomaly" that, requiring the intervention of the District Court to enforce a determination of the Labour Court was sufficient to deprive it of one of the characteristics of the administration of justice, but the existence of a full right of appeal against an EAT decision to the Circuit Court would not. However, he opined, that it might be that recourse to judicial power was always necessary to obtain an enforcement order, whereas a first instance decision became final and conclusive in the absence of an appeal. With other statutory schemes, the legislation provided an alternative to legal proceedings, but this did not displace a right of action.

Simons J. conclusion that the fifth limb of McDonald was satisfied

44. In the High Court, Simons J. held that this fifth criterion only assumed importance in cases where there had been a long-established tradition of a particular type of decision-making, falling either inside or outside the courts' jurisdiction. He correctly cited In re Solicitors Act, 1954 [1960] I.R. 239, ("the Solicitors Act"); Cowan v. Attorney General [1961] I.R. 411, ("Cowan"); Keady v. Commissioner of An Garda Siochana [1992] 2 I.R. 197, ("Keady"); and O'Connell v. The Turf Club [2017] 2 I.R. 43, ("O'Connell"), as instances where the courts had drawn that line. In The Solicitors Act, Kingsmill Moore J. held that the scope of a decision which might run afoul of Article 34 was very wide, including decisions of a type that might fundamentally affect persons and their livelihoods. In Keady, recognising the important role of administrative bodies in the running of the State, this Court held that Kingsmill Moore J.'s judgment should be confined largely to its own facts, and that it could not be said that the large range of administrative bodies by then in existence were engaged in making orders which, as a matter of history, were characteristic of the courts.

45. On this, Simons J. observed that claims for wrongful dismissal had been the business of the courts for decades before the WRA 2015. The law of employment generally concerned adjudications similar to those involved in proceedings for breach of contract. He rejected the respondents' submission that the UDA 1977 had created a new self-contained statutory jurisdiction, which had never been part of the jurisdiction of the High Court. He doubted that legislation by the Oireachtas could put legislation beyond the reach of the courts, without infringing Article 34. He pointed out that the fact that the Circuit Court had previously exercised jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals in claims of unfair dismissal under the UDA 1977 showed that the orders made by the WRC had been orders of a type historically made by the courts. He pointed out that, in Doherty v. South Dublin Co. Co. [2007] 2 I.R. 696, the issue had been whether the full and original jurisdiction of the High Court could be relied on when there had been an exclusive jurisdiction conferred on the tribunal under the Act. This did not address the different question of whether an order made by the Equality Tribunal was of a type which as a matter of history had been made by the courts. Thus, the High Court judgment actually concluded that the hearing and determination of a payment of wages claim did fulfil the fifth limb of the test in McDonald: that is to say, the making of orders determining claims were characteristic of the business of the courts as carried out under the UDA 1977, and the type of orders made pursuant to the common law jurisdiction for wrongful dismissal.

46. I comment here that the scope of the fifth limb remains significant in this case. As explained earlier in re Solicitors Act, Kingsmill Moore J. proposed as one of the tests of judicial function the extent to which the power to exercise a far-reaching power to strike a solicitor off the Rolls could be a non-judicial power. Some subsequent decisions, especially Keady, showed a desire to limit that decision to its special facts. (cf. The State (Calcul International Ltd. & Anor) v. Appeal Commissioners, 18 December 1986, Barron J., High Court).

The Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977

47. The UDA 1977 did not oust the jurisdiction of the courts. Rather, the statutory right to make a claim for unfair dismissal was parallel to the common law right of action for wrongful dismissal. Simons J. observed, however, that the existence of this parallel jurisdiction under statute was a limitation on the common law. (See Johnson v. Unisys [2003] 1 AC 518; Eastwood v. Magnox Electric plc [2005] 1 AC 503, as applied in Ireland by Laffoy J. in Nolan v. Emo Oil Services Ltd. [2010] 1 ILRM 228). But the issue of what areas of law are, as matters of history, characteristic of the courts, remains an important consideration, if it comes to a question of whether some areas of law can be placed in the hands of a non-judicial decision-making body.

48. The High Court judge concluded that, even if the preservation of a parallel right of action before the courts might be an answer to an allegation that a statutory decision-maker was carrying out the administration of justice, this could not apply in the context of employment legislation. He was of the view that the failure to satisfy the fourth limb of McDonald meant that the decision did not constitute the administration of justice for the purposes of Article 34.

49. Simons J. held that, even if the preservation of a parallel right of action before the courts might be an answer to an allegation that a statutory decision-maker was carrying out the administration of justice, this could not apply in the context of employment legislation, which dealt with an area which he held had been traditionally part of the courts' jurisdiction. However, he concluded that the failure to satisfy the fourth limb of McDonald meant that the decision did not constitute the administration of justice for the purposes of Article 34. It is fair to say that the judge's decision on this question was arrived at with, as he said, "some hesitation".

50. As mentioned, the rigour of the analysis, and the scope and depth of the judicial reasoning in the High Court judgment, is such that, in hindsight, it is unfortunate that the trial judge, for perfectly good reasons, did not consider it necessary to consider Article 37 of the Constitution. His assessment and consideration of that question would have been of real benefit to this Court, particularly in light of the observations he had made at the outset of his judgment regarding the extent of the jurisdiction provided for by the WRA 2015, by contrast with the limited jurisdiction under the Payment of Wages Act. The word "limited" is one of the key elements of Article 37 of the Constitution.

Procedural Requirements

51. Additionally, the High Court judge held that the appellant's claims for entitlement to fair procedures, compliant with Article 40.3 of the Constitution, began by assuming that an AO was equivalent to that of a judge. However, he held that, given that the decision-making power under the WRA 2015 did not involve the administration of justice, this could not be so. He held the evidence based on a 2016 survey which found that 49% of claimants were dissatisfied, or very dissatisfied with the new system, was not sufficient in itself to lead to a conclusion that there was a systemic problem with the use of AOs to hear claims. He commented that the appellant's evidence was "generalised" and "vague", to the extent that it was not possible to make a determination of systemic failure. I deal with these inferences later in this judgment. Thus, he held that AOs did not require to have legal qualifications; that the provisions did not require an oath or affirmation; that there need be no express provision for cross-examination, or hearings in public. I address these four conclusions at the end of this judgment.

Section II

An Overview of the Issues in this Case

52. The starting points, as in all issues which come to court, must be a set of given facts, and how the law should be applied to those facts. At one level, this case simply involves a consideration of the interaction between Articles 34 and 37 of the Constitution. But I believe, that, in fact, the issues go deeper and touch on the very nature of the State itself, as identified in the Constitution adopted by the People in 1937, and amended, where necessary, by a vote of the People in referendums. In enacting the Constitution, the People, who are sovereign, recognised the nature of the State identified in the Constitution as being based on Montesquieu's concept of the tripartite allocation of powers, based on checks, as well as balances. The constitution of the United States was the first which sought to give practical effect to Montesquieu's understanding of the tripartite allocation of powers.

53. Now, the very issue of how that constitution should be interpreted has come to the forefront of political discourse, and itself become a political question. We are fortunate that, in this State, our Constitution is flexible enough to entrust fundamental decisions to the People as the ultimate legislators. But the fact that there has been a tendency in other countries and jurisdictions, to portray courts as the agents of undesired or dangerous change must, on occasion, prompt a degree of caution when engaging in constitutional development. I make these observations not as a judicial conservative, but because I think there are times for caution. To everything there is a season. How a state actually functions is dependent upon the values of those who rule and administer that state. This judgment concerns the interpretation and application of the separation of powers, as identified in the Constitution of 1937. Underlying the previous jurisprudence of the courts on this issue is an accretion of wisdom in the process of interpretation by judges who, since the time the Constitution was enacted, had, to the forefront of their minds, the preservation and protection of the values expressed in that Constitution – again not for judges but to serve the public, including those who, like Mr. Zalewski, have to go to court to vindicate their rights when these have been denied elsewhere. In this process, judges bring to bear their own life experience, and the experience of other judges. It is hardly necessary to reiterate Oliver Wendell Holmes' oft quoted remark that experience, not logic, is the life-blood of the law. Holmes, having warned that the law cannot be dealt with as if it contains only the axioms and corollaries of a book of mathematics, then added "In order to know what [the Court] is, we must know what it has been, and what it tends to become." (The Common Law 1881).

54. I start this consideration also bearing in mind O'Dalaigh C.J.'s caution in McMahon v. The Attorney General [1972] I.R. 60, that constitutional rights "are declared, not alone because of bitter memories of the past, but no less because of improbable, but not to be overlooked, perils of the future". I acknowledge that the jurisprudence, (especially McDonald), in relation to Article 34 has been occasionally criticised as lacking a foundational prescriptive basis. But, while the judges in the courts do and must consider legal theory, in practice we must be empirical and practical. In any process of interpretation, too, courts must have regard to the improbable, but not to be overlooked, perils of the future. In judicial reasoning, judges will bring to bear not only their experience in interpreting the Constitution, but some knowledge of history and contemporary events which show the ways in which apparently well-established constitutional values can be placed under threat or undermined. Fortunately, this State is not threatened by such political forces in this way, either at present or in the foreseeable future. I engage in this discussion fully acknowledging that there is always the risk that accusations will be made of unnecessary concern, and of judges protecting their own territory. To that I would respond, the courts do not belong to judges, but to serve the People. Ultimately, under the Constitution, the courts provide the forum to right wrongs, and administer justice. Throughout the process he has been ably represented by his lawyers. The events in this case prompt a question as to how the appellant could have vindicated his rights if he had not been legally represented?

Section III

An Article 37 Resolution of the Case

55. This judgment would hold there is a direct route to resolving this claim, based on Article 34 of the Constitution itself, and the established case law. But, it is proposed, there is another route to resolution by resort to Article 37 of the Constitution, holding that, in fact, the Adjudication Officer and the WRC were, in this case, ones exercising limited powers and functions under Article 37 of the Constitution. This requires close scrutiny, both of the intent and effect of that Article. Like Holmes, we must proceed on the basis of what the law has been, and not only what it tends to become, but what it might possibly become. It is necessary, first to look at what the law "has been" regarding Article 37, back to the intention of the authors of the Constitution.

The Original Intentions of Article 37 – The Protection of Quasi Judicial Bodies

56. Discerning the "original intention" of the drafters of a constitution is not always a satisfactory method of interpreting the provisions of a living constitution. However, sometimes, such investigations throw much light on the interpretive process. This is such a case.

57. The original intention behind Article 37 was simple. (See Hogan, The Origins of the Irish Constitution, 1928 to 1941, p.580 et seq.). The Article was intended, only, to avoid the difficulties and litigation which had been experienced since independence, when the exercise of powers of a judicial, or quasi judicial, nature had been challenged in the courts on the grounds that these were matters reserved to the courts. (Hogan, p.581). These included powers exercised by the Land Commission, Ministers, County Registrars, Referees, and persons holding similar offices. In a revealing observation, Mr. Philip O'Donoghue, an official in the Attorney General's office in 1937, stated that the Article "merely attempts to establish that rulings of such quasi-judicial bodies shall not be upset on purely technical grounds, namely, that they were not judges*"*. (See p.581 Origins) (Emphasis added). This limited intent, therefore, was to avoid chaos in large areas of administration, as would deprive of their functions "the numerous Courts of Referees, Appeal Committees, and Appeals Tribunals" operating under Acts such as the "Old Age Pensions Act, National Health Insurance Acts, and Unemployment Insurance Acts." These were the quasi judicial bodies which described the intention of the authors of the Constitution. The note from Mr. O'Donoghue to the then Attorney General, Patrick Lynch, K.C. was in the context of an amendment to the Constitution then being considered before the Dáil, the effect of which would have been the entire deletion of Article 37 from the Constitution. Perusal of the Dáil Record of 12th May, 1937 shows, among other things, a concern as to how the Article might be deployed, bearing in mind the lack of limitations in the text. Be it said, that concern was not warranted. The authors of the Constitution had no such intention. (See Hogan, op. cit. p.41, 63, 84, 333.n.). The powers were to be exercised within the strict terms of the Constitution. (Hogan, p.84). But those who proposed the amendment had concerns as to the potential scope of the Article, as applied in other, future, circumstances.

58. There can be no doubt that the authors saw Article 37 as a saver, or exception, or exclusion, from the fundamental principle established by Article 34 that justice shall be administered in courts established by the Constitution. This value, including the open administration of justice, mentioned in the same Article, were seen as fundamental to the independent, democratic nature of the State, and the principle of separation of powers contained in the Constitution.

59. But not all shared this view. There were concerns raised in the Oireachtas about the potential scope of Article 37, at a time when, elsewhere in Continental Europe, the Weimar Constitution, a "parent" of our own, had been subverted by enemies of the rule of law by the utilisation of what was called the "tactic of legality", in which the law itself was exploited or interpreted in order to undermine the fundamental objectives of the Constitution. The functions and protections which, under the Weimar Constitution, were intended to be uniquely vested in the courts, were, instead, reposed by law in other "courts", by an "enabling" legislation. (See Judges, Transition, and Human Rights, Morrison ed.: Quinn, Dangerous Constitutional Moments, C.12, p.223 et seq).

The State (Ryan) v. Lennon

60. There was, too, another concern, based on recent national constitutional experience. That concern was to ensure that the spirit and intent of the new Constitution could not be undermined by an interpretation which defeated the aims of the new Constitution.

61. In The State (Ryan) v. Lennon [1935] I.R. 170, this Court's predecessor had to consider whether, under the terms of the 1922 Constitution, the Oireachtas had an unlimited power of amendment during a transitory period, provided for under Article 50 of that Constitution, which provision it was claimed, could itself be amended by the Oireachtas, rather than the People. The majority of the former Supreme Court, (Fitzgibbon and Murnaghan JJ.), considered that the Third Dail Eireann, as a constituent assembly, could have exempted Article 50 from the amending powers conferred upon the Oireachtas, but had not done so. Thus, the courts had no jurisdiction to read either into the Constituent Act, or into Article 50, a proviso excepting it, and it alone, from these powers.

62. Chief Justice Kennedy's dissent is memorable. He held that:

> "... any amendment of the Constitution, purporting to be made under the power given by the Constituent Assembly, which would be a violation of, or be inconsistent with, any fundamental principle so declared, is necessarily outside the scope of the power and invalid and void." ([1935] I.R. 209)

63. The judgments of the majority of the former Supreme Court, justifying the power of amendment claimed, were so utterly contrary to the spirit and original intent of the 1922 Constitution as should be a cause for reflection in this case, where, to my mind, what is in question is both the spirit and text of the 1937 Constitution. As I have already commented, Ireland is now fortunate. But it is also sometimes the duty of courts to look to what might now seem improbable, but what might possibly occur in the far future. Reading the judgments cited in this case, it is hard not to admire the role past judges have played in interpreting the Constitution, and shaping and guiding the evolution of the State. Some judges of half a century ago might be surprised as to how the nature of the State has evolved. But one feature of the many judgments is striking: it is a judicial reluctance to address the difficult issues of interpretation of what are quasi judicial functions by resort to Article 37, though there are some limited exceptions to this reluctance.

The Achilles Heel of the 1922 Constitution

64. Our Constitution of 1937 was specifically intended to avoid the "Achilles heel" of the 1922 Constitution where its authors had not foreseen the possibility of unlimited amendment by the Oireachtas. The question of limitations is always important in any constitutional discussion. A power or function which is stated in terms in a constitution to be "limited" is not to be interpreted in a way which undermines a more general definition of power or function or deprive that general definition of its true effect in spirit and text.

Section IV

Other Relevant Case Law

In re The Solicitors Act

65. Three judgments setting out settled law, form the essential framework for this judgment. These are McDonald, re The Solicitors Act, and Keady, referred to below. The judgment of the former Supreme Court in re The Solicitors Act 1954, actually predates McDonald. But it is essential background. In that case, the court had to consider the power provided by the Solicitors Act, 1954, to strike a solicitor off the Roll of Solicitors. Reversing an order of the High Court, the former Supreme Court held that the power to strike a solicitor off the Roll of Solicitors was, when exercised, an administration of justice, both because the infliction of such a severe penalty on a citizen was a matter which called for the exercise of the judicial powers of the State, and because to entrust such a power to persons other than judges was to interfere with the necessity of the proper administration of justice. The Court held that the powers and functions conferred by the Solicitors Act, 1954 on the disciplinary committee could not be described as merely limited powers and functions of a judicial nature, within the meaning of Article 37 of the Constitution, and accordingly the exercise of such powers was unconstitutional, and the applicants accordingly were not validly struck off the roll of solicitors.

66. In the course of his judgment, Kingsmill Moore J. observed that the power to strike a solicitor off the roll was disciplinary and punitive in nature, even though what was in question was not a criminal cause or matter. It was, however, a sanction of such severity that its consequences might be much more serious than a term of imprisonment. He observed that admission to the roll of solicitors was only attained after a long apprenticeship and training and the attainment of a high standard of legal knowledge. When a solicitor was struck off the roll, all his training and endeavours would go for nothing and it became a penal offence for him to practice as a solicitor. Historically, the act of striking solicitors off the roll had always been reserved to judges. It was necessary for the proper administration of justice that the courts be served by legal practitioners of high integrity and professional competence. On that basis, this Court's predecessor concluded that the power to strike a solicitor off the roll was, when exercised, an administration of justice, both because the infliction of such a severe penalty on a citizen was a matter which called for the exercise of judicial power of the State, and because to entrust such a power to persons other than judges was to interfere with the necessities of the proper administration of justice.

67. As we will see, the over-broad scope of this section of the judgment was later limited by this Court in Keady. In recognising the important role of administrative bodies in the running of the State, this Court held that application of that part of Kingsmill Moore J.'s judgment should be confined largely to its own facts, and that it could not be said that the large range of administrative bodies by then in existence were engaged in making orders which, as a matter of history, were characteristic of the courts.

68. But I do not think many of the observations in Kingsmill Moore J.'s judgment can so easily be disregarded. He raised legitimate questions as to the potential interpretation of Article 37. The validity of those questions endures. His conclusion was that, in accordance with Article 34, the fact that justice was to be administered in courts established by law, by judges appointed under the Constitution, necessitated that there could be only one corollary: that justice was not to be administered by persons who were not judges appointed in the manner provided by the Constitution, save in those instances especially excluded by the Constitution. Critically, he pointed out that justice, and what is "administration of justice" were nowhere defined in the Constitution, save that trial of criminal matters and offences was, undoubtedly, the administration of justice, as was clear from Article 38 of the Constitution.

69. But, regarding the text of Article 37, he rhetorically asked these questions:

> "What is the meaning to be given to the word "limited"? It is not a question of "limited jurisdiction" whether the limitation be in regard to persons or subject matter. Limited jurisdictions are especially dealt with in Article 34(3),(4). It is the "powers and functions" which must be "limited", not the ambit of their exercise. Nor is the test of limitation to be sought in the number of powers and functions which are exercised. The constitution does not say "powers and functions limited in number. Again it must be emphasised that it is the powers and functions which are in their own nature to be limited. A tribunal, having but a few powers and functions, but those of far-reaching effect and importance, could not properly be regarded as exercising "limited" powers and functions. The judicial power of the State is, by Article 34 of the Constitution, lodged in the courts*, and the provisions of Article 37 do not admit of that* power being trenched upon, or of its being withdrawn piecemeal from the courts. The test as to whether a power is or is not "limited", in the opinion of the court, lies in the effect of the assigned power when exercised." (Emphasis added) I return to each of the underlined passages later.

Those questions, especially ones arising from the emphasised words, have never satisfactorily been answered. It is not a sufficient answer simply to assert a power under an Act is "limited". Many, indeed most, statutory powers and functions are "limited". One concern posed in this judgment is, the extent to which powers, perhaps concerning fundamentally important areas of law, might be deemed by statute to be limited by a statute, when there might be no way under the Constitution of knowing or discerning which areas of law, whether core areas or not, are actually capable of such "limitation".

70. In the 1960 case, Kingsmill Moore J. added that, if the exercise of the assigned power was calculated ordinarily to effect in the most profound and far-reaching way the lives, liberties, fortunes or reputations of those against whom they are exercised, they cannot properly be described as "limited". It was that final passage which this Court later had to limit in Keady. This Court observed it went too far and did not have regard to the way in which administrative bodies formed an essential part of the State.

Keady

71. For present purposes, it is useful next to consider in more detail the last of the triad of cases, that is, the judgment of this Court in Keady. In that case, a tribunal of inquiry, composed of members of An Garda Siochana, found the plaintiff guilty of a number of breaches of discipline in relation to the falsification of claims for expenses. The plaintiff sought an order of certiorari in respect of the decision, on the grounds that the tribunal had acted ultra vires in determining upon criminal matters. He also sought a declaration that the tribunal had acted ultra vires in the absence of criminal convictions, and that the effect of the tribunal's decision constituted more than a mere exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature, as permitted by Article 37 of the Constitution.

72. In dismissing the appeal, this Court held that Articles 37 and 38 of the Constitution did not operate to prohibit the making of allegations, which might also found a criminal prosecution before any statutory or other domestic tribunal of inquiry. (The State (Murray) v McRann [1979] IR 133, and Deaton v. Attorney General [1963] I.R. 170). This Court held that the tribunal of inquiry had power to determine a breach of discipline in respect of breaches of garda conduct. The Court held, crucially, that, having regard to what is described in the headnote as "long and settled authority", the Garda Tribunal inquiry, although obliged to act judicially, did not exercise a judicial function, in that its determination was not upon a contest between parties before it, but an inquiry only, and, moreover, matters of internal police discipline historically had never been reserved to the jurisdiction of the courts in the administration of justice. In so holding, this Court applied McDonald as settled law. The Court went on to hold that, unlike the powers of certain tribunals established to regulate the professions, with the powers of disqualification, or striking from the register, and powers to make further professional practice in the absence of proper certification or registration a criminal offence, a garda was appointed to or dismissed from his office by the Commissioner, in accordance with the regulations. In so holding, this Court distinguished In Re Solicitors Act 1954, and C.K. v. An Bord Altranais [1990] 2 I.R. 396. In the course of his judgment, McCarthy J. quoted from the judgment of Kennedy C.J. in Lynham v Butler (No.2) [1933] I.R. 74. There, the then Chief Justice, identified that the controversies which fall to courts for determination may be divided into two classes, criminal and civil. Chief Justice Kennedy said:

> "In relation to the former class of controversy, the Judicial Power is exercised in determining the guilt or innocence of persons charged with offences against the State itself and in determining the punishments to be inflicted upon persons found guilty of offences charged against them, which punishments it then becomes the obligation of the executive department of government to carry into effect." (Emphasis added)

> "In relation to justiciable controversies of the civil class, the judicial power is exercised in determining in a final manner, by definitive adjudication according to law, rights or obligations in dispute between citizen and citizen, or between citizens and the State, or between any parties whoever they may be and in binding the parties by such determination which will be enforced if necessary with the authority of the State. ... It follows from its nature as I have described it that the exercise of the judicial power, which is coercive and must frequently act against the will of one of the parties to enforce its decision adverse to that party, requires of necessity that the judicial department of government have compulsive authority over persons as, for instance, it must have authority to compel appearance of the party before it, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to order the execution of its judgments against persons and property."

74. Having referred to The State (Shanahan) v. Attorney General & Ors. [1964] IR 239, and the five tests in McDonald, McCarthy J. pointed out that Walsh J. had accepted the characteristic features of a judicial body set out by Kennedy J. in McDonald. McCarthy J. indicated that the McDonald tests were cumulative, and each must be satisfied. But then McCarthy J. added:

"It was scarcely intended by Kenny J. or by this Court to exclude from the qualifying criteria such matters as were identified by Kennedy C.J. in Lynham v. Butler (No.2) [1933] I.R. 74 - authority to compel appearance of a party before it, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to order the execution of its judgments against persons and property."

These, I understand, were identified by McCarthy J. as being "qualifying criteria", which, too, would constitute the administration of justice. As will be seen, very many of the powers of the AO and the WRC involve precisely those powers.

75. But, importantly, McCarthy J. went on to point out that, for the purposes of Keady, test number 5 was not satisfied, that is, that the courts had no role, as a matter of history, in the supervision and disciplining members of An Garda Sioahana. He observed:

"In the case of an office or other position created by statute and held pursuant to statute, in my view the principles stated in In re Solicitors' Act 1954 [1960] I.R. 239 are not to be extended, if they are to be extended at all, so as to embrace the statutory framework which deals with the creation of and appointment to a particular position or rank and not to the wider factor of being qualified to work for gain in a restricted occupation as well, in appropriate cases, as being qualified to hold a particular position or rank. ..."

76. In his judgment in Keady, O'Flaherty J. observed that the line of authority established that there was now in place a "well charted system of administrative law which requires decision-makers to render justice in the cases brought before them and sets out the procedures that should be followed, which procedures will vary from case to case and from one type of tribunal to another and which, of course, are subject to judicial review." But, O'Flaherty J. did not consider it necessary, on the facts of the case, to embark on any consideration of the concept of "limited functions and powers". In my view, the fifth test in McDonald, together with the limitations contained in Keady, militate against any suggestion that any other past, or future, quasi judicial bodies might be deemed to be administrations of justice, as properly understood.

Section V

The Established Status of Article 34 Case Law

77. But, additionally, McCarthy J. enumerated the vast number of decisions of the courts which had expressed what he termed the "constitutional prescript" that justice shall be administered by judges in a manner provided by the Constitution. These included Lynham v. Butler, cited earlier*; Halpin v. Attorney General* [1936] I.R. 226; State (McKay) v. Cork Circuit Judge [1937] I.R. 650; Fisher v. Irish Land Commission & The Attorney General [1948] I.R. 3; The State (Crowley) v. Irish Land Commission [1951] I.R. 250; Foley v. Irish Land Commission & The Attorney General [1952] I.R. 118; Cowan v. Attorney General [1961] I.R. 411; Deaton v. Attorney General [1963] I.R. 170; State (Shanahan) v. Attorney General & Ors. [1964] IR 239; McDonald v. Bord na gCon (No.2) [1965] I.R. 217; Garvey v. Ireland [1981] I.R. 75. He was seeking to emphasise the accretion of consideration which had been given to the issue. McCarthy J. quoted an observation of Davitt P. in The State (Shanahan) v. The Attorney General [1964] I.R. 239, to the effect that he had "certainly no intention of rushing in where so many eminent jurists" had feared to tread and offer a definition of judicial power.

78. McCarthy J. stated:

> "I share the reluctance of Davitt P. … to attempt a definition of judicial power; it is easier, if intellectually less satisfying*, to say in a given instance whether or not the procedure is an exercise of such power, rather than to identify a comprehensive check-list for that purpose. The requirement to act judicially is not a badge of such power."* (page 204) (Emphasis added.)

Observations in O'Connell v. The Turf Club

79. Years later, in O'Connell v. The Turf Club, this Court stated:

> "There are very many bodies which adopt court-like procedures and which may make orders and determinations which have severe impact on individuals which can far exceed the orders made by courts. Furthermore, it must be recognised that the case law on this area is difficult and some of the decisions are not easily reconciled. The line between bodies required to act judicially or fairly, and those exercising judicial functions, is not one easily drawn in any jurisdiction, but is here more complicated by the existence of Article 37." (para. 54.)

But the judgment went on:

> "It is now however, much too late to seek any comprehensive theory*, even if such was desirable. Instead the resolution of these cases must be found within the existing case law and the guidance which they offer. As the majority of the Constitutional Review Group noted in this regard in its Report of the Constitutional Review Group 1996, (Stationery Office Dublin 1996, at page 155):*
> > "…there is no completely satisfactory answer to the problem raised and … there are great difficulties in formulating a different set of words which deal adequately with these complex issues". (Emphasis added.) (para. 54)

I think there was much wisdom in each of these observations. For courts, any search for a theory can only begin, and be rooted in, present realities, past experience, and take place within the framework of the Constitution governing the courts, and other organs of government. That present-day reality and experience includes the way in which courts have, sometimes with difficulty, sought to define the "administration of justice". As recently as three months ago, this Court delivered an important judgment as to the rights of persons when a decision is made to consider depriving a person of citizenship and whether this was in the nature of a judicial decision. In Damache v. Minister for Justice [2020] IESC 63, this Court's comprehensive judgment relied heavily on McDonald in its consideration of whether revocation of citizenship was a judicial procedure. (c.f. paras. 39 – 70 of the judgment). The judgment describes the McDonald criteria as the "classic test", (para. 64), whereas, here, the Court considered whether the power came within Article 37 of the Constitution, but concluded the power was an executive function.

80. The three quotations cited above speak powerfully as to the established status of the McDonald criteria in a profoundly important area of jurisprudence. The evolution of that jurisprudence is comprehensively dealt with in the judgments delivered by my colleagues. The historic case law is dense. In order to see the wood from the trees, I think the focus must be on what are the key decisions.

81. To again simplify: the five-pronged test in McDonald must now be subject to the limitations imposed on it by this Court in Keady. The McDonald test may not always be satisfactory in jurisprudential theory. But, I would hold that practice and experience show the criteria should be maintained as a fundamentally important safeguard for the rights of individuals going to court – not judges - even accepting criticisms. The criteria are rooted in experience and history. It has been said, by way of criticism, that the tests, especially presumably the fifth one, based on history, may be "circular", but it begins from what courts actually do, an essential starting point in an empirical analysis as to the nature of the checks and balances, which, in truth, has troubled courts in many common law nations.

The Attorney General's Submissions on Article 34 and McDonald

82. This case requires to be examined in a balanced way, looking at all the possible consequences of a potential invocation of Article 37, from all standpoints. I begin with the Attorney General's important submissions.

83. The Attorney General appeared for all the respondents in this appeal. He deserves thanks for this, and for his reminders to this Court concerning the values protected and served in the McDonald decision. In this appeal, he argued that the procedures under s.41(5) of the WRA 2015 did not satisfy either the fourth or fifth tests of McDonald, and, therefore, did not constitute the administration of justice. For the reasons now set out in this judgment, I respectfully differ from the conclusions he would seek to draw concerning how the fourth and fifth limbs of McDonald should be applied.

84. But those submissions are, nonetheless, of fundamental importance. They transcend the significance of this one case concerning the constitutionality of procedures in one Act of the Oireachtas. Based on his specific experience, and vantage point, the Attorney General submitted that McDonald, as now mediated by Keady, posed no insurmountable problems for the evolution of the administrative state. It is hard to think of more reliable expert testimony on the concrete reality of the issue. The Attorney General submitted with great force, that the current formulation of McDonald should be maintained. I do not think his cautions should be ignored. Pace criticisms occasionally levied against McDonald, he submitted that the judgment, as a matter of fact, based on experience, provided a balance between the different relevant considerations that needed to be applied in the application of Article 34 of the Constitution. He pointed out that the test contained the flexibility necessary to allow for the development of the law. In fact, it could, in some senses, be seen as a far-reaching test, or at least one which gave a structure, within which Article 34 could be interpreted, which nonetheless managed to contain a certain flexibility, as it envisaged that, not only would the law develop, but that the spheres of operation and responsibility of other organs of the government could also develop. The Attorney General submitted that the decision in McDonald, as now seen through the prism of Keady, actually encapsulated a core principle of the Constitution and of government in its broadest sense; that core principle being that the separation of powers should not stand in the way of new institutional approaches to a social, economic or political problems that had been addressed by other organs of government. The regulatory aspect that now pervades so many of the rights and obligations of different sectors of society simply could not be conducted by the standards and efficiencies required consistent with the Constitution itself, if one took a narrow view of what had been intended within the meaning of Article 34. The Attorney General submitted that, rather than ticking any one of the five tests in McDonald, they should, rather, be applied cumulatively. I agree with that submission.

85. But what he said in relation to Article 37 is no less relevant. He submitted that a reliance on Article 37 could lead to having to see that Article as "a prism" through which one assessed the accretion of power in the judicial sphere, and then determining the effect on the individual affected. This, he submitted, would create difficulties in legislation, and would be to introduce an entirely different test from McDonald, whereby the concept of justiciability became the touchstone of whether or not a particular decision-making function came within Article 34 – an idea which had never been suggested previously. This would overlook both the fourth and fifth criteria in McDonald and involve an abandonment of that established authority. The importance of these submissions cannot be overstated.

86. It must be said that, at minimum, there was something of a tension between the respondents' primary case, supporting Simons J.'s conclusions on the fourth limb, and opposing his conclusions on the fifth limb, and the respondents' alternative, fall-back position involving reliance on Article 37 as a constitutional justification for the WRC functions. The Attorney General expressed strong reservations on resort to Article 37. But, in fact, the respondents' case relied on both McDonald, and Article 37, contending the AO was exercising a limited power or function.

87. In her able argument, Ms. Catherine Donnelly, S.C., who also appeared on behalf of the respondents, outlined circumstances in which, were it thought appropriate, the Court might adopt the approach that what is in issue here is the administration of limited judicial powers under Article 37 of the Constitution. She correctly pointed out that, quoting from Johnson J. in Lynham v Butler (No.2) [1933] IR 74, that it was illusory to ask the courts to judge at first instance every minor matter of dispute arising out of the greatly extended and articulated administration. Ms. Donnelly S.C. submitted that the Court should look at the scheme of the WRA 2015, and the objectives, including simplification and integration of mechanisms, and the pathways to redress. These included a system that was "non-legalistic" that encouraged compromise and agreement. The aim is to have access to an adjudication body, which was informal, with the appropriate assistance on the presentation of the facts. Thus it was that the legislation included dispute resolution procedures and facilities. The primary objective is to seek resolution of disputes close to the workplace level. This is to be done in a non-legal informal basis, to encourage compromise and agreement. These are, she submitted, legitimate objectives for the legislature to pursue. I entirely accept that, in themselves, these are legitimate policy objectives. But I do not understand why it is said Article 34 of the Constitution stands in the way of such aims and objectives. Article 34 does not stand as an obstacle to pre-trial mediation, or for that matter court procedures aimed at resolving issues without resort to a full hearing.

Observations on Article 37

88. Nor can it be successfully argued that the structures created by the WRA 2015 are necessary for the vindication of entitlements under the Act. This argument confuses means with ends, policy with the words of the statute. The desire was to provide a system of resolution of employment disputes which is sufficient, timely, and minimises costs. But there is nothing in the respondents' case to suggest that these same objects could not be achieved in a constitutionally compliant manner. For example, the simple step of adopting procedures which are clear and constitutionally compliant, but which achieve those same ends. (See, for example, the rules governing the Commercial Court). Different procedures would not alter the statutory rights set out in the Act. The abrogation, or non-observance, of earlier procedures laid down for the Employment Appeals Tribunal, could, in any given case, certainly obstruct the attainment of entitlements for workers, as much as, potentially, for respondents.

89. As to the words of Article 37, she submitted that the limitations in question there were such as might render it appropriate to characterise the power here as being "limited". But, she submitted, one could not simply adopt it. The issue in the re Solicitors Act was not only the question of earning one's profession, but the severity of the sanction, containing a disciplinary element, which brought it outside the scope of being the exercise of a limited jurisdiction.

90. These, too, were significant submissions in the context of this case. They again raised the question, what limitations can be found in Article 37, or elsewhere in the Constitution? But I think the difficulties in favouring an Article 37 resolution in this case go very far. I turn then to the manner in which this case can be resolved by the application of established case law, rather than by resort to an idea which has "never been suggested previously".

Section VI

Simons J.'s Conclusions on the Fourth McDonald Criterion: Enforcement of Rights or Liabilities

91. There is no dispute in relation to the first three McDonald criteria. They are satisfied. The question under the fourth heading can be simply put. It is whether the decision of an administrative officer can be enforced by the executive power of the State, which is called on to enforce that judgment? Contrary to the submissions of the respondents, I would answer "yes" to this question. The text of s.43 has been set out earlier. It provides that, if an employer fails to carry out the decision of an AO, then an application can be made by the employee, or trade union, or excepted body to the District Court who, without hearing the other side, or any evidence, other than in relation to the making of the decision, can make an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms. The District Court may, instead of making an order directing the employer to carry out the decision, direct the employer to pay to the employee compensation of such amount as is just and equitable, having regard to all the circumstances, but not exceeding 104 weeks' remuneration. Furthermore, the court may award interest pursuant to the s.22 of the Courts Act, 1981. But then, in the event of further non-compliance, without just excuse, the WRC itself is empowered to bring a criminal prosecution against a respondent where, on conviction, such respondent may be liable to a fine or imprisonment. It is necessary to look at s.43 in combination with s.51. Does s.43 offend the Constitution of 1937, or just one Article of the Constitution?

92. Where the State respondents' argument falls down is that the wording of s.43 is not incompatible with the argument made seeking to justify it. The rationale for this section can only be a legislative or drafting concern in relation to the administration of justice, as in McDonald. The fourth limb is "the enforcement of those rights or liabilities, or the imposition of a penalty by the court or by the executive power of the State, which is called in by the court to enforce its judgment". Simons J. concluded, with hesitation, that the area of discretion permitted by s.43 of the WRA 2015 was sufficient to render that section, and the procedure flows from it, constitutionally firm. I respectfully disagree. In a key finding, Simons J. concluded: "A decision maker who is not only reliant on the parties invoking the judicial power to enforce its decisions, but whose decisions as to form of relief are then vulnerable to being overruled as part of the process cannot be said to be carrying out the administration of justice." I do not agree that what can be invoked here can be characterised as "the judicial power", in the sense of a court carrying out its function as a court recognised under the Constitution. Nor do I agree that, within the rigid limitations contained in s.43 of the Act, it can be said that, in considering remedy, the District Court could be said to be carrying out a judicial function, where fair procedures are a fundamental requirement. Very similar procedures were struck down in similar circumstances by this Court. (See, for illustration, DK v. Crowley [2002] 2 I.R. 744). The procedure here cannot be justified, either on the basis of fairness, or proportionality.

93. Instead, the District Court, for enforcement, is restricted to the process set out in s.43 of the Act, which simply cannot be seen as being ones where a court carrying out a judicial function. But s.43(1) involves a near-total restriction on the right of fair procedures. I agree with O'Donnell and Charleton JJ. who also hold in their judgments, that its effect is to allow for a mechanism whereby the court is called upon by statute to exercise a power and function which, by any standard, cannot be seen as a court exercising a judicial function, having regard to the principle of audi alteram partem, fair procedures, or the right to summon witnesses and cross-examine. Thus, the question is whether this power can be said to be the invocation and exercise of a judicial power "making the vital decisions" under the Constitution? If it was, it could be said that an ultimate decision on the merits could be made by a court of law exercising fair procedures. This is not a judicial power.

94. The intent behind s.43 was to provide "a protective" constitutional umbrella to the procedures, by providing that ultimately, resort could be had to a court. It fails in that aim, but simply because the District Court is not acting as a court, but, rather, in an administrative capacity. I do not agree either that the fact that the District Court can modify an AO's order on redress, can be seen as a significant judicial curtailment of the statutory power. At best, it is unclear how, and on what basis that power could be judicially exercised, having regard to the way in which the power of a District Court is so limited by s.43(1)(a) and (b). So also the exercise of the power under s.43(2) must operate within the constraints set out in s.43(1)(a) and (b).

95. Prior to the WRA 2015, a right to appeal to a court on the merits was, it is clear, assumed to be a potential constitutional protection. It was adopted in the UDA 1977 in order to avoid running afoul of Article 34. The importance of this assumption can be easily shown. In Keady, McCarthy J. quoted from, and distinguished, the judgment of this Court in CK. v An Bord Altranais [1990] 2 I.R. 396, a case arising under s. 38 of the Nurses Act, 1985, where the Court was considering a procedure contained in that Act for the regulation, registration and disciplining of members of the nursing profession. But, in the course of his judgment, Finlay C.J. observed that:

> "... it is in the court, namely, the High Court, that the decision effective to lead to an erasure or suspension of the operation of registration must be made. The necessity for that procedure to vest that power unequivocally in the court, in my view, arises from the constitutional frailty that would attach to the delegation of any such power to a body which was not a court established under the Constitution, having regard to the decision of the former Supreme Court in In re Solicitors' Act 1954 [1960] IR 239." (p. 403.) (Emphasis added)

96. Finlay C.J. went on to say:

> "In order for the court to be the effective decision-making tribunal leading to a conclusion that the name of a person should be erased from the register, or the operation of registration should be suspended, it is, in my view, essential that, having regard to the particular facts and issues arising in any case, it is the court who should make the vital decisions*".* (Emphasis added.)

It was the "fact" that a court has made the final decisions that was seen as providing compliance with Article 34.

97. Along with the fair procedures enshrined in Regulation 13 of S.I. 24/1968, the fact of a potential appeal on the merits militated against a constitutional challenge to the UDA 1977 on the basis of non-compliance with Article 34, despite some doubts expressed obiter. (see Canada v. Employment Appeals Tribunal [1992] 2 I.R. 484). In enacting the WRA 2015, the legislature, and those who were to administer the WRA 2015, departed from those protective measures provided for in the 1977 legislation, and by statutory instrument, not carried forward.

98. Like many of the provisions of the WRA 2015, s.43 espoused the good intention of protecting claimants from ruthless employers. But, to my mind, the section seeks to achieve its intention in a manner which simply could not withstand constitutional scrutiny. The process set out in the section denies the right of audi alteram partem to a respondent. It could not be characterised as a court administering justice. The section is, rather, a legislative devise. The process, as laid down in s.43, lacks the fundamental elements of justice and constitutional fairness, which would have to include in such a process the implementation of the constitutional guarantee that both sides can be heard. It is incapable of being understood as having any other purpose. But, not only that, it requires a District Court to carry out an assessment as to whether or not reinstatement should, or should not, be ordered, in circumstances where no right of audience is provided for. It is incapable of being understood as having any other purpose or meaning.

The Fifth Limb: Orders "as a matter of history characteristic of the courts"

99. As to the fifth limb of McDonald, I would uphold Simons J.'s conclusion that the fifth limb is satisfied. I accept his analysis. Having considered the issue in great detail, he concluded:

"The hearing and determination of employment disputes, and the making of orders thereon, is something which is characteristic of the business of the courts. This is evident from the fact that for almost forty years prior to the enactment of the WRA 2015, the Circuit Court had heard and determined claims under the UDA 1977, whether by way of a full appeal or by way of an application to enforce a determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal." (paras. 101-121 of the High Court judgment).

100. I think his findings that employment law has always been the business of the courts is correct. I do not agree with the respondents' submissions that the WRA 2015 can be seen as a self-contained code, to be seen as segregated, separate and distinct from the general area of employment law. While I agree that the courts will not entertain a claim for unfair dismissal, under the legislation, the line of distinction between unfair dismissal, the business of the WRC, and wrongful dismissal, the business of the courts, is too thin to be meaningful as an escape from the fifth limb. The judgments of my colleagues also set out reasons with which I respectfully agree.

The Five McDonald Criteria are satisfied

101. In this case, there are areas of agreement between the judgments. As I understand it, there is consensus that the five tests, as set out in McDonald, are satisfied, and consequently the procedures under question here are incompatible with Article 34.1 of the Constitution. The enforcement measure comes as near to automatic as is possible, and does not allow for input by a losing party. The District Court, as O'Donnell J. comments in his erudite judgment, is seen as a vehicle for enforcement, but is not deployed for its capacity to administer justice. Instead, the court process is "conscripted" in aid of the enforcement of the decision of the WRC (para. 95 of his judgment). Thus, the process cannot be an administration of justice, as it does not contain any of the essential ingredients of fair procedures (para. 97). The fifth limb is satisfied. Thus, the judgments are agreed that the functions of the WRC are the administration of justice. Charleton J., in his judgment, agrees with this conclusion. As I point out later, I am not sure how this finding, that the enforcement procedure cannot be an administration of justice, is necessarily compatible with the conclusion that the enforcement procedures constitute a limitation on the power of an adjudication officer, as set out in s.41(5) of the WRA 2015.

102. To my mind, until these important issues can be considered further, and in greater detail, I think the arguments in favour of the maintenance of McDonald, as now understood, are overwhelming. Experience shows that the test has withstood the test of time, as the Attorney General submits. Properly understood, the principles identified do not stand in the way of necessary work of quasi judicial bodies, which, historically, were never part of the business of the courts, or were to be excluded from the ambit of Article 34. Those same principles, to my mind, would not stand in the way of other quasi judicial bodies operating in new areas which were never the business of the courts. The principles are based on a series of judgments, where the courts have had to consider, an admittedly difficult question of the identification of judicial power in the context of the administration of justice, rather than a theoretical consideration of the problem.

Section VII

The Choice and Consequences

103. This is a case where it is essential to maintain a clear focus on the main issues. The Court is faced with a choice. But every choice, including those made in constitutional interpretation, entails a sacrifice. We should not sacrifice the substance or intent of Article 34. If the application of the logic of McDonald has the effect of arriving at a conclusion that the WRC is engaged in the administration of justice, I would conclude that its procedures, devoid of any protection as they would be by the flawed s.43 of the Act, are contrary to Article 34.1 of the Constitution.

104. The question then is how the Court should proceed? In the course of his comprehensive and detailed judgment, O'Donnell J. quotes from an extraordinarily interesting and thought-provoking work of legal and political philosophy. The author criticises McDonald, as providing only a descriptive summary of the everyday workload of the contemporary court, and that it does not offer a suitably prescriptive analysis of the core concepts of the judicial function. It is said the logic of the judgment is "hopelessly circular", as it relies on the current nature of the court's activities. A criticism is made that the categorisation of institutional power should be carried out on a case by case basis, despite the fact that this "easier if intellectually less satisfying" approach has been adopted by U.S. and Irish courts in several cases. These important observations must be cause for reflection. But, to be candid, I find the fact that McDonald provides a "descriptive" summary to be unsurprising. It is hardly a valid, practical, criticism, as that judgment is predicated on an analysis which must, of necessity, start from the reality of court business, which, in turn, reflects the reality of the society within which courts must function. Any identification of a process by a court must begin with what is the work which the courts actually do. An analysis by a court cannot begin with a clean slate, or a rejection of the accretion of case law, history, and experience. The work of the courts is a reflection of the society in which the courts must operate, framed by the concepts underlying the Constitution from the beginning.

105. Courts are constantly engaged in an empirical day-by-day process of self-definition by the demands placed upon them. In that sense, any approach to a definition of court functions must always be based on practical reality, and historical accretion. Any critique or reasoning must be seen in the light of its ultimate end point or object, which, in this instance, advocates a new theory of separation of powers. But the foundational principle within which the courts actually operate is set out in the Constitution itself. This reflects Montesquieu's thinking as realised first in the Federal Constitution. I think that any argument that the tripartite principle now fails to acknowledge a substantial tranche of government activity, including quasi judicial decision-making, or other administrative procedures, must, for the purposes of this case, be seen in the light of the Attorney General's submissions that McDonald, as explained, should be maintained, and that the judgment, as now understood, poses no real obstacle to the necessary extensions of administrative government. I agree, as the Attorney General submits, that an understanding of Article 34 should not be gleaned from the context of judicial observations regarding the separation of powers made in other jurisdictions, in different eras. The consideration in this judgment is confined to decisions of our own courts, and not only referring to history and experience, but speaking to what are contemporary and, potentially, future issues. Not all references to past experience lead to a restrictive interpretation of a constitution. The concerns in this judgment are contemporary ones, and arise from future possibilities.

Uncertainty

106. One deep concern, arising from proceeding to an Article 37 resolution of this case, is that, as Kingsmill Moore J. pointed out, it gives rise to uncertainty. From the standpoint of the State, I see the force of the Attorney General's submissions. These speak powerfully against the adoption of what he described as what would be an "entirely new test", distinct from McDonald. I would say the same, even if what was suggested is a "softening" of McDonald in the way suggested in the judgment of the majority. My apprehensions are increased by the fact that, by the same steps of logic, it might be possible, by statute, to engage in a process of legislation which, itself, might, potentially, have the effect of "hollowing out" Article 34 of the Constitution. A process which might lead to a near equivalence between the administration of justice, under Article 34 of the Constitution, and judicial powers subject to limitations, under Article 37 of the Constitution, begs the question of where, precisely, would the limitations be drawn? I pose the question, considered later in more detail, whether, even having regard to the precept that in interpreting a constitution there must be scope for flexibility at the points of intersection, that this could be the correct course of action for this Court to adopt in this case? I pose these concerns, too, in addition to those expressed by the Attorney General, as to the difficulty from the respondents' standpoint in drafting legislation in defining what the limits might be, and where the line between Article 34 and Article 37 should be drawn, and what duties of compliance with fair procedures, or otherwise, might be entailed.

Identifying Core Areas of Law

107. During argument in the appeal, there was some limited discussion as to the consequences of a departure from, or a softening of, McDonald. This, in turn, gave rise to a consideration as to whether there were core areas of law which could not be taken away from the courts. It is no criticism of counsel to say this discussion was rather inconclusive and speculative. Examples were given of what might be core areas, such as the whole area of administrative law, or the common law in large part. I am unable to see why these particular areas might be seen as definitively ones which could be described as core areas, and many other areas which would not fit in that description. Perhaps, a distinction might be made on areas governed by statute, and those not so limited. The reason for this difficulty is self-evident. There are no objective constitutional criteria for determining what are such core areas. I revert to the rhetorical question posed by Simons J. If legislative change of the type involved in the WRA 2015 could it be done in one significant area of law, then, in principle, it could be done in other areas of law? Simons J. instanced family law or commercial law. There were just examples. Neither Article 34, nor Article 37, contain any constitutional limits. It is true, criminal law is precluded by the terms of Article 37. But, with that one exception, I, too, pose the question, could other important areas of law be legislatively re-classified "by (statute) law", even those involving fundamental rights, with their scope categorised by legislation by an Oireachtas as "limited functions"? At some future time could some future Oireachtas define by statute other areas of law as "limited" in their area, or exercise, or by the limited extent of the remedy? I do not say this would, or will, ever foreseeably happen. I do not suggest that any foreseeable government would seek to adopt such a course. But I do not see why this Court should adopt a course of action involving a substantial departure from established precedents in a constitutional area which has the potential to affect both the State and the rights of citizens and individuals who must have recourse to the courts in the protection of their rights?

Absence of Constitutional Limitations

108. This question is not fanciful or speculative. In his comprehensive submissions, the Attorney General addressed the possibilities that there could, in the far future, be some cynical attempt by a legislature to remove core administrative or judicial functions, and to "dress them up" in some way. He submitted such circumstances would require a different approach by this Court, but that this consideration did not arise in an assessment of the jurisdiction of the District Court, as it raises under s.43 of the WRA 2015, in this case. I am not convinced that this concern should be thus confined. I think this issue certainly arises more broadly in the context of an Article 37 resolution of the case.

109. I find it hard to escape a sense that a different approach does indeed involve something "new" in terms of the norms of constitutional interpretation. I would emphasise, it is the provisions of the WRA 2015 which fall to be examined by reference to the Constitution and long-established principles of law: not a converse approach. I see a theoretical case can be made for reviewing the dividing line between Article 34 and 37 – the concept is theoretically and intellectually attractive - but this cannot be at the expense of depriving Article 34 of its spirit and substance. If there is one thing that is absolutely clear, it is that the authors of the Constitution were of the view that there must be a distinction, even if sometimes a difficult one to draw, between the administration of justice under Article 34, and the exercise of limited judicial powers under Article 37. They were seeking to establish a republic governed by the rule of law, the Constitution of which would be proof against modification or amendment, save by the People.

110. I do not think that it is necessary for the just resolution of Mr. Zalewski's case that the procedures under the WRA 2015 should be "re-categorised" under Article 37 of the Constitution, especially when the extent to which the administration of justice of the WRC can be characterised as "limited" under Article 37 has not been fully explored. Like Kingsmill Moore J., and McCarthy J., I think this raises the spectre of uncertainty.

The Order later proposed in this judgment

111. As will be seen later, I would hold that, for the purpose of doing justice in this case, what was in question was an administration of justice, where the appellant was entitled as of right to the full range of Re Haughey principles. I re-emphasise, without going further, that neither s.43 of the WRA 2015, nor any provision of that Act, provide that the decisions in issue in this case would be capable of an appeal on the merits by a court of law. The provisions governing appointment and determination of presiding officers are not sufficient to guarantee judicial independence.

An Article 37 Resolution of the Case: The text of Article 37: Limitations

112. I turn to a consideration of the limitations, as they are to be found in Article 37. I now consider the issue from a somewhat different standpoint than that set out in the Attorney General's submissions, to which I will return.

"Other than criminal matters …"

Core Functions

113. As touched on earlier, the concerns I have in relation to the application of Article 37 include, but are not limited to the fact that, in the range of the legal areas – whether they are deemed to be core functions of the courts or not – it might be possible to legislate so as to reclassify that area so that, by reason of legislative limitations "by law", be deemed "limited functions and powers of a judicial nature …, by any person or body of persons duly authorised by law to exercise such functions and powers notwithstanding that they are not judges …". (Emphasis added) With the exception of criminal law, Article 37 itself contains no specific limitations on what areas of law, whether fundamental rights or otherwise, might, potentially, be placed within its scope. This is so despite the "original intent" of Article 37 being very limited. Are there other reasons why the Court should not adopt an Article 37 resolution? I think there are, potentially. I offer a number of instances merely as illustrative of a more general concern.

Cowan v. Attorney General

114. In Cowan v. The Attorney General [1961] I.R. 411, (adverted to in the High Court judgment), the plaintiff was elected a member of Dublin City Council. Subsequently, his election was the subject of an election petition on the grounds that he was disqualified by law from seeking election. A practising barrister was elected on to an election court to try the petition. In an action by the plaintiff seeking, inter alia, a declaration that such assignment was unconstitutional, Haugh J. held in the High Court that the purported assignment of the election petition to be tried by the barrister was repugnant to, and ultra vires, the Constitution because (i) the election court might make findings which would affect the life, liberties, fortunes or reputations of individuals; and (ii) t*he election Court might exercise its jurisdiction in matters partly criminal*. As a consequence, the High Court held that the impugned sections of the various Acts that permitted a practising barrister be selected as an adjudicator in this case were repugnant to, and ultra vires, the Constitution. (In re Solicitors Act 1954 applied).

115. In the course of its judgment, Haugh J. held:

> "I am of opinion that the [election] court, availing of all the powers and duties conferred upon it in its ordinary day-to-day exercise of its powers and functions, is in fact not exercising the limited functions and powers allowable by Article 37, and is therefore unconstitutional." (p. 423.)

116. In so finding, the judge was adopting much of the phraseology used by Kingsmill Moore J. in Re Solicitors Act. However, more relevantly, Haugh J. then went on to observe:

> "Assuming for the purpose of my further observations, that the exercise of its powers is of a limited nature in the manner envisaged by Article 37, a further important question arises. Does that court exercise even part of its powers and functions in matters that are criminal*? From the pattern of the Acts as a whole it seems to me that the court's right to assume its criminal jurisdiction, at any time, should circumstances so warrant, is one that cannot be taken away from it without doing something that was contrary to the intention of Parliament. And it is beyond question that the court has power to try persons on matters that are criminal and to fine and imprison a person whom it convicts on a criminal charge. ..."* (Emphasis added, p. 423.)

117. Later, he said that he felt:

> "... compelled to hold that an election court, even if only exercising limited functions and powers of a judicial nature, must of necessity be ready at all times to exercise its powers in the criminal matters assigned to it - either of its own volition or at the request of the Attorney General - a function that is expressly prohibited by Article 37 of the Constitution. For these reasons I must hold that the election court when it sits to hear any matter is unconstitutional. …" (p. 424.)

118. In so finding, Haugh J. was persuaded by the arguments of Mr. T. J. Conolly, S.C., a pre-eminent advocate in the development of Irish constitutional law. The judgment was not appealed, as is pointed out in Kelly on the Constitution.

Enforcement

119. Again, for the purposes of this judgment, I go no further than to observe, as was pointed out earlier, that an AO is, under the WRA 2015, an official of the WRC. But it is the WRC which, having engaged in adjudication becomes also the prosecuting authority, for the purposes of a prosecution for the criminal offence of non-compliance with a District Court order. While the WRC may not be the decision-maker in this context, it is certainly granted by statute a deep engagement in a criminal matter. (See the passage from Lynham v. Butler, quoted earlier). Section 51, quoted earlier, provides that it shall be an offence for a person to fail to comply with an order under s.43, or s.45, directing an employer to pay compensation to an employee. Section 43 deals with the decision of an AO. Section 45 deals with a decision of the Labour Court.

120. This was not an argument advanced by the appellant, nor could it be, in his case. It is, however, are potential unforeseen potential consequence of categorisation of the functions of the WRC under Article 37. I make no comment on whether this Court would necessarily uphold the Cowan decision in its entirety. I confine myself to saying that it speaks to the inadvisability of a re-categorisation of the powers and functions of the WRC under Article 37, without due deliberation. The question, therefore, is twofold. When engaging in enforcement, would the WRC be engaged in "limited" functions? Would these functions be "criminal" matters? (c.f. Article 37).

121. I express this concern with caution. I do not say these considerations are definitive. There are authorities which might appear to be of contrary effect. (The State (Murray) v McRann [1979] IR 133; Gilligan v. Governor of Portlaoise Prison, 12th April, 2001, High Court, McKechnie J.; Keady; Goodman International v. Hamilton (No. 1) [1992] 2 I.R. 42). It may be said Cowan was distinguished in Keady. Similar concerns have arisen elsewhere in the case law, such as in Melling v. Ó Mathghamhna [1962] I.R. But I do think these observations show that a reasoning process based on re-categorisation is, itself, fraught with difficulty, and not consistent either with the spirit of either Article 34 or 37, or, to use the interpretive term expressio, the "expression" of a firm principle concerning the role of the judiciary contained in Article 34. I accept that other long-established bodies, fundamentally important to the State, have extensive powers involving adjudication and enforcement. In some cases, such enforcement powers have been held by the courts to be non-criminal in nature. (cf. McLoughlin v. Tuite [1986] I.R. 235). But, in fact, these would not come within the scope of the fifth limb of McDonald. These included those bodies described by the authors of the Constitution for the limited purposes described by those authors. A further illustration assists in the consideration of whether the process can now be seen as "limited".

"Limited Functions and powers …"

Minister for Justice v. WRC

122. The learned editors of Kelly comment that, hitherto the courts have understood the meaning of "limited" as meaning "modest or not far-reaching". But the editors also comment, perceptively, that the words leave much room for subjective interpretation, since there appears to be no objective criterion for any of these notions. (Chapter 6.4.101). Can it be said the powers of an AO are "modest", and not "far-reaching".

123. In the judgment of the CJEU in The Minister of Justice v. The Workplace Relations Commission (Case C-378/17), the Court of Justice, tasked with determining the direct effect of E.U. equality law in the context of a reference from the WRC, held that the primacy of E.U. law meant that national courts (within which category it included the WRC) must be under a duty to give full effect to the provisions of E.U. law even when in conflict with national law, and without requesting or awaiting the prior setting aside of that provision of national law by legislative or other constitutional means. The CJEU went on to say that it had repeatedly held that such a duty to dis-apply national legislation was binding on "all organs of the State, including administrative authorities called upon within the exercise of their respective powers to apply E.U. law" (para. 35 and 38). But the court also held that, insofar as the WRC must be considered as a court or tribunal, within the meaning of Article 267 TFEU, it could refer to the court questions of interpretation, or relevant provisions of E.U. law, be bound by the judgment of the court, and forthwith apply that judgment, dis-applying, if necessary, of its own motion, conflicting provisions of national legislation (para. 47). The court ruled that rules of national law, even constitutional provisions, cannot be allowed to undermine the unity and effectiveness of E.U. law. Thus, an AO would have the power to disapply national law. I contrast this with Article 34.3.2 of the Constitution, which, in terms, limits the jurisdiction to raise the question of validity of any law under the Constitution to the High Court, the Court of Appeal, or the Supreme Court, and precludes such issues being raised in courts, save those courts. Thus, such questions cannot be raised in courts of local and limited jurisdiction established under Article 34.3.4 of the Constitution. This surely speaks very strongly against any proposition that an AO can be operating "modest", or "limited" powers.

124. I acknowledge that such duties may arise from membership of the European Union, but I find it impossible to conclude that such an extensive power could be reconcilable with the provisions of Article 37 of the Constitution, which have hitherto been understood to be modest, and not far-reaching. I do not think it is a response to say that now other statutory bodies, many of which deal with new areas of law never part of the business of the courts, are under a similar duty. The question is, what do the words of Article 37 mean? The word "limited" must have a concrete application, and from the standpoint of the State and its People, must be capable of clear definition as an aspect of the rule of law which requires certainty.

The Text of Article 37

125. I accept that the WRA 2015 was intended with the intention of protecting rights of vulnerable employees. But that good aim cannot obscure the consequences which flowed from the attempt to achieve that aim. In summary, and at its heart, this case concerns a matter of constitutional interpretation. Article 34 of the Constitution expresses a fundamental principle in the clearest of terms. It is that "justice shall be administered in courts established by law by judges appointed in the manner provided in the Constitution …". The mandatory expression of that principle, reflected in the word "shall", is clearer still in the Irish version of the Constitution, which provides:

> "Is i gcúirteanna a bhunaítear le dlí agus ag breithiúna a cheaptar ar an modh atá leagtha amach sa Bhunreacht seo a riarfar ceart, …." (Emphasis added)

Literally translated, this is:

> "It is in courts established by law and to judges appointed in the manner set out in the Constitution that justice shall be administered ...". (Emphasis added)

This principle is an expression of a fundamental principle of the Constitution, in turn, referable to Article 6, which identifies the tripartite nature of the arms of government.

126. By contrast, Article 37 is, it is clear, a saver. It provides that:

> "Nothing in this Constitution shall operate to invalidate the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature, in matters other than criminal matters, by any person or body of persons duly authorised by law to exercise such functions and powers, notwithstanding that such person or such body of persons is not a judge or a court appointed or established as such under this Constitution."

127. The ambit of power and function, contained in Article 34, is not only clear, it is supported by the remainder of that Article, which sets out the structure and the constitutionally based jurisdictional limits of other courts established under the Constitution, and by law. In Kelly, it is suggested that Article 37 may have confused rather than clarified matters. (See The Irish Constitution, 6.4.7). Elsewhere, in Bennion, Statutory Interpretation, 4th Edition, it is suggested that saver clauses are an unsatisfactory guide, as they may throw doubt on which matters are intended to be preserved, but which are not mentioned in the saver. This concern is not, I think, confined to statutes.

128. The judgment of the majority (para. 106 et. seq.), concludes that, although Article 37 does not define either the area of administration of justice, or the "subset" covered by this saver, it is nonetheless clear that justice may be administered by bodies which are not courts, and by persons other than judges in non-criminal cases. However, such exercise must constitute the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature. I do not know how this conclusion can be reconciled with the words and intent of Article 34.

129. Earlier, this judgment quoted the passage from Kingsmill Moore J. in Re Solicitors Act 1954. The judge of the former Supreme Court was there engaged in an interpretation of Articles 34 and 37. The judgment identified what was contained in Article 34 as the expression (expressio) of principle, and Article 37 as the saver, or exception. This is not only consistent with the principle of constitutional interpretation, but also with the concept of a harmonious interpretation of the Constitution, whereby an interpretation of one Article should not do violence to an interpretation of another. The Constitution must be seen as a whole. It must look to the fundamental purpose of each provision. The "fundamental purpose" of Article 34, to use Henchy J.'s phrase in Tormey v. Ireland, is to give expression to the powers and functions of the third arm of government, that is, judiciary.

130. I believe that the judgments are ad idem, that s.43 WRA 2015 is inconsistent with Article 34 of the Constitution, as identified by the "McDonald/Keady" criteria. One question which might logically follow is whether it can be said that s.43 is repugnant to the Constitution, or whether, rather, it is saved by Article 37 of the Constitution, and is to be seen, in fact, as one of the limitations on the functions exercised under s.41?

131. I here pose some consequential questions which I find difficult to resolve. The first is whether s.43(1) and (2) are also repugnant to Article 37? If they are not, is the consequence that they become surplusage? If these provisions of s.43 are also repugnant to Article 37 of the Constitution, by reason of flawed and questionable procedures, what is the consequence to the procedure under s.41(5) or s.43, and s.51, seen together? Can s.43 be seen as a limitation on the powers set out in s.41(5) of the WRA 2015.

Consequences of an Article 37 Resolution of this case

132. I see further difficulty in the steps whereby it is said that the procedure can be located within Article 37. It is suggested that, whatever Article 37 permits, it must be capable of being the administration of justice, which means, at a minimum, a State sponsored decision-making function, capable of delivering a binding and enforceable decision. I am uncertain how that is reconcilable with s.41(5) and the intent behind s.43, given the flaws in the latter. The judgment of the majority holds that the background to Article 37 points to a broader understanding of the text, and that the exercise of the powers of the Land Commission and the Revenue Commissioners could be considered limited, then that suggests a significantly broader scope for the application of the Article. I am not persuaded that this is so. In fact, Article 37 was intended to be a constitutional exclusion clause. Such clauses are generally to be interpreted narrowly. The evidence from the authors of the Constitution shows nothing but the same intention. So, too, does the text in the first national language. Article 34.3 itself contains, either expressly or by clear implication, a series of limitations, which indicate the intent of the Constitution itself. The reservation of power contained in Article 34.3.2, regarding which courts may consider invalidity of laws, has been referred to. All these point to the conclusion that Article 37 should be given a narrow interpretation. An alternative analysis leads to areas of uncertainty in application, which are not consistent with the spirit of the Constitution, or the fundamental precepts of the rule of law, which include certainty. Whether decision-making bodies extant, or in the future, do, or do not, come within Article 37 will continue to have to be assessed on a case by case basis. The powers, including those implied by the Court of Justice in Case 378/17, and potentially vested in an AO are hard to reconcile with the concept of such persons exercising limited powers or functions. It appears to me that the logic of the reasoning goes too far: it is to disproportionately elevate the administration of justice under Article 37 into a position of near-equivalence to Article 34, which sets out the essence of the principle of where justice is to be administered – that is in courts established by the Constitution. As a matter of interpretation, the "exclusion", or saver, which is Article 37, almost itself becomes an expression of constitutional principle. Moreover, arguably, the saver becomes a different form of limitation, that is, on the right of claimants to have access to the administration of justice in the courts.

The Five Limitations Proposed

133. But, even if I am incorrect in my conclusions as to the potential scope of Article 37 of the Constitution, I think that there are other intractable issues based on any process of application of the approach adopted. It is said that the functions and powers of the WRC can be said to be limited by (a) subject matter; (b) limitations on awards; (c) enforceability; (d) a right of appeal to the Labour Court; and on point of appeal to the High Court; and (e) the fact that WRC may be subject to judicial review. But, again, I pose a question of interpretation.

134. Could these five limitations also be applied to the Circuit Court when it is carrying out an administration of justice under Article 34 of the Constitution? Where, then, is the distinction? In administering justice under Article 34, under its governing statutes, the Circuit Court is, also, subject to very similar limitations. But it cannot be suggested that, as a consequence, the powers and functions of the Circuit Court – in essence an administration of justice under the Constitution - might, in any given case, fall to be considered under Article 37 of the Constitution, rather than

Article 34. Where then does the dividing line lie? There must be a distinction made between form and substance. The five limitations identified are those of statutory form, rather than derived from the substance of constitutional administration of justice. My concern, therefore, is whether, at some future time, a legislature might assert this power of designation of limitations. Addressing each, I do not believe that "subject matter" can be a true constitutional limitation under Article 37. In any given law-case, a judge will, too, be limited by subject matter. Here, the limitation is that contained in the WRA 2015, as enacted by the Oireachtas. That limitation is one set not by the courts, but by the Oireachtas. The limitation of awards is, too, laid down by statute, where similar considerations arise. I turn then to enforceability. This must be seen in light of the uncertain constitutional status of s.43 of the Act. Yet, it is said that this constitutes a limitation for the purposes of s.41(5). But any objective standard, it cannot be seen as a limitation cognisable by law. Next, there is a "right of appeal to the Labour Court". The difficulty here is that, while there is such an appeal, it is not to a court of law, although a fuller range of fair procedures are provided for in the WRA 2015. But, further, such right of appeal is to a body appointed by the Minister, whose members do not enjoy the degree of independence which is guaranteed to the judiciary under the Constitution. Such absence of guarantees might, in individual cases, lead to a want of appreciation of what is required as true independence in decision-making. I include here the avoidance of actual or objective bias. Finally, there is said to be the existence of "judicial review". The fact that an AO, or the Labour Court, may be susceptible to judicial review is not, to my mind, a meaningful limitation. It also is applicable to any statutory administrative body exercising quasi judicial powers.

135. Taken together, I am concerned that the limitations, as described, do not set any objective boundary. Potentially, in some far future less benign scenario than the present, these might actually be utilised as a means of attempting to redefine or transgress the boundary between legislature and judiciary. Perhaps these concerns may be seen as hypothetical. But it is the duty of courts, especially this Court, to guard against a potentially non bona fide application of the law, as well as benign application. The obligation of this Court is to ensure that there remain checks, as well as balances. (Federalist Papers No. 78). The questions posed earlier in this judgment remain recurrent themes: by what yardstick or measure can an assessment be made as to whether a given area of law is, or is not, a core function of the courts, and who is to make such an assessment? Must that yardstick, in turn, be measured by reference to the fifth limb of McDonald? But then the concept of "core areas" begs a further question: whether, outside those core areas, there is to be "penumbra" of other non-defined core areas, which may, or may not, fall to be classified in one category or the other.

The Attorney General's Submissions Reconsidered

136. On the other side of the line are the Attorney General's concerns, which are no less important. By what objective criteria will it be possible, in any given future case, for the executive or legislature, acting entirely bona fide, to determine whether some future regulatory, or other body, with an adjudicatory function, is a limited administration of justice under Article 37. What rights will flow from such categorisation under that Article? When for some hypothetical statutory body is designated as having a limited judicial function, to what extent will fair procedures be required in any given situation, and if so, which entitlements of fair procedure? From what standpoint, will the question of limitations fall to be considered? As mediated by Keady, McDonald poses no obstacle to the operation of extant statutory bodies, sometimes with extensive powers and functions, operating in the public interest which were never part of the courts domain. There is much to be said for "leave well enough alone". Properly understood, McDonald does not stand in the way of accommodating competition or financial regulation, or the myriad of other important examples cited by the respondents, which are vital parts of the functioning of a modern state. Those statutory bodies deal with functions which were never part of the business of the courts historically. They are excluded from being an administration of justice by the fifth limb of McDonald. The limited intent of the authors of the Constitution is clear from the historical material referred to earlier.

137. I express these reservations in what I hope are polite and restrained language. Heightened judicial rhetoric is both unattractive, and counter-productive. But I would not like those constraints to conceal my very deep concern as to the process of classification applied here, from every standpoint. I am unable to see any basis within the Constitution which allows for an objective limitation on such a process of re-categorisation. As O'Dalaigh C.J. observed "The duty of the courts is not only to look to the present, but also the improbable future". On the most fundamental level, I conclude, a broad interpretation of Article 37, in the manner envisaged here, has the potential effect of hollowing out the essence or substance of Article 34. This cannot reflect a harmonious constitutional interpretation. It affects both the State in its concerns, and the citizens and others, who may have to seek recourse to the courts.

138. Perhaps I may be permitted to make further observations. In The Minister for Justice v. The Workplace Relations Commission, the equality case referred to earlier, Advocate General Wahl observed that in relation to equality legislation, not all disputes in particular those raising important issues of principle with broader legal importance, are best dealt with by such bodies [as the WRC]. (para. 87). He made this comment among many other valuable and perceptive observations, having pointed out that AOs, such as persons engaged in the process under discussion there, did not necessarily have legal qualification. He commented that bodies, such as the WRC, might be better placed than courts to provide low cost, speedy and effective solutions to conflicts of that nature (paras 87-88). But I think this comment also raises the question as to whether, in industrial relations law, as in equality law, there are areas which would be challenging, be it said, even for legally qualified persons, not to mind those not so qualified.

139. I turn then to a different question. Earlier this judgment noted that the WRC has not adopted any rules of procedure by statutory instrument. This, too, creates undesirable uncertainty, which arose in this case. Where significant issues are at stake, such as employment, parties are entitled to know, in advance, the rules of procedure to be applied prior to embarking on a hearing. This did not occur. This is not to say that the full range of fair procedures would be necessary in every case, but, in this one, they were necessary. In a case where there is a conflict of evidence, a person entrusted with making decisions or determinations which may affect someone's life, must make clear to the parties, from the outset, the scope of procedures which will apply in that given case. Such procedures are necessary for the administration of justice. Here, the full range of Re Haughey procedures should have applied.

140. Finally, I add observations as to the appellant's rights, even if it were to be held that the issue was not an administration of justice, but, rather, a quasi judicial administrative procedure. To my mind, the procedures were of such importance that the full range of Re Haughey rights would apply in cases of this type. Mr. Zalewski's personal rights under Article 43, including his right to a good name, are no less important to him, a worker, than to a doctor, or a solicitor. Thus, there should have been rules of procedure. There should have been a power to administer an oath. The importance of the issues required a right to cross-examine. Finally, in my view, he would be entitled to have a hearing in public. (Re Haughey [1971] I.R. 218; Kiely v. Minister for Social Welfare [1977] I.R.; Glover v. BLN [1973] I.R. 388).

Section VIII

Conclusion

143. In view of my conclusion that the procedures, as provided for at present by the WRA 2015, in fact, should be seen as an administration of justice, I would have set aside Simons J.'s findings on the four procedural requirements which he deemed did not arise for resolution. I would hold that each such requirement should have applied, even were the proceedings not an administration of justice, I would hold that the appellant's personal rights required the same entitlements should have been available to him.

144. This is a difficult constitutional issue. But, throughout our constitutional history, the process of judicial reasoning has operated as a form of self-righting mechanism, where the logic or consequence of each decision is later reviewed and scrutinised on the basis of new perceptions, different circumstances, and accretion of experience. Thus, mis-steps are remedied. In this case, the Court is of one mind that the procedure in question did constitute an administration of justice, contrary to Article 34 of the Constitution. That decision is based on the application of settled principles. I would hold that, by that logic, and the application of those long-settled principles, the consequent orders should necessarily be to declare the procedures in question under the WRA 2015, as repugnant to the Constitution of 1937.

Notice Party

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice William M. McKechnie delivered on the 6th day of April, 2021

1. There are three issues of law which arise out of the background to these proceedings: firstly, whether the adjudication process provided for in the Workplace Relations Act 2015, insofar as it applies to determine the underlying claim of the appellant, constitutes the 'administration of justice' within the meaning of Article 34 of the Constitution, secondly, if it does, whether such process can successfully seek the protection of Article 37, and in either event was that process, by its actual application to the appellant and his complaint, conducted in violation of Article 40.3.1 and Article 40.3.2 of the Constitution. At a very much secondary level, the European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003, ("the 2003 Act") was also invoked.

2. Mr. Zalewski was employed by the notice party, which operated a convenience store under the franchise "Costcutter" at North Strand, Dublin, between 2012 and 2016. He went from being a security guard, to being a supervisor and later was appointed to the position of assistant manager in the store. Unfortunately, shoplifting was not uncommon, but a more serious incident occurred in October, 2014 when the shop was robbed with a gun being discharged. He commenced personal injury proceedings against his employer arising out of this incident. In April, 2016 he was reprimanded by the manager who alleged that he should have been more involved when on some occasion a known shoplifter was on the premises. A short period of sick leave followed. Subsequently, the owner's son and the manager apologised to him for the latter's conduct at such meeting. Upon returning to work his performance as assistant manager was seriously questioned, both in terms of the security of the shop and also for arranging medical and legal advice for other staff members arising out of this robbery. In addition, he was accused of having used monies from the till, in effect an allegation of dishonesty, all of which were said by the employer to constitute gross misconduct for which he was summarily dismissed. His only right of appeal, which he unsuccessfully utilised, was to the shop owner himself. The only clarification arising from that appeal was that no accusation of theft was being made against him. Otherwise, the dismissal and its summary nature was to stand.

3. The appellant then instituted a claim for unfair dismissal under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (as amended), and the Payment of Wages Act 1991 (as amended). The application made, pursuant to the Workplace Relations Act 2015, was assigned by the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission ("the WRC"), established under the Act, to an Adjudication Officer, the first named respondent, who on 26th October, 2016, held a very brief meeting at which the parties were present and/or represented. This lasted for no more than a few minutes, ten at most, at which point both parties believed that the matter had been adjourned: whilst there is some difference of understanding as to the reasons why this occurred, nothing turns on this. The real point is that neither party ever understood that the case had been in any way concluded at that stage: in fact, the contrary was their specific impression. What then followed was seriously problematic.

4. By letter dated 1st November, Mr. Zalewski was notified that the further hearing date would be the 13th December. However, on attending, with his solicitor, at the designated place and time, they were informed by the employer's representative and immediately thereafter by the adjudication officer in person that she had already reached a decision on the dispute and that the letter had issued in error. In a document dated and published some three days later, a four-page written decision issued which on its face contained findings purportedly based on evidence and submissions: in fact it read as if a full hearing had taken place. Evidently, given the brevity and cursory nature of the only meeting previously held, this description was seriously mystifying. At the most basic level, such matters demonstrated several major deficits in the process adopted and at a general level are said by the appellant to reflect a structural and systemic failure in the operations of the adjudication process. These events, and this point in particular, will be further explored in that part of the judgment dealing with the fair procedures argument.

5. The within judicial review proceedings then followed in which an order of certiorari was sought in respect of the adjudication officer's decision and also in which a challenge was made on both constitutional and convention grounds. The former claim was advanced on two bases, firstly, that the powers conferred by various provisions of the 2015 Act as well as s. 8 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (as amended), constituted the administration of justice within the meaning of Article 34 of the Constitution, and were not saved by the provisions of Article 37, and secondly, and in any event, that the actual procedures adopted by the adjudication officer violated certain specified rights of the appellant under Article 40.3.1 and 40.3.2 of the Constitution. The Convention claim sought a declaration pursuant to s. 5 of the 2003 Act, that the same statutory provisions were incompatible with Articles 6 and/or 13 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

6. The quashing of the decision was not and could not, have been contested, but the constitutional argument was vigorously resisted at all levels. One such involved the State issuing a motion seeking to have that claim dismissed on the basis that since the adjudication was quashed, all other matters were moot or were otherwise of such a nature that should not be entertained by the court. In effect, this was treated by Meenan J. as a locus standi objection, with the learned judge holding that it could not be assumed that any rehearing of the complaints would suffer from the same constitutional infirmities as the original hearing had: on that basis, Mr. Zalewski was not "in real or imminent danger of being adversely affected, by the operation of the statute" ([2018] IEHC 59). On appeal this Court, when reversing that decision, identified the key constitutional issue as being a challenge to the statutory scheme as such and not as to what an adjudication officer might or might not do in any individual case under that scheme. In effect, the appellant's submission was that he should not be forced to have his claim determined by a regime which he argued violated Articles 34 and 37 of the Constitution. Accordingly, all issues came on for hearing and were determined in a judgment delivered by Simons J. on the 21st day of April, 2020 [2020] IEHC 178.

7. Given the concession made which necessarily and obviously had to be done, Meenan J. described the explanation offered by the adjudication officer/WRC for what had occurred, an administrative error, as being "unacceptable" and "lacking credibility": the trial judge himself described it as "bizarre". Both would have been entirely justified in expressing in much stronger terms his rejection of that explanation which was unbefitting from any decision making board. Unfortunately, even if it were possible to do so, the explanation offered was not improved upon in the appeal before us, but rather was simply reiterated.

I entirely concur.

8. After considering, inter alia, the constitutional challenge, which by court direction was confined, in argument, to the 1977 and 1991 Acts (locus standi, para. 97 infra) and having reviewed the authorities, Simons J. dismissed all complaints as made. On the Article 34 issue, he was satisfied to apply McDonald v. Bord Na gCon [1965] I.R. 217 "McDonald". Of the five features outlined by Kenny J., and said to constitute the administration of justice, both parties agreed that numbers (i) to (iii) were satisfied with some dispute on points (iv) and (v). The learned judge rejected the State's submission that requirement No. (v) had not been satisfied, and also rejected the appellant's claim that requirement no. (iv) had been satisfied.

9. On the former, he held that employment disputes have traditionally been regarded as justiciable, and were characteristic of the type of orders made by courts, for decades if not centuries, under their common law jurisdiction: comparing unfair dismissal with wrongful dismissal and a claim for payment in lieu of notice with a breach of contract claim. On the latter however, given the fact that the enforcement of any order made by an adjudication officer or the Labour Court on appeal, would have to involve the District Court, and that on the hearing thereof such court could modify the ultimate form of redress, the trial judge felt that such were "irreconcilable with a finding that the two statutory bodies are carrying out the administration of justice". (para. 82). Although reaching that conclusion with "some hesitation", (para. 77) nonetheless the result was that the claim was dismissed. Having so concluded, he found it unnecessary to consider the arguments made in relation to Article 37 of the Constitution.

10. The learned judge then considered each limb of the argument advanced in support of the submission that the procedures of the 2015 Act are entirely insufficient to meet the requirements of, and therefore are inconsistent with, Article 40.3 of the Constitution. These related to the fact (i) that an adjudication officer did not have to have a legal qualification, (ii) that there was no provision enabling such officer to administer the oath or affirmation, (iii) that likewise there was no express provision for the cross examination of witnesses and finally, (iv) that all hearings before such an officer are held otherwise than in public. For the reasons outlined in his judgment, he rejected each aspect of this submission.

11. On an application for leave, the Supreme Court permitted a direct appeal on all of the grounds advanced by the appellant, and also permitted the State's cross appeal with regard to the judge's finding on requirement No. (v) of the McDonald test. ([2020] IESCDET 93). It is those issues which I now turn to.

Constitutional Provisions (1937):

12. The following Articles of the Constitution insofar as relevant read as follows:-

(i) Article 6:

"6.1 All powers of government, legislative, executive and judicial, derive, under God, from the people, whose right it is to designate the rulers of the State and, in final appeal, to decide all questions of national policy, according to requirements of the common good.

6.2 These powers of government are exercisable only by or on the authority of the Organs of State established by the Constitution."

(ii) Article 34 :-

"1. Justice shall be administered in courts established by law by judges appointed in the manner provided by this Constitution, and, save in such special and limited cases as may be prescribed by law, shall be administered in public.

2. The court shall comprise:

(i) Courts of First Instance;
(ii) A Court of Appeal; and
(iii) A Court of Final Appeal

3.1° The Courts of First Instance shall include a High Court invested with full original jurisdiction in and power to determine all matters and questions whether of law or fact, civil or criminal.

4° The Courts of First Instance shall also include courts of local and limited jurisdiction with a right of appeal as determined by law."

(iii) Article 37:

"37.1 Nothing in this constitution shall operate to invalidate the exercise of limited functions and powers of a judicial nature, in matters other than criminal matters, by any person or body of persons duly authorised by law to exercise such functions and powers, notwithstanding that such person or such body of persons is not a judge or a court appointed or established as such under this Constitution.

Constitutional Provisions (1922):

13. The provisions of the 1922 Constitution corresponding to those above quoted, are as follows:

(i) Article 2:

"2. All powers of government and all authority, legislative, executive and judicial, in Ireland are derived from the people of Ireland, and the same shall be exercised in the Irish Free State (Saorstát Eireann) through the organisations established by or under, and in accord with, this Constitution".

(ii) Article 64:

"64. The judicial power of the Irish Free State (Saorstát Eireann) shall be exercised and justice administered in the public courts established by the Oireachtas by judges appointed in manner hereinafter provided. These courts shall comprise Courts of First Instance and a Court of Final Appeal to be called the Supreme Court. The Courts of First Instance shall include a High Court invested with full original jurisdiction in and power to determine all matters and questions whether of law or fact, civil or criminal, and also courts of local and limited jurisdiction, with a right of appeal as determined by law."

There is no provision akin to that of Article 37.

Separation of Powers – Brief History

14. The concept and notion of a constitutional tripartite separation of powers is to be found in the inspiring and enlightening writings of Blackstone, where such a proposition was enunciated with both clarity and foresight more than 250 years ago (Commentaries on the Law of England: Vol. 1, p. 267: 1769: Dublin Ed.). Whether it was he or others (Montesquieu: Esprit des Lois (1748)), who were the original thought inspiring individuals behind this framework, matters now of historical importance only: whoever, it has found widespread acclaim and approbation ever since, as evidenced by its adoption in multiple constitutional systems.

15. Under our constitutional system, that structure was given effect to by creating the legislative, the executive and the judicial. Post 1922 and after some transitional and temporary measures, the legislative power of the Irish Free State was established, inter alia, by the Electoral Act 1923, the executive power by the Ministers and Secretaries Act 1924, and the judicial system and courts administration by the Courts of Justice Act 1924, and the Court Officers Act 1926, respectively, all as amended, with the judicial power operating under the overall guidance of Article 64. That Article, which was not dissimilar to the third Article of the US Constitution, together with Article 2, were designed to ensure that each organ of government did not impermissibly encroach on the other, with the ultimate authority to determine any asserted trespass resting on the judiciary.

16. Under both Article 2 of the 1922 Constitution and Article 6(1) and (2) of the 1937 Constitution, provision was made for the judicial power of government to be exercised only by the organ of the State designated in the Constitution for that purpose, namely the Courts as staffed by judges duly appointed in accordance with law. This is a fundamental attribute of the sovereignty of the State and the constitutional formation adopted by its people. Therefore, justice, its administration and its administration by such judges, is a red line constitutional imperative. Any relaxation of this intrinsic principle, which must be found within the Constitution itself, is by way of a derogation from this norm. One such is that as provided for in Article 37, which as stated, had no equivalent in the State's first Constitution.

17. That Article by its terms permits non-judicial bodies in matters other than criminal, to exercise limited functions and powers of a judicial nature. There is therefore an inextricable link and relationship between both Article 34 and Article 37. The appropriate delineation between one from the other may well involve a consideration of both. At least this will be so, in some circumstances: in others not necessarily the case, as for example where in the first instance the activities under scrutiny are found not to constitute the administration of justice. Where however uncertainty might exist, an examination of the parameters of each may be required. When so doing, I am not at all certain that it is either possible or desirable that factors, which may be considered more appropriate to one provision, should be excluded from the assessment of the other, i.e. the dicta of Kingsmill Moore J. on Article 37 (para. 34 infra). In any event, when the landscape is looked at, questions arise as to what is the correct meaning of 'justice' in Article 34, which sometimes is referred to as the 'administration of justice', or the 'judicial function' or the 'judicial power', with the corresponding questions under Article 37 being what is understood by the words "functions and powers", and particularly what meaning is to be ascribed to the word "limited", which qualifies, in a qualitative sense, that phrase. Where statutory provisions are correctly classified as "limited", their exercise, even by non-judicial persons, will attract the cover of that constitutional provision.

18. The mere recitation of the relevant provisions of these Articles will not to any appreciable extent enlighten this exercise of differentiation, nor will such a similar undertaking relative to other Constitutions necessarily help in this regard, (e.g. the third Article of the US Federal Constitution and s. 71 of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act 1990). One must therefore look at the relevant authorities, which discussed these issues particularly where their resolution was necessary in any given situation. In mentioning case law, I am not of course ignoring the academic literature, but surprisingly enough whilst a good deal has been written about the individual components of Article 34, little enough has appeared with regard to Article 37.

19. The foremost authority in this area under the 1922 Constitution is undoubtedly Lynham v. Butler (No.2) [1933] I.R. 74 ("Lynham v. Butler (No.2)"), which shows a fascinating history of why litigation should be avoided if at all possible: on several occasions such was beyond the grasp of both Francis Lynham and the Reverend Dr. Butler. That history however, falls just short of the inventiveness with which the government dealt with Mr. Lynham's appeal to the Privy Council in 1925 against the Supreme Court's dismissal of his appeal in what are known as the "Ejectment Proceedings" case ([1925] 2 I.R. 82 (H.C.): [1925] 2 I.R. 231 (S.C.)): such occurring at a crucial time in the State's ongoing separation from the United Kingdom (Dáil Debates, 3rd February: Seanad Debates, 24th February and House of Lords Debates 3rd March, 1926). Moreover, the acceptance of the appeal by the Judicial Committee, which had earlier rejected each of the three applications previously made, was all the more surprising in view of the well declared Irish insistence on how restrictive that possibility should be: in fact, Article 66 has been described by some, as being for the government, the "most obnoxious feature of the [1922] Constitution" (Kohn – the Constitution of the Irish Free State p. 335/356).

20. After what can only be described as a markedly hostile engagement between the parties, ferocious and relentless at times, over the ownership of the subject lands, Mr. Lynham sought the sum of £1,635, either as mesne profits or damages for the defendant's unlawful occupation of the lands from August, 1924 to April, 1928. The claim was resisted on multiple grounds, the only one of interest to us was whether the Lay Commissioners in arriving at a particular decision were engaged in the exercise of judicial power under Article 64 of the Constitution: if so, for a variety of reasons the claim could not succeed with follow on consequences for the ownership of the lands. This very brief description of the background does not do justice to the intricacies of the encounter: for those interested, such details are fully set out in the judgment delivered by Kennedy C.J. In any event, the net point of interest was whether or not Article 64 was violated.

21. What can be seen from his judgment, is that the Chief Justice identified the following features as being inherent in the administration of justice.

- The existence on the civil side of a recognised legal dispute between parties, involving rights or liabilities and on the criminal side the issue of guilt or innocence and where appropriate, the imposition of penalty: it involved further, on the civil side,
- The making of a decision on such disputes,
- The determination in final manner of those disputes, and
- The enforcement of the resulting court order backed where necessary by executive support.

The oft quoted passage upon which this summary is based, appears at pp. 99/100 of the report.

22. In applying the principles outlined to the situation at hand, the conclusion reached was as follows:-

> "In my opinion, the Land Commissioners are; like the Estates Commissioners, primarily an administrative body with a great variety of ministerial duties to perform. Their duties are too numerous and too diverse to permit of an exhaustive examination > on a single occasion so as to put one in a position to affirm that the statutes have not purported to impose on them any duty of other than ministerial character. The nature of some of their ministerial duties requires that they be performed judicially, in the sense that they must be performed with fairness and impartiality in such a way as not to offend against the cannons of natural justice, which requirement however will not convert a ministerial act into a judicial act in the sense of an act which must be performed by a judge in a court of justice." (104/105 of the report)

Concurring judgments were delivered by both Fitzgibbon J. and Johnston J., to which further reference will be made at a point where I will endeavour to explain the rationale behind the court's general approach to, and assessment of, the powers so exercisable by the Land Commission.

23. Leaving aside the inter partes dispute for a moment, what is immediately apparent is that, Lynham v. Butler (No.2) in particular, but also some other cases have contributed significantly to the discussion on the administration of justice and provided a distinguished transitional platform for the subsequent decisions in both Re Solicitors Act, 1954 [1960] I.R. 239 and in McDonald. That single judgment of the Chief Justice contributed no less than four of the five characteristics, each of which is immediately recognisable, in McDonald v. An Bord na gCon [1965] I.R. 217 ("McDonald"). Although not mentioned by the Chief Justice, Palles C.B. in an earlier case had also highlighted as an aspect of the judicial power, the making of a final determination affecting rights or liabilities: the full quotation and the context in which the point is made can be found in the report: (R (Wexford County Council) v. Local Government Board [1902] 2 I.R. 349 at 373/374).

24. As stated earlier in this judgment, the substance of Article 37 had no comparable expression in our constitutional model before then, and so little insight as to its meaning can be deduced from the case law during the earlier period. However, as there is an obvious association between that provision and Article 34 and as both feature in most of the decisions which are about to be discussed, it would be appropriate at this juncture to briefly consider the history of the provision, and against that background consider thereafter the relevant authorities.

Article 37 - General History

25. Although it is entirely unsurprising that a new provision, like Article 37.1, reflecting the ongoing birth and growth of this nation, even if still in its infancy, was included in the Constitution, it is perhaps notable that in the core and central areas of justice, judicial power and the administration of both, this measure by its plain wording makes permissible the exercise, by non-judges, of limited judicial functions and powers (excepting criminal matters), something not contemplated or envisaged by the laws of the Irish Free State. This, in contrast with Article 34 which had a very strong forbearer in Article 64 of the 1922

Constitution. Therefore, Article 37.1 has a different antiquity to its more core sister provision and accordingly, falls to be considered as such. Without in any way attempting to ascertain the definitive intentions or motives of those involved, there are some nuggets in the public domain which can be gleaned about the history and purpose behind that provision.

26. Documentation from the first two meetings of the Constitutional Review Committee (1934) shows that it seriously considered the drafting of an entirely new Constitution, rather than simply confining its remit to an examination of the existing text. Soon however, this was seen as too mammoth a task, and although that ambition was curtailed, nonetheless its recommendations were to become highly influential in the drafting of the 1937 Constitution. This is evident by the fact that many of its innovatory features, including Article 37, can be traced back to it. Its final report was given to Mr. de Valera, then Taoiseach, on the 3rd July, 1934. Of the four Committee members; Stephen Roche, a secretary in the Department of Justice; Michael McDunphy, assistant secretary in the Department of the President of the Executive Council; John Hearne, legal adviser in the Department of External Affairs and Philip O'Donoghue, assistant to the Attorney General; the three last mentioned all went on to play a significant role in the preparation of the 1937 Constitution, which was a clear indicator of the significance of their work.

27. Article 64 was, unsurprisingly, identified by the Committee, as one of the Constitution's fundamental provisions. This was subject, however, to a textual amendment being made which would reflect, according to the Committee "the present position in which judicial or quasi-judicial functions are necessarily performed by persons who are not judges within the strict terms of the Constitution, e.g. Revenue Commissioners, Land Commissioners, Court Registrars etc.". Stephen Roche drew up what the amendment might look like: it began as follows:-

> "Provided for the removal of doubts and for the more expeditious and economical administration of justice and transaction of business, that nothing in this Article shall be deemed to render invalid any enactment, or any role, order or arrangement made under the authority of any enactment…" (G. Hogan, 'The Constitution Review Committee of 1934', Ireland in the Coming Times: essays to celebrate T.K. Whitaker's 80 years, p. 354 - 355)

As Hogan observes, this draft was clearly anticipatory of what became Article 37.1.

28. Later, as work on this continued, two members of the House (Mr. John A. Costello and Mr. Patrick McGilligan), suggested that in its entirety this proposal should be abandoned. This prompted Mr. O'Donoghue to write to the Office of the Attorney General (Patrick Lynch K.C.) expressing, his deep concern at this turn of events, his defence of the proposal and, most interestingly, articulating the reasons he believed it should remain. In a memorandum written on the 26th May, 1937, he explained that the provision was "designed to avoid the difficulties and litigation which were experienced in the past when the exercise of powers of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature was challenged in the Courts on the grounds that these were matters reserved for the Courts" (G. Hogan, 'The Origins of the Irish Constitution 1928-1941' p. 580). Only with the benefit of hindsight can we now observe that whatever other effects the provision may have had, litigation of the nature described, was perhaps not avoided to the extent that Mr. O'Donoghue may have been hoping for. In a further memo, two days later, he stated that the suggested deletion would deprive certain bodies of their functions and would be extremely dangerous: he mentioned a cohort of such bodies, including County Registrars and the numerous Court of Referees, Appeal Committees and Appeal Tribunals operating under legislation such as the Unemployment Insurance Acts, National Health Insurance Acts, Old Age Pension Acts. Practical matters regarding the everyday running of the State appear to have been at the forefront of his concern.

29. Thus, to some extent, it seems that the intention behind Article 37.1 was relatively straightforward and borne out of pragmatism. Both before and after 1922, many bodies existed, authorised by statute, to make decisions on facts and after argument was had, which could affect the rights and liabilities of people: not altogether different in one respect from court intervention. Although the practice met some resistance, the same largely went unchallenged until the 1930 proceedings, which resulted in Lynham v Butler (No 2) [1933] I.R. 74. As indicated elsewhere, it was of particular significance that the subject matter of the case was the Land Commission. Indeed, when addressing the Dáil on the 2nd June, 1937 (Dáil Debates), Mr. de Valera is quoted as saying:-

> "There were questions about the Land Commission, as to whether their functions were of a judicial character or not ... So as not to get tied in the knot that judicial powers or functions could only be exercised by the ordinary courts established here, you have to have a provision of this type."

It is against this backdrop that the insertion of Art. 37.1 should be viewed.

30. However interesting this brief look at history is, it cannot determine the meaning of the provision in a constitutional sense. As J. P. Casey cautioned, to know the broad purpose of the Article "does not carry one very far". (Casey, 'The Judicial Power under Irish Constitutional Law' ILCQ (1975) 24(2) p. 304, 308). This has to be a matter for the judicial arm of government.

Case Law:

31. The leading authority on the non-Land Commission side which firstly considered in depth the provisions of both Article 34 and 37 of the Constitution was the case of In the Matter of Solicitors Act 1954: O'Farrell & Gorman [1960] I.R. 239 ("O'Farrell & Gorman"). In that case the Disciplinary Committee of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, set up by s. 13 of the Solicitors Act 1954 ("the 1954 Act"), had the powers, after inquiry and having found established misconduct, to suspend a solicitor from practice, to order that his name be removed from the Roll, to compel the making of restitution or satisfaction to any aggrieved party, to make an order for costs against him (all within s. 18), and to order that the findings be published in Iris Oifigiúil, three daily newspapers and, as is their right, in the Society's Gazette (s. 21(2) of the 1954 Act). In respect of both Mr. O'Farrell and Mr. Gorman, the Committee duly exercised these powers save that relating to restitution and satisfaction: such giving rise to the constitutional challenge which was asserted on their behalf. The issue was whether or not the conferring and the use of those powers constituted an exercise of judicial power and if so, whether such could avail of the provisions of Article 37. The single judgment of the Supreme Court was that of Kingsmill Moore J.

32. The learned judge made it clear that a tribunal or body which operates by contractual consensus were not those under discussion: their powers are not statutorily based or derived, and existed solely in respect of those who have agreed to be bound by whatever rules and regulations govern the particular organisation which they have joined. Clubs, Trade Unions and some professional bodies are examples. Rather, it was those Associations which rely upon the state or the legislature for their efficacy which were in issue. (p. 264)

33. Having quoted extensively and with obvious approval from Lynham v. Butler (No.2), Fisher v. Irish Land Commission [1948] I.R. 3*, the State (Crowley) v. Irish Land Commission* [1951] 1 I.R. 250*,* and Foley v. Irish Land Commission [1952] I.R. 118, the learned judge then conducted a survey of some Australian cases: in particular, Huddart, Parker & Company v. Moorehead, [1909] 8 CLR 330, the Waterside Workers case [1918] 25 C.L.R. 434, and Shell Company of Australia v. Federal Commissioners of Taxation [1931] A.C. 276, observing in the process that in reality such cases were more helpful in identifying what was not the administration of justice, rather than what was. In any event, from the resulting exercise, one can discern some aspects, but not all, of what is now regarded, or at least up to the present case has been regarded, as the administration of justice.

34. The conclusion reached from this survey was that a precise and exhaustive definition of the concepts involved were extremely difficult if not impossible to achieve. This because of the variety of powers and functions, either singularly or collectively, which a legislature can entrust to various bodies which are not courts in a constitutional sense, with such powers and functions to be exercised by persons who are not judges, also in that sense (271). Therefore, one must look at each entity and the particular powers under scrutiny, so that a decision can be made, having regard to the observations outlined in the case law. Such led to the following statement:-

> "Eventually the question whether any particular tribunal is unconstitutional must depend on whether the congeries of the powers and functions conferred on the tribunal or any particular power or function is such as to involve the pronouncement of decisions, the making of orders, and the doing of acts, which on the true intendment of the Constitution are reserved to judges as being properly regarded as part of the administration of justice and not of the limited character validated by Article 37" (p. 264).

35. The learned judge endeavoured to put some descriptive terms on Article 37. Having rhetorically asked what was the meaning of the word "limited", he immediately discounted any association with the jurisdiction of the courts, as in his view the concept of "limited jurisdiction" was covered by Article 34.3.4 of the Constitution. Secondly, it was the "powers and functions" which must be limited and not either the scope of their exercise, or the number of such powers statutorily conferred. If any of those were intended to govern the phrases, the Constitution would have said so.

> "A tribunal having but a few powers and functions but those of far reaching effect and importance could not properly be regarded as exercising "limited" powers and functions. The judicial power of the state is by Article 34 of the Constitution lodged in the courts, and the provisions of Article 37 do not admit of that power being trenched upon, or of its being withdrawn piecemeal from the courts. The test as to whether a power is or is not "limited" in the opinion of the court, lies in the effect of the assigned power when exercised. If the exercise of the assigned powers and functions is calculated ordinarily to effect in the most profound and far reaching way the lives, liberties, fortunes or reputations of those against whom they are exercised they cannot properly be described as "limited"." (263 – 264)

37. Turning to the provisions of the 1954 Act, the learned judge also noted the existence of the procedural powers vested in the Committee which in respect of the following, were the same as if it was the High Court or a judge thereof: namely, the attendance of witnesses, the giving and testing of evidence on oath, the production of documents and the taking of evidence on commission. Further, whatever might constitute a court contempt could equally constitute a Committee contempt, which if so found could be certified to the High Court for further inquiry. (s. 19 of the 1954 Act).

38. In addition to his general views on both Article 34 and 37, it is necessary to also bear in mind three further observations which he made by reference to the powers which the Disciplinary Committee had. Firstly, he was satisfied that the power to strike off was "disciplinary" and "punitive" in nature and that a sanction of such severity may have more consequences for an individual than a term of imprisonment. It mattered not in his view that the conduct alleged was not strictly that of a 'criminal matter', because in light of the repercussions which arose, the adjudication on such conduct demanded qualities of impartiality, independence and expertise which are required of the holder of a judicial office. Secondly, whilst noting that the power to make a restitution or satisfaction order would only arise if misconduct had been established, nonetheless, such misconduct could include fraud or negligence which, may well involve contentious and difficult questions, and which if before a court of law, damages by way of restitutio in integrum could easily follow. In that respect, the power of the Committee would be no different from the court. And thirdly, he placed considerable reliance on the role which historically the court played in striking the name of a solicitor off the Roll: such stemmed from its ultimate superintendence over and its overarching authority to ensure a practitioner's utmost propriety.

39. Given therefore the object of the powers, the functions vested in the Committee, the nature and extent of the inquiry involved, and the adjudicative role demanded, as well as the punitive, restitution and historical aspects last mentioned, it was the court's opinion that such were unconstitutional "…both because the infliction of such a severe penalty on a citizen is a matter which calls for the exercise of the judicial power of the state and because to entrust such a power to persons other than judges is to interfere with the necessities of the proper administration of judges". (275). Neither this reasoning or the underlying issues involved, were seriously addressed in the further solicitor's case decided a few months later. (In the Matter of the Solicitors Act 1954: D.A. Solicitor: [1961] 95 ILTR 60).

40. The importance of this judgment does not simply rest on the court's confirmation that the features identified in Lynham v. Butler (No.2) (para. 21 above) are appropriate to the administration of justice, but also in its assessment of Article 37 (para. 125 of this judgment). In the period since its delivery, much discussion has taken place regarding certain aspects of it. However, surely what was said about criminal matters as such cannot be faulted: perhaps the creation of an offshoot by treating the Committee's power as quasi-criminal (para. 38 above), could be up for discussion, whilst undoubtedly the court's treatment of how the functions and powers are "limited" as well as the far reaching effect test have been the subject of much attention.

The Follow-on Regime:

41. The Oireachtas moved swiftly to deal with the infirmity identified in O'Farrell and Gorman. Section 5 of the Solicitors (Amendment) Act 1960, repealed ss. 13, 14(1) and (2) and 15-23 inclusive (thus repealing the impugned sections, see para. 31 above) and by virtue of s. 7(3)(a) and (b) of the 1960 Act put a new procedure in place whereby the Disciplinary Committee had to embody its findings and the recommendation as to sanction, in a report and based thereon make an application to the High Court, which had the power to make a variety of orders, including one striking the solicitor's name off the Roll (s. 8(1)(a)(i) of the 1960 Act). Ultimately, that statutory mechanism was held to satisfy the fault line identified by Kingsmill Moore J., but not without some initial challenge, arising mostly within the professions.

42. In a doctor's case arising under the Medical Practitioners Act 1978, Finlay P., as then, had no difficulty in distinguishing the regime in existence under the 1954 Act with that provided for in ss. 45 – 48 of the 1978 Act, under which the Medical Council had to seek High Court approval to suspend a doctor, remove his name from the register or attach conditions to his practising certificate. As such, the Council's role could not be said to constitute the administration of justice. In respect of its powers to advise, admonish or censure, or to publish a finding of misconduct or unfitness: if it could be said that these were final in any respect, then such were, in the court's view, clearly limited in their effect and consequence, and accordingly were covered by Article 37. From the reference last made, it is apparent that O'Farrell & Gorman was both applied and approved (M. v The Medical Council [1984] I.R. 485).

43. Several subsequent pieces of legislation such as the Dentists Act 1985 and the Veterinary Surgeons Act 1960, both as amended, implemented that procedure which prevented the underlying process from any constitutional frailty which might otherwise have resulted from O'Farrell & Gorman. In respect of provisions, identical to those relating to dentists, the Supreme Court in C.K. v. Bord Altranais [1990] 2 I.R. 396, when dealing with the Nurses Act 1985, and having affirmed the correctness of M. v. The Medical Council and the related decision of In Re M. (a Doctor) [1984] I.R. 479, confirmed the validity of this approach and pointed out that "the necessity for that procedure to vest that power unequivocally in the court, in my view, arises from the constitutional frailty which would attach to the delegation of any such power to a body which was not a court established under the Constitution, having regard to the decision of the former Supreme Court in Re the Solicitors Act [1960] I.R. 239". Such a legislative step was therefore entirely justified with Finlay C.J. expressing the view that "…it is the court who should make the vital decisions" (403).

McDonald v. Bord na gCon* [1965] I.R. 217 *("McDonald"):

44. McDonald was the first real case in which a definitive overall description of the 'administration of justice' was outlined. As is apparent however, it was not of course the first case to discuss the subject: many previously had joined the debate, an example of which is the judgment of Davitt P. (the State (Shanahan) v. the Attorney General [1964] I.R. 239 ("Shanahan"). The fact that the learned President included in the four points mentioned by him the right to compel the attendance of witnesses or parties, (not referenced in McDonald), but did not mention the historical aspect of the judgment of Kenny J., does not render both decisions inconsistent: rather, as with many other judgments, the observations made were intended as a further contribution. It seems to me that the observations of the President in Shanahan were intended as an addition in this area and not as some sort of rigid or strict definition of the administration of justice.

45. In any event, the facts in McDonald, whilst important of course to the decision in both courts, are not altogether crucial to the point of principle as in the days before Cahill v. Sutton [1980] I.R. 269 ("Cahill"), very few standing restrictions applied to a legislative constitutional challenge: it was therefore the scope of the overall statutory provisions which was under review. In any event, the case involved the making of an exclusion order by Bord na gCon ("the Board"), pursuant to the exercise of its statutory powers, with the consent of the Irish Coursing Club ("the Club"), both of which were established by the Greyhound Industry Act 1958 ("the 1958 Act"), whose fundamental object was to develop, improve and regulate that industry in all of its major facets. The Board was given power to make regulations, which it did, regarding matters such as the establishment, use, supervision and control of racetracks, the conduct of race meetings, the control of greyhound training for reward, as well as the holding and conduct of public sales of greyhounds. The effect of such regulations was that no such activity could be engaged in without a license being granted by the Board or in the case of an on course bookmaker, without a permit being obtained. In addition, the Board and its authorised officers were given investigative powers: as a result such officers could investigate any occurrence observed by him or brought to his notice, relating to any race or the performance of any greyhound at a race meeting, or when in attendance at a public sale. Further, pursuant to s. 45 of the Act, a disqualification order could be made in relation to specified greyhounds which were kept, owned, trained or managed by a named person, which had the effect, of preventing their registration in the Irish Greyhound Stud Book, of being entered in any authorised greyhound race or coursing meeting or of being offered for sale at a public sale of greyhounds. It was however the powers given under s. 47 which were impugned on constitutional grounds.

46. The Board with the consent of the Club or the Club with the consent of the Board (depending on which body was purporting to exercise a given power), was authorised to make an "exclusion order" under s. 47 prohibiting a person from being at any greyhound racetrack, any authorised coursing meeting or any public sale of greyhounds. Provisions were made for notifying the person concerned of any proposed order and affording him an opportunity of making representations which would be considered. If the order was made, its enforcement was provided for by subs (7), (8) and (9) of the Act: the subsections are in identical form, save that they relate to greyhound racetracks, coursing meetings and the public sale of greyhounds respectively: accordingly, a reference to subs (7) would be sufficient: -

> "7. Where a person to whom an exclusion order applies is found on any greyhound racetrack, any person acting under the direction of the licensee under the Greyhound Racetrack License relating to the track may remove such first mentioned person therefrom and for this purpose may use such force as may be reasonably necessary."

Such an order was made in respect of the plaintiff/respondent, who mounted, inter alia, a constitutional challenge to the provisions in question: such was determined as a preliminary issue on the application of the Attorney General. Kenny J., then of the High Court, determined the matter in his favour, but even though the legal principles outlined by him were endorsed by the Supreme Court, his decision was overturned on the merits. Centrally it is the High Court judge's treatment of what constitutes the administration of justice and in the process the judge's reference to Article 37 of the Constitution, which are directly in focus in this case.

47. The following five features are identified as being characteristic of what is and what constitutes the administration of justice:-

"(1) A dispute or controversy as to the existence of legal rights or a violation of the law: [subject matter]
(2) The determination or ascertainment of the rights of parties or the imposition of liabilities or the infliction of a penalty: [decision]
(3) The final determination (subject to appeal) of legal rights or liabilities or the imposition of penalties: [finality]
(4) The enforcement of those rights or liabilities or the imposition of a penalty by the court or by the executive power of the State which is called in by the court to enforce its judgments: [enforcement]
(5) The making of an order by the court which as a matter of history is an order characteristic of courts in this country. [characteristic of courts]" (pp. 230 – 231)

All of these matters were complementary to each other, and pertained to establishing by decisive decision, legal rights and their enforcement by resulting order on the civil side, and the infliction of sanctions or penalties on the criminal side. Self-evidently the learned judge was fully alive to the existence of many other incidences of justice (para. 78 below) but clearly felt that such were so obvious and well-known: their specific citation was not required.

48. Holding that the overall effect of an exclusion order was the creation of a legal prohibition against the subject person being at any greyhound racing track, at any authorised coursing meeting or from attending any public sales of greyhounds, Kenny J. went on to find that the process involved, the powers conferred, and the impact of their exercise possessed all of the above characteristics. In short, these involved (i) a dispute, that is whether or not the person acted in violation of the regulations/code of conduct, and (ii) a determination that such person had been guilty of the allegation(s) made against him, with the resulting imposition of a liability, namely the making of an exclusion order: further, (iii)

a determination which was final in that there was no appeal on the merits against it, (iv) the power to have an exclusion order enforced if necessary by physical force, as well as the powers of the Control Committee established by the Regulations, to impose unlimited fines, and finally (v) the order was similar in both form and effect to an injunction against trespass which is characteristic of orders which the court traditionally makes in this jurisdiction. Accordingly, the plaintiff had established that the power so conferred constituted an exercise in judicial power.

49. When referring to Article 37, Kenny J. firstly dealt with a submission that the proceedings before the Board were criminal in nature and therefore fell foul of Article 37 in limine. That submission was rejected. He then went on to acknowledge that the Board was limited in certain respects in that it had no power to summon witnesses, or to administer the oath and evidently, was confined in its operation to the remit outlined in the Act. But in his view, these considerations were irrelevant in light of a passage from O'Farrell & Gorman, (264), which specified that the real test was 'to look at the effects or consequences' of the assigned power when exercised. Through that prism, Kenny J. had no doubt but that Article 37 could not be invoked. From the resulting decision the respondent Board appealed to the Supreme Court.

50. This Court via the judgment of Walsh J., whilst accepting the five point test as outlined by the learned trial judge (p. 244), nonetheless held, on the application of those principles to the statutory provisions in issue, that when the Board/Club were utilising s. 47, only one of the five requirements could be satisfied. With great respect, it is not easy to understand this conclusion, particularly in view of the reasons offered for it by the court. Given the acceptance of the test and the uncontroverted circumstances, it is difficult to see how there could have been such a divergence between the courts. A dispute undoubtedly existed which involved the making of a decision without an appeal on the merits: a very strong argument can be made in support of the trial judge's view as to the effect of an exclusion order; the actual and rather plain wording of s. 47(1) so confirms – it "prohibits a person from all of the following", being on a greyhound racetrack, at a coursing meeting or at a public sale of greyhounds. In addition, on many occasions the court's intervention for a second or subsequent time will be required in the case of a variety of civil proceedings. Further, the court's discussion on Article 34 was extremely limited and extended only to generalised conclusions that its provisions were not operative in the context of the case. There was no discussion on the provisions of Article 37. Overall, given the striking difference in outcome, it is a matter of serious regret that this Court did not engage more fully with the agreed principles and agreed facts, relative to various provisions of the Act, in particular section 47. Be that as it may, what emerges from McDonald in the context of this case are the five features identified by Kenny J.

51. It is interesting to note that this was not the first occasion on which the learned judge considered what elements might constitute the administration of justice. The forerunner was Deaton v. The Attorney General & Anor [1963] I.R. 170 ("Deaton"), where the issue was whether the powers of the then Customs Commissioners under s. 186 of the Customs Consolidation Act 1876, "to select" the punishment for an accused person, if convicted of an offence under the Act, was an exercise of judicial power. Neither the facts or the outcome are material to us, save to note that one such option had to be adjusted in light of this Court's decision in Melling v. O'Mathghamhna v. the Attorney General [1962] I.R. 1. In his judgment, Kenny J. discussed what became features Nos (i), (iii), (iv) and (v) in McDonald, although in light of the approach adopted, he felt it unnecessary to decisively pronounce on any of these matters. Article 37 did not arise in that case as the type of revenue proceedings involved were, by the date of the hearing, undoubtedly criminal in nature (Melling). However, the debate engaged in is interesting in the context of whether or not all five requirements must exist so as to constitute the administration of justice, particularly when the learned trial judge himself felt that the absence of a justiciable controversy or of a final determination may not be decisive or conclusive as to whether the act is or is not an exercise of the judicial power (175).

52. Notwithstanding these remarks, McCarthy J., in Keady, interpreted a passage from the judgment of Walsh J. in McDonald (244), as requiring all five: Purcell v. Central Bank of Ireland [2016] IEHC 514 relied on Keady and said the same (p. 53), with O'Flaherty J. in Plunkett, stating "it seems clear that any activity to qualify as being an administration of justice, each of the five McDonald test would be satisfied (the State (Plunkett) v. Registrar of Friendly Societies (No.1) [1998] 4 I.R. 1 at 5. The deduction made by McCarthy J. is, may I respectfully suggest a possible overreading of the passage relied upon as I do not believe it was so intended: rather, I feel that Walsh J. was only dealing with the circumstances of the case before him. In any event, no further debate took place in any of these cases or elsewhere on this rather important question and, in light of my conclusion on the Article 34 issue, I do not find it necessary to further explore this issue, but would simply comment that the matter is not foreclosed, certainly not on the basis identified by McCarthy J..

53. One further case decided in 1961 can usefully be alluded to at this point. By virtue of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, and the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act 1884, as adapted in this country, the powers formerly exercised by the High Court relating to petitions arising out of municipal elections became vested in election courts, to be presided over by a senior barrister appointed in the manner provided for by that legislation. Issues arising out of parliamentary elections however remained with the High Court. In response to a petition questioning the legality of his appointment to Dublin City Council, Mr. Cowan sought a declaration that the intended hearing before the election court (Mr. Richard N. Cooke S.C.) violated Article 34 of the Constitution. The High Court so agreed.

54. Having outlined the relevant provisions of both Acts, the 1882 and 1884 Acts, Haugh J. quoted with obvious approval from Lynham v. Butler (No.2) and from O'Farrell & Gorman, including the passage from the judgment of Kingsmill Moore J. regarding Article 37 of the Constitution (p. 420-422). Being satisfied that an election court when hearing such petition was engaging in precisely the same class of work as the High Court did pre-1882, and still does when hearing a parliamentary election petition, it followed in his view that such constituted the administration of justice. In addition, as the court could make findings which would affect in a most profound and far reaching way the lives, liberty, fortune and reputation of those affected, such powers could not avail of the protection of Article 37 of the Constitution. In essence, this was a direct application of the Supreme Court decisions in the cases mentioned, in particular O'Farrell & Gorman. This in my view was a stand-alone part of his decision and the importance of such conclusion on this point is not undermined by the additional finding that since an election court might engage, within jurisdiction, in matters partly criminal, that aspect of its powers also violated Article 37 of the Constitution (Cowan v. Attorney General [1961] I.R. 411).

The Subsequent Cases:

55. The five-characteristic formulation from McDonald and the reasoning of Kingsmill Moore J. from O'Farrell & Gorman have, generally, enjoyed widespread judicial support with nothing in the judgment of O'Flaherty J. in Keady to credibly challenge O'Farrell & Gorman. In Central Dublin Development Association v. AG [1975] 109 I.L.T.R. 69, the same judge, Kenny J., applied McDonald in holding that some provisions of the Local Government (Development and Planning) Act 1963, constituted the administration of justice, but went on to conclude that in accordance with the judgment of Kingsmill Moore J, the same were entitled to the protection of Article 37.

56. McDonald was applied by this Court in Goodman International v. Hamilton (No.1) [1992] 2 I.R. 542, on a straightforward basis (589/590: S.C.: 556: H.C.) as it was by the High Court in Wheeler v. Culligan [1989] I.R. 347 (Costello J.), and likewise In The Application of Neilan v. DPP [1990] 2 I.R. 267 (Keane J.): see also Brady v. Haughton and Others [2005] IESC 54, [2006] 1 I.R. 1, Cassidy v Commissioner of an Garda Síochána and Others [2014] IEHC 386 (Barr J.), The two most recent cases are those of O'Connell v. The Turf Club & Ors [2017] 2 I.R. 43 ("O'Connell"), and Damache v. Minister for Justice & Ors [2020] IESC 63 ("Damache"). In the former, O'Farrell & Gorman and McDonald were applied in both the judgments of Hardiman J., who expressed no reservations whatsoever about either decision (p. 64-67) and by O'Donnell J., with whom the other members of the court agreed, (p. 98-100). On the facts, Hardiman J. was satisfied that "certain [but not all] of the criteria" set out in McDonald were satisfied, at least to the extent that the exercise of the power "may arguably constitute an administration of justice" (p. 66). On the other hand, O'Donnell J. could not see any compliance with requirements (iv) and (v) of McDonald.

57. Although explaining what is undoubtedly true, namely that the boundary line between judicial power and administrative power is not easy to determine, nonetheless, O'Donnell J. continued "it is now…much too late to seek any comprehensive theory, even if such was desirable. Instead the resolution of these cases must be found within the existing case law and the guidance which they offer", citing in support the report of the Constitutional Review Group 1966, at p. 55. (para. 93). See also Damache where in the context of a purported revocation of a certificate of naturalisation , this Court unanimously held that such a revocation, if made could not be enforced in its own right or converted into a judgment (O'Connell 94) so as to achieve the deportation of the applicant: for that purpose an entirely different procedure would be necessary. Accordingly, in applying the McDonald criteria, point No. (iv) and for other reasons point No. (v) were not satisfied with the result that Article 34 was not infringed. (para. 67-71)

Suggested Pull-Back:

58. Despite the longstanding support underpinning the above approach to both Article 34 and Article 37, some of my colleagues have expressed the view that the principles involved, never somehow gained the traction which might have been anticipated after those cases were decided. In other words, there was an expectation that such might have led to the constitutional compatibility of many statutory bodies being intensely scrutinised with a partiality toward their demise. The fact that this did not occur is relied upon to recant from the widespread approval which both authorities have since enjoyed. Others have tended to confine this line of argument to the test of Kingsmill Moore J. on the Article 37 provision. In either situation, Keady is primarily cited in this regard: in fact, very few if any other cases are aligned with that decision for this purpose. It is said that Keady (i) represents a significant pull back from the taxing demands of both O'Farrell & Gorman and McDonald, (ii) that it regarded the five-point test of Kenny J. as a guide only to the definition of judicial power and, (iii) that it also decided that O'Farrell & Gorman should be confined to its own facts and not otherwise have general application: all pointing to a more relaxed judicial approach to both Articles 34 and 37 of the Constitution. With the utmost respect, even if some such generous standard should be appropriate to either one or both of these constitutional provisions, I have great difficulty in reading Keady as a justification for this conclusion. I doubt very strongly that the case is an authority for what is being suggested. My reasons are as follows.

Keady v. the Commissioner of An Garda Síochána* [1992] 2 I.R. 197:

59. In issue in Keady was whether or not the powers of the Commissioner of An Garda Síochána, to dismiss a member from the force, following a breach of discipline finding by a Tribunal of Inquiry, all under An Garda Síochána (Disciplinary) Regulations 1971, were such as to breach the provisions of Article 34 of the Constitution and if so, could Article 37 be invoked to save them. Two judgments were delivered, McCarthy J. and O'Flaherty J., both of which were agreed by the other members of the Court.

60. McCarthy J. referred, with approval, inter alia, to Lynham v. Butler (No.2) (202), Cowan, Shanahan, McDonald and O'Farrell & Gorman (203), when discussing the essential features of the administration of justice, and in the process cited large passages from the judgments of Kennedy C.J., Kingsmill Moore J., and Kenny J. The learned judge went on to apply McDonald and concluded that the challenge failed requirement No. (i) in that there was no dispute or controversy of a kind envisaged by that characteristic of the test. On the broader front he rejected a submission that the legislative regime dealing with certain professions (para. 41 above), should by analogy be applied to the powers in question, so that only the court would have the ultimate dismissal authority in that regard (C.K. v. An Bord Altranais [1990] 2 I.R. 396: Finlay C.J. at 403, with whom McCarthy J. agreed, was cited in support). In his view, members of An Garda Síochána were entirely different from professional people who required a certain qualification and an ongoing standing to practice: whereas apart from the higher management being nominated by the government, all members of the force were appointed by the Commissioner. He then went on to say "In the case of an office or other position created by statute and held pursuant to statute, in my view the principles stated in In Re The Solicitors Act 1954, [1960] I.R. 239, are not to be extended, if they are to be extended at all, so as to embrace the statutory framework which deals with the creation of and an appointment to a particular position or rank and not to the wider fact of being qualified to work for gain in a restricted occupation as well in appropriate cases as being qualified to hold a particular position or rank" (emphasis added) (206/207). These features he said, distinguished the regulations and members of the force from the professions mentioned and their governing legislation. It seems to me however that having endorsed the line of authority as mentioned, I cannot accept that by simply distinguishing the members of the force from other professional people or by the throwaway comment which is emphasised, he intended to suggest that such case law had outlived its usefulness and that it was no longer of general application. If he did, I like several other judges would strongly disagree with such proposition.

61. O'Flaherty J., delivered a second judgment: when referring to O'Farrell & Gorman he felt "central" to that decision was the historical role which the court played in maintaining a profession of recognised integrity and one with the highest level of competence: C.K. was differentiated on the basis that a dismissal of such a person resulted in a loss of his professional qualification whereas a member may have lost his employment, but not any qualification. Further, having cited the five point test from McDonald, he isolated "two essential ingredients" from the five, namely the existence of a contest between parties and the infliction of "some" form of penalty or liability. In Mr. Keady's case there was no such dispute or controversy and accordingly, Article 34 was not engaged: it was not therefore necessary to consider Article 37.

62. It is however that part of his judgment, which comments on the decision of Kingsmill Moore J., which is more relevant to the instant discussion. Having referred to that passage which identified the severity of the imposed sanction as a key factor, the learned judge continued "Earlier in the court's judgment it made clear that it was not dealing with a domestic tribunal with a jurisdiction based solely on contract (at p. 264). It seems clear, therefore, that the case of solicitors must be regarded as exceptional and, perhaps, anomalous and owes a great deal to the historical fact that judges always were responsible for the decision to strike solicitors off the Roll". This has been relied upon for suggesting that Keady hoisted a red flag against the further general application of O'Farrell & Gorman, if indeed, it did not signal its virtual demise or something close or akin to it. I respectfully disagree, as the passage quoted does not in any way support the conclusion reached (para. 126 infra).

The Land Commissioners and the Revenue Commissioners

63. A line of argument running through this case is a suggestion by the respondents that since the powers exercised by both the Land Commission (or "L.C.") and the Revenue Commissioners (or "R.C.") have on several occasions resisted various challenges under Article 34 of the Constitution, then the powers of the WRC by analogy should likewise be so declared. This in my view involves an inherent misunderstanding as to the reasons why historically both of those bodies were found to be external to the constitutional provision as mentioned. My reasons are as follows.

Land Commission:

64. Notwithstanding the respect which ever since has rightfully been paid to the judgment of Kennedy C.J. in Lynham v. Butler (No.2), it is I think more revealing to consider that of his colleague in understanding the true rationale which underpins L.C. cases in a constitutional setting. The decision of Johnston J. is most insightful in this regard. At both the outset of his judgment and again towards its conclusion, great emphasis was placed on the exercise of carrying out the land purchase code, described as a "great social work of the highest importance" (115), and as "an administrative task of national importance and of colossal magnitude" (p. 123). This work involved inter alia the abolition of the dual ownership of land by acquiring whole estates for relocation purposes and by advancing monies to certain tenants to enable them to acquire their holdings. Such an undertaking was vested in the L.C. being the land administrator for the entire state and as a body "…equipped with the most complete knowledge of the agrarian and social conditions of this country and actuated by an absolute determination that every citizen and every class of citizen should get fair play and honest treatment". Therefore, the identification of such lands in that case was not in any sense an exercise of power under Article 64. In his view "any other result would have a most paralysing effect upon the whole work of the Land Commission", and would convert that provision of the Constitution into "a guarantee of anarchy and not of order" (123/124). See also to the same effect In Re Maxwell's Estate ([1891] 28 LR IR. 356 and In Re Lawrence Estate [1896] 2 I.R. 347).

65. Fisher v. Irish Land Commission [1948] I.R. 3, was I think one of the first cases of note to call for resolution after the 1937 Constitution. This was a "resumption" case under s. 39 of the Land Act 1939, in respect of which the Lay Commissioners had the power to decide all issues arising, including the question of title to the subject lands: its decision was final subject only to an appeal on a point of law. In dismissing an Article 34 challenge, Gavan Duffy J., as then, when once more referring to the policy of the code, alluded to the grave economic problems of the time and the dreadful plight of small farmers who were forced to survive on totally uneconomic holdings. This could be addressed, at least in part by the equitable distribution of certain estates, following the partial or total expropriation of some proprietors. As the ordinary courts were in his view ill fitted for that task, the Oireachtas turned to the Land Commission as a tried and efficient public trustee and as an expert body enjoying great public confidence. As such, it "…must now enjoy a very wide and virtually uncontrollable discretion in the practical administration of the policy committed to its charge" (p. 11). It was clear to the learned judge that by committing those issues to "one of the most extensive agencies of administrative government in the State", the legislature clearly felt that the measures in question were "extra judicial in their general scope" (10). On the constitutional question, whilst confessing that he himself would "classify the power given…as fundamentally legislative, though one might call it administrative in everyday speech" (p. 12), nonetheless, he very much doubted whether any of those powers could be said to partake of the administration of justice. As such, recourse to Article 37 was not required to validate the powers of the Commission under s. 39 of the Act: however, if it was, those powers were clearly of a limited nature under that provision. The Supreme Court so agreed with these views and this conclusion.

66. It is interesting to note that the same judge, who as counsel for Mr. Butler (Butler v. Lynham (No.2)), had boldly and vigorously asserted "in his devastating argument" that the Land Commission was "an unconstitutional court", "a judicial enormity" and thus, unconstitutional (Fitzgibbon J. 109), had in an earlier judgment commented on Article 37 as follows:-

> "The Oireachtas has continued the policy of committing the highly technical and intricate administration of land purchase under a wide and comprehensive code to a responsible body of specialists, with an extraordinary and unique jurisdiction: and this anomaly is carefully protected by Article 37 of the Constitution." (In Re Loftus Bryans Estates [1942] I.R. 185 at 198) (emphasis added)

67. There are two further cases which might be mentioned: The State (Crowley) v. Irish Land Commission [1951] I.R. 250 and Foley v. Irish Land Commission [1950] 2 I.R. 118. In the first, again a "resumption" case but under a different subsection of s. 39 of the Land Act 1939 from Fisher, the court was satisfied that whilst the Commission's function was quasi-judicial it was captured by Article 37, whereas in the second, which involved the exercise of powers under s. 2(b) of the Land Act 1946, the court dealt with the constitutional argument by reference to both Article 34 and Article 37 holding that whichever applied, the impugned powers were not susceptible to constitutional challenge. (See the High Court judgment in Foley where Dixon J. agreed completely with the views espoused in Fisher as to the social importance of the L.C. and the functions its performed).

The Revenue Commissioners:

68. In the past number of years, diverse challenges in a variety of ways have been asserted against certain powers of the Revenue Commissioners, in which decisions of the Appeals Commissioners, Tax Inspectors and the Collector General, have all been questioned. The first of those which I wish to mention is the State (Calcul International Limited & Ors) v. Appeal Commissioners & Anor (Unreported, High Court, 18th December, 1986) ("Calcul"). Barron J., rejected the submission that by finally determining an appeal, moved by the taxpayers against assessments raised by tax inspectors, the Appeal Commissioners were exercising judicial power. In doing so, he endorsed both McDonald and O'Farrell & Gorman, citing certain sections from the latter which included the passage: that if the impugned powers affect in "the most profound and far reaching way the lives, liberties, fortunes or reputations of those against whom they are exercised, they cannot properly be described as "limited"". (para. 56).

69. When addressing their functions he held that, whilst questions of fact and law may be involved and that the process is adversarial in nature, nonetheless the Commissioners "do not deprive [the tax payer] of anything nor impose penalties, nor limit his freedom of action" (para. 60), with their essential function being to adjust, if at all, the quantum of any assessment. Further, although acknowledging that the required exercise, involved determining the amount of tax to be paid and as a result "obviously imposes liability upon the tax payers concerned" (para. 60), nonetheless, in accordance with the cited case law, such powers did not amount to the administration of justice. In addition, firstly, although recognising the seriousness of being branded a tax defaulter, such was but an inference from the decision and not part thereof. Secondly, although their decision may well impact financially on a taxpayer, the same should not do so in any profound way as any liability is proportionate to the value of goods or to one's taxable income: it is thus relative in that way with the actual amount involved, however large, not being important. Therefore, on the Article 37 issue the powers in question cannot be said to have the kind of far reaching effects as contemplated by the authorities. The conclusion can be contrasted with Hunt, where this Court (Keane C.J.) held that the powers of the Appeal Commissioners in issue in that case were properly characterised as limited functions and powers of a judicial nature within the meaning of Article 37.1. (Criminal Asset Bureau v. Hunt [2003] 2 I.R. 168).

70. Where in a situation of default, occurring within s. 7 of the Finance Act 1968, the Revenue Commissioners, following demand as in this case based on an assessment, had the power to activate recovery steps: either by distraint or court proceedings. (s. 485 of the Income Tax Act 1967). ("the 1967 Act"). In his challenge, Mr. Kennedy alleged that s. 7 was repugnant to Article 34 of the Constitution. Finlay C.J., in giving the court's judgment rejected that argument. Although not referring to either O'Farrell & Gorman or McDonald by name, it is clear that both decisions were being endorsed and applied, subject perhaps to a revised wording on point (v) of McDonald (paras. 82 & 83 below). In his view, there was no "contest" or "issue" of fact or law arising on the 25th July, 1984, when the Collector General generated the enforcement steps, even if he did so in the mistaken belief that the tax remained unpaid: accordingly, there was no judicial determination involved in that decision. Secondly, what created/imposed the liability or affected the appellant's rights was not the decision of the Collector General, but rather was his own default in complying with his statutory obligations. Finally, the powers contained in s. 485 of the 1967 Act, did not oust any of the functions vested in judges under Article 34. Accordingly, that aspect of the claim was rejected. (Kennedy v. Hearne [1988] I.R. 481).

71. In the third case, where returns are not made for schedule D purposes, assessments may be raised under s. 184 of the 1967 Act, which in the absence of appeal become final and conclusive. Enforcement steps may then be taken requiring the County Sheriff to execute for the amount specified (s. 485 of the 1967 Act: see the preceding paragraph). Having found himself in these circumstances, Mr. Deighan at that point of the process challenged both the power to raise the assessments and that of the County Sheriff to levy execution thereon.

72. Murphy J., in the High Court, was entirely satisfied that the raising of an assessment was purely an administrative task: it involved neither a dispute or controversy and in the 'ordinary' way, resulted from the application of the relevant statutory provisions to the information which the tax payer was obliged to submit. Whilst of necessity the situation is more difficult where default has occurred, nonetheless the legal effect of each procedure is the same. The "finality" aspect of an assessment results, not from any determination by the Inspector as such, but rather by the tax payer's failure to challenge, on appeal that assessment. In the view of the learned trial judge, Article 34 was not engaged. That decision was affirmed on appeal, with this Court applying the principles which it had in the then recent past set out in Kennedy v. Hearne [1988] I.R. 481. Accordingly, the constitutional challenge to both the raising of the assessment and the execution steps was rejected. (Deighan v. Hearne [1990] 1 I.R. 499).

The Underlying Rationale for such Bodies:

73. The land question seen in a national and historical context, and the State's policy response – to alleviate the untoward affliction and ghastly suffering of its people – via, inter alia, the Land Acts/Land Purchase Acts including the establishment of its implementing agency, were in my view key appreciating factors in the judicial approach to the constitutional challenges previously mentioned. In so saying, I am not suggesting that legal learning of the most scholarly type was not applied by those imminent judges involved in such decisions: however, in light of some of the individual conclusions reached and the reasoning behind them, some further explanation should be added. Indeed, this type of influence can be seen in some cases quite explicitly and even if less so in others, is still present. A brief recap on the judgment of Johnston J. in Lynham v. Butler (No.2) will illustrate this point. The learned judge was unquestionably satisfied that the Commission's work was correctly described as administrative, and not judicial. Even if some or many of its activities had the appearance of the latter, such were in his view quasi-judicial in character, and were purely incidental and ancillary to its principal functions as above described. With that pragmatic reasoning, it was possible to preserve the distinction between the administration of justice and the several administrative tasks which the executive sought to have carried out by non-judicial bodies: if such had to be otherwise classified, the same would seriously undermine that branch of government. The tripartite division established under Article 6 of the 1922 Constitution was not devised in that way and had within it a breadth of flexibility and elasticity which allowed for the carrying out of such functions: this in his view was a sound basis for the distinction so made. Accordingly, the judicial conclusion in that and other cases, was that the Land Commission in all of its attributes and in performing all of its functions was administrative in nature, with its national standing being pre-eminent in this regard (Kelly, 6.1.11).

74. On the Revenue front, the overall impression given in each of the three judgments just discussed (Calcul, Kennedy and Deighan), is that the functions performed by the Appeal Commissioners, Inspector of Taxes and the Collector General are not part of the administration of justice because the actual liability of the taxpayer is already existing and has been or is capable of being determined, by reference to the relevant provisions of the tax code; their function was to do no more than estimate, calculate and declare this liability. None of the decisions saw any of these powers, all exercised without court intervention, as involving a justiciable controversy of fact or law, or as being causally responsible for the imposition of a liability on the tax payer. Given the serious consequences which the resulting debt may have on the person and his asset position, it is perhaps surprising how, on the application of the principles outlined in O'Farrell & Gorman, Barron J. saw nothing profound or far reaching in their effect (Calcul) or why, some more critical analysis has not taken place on the constitutional compliance of such powers.

75. The Chief Justice in Deighan v. Hearne, had perhaps other reasons in mind to explain such cases when he said "this court in McLoughlin v. Tuite [1989] I.R. 82, has already indicated the importance within the constitutional framework of the revenues of the State and that has bearing upon the powers properly and necessarily vested in the Inspector of Taxes in this context" (504). The passage in McLoughlin was a reference to the fact that the tax code in general and the income tax sector in particular contained a series of statutory provisions so as to ensure that each tax payer should pay his due taxes and should do so "with a promptitude which will permit the central fund to be so established at any time so as avoid unnecessary short term borrowing" (88): Murphy J. in the High Court said something along the same lines. It therefore seems to me that the tenor of such comments alludes perhaps to a view of the work of the Revenue Commissioners which is not too far removed from the view of what the Land Commission did under the land purchase code. In any event, I am quite satisfied that both bodies must be considered as being in a special area of consideration for both Article 34 and 37 purposes.

Observations on Article 34:

76. Although in McDonald Kenny J. felt it unnecessary to refer to more than three cases on the Article 34 and 37 aspects of his judgment (Farrell and O'Gorman: Cowan, and The Queen v. Davidson [1954] 90 C.L.R. 353), there was an abundance of other case law, in addition to Lynham v. Butler (No.2), which would have justified the formation which he outlined. Some of the authorities in question, much earlier in time, identified the following constituent elements of the test:-

(i) All controversies of a justiciable nature (Kansas v. Colorado (206 U.S. 46)

(ii) Deciding such controversies "between its subjects, or between itself and the subjects, whether the rights relate to life, liberty or property": followed by "…a binding and authoritative decision…" – Huddart, Parker & Co. v. Moorehead, 8 C.L.R. 330 at 357:

(iii) Adjudicating "…as to legal claims, rights and obligations whatever their origin, and to order right be done in the matter…" (The Waterside Workers Case [1918] 25 C.LR. 434,);

(iv) Having the power to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision ('Lectures on Constitutional Law' (1891) at 314: Miller J.: U.S. Supreme Court)

77. A few comments on the above: the extract at (ii), from Griffin C.J. in Huddart Parker & Company, was later acclaimed as being "a classic and widely accepted definition" (Attorney-General for Australia v. The Queen at p. 621). Secondly, the reference to "controversies" obviously means justiciable controversies and that relating to 'life, liberty or property', as illustrative only of the many other aspects of one's being and one's existence, which can be impacted, and thirdly, the mention of the "binding" nature of the decision is also noteworthy.

78. In addition to the impressive and diverse range of authorities on this issue, it appears to me at a glance, and certainly at a general level, that the identifiable elements from McDonald are for the most part self-evident. The first is the "subject matter" of a suit, a "justiciable issue", a "dispute or controversy" involving citizens, the State or other legal personalities. Of course not every dispute is amenable to judicial determination, and not every judge when sitting as a "court" is always exercising judicial power. Examples of both might be:

- The engagement of Article 15(10) - aspects of -, (12) and (13) of the Constitution: or an Article 26 reference,

- The raising of an estimate by the Revenue Commissioners in respect of monies due in a particular context, such as that presenting, (Kennedy v. Hearne [1988] I.R. 481)
- The performance by the A.G. of a function under s. 2 of the Extradition (Amendment) Act 1987, repealed since 2003 (Wheeler v. Culligan [1989] I.R. 344),
- The giving of directions under s. 7(4) of the Companies Act 1990 (In Re Countryglen Plc [1995] 1 I.R. 220),
- The administration of assets or trusts or when enforcing a family arrangement by consent (Deaton – 174/175), and
- The making of orders in wardship cases, in lunacy proceedings, and in certain matters regarding the winding up of companies (In Re R. Ltd [1989] I.R. 126 at 135 and Deaton – 174/175)

79. However, it should be noted that not all orders so made, particularly in the latter examples given, can be accurately described as non-justiciable: such will depend on the nature of the application itself, the relief being sought, the orders made and also perhaps the stance of the relevant parties. (Eastern Health Board v. M.K and M.K. v. K. [1999] 2 I.R. 99, Barrington J. at 116: In Re Greendale Developments Limited (in liquidation) (No.1) [1997] 3 I.R. 540 at 547 and In the matter of JJ [2021] IESC 1, McKechnie J.). Aside from this caveat however*,* such limitations are self-created and self-imposed so that the court's jurisdiction is properly and correctly exercised.

80. In relation to the second requirement, society could not in any compatible or self-restraining way exist unless disputes which inevitably arise could be determined by an independent and impartial body, with expertise and knowledge and one commanding widespread public respect: otherwise resort would be had to the most unsavoury means of resolution: hence the decision making aspect of justice. Thirdly, such decision, or determination, must have the inbuilt capacity to be an end in itself, meaning that subject to other avenues within the judicial process, such as reviews or appeals, there should be no necessity to engage with external bodies to bring finality to the matter referred. Fourthly, it is the constitutional norm that where enforcement of court orders becomes necessary, the same can and indeed must be executed by the executive branch whose constitutional powers and duties, include this obligation. The court self-evidently in no civilised jurisdiction can directly enforce its own orders. So much so for points (i) – (iv): the fifth feature however, requires some further comment.

81. As noted by Kenny J. in Deaton, this aspect of the "test" derived from a suggestion in The Queen v. Davidson [1954] 90 CLR 353, to the effect that if as a matter of historical fact the order or event under scrutiny, was typical of what the courts traditionally engage in, then the doing of such act would be characteristic of the judicial function. Whilst undoubtedly, it is true that Dixon C.J. in his judgment said something along those lines, nevertheless the source of this observation should be noted as well as what the author actually stated, which was that "in doubtful cases" [we] ask whether the subject power was exercised by the Crown, parliament or by judges "at the time our constitutions were adopted" (The Rule Making Power, 12th A.B.A. 599: Dean Pound). With great respect, whatever limited validity this proposition may have in a certain context, it is very difficult to see how the extrapolation made by the learned judge could be justified on such basis.

82. Leaving that aside however, and despite what Kenny J. said, I do not believe that support for the same point can also arise from the reference in O'Farrell & Gorman to the historical role of the court regarding solicitors: that in my view was particular to context, and was neither absolute in intention or unconditional in effect. Moreover, a moments reflection will illustrate that if taken literally, such aspect of the test could render immune from an Article 34 challenge, the exercise of powers conceived in and serving modern society, but which are foreign looking to the historical landscape. Such would have quite disturbing implications for the separation of powers and within that for the constitutional role of the court under that provision. I therefore would alter the fifth requirement by removing its confinement to the "historical" nature of such orders, and instead would adopt the refinement suggested by Finlay C.J., where such is included but not decisively so worded: the Chief Justice said "a further test which can be applied to the question whether this section allows the exercise of a judicial function is whether it has the effect of invading or ousting any of the functions vested in the judges by Article 34 of the Constitution" (Kennedy v. Hearne [1988] I.R. 481 at 489). This has the obvious benefit of being able to assess the requirement in a contemporary setting.

83. There is another justification for this view. I have always believed that the Constitution should be viewed as an instrumental medium to serve the people who in return would serve the Constitution. As prevailing values, norms and standards will inevitably change over time, it is important that the highest level of the societal legal order should be capable of adjustment, by interpretation, so as to reflect those needs and requirements. Thus, it has often been said that the Constitution is flexible and is amenable to change, with no one interpretation being definitive for all time. However, to say that the Constitution is a living document is a treacherous generality, being as deceptive as it is accurate. Certainly in some areas it has been adapted to reflect society but in many others, particularly in the most sensitive and personal areas, such as families, marriage, status, relationships and the like, it appears quite incapable of movement, in fact it seems to be frozen in its historical origin. It is to be regretted that a more bold, innovative and imaginative approach has not been adopted by the judiciary at large. In any event, I cannot imagine that Kenny J. intended to exclude from the purview of Article 34 all orders other than those which traditionally the courts were likely to make. If however I am wrong in that regard, I would also on this basis, include as part of point No. (v), orders which are typical or normal of the judicial system at any given time.

84. All of the above discussion is helpful in offering an understanding of what the essential elements of both Article 34 and 37 are, and where these interrelate with each other in the constitutional frame. This exercise is however complicated by the fact that bodies, in number several; in title, structure and composition vast; and in reach and scope enormous, have nonetheless consistently been held to be ministerial or administrative, but not judicial. These exist in multiple sectors of society and in many instances have a variety of powers and responsibilities for making decisions which affect the person, good name and property rights of citizens, sometimes in a most profound way. From this category can be excluded those which simply conduct exercises such as the taking of accounts and enquiries, the making of calculations, the ascertainment of facts, or those who engage in matters which are purely ancillary to and subordinate of the judicial system, e.g. registrars, examiners and the Master. With regard to the former agencies, many may exhibit, to use a hollow phrase "the trappings of a court" (Shell case, Lord Sankey at p. 296), such as having the power:

- To entertain contested disputes s
- To compel the attendance of witnesses and sometimes parties
- To direct the production of documents
- To take evidence on oath and to preside over cross examination
- To resolve factual disputes and decide controversial points of law, and
- To make a determination on such disputes, to finality.

These features are but illustrative: some will have more or less powers and others different powers. It is difficult to be more precise than this, as all will depend on the make-up of their individual formation.

85. Whilst the decisions of such organisations may be subject to review or appeal, howsoever described, and whilst the supervisory nature of the court's jurisdiction cannot be excluded, nonetheless the breadth of their established remit, can be considerable. To an onlooker, even a lawyer, their features may appear to closely resemble, if not indeed be indistinguishable from, the court process. As a justification, many would argue that given the complexity of modern day society, it would not be possible for the executive branch to govern in an effective and efficient way without utilising such entities. That indeed may be the case, but almost inevitably some such body with such powers, either by their creation or functioning, will inescapably encroach into justice and then may or may not have the protection of Article 37. This therefore begs the question: how can separation be decided upon?

86. In considering this matter, it is obvious that the existence of the factors above mentioned, cannot be decisive in badging an entity as a court or in determining the Article 37 issue (O'Farrell & Gorman at 273), even if undoubtedly such are also clearly incidents of the judicial power. A good deal of this convergence can be explained by the absolute obligation on those bodies to act judicially at all times, that is to comply and ensure compliance with, not only natural justice, but also with the broader requirements inherent in the current understanding of constitutional justice: in short, they must act fairly and impartially and in a proportionate way to the circumstances presenting: (Kingsmill Moore J., 265/266): or as put "are subject to the trammels of a quasi-judicial body" (Crowley at 267). To satisfy this duty which exists regardless of the Article 34/37 debate, many of the requirements above identified would have to be complied with. But, as sometimes stated, "due process is not necessarily judicial process" (Reetz v. Michigan 188 U.S. 505). Accordingly, not a great deal of differentiation can be deduced from the existence of these features, whether implicit or explicit in the exercise of the subject power. So the basic problem remains for the court, as the only organ of government who can so decide, by what test can it be determined which bodies/powers merit constitutional condemnation, and which do not?

87. As is evident from reviewing the case law, whilst many judges have described the ingredients of what constitutes the administration of justice few have ventured to define it in such a way that the resulting test could be applied at a general level to the varying circumstances which may present. Whilst some phraseology, different from that used in Lynham v. Butler (No.2) and McDonald, appears from time to time, the same is more by way of explanation than analysis. It is therefore probable that it is not possible with any precision to delineate the boundary in an all-inclusive or exclusive way. Whilst it would be much more acceptable if that exercise could be achieved, such may not be realistic given the myriad of bodies established inter alia by statute with such diverse subject matters, powers, functions and responsibilities.

88. Even Kingsmill Moore J. concluded, from a survey of the representative cases outlined in his judgment, that "from none of the pronouncements as to the nature of judicial power which have been quoted a definition at once exhaustive and precise be extracted, and probably no such definition can be framed". Very much the same was echoed by Davitt P., in Shanahan, where he was content to identify a number of features, subsequently evident in McDonald, which if existing were to his mind an exercise in judicial power. McCarthy J. in Keady added a further voice in this regard "I share the reluctance of Davitt P…to attempt a definition of judicial power: it is easier, if intellectually less satisfying, to say in a given incidence whether or not the procedure is an exercise of such power, rather than to identify a comprehensive check list for that purpose" (204). Further, having said that any such definition is complicated by the existence of Article 37, O'Donnell J., in this precise context said "It is now however, much too late to seek any comprehensive theory, even if such was desirable. Instead the resolution of these cases must be found within the existing case law and the guidance which they offer" (O'Connell v. the Turf Club [2017] 2 I.R. 43 at 98).

89. Finally, as the majority of the Constitution Review Group noted in this regard in its report (1996) "…there is no completely satisfactory answer to the problem raised and…there are great difficulties in formulating a different set of words which deal adequately with these complex issues". (para. 34). It is difficult, from an examination of the case law, to otherwise than agree with these and the above observations, with the result that if a generalised approach by way of a comprehensive description cannot be satisfactorily found, then in my view one can only proceed on a case by case basis and apply the well-established principles to the powers under scrutiny in any given case. In consequence, I am satisfied to adopt and apply, subject to the caveat above mentioned (paras. 82 and 83), the criteria set out by Kenny J. in McDonald, as further explained, both before and after that decision, in a number of the cases previously considered in this judgment.

90. To understand the conclusion reached in this case on the Article 34 issue, it is necessary firstly to refer to the procedures of the 2015 Act under challenge and secondly, to address briefly the restriction which the learned trial judge placed on what arguments could be advanced by the appellant on the constitutional issues, in effect, the standing point.

91. Prior to the 2015 Act, there were several different bodies which played a role in the investigation, adjudication and resolution of industrial relations disputes and employment issues, loosely so called. With the intention of streamlining the procedural mechanism utilised by such bodies, the 2015 Act created a unifying process through which all such disputes would be processed and determined. This new procedure included claims under the 1977 Act and the 1991 Act.

92. At the outset, it should be noted that the EAT was abolished by this Act (s. 65), and that its functions relating to, inter alia, claims under the 1977 and 1991 Acts were transferred to the Workplace Relations Commissions (WRC) (s. 66). From our point of view however, the most relevant sections are those contained in Part 4 of the Act (ss. 38 – 53 inclusive), which cover the initiation, investigation and adjudication of disputes arising out of employment in the workplace generally, including the enforcement of any orders so made.

93. An employee who wishes to make a complaint, must do so directly to the Director General of the WRC who on receipt thereof, refers it to an "adjudication officer" ("AO"). The resolution process by way of mediation did not feature in this case (s. 39). That official has duties, obligations and powers under s. 41 of the Act. Included are the following:- to afford the parties an opportunity to be heard and to present their evidence and to make a decision on the complaint in accordance with the relevant redress provision (subs (5)(a)). The AO has the power by way of written notification to compel the attendance of witnesses, to give evidence and to provide documents, with such persons being entitled to the same immunities and privileges as a witness before the High Court (subs (10) and (11)): the failure or refusal to give evidence or produce documents in accordance with the notice is a criminal offence which on summary conviction is subject to a class E fine (subs (12). In addition, proceedings before an adjudication officer "shall be conducted otherwise than in public" (subs (13), and all such decisions are published. However, of note and indeed of some surprise, is the fact that there is no provision for the administration of an oath, or for the cross examination of witnesses.

94. The enforcement of a decision made by an adjudication officer is by way of an application to the District Court, which becomes necessary only if and where an employer defaults in compliance within 56 days of the decision being notified to him: obviously such a step is not required where the order has been satisfied. This provision, along with s. 43(1) and (2) plays a central role in Mr. Zalewski's appeal against the finding of the learned trial judge that requirement (iv) of the McDonald test has not been met. On such an application, which can be moved by the employee or with his consent by a trade union or excepted body of which he is a member, or indeed by the WRC itself, "…the District Court shall without hearing the employer or any evidence (other than in relation to the matters aforesaid) make an order directing the employer to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms." (emphasis added) (subs (1)). Ss. (2) also bears quoting "Upon the hearing of an application under this section in relation to a decision of an adjudication officer requiring an employer to reinstate or reengage an employee, the District Court may, instead of making an order directing the employee to carry out the decision in accordance with its terms, made an order directing the employer to pay to the employee compensation of such amount as is just and equitable having regard to all of the circumstances but not exceeding 104 weeks remuneration in respect of the employees employment…" (emphasis added). There are comparable provisions for the enforcement of a decision of the Labour Court, although in that situation the District Court has no power to interfere with any redress aspect of the order made (s. 45). In addition, the Court has a discretionary power to award interest under s. 22 of the Courts Act 1981, as amended. This is not material. Finally, a failure to comply with the court's order made under s. 43 (AO) or s. 45 (LC) is a criminal offence punishable on summary conviction, with a class A fine or imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months, or both (s. 51).

95. In terms of the appeal structure, such is contained in s. 44. There is a right of appeal to the Labour Court by way of a full re-hearing on facts and law (s. 44(1)), which body can refer any legal question to the High Court (s.44(6)). Following its decision, the parties may also appeal to that Court, but only on a point of law (s.46). Various time limits for these steps are set out in the sections mentioned. This system can be contrasted with the previous regime under the 1977 Act, which provided for a full re-hearing before a court, namely the Circuit Court.

96. As is evident, the features of the 2015 Act just identified have the practical effect of creating a procedure for dispute resolution which is in fact entirely akin to that of legal proceedings. Though the setting and framework of an inquiry under s. 41 may well be more informal and swifter than a court action, these considerations are irrelevant to the question, which now must be considered, of whether the process is or is not an administration of justice. Before doing so however, a brief word about a standing issue.

Locus Standi* Point:

97. As mentioned, but only scarcely so, (para. 8) the applicant on the constitutional issue was not permitted by the learned trial judge to rely on the powers of the WRC under any enactment, save that of the 1977 and 1991 Acts: in particular, he wished to highlight that under s. 12(3)(c) of the Protected Disclosures Act 2014, an employee who had been "unfairly dismissed" on the basis that he/she made a protected disclosure, may be entitled to five years remuneration. That, according to Mr. Zalewski illustrated the vast nature and scope of the powers which an adjudication officer and the Labour Court alike possess.

98. Prior to Cahill v. Sutton [1980] I.R. 269 the range of arguments available on a constitutional challenge to a piece of legislation was extensive but not unlimited: it certainly was not confined to the individual circumstances of any given plaintiff: an example of which is McDonald itself, where the full range of the Board's powers were considered. In fact, the law books are littered with submissions that ranged far and wide in that respect but which are not purely theoretical or wholly unrealistic. All of that changed with this Court's decision in Cahill, which resulted in a significant modification to that practice as then applying in this jurisdiction. The resulting consequences were that any person seeking to mount such a challenge, was confined to how he was or would be impacted by such provision(s): no wider claim would be entertained. (p. 284 of Cahill).

99. Although with some flexibility from time to time, Cahill has been consistently applied ever since. However, it has attracted some criticism, including that from McCarthy J., who as lead counsel for Mrs. Sutton was baffled by the decision and who subsequently as a judge expressed hesitancy, indeed, even a flat-out refusal to accept what he described as the "busybody" basis for the decision (Norris v. v Attorney General [1984] I.R. 36 at p. 91). He doubted in the 43 years before Cahill, that there had been many instances, if any at all, of "officious interference" where a plaintiff instituted a case of this type without a personal reason or justification to so do: "reluctantly" however, at the end of the day he considered himself bound by it (p. 91).

100. Four years later, the learned judge dissented, yet again, from the rest of this Court, who had applied Cahill to reverse the decision of Costello J., who held that the applicant had standing to bring mandamus proceedings seeking to compel the government to commence, by an S.I., s. 60(1) of the Civil Liability Act 1961, which abolished the rule against non-feasance (State (Sheehan) v. The Government of Ireland [1987] I.R. 550). It is difficult to disagree with his comment that "If the prosecutor [who had tripped on a pavement and had been injured], or another in like position, does not have locus standi, then who has?" (p. 562). Whilst other voices have been raised from time to time, the decision of Henchy J. is still very much alive.

101. This particular case, in quite a specific way, illustrates very well the concerns which McCarthy J. had in mind. There is no doubt but that the range of compensation which an adjudication officer could award would be, and in fact was, an important aspect of the court's consideration in this appeal, especially in relation to Article 37, with there being a significant difference between 260 weeks (five years' worth) of salary under the 2014 Act, as distinct from 104 weeks (two years' worth) of salary under the 1977 Act. Simons J. in fact made a very similar point regarding the other end of the scale where under the 1991 Act, the maximum amount is 2 weeks' remuneration, albeit he did so to make a different point. Nonetheless, this very example highlights the artificiality of a situation which can result from an over restrictive approach to standing.

102. In addition, the Oireachtas, which must now examine quite carefully certain provisions of the 2015 Act, in particular those referable to both an adjudication officer and the Labour Court, are left with what is in essence an incomplete assessment by this Court of the full powers which such bodies possess under the legislation. In many situations that would not give rise to a difficulty and in fact would accord with a sensible application of Cahill: but in this case, given the integrated nature of these powers, it may well do so. It certainly has resulted, at the very least, in the creation of a doubt as to what the overall outcome of the case would be, on the Article 37 provision, if this argument had been considered: obviously this will inevitably create uncertainty for the legislature as they assess the future pathway of the WRC.

103. In light of both of those points, the question remains whether this was a productive or an ineffective application of the doctrine of locus standi? Given that one of the main objectives of the rule, is to protect the administration of justice and also to ensure that any such challenge retains "the force and urgency of reality", I do not accept that allowing Mr. Zalewski to rely upon the argument mentioned would have undermined this rationale, particularly since he was permitted, to "make the general point that the adjudication officers and the Labour Court exercise jurisdiction under a great number of pieces of legislation" (para. 31 of the High Court judgment). Quite the reverse may I suggest: and may I further add that had the rejected argument been allowed, the case would have been conducted in a more realistic, informative and worthwhile manner.

The McDonald Test:

Requirement No (iv)

104. The learned trial judge dismissed the Article 34 claim on the basis that in his view point (iv) of the McDonald test could not be satisfied (para. 47 above). The two essential reasons for this conclusion were firstly, that the bodies in question were dependent on the parties to activate the follow on enforcement procedure and secondly, the District Court's power to modify the redress ordered, if such was to include either re-instatement or re-engagement ("re-employment", for short). The inclusion of the Labour Court in this latter reference by the judge was not intended and can be disregarded. As a result, therefore, in his opinion, neither body could be said to be involved in the administration of justice (para. 77 of the judgment). I respectfully disagree with this view.

105. In the first instance it is important to note the concession made by the respondents, to the effect that points No's (i) to (iii) of McDonald are in place. These factors must therefore create an extremely influential platform from which the other requirements should be considered, as it necessarily follows that the subject powers/processes have, at that point, permeated acutely into the judicial domain. This is a significant journey step into the zonal sphere of justice. In consequence, the further analysis required must be consciously impacted by that position.

106. In looking at this matter, it is important to differentiate between the position of an adjudication officer, and the role of the District Court: in this regard, one must start by again considering the process conducted by the AO (para. 93), from complaint to decision, and the legal position of the parties when that process has concluded. As previously noted, to fulfil the functions demanded by statute, the AO, having received a complaint, must consider all relevant evidence which either party offers and must afford to each of them an opportunity to be heard: for such purposes, he or she has the power to order the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, both under pain of criminal sanction. The officer must adjudicate on the resulting evidence, both oral and documentary, and must do so by way of a decision which is then published. Certainly at first glance, such features sit side by side with those which are inherent in the court process. So where is the complaint at that point and what is the position of the parties?

107. Leaving aside the possibility of an appeal or the exercise of the court's supervisory jurisdiction, the unfair dismissal complaint at that point has been dealt with: it has concluded: it is over: the matter has ended. The facts, relevant to all aspects of the dispute, whether conflicting or otherwise, have been aired, the legal principles have been canvassed, the parties have had their say on both and a decision on the merits and law has been given. The AO is the only entity which touches the facts and applies the law to those as found. For all intents and purposes once over, the position of the parties has been established. There will be a winner and a loser or something close to either. The issue determined will never be revisited in the District Court. The matters dealt with have been ring-fenced and assigned to that process. Whilst the shortcomings of this system and the limitations inherent in it, cannot be ignored, and rightly are regarded as significant (paras 137 – 142 infra), nonetheless for all intents and purposes the parties will have engaged in a process which will have resulted in the final determination of the controversy between them: akin to essential aspects of legal proceedings. That the parties will have so considered, is clearly demonstrated by the fact that over 90% of decisions by adjudications officers are not appealed and so presumably have conclusively terminated the dispute between those involved. It is only where default is made by the employer in complying with such decision, that the District Court becomes engaged.

108. It is obvious that a decision of the adjudication officer is not, of itself, directly enforceable as a judgment of a court is: hence the involvement of the District Court for that purpose. It is however important to carefully analyse the basic provisions which govern such application, as applying to an adjudication officer (s. 43(1) and (2) of the 2015 Act): the position of the Labour Court is that as set out above (para. 94). These provisions however, whilst curious to a point, are neither novel or original as can be seen by their inclusion in the amendment to the 1977 Act. Under s. 10(1) and (2) of the original Act, the relevant Minister could apply to the Circuit Court to enforce an order of the EAT; such however involved an entire rehearing by that court of the substantive case previously determined by the tribunal. Much if not exactly the same as if the employer had appealed under s. 10(4). That position was however altered by s. 11 of the 1993 Act, which, by virtue of subs (3) set out a process virtually identical to that contained in s. 43(1) of the 2015 Act. Apart from also permitting an employee to move such an application, the same was made ex parte, and required evidence only of the earlier decision and non-compliance following notification: based thereon, the Circuit Court was obliged to make an order enforcing the decision of the EAT, with a similar power in respect of any re-engagement or re-instatement, if suggested by the tribunal (para. 94 above). As can be seen, what resulted from the amendment was pretty much identical to what is now contained in the 2015 Act.

109. An application to the District Court can only be made by two persons, namely the employee or the Commission: I discount a trade union or an excepted body as independent from the employee, as neither can operate without his consent (s. 43(1)). If the trial judge is correct, as I think he is, in saying that one of the reasons for the Supreme Court's decision in McDonald was the fact that neither the coursing club or the racing club themselves could seek an injunction to enforce the exclusion order, that is not a factor in this case given the power of the Commission to also make such an application. That aside, there are several distinctive features of the process which must be noted: the employer has no right to be present or heard, the only evidence which is required of the employee or which can be demanded by the court is the existence of a decision and default having been made following notification thereof. With that evidence only, the District Court is mandatorily obliged to make an order directing due compliance with the decision of the AO in accordance with its terms. Save for the peculiarity of one aspect of the redress system, it has no other function: it cannot review the case even if it disagrees with the conclusion reached. The evidence involved could not be more perfunctory: it could hardly be said to involve anything more than the most cursory engagement, in that, on the production of such evidence its role is preordained by statute: the result is inescapable and must be as indicated. If the legislation therefore had so rested, the decision of the learned trial judge on this point may well have been different. However, it was the modification powers of the court which were ultimately the most significant factor in his final decision.

110. These provisions are understandable as to intent and purpose but not readily recognisable as achieving that objective. I agree with MacMenamin J. that the principal intention behind these provisions was to offer a form of protective shield, so that this regime would be rendered less vulnerable to constitutional challenge. Whilst some doubts were occasionally expressed about the constitutionality of the EAT, (Canada v. Employment Appeals Tribunal: and some academic commentators: such as 'Kelly: The Irish Constitution' at 6.4.111), it must be said that for the duration of its existence, those doubts were never seriously pursued. In any event, it is now of course the situation under the 2015 Act which is in issue.

111. At first I felt that I had a certain insight into the rationale behind subs (2) of s. 43 (para. 94 above), but in hindsight, I am far from sure of that understanding. In the notice of application one assumes that the employee will set out what form of redress he is seeking: if that is compensation, then subject to what follows, it is very difficult to see how the AO could order, in its place, re-employment without that having been sought by the employee. Whilst a possibility, it certainly seems a strange one. The most likely sequence therefore is that in the first instance such is sought and granted by the AO, but by the time of the District Court hearing, the employee has had a change of mind and then seeks to substitute an order for compensation for what was originally sought. How this could be considered by the District Court, given its remit, is far from easy to understand.

112. The other possible reason for this provision might be employer related in that it is, I suppose, not impossible to think of such a person, even one who is denying the unfairness alleged and certainly one who is defending the unfair dismissal claim, making such a suggestion before the AO. That situation might conceivably arise if there is any significant delay between the dismissal and the adjudication, and might be further influenced by intervening events occurring during that period. For example, it is not fanciful to suggest that an award of two years' compensation might render a business non-viable, and thus no matter how unappealing, re-employment might then be the most attractive outcome for the employer. But as the defaulting party, it is difficult to see how such a submission could prevail over the wishes of the employee. It any event, he certainly could not make that argument before the District Court as he will not be present, or represented or have any opportunity to adduce evidence or make submissions, or otherwise participate in any way in such proceedings.

113. A further difficulty of a much more general nature also arises with that possible scenario. Under the statutory provisions, the proofs required of an employee (or the WRC if the moving party) are extremely limited with the only evidence needed being that to support the very specific requirements above mentioned (paras. 109). The question then is this:

on what evidential basis could the District Court possibly discharge the compensation award and substitute in its place re-engagement or re-instatement? At the most instinctive level, some evidence would be required relating to the "unfairness" of the dismissal itself and the reason why compensation, rather than the alternative was sought: and, likewise as it would be to assess the appropriateness of the employee returning to the workplace, what position might be offered and of course why compensation was not or could not have been discharged. How, such evidence could possibly be entertained in light of the statutory focus on the restricted nature of the court's role and in the absence of the employer, is something I seriously struggle with. Furthermore, it must be recalled that all courts including of course the District Court is constitutionally bound to exercise fair procedures and to comply with natural and constitutional justice, right throughout their remit. How the operation of these provisions could be rendered compatible with this norm, is almost impossible for me to understand. As a result, it seems to me that save in the rarest of circumstances, which presently I cannot imagine, this provision (s. 43(2) of the 2015 Act) is both legally and constitutionally inoperable.

114. I very much doubt if any of these difficulties can be resolved or explained by the suggestion of some of my colleagues that in its role, the District Court is not involved in the administration of justice and that the judges, when so acting, are neither exercising judicial power or engaging in the judicial act: the logical corollary of that position is to say, as indeed it has been, that the court is somehow acting as a purely administrative chamber. I can find no authority for this proposition or for the analysis giving rise to it.

115. The fact that the District Court has such a limited role in supporting the enforcement of the antecedent decision, is no reason in itself to justify such a view. Several examples exist where on very limited evidence a court is obliged to make a particular order and may even do so on an ex parte basis. Some of these cases have been referred to in the other judgments delivered. Dublin Corporation v. Hamilton [1999] 2 I.R. 486, was one such case where it was held that the District Court could make an order under s. 62 of the Housing Act 1966, on the very specific and limited proofs set out in that section: a section not condemned by this Court in Gallagher, but compromised in Donegan ([2012] IESC 18, [2012] 2 I.L.R.M. 233) on the basis that in the absence of some method to determine a genuine dispute on the underlying facts, the Article 8 rights of the tenant were infringed. The problem in DK v. Crowley [2002] 2 I.R. 744, did not stem from the District Court's power to grant, ex parte, an interim barring order, but rather from the failure of both the legislation and the rules of that court (unlike the Circuit Court) to afford the respondent an early opportunity of contesting the order: there was no requirement for a return date or that a motion should issue. I therefore cannot see in any of these cases any support for the suggestion that the court when involved under s. 43 of the 2015 Act is but purely an administrative agency.

116. The fact that the District Court, when called upon, provides a supporting element to the enforcement of the A.O.'s decision, does not change the constitutional categorisation of what the adjudicative process is. If that in itself was the only reason to re-classify what otherwise would be an exercise of judicial power, then the same would have to follow regarding multiple other situations where similar support is frequently called upon. Whilst appreciating that there is a difference, these are not quite the same: attachment and committal, orders for possession, orders of fieri facis and sequestration, to name but some, come to mind. In addition, whatever the historical view might have been, it is no longer correct to say that court intervention in areas such as wardship, company law matters, the administration of estates etc (para. 78 above) is not an exercise of judicial power. Many of these can be highly contentious. To whom should a grant of administration be given? Should a person be admitted to wardship, noting the judgment of this Court given earlier this year in J.J. ([2021] IESC 1)? Consequently, it is only in very limited and very rare circumstances that orders typically made by a court are to be considered as not involving the administration of justice.

117. There is one further reason why in my view requirement No (iv) of McDonald is satisfied. In O'Connell, where in the context of the powers of the Turf Club, O'Donnell J. suggested as an alternative to direct enforcement that where a process for converting a prior decision into a judgment existed, then the same would satisfy this particular requirement: Rogers v. Moore & Ors [1931] I.R. 24 is cited in this regard. Rogers, is I think a case different to the point being made, in that the attempted set off, by the Turf Club, of a fine unauthorised by the relevant rules from monies held by it on Mr. Roger's behalf, was declared ultra vires. That aside, it seems to me that apart from the modification point, the District Court's involvement under the 2015 Act can be seen as a "process for converting" the previous decision of the adjudication officer into a judgment. As a result, on this ground also, I would set aside the decision of the learned trial judge on this issue. Accordingly, for the above reasons, I am entirely satisfied that requirement No. (iv) in McDonald has been met.

Requirement No (v):

118. On this point, I am satisfied to rest my conclusion in the same way and for the same reasons as set out by the learned trial judge at paras. 101 and 102 of his judgment. In particular, I fully agree that the determination of employment disputes across a diverse range of circumstances has been recognised as the business of the courts for several decades. Indeed, much longer. Putting the matter in reverse, would any practitioner specialising in this area or indeed, any judge dealing with such matters, consider that the same was foreign to court intervention or to his judicial role. I doubt very much so. Accordingly, it is unnecessary to add further on this matter.

Resulting in:

119. Consequently, as all five aspects of the McDonald test are satisfied in this case the only remaining issue on the administration of justice side, although of the highest significance, is to consider whether the adjudicative process of the 2015 Act, being that relevant to this case, can be said to be an exercise of functions and powers of a limited nature as ordained by the provisions of Article 37 of the Constitution (para. 12 above).

Article 37: Limited Functions and Powers:

120. In an earlier part of this judgment I outlined some of the discussion which the 1934 Constitutional Review Group had, and some of the debate which followed, on what eventually became Article 37: from a political perspective those who favoured its inclusion expressed concern about the potential vulnerability of bodies such as the Land Commission, the Revenue Commissioners, County Registrars, the Master etc. In effect bodies, which undoubtedly were not courts under the Courts of Justice Act 1924, but which were performing certain notable functions, considered necessary to give expression to executive policy in a variety of social, economic, cultural, political and legal spheres: these bodies were variously described as either administrative/ministerial in nature or as exercising quasi-judicial functions or sometimes both (paras. 25 - 30 above: History of Article 37).

121. In the period which followed 1922, there were a few intermittent cases where Article 64 was mentioned but not discussed in any significant way until Lynham v. Butler (No.2). One of the earlier decisions, Roe v. McMullan [1929] I.R. 9, is of doubtful value as the only comment of note, that of Sullivan P., arose out of a particular submission of counsel which was in fact rejected: in any event, the observation made was quite ambiguous as to meaning (p. 15). Immediately prior to the delivery of that judgment, the Supreme Court of the Irish Free State, when dealing with the powers of the Master, on a referral by the court, to "assess" damages for an established breach of contract, held that it had not been shown at the particular point where the proceedings were, that the intended "calculation" was an exercise in judicial power. (Matheson & Ors v. Wilson [1929] I.R. 134). Another instance is where the court found that the execution of distress warrants by county registrars did not violate Article 64 (Halpin v. Attorney General [1936] I.R. 226), and finally, where it was held that an adjudication in bankruptcy by a county registrar was also constitutionally compliant (the State (McKay) v. Cork Circuit Judge [1937] I.R. 650). However, apart from those, there were very few other judicial murmurings, of note, which might have caused political unease.

122. Accordingly, whilst other bodies were undoubtedly mentioned in the debates and even in the case law, I remain entirely of the view that by far the greatest concern to the executive related to the Land Commission and the Revenue Commissioners. These were the focus of the concern: both from a political perspective (paras. 25-30 above) and a judicial perspective, the latter, as can be seen from the manner in which the courts, both pre and post 1937 have consistently ring-fenced such bodies from constitutional frailties.

123. As stated earlier in this judgment, an understanding of Article 37 cannot really be fully developed without involving a discussion on Article 34, which has been had elsewhere, but a brief recap is required. That provision is a cornerstone of our constitutional structure and is the lead provision on the judicial side of government. It therefore must have a headline meaning in the sense that there must be an area of administration, a core or principle area, that no other entity or body save for judges, may adjudicate upon. That area is separate to, and protected from encroachment by, all other arms of government: that is what the Constitution decrees. What McDonald tried to do was to put some practical meaning on this and to offer a criteria by which contested issues might be resolved. Save for the historical aspect of the five-point test, what was articulated by Kenny J. has been consistently applied since then. I readily acknowledge that it is not fully prescriptive in the sense of setting out a criteria, all embracing and immune from ambiguity, which by simple application could resolve all such disputed matters: whilst it is always more satisfying if the analysis gives rise to an authoritative definition of, as in this case, judicial power, nonetheless where, despite sharp attention by many insightful minds over several years, that has been found obstinate in reach and obscure in search, I am not afraid to rest on what is found practicable for a functioning judicial system. To those who voice opposition could I respectfully add that the strength of their disapproval would be more impressive if an alternative formula was offered to address the concerns raised: none such has been made and I have yet to see a more compelling approach to Article 34. I therefore reject the criticism made of this decision and likewise reject the subordination of the judge's reasoning as being circular in nature. Whilst I acknowledge the enormous benefit of academic discussion, abstract theory whilst formidable and highly welcome in its way, must at times yield to the judicial imperative of adjudicating upon cases in a constitutionally compliant manner.

124. What I think cannot but be acknowledged, even if I am wrong in suggesting that the Land Commission and the Revenue Commissioners were the key incentives behind Article 37, is that such provision was never intended to sit side by side with Article 34, and that both would have comparable status. Article 37 was grafted as an exception or derogation from a core principle upon which the vast majority of constitutional regimes, throughout the world, function, namely that justice is administered by judges duly appointed as such.

Such provision is subservient to Article 34 and must yield to its hierarchical superior of general application. It therefore follows that no matter what interpretive tools are used, such a provision must be narrowly construed and only in that way given effect to: any other application is a hostage to trust and offensive to the equilibrium created by the Constitution: such would severely undermine and damage the judicial institution, even if that is already considered, by some, as the weakest limb of government.

125. To this day the most informative case on Article 37 remains O'Farrell & Gorman in respect of which, despite some suggestions to the contrary, there has been a remarkable lack of criticism in the sixty years or more since Kingsmill Moore J. delivered the court's judgment in that case. One such however is that offered by Professor Casey, whose views can be distilled into the following: firstly, that no "real reasons" were given for the courts definition/description of "limited" and that "it was possible" a different meaning could prevail, namely being "restricted in number or subject matter", secondly, since the courts have not definitively decided on what the word "limited" means in Article 34.3.4 of the Constitution "it is difficult to accept" that in differentiating between that provision and Article 37, the court was correct. The main justification for these criticisms, if such can be so described, is that a more expansive approach "would give the Oireachtas wider scope for experiment" (321): so that for example the legislature could hive off "certain specified jurisdictions e.g. negligent actions" to a tribunal (Constitution Law in Ireland (3rd Ed.): (The Judicial Power under Irish Constitutional Law: I.C.L.Q., Vol. 24, No. 2, p. 305/324: C.U.P. 1975).

126. It has been further said that the decision has been marginalised and is seen as being increasingly anomalous: apart from Casey and Keady, I see no widespread support for such views but the generalised criticism of that case and McDonald offered by Professor Gwynn-Morgan should be noted. Keady in my view has been elevated into a position it simply does not merit: McCarthy J. referenced O'Farrell & Gorman as being one of a number of cases which he endorsed as having examined the meaning and breadth of the "constitutional prescript" of the administration of justice (202): and he then cited a particular passage from the court's judgment (204). Having stated that the decision should not be extended to the code in question he added the innocuous comment "if it is to be extended at all", which in my view has since been over-emphasised, wrongly applied and indeed probably misconstrued. The reservation expressed by O'Flaherty J. arose from his understanding that the historical relationship of the court with the solicitor's profession was virtually the entire basis for the decision (para 62 supra): a view which I respectfully disagree with: there were many more reasons which underpinned that decision (paras. 38 and 39 supra). It would I think have been more convincing if the learned judge had solely relied on An Garda Síochána being a disciplined force which required internal control, for not extending O'Farrell v. Gorman to that particular code.

127. In any event, what cannot be ignored or downplayed are the numerous judicial statements which subsequently have endorsed Kingsmill Moore J.: likewise, what cannot be disregarded is the fact that no one, including those which might have ventured disapproval, have set out an alternative version which would better orientate Articles 34 and 37. It is I think extremely difficult to disagree that what must be "limited" are the "functions and powers" in issue: if that is so, to suggest that such can be done by 'numerical restriction or isolated subject matter', is very much open to question and highly debateable. Further, such a meaning would interface with Article 34.3.4 in a manner which invades, and even perhaps questions its independent value. Such provision is the foundational principle for the type of restriction suggested (para. 125): however it clearly applies only to the jurisdiction of certain courts, and not as suggested on the Article 37 side: if it was the latter, one would have to wonder why there would be two provisions giving rise to the same result. In addition, in circumscription either by number or subject matter, it would be possible to exclude from Article 34 entire areas of justiciable issues such as commercial law, family law, or indeed apart from crime, any other sector of the legal order: just the fear expressed by MacMenamin J. in his judgment. Indeed, if permissible, one could readily see a statutory provision deeming or declaring such a move as being "limited" in nature. Furthermore, such a step would erode or certainly lessen public confidence in the carefully structured balance, even if imprecise, envisaged by the Constitution.

128. In every sense if an activity is limited (as it is in Article 37), it must have some parameters beyond which it ceases to be limited. On the dictionary side, there are several meanings to that word, but none of these can be really influential and certainly not decisive for our purposes: these might suggest, 'modest', 'not far reaching' or 'confined to special situations' (Kelly 6.4.10). That being so, it seems to me that the most appropriate yardstick is to judge this derogation from the red line constitutional norm that justice is administered by judges in established courts.

129. Kingsmill Moore J. suggested that where the powers conferred, looked at collectively, are such as to involve decisions, orders, or the doing of acts which the Constitution reserves to duly appointed judges, such therefore cannot be validated by Article 37. That of course must be correct, but begs the question: its purpose therefore was to give an indicative flavour of what he meant to convey, rather than being an end to itself. Having discounted the type of limitation endorsed by Casey (para. 125), the judge went on to describe the test previously outlined, which it will be recalled, is as follows: "The test should be as to whether a power is or is not "limited" in the opinion of the court, lies in the effect of the assigned power when exercised. If the exercise of the assigned powers and functions is calculated ordinarily to effect in the most profound and far reaching way the lives, liberties, fortunes or reputations of those against whom they are exercised they cannot properly be described as "limited"." Whilst I acknowledge its subjective element, it is not unexplained as to meaning or effect: in my view, to this day his analysis of Article 37 has not been bettered.

130. Those who have argued for an expansive understanding of this term, including Casey, are for the most part motivated by a concern that unless so provided, the exercise by the executive branch of its functions will be curtailed and restricted and thereby will have the potential of rendering government action less effective than what otherwise it might be. Whilst fully understanding that viewpoint, it provides a very doubtful legal or constitutional justification for such an approach. Firstly, it belittles the carefully constructed separation between the judiciary and all other agencies which exist to implement the executive function. This role of the former is, as stated, a core norm, it cannot be neutralised for the sake of government efficiency and effectiveness. In essence, what is being suggested is that the Constitution should somehow be subservient to the government and not that the government, like every other organ of state, every person, citizen, entity and body, should be constitutionally bound. The preservation of Article 34 in its rightful positioning is not for the accretion of power for the judiciary or to enhance the status of judges themselves: rather, it is to serve the people, to protect frights and to uphold the rule of law.

131. Secondly, if the government felt unduly restricted in the exercise of its functions or that its ability to govern was overly curtailed, it could have taken a number of opportunities to move an effective amendment to Article 37 in that regard. Some might say that this would be a last resort, but that very provision in its original form was added to by the 6th Amendment in 1979 dealing with adoption. Thirdly, and being ever so mindful of the absolute necessity that the executive must function through a multiple of agencies, I can see no serious evidence that the decided caselaw has caused the government undue concern in conducting the functions which it wishes to undertake and in the manner of doing so. Several bodies, other than the Land Commission, such as the Censorship of Publications Board, the Social Welfare system, various tribunals etc, have all survived constitutional challenge from time to time. Finally, in this context, it is significant to note that it has not been suggested by the constitutional law officer of the state, who appeared on behalf of all respondents, that the efficacy of government or its policy was or is being compromised by the principles which currently govern Article 37: although in fact he was seriously concerned that this case should not be resolved by reference to that provision, which if viewed through a particular lens, could create an entirely different test from McDonald, thus potentially causing great uncertainty for the legislature. Therefore, these arguments in my view, even if they were such as should be considered, cannot have any real influence on the outcome of the point under discussion.

Functions of the AO/LC:

132. In considering possible protection under Article 37, it is not of insignificant value to note that the start point is that the adjudicative process of the WRC under the 1977 and 1991 Acts, constitute the administration of justice under Article 34 of the Constitution: all members of the Court so agree. This in itself is of some note. The powers given by the Act to facilitate this process have been set out earlier in this judgment and do not require repetition here. However in short, could I highlight the following: firstly, that almost fifty pieces of legislation are now subject to that process, secondly, virtually an entire area of law, namely all employment disputes are governed by it and whilst its provisions do not preclude an action at law, nevertheless the evidence is dramatic in showing what a vast number of complaints have been adjudicated upon by the WRC in the period between October, 2015 to May, 2019. Therefore, it must be seen as the mainstream vehicle within which such disputes are resolved. Thirdly, as the facts of this case strikingly demonstrate, dismissal issues can have major consequence for reputation, good name and for the right to earn a livelihood. Fourthly, the jurisdiction in monetary terms is limited only by double what a person's salary is. Given that the average industrial wage is approximately €40,000, it can therefore extend from €80,000 at that average level up to multiples of that figure in the case of high earners. Without any imagination whatsoever an award could be significantly greater than the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court in personal injury matters, in contract and in other tort actions. Furthermore, both the AO and the Labour Court have the power to order the re-engagement or re-instatement of an employee which is at least akin to the court making a mandatory order, in effect compelling even a recalcitrant employer to resume a working relationship with an unwelcome employee. Accordingly, given those widespread powers of the WRC, and noting the size of the national workforce which in this jurisdiction is upward of 2.32 million, I take the view that the same are constitutionally flawed and must remain so unless whatever limitations can be found in respect of such powers are sufficient for Article 37 purposes.

Suggested Limitations:

133. One of the most striking and worrying aspects of what is suggested as constituting the necessary limitations is the commonality of the features proposed. Firstly, the absence of inherent jurisdiction: to my knowledge there is no entity, other than the High Court and this Court (now also the Court of Appeal) which can be said to have a power, authority or a jurisdiction which is correctly described as "inherent". Secondly, apart from the High Court and the existing appellate structure, every creature of statute is bound by the parameters of its legislative remit: the extent of it is a matter of construction and not relevant here. What matters is that all such bodies must remain within the four corners of the powers deposited with them. Thirdly, it must logically follow that there will be a point beyond which such bodies cannot go: for at that stage they would have exceeded their jurisdiction. Take the Circuit Court as an obvious example but there are many others also: on the civil side the most common actions might be in contract and tort, the upper limit of which is €60,000 for personal injuries and otherwise €75,000. Fourthly, all inferior courts and bodies are subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of the High Court, whether by way of certiorari, mandamus, injunction or other remedy, now for the greater part all moved by way of judicial review: this is a constitutional imperative as is evident from Article 34.3.1. Fifthly, with the vast majority of decisions, adjudications, and determinations by whatever name, there is some right of review, re-assessment or of appeal, whatever that might be called and finally, the reliance on the activities of the WRC being confined to resolving disputes under a limited number of Acts is entirely unpersuasive: in fact in light of the numerous enactments involved, the force of the point is to the contrary. As applying to the 2015 Act, I cannot see in any of these matters how either singularly or collectively they could constitute the type of "limitation" envisaged by Article 37 of the Constitution. Furthermore, the role of the District Court in the enforcement process, is for the reasons above outlined, so denuded of substance that it could not in my view be regarded as adding value to the respondents' alternative claim as seeking safety in that provision.

134. In looking at such "limitations" said to exist in relation to the WRC and said to maintain the survival of the process under Article 37, I confess, with the greatest respect that if such are intended to create some sort of template by which future Article 34/37 issues are to be determined, I fear that the yardstick of judgment by such routine matters could gravely undermine our present understanding of that provision and Article 34 and could potentially lead the legislature to contemplate precisely what Professor Casey had in mind which if occurred, would seriously damage the judicial role. The concerns of MacMenamin J. are not at all far-fetched in this regard. That of course would be a bad day for our constitutional stability.

135. Two further points if I might, even if the first is slightly out of sequence. In my view, it is only where a court has a decisive influence on the substantive outcome that its involvement could possibly save the powers of an administrative body which otherwise violated Article 34. In saying this, I am speaking of the courts' intervention at first instance level and not at any later stage. Secondly, I have never taken the view that a right of appeal could render constitutional the exercise of judicial power by a non-judicial body. I cannot see any logic or justification for such view. In any event in this case, the appeal is to the Labour Court which is not a court and its independence in a constitutional sense is questionable.

Conclusion on Article 37:

136. None of the above suggested reasons are such as to constitute a "limitation" as properly understood, of the adjudicative functions and powers of the WRC under the 2015 Act. I therefore would hold that such provisions are inconsistent with Article 34 and cannot attract the protection of Article 37 of the Constitution.

Constitutional Justice/Fair Procedures:

137. Under this heading of argument, the appellant suggests that his rights under Article 40.3.1 and 2 of the Constitution have been violated. Four specific complaints were made in this regard.

Legal Qualification:

i) The Act contains no requirement for adjudication officers or members of the Labour Court to have any legal qualifications, training or experience: This was rejected by Simons J., who found that a decision-maker with relevant experience would be able to make necessary determinations of fact and, in respect of any difficult legal questions, that there was adequate recourse to the Labour Court but in particular also to the High Court.

The Oath

ii) There is no provision for an adjudication officer to administer an oath or affirmation: this was also rejected by the trial judge, who held that there was no constitutional requirement to have an unfair dismissals claim conducted on the basis of sworn evidence. The procedures provided for were obviously less stringent than those in criminal proceedings but also had attendant benefits such as informality and expedition. Having the evidence sworn before the Labour Court on appeal, was sufficient to put the mind of the learned judge at ease.

Cross Examination:

iii) There is no express provision made for the cross-examination of witnesses: this argument failed to have regard to the principles enumerated in that case, namely that administrative proceedings had to be conducted in accordance with the laws of natural of justice; at a practical level this translated into an assumption that if cross-examination was required, the adjudication officer would permit it. Therefore, the 2015 Act is not necessarily defective in this regard.

Otherwise than in Public:

iv) The proceedings before an adjudication officer are held otherwise than in public: The final argument made was rejected by Simons J. on the basis that a public hearing in an appellate court could remedy the hearing at first instance being conducted in private.

138. At the level of principle I reject the suggestion, so frequently found in the case law of many courts, including this Court, that a review, by appeal, case stated, judicial review or otherwise, can somehow be a substitute for an unacceptable system operating at the front line: save in very limited circumstances, a two or multi-step measure, unless made absolutely clear that such is truly a composite event or a single process, demands at each level, the application of such constitutional justice as may be appropriate. As experience has shown, employment disputes can often involve difficult questions of law as well as having to discern fact from non-fact, accuracy from inaccuracy and truth from un-truth. Those who regularly practice their profession or carry out their responsibilities involving such issues, are well qualified to that end, whereas persons even if otherwise suitable, may fall short of having the requisite skill, knowledge or experience in this regard. The availability of an appeal to the Labour Court or to the High Court on a point of law is no substitute for these attributes.

139. In relation to the WRC, I fully appreciate why it may not be necessary on all occasions to have qualified lawyers determining such issues. However, the availability of a panel of such persons would in my view be central to the legitimacy of the process, as would be the discerning appointment of suitable individuals in any given case who would, having regard to the issues, be in a position to properly reflect the requirements of constitutional justice. If a lawyer is reasonably required, a lawyer should be appointed. In fact, any doubt or uncertainty in this regard should be dealt with by the exercise of a generous perspective rather than by the adoption of a minimalist approach. In the belief that the process will heretofore be conducted on that basis, I would not regard the absence of legal qualifications, per se, as being unconstitutional in respect of the appointment of, or the exercise of his or her function by an adjudication officer.

140. With respect, it seems extraordinary to me that no provision has been made for the administration of the oath in respect of a body, such as that under discussion, given the range of its powers and functions vested in it. Where, as I suspect, the vast majority of cases that go to a hearing are contentious, certainly as to fact and maybe as to law, the absence of an express power in this regard is utterly lacking in constitutional compliance. In that regard, I agree entirely with the order proposed by O'Donnell J.

141. Given the presumption of constitutionality and the absolute obligation on every "adjudicating" body to act judicially and comply with natural and constitutional justice, the failure to expressly make provision for cross examination, even if extremely difficult to understand, is however not fatal. Again, where there is any conflict of fact, the adjudicator, to render compliance with his or her duty, must readily accede to any bona fide request made by either party to cross examine a witness on their evidence. This is one of the most basic instinctive requirements of justice. A denial, even where peripheral, should only be made, by conscious decision and then on sustainable grounds which are duly explained, as otherwise such could potentially render the process unlawful.

142. With regard to the proceedings being held otherwise than in public, I agree with O'Donnell J. and MacMenamin J. that the blanket ban on hearing any of the referred cases in public is unconstitutional. I can well accept that a statutory provision which for just cause allows such a course to be adopted could and most probably would be constitutionally valid, but without vesting any discretionary power on the adjudicator to make that decision, the underlying statutory direction cannot stand.

The Systemic Point:

143. A further argument made under Article 40.3 of the Constitution was that the system of adjudication by adjudicating officers suffered from systemic deficiencies which travelled far beyond this particular case. The essential evidence in this respect was given by both Mr.

Tom Mallen B.L., and Mr. Kieran O'Meara, Solicitor. Whilst the appellant's own solicitor, who himself is an experienced practitioner in this area, supported what was averred to, it is perhaps more satisfactory to stand that aside given his retainer by Mr. Zalewski. In any event, both Mr. Mallen and Mr. O'Meara, each of whom are pre-eminent in the field of industrial relations law, stated in their evidence that since its creation in 2015, they have knowledge of several hearings, conducted by A.O.s without appropriate qualification or experience and who in their view lacked the competence to decide issues significant to a just resolution of the complaint. It is difficult to fault either for not identifying a particular adjudication officer or for not giving the title of individual cases. Neither Mr. Mallen nor Mr. O'Meara were cross examined on their affidavits and given the breadth of their experience in this area and the cogency of their evidence, the disclosures made are troublesome indeed. For me, a call on this issue is much closer than it was for the learned trial judge. However, if one steps back a little from that detail and considers the overall flavour of the evidence given, it would not for me take a great deal more to render this a very serious issue indeed. However, in view of the other conclusions, I do not find it necessary to go further other than to again highlight the importance of addressing these concerns in an acceptable way.

Conclusion

144. In conclusion, I hold that the procedures adopted by the WRC violate Article 34 of the Constitution and are not saved by Article 37. Secondly, even if I did not reach this conclusion, I would also hold that the appellant's rights under Article 40.3.1 and 2 have been breached in the manner indicated. I would hear the parties as to the precise orders which should follow. In the above circumstances and given the conclusions reached, it is unnecessary to consider the Convention claim.

[2009] IESC 10 Judgment delivered by Finnegan J. [rem diss.]

THE SUPREME COURT

APPEAL NO. 464/2006

Denham J.
Hardiman J.
Finnegan J.

BETWEEN

PLAINTIFF/RESPONDENT

and

DUNNES STORES LIMITED

DEFENDANT/APPELLANT

Judgment of Mr Justice Finnegan delivered on the 12th day of February 2009

The respondent was an employee of the appellant. The respondent in his pleadings advances a number of causes of action. For the purposes of this appeal the issues which arise are as follows:-

1. Was the respondent wrongfully dismissed by reason of a breach by the appellant of the implied term of the contract of employment that it would not conduct itself in a manner likely to destroy or seriously damage the relationship of confidence and trust between employer and employee, such breach amounting to repudiation of the contract of employment which the respondent was entitled to accept.

2. Was the respondent in breach of the contract of employment and/or negligent and in breach of duty as a result of which the respondent sustained personal injury and special damage being five months loss of earnings referable to a period over and above the three month notice period during which the respondent was unemployed in consequence of personal injury.

The factual background

The respondent commenced employment with the appellant as a trainee manger in April 1980 at the age of nineteen. On completion of his training he was employed as a store manager at various locations until 1988. From 1988 until November 2000 he transferred from store management to the position of buyer being successively group footwear merchandiser, men's footwear buyer and men's readymade buyer. On his last management performance review in February 2000 his performance was generally rated at the level of "effective contribution". The assessment provided for four performance standards in descending order – excellent, highly effective, effective contribution and below standard. The review contained a comment "colour issue". Some years prior to that review the appellant had a colour blindness test carried out on all buyers and the respondent was reported as colour blind. Notwithstanding this he had been moved to a position as men's readymade buyer. From February 2000 onwards the plaintiff's evidence was that there was a change of attitude towards him evidenced by the following:-

(a) Unlike previous years as a buyer when he spent as many as fifty days abroad during 2000 he was sent abroad only once.

(b) There was an increased interest in the state of his health notwithstanding an excellent work attendance record. He had been diagnosed with Crohn's disease in 1978. He had a recurrence of his disease in 1995 and again in spring 2000. In the years 1995, 1996 and 1999 he missed one day through illness. He had no absences in 1998. He was absent for five days in 1997 and seven days in 2000 up to 23rd November 2000 (the relevance of which date will appear hereafter).

In July 2000 he was told that he was not being sent on a trip to the Far East because Mrs Heffernan was concerned that he might get ill on account of his Crohn's disease and he considered this "bizarre". In October 2000 the respondent was informed that he was to be transferred from buying back to store management and his colour blindness was adverted to at this time. He was informed on the 22nd November 2000 that he was to be moved to the appellant's store in the ILAC Centre Dublin as either department manager of menswear or ladieswear. The respondent considered this demotion and sought a meeting with Mrs Heffernan and a meeting took place on the 23rd November 2000. At the meeting it was agreed that the respondent would return to store management initially at the appellant's store in Blanchardstown Shopping Centre, which was regarded as it's flagship store, where he would undergo training with a view to being fast-tracked for appointment as store manager or regional manager within six to twelve months. The respondent's understanding was that he would commence work in the ladieswear department in Blanchardstown on the 4th December 2000. On the 27th November 2000 the respondent was directed to report for duty that day to Blanchardstown and to take up a position in the homewares department. He considered this a variation of his agreement with Mrs Heffernan and he tried to contact her without success as she was abroad. He did not go to Blanchardstown on the 27th November 2000 but was contacted the next day by the director of store operations Mr McNiffe. On the 28th and 29th November the respondent had three meetings with Mr McNiffe. At the meeting on the 28th November 2000 the respondent refused to go to Blancharsdstown until such time as he had spoken with Mrs Heffernan. There were two meetings on the 29th November 2000. At the first meeting the respondent read out a statement which he had prepared but refused to furnish a copy of the same to Mr McNiffe and maintained his refusal to go to Blanchardstown. At the second meeting the respondent maintained this position and Mr McNiffe suspended him from work with pay. Thereafter the respondent's communications to the appellant were largely through his solicitors. The first solicitors' letter dated 7th December 2000 made it clear that the respondent would go to Blanchardstown on the terms which he had agreed with Mrs Heffernan. The matters raised on his behalf were that the transfer was taking place seven days earlier than agreed, a plan to fast track him was not yet prepared and that the position was in homewares. In the letter the respondent's solicitors said in relation to the respondent's suspension:-

> "The effect of this quite extraordinary conduct on the part of the company towards our client and the stress generated by it, has resulted in our client becoming ill and he attended his doctor on 1 December and again today, 7 December, who has ordered him to rest and certificates to this effect have been delivered to the company."

The letter threatened proceedings if the suspension was not lifted. In a short report of 31st January 2001 the respondent's treating surgeon had this to say:-

> "Over the last while he has had an exacerbation of symptoms (of Crohn's disease) and I have no doubt the recent wrangle has exacerbated his symptoms and has resulted in him having to increase his medication."

In a reply of 12th December 2000 the appellant's solicitors gave as the reason for the respondent's suspension his attitude at the meetings with Mr McNiffe, his persistence in seeking to speak to Mrs Heffernan and his refusal to explain his issues to Mr McNiffe which they categorised as unreasonable. The letter indicated that the appellant was prepared to overlook the incident provided that the respondent reported to work in Blancharstown as soon as certified fit to do so by his doctor.

Having considered this evidence the learned trial judge categorised the attitude of each of the parties. The respondent considered that Mrs Heffernan was intent on ousting him from his employment. He attributed this to jealousy of the respondent's brother who had achieved remarkable commercial success. Mrs Heffernan had alluded to this at the meeting on the 23rd November 2000. The learned trial judge found that the appellant was motivated by sound management considerations in deciding to transfer the respondent from buying to store management. However the respondent's solicitors letter of the 7th December 2000 should have sounded alarm bells with the respondent's senior management as to the respondent's state of health. On the other hand the appellant inferred from the respondent's conduct that he had an ulterior motive in that he was attempting to orchestrate a situation in which he could get a severance payment or compensation: the learned trial judge held that this was an incorrect inference. She concluded that while some of the respondent's behaviour might be characterised as unreasonable, it was attributable to his trust in the appellant's senior management executives having been shattered. The learned trial judge noted that responses from Mr McNiffe to the respondent's solicitors letters were sent directly to the respondent at his home address sometimes by courier and sometimes on Saturday, and, while the appellant was entitled to communicate directly with the respondent this course heightened the respondent's distrust of the appellant and increased the stress he was under.

The respondent reported for work in Blanchardstown on 28th December 2000 having been cleared to do so by his doctor. There was an incident that day. He was dressed casually in the manner in which he dressed while working as a buyer in Head Office. He was informed by Mr Sills, the store manager, that the dress code for managers was a conservative coloured suit and formal footwear. The respondent asked Mr Sills to put that in writing and Mr Sills did so on the 29th December 2000. The respondent explained that he was on the defensive at this time because of the cumulative effect of the problems which he was having. He ceased work again four days later on account of ill health. He contended that his treatment at Blanchardstown in this period exacerbated his ill health. He particularised two matters:-

(a) A document entitled "Drapery Management Analysis" widely circulated included his name under the heading of "new trainees" which he considered humiliating, defamatory and vindictive. The document is in fact no more than a manuscript duty roster for the particular store for a particular week.

(b) A personalised twelve week homewares training plan which was furnished to him on his arrival was appropriate to a newly joined trainee and failed to take account of his twenty one years experience.

These complaints were contained in a letter of 11th January 2000 from the respondent's solicitors in which it was alleged that these matters were a continuation of a course of treatment which began the preceding February designed to sideline him out of management and out of his employment. The letter demanded the withdrawal of the Drapery Management Analysis and the preparation of an appropriately devised training plan. There was a measured and conciliatory response from Mr McNiffe by reply dated 12th January 2000. Mr McNiffe explained the mis-description in the roster as an oversight and sought flexibility on the respondent's part in giving the training programme a chance to work. He explained that in the twelve years since the respondent had been in store management much had changed and that it was important that the respondent re-learn the business from the ground up. The respondent was requested to return to work the following Monday. By letter dated 21st February 2001 the respondent's solicitors advised the appellant that the respondent's treating surgeon had indicated that the respondent might return to work but that before doing so the respondent required confirmation in relation to the training programme and his future career path and that a communication be circulated to all management and staff within head office and all stores to correct the mis-description in the Drapery Management Analysis. There was further correspondence but ultimately a meeting was arranged for the 7th March 2001 between the respondent and his solicitor and Mr McNiffe and the appellant's solicitor and at which a stenographer retained by the respondent attended. Following the meeting Mr McNiffe wrote to the respondent setting out the matters which had been, he considered, agreed and this gave rise to further disagreement and further correspondence. The first matter in issue was the length of time before the respondent would proceed to a position as store manager or regional manager: Mr McNiffe suggested that this could take eighteen months with an initial position as No. 2 before progressing to a position of No. 1. in store management. The respondent was insisting on a time scale of three to six months rather than the six to twelve months mentioned by Mrs Heffernan at the meeting of 23rd November 2000 notwithstanding that he had only attended for work in Blanchardstown for four days since that meeting. The second related to the training programme and the extent to which the respondent should be involved in its preparation. The first matter was not resolved prior to the respondent leaving his employment. On the second matter while a training programme was produced on the 8th March 2001 the respondent's solicitors raised in correspondence a number of points in relation to the same with which Mr McNiffe was not prepared to agree. A third matter was in relation to the Drapery Management Analysis and concerned the text of an announcement made. The announcement as circulated was not in the terms agreed. The learned trial judge held that the substance of the announcement was as agreed and she did not consider the variations to be of significance. The circulation was narrower, the learned trial judge held, than the respondent was entitled to expect.

There were further live issues at this time. One related to a Christmas bonus of €1,500 which the respondent claimed to be entitled to in respect of Christmas 2000. Another related to a schedule of monthly meetings which it was agreed on the 7th March 2001 should take place between the respondent and senior management. A meeting scheduled for the 8th May 2001 had not taken place and by letter dated 9th May 2001 the respondent's solicitors complained of this. The learned trial judge held that in view of the respondent's absence through illness the appellant was justified in considering the complaint unreasonable.

The respondent returned to work towards the end of April 2001. His solicitors continued to raise issues on his behalf in correspondence. He continued to work until the 15th May 2001. On the 15th May 2001 the respondent was rostered for duty from 10 a.m. to 8.30 p.m. but incorrectly believed that he had been rostered for duty from 8.30 a.m. to 6 p.m. He attended at 8.30 a.m. During the morning Mr Sills the store manager made it clear to the respondent that he was required to attend until 8.30 p.m.

There were heated exchanges. Mr Sills made it clear that he was the respondent's superior and the respondent's reply was that Mr Sills could deal with his solicitor. He did not work until 8.30 p.m. The learned trial judge found that in relation to this incident the respondent was in the wrong and that Mr Sills conduct was understandable.

By letter dated the 30th May 2001 the respondent's solicitors wrote to the appellant's solicitors as follows:-

> "We refer to our letters of 1 May and 9 May, neither of which have received a response. Our client has kept us closely advised of the developments at his place of employment which have had a severely adverse effect on his health. We have advised our client that the company has repudiated its obligations towards him as an employee. Our client has written the enclosed letter to Mrs Margaret Heffernan.
> We have been instructed to seek damages against the company in relation to the company's repudiation of the contract of employment and to the reckless imposition by the company of physical and emotional suffering on our client including an abusive verbal attack on our client by a senior manager in the presence of other members of management and staff. Unless we receive from the company within seven days of the date of this letter, adequate proposals to compensate our client, proceedings will issue without any further notice. In that event we shall be obliged for your confirmation that you have authority to accept service of such proceedings on behalf of your client."

The letter from the respondent enclosed therewith complained that the appellant had failed to honour his understanding of the meeting of 7th March 2001. He complained of the altercation with Mr Sills on the 15th May 2001. Finally he complained that his working environment was hostile to his health and in consequence he had been advised by his consultant Professor Ó Morain to cease working in that environment.

Thereafter the respondent was out of work for a period of approximately eight months. At the end of January 2002 he obtained a position as a buyer with another retail group on terms no less favourable than those which he had enjoyed with the appellant.

High Court findings on the evidence

On the evidence the learned High Court judge made the following findings:-

(a) There was little disagreement between the parties as to the terms of the contract of employment. In dispute, however, was the respondent's entitlement to a Christmas bonus of €1,500 and an annual bonus of €5,000. The learned High Court judge found that the respondent had earned each of these bonuses and awarded the respondent the same in respect of the period 31st May 2001 to the 19th January 2002 in the amount of €9,079.00.

(b) It was a term of the respondent's contract of employment that the appellant acting reasonably could assign him from one work location to another and from one management function to another appropriate management function. Change of work location was not an issue for the respondent. The appellant was entitled to transfer the respondent from buying to a suitable position in store management commensurate with his experience.

(c) It was an implied term of the respondent's contract that both the employer and the employee would maintain mutual trust and confidence.

(d) The respondent sought to set up what happened between him and Mrs Hefferman on the 23rd November 2000 as a free standing agreement. The appellant categorised the meeting as a consultation process. The learned trial judge held that neither view was correct but that what transpired at the meeting on the 23rd November 2000 must be interpreted in the context of the implied term that both the employer and the employee would maintain mutual trust and confidence.

(e) The appellant acted bona fide in deciding to move the respondent from buying to store management.

(f) The respondent through Mrs Heffernan had a bona fide concern about the respondent's health. The respondent worked in the same building as Mrs Heffernan and their paths crossed occasionally. The respondent was unwell from March 2000 onwards and this must have been obvious to anyone who would meet him. He had an uncharacteristic number of absences because of illness during 2000.

(g) The appellant's treatment of the respondent up to and including 23rd November 2000 viewed objectively was such that appropriate steps were taken by the appellant to allay the respondent's concerns in relation to the proposed move and to protect the employer and employee relationship.

(h) Mr McDermott (the respondent's departmental head) or Mrs Heffernan or both "were subconsciously, if not consciously, aware of the respondent's vulnerability at the time of the meeting of 23rd November 2000."

(i) After the 23rd November 2000 Mr McNiffe failed to have proper regard to the respondent's medical condition. This is particularly so after the appellant was informed by the respondent's solicitor by letter of 7th December 2000 of the effects of the stress generated by his suspension on the respondent.

(j) In the absence of knowledge of the respondent's physical and mental condition an objective assessment of the respondent's conduct after 23rd November 2000 justifies the conclusion that the respondent was being unreasonable. Samples of such conduct are the respondent's refusal to share with Mr McNiffe the issues which were troubling him and his insistence on speaking to Mrs Heffernan at the meetings on the 28th and 29th November 2000, his reaction to Mr Sill's instruction in relation to dress code on 28th December 2000, and some of his requirements in relation to the training programme produced on 14th March 2001.

(k) Mr McNiffe adopted an uncompromising stance with the respondent from the outset in requiring the respondent to attend for work in Blanchardstown or else he would be suspended. After the suspension was lifted Mr McNiffe would not deal with the respondent until he returned to work in Blanchardstown notwithstanding that the respondent was on sick leave and the appellant had been warned of the effect which his work situation was having on the respondent and of the respondent's perception of the appellant's motivation. The appellant maintained this stance for three months. The stance was informed by the appellant's perception that the respondent never had any intention of allowing the move to Blanchardstown to work which view was erroneous.

(l) The respondent's perception of the appellant's motivation was reinforced by the error of including his name under the heading "new trainee" on the roster in January 2001 and the failure to supply him with a suitable training programme.

(m) The appellant ought to have been aware that the extension of the time frame for achieving a position as store manager or regional manager from twelve months to eighteen months would reinforce the respondent's distrust.

(n) The delay of one week in producing a training programme would be inconsequential in the normal course of events. In the present case, however, it would be of significance to the respondent because it was envisaged that he would have it before he returned to work. The insistence that the respondent return to work before the programme was available was unnecessarily peremptory.

(o) The respondent's submission that there was a series of breaches of the contract of employment by the appellant, the accumulation of which resulted in a repudiation of the contract, is not correct.

(p) The manner in which the appellant dealt with the respondent in the knowledge of the precarious nature of his physical and psychological health viewed objectively amounted to oppressive conduct likely to seriously damage the employer/employee relationship and it did so. Accordingly the appellant breached its obligation to maintain trust and confidence. Breach of that obligation goes to the root of the contract of employment.

(q) The respondent's work situation prolonged the respondent's ill health and caused his failure to respond to treatment.

(r) The respondent was justified in leaving his employment on receiving his treating surgeon's advice.

(s) The respondent is entitled to an award of damages for wrongful dismissal in the amount which he would have earned had he continued for a period commensurate with the notice to which he was entitled: three months notice is reasonable notice.

The Law – Breach of Contract

There is implied in a contract of employment a mutual obligation that the employer and the employee will not without reasonable and proper cause conduct themselves in a manner likely to destroy or seriously damage the relationship of confidence and trust between them. The term is implied by law and is incident to all contracts of employment unless expressly excluded. The term imposes reciprocal duties on the employer and the employee. In assessing whether there has been a breach by the employer what is significant is the impact of the employer's behaviour on the employee rather than what the employer intended. Having regard to the mutuality of the obligation the impact of an employee's behaviour is also relevant. The test is an objective one: if conduct objectively considered is likely to cause serious damage to the relationship between employer and employee a breach of the implied obligation may arise. Malik v Bank of Credit and Commerce International S.A. [1996] I.C.R. 406.

In Lewis v Motorworld Garages Limited [1986] I.C.R. 157 Browne-Wilkinson J. summarised the law as follows:-

1. In order to prove that he has suffered constructive dismissal an employee who leaves his employment must prove that he did so as a result of a breach of contract by his employer, which shows that the employer no longer intends to be bound by an essential term of the contract: see Western Excavating (E.C.C.) Limited v Sharp [1978] I.C.R. 221.

2. However, there are normally implied in a contract of employment mutual rights and obligations of trust and confidence. A breach of this implied term may justify the employee in leaving and claiming that he has been constructively dismissed: see Post Office v Roberts [1980] I.R.L.R. 347 and Woods v W.M. Car Services (Peterborough) Limited [1981] I.C.R. 666, 670 per Browne-Wilkinson J.

3. The breach of this implied obligation of trust and confidence may consist of a series of actions on the part of the employer which cumulatively amount to a breach of the term, though each individual incident may not do so. In particular in such a case the last action of the employer which leads to the employee leaving need not itself be a breach of contract; the question is, does the cumulative series of acts taken together amount to a breach of the implied term. See Woods v

W.M. Car Services (Peterborough) Limited [1981] I C.R. 666. This is the 'last straw' situation."

As to the "last straw" it was held in Omilaju v Waltham Forest London Borough Council [2005] 1 All. E.R. 75 that the quality that a "last straw" had to possess was that it was an act in a series whose cumulative effect amounted to a breach of the implied term. The essential quality of that act was that, when taken in conjunction with the earlier acts on which an employee relied, it amounted to a breach of the implied term of trust and confidence.

As to whether conduct amounts to a repudiation of the contract the ordinary law of contract applies: the cumulative effect of the acts complained of must be such as to indicate that a party, in this case the employer, had repudiated its contract. Brown v Merchant Ferries Limited [1998] I.R.L.R. 682. It had earlier been held in Woods v W.M. Car Services (Peterborough) Limited [1981] I.R.L.R. 347 by Browne-Wilkinson J. following Courtaulds Northern Textiles Limited v Andrew [1979] I.R.L.R. 84 that any breach of the implied term that the employers will not, without reasonable and proper cause, conduct themselves in the manner calculated or likely to destroy or seriously damage the relationship of confidence and trust between employer and employee was a fundamental breach amounting to a repudiation since it necessarily went to the root of the contract. This broad statement was not accepted by the Court of Appeal in Bliss v South East Thames Regional Health Authority [1985] I.R.L.R. 308. Nor was it accepted by Douglas Brodie in an article in the Industrial Law Journal, Volume 25, No. 2 at p.121 which article was referred to with approval in both Malik v Bank of Credit and Commerce International and in Browne v Merchant Ferries Limited.

It must not be forgotten, however, that the implied term applies to both the employer and the employee. Thus in Woods v W.M. Car Services (Peterborough) Limited [1981] I.C.R. 666 Browne-Wilkinson J. said:-

> "In our view it is clearly established that there is implied in a contract of employment a term that the employers will not, without reasonable and proper cause, conduct themselves in a manner calculated or likely to destroy or seriously damage the relationship of confidence and trust between the employer and employee: Courtaulds Northern Textiles Limited v Andrew [1979] I.R.L.R. 84. To constitute a breach of this implied term it is not necessary to show that the employer intended any repudiation of the contract; the Tribunal's function is to look at the employer's conduct as a whole and determine whether it is such that its effect, judged reasonably and sensibly, is such that the employee cannot be expected to put up with it: see British Aircraft Corporation Limited v Austin [1978] I.R.L.R. 332 and Post Office v Roberts [1980] I.R.L.R. 347. The conduct of the parties has to be looked at as a whole and its cumulative impact assessed; Post Office v Roberts. "

The learned trial judge's finding in the present case on this aspect was as follows:-

> "In my view the (respondent's) submission that there was a series of breaches of contract on the part of the (appellant) and that the accumulation of those breaches resulted in a repudiation by the (appellant) of the (respondent's) contract is not correct. The correct interpretation of what happened is that the manner in which the (appellant) dealt with the (respondent) in the knowledge of the precarious nature of his physical and psychological health viewed objectively amounted to oppressive conduct. It was likely to seriously damage their employer/employee relationship and it did so. Accordingly, the (appellant) breached its obligation to maintain the (respondent's) trust and confidence."

The learned trial judge found that up to and including the 23rd November 2000 objectively the appellant took appropriate steps to protect the employer and employee relationship. Having regard to the learned trial judge's findings it is necessary to look at the conduct of each of the parties after the 23rd November 2000. The appropriate test must be applied to that conduct. In relation to the test the following matters are to be noted:-

1. The test is objective.
2. The test requires that the conduct of both employer and employee be considered.
3. The conduct of the parties as a whole and the accumulative effect must be looked at.
4. The conduct of the employer complained of must be unreasonable and without proper cause and its effect on the employee must be judged objectively, reasonably and sensibly in order to determine if it is such that the employee cannot be expected to put up with it.

Conclusion on the breach of contract claim

The test must be applied to the events which occurred after the 23rd November 2000.

On the 27th November 2000 the respondent was instructed to report to Blanchardstown. He did not do so. The appellant made contact with him and discussions took place over the 28th and 29th November 2000. The learned trial judge found that at that date the appellant was "subconsciously" aware of the respondent's vulnerability. The appellant was indeed aware that the respondent suffered from Crohn's disease. However the appellant was first notified that stress was exacerbating his Crohn's disease on receipt of the solicitor's letter of the 7th December 2000. There was no evidence to justify a conclusion that at the date of these events the appellant's were aware of the respondent's mental condition or if it's effect on his Chron's disease. Applying an objective test to the suspension of the respondent with pay it cannot be said, in my view, that the same was unreasonable. The appellant acted bona fide and within its rights in deciding to move the respondent from buying to store management and to the location at Blanchardstown. The respondent's refusal to co-operate until such time as he should speak to Mrs Heffernan was in my view unreasonable. In Harrington v Irish Life and Permanent Plc, the High Court, unreported 18th June 2003 Smyth J. stated the law as follows:-

> 1. the employer impliedly contracts to obey the lawful and reasonable orders of his employer (or his employer's delegate) within the scope of the employment he contracted to undertake. Chitty on Contracts (24th ed. Vol. 2 para. 37-050); and
> 2. it has long been part of our law that a person expudiates the contract of service if he wilfully disobeys the lawful and reasonable orders of his Master. Such a refusal fully justifies an employer in dismissing him summarily.

(Per Karminski L.J. in Pepper v Webb [1969] 2 All E.R. 216 at 218, cited with approval and adopted by Hamilton J. as he then was in Brewster v Burke & Anor [1985] 4 J.I.S.L.L. 98 at p.100)."

Notwithstanding the seriousness of the respondent's refusal to comply with the direction given to him the appellant did not seek to dismiss the respondent but rather adopted the significantly less draconian measure of suspending him with pay. This course was adopted only after three meetings over two days at which the respondent was asked to re-consider his stance. Objectively the respondent's conduct was unreasonable. On hearing from the respondent's solicitor by letter dated 7th December 2000 the appellant gave an unequivocal assurance of willingness to overlook the incidents provided the respondent returned to work as soon as his doctor should certify him as fit to do so.

When certified fit to return to work the respondent did return on the 28th December 2000. By this date the appellant was on notice of the state of the respondent's health having received his solicitors' letter of 7th December 2000. However the respondent had been certified as fit to return to work by his medical adviser and the appellant was entitled to rely on this. Immediately the incident relating to the dress code for managers occurred. The respondent required that Mr Sills instruct him in writing as to the dress code. The exchange, according to the respondent, was not an unpleasant one but the request to put the dress code in writing would justify concerns in the appellant as to the course of future interaction with the respondent. The occurrence, however, is neutral for present purposes neither party having acted unreasonably.

The next incident which occurred was the error in the Drapery Management Analysis or roster which described the respondent as a new trainee. It was a mistake and was promptly acknowledged by the appellant as such. It offended the respondent. However mistakes occur and there is no reason to consider what occurred other than as a mistake. The appellant did not act unreasonably and judged objectively the effect upon the respondent could not reasonably have been anticipated.

The respondent objected to the personalised training plan as being appropriate to a newly joined trainee and as ignoring his twenty one years experience. However he was new to homewares. As pointed out by the appellant much had changed in the period during which the respondent was absent from store management and operating as a buyer. Nonetheless reasonable attempts were made to accommodate the respondent's concerns and a new plan was provided albeit seven days too late. I would not categorise the appellant's conduct in relation to the plan viewed objectively as unreasonable. There was a willingness to accommodate some, if not all, of the respondent's concerns. The learned trial judge found that the appellant was aware of the respondent's vulnerability at the date of preparation of the original training plan: I understand this to mean the normal anxiety and concern which any employee might feel on a significant change in his employment taking place. I do not consider the appellant's course of conduct in relation to the training plan as unreasonable or oppressive.

The correction to the Drapery Management Analysis was not in the form agreed but was in substance to like effect. Its circulation was narrower than required. The Analysis was a document internal to Blanchardstown being the store's duty roster for a particular week. It consisted of a printed document with a number of columns each headed with a brief description of an employee category or function: one such heading was "new trainee" and while not appropriate to the respondent this was the heading best reflecting the respondent's situation. The form was completed in manuscript listing the names of employees under each category. The respondent required the correction to be circulated by e-mail and internal post to all stores in Ireland, the U.K. and Spain and the respondent through Mr McNiffe accepted that there would be circulation by e-mail to all stores. The correction was circulated to department heads, store managers and regional managers in Ireland. I am of the view that the original limited circulation would not justify the very wide circulation required by the respondent. However his requirement was acceded to by the appellant but not complied with. I am, however, satisfied that the default by the appellant could not amount in isolation to a breach of the implied term in his contract of employment.

Meetings were agreed to take place on a monthly basis and no meeting took place on the 8th May 2001. However as the learned trial judge held this was entirely reasonable as the respondent had attended for work on only four days in December 2000 and did not attend thereafter until late April 2001.

The final matter to which it is appropriate to refer is what occurred when the respondent returned to work at the end of April 2001. On the 15th May 2001 he was rostered for duty from 10 a.m. to 8.30 p.m. but he incorrectly believed that he had been rostered for duty from 8.30 a.m. to 6.00 p.m. When he was required by Mr Sills to remain on duty until 8.30 p.m. there were heated exchanges with Mr Sills insisting that he work until 8.30 p.m. and the respondent refusing to do so. The respondent did not work beyond 6 p.m. and his final salvo was that Mr Sills could deal with his solicitor. This was part of a consistent pattern of conduct and not an isolated incident: the respondent objected to written communications to him being sent to him directly and required that all such communications should be sent to his solicitor. I consider the respondent's stance in this regard as damaging to the relationship and unreasonable.

That being the history of interaction between the appellant and the respondent and looking at each event individually and at the events cumulatively, I am satisfied that the conduct of the appellant judged objectively was not such as to amount to a repudiation of the contract of employment. The conduct judged objectively did not evince an intention not to be bound by the contract of employment. On the other hand the conduct of the respondent was in the instances mentioned above unreasonable or in error and the employer's conduct must be considered in the light of the same. In these circumstances the purported acceptance of repudiation of the contract of employment by the respondent was neither justified nor effective. The respondent must fail on his claim under this heading.

The law - personal injuries claim

As the learned trial judge found, this claim can be based in contract or in tort and it is not necessary to distinguish between the two causes of action. The respondent claims that as a result of the appellant's breach of contract or breach of duty to him he incurred a recognised psychiatric illness and not mere hurt, upset and injury to his feelings and in addition physical injury being the exacerbation of his Crohn's disease.

In Maher v Jabil Global Services Limited [2005] 16 E.L.R. 233 the plaintiff claimed that as a result of his treatment by his employer, the defendant, he suffered significant psychological harm. The plaintiff claimed that the amount of work which he was required to perform and the pressure under which he was placed by management to achieve targets which he claimed to be unrealistic gave rise to stress and that his employers knew or ought to have known that stress was a likely consequence of their conduct. As authority for the proposition that an employer may be liable for stress engendered injury to health of an employee as opposed to ordinary occupational stress the learned trial judge referred to McGrath v Trintech Technologies Limited [2005] E.L.R. 49, Quigley v Complex Tooling and Moulding, unreported, High Court, Lavan J. 9th March 2005 and Hatton v Sunderland [2002] 2 All E.R. 1.

The Court of Appeal in Hatton considered four cases in each of which as a result of stress the plaintiff suffered psychiatric illness. In examining the law the court went back to first principles – liability in negligence depends upon three inter-related requirements:

1. The existence of a duty to take care.
2. A failure to take the care which can reasonably be expected in the circumstances and
3. Damage suffered as a result of that failure.

The court held that special problems attend claims for psychiatric injury and that they require care in determination because they give rise to difficult issues of foreseeability and causation and in identifying a relevant breach of duty. As to foreseeability, the issue in most cases will be whether the employer should have taken positive steps to safeguard the employee from harm and the threshold to question is whether the kind of harm sustained to the particular employee was reasonably foreseeable. The test is not concerned with the person of ordinary fortitude. The answer may be found in asking the question whether the employer knew or ought to have known of a particular vulnerability. Stress is merely a mechanism whereby harm may be caused and it is necessary to distinguish between signs of stress and signs of impending harm to health. Frequent or prolonged absences from work which are uncharacteristic for the person concerned may make harm to health foreseeable: there must be good reason to think that the underlying cause is stress generated by the work situation rather than other factors. Where an employee is certified as fit for work by his medical adviser the employer will usually be entitled to take that at face value unless there is a good reason for him to think to the contrary. As to the duty of care the employer's duty is to take reasonable care and if the risk of harm to health is foreseeable the employer must act reasonably. It is necessary in each case to consider what the employer could and should have done. Finally if a breach of duty is found it is still necessary to show that that particular breach of duty caused the harm complained of: where there are several factors contributing to stress related illness if the employer made a material contribution he will be liable for the whole subject to any rights he may have to seek contribution from others who have contributed to the injury.

Hale L.J. set out a number of propositions which she derived from the case law the following being relevant to this case:-

1. The ordinary principles of employer's liability apply.
2. The threshold question is whether the kind of harm to the particular employee was reasonably foreseeable: this has two components (a) an injury to health (as distinct from occupational stress) which (b) is attributable to stress at work (as distinct from other factors).
3. Foreseeability depends upon what the employer knows (or ought reasonably to know) about the individual employee. Because of the nature of mental disorder it is harder to foresee than physical injury, but may be easier to foresee in a known individual than in the population at large. An employer is usually entitled to assume that the employee can withstand the normal pressures of the job unless he knows of some particular problem or vulnerability.

4. The employer is generally entitled to take what he is told by his employee (including what he is told by the employee's medical adviser) at face value unless there is good reason to think to the contrary.

5. The indications of impending harm to health arising from stress at work must be plain enough for any reasonable employer to realise that he should do something about it.

6. The employer is only in breach of duty if he has failed to take the steps which are reasonable in the circumstances, bearing in mind the magnitude of the risk of harm occurring, the gravity of the harm which may occur, the cost and practicability of preventing it, and the justifications for running the risk.

7. An employer can only reasonably be expected to take steps which are likely to do some good: the court is likely to need expert evidence on this.

8. If the only reasonable and effective steps would have been to dismiss or demote the employee the employer will not be in breach of duty in allowing a willing employee to continue in the job.

9. In all cases it is necessary to identify the steps which the employer both could and should have taken before finding him in breach of his duty of care.

10. The claimant must show that the breach of duty caused or materially contributed to the harm suffered. It is not enough to show that occupational stress has caused the harm.

The medical evidence in this case is as follows. On the 31st January 2001 Professor Colm Ó Moráin, Consultant Gastroenterologist, wrote to the respondent's solicitor a short report as follows:

> "This is to confirm that Adam is a patient of mine. He has Crohn's disease for which he has had a previous resection done in the eighties but since then he has had recurrence. Over the last while he has had an exacerbation of symptoms and I have no doubt the recent wrangle has exacerbated his symptoms and has resulted in him having to increase his medication."

In a further short report dated 25th April 2001 Professor Ó Moráin reported as follows:-

> "Adam is having ongoing problems with his Crohn's disease. He had a recent exacerbation and as a result of this he has a probable mass on the right side of his bowel which represents an inflamed portion of his bowl. I feel this is pressing on his bladder and as a result is causing recurrent urinary tract infections. He does need ongoing treatment and unfortunately the continuous stress at work is not helping his symptoms. We are closely monitoring his progress at the moment and he does require strict medical supervision at the moment but I am concerned that the level of stress at work may well be exacerbating his symptoms.

In a report of 31st May 2001 Professor Ó Moráin reported as follows:-

> "In the last year, however, Adam has been having a flare-up of his Crohn's disease and I do feel that the psychological stress he is undergoing has a major role to play in this exacerbation. The flare-up has been characterised by more frequent visits to me and increasing his doses of medication, more marked since February 2000. With his present exacerbation he will be closely monitored at weekly intervals for the next few weeks.
> I am concerned about Adam's deterioration of health and after a long discussion with him I do think that his work situation is certainly not helping health wise and I feel the best approach would be for him to get out of this environment. I feel this would be a positive contribution to his health."

As to the respondent's psychological condition there was a report from Dr. Paula McCoy, Consultant Psychiatrist. The following paragraphs of the report set out her opinion:-

> "29. The background here appears to be that of a normal individual, with a stable, social and personal family background; and a record of high achievement at the work place, notwithstanding the fact that Mr Berber has suffered from a chronic inflammatory bowel disease since his teens with arduous treatment required at times.
> 30. The history and clinical findings as I have elicited them would accord with the development of a psychological adjustment disorder, with features of anxiety and possible features of depression, in Mr Berber occurring on a background of work place stress over many months, following the occurrence of the events under consideration. This disorder is likely to have been of moderate severity.

31. It is recognised that the occurrence of ongoing stress disorders may be associated with less favourable clinical outcomes in some chronic medical conditions, including Crohn's disease and hypertension. In my view the occurrence of the psychological disorder noted at 31 above is likely to have contributed to symptom severity and possibly, to symptom duration in Mr Berber's Crohn's disease.

32. The psychological disorder noted at 31 above appears in Mr Berber's case to have resolved over the months following resolution of the situational stresses with which it was associated (work place difficulties and ensuing period of unemployment). I expect that Mr Berber's close family support, and his previously stable personality with the passage of time have been favourable factors in his recovery from this disorder."

The Civil Liability Act 1961 in section 2 defines personal injury as including any disease and any impairment of a person's physical or mental condition. The learned trial judge accepted Dr. McKay's evidence and found, as she was entitled to do on the evidence, that the adjustment disorder from which the respondent suffered constituted an illness or injury and that it exacerbated the respondent's Crohn's disease and hampered treatment of that disease. She found that the adjustment disorder and the consequential impact was attributable to the manner in which the appellant dealt with the respondent after 23rd November 2000. She found that the injuries suffered by the respondent were reasonably foreseeable and that for the like reasons for which the appellant had been found in breach of contract it was in breach of duty. As I have found that the appellant was not in breach of contract it is necessary to look at those circumstances again and apply to them the appropriate test.

Causation is not an issue in that the personal injury arose out of the circumstances existing in the work place. The learned trial judge found that at the relevant times the appellant was subconsciously aware of the respondent's vulnerability. This being so I am satisfied that a reasonable employer applying its mind to the situation would in fact be aware of that vulnerability. However that is not a vulnerability to mental injury but rather that the respondent felt vulnerable by reason of the changes in his occupation from buyer to a position in training for store management. If the respondent had applied its mind to the situation I am satisfied that it was also foreseeable having regard to his vulnerability that if it should fail to take reasonable care it would result in stress. From receipt of the respondent's solicitor's letter of the 7th December 2000 the appellant was actually aware that the respondent was suffering from stress and that the stress was affecting the respondent's Crohn's disease. Accordingly, at least from receipt of the letter of 7th December 2000 the respondent had a duty to take reasonable care not to cause harm.

The question for determination then is whether the appellant took reasonable care. What is reasonable depends upon the foreseeability of harm, the magnitude of the risk of that harm occurring, the gravity of the harm which may take place, the cost and practicality of preventing it, and the justifications for running the risk: Stokes v Guest Keen and Nettlefold (Bolts and Nuts) Limited [1968] 1 W.L.R. 1776. In Hatton v Suderland, Hale L.J. said:-

"It is essential therefore, once the risk of harm to health from stress in the work place is foreseeable, to consider whether and in what respect the employer has broken that duty. There may be a temptation, having concluded that some harm was foreseeable and that harm of that kind has taken place, to go on to conclude that the employer was in breach of his duty of care in failing to prevent that harm (and that the breach of duty caused the harm). But in every case it is necessary to consider what the employer not only could but should have done."

I have already held had that the employer's reaction to the events of the 27th, 28th and 29th March 2001 was reasonable. In the incident relating to the dress code there were exchanges but they were not heated and I am not satisfied that the appellant acted other than reasonably. The mis-description in the roster was a mistake and any harm resulting from the same in my view was unforeseeable. The error in relation to the hours upon which the respondent was rostered for duty was the respondent's mistake. The wording of the circular correcting the error in substance was as agreed. Its circulation was less than that agreed but, insofar as that fell short of the circulation agreed, the shortfall looked at in terms of the circulation of the error was not such as to make injury foreseeable. The training programme as originally drafted the discussions concerning its contents and the seven days delay in producing the revised training plan taken together are not circumstances which make mental injury foreseeable. Insofar as the appellant was unwilling to discuss the contents of the plan while the respondent was absent from work due to stress and its effect on his Crohn's disease it was perhaps more beneficial to the respondent that matters causing him stress should not be discussed until he was certified fit to return to work by his medical adviser. Had the appellant insisted on discussing the training plan at a time when the respondent was certified as unfit for work such conduct might well be regarded as oppressive conduct. Each of the incidents raised in the course of the hearing and which occurred after the 23rd November taken individually fails on the test of foreseeability. I am satisfied that cumulatively they also fail. The appellant responded reasonably to each incident as it arose and the alternative available to the appellant was to abdicate from all control of the manner in which the respondent would carry out the duties of his employment.

The injury sustained by the respondent being unforeseeable the respondent's claim based on breach of duty must fail.

Conclusion

For the reasons hereinbefore set out I will allow the appeal and set aside the judgment of the High Court save and except in so far as the sum of €9,079.00 was awarded to the respondent in respect of Christmas and annual bonus which sum should carry interest at Courts Act rate from the 1st June 2001.

Supreme Court 1st December, 1997

Contract - Employment - Whether contract for services or contract of service - Shop demonstrators - Whether "servant" or "independent contractor" - Whether "insurable persons" - Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1981 (No. 1), ss. 5(1)(a), 111(1) and 298-300.

High Court - Jurisdiction - Appeal from expert tribunal - Whether jurisdiction limited to questions of law - Whether mistake of law in decision of appeals officer - Whether findings reached on evidence and within jurisdiction - Test to be applied in determining whether findings correct - Whether conclusions of appeals officer were those which reasonable person could draw - Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1981 (No. 1), s. 300(4).

Words and phrases - "Servant" - "Independent contractor" - "Insurable person" - Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1981 (No. 1), s. 111.

Section 5(1)(a) of the Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1981, provides as follows:-

> "every person who, being over the age of 16 years and under pensionable age, is employed in any of the employments specified in Part I of the First Schedule, not being an employment specified in Part II of that Schedule, shall, subject to section 65(1), be an employed contributor for the purposes of this Act..."

Employment is defined under Part I of the First Schedule of the Act of 1981 as employment under a contract of service or apprenticeship. Section 111(1) of the Act of 1981 provides, inter alia, that every question arising in relation to a claim for benefit under the Act and as to whether a person is an "insurable person" shall be decided by a deciding officer.

Section 300(4) of the Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1981 provided [now contained in the Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1993] as follows:-

> "The Chief Appeals Officer may, at any time and from time to time, revise any decision of an appeals officer, if it appears to him that the decision was erroneous by reason of some mistake having been made in relation to the law or the facts, and, save where the question is a question to which section 298(6) applies, any person who is dissatisfied with the revised decision may appeal therefrom to the High Court on any question of law."

The appellant was contacted in 1988 by S.M. ("the demonstrator") who offered to work for the company as a shop demonstrator. The demonstrator was interviewed, placed on a panel and signed a written twelve month contract of employment. The manner in which a demonstrator was employed was that when a store requested a demonstration for a product a demonstrator on the panel was contacted, sent to the store and carried out the demonstration. The demonstrator then submitted an invoice to the appellant which was signed by the store manager. The demonstrator was paid at a daily rate and was given a mileage allowance. As a shop demonstrator under her contract of employment the demonstrator was not eligible to become a member of the appellant's pension scheme or a trade union.

The demonstrator was employed by the appellant under yearly renewable contracts from 1991 to 1993. Her written contract of employment for 1993, described her as an independent contractor and purported to make her responsible for her own tax affairs. The demonstrator worked an average of twenty eight hours a week for forty eight to fifty weeks a year and carried out approximately fifty demonstrations a year. The demonstrations were not carried out under the supervision of the appellant, however, she was required to comply with any reasonable directions given by the owner of the store and she had been provided with written instructions as to how she was to carry out her work. She was supplied by the appellant with the materials for performing the demonstration and required the consent of the appellant prior to subcontracting any of the demonstrations assigned to her.

A question arose as to whether the demonstrator was employed under a contract of service or a contract for services and was to be considered an "insurable person" under the Social Welfare Acts. The question was referred to a deciding officer, pursuant to s. 111(1) of the Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1981, who decided that the demonstrator was employed under a contract of service. The appellant appealed the decision to an appeals officer pursuant to s. 298(1) of the Act of 1981, who affirmed the decision. The appellant then applied to the Chief Appeals Officer pursuant to s. 300(4) of the Act of 1981 for a review of the decision of the appeals officer. The review was refused by the Chief Appeals Officer. The appellant then appealed the decision of the Chief Appeals Officer to the High Court by way of special summons pursuant to s. 299 and s. 300(4) of the Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1981. The High Court refused to set aside the decision of the appeals officer and held that the appeal was on a question of law only and in such an appeal the court does not go into the merits of the decision but is confined to considering if the conclusions and inferences of the appeals officer are those which no reasonable person could draw or whether they are based on an erroneous view of the law. In so deciding, the court was required to consider whether there was evidence to support the findings of fact that the demonstrator was employed under a contract of service and whether the appeals officer applied the law correctly.

At the hearing, the appellant submitted that the trial judge erred in law in the approach which she adopted to the appeal as she had failed to distinguish between the power of the High Court to set aside inferences of fact where those inferences are based on documents and its powers in regard to other inferences of fact. It was also contended that the trial judge had applied the wrong test in holding that she should only interfere with the findings of fact of the appeals officer if they were such that no reasonable person could have reached them on the evidence. It was submitted on behalf of the appellant that where the question to be determined by the appeals officer was a mixed question of law and fact a different approach should have been taken and that even if the trial judge had correctly exercised the jurisdiction of the High Court in the appeal the decision of the appeals officer should nonetheless be set aside as being incorrect in point of law as he had failed to have proper regard to the written contract of employment.

Held by the Supreme Court (Hamilton C.J., Keane and Murphy JJ.), in dismissing the appeal, 1, that the High Court should not interfere with the findings of the appeals officer unless his findings were incapable of being supported by the facts or were based on an erroneous view of the law.

2. That the only matters to be determined by the High Court were whether there was evidence to support the finding of fact by the appeals officer that the demonstrator was employed under a contract of service and whether the appeals officer had applied the correct legal principles.

Mara (Inspector of Taxes) v. Hummingbird Ltd. [1982] 2 I.L.R.M. 421 followed.

3. That it had not been shown that the appeals officer in any way misconstrued the written contract and was entirely correct in holding that he should not confine his consideration to what was contained in the written contract of employment but should have regard to all of the circumstances surrounding the demonstrator's employment.

4. That, if the appeals officer had erred in law in his construction of the written contract, his decision would be liable to be set aside by the High Court.

Dicta of Kenny J. in Mara (Inspector of Taxes) v. Hummingbird Ltd. [1982] 2 I.L.R.M. 421 approved.

5. That in deciding whether a person was employed under a contract of service or under a contract for services each case must be considered in light of its particular facts and of the general principles which the courts have developed. In general, a person will be regarded as being employed under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor where he or she is performing services for another person and not for himself or herself.

Graham v. Minister for Industry and Commerce [1933] I.R. 156, Queensland Stations Property Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation [1945] 70 C.L.R. 539 and Cassidy v. Ministry of Health [1951] 2 K.B. 343 considered. Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173 and McAuliffe v. Minister for Social Welfare [1995] 2 I.R. 238 approved.

6. That the degree of control exercised over how the work was to be performed, although a factor to be taken into account, was not decisive. The inference that the person was engaged in business on his or her own account can be more readily drawn from where he or she provided the necessary premises or equipment or some other form of investment, where he or she employed others to assist in the business and where the profit which he or she derived from the business was dependent on the efficiency with which it is conducted by him or her.

7. That the appeals officer was entitled to arrive at the conclusions which he did on the facts and having taken into account all of the circumstances of the demonstrator's employment.

8. That the appeals officer was correct in applying the legal principles laid down in decisions of the High and the Supreme Court to the facts as found by him and he was not bound by an unwritten judgment of the Circuit Court which was a decision on different facts in another statutory context.

(Per Hamilton C.J.): That the courts should be slow to interfere with the decisions of expert administrative tribunals.

(Per Murphy J.): That the decision as to whether the demonstrator was retained under a contract of service depended on the totality of the contractual relationship express or implied between the parties and not solely upon any statement as to the consequences of the bargain.

Appeal from the High Court.

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are fully set out in the judgment of Keane J., infra.

The High Court (Carroll J.) heard and dismissed the appeal by order dated the 19th October, 1995. By notice of appeal dated the 17th November, 1995, the appellant appealed to the Supreme Court.

The appeal was heard by the Supreme Court (Hamilton C.J., Keane and Murphy JJ.) on the 23rd and 24th July, 1997.

Paul Gallagher S.C. (with him Herbert Giblin) for the appellant.

Aindrias Ó Caoimh S.C. (with him Nuala Butler) for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Hamilton C.J. 1st December, 1997

I agree with the judgments about to be delivered but I believe it would be desirable to take this opportunity of expressing the view that the courts should be slow to interfere with the decisions of expert administrative tribunals. Where conclusions are based upon an identifiable error of law or an unsustainable finding of fact by a tribunal such conclusions must be corrected. Otherwise it should be recognised that tribunals which have been given statutory tasks to perform and exercise their functions, as is now usually the case, with a high degree of expertise and provide coherent and balanced judgments on the evidence and arguments heard by them it should not be necessary for the courts to review their decisions by way of appeal or judicial review.

Keane J.

Demonstrators who offer passing shoppers free samples of wine, cigarettes, sausages or whatever are a familiar feature of supermarkets today. The net issue in this case is as to whether they are properly regarded in law as engaged in their tasks under a "contract of service" or a "contract for services".

The significance of the distinction is that if such a demonstrator is regarded as being employed under a contract of service, then he or she is an insurable person for the purposes of the Social Welfare Acts, 1993 to 1997. In the case of Ms. Sandra Mahon who performed such services for the appellant, a deciding officer, an appeals officer and the chief appeals officer in the department of the respondent were of the opinion that she was employed under a contract of service and hence was an insurable person. That conclusion was upheld on appeal to the High Court by Carroll J. in a judgment delivered on the 18th October, 1995. From that decision, the appellant has appealed to this Court.

The relevant legislation can be shortly summarised. Under s. 5(1)(a) of the Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act, 1981, (the Act in force at the time that the question arose in relation to Ms. Mahon), every person over the age of 16 years and under pensionable age is "an insured person" for the purposes of the legislation if he or she is employed in any of the employments specified in Part I of the First Schedule. Paragraph 1 of Part I, refers to:-

> "Employment in the State under any contract of service or apprenticeship, written or oral, whether expressed or implied, and whether the employed person is paid by the employer or some other person, and whether under one or more employers, and whether paid by time or by the piece or partly by time and partly by the piece, or otherwise, or without any money payment."

Under s. 111(1), every question arising inter alia as to whether the employment is or was insurable employment is to be decided by a deciding officer of the respondent. Section 298(1) provides that, if any person is dissatisfied with that decision, the question is to be referred to an appeals officer. Section 300(4) provides that:-

> "The Chief Appeals Officer may, at any time and from time to time, revise any decision of an appeals officer, if it appears to him that the decision was erroneous by reason of some mistake having been made in relation to the law or the facts, and, . . . any person who is dissatisfied with the revised decision may appeal therefrom to the High Court on any question of law."

The facts - which were not at any stage materially in dispute - should now be set out.

Ms. Mahon contacted the appellant by telephone in or about 1988, with a view to providing her services as a demonstrator and, having been interviewed, was placed on the panel from whom demonstrators are selected by the appellant. She was engaged on the terms of a written contract. The contract expired at the end of each year and a fresh contract was then entered into annually between her and the appellant. The appellant has approximately 70 demonstrators on its panel.

The manner in which Ms. Mahon's services were availed of by the appellant was as follows. The particular retail store which required one of the appellant's food products to be demonstrated got in touch with the local customer service manager of the appellant and asked for such a demonstration specifying the day or days upon which it was required. Three or four days before the date of the proposed demonstration, the manager would telephone a demonstrator on the panel to inquire whether or not the demonstrator was available to provide her services on the particular days at the specified shop. Generally speaking, neither the demonstrator nor the appellant knew prior to this time whether or not a demonstration was to be given at any particular shop or store during the immediately following weekend. If the demonstrator was available, it was agreed that the service should be provided. The demonstration was carried out without any supervision by the appellant.

Ms. Mahon submitted an invoice in respect of the services provided after each demonstration to the appellant. The invoices were not treated as valid unless they were signed by the manager of the particular store in which the demonstration was carried out. Her fees were discharged on a fortnightly basis on production of the completed invoices. She was paid approximately £28.32 per day for her services and was also paid travelling expenses at the rate of 27p per mile. She was not a member of any pension scheme of the appellant nor was she a member of a trade union.

New contracts were entered into by the appellant with Ms. Mahon in respect of each of the years ending the 31st December, 1991, the 31st December, 1992, and the 31st December, 1993. While there were some differences, the contracts for each of the years in question were in broadly the same terms. That in force for the year ending the 31st December, 1993, contained a number of important provisions which must be set out in full.

The letter from Ms. Bernie Campbell, the customer services manager, confirming the retention of Ms. Mahon and enclosing the terms and conditions of her employment, began as follows:-

> "This is to confirm that [the appellant] is willing to retain your services as a demonstrator/merchandiser commencing on the 1st January, 1993 and ending on the 31st December, 1993.
>
> For the avoidance of all doubt, I am obliged to point out to you that you will not be an employee of [the appellant], you will be providing it with your services as an independent contractor as and when they are required during the term of the contract.
> The contract shall be subject to the standard terms and conditions, a copy of which is attached thereto . . ."

Attached to this letter were what were described as "NOTES" which stated as follows:-

"(1) You will be responsible for your own tax affairs. [The appellant] will be making returns to the revenue of all payments made to you. These payments will be made gross.

(2) You will not be an employee of [the appellant], you will be an independent contractor. This has implications in the area of employment legislation and from the point of view of injury or health and damages sustained or caused while you are providing services under the general terms and conditions to [the appellant]."

Clauses 2 to 9 inclusive were as follows:-

"(2) Retention of services

[The appellant] may, at its absolute and sole discretion and on such occasions as it thinks fit, retain the services of the demonstrator for the purposes of demonstrating and/or promoting and/or merchandising the product at such venues within the area as [the appellant] may from time to time require. [The appellant] shall give the demonstrator not less than 24 hours notice of the retention of his/her services hereunder. In the event of the demonstrator being unable for any reason to provide a service hereunder when requested so to do, the demonstrator shall at the earliest opportunity so inform [the appellant]. The demonstrator shall in such an event arrange for the service to be provided by a third party or by a servant or agent of the demonstrator PROVIDED ALWAYS that any such third party, servant or agent shall first have been approved by [the appellant] and shall agree to perform the service on terms and conditions which are these terms and conditions.

(3) The performance of functions
The demonstrator shall use his/her best endeavours to promote and/or demonstrate and/or merchandise the product to the best advantage of [the appellant] and shall at all times, while performing his/her functions hereunder, act in the best interest of [the appellant]. The demonstrator shall at all times be courteous towards customers or potential customers of [the appellant].

(4) Proper dress
The demonstrator shall present himself/herself in a neat, clean and tidy manner, properly attired and shall wear such uniform, jackets, coats and/or head-dress as [the appellant] may from time to time require and shall at all times present himself/herself in a manner that befits a demonstrator/merchandiser/promoter of food products.

(5) Punctuality
The demonstrator shall punctually attend at the time(s) stipulated by [the appellant] at the location where the demonstration, promotion or merchandising of the product is to take place.

(6) Abide by regulations
The demonstrator shall abide by such directions and regulations as may be in force at the place where the demonstration / promotion / merchandising is to take place. In the event of the demonstrator considering that any such directions or regulations are so restrictive that they effectively prevent or severely inhibit the performance of the demonstrator's functions hereunder, the demonstrator shall at the earliest opportunity inform the sales manager for the time being of [the appellant]whose decision on the matter shall be final and binding.

(7) Misconduct
Without prejudice to the terms of clause 16 hereof, if the demonstrator shall be guilty of any serious misconduct or neglect of his/her obligations under these terms and conditions [the appellant] may forthwith terminate the particular contract under which the services of the demonstrator are retained without prejudice to any other remedy which [the appellant] may have in such an event against the demonstrator.

(8) Independent contractor
The demonstrator is and shall be deemed to be an independent contractor and nothing in this agreement shall be construed as creating the relationship of master and servant or principal and agent. It is further agreed that the provisions the of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, shall not apply to the contractual relationship that exists between [the appellant] and the demonstrator.

(9) Property of [the appellant]
All uniforms, coats, overalls, head-wear and utensils given to the demonstrator by [the appellant] shall at all times remain the sole property of [the appellant] and the demonstrators shall take all reasonable care of and shall not assign or part with the possession of any such uniforms, coats, overalls, head-wear and utensils."

Clause 11, which provided for the payment of the fees in the manner already described, also made it clear that it was the duty of the demonstrator to pay and discharge such taxes and charges as might be payable out of such fees.

Clause 12, under the heading "Indemnity", provided that the demonstrator was to exercise due skill and care and was to indemnify the appellant against claims for loss and damage sustained as a result of any act or omission of the demonstrator. It also made clear that the lifting and moving of goods, etc., in connection with the performance of the contract were to be done at the demonstrator's sole risk, but that nothing in the contract was to be construed as obliging the demonstrator to perform a task which was dangerous or to do anything in an unsafe manner.

Clause 13, under the heading "Not to work for Competitors", provided that:-

"The demonstrator shall not, for so long as he/she is making his/her services available to [the appellant] as a demonstrator and/or merchandiser and/or promoter, act as demonstrator, merchandiser or promoter in the area of any product which would be in competition with the product of [the appellant]."

Clause 16, under the heading "Separate Contract," provided that:-

"Each separate retention of the demonstrator's services by [the appellant] shall, unless otherwise agreed between [the appellant] and the demonstrator, be a separate and distinct contract to which each of these terms and conditions shall apply."

Ms. Mahon carried out approximately 50 demonstrations in the course of a year. She was not supervised in any way by the appellant in carrying out the demonstrations, although she was expected, as clause 7 made clear, to comply with any reasonable directions given by the owner of the shop or store in which she was carrying out the demonstration. Moreover, while there was no continuous and direct supervision, a circular letter from Ms. Campbell dated the 17th February, 1993, to all the demonstrators gave detailed instructions to them as to how they should do their job. This letter also made it clear that, in the event of a demonstrator finding on arrival at a store that the particular demonstration had been cancelled, he or she was entitled to ask if they could demonstrate another product. If there was no work available for them, the appellant paid no more than the mileage rate.

On the 11th May, 1992, the deciding officer decided that Ms. Mahon was an insurable person. An appeal having been lodged, an oral hearing took place before the appeals officer at which evidence was given by Ms. Mahon and Mr. Liam Kerins, an accountant employed by the appellant. The appeals officer made his findings in the form of a written report dated the 30th April, 1993.

During the course of the hearing, the appellant had indicated that it was relying in part on a decision of the Circuit Court on an appeal from a determination by the Employment Appeals Tribunal in the case of a Mr. Robert Cronin that his status was that of an independent contractor and not of an employee. The appeals officer indicated that he did not consider himself bound by this decision, although he did refer to other decisions of the High Court and of this Court and also to certain English authorities.

He was also referred to a decision by a local Inspector of Taxes that demonstrators such as Ms. Wilson were self-employed persons and not within the scope of the P.A.Y.E. system. However, he said that he was aware that the Revenue had generally deemed employments of this nature to be under a contract of service and subject to P.A.Y.E. and was of the view that the stance adopted by the Inspector was "merely a holding arrangement".

The appeals officer also referred to a questionnaire from the department which had been completed by the appellant and in which it was apparently accepted by the appellant that it had the right to direct and control the demonstrator as to how, when and where he/she did the work.

As to the written contract, the appeals officer said:-

"Considerable reliance has been placed on the actual contract of employment, which is signed by Ms. Mahon annually. However, as Ms. Mahon mentioned at the hearing, she wants the work and thus has very little real option but to sign same."

Having referred to some of the authorities, he added:-

"Thus in the present case, I am required to consider the facts and the realities of the situation on the ground irrespective of what the actual contract states or specifies."

He then expressed his conclusion as follows:

"The facts are that Ms. Mahon was recruited by the appellant. Has worked for the company for a number of years. Works 27/28 hours per week for 48 to 50 weeks of the year. Is paid a basic rate of £85 together with travelling expenses. Must do the work herself and supplies labour only. Cannot engage other people to stand in for her except in exceptional circumstances and then only with the approval of the company. She is supplied with materials to carry out her work. It appears to me that she cannot but be regarded as being subject to control and direction of the company.

All these factors when considering the above-mentioned test indicate that the only reasonable conclusion that I can come to is that the ingredients for a contract of service exist in this case and I so decide."

On the 22nd September, 1993, an application was made on behalf of the appellant to the Chief Appeals Officer to revise this decision. On the 11th October, 1993, the appellant was informed that the Chief Appeals Officer was of the view that the appeals officer had properly addressed himself to the issues arising from the deciding officer's decision and that the appeal decision was not erroneous by reason of some mistake having been made in relation to the law or the facts.

These proceedings were then instituted by way of an appeal pursuant to s. 300(4) of the Act of 1981 from the decision of the Chief Appeals Officer. (In the special summons, the appeal was also stated to be brought pursuant to s. 299, but it was accepted at the hearing that the appropriate form of appeal was under section 300(4).)

In her judgment, the learned High Court Judge (Unreported, High Court, Carroll J., 18th October, 1995), having pointed out that the appeal was on a question of law only, observed:-

"In an appeal on a question of law the court does not go into the merits of the decision. The primary facts are not in issue. Where there is a question of conclusions and inferences to be drawn from facts (a mixed question of fact and law) the court should confine itself to considering if they are conclusions and inferences which no reasonable person could draw or whether they are based on a wrong view of the law.

In this case that means that the court must consider (1) whether there was evidence to support the finding of fact that Sandra Mahon was employed on a contract of service and (2) did the appeals officer apply the law correctly. It is not for the court to start weighing the various factors."

Having also said that the fact that the contract was stated to be a contract for services was not a decisive factor and that "the entire contract" had to be considered in order to decide whether it was indeed a contract for services, the learned High Court Judge said that she was satisfied that the approach of the appeals officer was correct in law. She was also satisfied that he was correct as a matter of law in holding that he was not bound by the decision of the Circuit Court in the case of Cronin. Having said that the appellant had pointed to facts which supported the view that the contract was a contract for services and that the respondent had relied on facts which pointed to a contrary conclusion, she expressed her own conclusion as follows:-

"The decision reached depends on the importance which the appeals officer attached to some facts. This was a balancing operation which is essentially a matter of degree and his conclusions should not be disturbed unless they are such that no reasonable person could draw them.

In my opinion the appellant has not shown that the conclusions drawn by the appeals officer are ones which no reasonable person could draw and neither have they shown that they were based on a mistaken view of the law.

In those circumstances, the appeal should be dismissed."

On behalf of the appellant, counsel submitted first that the learned High Court Judge was wrong in point of law in the approach she had adopted to the appeal. He said that, in particular, she had failed to distinguish between the power of the High Court to set aside inferences of facts where those inferences are based on documents, such as the written contract in the present case, and its powers in regard to other inferences of fact. He further submitted that, in general, she had applied the wrong test in holding that she should only interfere with the findings of the appeals officer if they were findings of fact which no reasonable person could have reached on the evidence. He said that where, as here, the question before the appeal's officer was not one of fact, but a mixed question of fact and law, the learned High Court Judge should not have adopted so circumscribed an approach. He cited in support the decision of this Court in Mara (Inspector of Taxes) v. Hummingbird Ltd. [1982] 2 I.L.R.M. 421 and the High Court decisions in Ó Coindealbháin (Insp. of Taxes) v. Mooney [1990] 1 I.R. 422 and McAulliffe v. Minister for Social Welfare [1995] 2 I.R. 238.

Counsel secondly submitted that, even if the jurisdiction of the High Court was as stated by the learned High Court Judge, the decision of the appeals officer should nonetheless have been set aside as being incorrect in point of law. He said that it was clear from his report that the appeals officer had wholly failed to have regard to the terms of the written contract between Ms. Mahon and the appellant, contrary to the principles of law enunciated in the authorities. He said that the appeals officer had effectively ignored the contract on the ground that if Ms. Mahon wanted the work she had to agree to that contract. Counsel said that, while it was accepted that clause 8 of the contract, providing that the demonstrator was to be deemed to be an independent contractor, was not determinative of the issue, it was of importance when viewed in the context of other terms of the contract. He relied particularly on those clauses of the contract which made it clear that the appellant was not obliged to retain the demonstrator's services and that the demonstrator was not obliged in turn to provide the services when requested, which imposed on the demonstrator the duty to discharge any taxes and which required the demonstrator to indemnify the appellant against any claims against it. He submitted that these clauses were not usually found in a contract of employment.

Counsel also relied on the fact that there was no supervision of the demonstrator's work and that, on the contrary, she had to comply with the directions and regulations of the particular store or shop which had requested the demonstration, which would obviously vary from one company to another.

Counsel submitted that, in addition, the appeals officer was wrong in law in wholly disregarding the decision of the Circuit Court, even though he was not bound by it. He had also placed too much reliance on the Form IWSI signed by the appellant, the form of which, requiring as it did "YES" or "NO" answers, made it difficult for the appellant accurately to describe the nature of Ms. Mahon's employment.

On behalf of the respondent, counsel submitted that the jurisdiction of the High Court was limited under s. 300(4) of the Act 1981 to questions of law. Accordingly, unless the appeals officer had made a mistake of law or reached a conclusion which was not open to him on the evidence, his decision could not be set aside by the High Court. Counsel urged that it was clear from the appeals officer's report that he was aware of, and had applied, the relevant principles of law. Since his conclusions were reasonable, capable of being supported by the evidence and reached in accordance with the relevant legal principles, there was no ground on which they could be interfered with by the High Court.

Counsel for the respondent submitted that the legal principles applicable in determining whether a particular contract was one "of service" or "for services" had been identified in a number of Irish decisions such as Ó Coindealbháin (Insp. of Taxes) v. Mooney [1990] 1 I.R. 422 which made it clear that the critical question was whether the person concerned was performing the relevant services as a person in business on his or her own account: if he or she was not, then the contract was clearly one of service. He submitted that the facts in the present case were closely analogous to those in the English decision of Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, where it had been held that a person employed by a company engaged in market research as an interviewer was employed under a contract of service within the meaning of the corresponding English legislation. He submitted that the appeals officer in the present case was correct in law in adopting a similar approach to the employment of Ms. Mahon.

Counsel further submitted that the appeals officer was correct in point of law in declining to follow the unreported decision of the Circuit Court in Cronin which had been reached on the basis of different facts and under different statutory provisions. The appeals officer was also correct in taking the view, that, while he should have regard to the decision in question, he was not bound to follow it and should take as the relevant binding precedents decisions of the High Court and the Supreme Court.

The first question that arises for consideration on this appeal is as to whether the High Court Judge was correct in holding that the only matters to be determined by her were whether there was evidence to support the finding of fact by the appeals officer that Ms. Mahon was employed under a contract of service and whether the appeals officer had applied the correct legal principles.

In Mara (Inspector of Taxes) v. Hummingbird Ltd. [1982] 2 I.L.R.M. 421, Kenny J., speaking for this Court, said at p. 426 in reference to findings of fact in a case stated by an appeals commissioner under the Income Tax Act, 1967:-

> "A case stated consists in part of findings on questions of primary fact . . . These findings on primary facts should not be set aside by the courts unless there was no evidence whatever to support them. The commissioner then goes on in the case stated to give his conclusions or inferences from these primary facts. These are mixed questions of fact and law and the court should approach these in a different way. If they are based on the interpretation of documents, the court should reverse them if they are incorrect for it is in as good a position to determine the meaning of documents as is the commissioner. If the conclusions from the primary facts are ones which no reasonable commissioner could draw, the court should set aside his findings on the ground that he must be assumed to have misdirected himself as to the law or made a mistake in reasoning. Finally, if his conclusions show that he has adopted a wrong view of the law, they should be set aside. If however they are not based on a mistaken view of the law or a wrong interpretation of documents, they should not be set aside unless the inferences which he made from the primary facts were ones that no reasonable commissioner could draw."

In the present case, both the appeals officer and the learned High Court Judge were of the view that the fact that Ms. Mahon was described in the written agreement as being employed as an "independent contractor" was not conclusive. It is accepted that they were correct in so holding. It is correct to say that the appeals officer appears to have taken the view that the importance of the terms of the written contract was somewhat diminished by the fact that Ms. Mahon wanted the job and accordingly had no option but to sign the contract. However, it is also clear from his report that he considered in some detail the actual terms of the written contract and also had regard to the manner in which the work was done by Ms. Mahon.

If the appeals officer had erred in law in his construction of the written contract, then, in accordance with the principles explained by Kenny J., his decision would be liable to be set aside by the High Court. In the present case, however, it has not been shown that the appeals officer in any way misconstrued the written contract: he was, on the contrary, entirely correct in holding that he should not confine his consideration to what was contained in the written contract, but should have regard to all the circumstances of Ms. Mahon's employment. Equally, the High Court Judge was correct in the view she took that she should not interfere with his findings in this regard unless they were incapable of being supported by the facts or were based on an erroneous view of the law.

The second question that arises on this appeal is as to whether the conclusions reached by the appeals officer in his report were in fact based on an erroneous view of the law. The criteria which should be adopted in considering whether a particular employment, in the context of legislation such as the Act of 1981, is to be regarded as a contract "for service" or a contract "of services" have been the subject of a number of decisions in Ireland and England. In some of the cases, different terminology is used and the distinction is stated as being between a "servant" and "independent contractor". However, there is a consensus to be found in the authorities that each case must be considered in the light of its particular facts and of the general principles which the courts have developed: see the observations of Barr J., in McAuliffe v. Minister for Social Welfare [1995] 2 I.R. 238.

At one stage, the extent and degree of the control which was exercised by one party over the other in the performance of the work was regarded as decisive. However, as later authorities demonstrate, that test does not always provide satisfactory guidance. In Cassidy v. Ministry of Health [1951] 2 K.B. 343, it was pointed out that, although the master of a ship is clearly employed under a contract of service, the owners are not entitled to tell him how he should navigate the vessel. Conversely, the fact that one party reserves the right to exercise full control over the method of doing the work may be consistent with the other party being an independent contractor: see Queensland Stations Property Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation [1945] 70 C.L.R. 539.

In the English decision of Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, Cooke J., at p. 184 having referred to these authorities said:-

> "The observations of Lord Wright, of Denning L. J. and of the judges of the Supreme Court suggest that the fundamental test to be applied is this: 'Is the person who has engaged himself to perform these services performing them as a person in business on his own account?'. If the answer to that question is 'yes', then the contract is a contract for services. If the answer is 'no', then the contract is a contract of service. No exhaustive list has been compiled and perhaps no exhaustive list can be compiled of considerations which are relevant in determining that question, nor can strict rules be laid down as to the relative weight which the various considerations should carry in particular cases. The most that can be said is that control will no doubt always have to be considered, although it can no longer be regarded as the sole determining factor; and that factors which may be of importance are such matters as whether the man performing the services provides his own equipment, whether he hires his own helpers, what degree of financial risk he takes, what degree of responsibility for investment and management he has, and whether and how far he has an opportunity of profiting from sound management in the performance of his task."

It should also be noted that the Supreme Court of the Irish Free State in Graham v. Minister for Industry and Commerce [1933] I.R. 156, had also made it clear that the essential test was whether the person alleged to be a "servant" was in fact working for himself or for another person.

It is, accordingly, clear that, while each case must be determined in the light of its particular facts and circumstances, in general a person will be regarded as providing his or her services under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor where he or she is performing those services for another person and not for himself or herself. The degree of control exercised over how the work is to be performed, although a factor to be taken into account, is not decisive. The inference that the person is engaged in business on his or her own account can be more readily drawn where he or she provides the necessary premises or equipment or some other form of investment, where he or she employs others to assist in the business and where the profit which he or she derives from the business is dependent on the efficiency with which it is conducted by him or her.

The question remains as to whether the appeals officer, in the light of the legal principles to which I have referred, was entitled to arrive at the conclusion he did on the facts as found by him. I have no doubt that he was. Obviously, having regard to the nature of the work for which she was employed, there was no continuous supervision of Ms. Mahon by the appellant. That cannot be regarded as a decisive factor, any more than it was in the case of the market researcher, the nature of whose employment was in issue in the case decided by Cooke J. On the other side of the equation are the facts that Ms. Mahon was provided by the appellant with the clothing and equipment necessary for the demonstration and made no contribution, financial or otherwise, of her own and that the remuneration she earned was solely dependent on her providing the demonstrations at the times and in the places nominated by the appellant. The amount of money she earned was determined exclusively by the extent to which her services were availed of by the appellant: she was not in a position by better management and employment of resources to ensure for herself a higher profit from her activities. She did not as a matter of routine engage other people to assist her in the work: where she was unable to do the work herself, she had to arrange for it to be done by someone else, but the person in question had to be approved by the appellant.

The written agreement was undoubtedly drafted with understandable care with a view to ensuring, so far as possible, that Ms. Mahon was regarded in law as an independent contractor. However, as I have already pointed out, although this was a factor to which the appeals officer was bound to have regard, it was by no means decisive of the issue. When he took into account all the circumstances of her employment, he was perfectly entitled to arrive at the conclusion, as he did, that she was employed under a contract of service.

As to the submission that the appeals officer should have treated himself as bound by the unreported decision of the Circuit Court in Cronin, it is sufficient to say that, since it was a decision on different facts in another statutory context and no written judgment appears to have been available, the appeals officer was entitled to adopt the approach he did, i.e. of applying to the facts as found by him the legal principles laid down in decisions of the High Court and this Court. This he clearly did and, for the reasons I have already given, I am satisfied that the High Court Judge was entirely correct in holding that his conclusions could not be disturbed.

I would dismiss the appeal.

Murphy J.

I am in complete agreement with the judgment delivered by Keane J. but I would like to add certain observations of my own partly in deference to the very able argument presented by counsel on behalf of the appellant and more particularly to provide such assistance as I can for the administrative tribunals charged with the duty of implementing the provisions of the Social Welfare Acts, 1993 to 1997.

The argument on which the appellant most confidently relied was that the appeals officer had erred in law in failing to have sufficient regard to the terms of the written contract between Ms. Mahon and the appellant and that the learned judge of the High Court failed to correct that error. The appellant cited the principle accepted by Blayney J. in Ó Coindealbháin (Insp. of Taxes) v. Mooney [1990] 1 I.R. 422 at p. 424 in the following terms:-

> "Where the agreement creating the relationship between the parties is expressed in writing, . . . the entire agreement between the parties is to be found in the writing, so it is the unique source of their relationship; it follows that it is from its terms alone that the nature of the relationship can be determined."

It is then said that this principle was ignored or misapplied by the appeals officer who in his written report dated the 30th April, 1993, stated as follows:-

> "Considerable reliance has been placed on the actual contract of employment, which is signed by Ms. Mahon annually. However, as Ms. Mahon mentioned at the hearing, she wants the work and thus has very little option but to sign same."

The officer went on to say, as Keane J. has already noted:-

> "Thus in the present case, I am required to consider the facts and the realities of the situation on the ground irrespective of what the actual contract states or specifies."

The document known as the "Demonstrators' General Terms and Conditions", which was applicable to Ms. Mahon and all other demonstrators whose names were from time to time included on the panel maintained by the appellant as persons available to provide the services of a demonstrator, is reasonably lengthy but not very informative. It is clear that the panellists might have been called upon "to demonstrate, promote, market and sell" the appellant's products at different locations but little guidance is forthcoming as to the manner in which those operations would be carried out or the skills which the panellists might possess or would be required to exercise in carrying out their functions. The document is silent as to who decides the precise form of any particular commercial activity involved. Has the demonstrator any role in deciding what form a demonstration should take? Presumably important commercial issues could arise as to the amount of individual samples to be provided or the form or scope of any particular display. The general terms and conditions cast no light on these matters. The document, for the greater part, regulates matters of conduct which might be of equal application to an employee or to an independent contractor.

The terms and conditions expressly provide that the demonstrator is:-

> "deemed to be an independent contractor and nothing in this agreement should be construed as creating the relationship of master and servant or principal and agents."

The same clause goes on expressly to provide that:-

> "It is further agreed that the provisions of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, shall not apply to the contractual relationship between [the appellant] and the demonstrator."

Again the express provisions included a term that:-

"It shall be the duty of the demonstrator to pay and discharge such taxes and charges as may be payable out of such fees to the revenue commissioners or otherwise."

On behalf of the appellant it was conceded that these provisions were not of decisive importance. In my view their value, if any, is marginal. These terms are included in the contract but they are not contractual terms in the sense of imposing obligations on one party in favour of the other. They purport to express a conclusion of law as to the consequences of the contract between the parties. Whether Ms. Mahon was retained under a contract of service depends essentially on the totality of the contractual relationship express or implied between her and the appellant and not upon any statement as to the consequence of the bargain. Certainly the imposition of income tax and the manner of its collection falls to be determined in accordance with the appropriate legislation and the regulations made thereunder as they impinge upon the actual relationship between parties and not their statement as to how liability should arise or be discharged.

The terms and conditions governing the engagement of Ms. Mahon were not "the unique source" of the relationship between her and the appellant. I am satisfied that the appeals officer was correct in his conclusion that he was required to consider "the facts or realities of the situation on the ground" to enable him to reach a decision on the vexed question whether the respondent was an employee or an independent contractor. In seeking to ascertain the true bargain between the parties rather than rely on the labels ascribed by them to their relationship the appeals officer was expressly and correctly following the judgment of Carroll J. In In re Sunday Tribune Ltd. [1984] I.R. 505. Of course the appeals officer was not entitled to ignore the terms and conditions under which the demonstrator was engaged nor did he do so. His report analyses fully and fairly the relevant written conditions in the context of the oral evidence heard by and the arguments addressed to him. I have no doubt that the officer was entitled to reach the conclusion that he did and that the learned trial judge was correct in upholding that decision.

I would dismiss the appeal herein.

1. I too would reverse the High Court judgment and order. I adopt the narrative of events set out in Charleton J.'s judgment. I agree with the order which both he and Laffoy J. propose.

2. The Employment Appeals Tribunal erred in concluding that an earlier judgment, delivered in this case by Edwards J. in the High Court, directed the Tribunal to find, as a matter of fact and law, that the appellants were self-employed, and had never been employed by the Minister.

3. In proceeding on this misconception, the Tribunal acted outside the scope of its statutory power as outlined in Charleton J.'s judgment.

4. It was for the Employment Appeals Tribunal itself to determine, on the facts, whether or not an employment relationship existed between the parties. It follows, therefore, that the Tribunal erred in concluding that Edward J's High Court ruling required it to make a finding in a particular way. In so concluding, it fell into error. It also follows that Hedigan J. erred and his judgment should be set aside. Thus, the matter should be remitted to the Employment Appeals Tribunal to be determined in accordance with its jurisdiction. That this course is necessary is profoundly unfortunate. This case has had a very long duration. It is to be hoped that, ultimately, the matter can achieve finality on remittal.

Management of the Matter As Remitted

5. I would suggest the following course of action might be adopted before the reconstituted Tribunal:

(a) That the parties prepare an issue paper identifying the questions now to be determined by the Tribunal. This issue paper should be no more than two A4 pages. It shall be submitted to the Tribunal:

(b) That the parties prepare written submissions of no more than fifteen A4 pages. These should address, in sequence, the agreed issues as identified in the issue paper. The sequencing and timing of these submissions are a matter for the Tribunal.

(c) The Tribunal may, thereafter, apportion such time, as may appear to it appropriate, for oral submissions. I note the parties accept that the evidence which has already been heard, may now be accepted by the Tribunal on foot of the transcript. It will be necessary to refer to those transcripts to assist the Tribunal panel now charged with finally concluding the matter.

(d) In the event that the parties disagree in relation to the issues, I would suggest that the Tribunal itself should receive a proposed issue paper from both sides, and should thereafter prepare its own issue paper, identifying the issues which, in turn, should be the subject of written submissions in the sequence therein set out.

RESPONDENT

Judgment of Ms. Justice Laffoy delivered the 16th day of July, 2015

Introduction

1. The background and the long drawn-out history of the endeavours of the appellants (the Applicants) to establish entitlement to payments under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 – 2003 (the Redundancy Payments Acts) and the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 – 2001 (the Minimum Notice Acts) following the termination of their retainer, to use a neutral word, as temporary veterinary inspectors at the Galtee Meats plant in Mitchelstown, County Cork on the closure of that plant in October 2004 is set out in the judgment to be delivered by Charleton J. I agree with the finding of Charleton J. that the decision of the High Court which is the subject of this appeal on a question of law, the judgment and order of the High Court (Hedigan J.) made on 9th February, 2011 (the second High Court order), must be set aside. I understood counsel on both sides to be ad idem that the consequence of such a finding would be that the matter would have to be remitted to the Employment Appeals Tribunal (the Tribunal). I am satisfied that that is what must happen. The purpose of this judgment is not to re-traverse ground which is addressed in the judgment of Charleton J. Rather it is to highlight certain matters which may assist the Tribunal in understanding why its substantial efforts to date have not brought the matter to a conclusion and what its duty is going forward.

First determination of the Tribunal

2. The issue between the Applicants and the respondent (the Minister), who had retained the Applicants as temporary veterinary inspectors, from the outset has been whether the Applicants were employees of the Minister under a contract of service, so as to entitle them to the statutory payments they have claimed. When the matter was first before the Tribunal in 2006 it was decided that the Tribunal would determine, as a preliminary point, whether the Applicants "were employed under a contract of service or a contract for service" by the Minister. Having heard the matter over four days in June and October 2006, the Tribunal gave its determination on 12th March, 2007 (the first determination). In the first determination, the Tribunal comprehensively outlined the Applicants' case and the Minister's case and the legal submissions made by counsel for both parties. It then gave a reasoned determination which extended over five pages. The outcome was that the Tribunal determined by a majority, one member of the three member Tribunal dissenting, that "the five [Applicants] were employed by the [Minister], under a contract of service, and therefore they were employees".

First order of the High Court

3. The Minister appealed against the first determination on a question of law to the High Court pursuant to the Redundancy Payments Acts and the Minimum Terms Acts. The appeal, in which the Applicants were respondents, was heard in the High Court by Edwards J., who gave judgment on 7th July, 2008. The judgment is reported as Minister for Agriculture v. Barry [2009] 1 I.R. 215. The conclusion of the High Court Judge is quoted in the judgment of Charleton J.

4. The order of the High Court was made on 22nd July, 2008 (the first High Court order). Its curial part contained eight declarations in the following terms:

"The Court doth declare that

(i) there was insufficient evidence before the [Tribunal] on which the Tribunal could properly find that the [Applicants] were employed by the [Minister] under a contract of service

(ii) the [Tribunal] erred in law in finding that mutuality of obligation was present in an implied contract between the [Minister] and the [Applicants]

(iii) the [Tribunal] erred in law in finding that there was mutuality of obligation based on an obligation on the part of the [Applicants] alone with no obligation on the part of the [Minister]

(iv) the [Tribunal] erred in law in failing to consider evidence that the [Minister] was not obliged to provide work to the [Applicants] and that the [Applicants] did not have an expectation of a particular level of work

(v) the [Tribunal] erred in law in attaching no weight to the evidence that the [Applicants] were entitled to refuse up to 16% of shifts before action would be taken by the [Minister]

(vi) the [Tribunal] incorrectly distinguished relevant and binding authorities from the facts in the case before it and failed to have regard to same

(vii) the [Tribunal] erred in law in determining that the [Applicants] were employed under a contract of service with the [Minister]

(viii) the claim of the [Applicants] pursuant to [the Redundancy Payments Acts] and [the Minimum Notice Acts] be returned to the [Tribunal]"

5. There was no appeal to this Court against the first High Court order.

Second determination of the Tribunal

6. After the matter was remitted to it by the first High Court order, the Tribunal conducted a further hearing on 8th January, 2009 and heard evidence from the witnesses referred to in the judgment of Charleton J.. It subsequently gave its determination on 31st July, 2009 (the second determination). In the second determination it was recorded that "there was no final objection that further evidence be heard" at the hearing on 8th January, 2009. The Tribunal then recorded the additional evidence which was adduced on behalf of the Applicants and on behalf of the Minister. The decision of the Tribunal in the second determination is quoted in part in the judgment of Charleton J.

7. When one analyses the decision in the second determination, the following features emerge:

(a) The Tribunal identified the question on the preliminary issue as concerning "the status and working relationship between the [Applicants] and the [Minister]", expressing it also in terms as –

(i) whether the Applicants were "engaged under a contract of or a contract for services", and

(ii) whether the Applicants were "employees or contractors of the [Minister]".

The answer to that fundamental question would determine whether the Tribunal had jurisdiction to hear the substantive matter, it stated.

(b) Its findings as to "mutuality of obligation" in the first determination having been declared to be erroneous in the first High Court order, as recorded at para. 4 above, the Tribunal noted that the Redundancy Payments Acts and the Minimum Notice Acts make no reference to "the disputed imported [phrase] of mutuality of obligation", but stated that it was mindful that it must deal with that issue. It set out to define mutuality of obligation, stating that it can be defined as that the work provider is obliged to provide employment and there is a corresponding obligation on the worker to accept and carry out the work provided. Setting out its decision, following reference to the renewed hearing at which the additional evidence was adduced in January 2009 and its consideration of the written submissions it had obtained from the parties, the Tribunal stated that it still maintained –

> ". . . on the balance of probability, by a majority decision that the [Applicants] and the [Minister] were engaged in a working relationship that carried sufficient mutuality of obligation to allow them to be classified as possible employees".

(c) Having made that finding, the Tribunal stated that the finding allowed it to "consider the various other tests associated with determining whether they were employed under a contract of or for services". It must be assumed that that conclusion was derived from the characterisation of Edwards J. in his judgment (at para. 47) of the "mutuality of obligation test" as "an important filter". In any event, the Tribunal then stated:

> "In that consideration their determination from March 2007 applies".

(d) However, the Tribunal went on to reverse its determination of 12th March, 2007, that is to say, its first determination, on the basis of its interpretation of the judgment of Edwards J. and the first High Court order, outlining its understanding in the following passage:

> "The judge on that case issued eight declarations concluding that the case be returned to the Tribunal. Two contrasting interpretations emerged from the totality of those declarations. One was that the judge was in effect instructing the Tribunal to change its original determination due to its many errors in law in reaching that determination. Another interpretation was that this ruling was silent on the Tribunal's original determination but critical of its reasoning and flawed approach in law as to how it reached that decision".

It was then stated that, notwithstanding the majority view expressed earlier, which I understand to be a reference to the decision that the "determination from March 2007 applies", it was stated that the Tribunal felt bound to accept the former interpretation, that is to say, that it was instructed to change its original determination.

(e) On that basis, the Tribunal reversed its first determination of 12th March, 2007 and found that the Applicants were engaged under a contract for services with the Minister and that it had no jurisdiction to proceed with the hearing of the substantive issues under the Redundancy Payments Acts and the Minimum Notice Acts.

8. It is absolutely clear from the foregoing outline that the Tribunal misunderstood the effect of the declarations embodied in the first High Court order. Although very specific, in my view, those declarations did not amount to a direction by the High Court to the Tribunal as to the decision it should make when the matter was remitted to it. I agree with the view expressed by Charleton J. that it would not have been open to the High Court on the first appeal to give such a direction. Indeed, on this appeal, there was consensus between counsel on both sides on that point.

The second order of the High Court

9. That leads to the second appeal on a question of law from the Tribunal to the High Court, in which the Applicants were appellants and the Minister was respondent. It is quite clear from the summary of the reliefs sought by the Applicants on that appeal against the second determination of the Tribunal, as set out in paragraph 3 of the judgment of Hedigan J. delivered on 9th February, 2011, that at the core of the appeal was the Applicants' contention that the Tribunal erred in law in acting on its misunderstanding of the first High Court order in –

(a) believing that it had been directed by the High Court to change its original determination due to its many errors in law in reaching that original determination, and

(b) failing to consider that, having heard additional evidence, it was entitled to apply the legal principles enunciated by the High Court in the first judgment and to make its own determination having regard to the totality of the evidence.

Unfortunately, on the second appeal, Hedigan J. did not identify or address that as the core issue, but rather entered on an assessment of the additional evidence, against the background of the declarations in the first High Court order, in particular, that at the first hearing before the Tribunal there was insufficient evidence on the basis of which a finding could be properly made that the Applicants were employed by the Minister under a contract of service. On the basis of his assessment of the evidence, Hedigan J. concluded (at para. 7.7) that no reasonable Tribunal would be entitled to conclude that the Applicants were employed other than under a contract for service. On that basis, he disallowed the appeal without addressing the real complaint of the Applicants, stating that it was not necessary for him "to consider the issue of express directions to the Tribunal as to the correct application of the law to the facts of this case".

10. Having regard to the foregoing, the Applicants have unquestionably established that the second High Court order should be set aside on the grounds that it was based on an erroneous failure by Hedigan J. to address the core issue on the appeal, namely, that the Tribunal, in making the second determination had not performed its statutory duty, in that it had wrongly acted on a misinterpretation of the first High Court order in concluding that it had been instructed to reverse its first determination, when it should have made a determination on the basis of the evidence then before it and the proper application of the relevant legal principles.

Remittal to the Tribunal

11. On the remittal from this Court to it, the function of the Tribunal will be to determine whether the Applicants' claim to be entitled to payments under the Redundancy Payments Acts and the Minimum Notice Acts have been established in accordance with the applicable statutory criteria. That will involve, inter alia, determining whether each of the Applicants was an employee of the Minister in accordance with the application of the relevant legal principles to the evidence before it.

12. I fully agree with the view expressed by Edwards J. in his judgment (at para. 42) that the work relationship between each of the Applicants and the Minister "was a very unusual one, and one which it is not easy to classify". Notwithstanding that, in making the determination which it will be under a duty to make, the Tribunal will have to assess the evidence as to the work relationship of the Applicants with the Minister adduced by the parties before it by reference to the legal principles which have been established by the courts over the years in order to make a finding as to whether or not each of the Applicants was an employee of the Minister. No doubt the Tribunal will be assisted in that task by the guidance given in the judgment of Edwards J. However, it is for the Tribunal to determine on the basis of the evidence before it as to whether, in accordance with the established principles, each of the Applicants was or was not an employee of the Minister prior to October 2004.

Judgment of Mr Justice Charleton delivered on Thursday the 16th day of July 2015

1. The applicants/appellants are all veterinary surgeons. Each worked over several years in the Galtee Meats Plant in Mitchelstown in County Cork as temporary veterinary inspectors for the respondent Minister. This work involves inspecting animals, in this case it was apparently always pigs, prior to slaughter, to ensure that they are disease free and, upon slaughter, to examine the carcass, with particular attention to the internal organs, for lesions or other signs of illness. This work is standardised throughout the European Union pursuant to legislation, the purpose of which is human health. The plant shut down in October 2004. The vets were informed by the Minister that no more work was available to them. Of the 5 vets, one had worked almost fulltime in the plant, doing the ordinary maximum 4 hour shift on any working days, while the other vets also had a private practice outside those hours. They all claim to have been employees of the Minister. That is the core assertion in their case. It is denied: the Minister argues that, on the arrangements between the Minister and the vets, the vets are self-employed: this despite their shift not being subject to a VAT charge by the vets and despite the Minister apparently deducting the pay related social insurance and pay as you earn income tax, and accounting for same. On their services being no longer called on, the vets claimed statutory entitlements in respect of employees, effectively claiming that they were made redundant. That issue of statutory rights to employment benefits is one within the jurisdiction of the Employment Appeals Tribunal. Pursuant to the statutory appeal mechanism whereby this matter came before the High Court, neither that court nor this Court on appeal is entitled to decide that issue. That point is crucial to this appeal.

Background

2. It is regrettable to record that this is the eleventh year of this legal dispute. Thus far, there have been two determinations of the Employment Appeals Tribunal and two judgments of the High Court. This appeal, from the second of those judgments, has not focused on the tests for determining the circumstances where a person engaged in work is self-employed or, in the alternative, is an employee of another. Since that matter was not argued, it is unfortunately not possible to give any guidance on the matter. Instead, the appeal focused solely on the particular history that has led here.

3. Entitlements were claimed by the vets under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967-2003 and the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973-2001. On the Employment Appeals Tribunal hearing this matter first, over four days in June and October, 2006, a preliminary question was self-set for determination: "Whether the temporary veterinary inspectors were employed under a contract of service or a contract for service by the Department of Agriculture and Food." That led to a detailed analysis of the precise circumstances whereby the vets were first engaged in the meat plant in Mitchelstown and the individual work history of each vet. In its ruling of 12th of March, 2007, the Employment Appeals Tribunal considered that a proper legal analysis required a judicial tribunal to look "at the contract as a whole" and to ask "is the person in business on his or her own account?" The Employment Appeals Tribunal in its first assessment decided thus:

> The majority having regard to all the factors in this case herein found that there is little to support the proposition that the five [vets] were engaged in business on their own account. Rather, the preponderance of evidence suggests that they undertook a continuing arrangement to provide their own skill and labour in the service of the Department of Agriculture and Food on a mutually convenient basis as to how and when they would work and that they did so for remuneration. They were not in a position to be enterprising in relation to their [temporary veterinary inspectors'] employment. They were paid a salary. This salary was paid by the... Department... in Cavan. The [temporary veterinary inspectors were not in a position to do their own shifts faster or in a shorter period of time like TB testers were. [They] simply came in and did their own work, finished their shift and went back to their own business. The fact that four of the five [vets] had their own business does not preclude them in law from being employees of the Department of Agriculture and Food. The Tribunal determines by majority decision ... that the five [vets] were employed by the [Department] under a contract of service and therefore they were employees.

4. Pursuant to ss.39 (14) and 40 of the Redundancy Payments Acts and s.11 (2) of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts, an appeal on a question of law may be brought against a decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal. The Respondent Minister brought such an appeal to the High Court, Edwards J, claiming a misdirection as to the applicable law or, alternatively, that the law had been incorrectly applied to the facts. Edwards J overturned the ruling of the Employment Appeals Tribunal on 7th July, 2008; Barry & Others v. Minister for Agriculture and Food [2009] 1 IR 215 at paragraph 73 and see [2008] IEHC 216. Edwards J was critical of the decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal to limit the issue before it to a binary question, recognising that a self-employed relationship could turn over time into an employment relationship depending on the circumstances. He held that there was no "single composite test" for determining whether an employment relationship existed; that the "enterprise test" was not necessarily determinative of the issue; and that "questions of control and integration" were not merely to be regarded as elements to be taken into account in applying the enterprise test but were, rather, tools whereby appropriate inferences might be drawn. Edwards J at para.20 of that first judgment in the High Court concluded:

> In my view the [Employment Appeals Tribunal]'s fell into error from the very outset in formulating the preliminary question in the way that it did, and in failing to have regard to all possibilities in determining the nature of the work relationship between the parties. That initial error was compounded by a finding of mutuality of obligation on a flawed and untenable basis. Further, the [Employment Appeals Tribunal] misdirected itself in law ... based upon a misinterpretation of Keane J's judgement in Henry Denney & Sons (Ireland) Ltd v Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 IR 34. In all the circumstances I must allow the appeals... I will hear submissions as to what orders may be appropriate in the circumstances.

5. On the matter returning to the Employment Appeals Tribunal for a second appraisal, further evidence was heard on the 8th January, 2009. That evidence consisted of testimony from one of the vets, from an official in Veterinary Ireland and from an official of the Respondent Minister, Michael Mackessy. Written submissions were then made by the parties in preference to oral submissions. A spoken submission with a chance for the Employment Appeals Tribunal members to ask questions, might well have been more helpful in the complex circumstances of the wealth of individual tests that might be applied to the circumstances. The Employment Appeals Tribunal in a final ruling on the matter of 31st July 2009, the second ruling, did not feel itself to be free to make a decision. Instead, it regarded the judgment of Edwards J as directing it to find as a matter of fact and as a matter of law that the vets in the Michelstown meat plant were self-employed and had never been in the employment of the respondent Minister. Accordingly, the first determination of 12th March 2007 was reversed in favour of finding that all of the vets "were engaged in a contract for services with the respondent" and that it had "no jurisdiction to proceed with substantive hearings on these cases" under the legislation. The operative part of that second ruling follows:

> The question in this preliminary issue concerns the status and working relationship between the [temporary veterinary inspectors] and the [respondent Minister]. [In other words] were the [vets] engaged under a contract of or a contract for services?... [The legislation states] that an employee is a person who has entered into or works under a contract of employment, whether that contract is for manual labour, clerical work or otherwise, is expressed or implied, oral or in writing, and whether it is a contract of service or apprenticeship or otherwise.... Lack of mutuality of obligation means not only must the provider not be under any obligation to provide employment, the worker must not be under any obligation to accept any work that is offered.... [The] tribunal still > maintains on the balance of probability, by a majority decision, that the [vets] and the respondent [Minister] were engaged in a working relationship that carried sufficient mutuality of obligation to allow them to be classified as possible employees. This allowed the Tribunal to consider the various other tests associated with determining whether they were employed under a contract of or for services. In that consideration their determination from March, 2007 applies. However, a ruling from the High Court in this case... issued eight declarations concluding that the case be returned to the Tribunal. Two contrasting interpretations emerged from the totality of those declarations. One was that the judge was in effect instructing the Tribunal to change its original determination due to its many errors in law in reaching that determination. Another interpretation was that this ruling was silent on the Tribunal's original determination but critical of its reasoning and flawed approach in law as to how it reached that decision. Following further consultations of this division of the Tribunal and notwithstanding the majority view expressed above and the relevant legislation, the Tribunal feels bound to accept the former interpretation.

6. That ruling was again appealed to the High Court, Hedigan J, this time by the vets. Hedigan J in the second High Court appeal refused to overturn the ruling, holding that as a matter of law the Tribunal had been correct; Barry & Others v. Minister for Agriculture and Food [2011] IEHC 43. Hedigan J held that the question of mutuality of obligation is central to the issue that the Tribunal had decided and that there was "nothing in the additional evidence... which was of such crucial importance that having heard it no reasonable Tribunal would be entitled to conclude that the [vets] were employed other than under a contract for service." Hedigan J on the express issue that has been argued on this appeal, that of the entitlement or non-entitlement of the High Court to direct the Employment Appeals Tribunal as to their findings, held at para.7.7:

> I am obliged therefore to refuse the relief sought by the appellants to have their claim returned to the Employment Appeals Tribunal. It is therefore not necessary for me to consider the issue of express directions [by Edwards J in the High Court] to the Tribunal as to the correct application of the law to the facts in this case.

7. That issue as to whether there had been an express direction by Edwards J and if there had been what was to be done about it was, however, central to the question as to whether the Employment Appeals Tribunal had properly exercised jurisdiction in relation to this matter.

Contract

8. One of the problems faced by the Employment Appeals Tribunal, and by Edwards J on the first appeal to the High Court, was that there was little in the way of a written contract that could have assisted in determining whether: the vets in working at the Middleton meat plant were self-employed contractors; or whether, from the outset, they were employees of the respondent Minister; or whether, over a period of time, the conditions of engagement changed at a particular point from one to the other. Some details are available. A notice from the Department of Agriculture and Food dated 28th of August, 1995, specifies that applicants for the work will be given training and that an inspector in charge at each meat plant "will call upon the services of the panellists at the plant as and when required on the basis of seniority, availability and suitability, assessed on work performance." This, presumably, is the "major agreement" referenced by the Employment Appeals Tribunal, first decision, as "concerning rules of engagement for [temporary veterinary inspectors]". Another notice which is stated to be effective as of "1st January, 1999" specifically requires this training but establishes that there may be "disciplinary action", where there is inability to attend for a particular shift in the plant. In itself, this is a peculiar term to apply to a self-employed person, though it is not necessarily determinative of the nature of an employment relationship in itself. This memorandum provides indications in relation to annual leave, inability to attend for practice reasons, sick leave, and maternity leave. An update was provided in November, 1999. Then, there is an agreement of the 2nd September, 2003, as to budget allocations and a new hourly rate of pay was set at €58.35 but subject to adjustments under further national wage agreements. As of January, 2004, detailed conditions of engagement were set out by the Department in a lengthy document which provided for remuneration and attendance, absence of payment for lunch breaks, electronic recording of the hours worked, detailed provisions as to the operation of the panels and as to how shifts were to be changed. Finally, a memorandum from the Department on 16th June 2004 refers to applicants being notified "by Personnel Division as soon as they have been approved for engagement."

9. It is not before this Court on this appeal and, further, it was not a matter whereby the High Court could have made a decision for itself as to whether these memoranda coupled with the manner of the operation of the working conditions constituted employment of the vets, as opposed to the engagement of self-employed contractors. It is correct to note, however, as was noted by Edwards J, that there is no universal test whereby it may be said that if a particular indication is met or not met that a person is employed or not. Furthermore, it may need to be factored into any such analysis that it can be that a course of dealings over years may turn from what was initially the engagement of self-employed contractor to do work on a particular basis into an employment relationship. No direction or suggestion is hereby given. As follows from the analysis set forth below, it is for the Employment Appeals Tribunal to make that decision on analysis of the facts individual to each case, and in terms of any entitlement that may result for redundancy payments or minimum notice of the termination of employment to find a point in time, if such exists, whereby a self-employed status turned into an employment relationship, should there be facts whereby that decision might be made.

Jurisdiction

10. The Employment Appeals Tribunal was originally established in 1967 as the Redundancy Appeals Tribunal under s.39 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1967. With the introduction of statutory rights to redundancy on the failure of a business or on surplus employees being let go, an entitlement was also established with a view to determining rights by ex-employees to redundancy payments to seek a ruling from a rights commissioner, whose ruling in turn could be appealed to a more formal quasi-judicial tribunal. Both the rights and the manner of enforcing the rights were new to the legal system and were justiciable not in the courts established under Article 34 of the Constitution, but through a mechanism of resolution established separately. Procedural rules are contained in the Redundancy (Redundancy Appeals Tribunal) Regulations 1968, which have been since much amended; SI No.24 of 1968. Hearings are conducted by a panel of three, with a legally qualified chairperson and hearings are open to the public, save by request. Complaints of not being given the statutory minimum notice of dismissal may be referred to the Employment Appeals Tribunal under the Minimum Notice and Terms of the Employment Act 1973 section 4. Upon such a claim succeeding, an award may be made in compensation for any loss and this is recoverable as a simple contract debt against the employer; section 12 (2). A right of appeal is provided, as noted above, and this may also be exercised by the relevant Minister; section 12 (3). The extensive jurisdiction of the Employment Appeals Tribunal includes such legislation as the Maternity Protection Acts 1994-2004 and the Transfer of Undertaking Regulations 2003; see generally Forde and Byrne, Employment Law 3rd Ed., (Dublin, 2009). The appellate jurisdiction is specifically defined in s.39 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1967 in providing:

> The decision of the Tribunal on any question referred to it under this section shall be final and conclusive, save that any person dissatisfied with the decision may appeal therefrom to the High Court on a question of law.

11. The Employment Appeals Tribunal is a creature of legislation exercising jurisdiction in the enforcement of modern employment rights which did not exist at common law and which were created specifically by statute, often pursuant to international convention obligations, and with precise remedies under legislation, the analysis of which are within the exclusive competence of that statutory body. The High Court is not mandated to exercise that jurisdiction. Appeals are not by rehearing, with the High Court applying its own view, but are on the basis of whether there has been an error of law in the reasoning or, alternatively, such a fundamental error of fact such that an error of law may be inferred. Clarke J in Fitzgibbon v. Law Society of Ireland [2014] IESC 48 (Unreported, Supreme Court, 29th July, 2014) at para 1.2 commented on the wide range of statutory wordings which can cause confusion;

> [The] problem stems from the use of terminology in the context of appeals which can be open to legitimate debate as to its proper meaning and which can, therefore, lead to significant uncertainty as to the precise form of appeal permitted. The background to that difficulty is that the term "appeal" covers a wide range of possible forms of process. These comments are offered in the hope that they may be taken on board by those who are charged, whether in the public or private spheres, with drafting rules or legislation (whether primary or secondary) which provide for the possibility of an appeal.

The only body with jurisdiction in respect of redundancy payments and minimum notice payments on the termination of employment is the Employment Appeals Tribunal. That jurisdiction exists by virtue of statute and its exclusive nature determines that no other body can make decisions that are mandated solely to the Employment Appeals Tribunal. In reaching the decision which he did, it is clear that Edwards J was not giving any direction to the Employment Appeals Tribunal as to the decision which it should make; and nor could he. The appellate jurisdiction exercised in this statutory context by the High Court is one in relation to law only. The statutory entitlement to appeal is limited and, specifically, this form of appeal is not a rehearing. The High Court cannot substitute its own view for that of the Tribunal. Indeed, in his decision Hedigan J recognised this in quoting from the decision of Donaldson MR in O'Kelly & Others v. Trusthouse Forte plc [1983] ICR 723 where it was stated that an appellate court "must loyally accept the conclusions of fact with which it is presented" on such an appeal despite that exercise being "unpalatable … on occasion." The trial judge accepted that unless there has been an express direction of law, deriving an incorrect principle of law from factual analysis by the Tribunal was a heavy burden. This emphasises the express nature of the jurisdiction of statutory tribunals and the role which they have in fact finding. This form of statutory appeal, not by way of rehearing, is an exercise in respect for the tribunal tasked with finding facts. Donaldson MR. held that such tribunals were at large unless "no reasonable tribunal, properly directing itself on the relevant questions of law could have reached the conclusion under appeal."

12. It may be possible to set up tribunals in relation to employment or immigration or any other specialist sphere which are fully judicial in nature. It is also, perhaps, possible to have appeals from quasi-judicial bodies determined by a court rehearing under statute. The determination of such tribunals or courts exercising that kind of appeal might, under such legislation, be such that a re-analysis of the relevant factors afresh or a rehearing of the evidence or a reconsideration of the materials entitles the tribunal to give a fresh appraisal of the facts which is final and determinative. That model has been adopted in the neighbouring kingdom in respect, for instance, of immigration disputes. No comment is made as to whether that model is consistent with constitutional principles in this jurisdiction. It is not, for good or bad, the model that is adopted under this legislation. It is not the jurisdiction which has been given to the High Court in exercising an appeal on a point of law from the Employment Appeals Tribunal.

13. The limited nature of the jurisdiction exercised by the High Court in such circumstances is perhaps more obvious by analogy with judicial review under Order 84 of the Rules of the Superior Courts. There, the entitlement of the High Court in exercising its jurisdiction over lower courts and over tribunals and administrative officials is to rule as to whether the procedure was correct and consistent with the relevant elements of fairness, operated within jurisdiction, in terms of fact did not fly in the face of fundamental reason and common sense and, in terms of the record, was correct. The High Court on judicial review has no entitlement to substitute its own view in terms of fact for that of any statutory body or lower court which is under review despite making a finding that, for instance, an error of law was so important as to amount to an excess of jurisdiction. More fundamentally, it is not the function of the High Court on judicial review to exercise any statutory jurisdiction which by statute is exclusively given to a tribunal. Thus, it is not possible for the High Court to grant planning permission, nor is it possible for the High Court to grant a mining licence or a foreshore licence or an exploration licence upon finding on judicial review that any particular administrative or quasi-judicial decision in relation to such matters cannot stand. Thus, for instance, while it may be within the competence of the High Court to grant a declaration as a matter of law whether a resident of Ireland is liable to pay income tax, it is not for the High Court to exercise in place of the Revenue Commissioners the machinery whereby a taxpayer is assessed to a particular amount of tax for a particular year; see Deighan v Hearne [1986] IR 367.

14. Similarly, when an appeal is taken pursuant to statute which allows resort to a court simply on a point of law, the High Court is entitled and obliged to state what point or principle of law was in error where a statement of law has been made by a lower court or by a quasi-judicial tribunal. There may be some circumstances where the statement of law effectively determines the point under appeal: but even in such a rare case it is a matter for the parties to return to the tribunal with the ruling of the High Court and it is for that tribunal to apply the ruling of law to the facts as found exclusively within the tribunal's jurisdiction in order to reach a determination. There are no circumstances under which the tribunal may declare that its jurisdiction is spent since, as a creature of statute, the sole and exclusive entitlement to exercise that jurisdiction, which was expressly created for it alone, rests with the tribunal.

Result

15. In thus deciding that the High Court, Edwards J, had made a ruling requiring the tribunal to find in favour of the respondent Minister, the Employment Appeals Tribunal was in error in the second determination. The trial judge in the judicial review of this second decision, Hedigan J, was unfortunately drawn into an analysis of employment law related to the factual circumstances and the point which was so clearly identified on this appeal as to jurisdiction was regrettably subsumed in a plethora of legal argument in the High Court.

16. It is also reasonable to comment in this context that it is far too common for complex issues of law to overwhelm or occlude the clear questions that are necessary to be stated for the decision of any tribunal, or the decision of any court, as to what result should be arrived at. In the rehearing of this matter by the Employment Appeals Tribunal, the courtesy extended to courts whereby it is indicated as to what issues, cast as simple and ordinary questions, need to be decided for the result to go one way or the other should be adopted. This used to be the function of pleadings but this purpose of clarification through pleading has now largely been lost. As a matter of practice, it is for the advocate pursuing a case to put before a tribunal or court such straightforward questions for its determination as will enable a decision to be made.

17. In the result, the ruling Hedigan J in the High Court must be overturned. The case of whether the vets were employed by the respondent Minister or were, instead, self-employed persons doing shifts at the Mitchelstown meat plant is a matter of fact for the Employment Appeals Tribunal on a rehearing of the matter. This judgment also concurs with the separate judgment of Laffoy J.

Constitution of Ireland—Statute—Validity—Inquiry by committee of Dáil Éireann—Refusal by witness to answer questions—Statute authorising the committee to "certify the offence" and empowering the High Court after inquiry to punish the offender as if he had committed contempt of the High Court—Whether a minor offence—Right to trial by jury—High Court—Jurisdiction—Whether a court of summary jurisdiction—Standing ord rs of Dáil Éireann—Criminal offence—Particulars—Oireachtas Witnesses Oaths Act, 1924 (No. 53), s. 1—Constitution (Consequential Provisions) Act, 1937 (No. 40), s. 4, sub-s. 1—Committee of Public Accounts (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970 (No. 22), s. 3, sub-s. 4—Constitution of Ireland, 1937, Articles 37, 38, 40.

On the 1st December, 1970, the Committee of Public Accounts was ordered by Dáil Éireann to examine specially the expenditure of a certain grant-in-aid for Northern Ireland relief and any moneys transferred by the Irish Red Cross Society to a bank account into which moneys from the grant-in-aid were or might have been lodged, and to furnish a separate report upon the expenditure. On the 23rd December the Oireachtas passed the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, which provided by sub-s. 4 of s. 3 that, if any person being a witness before the Committee should refuse to answer any question to which the Committee might legally require an answer, the Committee might "certify the offence of that person under the hand of the chairman of the committee to the High Court" and that the High Court might "after such inquiry as it thinks proper to make, punish or take steps for the punishment of that person in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court."

Hearsay evidence, containing serious accusations against H., was received by the Committee and H. then attended before it as a witness but, having made a statement, he refused to answer any questions of the Committee. The Committee then certified to the High Court that "an offence under the said Act has been committed by the said H." by reason of his refusal to answer questions. The High Court ordered H. to show cause why he should not be punished in accordance with the terms of the Act of 1970 and at the hearing of the motion before three judges of the High Court the evidence was furnished on affidavit. H. did not ask for a trial by jury. In sentencing H. to six months imprisonment it was Held by the High Court (O'Keeffe P., Murnaghan and Henchy JJ.), 1, that the sub-section did not empower the Committee to conduct a criminal trial in violation of Article 38 of the Constitution but merely authorised the Committee to complete a step preliminary to a criminal trial in the High Court, and that a conviction did not take place until the High Court had recorded a conviction after the completion of a proper inquiry.

2. If the functions and powers of the Committee were of a judicial nature, they were limited functions and powers which were authorised by Article 37 of the Constitution.

3. The sub-section did not infringe the provisions of Article 38, s. 5, of the Constitution relating to a right to trial by jury since, if a right to trial by jury existed because the offence created by the sub-section was not a minor offence, the terms of the sub-section did not preclude a trial in that form.

In re
HAUGHEY

Attorney General v. O'Kelly [1928] I.R. 308 and Attorney General v. Connolly [1947] I.R. 213 considered.

4. Standing Order 127 of Dáil Éireann had been duly made in accordance with the provisions of Article 15, s. 10, of the Constitution.

5. That the certificate of the Committee contained a sufficient statement of the offence with which H. had been charged, although the statement did not specify the questions which he had refused to answer; and that a majority decision by the Committee to certify the offence was sufficient.

On appeal by H. it was Held by the Supreme Court, in allowing the appeal, 1, that the offence created by the sub-section was not the offence of contempt of court but was an ordinary criminal offence which, by reason of the unlimited nature of the penalty authorised upon conviction, was not a minor offence within the meaning of s. 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution.

Conroy v. Attorney General [1965] I.R. 411 and The State (Sheerin) v. Kennedy [1966] I.R. 379 applied.

2. That, accordingly, a person charged with that offence was entitled to a trial by jury under the provisions of s. 5 of Article 38 of the Constitution.

3. That the presumption in favour of the validity of an Act of the Oireachtas, having regard to the provisions of the Constitution, was sufficient to support a construction of the sub-section which required the trial of the person accused of the offence to be held in the High Court, but the presumption was not sufficient to support a construction which would authorise a trial by jury.

McDonald v. Bord na gCon [1965] I.R. 217 and East Donegal Co-Operative v. Attorney General [1970] I.R. 317 applied.

4. That, as the sub-section purported to authorise a summary trial in the High Court in relation to an offence which was not a minor offence, the sub-section infringed the provisions of Article 38, s. 5, of the Constitution and was invalid.

5. That, if the offence created by the sub-section had been a minor offence and therefore triable in a summary manner by a court of summary jurisdiction pursuant to s. 2 of Article 38, then (a) the High Court would not have jurisdiction to try the person accused of the offence as that court was not a court of summary jurisdiction and (b) the sub-section would violate the provisions of Article 38 by allowing a penalty appropriate to a non-minor offence to be imposed upon conviction for a minor offence.

Held further by the Supreme Court (Ó Dálaigh C.J., Walsh, Budd, FitzGerald and McLoughlin JJ.) as follows:—

6. (Per Ó Dálaigh C.J., Walsh, Budd and FitzGerald JJ.). The facts that the evidence against H. in the High Court had been given on affidavit instead of orally as required in a criminal trial and that H. had been denied an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses who gave evidence against him furnished an additional ground for setting aside his conviction and sentence.

7. (Per Ó Dálaigh C.J., Walsh and Budd JJ.). As the certificate of the Committee was the only document which described the charge made against H., it should have contained particulars of the relevant questions and an assertion by the Committee that they could require answers to those questions.

8. (Per eosdem) The role of H. before the Committee was not that of a witness but was that of a party accused of serious offences, whose conduct had become the subject matter of the Committee's inquiry and, accordingly, in those circumstances the enforcement of any rule of procedure which would deprive H. of his right to cross-examine, by counsel, his accusers and to address, by counsel, the Committee in his defence would violate the rights guaranteed by Article 40, s. 3, of the Constitution.

9. (Per Ó Dálaigh C.J., Walsh, Budd and McLoughlin JJ.) Any examination by the Committee of the expenditure of moneys of the Irish Red Cross Society lodged in the same bank account as moneys from the grant-in-aid would be outside the functions of the Committee, except for the purpose of segregating the two funds.

9. (Per Ó Dálaigh C.J., Walsh, Budd, FitzGerald and McLoughlin JJ.) That the standing orders of Dáil Éireann had been duly made pursuant to Article 15, s. 10, of the Constitution; and that the Committee had power to administer oaths.

10. (Per Ó Dálaigh C.J., Walsh, Budd, and FitzGerald JJ.) That a majority decision of the Committee to certify an offence under the sub-section was sufficient.

MOTION ON NOTICE.

On the 19th February, 1971, the High Court (O'Keeffe P.) on the application ex parte of the Attorney General made an order giving him liberty to serve on Mr. Pádraic Haughey a notice requiring him to attend before the High Court on the 24th February, 1971, to show cause why he should not be punished in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court; the order also directed that a copy of the order and a copy of a certificate dated the 18th February, 1971, of the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann should be served with the said notice.

On the 22nd February Mr. Pádraic Haughey issued a plenary summons (1971. No. 701 P.) in the High Court naming the Attorney General as defendant and seeking a declaration that the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, was repugnant to the Constitution.

When Mr. Pádraic Haughey attended, as respondent, before the President of the High Court on the 24th February he undertook to file in the Central Office on or before the 8th March a statement of the grounds upon which he relied in claiming that the Act of 1970 was repugnant to the Constitution and invalid; and on the 24th February the President ordered the applicant to file in the Central Office on or before the 1st March an affidavit stating the facts which were alleged to constitute an offence under the Act of 1970; and the President further ordered the respondent to file in the Central Office on or before the 8th March a notice or affidavit showing cause (other than the alleged grounds for the invalidity of the Act of 1970 under the Constitution) why he should not be punished in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of court; and the 10th March was fixed as the date for the hearing of the questions arising on the documents to be filed. The respondent did not ask for a trial by jury. An affidavit of Patrick Hogan was filed on behalf of the applicant on the 26th February and two notices were filed on behalf of the respondent on the 8th March.

The applicant's motion was heard in the High Court (O'Keeffe P., Murnaghan and Henchy JJ.) on the 10th, 11th and 12th March

MURNAGHAN J.:—

I accept that there are cogent reasons why the members of the Court should give at the earliest convenient time their reasons for the decision which the Court made on the 12th March, 1971. As I have been on Circuit, I have not had the necessary opportunity of formulating my reasons in writing. However, I have been fortunate in having been afforded the opportunity of reading a copy of the opinion about to be delivered by Mr. Justice Henchy. In the circumstances, and in the interest of expedition, I content myself with saying that I agree generally with the reasons therein contained as the basis of the decision which this Court has already announced.

HENCHY J.:—

It was resolved by Dáil Éireann on the 1st December, 1970, that a committee of the House, the Committee of Public Accounts, should make a special examination of the expenditure of certain moneys. The precise wording of this resolution, as passed in its amended form, was as follows:—"That the Committee of Public Accounts shall examine specially the expenditure of the Grant-in-Aid for Northern Ireland Relief issued from Subhead J., Vote 16 (Miscellaneous Expenses) for 1969/70 and any moneys transferred by the Irish Red Cross Society to a bank account into which moneys from this Vote were or may have been lodged and shall furnish a separate report on this expenditure as soon as possible." To make provision for privilege, immunity and procedure in the performance by the Committee of Public Accounts (hereinafter called "the Committee") of its functions under that resolution, a special Act entitled the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, was passed. Sub-section 4 of s. 3 of this Act[2] provides that, if a person who appears before the Committee as a witness refuses to answer any question to which the Committee may legally require an answer, "the committee may certify the offence of that person under the hand of the chairman of the committee to the High Court and the High Court may, after such inquiry as it thinks proper to make, punish or take steps for the punishment of that person in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court."

Amongst those summoned to appear before the Committee was Mr. Páraic Haughey. When he appeared before the Committee on the 17th February, 1971, and was sworn as a witness, he was told by the chairman of the Committee that it was proposed to ask him certain questions. Thereupon, asserting that he was entitled as of right to make a sworn statement, he read out a written statement[3] in which, having deposed to certain matters of fact, he stated that he was not prepared to be examined by the Committee. After an interval, during which the Committee sat in private, the Committee reassembled in public and the chairman put a series of questions to Mr. Haughey. It was clear from the replies he gave to these questions that he was not prepared to give any information to the Committee other than what was in his written statement. When asked if he claimed the right to refuse to answer any question whatsoever that the Committee might put to him, Mr. Haughey replied:—"I am further advised—I will read the last sentence [of the written statement]—not to answer any questions, for the reasons already given." Faced with that impasse, the chairman ceased to examine Mr. Haughey further.

In exercise of the powers vested in them by s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act, the Committee then certified to the High Court on the 18th February, 1971, under the hand of the chairman that, by reason of his refusal to answer questions to which the Committee legally required answers, Mr. Haughey had committed an offence under the Act. Thereupon the High Court, on motion of the Attorney General, gave liberty to the Attorney General to serve a notice on Mr. Haughey calling on him to attend before the High Court on the 24th February, 1971, to show cause why he should not be punished in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court. When the matter came before the High Court on that date, it transpired that Mr. Haughey had issued a plenary summons against the Attorney General seeking to have the Act declared invalid as being repugnant to the Constitution. On Mr. Haughey by his counsel undertaking to file in the High Court and to serve on the Chief State Solicitor a statement of the grounds on which he claimed the Act to be repugnant to the Constitution and invalid, he was ordered to file in the High Court a notice or affidavit showing cause (other than the grounds for challenging the constitutional validity of the Act) why he should not be punished in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court. The matter then came before this Court to determine if he should be so punished under the Act and, if so, whether the Act should be held invalid as being repugnant to the Constitution. At the conclusion of the hearing the Court ruled against Mr. Haughey on both of these issues but postponed giving its reasons for so deciding. To-day the Court sits to give its reasons.

[3]See pp. 255-6, post.

I propose to deal first with the grounds (other than those challenging the constitutional validity of the Act) relied on as showing cause why Mr. Haughey should not be punished as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court.

It is submitted that the powers and functions conferred on the Committee by the resolution of Dáil Éireann entrusting this inquiry to the Committee are ultra vires Standing Order 127 of the standing orders of Dáil Éireann. Standing Order 127 says that the function of the Committee is "to examine and report to the Dáil upon the accounts showing the appropriation of the sums granted by the Dáil to meet the public expenditure, and to suggest alterations and improvements in the form of the Estimates submitted to the Dáil." It is the contention of counsel for Mr. Haughey that, when Dáil Éireann by its resolution of the 1st December, 1970, entrusted to the Committee an examination of any moneys transferred by the Irish Red Cross Society to a bank account into which moneys voted by Dáil Éireann were or may have been lodged, Dáil Éireann was seeking to endow the Committee with functions beyond the ambit of those vested in it by Standing Order 127. The moneys of the Irish Red Cross Society, it is said, derive from sources such as public subscriptions and Standing Order 127 gives no power to the Committee to examine the expenditure of such moneys. Even if this argument is correct, and I refrain from so holding, it would avail Mr. Haughey only to the extent of making the resolution of the Dáil invalid in so far as it purported to delegate to the Committee an examination of the expenditure of moneys paid into a bank account by the Irish Red Cross Society; it would not call into question the delegation to the Committee of an examination of the expenditure of the Grant-in-Aid for Northern Ireland. Consequently this argument, even if well founded, would help Mr. Haughey only if his refusal had been limited to questions dealing with the Red Cross moneys. It was not so limited. For example, he specifically refused to answer either affirmatively or negatively when he was asked if he claimed a right to refuse to answer any question whatsoever that the Committee might put to him. I hold that this argument is irrelevant to the circumstances of this case.

It was next contended by counsel for Mr. Haughey that Standing Order 127 (incorporating by internal reference Standing Orders 67 and 70) has not been made by the Dáil as required by Article 15, s. 10, of the Constitution of Ireland. The latter section states that each House of the Oireachtas "shall make its own rules and standing orders." While standing orders of Dáil Éireann, including one corresponding to that now numbered 127, existed at the date of the coming into operation of the Constitution on the 29th December, 1937, the complaint is that before any standing order could have validity after that date it should have been made by the Dáil on or after that date. It appears, however, that on the 12th January, 1938, the Dáil made a series of amendments in the standing orders as they existed on the 29th December, 1937. Further amendments were made on other dates and, in particular, the standing order which is now numbered 127 was amended by the Dáil on the 29th October, 1963. The Constitution lays down no procedure for the making of standing orders by the Dáil. I am satisfied that when the Dáil formally amended an existing standing order (or what was considered to be an existing standing order) it may be said to have thereby made such amended version a standing order for the purposes of Article 15, s. 10, of the Constitution. Since the Dáil did so in regard to Standing Order 127, I consider that this challenge to the validity of Standing Order 127 fails.

It is contended that, if these arguments against the jurisdiction of the Committee in this case fail, Mr. Haughey is not in default of s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 in that the questions he refused to answer were not questions to which the Committee could have legally required him to answer under oath. The basis of this submission is, first, that the Committee had no power to administer an oath to him because the Oireachtas Witnesses Oaths Act, 1924, did not apply; and, secondly, that even if it did there was no compliance with s. 3 of that Act. That this submission is unmeritorious is shown by the fact that Mr. Haughey appeared before the Committee armed with a written statement which he read out under oath and in which he claimed to be entitled as of right to make the statement under oath. As a matter of law this submission has no greater validity. The contention that the Act of 1924 does not apply rests on the argument that it has application only to the Houses of the Oireachtas of Saorstát Éireann; but the Constitution (Consequential Provisions) Act, 1937, adapts its application to the present Houses of the Oireachtas and any committee of either of these Houses. Section 3 of the Act of 1924 provides that any oath under that Act may be administered by a person appointed for that purpose by the Ceann Comhairle. It has been proved in this Court that John R. Tobin, clerk to the Committee, was duly authorised by the Ceann Comhairle on the 23rd December, 1970, to administer oaths for the purposes of s. 3 of the Act of 1924 and that it was he who administered the oath to Mr. Haughey. So this ground fails.

The point is taken, quite rightly, that sub-s. 4 of s. 3 of the Act of 1970, being a penal provision, should be construed strictly. For that reason it is said that the certificate of the offence, given under the hand of the chairman of the Committee, is insufficient in that it does not specify what were the questions which Mr. Haughey was legally required to answer and which he refused to answer. It is argued that the charge against Mr. Haughey should be given in the certificate with the particularity of an indictment. If that be so, I would be prepared to hold that the certificate complied with that requirement. Section 4, sub-s. 1, of the Criminal Justice (Administration) Act, 1924, provides that:—"Every indictment shall contain, and shall be sufficient if it contains, a statement of the specific offence or offences with which the accused person is charged, together with such particulars as may be necessary for giving reasonable information as to the nature of the charge." In the present case the certificate[4] could have left Mr. Haughey in no doubt as to what offence he was being charged with and, considering that he had failed to yield the information sought by every question that was put to him, he cannot be heard to say that the certificate withheld from him reasonable information as to the nature of the charge. His counsel has not, and could not, suggest that Mr. Haughey is prejudiced in the present proceedings in any way by any want of particularity in the certificate. The point is taken as a purely technical one. In my view it is unsustainable.

The further point has been taken by counsel for Mr. Haughey that the certificate does not show and it has not been otherwise proved that the Committee decided unanimously to give this certificate. Without citing any authority, counsel submits that the Committee, being an unincorporated body, could reach its decisions only by an unanimous vote. However, I consider it to be well-settled law that a parliamentary committee of this kind, charged as it is with carrying out a duty of a public nature, is entitled to act by majority decision: see the authorities cited by Professor Hand in his article[5] entitled "The Development of the Common Law Principle of Majority Rule in the Arbitration of Matters of Public Concern." Neither in his written notice showing cause nor through his counsel in this Court has Mr. Haughey questioned the making by the Committee of the certificate filed in this Court. I have already rejected the objection taken as to its lack of particularity. To that I add a rejection of the submission that it should have been shown that it was made by the unanimous decision of the Committee.

When this matter was before the President of the High Court on the 24th February, 1971, he gave liberty to Mr. Haughey to show cause by filing either an affidavit or a notice showing cause. Mr. Haughey chose to file a statement of cause. He has led no evidence at this hearing in support of the cause shown, but he has applied for liberty to cross-examine the chairman of the Committee. The reason given to the Court for that application was that it was intended by such cross-examination to establish (a) the conduct of the Committee at previous hearings, (b) that one or two other witnesses had been allowed to give evidence before the Committee which was based on hearsay and which was incriminatory of Mr. Haughey, (c) that the Committee had gone outside the scope of the Dáil resolution committing this special examination to the Committee, and (d) that the Committee had so interpreted that resolution as to investigate the commission of crimes by persons including Mr. Haughey. The application for liberty to cross-examine has been refused on the ground that none of the matters sought to be established by cross-examination could be said to be relevant to the issue as to whether Mr. Haughey refused to answer questions to which the Committee might legally require answers; and that was the only issue on which it was sought to adduce this evidence. Even if Mr. Haughey were justifiably aggrieved by the conduct of the Committee in regard to other witnesses, that could not justify him in refusing to submit to any examination whatsoever by the Committee. The conduct of the Committee in regard to other witnesses and the extent to which they were keeping within their terms of reference could conceivably be factors to be reckoned in deciding whether they could legally require particular questions to be answered but, since Mr. Haughey's attitude was one of total refusal to divulge any information in response to any question the Committee might put to him, the stage had not been reached when such factors could be taken into account. It follows that the matters sought to be brought out in cross-examination in this Court were inadmissible on the issue of Mr. Haughey's guilt. In my view Mr. Haughey fails in all the grounds relied on by his counsel as showing cause.

There remains the claim that the Act of 1970 is invalid as being repugnant to the Constitution. The first and principal ground in support of this claim is that the mode of trial and punishment laid down by s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 for the criminal offence created by that sub-section is such that, if his offence be other than a minor one, Mr. Haughey is denied his constitutional right to a trial with a jury. For my part, I am prepared to hold that the offence created by s. 3, sub-s. 4, is a criminal offence and that a conviction for it does not take place until the Committee, under the hand of the chairman, have certified the offence and the High Court has recorded a conviction "after such inquiry as it thinks proper to make." Therefore, applying the tests laid down by the Supreme Court in Conroy v. Attorney General,[6] if it turns out that the offence is not a minor one for the purposes of the provisions[7] of Article 38, s. 2, of the Constitution, the person certified by the Committee is prima facie entitled to trial by jury under s. 5 of that Article. But in Attorney General v. O'Kelly[8] Sullivan P. (with Meredith and Hanna JJ. concurring) held that the then High Court had jurisdiction to try summarily a charge of contempt of court notwithstanding Article 72 of the Constitution of 1922 which stated that:—"No person shall be tried on any criminal charge without a jury save in the case of minor offences triable by law before a Court of summary jurisdiction and in the case of charges for offences against military law triable by Court Martial or other Military Tribunal." In Attorney General v. Connolly[9] Gavan Duffy P. (with whom Maguire and Davitt JJ. concurred) followed the judgment of Sullivan P. in Attorney General v. O'Kelly[8] and held that the High Court continued to have jurisdiction to try summarily a charge of contempt of court notwithstanding the provisions of Article 38 of the present Constitution. If the law laid down in these cases is applicable to the present case, it disposes of the argument that s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 dispenses unconstitutionally with trial by jury.

If the law laid down in these cases were to be held not to govern the present case, I would hold that a person appearing before the High Court after the Committee has certified his offence under s. 3, sub-s. 4, is not debarred from trial by jury if the offence is not a minor one. The sub-section makes clear that there shall be no punishment and, therefore, no conviction in the High Court until "after such inquiry as it thinks proper to make." If trial by jury is a constitutional right in cases under the sub-section which are too serious to be classified as minor, the problem is whether such mode of trial is comprehended by the words "after such inquiry as it thinks proper to make." It is a well-established rule of interpretation that statutes which have been enacted after the coming into operation of the Constitution enjoy a presumption of constitutionality, and "one practical effect of this presumption is that if in respect of any provision or provisions of the Act two or more constructions are reasonably open, one of which is constitutional and the other or others are unconstitutional, it must be presumed that the Oireachtas intended only the constitutional construction and a Court called upon to adjudicate upon the constitutionality of the statutory provision should uphold the constitutional construction. It is only when there is no construction reasonably open which is not repugnant to the Constitution that the provision should be held to be repugnant": see McDonald v. Bord na gCon.[10] Furthermore, "an Act of the Oireachtas, or any provision thereof, will not be declared invalid where it is possible to construe it in accordance with the Constitution; and it is not only a question of preferring a constitutional construction to one which would be unconstitutional where they both may appear to be open but it also means that an interpretation favouring the validity of the Act should be given in cases of doubt": see East Donegal Co-Operative v. Attorney General.[11]

The provision in s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 that the High Court shall not punish or take steps for the punishment of a person certified until "after such inquiry as it thinks proper to make" involves no repugnancy to the Constitution under this ground of complaint unless it can be shown that the Oireachtas clearly intended the sub-section to empower the High Court to convict and punish summarily in violation of a constitutional right to trial by jury. Far from showing such an intention, the sub-section in my view clearly permits trial by jury if the judge or judges of the High Court consider that mode of trial to be the proper form of inquiry, or part of the proper form of inquiry, to be made before punishment is inflicted. Trial by jury of a criminal offence is a form of inquiry for, in effect, it involves a question being put to the jury by the judge asking if they are unanimously satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the offence charged has been committed by the accused. If trial by jury is a constitutional necessity for the trial of certain types of offence under the sub-section—and I stress that I am not so deciding—I see nothing in the sub-section to prevent that mode of trial. On the contrary, in stipulating that punishment is not to be inflicted in the High Court until "after such inquiry as it thinks proper to make," the sub-section should be read as making trial by jury mandatory if the person certified by the Committee is entitled under the Constitution to trial by jury. Counsel for Mr. Haughey has argued that a contrary conclusion is indicated if one looks at s. 17 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1967, which deals with the restriction of publication of information as to the preliminary investigation of indictable offences, because such restriction is incompatible with the procedure involved under the Act in question here. There might be force in that argument if s. 17 of the Act of 1967 were applicable to the present case, but Part II of the Act of 1967 (comprising ss. 5–20) is headed "Preliminary Examination of Indictable Offences in the District Court" and has reference only to cases of indictable offences originating in a preliminary examination in the District Court. Since that is not the case here, it follows that s. 17 of the Act of 1967 does not apply.

I would reject this challenge to the constitutional validity of the Act of 1970 because a person charged under the sub-section is either not entitled under the Constitution to trial by jury or, if he is so entitled, the sub-section does not deprive him of that right.

Counsel for Mr. Haughey proceeded to impugn the constitutionality of the Act of 1970 by alleging that the powers conferred on the Committee by the Act of 1970 and by the Dáil resolution of the 1st December, 1970 (and the manner of the exercise of these powers) are contrary to Article 34 of the Constitution in that they amount to an administration of justice and an exercise of the judicial power reserved by Article 34 for the Courts established under that Article. Since the Dáil resolution of the 1st December, 1970, merely resolved that the Committee should make a special examination of the expenditure of certain moneys and report as soon as possible on that expenditure, and since it is silent as to how that examination is to be carried out, I fail to see how the provisions of the Constitution which are relied on can be invoked against that resolution. Such examination is not in any sense an exercise of judicial powers, since the examination and the report following on it do not affect rights or impose liabilities. As to the Act itself, even if there be validity in the submission that the Act of 1970 empowers the Committee to exercise functions and powers of a judicial nature, since such functions and powers are limited and are not exercisable in a criminal matter they are validated by Article 37 of the Constitution. The power to certify an offence, given to the Committee by s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970, is not a power exercisable in a criminal matter; it is merely a power exercisable for the purpose of bringing into existence a criminal matter. If judicial powers are given to the Committee by the Act, I would be prepared to hold that these powers are properly exercisable under Article 37 of the Constitution; since Article 37 provides that nothing in the Constitution shall operate to invalidate the exercise of the functions and powers permitted by that Article, Mr. Haughey is thereby precluded from invoking against the Act, as he seeks to do, Articles 6, 15, 28 and 34 of the Constitution.

The next point taken against the constitutional validity of the Act of 1970 is that it confers on the Committee, contrary to Article

High Court 1971

In re HAUGHEY

Henchy J.

38 of the Constitution, the power to try persons for criminal offences. The only provision in the Act that has reference to a criminal offence is s. 3, sub-s. 4, which empowers[12] the Committee to certify an offence but, as I have already pointed out, that is not the trial of a criminal offence; it is merely a step preliminary to the commencement of the trial of a criminal offence in the High Court. I would hold that nothing in the Act of 1970 is repugnant to Article 38 of the Constitution.

As to the further complaint that the Committee have interpreted the powers conferred on them by the Act in such a manner that they have sought to try people for criminal offences and otherwise have adopted procedures that violate (or threaten to violate) the constitutionally guaranteed rights of Mr. Haughey and others, there is no evidence before this Court that the Committee have done so and an application to receive such evidence was refused on the ground that it would be irrelevant to the issue of guilt in this case. However, even if such evidence were before the Court, I would point out that the mere fact that an Act has been operated in violation of constitutionally guaranteed rights is not in itself sufficient to make the Act unconstitutional; the provisions of the Act must have clearly stamped on them the intention of the legislature that the Act may be operated unconstitutionally. As was stated by the Supreme Court in East Donegal Co-Operative v. Attorney General,[13] "the presumption of constitutionality carries with it not only the presumption that the constitutional interpretation or construction is the one intended by the Oireachtas but also that the Oireachtas intended that proceedings, procedures, discretions and adjudications which are permitted, provided for, or prescribed by an Act of the Oireachtas are to be conducted in accordance with the principles of constitutional justice. In such a case any departure from those principles would be restrained and corrected by the Courts." If he considers that any constitutionally guaranteed right of his has been violated or is threatened with violation by the Committee, Mr. Haughey is entitled to institute the appropriate proceedings in the Courts but he is not entitled to seek to redress any grievance he may have by adopting a course of conduct which is forbidden by the Act and which is calculated to frustrate the constitutional operation of the Act.

It was also submitted that the Act of 1970 violates Article 40, s. 3, of the Constitution[14] in that the Committee is given power to summon and examine witnesses in public without such witnesses being accorded any of the rights or protections accorded to the ordinary citizen in the Courts established under the Constitution. In particular it is complained that the ruling of the Committee that witnesses will be allowed legal representation only for the purpose of consultation amounts to a denial of constitutional justice. As I have already pointed out, even if that were the effect of the Committee's ruling it would not render the Act of 1970 unconstitutional; but I find nothing in the Act, or in the procedures laid down by the Committee in its interim report, that could be said to be a deprivation or diminution of the constitutional or legal rights that a witness would be entitled to in a court established under the Constitution.

[14]See p. 261, post.

Finally, it is argued that s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 is repugnant to the Constitution (in particular Article 38) in failing to provide a punishment for the offence created by the sub-section. Since the offence created is a constructive contempt of the High Court and there is attached to it the punishment which it would attract if it were a contempt of the High Court, I cannot find any validity in this argument, as the punishment is clearly defined by reference. In this, as in other respects, there is nothing novel or unique about the section; it merely reproduces provisions that are to be found in a wide range of statutory provisions such as s. 1 of the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act, 1921, and the First Schedule (para. 6) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1953, and s. 15 of the Solicitors (Amendment) Act, 1960, and s. 60 of the Trade Marks Act, 1963.

For the aforesaid reasons I would disallow the cause shown. Mr. Haughey has not asked for trial by jury and this Court, having considered the law and the facts, does not consider a trial by jury to be called for. Having regard to all the circumstances, the sentence of six calendar months imprisonment seems to me to be appropriate.

The respondent, Mr. Pádraic Haughey, appealed to the Supreme Court from the order and judgment of the High Court.

T. J. Conolly S.C. and A. J. Hederman S.C. (with them P. J. Connolly) for the respondent:—

Section 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 does not merely create an offence of constructive contempt of court; it creates a new substantive criminal offence which is punishable in like manner as if the offender had been guilty of contempt of the High Court. It is punishable only after the taking of an essential step of a judicial nature which is not authorised by the Constitution, namely, the certifying to the High Court of the offence by the Committee. The High Court is not given jurisdiction to try an issue as to whether an offence has been committed; its function is merely to determine the punishment of a person who has been found by the Committee to be an offender.

Supreme Court 1971

Even on the assumption that the Committee's certificate is a mere administrative step—analogous to an indictment—which is preliminary to a judicial inquiry by the High Court, the sub-section is still unconstitutional as no express provision is made for trial by jury, although the offence created is not a minor one.

There are two alternative methods by which an administrative tribunal can properly call the Courts in aid to punish a default in appearing, or in giving evidence, before it. First, the statute which sets up the tribunal may provide that such default shall be a minor offence, punishable summarily, as in s. 86 of the Local Government Act, 1941, and in ss. 82 and 83 of the Local Government (Planning and Development) Act, 1963; see also s. 76 of the Housing Act, 1966, and s. 75 of the Health Act, 1970. Secondly, the tribunal may be empowered to certify to the High Court that, in its view, a person has made such default, but the statute reserves to the High Court the power to inquire fully into such alleged default and to hear the defence of the person charged and any evidence offered on his behalf and then, having held such inquiry, the Court is empowered to punish or take steps for the punishment of the person charged "in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the court" as in the Special Commission Act, 1888, and s. 1, sub-s. 2, of the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act, 1921, and s. 19, sub-s. 2, of the Solicitors Act, 1954, and s. 15, sub-s. 2, of the Solicitors (Amendment) Act, 1960.

Section 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 empowers the High Court to determine merely the quantum of the penalty which it shall impose on a person who has already been found by another tribunal to be in default, and the form of that enactment is similar to s. 17, sub-s. 2, of the Control of Prices Act, 1937, and s. 35, sub-s. 2, of the Minerals Development Act, 1940, and para. 6 (4) of the First Schedule to the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1953, and para. 12 (4) of the Second Schedule to the Prices Act, 1958, and s. 8, sub-s. 4, of the Land Act, 1965. It is possible that those statutory provisions, unlike the enactment which is in issue in this case, are justified on the basis that the tribunals created by the relevant statutes are exercising "limited functions and powers of a judicial nature, in matters other than criminal matters" as authorised by Article 37 of the Constitution. The matters into which the Committee of Public Accounts has been inquiring have included criminal matters, and this has brought the Committee into conflict with Articles 34 and 38 of the Constitution.

A witness before a tribunal can be in contempt only if the tribunal is acting within jurisdiction. In this case the Committee had no jurisdiction to proceed with the inquiry and the respondent was not a compellable witness before it; the Committee had no jurisdiction either to compel Chief Superintendent Fleming to give evidence before it, or to give him privilege in respect of the evidence which he might elect to give.

The Act of 1970 contravenes Article 40, s. 1, of the Constitution in as much as witnesses who give evidence before the Committee are deprived of the rights and protections that are accorded to ordinary citizens in the Courts established under the Constitution. The Act also contravenes s. 3, sub-s. 2, of Article 40 in as much as a citizen, whose good name has been attacked by evidence which would not have been admitted in a court established under the Constitution, is deprived of an opportunity to test by cross-examination the allegations contained in such evidence.

The effect of the evidence of Chief Superintendent Fleming is to make the respondent a person who has been accused of committing an offence and, therefore, his position resembles that of a defendant who is being prosecuted rather than that of a mere witness in an action.

It does not appear from the certificate of the Committee whether its decision was made unanimously or by a majority. If the Committee's decision was a majority one, it was made ultra vires in the absence of a specific provision in the Act that the Committee might certify the commission of an offence on a majority verdict: Brain v. Minister of Pensions[15]; Minister of Pensions v. Horsey.[16] [They also referred to Grindley v. Barker[17] and to Picea Holdings Ltd. v. London Rent Assessment Panel.[18]]

The resolution by which the Committee was authorised to embark on these enquiries was intra vires Dáil Éireann to the extent only that it authorised the ascertainment of the initial destination of the public funds which are the subject matter of the inquiry. Thereafter, any transfers of the moneys are private financial transactions into which the legislature can have no jurisdiction to inquire. The Courts are empowered to interfere to restrain the legislature from such an undue exercise of power: Stockdale v. Hansard.[19] Money paid to the Irish Red Cross Society, though paid to a body set up pursuant to an Act of the Oireachtas, is money paid into a private account. Paragraph 14 of the Irish Red Cross Order, 1939, which establishes the Irish Red Cross Society in accordance with the Red Cross Act, 1938, provides that the accounts of the Society "shall be audited by a duly qualified auditor appointed by the Central Council" of the Society; but neither in the Red Cross Act, 1938, nor in the amending Acts of 1944 and 1954 is there any provision empowering the investigation of the Society's accounts by the Auditor and Comptroller General.

S. F. Egan S.C. and D. P. Sheridan S.C. (with them K. J. Haugh) for the Attorney General:—

The previous admission by the Committee of hearsay evidence is irrelevant to a consideration of the consequences of the respondent's admitted refusal to answer questions put to him by the Committee. A witness in the High Court who refused to answer questions would not cease to be in contempt, merely because hearsay evidence had been admitted previously. Similarly, a witness in the High Court does not enjoy any protection from allegations made against him by another witness in the case.

An Act of the Oireachtas which has been passed since the coming into force of the Constitution of Ireland, 1937, ought not to be declared to be invalid where it is possible to construe its provisions so that they accord with the Constitution: East Donegal Co-Operative v. Attorney General[30]; McDonald v. Bord na gCon.[31] Section 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 is open to the construction that the Committee's function is merely to refer a complaint to the High Court for inquiry.

This inquiry may be a summary one if the High Court decides that the offence that it is investigating is a minor one—otherwise it must be by jury: Conroy v. Attorney General.[32] The test of whether an offence is a minor one is the penalty which is actually imposed rather than that which the Court could have imposed: Frank v. U.S.[33] By that test, the High Court clearly found the respondent's offence to be a minor one which was analogous to contempt of court, and one with which (as with contempt of court) a superior court is constitutionally empowered to deal without a jury: Attorney General v. Connolly[34]; Attorney General v. O'Kelly[35]; In re Earle[36]; and The State (Quinn) v. Ryan.[37] To that limited extent, the High Court can properly be regarded as a court of summary jurisdiction with the meaning of Article 38, s. 5, of the Constitution.

The Committee of Public Accounts, which is created by Standing Order 127 of the standing orders of Dáil Éireann, is empowered by Standing Order 72 to arrive at a decision by a simple majority. It is not a court; it is merely a fact-finding tribunal and, as such, it may use hearsay evidence. The witnesses' rights are protected adequately by s. 3, sub-s. 2, of the Act of 1970.

The Act of 1970 was passed in reliance on the Constitution of 1937; it is more attenuated than the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act, 1921, because the protections of that Act are embedded in the Constitution.

The departure in the Act of 1970 from the formula prescribed in the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act, 1921, cannot be explained by an assumed reliance on the Constitution of Ireland, 1937, since that Constitution was in force when the Solicitors Acts, 1954 and 1960, were passed and the formula of the Act of 1921 was employed in those Acts.

In Attorney General v. Connolly[34] and in Attorney General v. O'Kelly[35] the Court held that a superior court of record had an inherent power to commit for contempt of court and did not consider the effect of the Constitution. [He also referred to Attorney General v. Kissane.[39]]

The effect of Article 72 of the Constitution of 1922—and in this respect the position has not been altered by the Constitution of 1937—is to preclude the High Court from acting to any extent as a court of summary jurisdiction. Where the subject of the inquiry is in essence a criminal charge as in this case, there is no answer to the respondent's claim of a right to be represented, and to cross-examine witnesses, at the hearing of the charge. The clear words, or necessary implication, which would be required to exclude the principles of natural justice are not present in the Act of 1970. [He referred to McDonald v. Bord na gCon.[42]]

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment delivered by Ó Dálaigh C.J. was divided into two parts. The first part was the judgment of the Supreme Court on the issue of the constitutionality of the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970. On this issue only one judgment was pronounced as Article 34, s. 4, sub-s. 5, of the Constitution of Ireland, 1937, provides that the decision of the Supreme Court on the validity of a law having regard to the provisions of the Constitution shall be pronounced by such one of the judges of the Court as the Court shall direct, and that no other opinion on such question, whether assenting or dissenting, shall be pronounced. The second part, and the judgments of the other judges of the Supreme Court, dealt with the several other grounds of appeal.

Ó DÁLAIGH C.J., delivering the judgment of the Court:—
This appeal is taken by Mr. Pádraic Haughey against an order of a divisional court of the High Court which is dated the 12th March, 1971. The High Court, by its order, having recited that "the Court being satisfied that the said Pádraic Haughey has been guilty of the offence certified by the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann under the hand of its Chairman in writing dated 18th February 1971 namely that the said Pádraic Haughey on the 17th day of February 1971 being in attendance as a witness before the said Committee engaged in the performance of the functions assigned to it by order of Dáil Éireann made on the 1st day of December 1970 did contrary to the provisions[43] of Section 3(4) (b) of the above-mentioned Act refuse to answer questions to which the said Committee might legally require answers" ordered and adjudged as follows:—"that the said Pádraic Haughey do undergo a term of six calendar months imprisonment dating from this 12th day of March 1971 in the custody of the Governor of Mountjoy Prison in punishment of the said offence." The order added that "the Attorney General be at liberty to issue an Order of Committal accordingly." Counsel for both parties have stated that this addendum formed no part of the Court's spoken order and that they accept no responsibility for it. By notice of appeal, also dated the 12th March, Mr. Haughey appealed to this Court against the order of the High Court; and on that day, on the application of Mr. Haughey, this Court granted him an interim stay of execution, and on the 16th March, 1971, the Court granted a further stay of execution until the disposal of this appeal.

On the 1st December, 1970, it was ordered by Dáil Éireann as follows:—"That the Committee of Public Accounts shall examine specially the expenditure of the Grant-in-Aid for Northern Ireland Relief issued from Subhead J, Vote 16 (Miscellaneous Expenses) for 1969/70 and any moneys transferred by the Irish Red Cross Society to a bank account into which moneys from this Vote were or may have been lodged and shall furnish a separate report on this expenditure as soon as possible." The Court was informed that Vote 16 was voted on the 18th March, 1970.

The Committee of Public Accounts is a select committee of Dáil Éireann which, pursuant to Standing Order 127 of the standing orders of Dáil Éireann relative to public business, is appointed as soon as may be after the beginning of the financial year "to examine and report to the Dáil upon the accounts showing the appropriation of the sums granted by the Dáil to meet public expenditure and to suggest alterations and improvements in the forms of the estimates submitted to the Dáil." On the 17th November, 1970, it was ordered by Dáil Éireann in pursuance of Standing Order 127 that the Committee of Public Accounts be appointed. On the 3rd December, 1970, the Committee of Selection reported that it had nominated twelve named members of Dáil Éireann to serve on the Committee of Public Accounts on the appropriation accounts for the year ended 31st March, 1970, and the Dáil thereupon ordered that the report be laid before the Dáil. The Committee of Selection is authorised by Standing Order 73 to nominate the members to serve on select and special committees. On the 10th December, 1970, the Committee of Public Accounts met and Deputy Hogan was elected chairman.

On the 15th December, 1970, the Committee presented an interim report to the House in which it reported that in considering the adoption of procedures to govern its proceedings it had encountered a difficulty of a fundamental nature, viz., the extent of the application of the provisions of ss. 12 and 13 of Article 15 of the Constitution. Section 12 confers privilege on all official reports and publications of the Oircachtas, or of either House thereof, and utterances made in either House wherever published; and s. 13 provides, inter alia, that the members of each House of the Oireachtas shall not be amenable to any court, or any authority other than the House itself, in respect of any utterance in either House. The report stated that the difficulty for the Committee was whether these sections, which it regarded as essential to the effective discharge by members of the Houses of their duties, were applicable to (a) the utterances in the Committee of the members, advisers, officials and agents of the Committee; (b) the utterances in the Committee of any persons sent for by the Committee to give evidence; (c) the documents of the Committee and of its members prior to an order of the Dáil that they be laid before it; and (d) any papers or records sent to the Committee at its request or of his own volition by any person prior to an order of the Dáil that such papers or records be laid before it. The report then stated that it seemed to the Committee that, if the sections of the Article did not apply, the effective conduct of the business referred to it by the Dáil might prove to be impossible, having regard to the nature of the examination which it must conduct.

Having exhibited an extract from the report of the Attorney General's committee on legal points referred to the Attorney General by the all-party Committee on the Constitution and also the opinion of counsel whom the Committee consulted, the Committee observed in its report that it would be seen from these documents that, although the Committee had been advised that it enjoyed absolute privilege, the constitutional provisions might bear differing interpretations as to whether privilege attaches to the documents of the Committee before presentation to the House and to any papers or records sent to the Committee by any person at its request or of his own volition prior to an order of the Dáil for presentation and to utterances made in the Committee. The Committee further observed that in the circumstances, and since it could not adjudicate authoritatively on the issues, it had come to the conclusion that it would not be proper for it to proceed with the examination of the matter referred to it pending a resolution of the difficulty. The report then added that "consideration of the legal opinions suggests that the matter can be resolved by legislation" and the Committee recommended the earliest adoption of this course for the favourable consideration of the Dáil. The report also pointed out that the question as to whether the Committee had power to compel the attendance of witnesses was adverted to during the Dáil debate on the motion referring the examination of the expenditure of the Grant-in-Aid to the Committee, and the Committee suggested that the opportunity should be taken to resolve this last matter also if the House should decide to take legislative action, as suggested by the Committee.

Finally, the Committee reported that, in order to be in a position to proceed as soon as possible when the difficulties brought to its attention had been resolved, the Committee had adopted a number of procedures to govern its examination and these it sets forth in an appendix. It will suffice, for present purposes, to refer to clauses (i), (iii) and (viii) of the procedures. By clause (i) the Committee will sit in public during the taking of evidence by it, but the chairman is empowered to exclude persons at his discretion during the taking of certain evidence. By clause (iii) the Committee will allow witnesses to be accompanied, solely for the purpose of consultation, by counsel, solicitors or advisers as may be determined by the Committee in each relevant case. However, such counsel, solicitors or advisers will not be permitted to examine any witness nor to address the Committee. By clause (viii) witnesses will be invited to furnish preliminary statements.

On the 23rd December, 1970, the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, was passed by the Oireachtas. The term "committee" is defined by s. 1 of the Act of 1970 as meaning the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann while engaged in the performance of the functions assigned to it by the order[44] of Dáil Éireann made on the 1st December, 1970. By s. 2, sub-s. 1, of the Act, the members of the Committee shall not be amenable to any court, or any authority other than Dáil Éireann, in respect of any utterance in the Committee. By s. 2, sub-s. 2, of the Act (a) the documents of the Committee and documents of its members connected with its functions, (b) all official reports and publications of the Committee and (c) the utterances in the Committee of the members, advisers, officials and agents of the Committee, wherever published, shall be privileged. By s. 3, sub-s. 1, of the Act, the Committee may for the purposes of its functions do all or any of the following things—(a) summon witnesses, by letters delivered to them personally or by registered post, to attend before it; (b) examine the witnesses attending before it; and (c) require any such witness to produce to the Committee (or require any person, by letter delivered to him personally or by registered post, to send to the Committee) any document in his power or control. By s. 3, sub-s. 2, of the Act a witness before the Committee, and a person sending a document to the Committee, shall be entitled to the same immunities and privileges as if he were a witness before the High Court. By s. 3, sub-s. 3, of the Act a witness summons shall be signed by at least one member of the Committee.

Section 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 (under which Mr. Haughey was dealt with) is in the following terms:—

> "(4) If any person—
>
> (a) on being duly summoned as a witness before the committee makes default in attending, or
>
> (b) being in attendance as a witness before the committee refuses to take an oath or to make an affirmation when legally required by the committee to do so, or to produce any document in his power or control legally required by the committee to be produced by him or to answer any question to which the committee may legally require an answer, or
> (c) fails or refuses to send to the committee any document in his power or control legally required by the committee to be sent to it by the person, or
>
> (d) does anything which would, if the committee were a court of justice having power to commit for contempt of court, be contempt of such court,
> the committee may certify the offence of that person under the hand of the chairman of the committee to the High Court and the High Court may, after such inquiry as it thinks proper to make, punish or take steps for the punishment of that person in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court."

On the 17th February, 1971, when the Committee was purportedly engaged in the performance of the functions assigned to it by the order of Dáil Éireann made on the 1st December, 1970, Mr. Pádraic Haughey appeared before the Committee as a witness, having been duly summoned to appear. After Mr. Haughey had been sworn, the chairman of the Committee, addressing Mr. Haughey, said:—"Mr. Haughey, as you know, we are investigating the question of the expenditure of a Grant-in-Aid of £100,000, and, owing to statements that have been made about the alleged importation of arms, I want to ask you a few questions in general in which you may be able to help us?"

In reply, Mr. Haughey read out a written statement which he handed later to the chairman. Mr. Haughey's statement, the full text of which is annexed[45] to this judgment, may be summarised as follows. He said that he wished to make a statement on oath. On the 29th January, 1971, he had received a registered letter which was a notice to produce to the Committee all documents in his possession touching on the matters which the Committee was inquiring into. On the 6th February, 1971, he received by registered post a witness summons signed by a member of the Committee. He was there in answer to that summons. He had not then, nor had he ever, any documents or copy documents which would or could in any way relate to the matters being investigated by the Committee. He never, directly or indirectly, got in touch or sought to get in touch with Mr. C. J. Haughey in order that he would authorise customs clearance of any guns, ammunition or materials of any nature or description, nor did he (Mr. C. J. Haughey) ever indicate to him what his attitude would be if such requests were made to him, as the matter never arose between them. Referring to reports which he had read of "alleged evidence" given before the Committee, he definitely never received or gave money, or received or gave any cheque or any valuable security in the name of George Dixon; nor did he ever use the name George Dixon in any connection with any financial or banking dealings. No moneys from the Grant-in-Aid for Northern Ireland Relief were ever paid to him, nor did he ever have any control over any of these moneys, nor had he ever any say in the disbursement of this money. His brother, Charles Haughey, never discussed with him the moneys voted for Northern Ireland relief—until after he had received a subpoena to appear before the Committee.

Mr. Pádraic Haughey then said he wished to state the reasons why he was not prepared to be examined by the Committee. He was advised by his lawyers that the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, did not give any privilege or immunity to any newspaper, periodical, radio, or television which published any evidence allegedly given before the Committee. His legal advisers were then considering his position in civil law, as a result of reports of alleged evidence already given by witnesses before the Committee, in so far as that alleged evidence referred to him personally and he was advised that, by giving evidence before the Committee, he might be liable in civil law and under the laws of the land for any answer he might make. While he appreciated that the laws of evidence might well be stretched by a non-legal body, such as the Committee, nevertheless he was not prepared to submit to examination arising out of so-called principles of justice. He was advised that because of the publicity already given to allegations not based on best evidence or admissions made against him he was entitled as of right to make a sworn statement, and he was further advised not to answer any questions for the reason already given. Mr. Haughey then handed in copies of his statement, and the chairman, having ascertained from Mr. Haughey that he was following the advice he had been given, announced that the Committee would go into private session.

After an interval of three-quarters of an hour, the Committee resumed public session and the chairman then asked Mr. Haughey a number of questions. The chairman's first questions were an inquiry as to whether Mr. Haughey accepted the authority of the Committee (i) to conduct the investigation, (ii) to summon witnesses, and (iii) to examine witnesses appearing before it. Mr. Haughey's answer in relation to item (ii) was that he was subpoenaed to come there; as to the other matters, his answer was to refer to his sworn statement. The chairman then asked:—"Do you then claim the right to refuse to answer any question whatsoever that this Committee of Dáil Éireann may put to you?" Mr. Haughey replied:—"I am further advised—I will read the last sentence—not to answer any questions, for the reasons already given." The chairman then read s. 3, sub-s. 2, of the Act of 1970 to Mr. Haughey. Mr. Haughey repeated that he was advised not to answer any question for the reasons already given. Then the chairman said:—"I just want to ask you one other question: did you travel by plane to England with Mr. —— [name given] and others?" Mr. Haughey replied as before. The chairman next read to Mr. Haughey the terms[46] of s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970. He added:—"I think it is only fair to warn you that the Committee may be obliged to act on that if you continue to refuse to answer questions or give evidence." Continuing, the chairman referred to a Government decision at a meeting on the 16th August, 1969, that a sum of money—the amount and the channel of disbursement of which would be determined by the Minister for Finance—would be made available from the Exchequer to provide aid for victims of the current unrest in the Six Counties, and he asked Mr. Haughey if he was aware that the Government had so decided. Mr. Haughey replied:—"I have made a sworn statement, Mr. Chairman, and everything in it is relevant to your inquiry, as far as in relation to me personally." The chairman then referred to an announcement made by the Government Information Bureau on the same date stating that the Minister for Finance would make funds available for the relief of victims of the disturbances in the Six Counties and that he would have early consultation with the chairman of the Irish Red Cross, and he asked Mr. Haughey if he was aware that the Government Information Bureau had so announced. Mr. Haughey repeated that he was advised not to answer any questions. The chairman then said:—"You are refusing to answer that question—would you say 'yes' or 'no'?" Mr. Haughey replied:—"I am further advised not to answer any questions." The chairman concluded by saying:—"We will take that as a 'no'. Thank you very much." Mr. Haughey then thanked the chairman and Committee and, having first inquired if he was free to go, he withdrew.

On the application of counsel for Mr. Haughey, this Court admitted the printed transcript of the minutes of the evidence given before the Committee by Chief Superintendent John P. Fleming on Tuesday, the 9th February, 1971, which was a week before Mr. Haughey appeared before the Committee. The chairman began the session by saying to the Chief Superintendent:—"You know, of course, that we are investigating this question of the expenditure of public money." He then asked:—"Have you any information in respect of the passage of money to any persons or organisations which might be of help to us?" The Chief Superintendent replied "Yes, I have" and he then asked for, and received, permission to refer to a note for dates and amounts. He then added that, at the outset, he wished to point out that all his information had come from confidential sources and that he was not at liberty to reveal the sources.

In the course of his evidence Chief Superintendent Fleming then made several references to Mr. Pádraic Haughey, as follows:—

(i) In or about the third week of August, 1969, Mr. Haughey paid over £1,500 in London to Cathal Goulding, Chief of Staff of the I.R.A.

(ii) In August or September Mr —— [name given] had a meeting with a certain leading I.R.A. leader in Dublin and promised him about £50,000 for funds for the I.R.A., for the North; he was not sure about future meetings but he knew Mr. Haughey was deeply involved.

(iii) One consignment of arms at least came in through Dublin Airport some time early in October—there could have been a second or third—and Mr. Haughey made all arrangements at the airport to take in this consignment. He handed them over at the airport to two leading I.R.A. men. As far as he was aware the arms were taken away in a truck. When asked by the chairman "Have you any knowledge of the source of the moneys which paid for the arms?," the the Chief Superintendent replied:—"I imagine it came from the grant-in-aid fund."

(iv) Mr. Haughey went to London on the 16-17th November, 1969, and from confidential information the witness knew that he went for the purpose of purchasing arms, and that he travelled with a person referred to as "J" on the Committee's code list.

(v) There could well have been other arms shipments in which Mr. Haughey or Captain —— [name given] may have been involved, but the witness had no evidence, no direct evidence: it was speculation or rumour.

(vi) Deputy Keating referred to a copy letter of the 17th November, 1969, addressed to the Manager of the National Provincial Bank Ltd., Piccadilly, London, confirming the contents of a telephone conversation to the effect that a Mr. George Dixon would call to cash cheques to a total of £11,450 on the 18th November, giving the number of the cheque book, and requesting that he be assisted. The Chief Superintendent said he believed that Mr. George Dixon was Mr. Haughey, and he said the £11,450 was to be used for the purchase of arms in England. He had no information of an importation of arms which would correspond to this. (Deputy Keating added that they knew the facility was not used.)

On the 18th February, 1971 (which was the day following the sitting of the Committee at which Mr. Haughey appeared) a certificate pursuant to s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 was forwarded by the secretary of the Committee to "The Registrar, High Court . . . for the consideration of the High Court." The certificate was in the following form.

"In the matter of:—Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970.

I, Patrick Hogan of John Street, Cashel, County Tipperary, Surgeon and Dáil Deputy, hereby certify as follows:—

1. I am and was at all material times Chairman of the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann.

2. The said Committee was on the 17th day of February 1971 engaged in the performance of the functions assigned to it by Order of Dáil Éireann made on the 1st day of December, 1970.
3. One Pádraig Haughey of 25 Foxfield Avenue, Raheny, Dublin 3, having been summoned to attend before the said Committee duly attended as a witness before the said Committee on the 17th day of February 1971 when the said Committee was lawfully engaged in the performance of its said assigned functions.
4. The said Pádraig Haughey on the said occasion, contrary to the provisions of Section 3 (4) (b) of the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, refused to answer questions to which the said Committee legally required answers.
5. The said Committee, therefore, in accordance with the provisions of Section 3 (4) of the said Act, hereby certifies to the High Court that an offence under the said Act has been committed by the said Pádraig Haughey by reason of his refusal to answer the said questions.

Given under my hand as Chairman of the said Committee.

P. Hogan
Chairman of the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann.
18th February, 1971."

On the 19th February, 1971, the President of the High Court, on motion of counsel for the Attorney General, made an order which, having recited the reading of the certificate, ordered "that the Attorney General be at liberty to serve on the said Pádraic Haughey a notice requiring him to attend before the High Court in the President's Court at 11 a.m. on Wednesday the 24th February 1971 to show cause why he should not be punished in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court . . ." On the 22nd February, 1971, Mr. Haughey issued a plenary summons in the High Court against the Attorney General claiming a declaration that the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, was repugnant to the Constitution. When Mr. Haughey attended before the President on the 24th February, it was ordered that the Attorney General should file before the 1st March an affidavit stating the facts upon which it was alleged Mr. Haughey had committed an offence under the Act of 1970 and that Mr. Haughey should, on or before the 8th March, file a motion or an affidavit showing cause, and that the hearing should be fixed for the 10th March, 1971. The matter came on for hearing on that date before a divisional court consisting of the President, and Mr. Justice Murnaghan and Mr. Justice Henchy. It was agreed that Mr. Haughey, in addition to the grounds relied upon to show cause, should be free to rely on the grounds upon which, in the action he had brought, he sought a declaration that the Act was unconstitutional. The order of the divisional court was made on the 12th March and the reasons of the members of that court were stated on the 31st March, 1971. The President agreed with the reasons stated in the judgment of Mr. Justice Henchy. Mr. Justice Murnaghan, who in the interval had been on circuit and had not the necessary opportunity of formulating his reasons in writing, stated that in the interest of expedition he would content himself by saying he agreed generally with the reasons stated in Mr. Justice Henchy's judgment as the basis of the decision which the High Court had announced on the 12th March, 1971.

The major question raised by this appeal is the validity of s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970, having regard to the provisions of Article 38 of the Constitution. The terms[47] of the impugned sub-section have already been set out and need not be re-stated.

Article 38 of the Constitution is entitled "trial of offences" and is as follows:—

> "1. No person shall be tried on any criminal charge save in due course of law.
> 2. Minor offences may be tried by courts of summary jurisdiction.
>
> 3. 1° Special courts may be established by law for the trial of offences in cases where it may be determined in accordance with such law that the ordinary courts are inadequate to secure the effective administration of justice, and the preservation of public peace and order.
> 2° The constitution, powers, jurisdiction and procedure of such special courts shall be prescribed by law.
>
> 4. 1° Military tribunals may be established for the trial of offences against military law alleged to have been committed by persons while subject to military law and also to deal with a state of war or armed rebellion.
> 2° A member of the Defence Forces not on active service shall not be tried by any courtmartial or other military tribunal for an offence cognisable by the civil courts unless such offence is within the jurisdiction of any courtmartial or other military tribunal under any law for the enforcement of military discipline.

[47] See p. 240, ante.

5. Save in the case of the trial of offences under section 2, section 3 or section 4 of this Article no person shall be tried on any criminal charge without a jury.

6. The provisions of Articles 34 and 35 of this Constitution shall not apply to any court or tribunal set up under section 3 or section 4 of this Article."

In the circumstances of this case, the trial of offences by special courts (section 3) or by military courts (section 4) may be ignored; what remains of relevance in Article 38 are ss. 2 and 5 which, read together, provide that no person shall be tried on any criminal charge without a jury, save for minor offences tried by courts of summary jurisdiction.

Article 38 recognises two categories of offence, namely, minor offences and offences which are not minor offences and which, for brevity, may be called non-minor offences. How is it to be determined into which category an offence falls? Of the relevant criteria, the most important is the severity of the penalty which is authorised to be imposed for commission of the offence. This test was laid down by this Court in Conroy v. Attorney General,[48] which has been followed in The State (Sheerin) v. Kennedy.[49] The decision in Conroy's Case[48] followed the judgment of the former Supreme Court in Melling v. O Mathghamhna.[50] Turning back to s. 3, sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970, the penalty authorised for the offence which is in question in this case is such penalty as can be imposed for contempt of the High Court. Contempt of court is a common-law misdemeanour and, as such, is punishable by both imprisonment and fine at discretion, i.e., without statutory limit. Some English authorities suggest that limits are nevertheless to be imposed—that imprisonment must not be inordinately heavy and the fine not excessive or unreasonable—but the position remains that a common-law misdemeanour can be punished by a penalty entirely outside the range of penalty permissible for a minor offence: see Archbold's Practice in Criminal Cases, 36th ed., paras. 659 and 662. On the authority of the decisions of this Court, referred to above, the offence in question here is not a minor offence. Counsel for the Attorney General submitted that the Court should follow the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Frank v. United States[51] and apply as a test, not the severity of the penalty authorised, but of the penalty actually imposed. Here the sentence imposed by the High Court was six months imprisonment, and this would be within the range of penalty appropriate in the case of a minor offence. This Court sees no reason for departing from the test it laid down in Conroy's Case.[52] Frank's Case[53] was a case of contempt of court; the present case is not a case of contempt of court but an ordinary criminal prosecution. Moreover, it should be noted that Marshall J., who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court in Frank's Case,[53] expressly excluded the test of the penalty actually imposed in ordinary criminal prosecutions. At p. 149 of the report his words are:—"In ordinary criminal prosecutions, the severity of the penalty authorized, not the penalty actually imposed, is the relevant criterion." To apply the test of the penalty actually imposed would, in effect, be to deny to an accused the substance of the right to trial by jury guaranteed by Article 38, s. 5, of the Constitution. Therefore, the offence which s. 3. sub-s. 4, of the Act of 1970 has created is a non-minor offence.

Three possible constructions of the impugned sub-section have been put forward during the course of the argument:—

(i) that the sub-section purports to authorise the Committee to try and convict, and thereupon to send the offender forward to the High Court for punishment;

(ii) in the alternative, that the sub-section merely authorises the Committee to complain to the High Court and, thereupon, that it is for that court to try summarily and, if it should convict, to punish the offender;

(iii) in the further alternative, that the sub-section—as in (ii)—merely authorises the Committee to complain to the High Court and, thereupon, that it is for the court either summarily, or upon indictment (i.e., by jury), to try and, if it should convict, to punish the offender.

It has been strongly urged on behalf of Mr. Haughey that the first construction is the correct construction. That argument has been based upon contrasting the formula to be found in the impugned sub-section with the formula of sub-s. 2 of s. 1 of the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act, 1921.[54] The latter sub-section is in these terms:—

"(2) If any person—

(a) on being duly summoned as a witness before a tribunal makes default in attending; or

(b) being in attendance as a witness refuses to take an oath legally required by the tribunal to be taken, or to produce any document in his power or control legally required by the tribunal to be produced by him, or to answer any question to which the tribunal may legally require an answer; or

(c) does any other thing which would, if the tribunal had been a court of law having power to commit for contempt, have been contempt of that court;

the chairman of the tribunal may certify the offence of that person under his hand to the High Court, or in Scotland the Court of Session, and the court may thereupon inquire into the alleged offence and after hearing any witnesses who may be produced against or on behalf of the person charged with the offence, and after hearing any statement that may be offered in defence, punish or take steps for the punishment of that person in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the court."

If one compares the formula of the Act of 1970 with that of the Act of 1921, the provenance of the former Act is apparent. But there are significant differences. It will be noted that the Act of 1921 refers to an inquiry into "the alleged offence" and speaks of hearing any witness produced against or on behalf of "the person charged with the offence," and there are further references to the rights of the defendant which are spelt out with care. Mr. Haughey's counsel has called attention to the absence of these very features from the Act of 1970. That Act states baldly that "the committee may certify the offence of that person . . . to the High Court and the High Court may, after such inquiry . . . punish . . ." It has been urged on behalf of Mr. Haughey that the Act of 1970 intended to authorise the Committee to try and to convict and, thereupon, to send the offender forward to the High Court for punishment. It may be noted that the Committee itself appears to have thought that this was the correct construction. The curial clause of the Committee's certificate[55] reads:—"The said Committee, therefore, in accordance with the provisions of Section 3(4) of the said Act, hereby certifies to the High Court that an offence under the said Act has been committed by the said Pádraig Haughey by reason of his refusal to answer the said questions." The Committee departed from the strict wording of the section, which states that it may "certify the offence," and certified that an offence had been committed by the witness.

If one examines the impugned sub-section in the light of the ordinary canons of construction, the Committee's view—which is also the view contended for on behalf of Mr. Haughey—has much to support it. The sub-section seems to say precisely what the Committee interpreted it as saying. If that view is the correct view, then the sub-section has authorised the Committee to try and to convict a witness of a criminal offence. But the trial of a criminal offence is an exercise of judicial power and is a function of the Courts, not of a committee of the Legislature. Article 34 of the Constitution provides that justice shall be administered in courts established by law by judges appointed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. The Committee of Public Accounts is not a court and its members are not judges. The Constitution of Ireland is founded on the doctrine of the tripartite division of the powers of government—legislative, executive and judicial—as appears from an examination of Articles 6, 15, 28 and 34; and a statute that conferred on a committee of the Legislature a power to try a criminal offence would be repugnant to the Constitution and invalid, and a conviction by such committee, and any sentence pursuant thereto, could not stand. Moreover, under the Constitution the Courts cannot be used as appendages or auxiliaries to enforce the purported convictions of other tribunals. The Constitution vests the judicial power of government solely in the Courts and reserves exclusively to the Courts the power to try persons on criminal charges. Trial, conviction and sentence are indivisible parts of the exercise of this power: see Deaton v. Attorney General.[56]

The formula of the Act of 1921 has been copied verbatim in at least a couple of instances in our legislation and significantly, perhaps, in s. 19, sub-s. 2, of the Solicitors Act, 1954, and in s. 15, sub-s. 2, of the Solicitors (Amendment) Act, 1960. The truncated version which is found in the Act of 1970 first appeared, so far as counsel's researches have gone, in s. 17, sub-s. 2, of the Control of Prices Act, 1937, and was repeated in s. 35 of the Mineral Development Act, 1940, and para. 6(4) of the First Schedule to the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1953. Mr. Haughey's counsel has called attention, by way of contrast, to the wholly unobjectionable formula employed in s. 86 of the Local Government Act, 1941, and in s. 82, sub-s. 7 (b) (iv) of the Local Government (Planning and Development) Act, 1963. The formula in the latter Act reads as follows:—

> "every person to whom a notice has been given who refuses or wilfully neglects to attend in accordance with the notice or who wilfully alters, suppresses, conceals or destroys any document to which the notice relates or who, having so attended, refuses to give evidence or refuses or wilfully fails to produce any document to which the notice relates shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds."

When one compares the formula of the Act of 1921 with its truncated successor, it will be noted that the Act of 1921 put it beyond question that the tribunal was not being vested with a power of trial; although a provision to such effect under the British Constitution (the cardinal principle of which is the supremacy of parliament) would be wholly unexceptionable, however unusual.

If the Court is to apply the ordinary canons of construction of statute law, the Court would affirm the construction of the sub-section first contended for on behalf of Mr. Haughey and in such case, as has already been stated, the sub-section thus construed would offend against the Constitution and the order of the High Court would be set aside in consequence. But, in this instance, the ordinary canons of construction are not applicable. Here the constitutionality of an Act of the Oireachtas established by the Constitution is questioned; in such case the Court must apply different canons of construction.

The Courts, in construing a statute of the Oireachtas, act on the presumption of constitutionality. This presumption was enunciated in National Union of Railwaymen v. Sullivan[57] and it has been elaborated in two recent decisions of this Court: McDonald v. Bord na gCon[58] and East Donegal Co-Operative v. Attorney General.[59] In delivering the judgment of the Court in McDonald's Case,[58] Walsh J. said at p. 239 of the report:—". . . an Act of the Oireachtas, is presumed to be constitutional until the contrary is clearly established. One practical effect of this presumption is that if in respect of any provision or provisions of the Act two or more constructions are reasonably open, . . . it must be presumed that the Oireachtas intended only the constitutional construction and a Court called upon to adjudicate upon the constitutionality of the statutory provision should uphold the constitutional construction. It is only when there is no construction reasonably open which is not repugnant to the Constitution that the provision should be held to be repugnant." In delivering the judgment of the Court in East Donegal Co-Operative v. Attorney General,[59] Walsh J. said at p. 341 of the report:—"It must be added, of course, that interpretation or construction of an Act or any provision thereof in conformity with the Constitution cannot be pushed to the point where the interpretation would result in the substitution of the legislative provision by another provision with a different context, as that would be to usurp the functions of the Oireachtas. In seeking to reach an interpretation or construction in accordance with the Constitution, a statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous cannot be given an opposite meaning. At the same time, however, the presumption of constitutionality carries with it not only the presumption that the constitutional interpretation or construction is the one intended by the Oireachtas but also that the Oireachtas intended that proceedings, procedures, discretions and adjudications which are permitted, provided for, or prescribed by an Act of the Oireachtas are to be conducted in accordance with the principles of constitutional justice. In such a case any departure from those principles would be restrained and corrected by the Courts." Applying this doctrine in the present case, the Court is of opinion that it is its duty to reject the construction which the ordinary canons of construction recommend and to treat the Committee's certificate, not as a certificate of conviction, but as "merely a step preliminary to the commencement of the trial of a criminal offence in the High Court" as Mr. Justice Henchy expressed it in his judgment in the High Court. This construction saves the sub-section from the constitutional infirmity from which, in the first instance, Mr. Haughey's counsel has urged the sub-section suffers.

The second of the three possible constructions[60] is that the sub-section authorises the High Court to try and to convict and punish, and to do so by way of summary trial. This in fact is what the High Court did. Mr. Haughey's argument, on the basis of this second construction, has been briefly and simply this. The offence in question here is not a minor offence and all non-minor offences must be tried with a jury; but Mr. Haughey's trial in the High Court was a summary trial, without a jury, and therefore it was in violation of Article 38 of the Constitution[61] and his conviction must, in consequence, be set aside. The wording of Article 38, be it noted, is "no person shall be tried on any [for brevity I insert non-minor] criminal charge without a jury," or in the Irish text "ní cead duine do thriail [i gcúis neamh-mhionchionta] ach i láthair choiste thiomanta." Trial by jury of non-minor offences is mandatory, it is not simply a right to be adopted or waived at the option of the accused. It follows that the sub-section, on the basis of the second construction which would authorise summary trial in the High Court, would offend against the Constitution no less than it does on the basis of the first construction: the first construction infringes Article 34 and the second infringes Article 38.

Counsel for the Attorney General has argued against this conclusion by submitting that the sub-section can, constitutionally, allow of summary trial of the charge in question here as a case of contempt of court. Under the Constitution of the Irish Free State in Attorney General v. O'Kelly[62] and under the Constitution of Ireland in Attorney General v. Connolly,[63] the High Court tried charges of contempt of court without a jury, i.e., summarily. Neither case was a case of ex facie contempt, or so close thereto as to amount to an interference with a pending or current trial. This Court is not now called upon to consider whether O'Kelly's Case[62] and Connolly's Case[63] were correctly decided; for the purpose of the Attorney General's submission the Court accepts that they were. It is enough for this Court now to say that these two cases cannot assist the Attorney General's submission. The High Court in the present case was not dealing with a charge of contempt of court. The impugned sub-section does not purport to make the offence here in question "contempt of court"; it does no more than direct that the offence, which is an ordinary criminal offence, shall be punished in like manner as if the offender had been guilty of contempt of court, that is to say, it defines the punishment for the offence by reference to the punishment for contempt of the High Court. Moreover, it would not be competent for the Oireachtas to declare contempt of a committee of the Oireachtas to be contempt of the High Court. This is an equation that could not be made under the doctrine of the tripartite separation of the powers of government. The reasoning in O'Kelly's Case[62] and in Connolly's Case[63] does not support the Attorney General's submission but, on the contrary, it is inimical to it. The exception which the High Court (under Article 72 of the Constitution of the Irish Free State) in O'Kelly's Case[62] and (under Article 38 of the Constitution of Ireland) in Connolly's Case[63] engrafted on the injunction for trial by jury is based upon the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court to ensure the administration of justice without obstruction. That is to say, the exception finds its source and justification in another article of the Constitution: Article 64 in the Constitution of the Irish Free State and Article 34 in the Constitution of Ireland. Neither O'Kelly's Case[62] nor Connolly's Case[63] makes any exception in respect of the trial of ordinary criminal offences which are not minor offences.

There is, moreover, yet another barrier to the trial in the High Court without a jury of the offence alleged to have been committed in this case. By the provisions of Article 38, s. 2, of the Constitution the trial of minor offences without a jury is restricted to courts of summary jurisdiction. It is true that the High Court possesses a universal jurisdiction in matters, civil and criminal, but that does not make it a court of summary jurisdiction within the provisions of s. 2 of Article 38. A court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of that section is one whose criminal jurisdiction to try and to convict is restricted to the trial of minor offences. The term "court of summary jurisdiction" was well known prior to the enactment of the Constitution; the expression appeared in almost identical words in the Constitution of Saorstát Éireann and, prior to that, in s. 13 of the Interpretation Act, 1889. Under our law that jurisdiction is exercised only by the District Court. In accordance with the provisions of s. 5 of Article 38, the jurisdiction of the High Court to try criminal offences is a jurisdiction to try them only with a jury.

In re HAUGHEY

This does not conclude the matter. The High Court took the view that the formula to be found in the impugned sub-section—"after such inquiry as it [the High Court] thinks proper to make"—was wide enough to contemplate trial by jury as well as summary disposal: that is to say, that the sub-section has provided that the alleged offender may be tried either summarily or upon indictment (i.e., by jury) and that, upon conviction, he may be sentenced in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the High Court. This is the third of the three possible constructions[64] of the impugned sub-section. For the Attorney General it was urged that the principle of presumption of constitutionality warranted such a construction. In the opinion of this Court the formula "after such inquiry as it [the High Court] thinks proper to make" can be stretched, by presumption of constitutionality, to contemplate a trial in the High Court by a High Court judge or judges but, as has been pointed out, the presumption of constitutionality is not to be applied where it would do violence to the plain meaning of the words. It is, in the opinion of this Court, beyond the reach of the presumption of constitutionality to read into the simple inquiry formula of the sub-section an intention to authorise trial by jury. The statute in this case created an offence which was not prohibited by the common law. It indicated a particular manner of proceeding against the alleged offender by express reference to contempt of court in terms which clearly indicated a summary manner of disposal of the trial and of the offender, if convicted; and the procedure thus indicated clearly excludes that of indictment. This interpretation is reinforced by the express provision that the charge is laid by the certificate of the chairman of the Committee.

If, however, the sub-section were to be construed as contended for by the Attorney General, in the opinion of the Court the subsection would not thereby shed its constitutional infirmity. The sub-section, in the supposed meaning, would then authorise trial either summarily or on indictment. But for the sub-section to authorise summary trial (i.e., a mode of trial suitable for a minor offence) and upon conviction to authorise punishment by a penalty only appropriate to a non-minor offence would offend grossly against the substance of the guarantee contained in Article 38. So much then of the sub-section as authorised summary trial would be struck down, and authority to try by jury is all of the sub-section that would remain in force. But Mr. Haughey was tried summarily.

None of the three possible constructions of the impugned sub-section is free from constitutional infirmity and, however one views the sub-section, Mr. Haughey's conviction cannot stand. In the opinion of the Court sub-s. 4 of s. 3 of the Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, violates Article 38 of the Constitution and, therefore, is invalid and of no effect. The order of the Court will so declare; and, in consequence, this appeal will be allowed, the conviction and sentence of the High Court will be set aside and Mr. Haughey will be discharged. This concludes the judgment of the Court.

APPENDIX

Statement of Pádraig Haughey

"With respect, Mr. Chairman, my name is Pádraig Haughey. I reside at 25 Foxfield Avenue, Raheny, Dublin 3. I am aged 38, married—with one child. I wish to make a statement on oath. On the 29th January, 1971, I received a letter, a registered letter, which was notice to produce to the Committee of Public Accounts all documents in my possession touching on the matters into which the Committee was inquiring. These alleged documents were to be produced before the 22nd January, 1971, and, on the following Monday, I received a letter from the Clerk of the Committee extending the time to produce these alleged documents to the 8th February, 1971, and apologising for the mistake to the date for final production of documents in the original letter. On the 6th February, 1971, I received, by registered post, a witness summons signed by Garret FitzGerald, member of the Committee. I am here in answer to this summons. I have not now, nor had I ever, any documents or copy documents which would or could in any way relate to the matters presently being investigated by this Committee. I wish to state that I never, directly or indirectly, got in touch or sought to get in touch with Mr. C. J. Haughey in order that he would authorise customs clearance of any guns, ammunition or materials of any nature or description, nor did he ever indicate to me what his attitude would be if such requests were made to him as the matter never arose between us. Again, referring to reports, which I have read, of alleged evidence given before this Committee, I definitely state I never received or gave money, or received or gave any cheque, or any valuable security in the name of George Dixon; nor did I ever use the name of George Dixon in any connexion with any financial or banking dealings.

I also wish to state that no moneys from the Grant-in-Aid for Northern Ireland Relief issued from subhead J, Vote 16, Miscellaneous Expenses for 1969/70, were ever paid to me, nor did I ever have any control over any of these moneys; nor had I ever any say in the disbursement of this money. Further, I wish to state positively that my brother, Charles Haughey, never discussed the moneys voted for Northern Ireland relief with me until I—until after I had received the subpoena to attend before this Committee. I now wish to state that the reasons why I am not prepared to be examined by the Committee are as follows: I am advised by my lawyers that Statute No. 22 of 1970, The Committee of Public Accounts of Dáil Éireann (Privilege and Procedure) Act, 1970, does not give any privilege or immunity to any newspaper, periodical, radio or television which publishes any evidence allegedly given by a witness before this Committee. At present my legal advisers are considering my position in civil law as a result of the reports of alleged evidence already given by witnesses here in so far as that alleged evidence relates to me personally. I am advised that by giving evidence before this Committee I might be liable in civil law and under the laws of the land for any answer I might make. I wish to state that, while I appreciate that the laws of evidence may well be stretched by a non-legal body, such as this, nevertheless I am not prepared to submit to examination arising out of so-called principles of justice. I am advised that, because of the publicity already given to allegations not based on best evidence or admissions made against me, I am entitled as of right to make this sworn statement and I am further advised not to answer any questions for the reasons already given. I have copies now which I will hand out to you all."

Ó DÁLAIGH C.J.:—

I turn now to a consideration of the several grounds of appeal which raise questions which are independent of the constitutionality of the Act of 1970, and I follow the order in which these grounds have been dealt with in the judgment of Mr. Justice Henchy.

First, Mr. Haughey objected to such part of the Committee's terms of reference as refers to an examination of expenditure of moneys of the Irish Red Cross Society. The terms[65] of the order of Dáil Éireann of the 1st December, 1970, contemplate an examination not only into the expenditure of the grant-in-aid for

Northern Ireland issued from Subhead J of Vote 16, Miscellaneous Expenses for 1969/70, but also an examination into the expenditure of the Irish Red Cross Society's moneys transferred by the Irish Red Cross Society to a bank account into which moneys from the Vote were, or may have been, lodged. The examination in question here is not being conducted by a select committee established under Standing Order 67, but by the Committee of Public Accounts whose powers are defined in Standing Order 127. Those powers are "to examine and report to the Dáil upon the accounts showing the appropriation of the sums granted by the Dáil to meet the public expenditure and to suggest alterations and improvements in the form of the estimate submitted to the Dáil." The examination of the expenditure of moneys belonging to the Irish Red Cross Society, not being moneys granted by the Dáil to meet the public expenditure, is not a matter which, as such, falls within the jurisdiction of the Committee of Public Accounts. If, however, moneys issued from Subhead J of Vote 16 were lodged in a bank account and Irish Red Cross Society moneys were transferred to that account, forming a mixed fund, then for the purpose of segregating the funds the expenditure of the moneys of the Irish Red Cross Society might incidentally be disclosed but, upon the moneys being duly segregated, any further examination into the expenditure of the Irish Red Cross Society moneys would be outside the functions of the Committee of Public Accounts as defined in Standing Order 127.

Secondly, Mr. Haughey has also objected to any examination whatsoever into the expenditure of the grant-in-aid even though conducted within the terms of Standing Order 127. The ground of his objection is that the standing orders relative to public business (of which Standing Order 127 forms part) have not been adopted as the standing orders of the House of Representatives, called Dáil Éireann, established under the Constitution of Ireland, but are the standing orders of the former Dáil Éireann, i.e., the chamber of deputies, called Dáil Éireann, established under the Constitution of Saorstát Éireann. It is surprising that the new Dáil Éireann did not formally adopt a new body of standing orders when the Constitution came into force on the 29th December, 1937, and has not done so since. Article 15, s. 10, of the Constitution contemplated that the new Dáil should make its own rules and standing orders. The section reads:—"Each House shall make its own rules and standing orders . . ." or "Déanfaidh gach Tigh ar leith a rialacha agus a bhuan-orduithe féin . . ." Instead, it appears that the new House has continued to operate under the standing orders of the old Dáil Éireann, subject to amendment. On the eve of the coming into force of the Constitution, the Committee of Procedure and Privileges met under the chairmanship of the Ceann Comhairle to consider the "amendment of Standing Orders relative to Public Business consequent on the coming into operation of the Constitution." The Committee's report, printed on the 17th December, 1937, recommended certain amendments which were set out in a schedule to the report. The report said that further amendments would be required after the assembly of Seanad Éireann, and it added that the committee considered that a reprint of the standing orders might await these further revisions. The Oireachtas, it may be noted, was then a uni-cameral House. The suggested amendments were adopted by the new Dáil on the 12th January, 1938. This, in my opinion, was a tacit adoption by the new Dáil Éireann of the standing orders of the former House, as amended, as the standing orders of the new House. It may indeed be that taciturnity is uncharacteristic of parliaments, but it seems to me that the action of Dáil Éireann on the 12th January, 1938, is susceptible of no other construction than that the new House was "making" its Standing Orders within the meaning and intention of Article 15.

Thirdly, Mr. Haughey has objected that the Committee had no power to administer an oath. Mr. Justice Henchy, in the High Court, referred to this objection as unmeritorious as shown by the fact that Mr. Haughey initiated his appearance before the Committee by stating that he wished to make a statement on oath, and then in fact did so. The ground of Mr. Haughey's objection is that the Oireachtas Witness Oaths Act, 1924, which applied to the House of the former Oireachtas and any committee or joint-committee thereof, has not been "carried over." The sustainability of this objection turns on the meaning of the words "governmental authority" in s. 4, sub-s. 1, of the Constitution (Consequential Provisions) Act, 1937, which was enacted in preparation for the coming into operation of the Constitution of Ireland. The relevant portion of s. 4, sub-s. 1, of the Act of 1937 says that every mention or reference in a statute in force before the coming into force of the Constitution of, or to, any governmental authority, whether legislative, judicial, or executive, established by virtue of the Constitution of Saorstát Éireann shall, in relation to anything to be done after the coming into operation of the Constitution, be construed and have effect as a mention of the governmental authority established by the Constitution of Ireland which corresponds to, or has like functions as, such governmental authority established by the Constitution of Saorstát Éireann. The term "governmental authority" by itself might not be clear, but the sub-section refers to a legislative governmental authority and this, it seems to me, points to the former Oireachtas and its committees. The corresponding legislative governmental authority under the new Constitution, in my opinion, can be none other than the new Oireachtas and its committees. It may be added that the Act of 1937, although passed before the coming into operation of the Constitution of Ireland, was expressed at s. 1 to come into operation immediately after the coming into operation of the Constitution; and Article 50, s. 2, of the Constitution provides that laws enacted before, but expressed to come into force after, the coming into operation of the Constitution should come into force in accordance with the terms thereof, unless otherwise enacted by the Oireachtas. In my opinion the Committee had, and has, authority to administer an oath.

Fourthly, Mr. Haughey objected that the certificate under the hand of the chairman of the Committee was not made with sufficient particularity. The certificate baldly stated an offence in the terms of the sub-section and gave no particulars of the questions, being questions to which the Committee could legally require answers, which it was alleged Mr. Haughey had refused to answer. The validity of this objection depends on the purpose which, in the intention of the Act of 1970, the certificate is to serve. The judgment of the Court has accepted[66] that the Committee's certificate is a step preliminary to the commencement of the trial of a criminal offence. In all criminal proceedings, whether tried summarily in the District Court or on indictment in the Circuit Court or Central Criminal Court, it is required that "particulars of the offence" be furnished: see Rule 44 of the District Court Rules, 1948, and r. 4, sub-r. 4, of the First Schedule to the Criminal Justice (Administration) Act, 1924. The certificate is the only document in which will be found the complaint that the witness has to answer. It should, therefore, furnish all necessary particulars. In this instance these should include the question or questions which it is alleged the witness refused to answer and, coupled with this, an assertion that the Committee could legally require an answer to such question or questions. The transcript of the proceedings discloses that when Mr. Haughey had made his preliminary statement and had dialogue with the chairman of the Committee, the Committee retired and, after an interval of about three-quarters of an hour, it resumed its public sitting and thereupon the chairman put certain questions to Mr. Haughey with the object of reminding him

In re HAUGHEY

of the possible consequence of his refusal to answer them, and then the chairman asked him two specific questions to which the chairman failed to elicit answers. The chairman, it would appear, thought it necessary—and correctly so—to have on record the specific questions which were put, together with the refusals to answer them, for the purpose of certifying an offence under sub-s. 4 (b) of s. 3 of the Act of 1970. This point does not appear to have been pursued in any great detail in the High Court where the view was erroneously taken that Mr. Haughey's initial statement, in which he indicated that he would not answer questions for the reasons which he gave, constituted an offence under sub-s. 4 (b). If this conduct constituted an offence, it fell to be dealt with under sub-s. 4 (d) which makes it an offence to do anything which would be contempt of court if the Committee were a court of justice having power to commit for contempt. The offence created by sub-s. 4 (b) is the offence of refusing to answer questions to which the Committee may legally require an answer. Quite clearly the Committee is not legally entitled to an answer to any question which is not relevant to the proceedings and which is not within its terms of reference; before anyone can be convicted of a refusal to answer a question, contrary to sub-s. 4 (b), the court would have had to be satisfied that the question put was relevant and within the terms of the inquiry. The court could not so satisfy itself unless a specific question, or questions, has or have first been put.

Fifthly, Mr. Haughey also objected to the validity of the Committee's certificate on the ground that it should have been made by the unanimous decision of all the members of the Committee. The High Court, in the judgment of Mr. Justice Henchy, held that a majority decision sufficed at common law. The High Court was not referred to Standing Order 72 which, by clear inference, says that a select committee may make its decisions by a majority. The words of the standing order are:—"in the event of there being an equality of votes the question shall be decided in the negative." This, in effect, says that for a positive decision a simple majority suffices. The Committee of Public Accounts is itself a select committee by the terms of Standing Order 127. Therefore, the position is that Standing Order 72 furnishes an adverse answer to Mr. Haughey's contention, without need to resort to the common law.

The sixth and last of Mr. Haughey's complaints was that his rights under s. 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution were, and would be, disregarded. Article 40, s. 3, provides as follows:—

"1° The State guarantees in its laws to respect, and, as far as practicable, by its laws to defend and vindicate the personal rights of the citizen.

2° The State shall, in particular, by its laws protect as best it may from unjust attack and, in the case of injustice done, vindicate the life, person, good name, and property rights of every citizen."

Mr. Haughey's counsel formulated this complaint under two heads—(a) with regard to the conduct of the trial in the High Court and (b) with regard to the procedures of the Committee.

In the High Court, the court heard no oral evidence, with the exception of the evidence of the clerk of the Committee who was called to prove his authority to administer oaths. The substantive evidence in support of the Committee's complaint was put forward by affidavit—that of the chairman of the Committee—and leave to cross-examine the chairman was refused by the court on the ground that the indicated purpose of the cross-examination was irrelevant to the issue before the court. Mr. Haughey complains of the admission of evidence otherwise than viva voce and, further, that he was denied the right to cross-examine.

In a criminal trial, evidence must be given orally; a statute may authorise otherwise but the Act of 1970 in this instance has made no exceptions. The High Court, therefore, should not have allowed the affidavit evidence of the chairman of the Committee.

As to the disallowance of cross-examination, an accused person has a right to cross-examine every witness for the prosecution, subject, in respect of any question asked, to the court's power of disallowance on the ground of irrelevancy. An accused, in advance of cross-examination, cannot be required to state what his purpose in cross-examining is. Moreover, the right to cross-examine "to credit" narrows considerably the scope of the irrelevancy rule. Mr. Haughey, in my opinion, was wrongly denied the right to cross-examine.

As to the procedures of the Committee, Mr. Haughey's complaint is that in the special circumstances in which he found himself a witness, the procedures of the Committee failed to protect his rights under Article 40 of the Constitution. The procedures determined upon by the Committee in its interim report of the 1st December, 1970, by clause (iii) provide, inter alia, that:—"the Committee will allow witnesses to be accompanied solely for the purpose of consultation by counsel, solicitor or advisers, as may be determined by the Committee in each relevant case. Such counsel, solicitor or advisers will not, however, be permitted to examine any witness nor to address the Committee."

In re HAUGHEY

Ó Dálaigh C.J.

The special circumstances in which Mr. Haughey appeared before the Committee were these. A week earlier, at the public sitting of the Committee on the 9th February, 1971, evidence was given by Chief Superintendent John P. Fleming. The Chief Superintendent at the outset explained the nature of the evidence which he proposed to give: all his information was, he said, from confidential sources which he was not at liberty to reveal. In terms of the law of evidence the entire of the evidence which he was about to offer was hearsay evidence.

The evidence in question purported to indicate (i) that Mr. Haughey had paid over money to the Chief of Staff of the I.R.A. in London; (ii) that Mr. Haughey was deeply involved in meetings with a certain I.R.A. leader after August or September and in promising funds for the I.R.A. in the North; (iii) that Mr. Haughey made all the arrangements at Dublin Airport some time early in October to take in a consignment of arms and handed same over to two leading I.R.A. men; (iv) that Mr. Haughey went to London on the 16-17 November, 1969, for the purpose of purchasing arms; (v) that Mr. Haughey or Captain—— [name given] could well have been involved in other arms shipments.

As to item (iii), when asked if he had any knowledge of the source of the moneys which paid for the arms, the Chief Superintendent said:—"I imagine it came from the grant-in-aid fund." As to item (v), relating to the other arms shipments in which Mr. Haughey may have been involved, the witness said that he had no direct evidence and that "it was speculation or rumour." The italics are mine.

Therefore, the position of Mr. Haughey was that at a public session of the Committee held on the 9th February, 1971, he had been accused of conduct which reflected on his character and good name and that the accusations made against him were made upon the hearsay evidence of a witness who asserted that he was not at liberty, and therefore was not prepared, to furnish the Committee with the names of Mr. Haughey's real accusers. The question which arises in these circumstances is what rights, if any, is Mr. Haughey entitled to assert in defence of his character and good name? It should be noted that, in the statement which he read to the Committee on the 17th February, 1971, he denied on oath that he had been connected, in any way, with the expenditure of moneys issued out of Subhead J of Vote 16.

Mr. Haughey's counsel offered no criticism of the immunity which the Act of 1970 gives to witnesses; he acknowledged that it would be unrealistic to expect witnesses to come forward without such immunity. Having thus apparently accepted the necessity for such immunity, counsel's submission was that, in all the circumstances, the minimum protection which the State should afford his client was (a) that he should be furnished with a copy of the evidence which reflected on his good name; (b) that he should be allowed to cross-examine, by counsel, his accuser or accusers; (c) that he should be allowed to give rebutting evidence; and (d) that he should be permitted to address, again by counsel, the Committee in his own defence. Protection (c) was allowed by the Committee and no real difficulty arose with regard to (a), so far as I can see; therefore (b) and (d) are the crux. The Committee's procedures ruled out the two latter protections.

For the Attorney General it was urged that a witness in the High Court is not allowed the protections mentioned at (b) and (d) supra—this is undoubtedly so—and it was submitted that Mr. Haughey therefore could not be in any better position. The answer made by counsel for Mr. Haughey was that his client is not just a witness but that he has, in effect, become a party because his conduct has become the subject matter of the Committee's inquiry or examination by reason of the charges which have been levelled against him. Counsel points out that Mr. Haughey cannot, in defence of his good name, make his accusers answerable in the civil courts as they are protected by the immunity granted by the statute; and counsel then urges that unless he is allowed on his client's behalf to challenge and test the accusations by cross-examination and, further, to address the Committee, his client's good name is left unprotected. Counsel supported his submission by reference to the well-established procedure, adopted by the several tribunals of inquiry set up by Dáil Éireann to inquire into matters of urgent public importance. In all these instances persons accused in connection with the subject matter of the inquiry were granted the rights of parties and were allowed to appear by counsel, to cross-examine and to address the tribunal.

In my opinion counsel is right in his submission that Mr. Haughey is more than a mere witness. The true analogy, in terms of High Court procedure, is not that of a witness but of a party. Mr. Haughey's conduct is the very subject matter of the Committee's examination and is to be the subject matter of the Committee's report.

No court is unaware that the right of an accused person to defend himself adds to the length of the proceedings. But the Constitution guarantees that the State "so far as practicable" (sa mhéid gur féidir é) will by its laws safeguard and vindicate the citizen's good name. Where, as here, it is considered necessary to grant immunity to witnesses appearing before a tribunal, then a person whose conduct is impugned as part of the subject matter of the inquiry must be afforded reasonable means of defending himself. What are these means? They have been already enumerated at (a) to (d) above. Without the two rights which the Committee's procedures have purported to exclude, no accused—I speak within the context of the terms of the inquiry—could hope to make any adequate defence of his good name. To deny such rights is, in an ancestral adage, a classic case of clocha ceangailte agus madraí scaoilte.[67] Article 40, s. 3, of the Constitution[68] is a guarantee to the citizen of basic fairness of procedures. The Constitution guarantees such fairness, and it is the duty of the Court to underline that the words of Article 40, s. 3, are not political shibboleths but provide a positive protection for the citizen and his good name. Clause (iii) of the Committee's procedures,[68] while valid in respect of witnesses in general, in this instance would, if applied in the circumstances of this case, violate the rights guaranteed to Mr. Haughey by the provisions of Article 40, s. 3, of the Constitution. This position, however, has not yet in fact arisen in this case because of Mr. Haughey's non-participation in the proceedings of the Committee.

The provisions[69] of Article 38, s. 1, of the Constitution apply only to trials of criminal charges in accordance with Article 38; but in proceedings before any tribunal where a party to the proceedings is on risk of having his good name, or his person or property, or any of his personal rights jeopardised, the proceedings may be correctly classed as proceedings which may affect his rights, and in compliance with the Constitution the State, either by its enactments or through the Courts, must outlaw any procedures which will restrict or prevent the party concerned from vindicating these rights.

The immunity of witnesses in the High Court does not exist for the benefit of witnesses, but for that of the public and the advancement of the administration of justice and to prevent witnesses from being deterred, by the fear of having actions brought against them, from coming forward and testifying to the truth. The interest of the individual is subordinated by the law to the higher interest, viz., that of public justice, for the administration of which it is necessary that witnesses should be free to give their evidence without fear of consequences. It is salutary to bear in mind that even in the High Court, if a witness were to take advantage of his position to utter something defamatory having no reference to the cause or matter of inquiry but introduced maliciously for his own purpose, no privilege or immunity would attach and he might find himself sued in an action for defamation. The witnesses before the present Committee are in no better position. The fact that a witness may have been permitted or even encouraged to venture into the area will afford him no defence in such an action. Furthermore, in the High Court it is the duty of the judge to warn a witness that he is privileged to refuse to answer any question if the answer would tend to incriminate him. That privilege is also enjoyed by witnesses before the Committee, but it does not appear from the documents before us that Mr. Haughey in this case was so warned.

In my opinion this appeal should be allowed and the conviction and sentence of the High Court set aside for the reasons I have stated under head (a) of Mr. Haughey's sixth and last complaint, in addition to the reasons given in the judgment of the Court.

WALSH J.:—
I agree.

BUDD J.:—
I agree.

FITZGERALD J.:—
On the secondary issues raised on behalf of Mr. Haughey, which are independent of the constitutionality of the Act, I wish to refer to the various points raised on his behalf in the same order as they are dealt with in the opinion of the Chief Justice.

First, in relation to Mr. Haughey's objection to the inclusion in the terms of reference of power to examine the account of the Irish Red Cross Society, I am of the opinion that the objection is not well founded. It appears to me that the order of Dáil Éireann of the 1st December, 1970, was competent to authorise the Committee to examine any bank accounts which appear to have been credited with any moneys which were shown to have come from the grant-in-aid. The fact that the Irish Red Cross Society's account was named in the order appears consequently to be irrelevant and this specific reference to the Red Cross Society's account was superfluous.

Secondly, I agree with the judgment of the Chief Justice, for the reasons stated by him, that Standing Order 127 must be deemed to have been adopted under the Constitution of 1937 by the

In re HAUGHEY

FitzGerald J.

McLoughlin J.

adoption on the 12th January, 1938, of the amendments to the existing Standing Order 127.

Thirdly, I also agree with the Chief Justice that Mr. Haughey's objection that the Committee had no power to administer oaths is not well founded.

Fourthly, in my opinion Mr. Haughey's declaration that he would not answer any question disposed of any necessity for the Committee to put specific questions to him. His conduct would have justified the chairman in certifying that he had offended against both paragraphs (b) and (d) of sub-s. 4 of s. 3 of the Act of 1970. In my opinion, the certificate amounts to no more than a statement of facts. It is neither a conviction, as the Committee seem to have thought, nor an indictment and, in my opinion, it should not be analysed as if it were. Mr. Haughey required no information as to his own actions or behaviour in relation to the Committee's inquiry; he was quite familiar with all the relevant facts.

Fifthly, I agree with the opinion of the Chief Justice, for the reasons stated by him, that the Committee's decision did not necessitate unanimity and that a majority decision was sufficient.

Sixthly, in my opinion the procedure adopted by the Committee was ill-advised. They failed to have regard to the fact that Mr. Haughey had the character of an accused person, rather than that of a mere witness as to fact. I do not consider that any constitutional right was thereby infringed but I do consider that the limitations imposed upon him as to the conduct of his case, as a person in effect accused, were contrary to natural justice. On his appearance in the High Court he was deprived of the opportunity of cross-examining the deponent whose certificate purported to establish facts which brought him before the court. There can be no doubt that in the High Court Mr. Haughey had the status of an accused person and was denied the opportunity of presenting his defence in the normal accepted way. I regard his trial before the High Court, if such it can be described, as unsatisfactory; and so the judgment of that court should consequently be set aside.

McLOUGHLIN J.:—

In this judgment I wish to deal shortly with the submissions made on behalf of Mr. Haughey on matters independent of the constitutionality of the Act and will set them out in numbered paragraphs.

1. As to the terms of reference in regard to expenditure of moneys of the Irish Red Cross Society in a bank account into which moneys voted by the Dáil were or may have been lodged.

2. Objection as to the validity of Standing Orders of Dáil Éireann.

3. Submissions that the Committee has no power to administer an oath.

On these matters I agree with what has been said by the Chief Justice in his judgment.

4. Submissions that the certificate of the Committee to the High Court did not set out the offence with sufficient particularity and should have been made by the unanimous decision of the members of the Committee and not the chairman alone.

5. Submissions as to alleged irregularities of the proceedings in the High Court.

Having regard to the decision of the Court that sub-s. 4 of s. 3 of the Act of 1970 is unconstitutional, the objections as to the form of the certificate to the High Court and the alleged irregularities of its proceedings do not, in my opinion, require to be decided.

6. The complaint by Mr. Haughey that the Committee failed to protect his rights under Article 40 of the Constitution in as much as it adopted a procedure denying to a witness the right to have legal advisers to examine witnesses and to address the Committee. This contention, in my view, is based on a misconception as to the nature of the proceedings of the Committee. The direction of the Dáil to the Committee was in these terms:—"That the Committee of Public Accounts shall examine specially the expenditure of the Grant-in-Aid for Northern Ireland Relief issued from Subhead J, Vote 16 (Miscellaneous Expenses) for 1969-70 and any moneys transferred by the Irish Red Cross Society to a bank account into which moneys from this Vote were or may have been lodged . . ." In making this examination the Committee might obtain information which might indicate that moneys from the Vote had come into the hands of persons who had expended them otherwise than for the proper purpose or had illegally misappropriated such moneys. If information of this kind were obtained by the Committee, it was its function to report such information to the Dáil; it was not its function to indict or charge any such person, much less to try and convict.

I do not need to set out in full the special circumstances under which Mr. Haughey appeared before the Committee. They have been fully set out in the judgment of the Chief Justice; in short they were that, one week before his appearance, a witness, Chief Superintendent Fleming, had given evidence implicating Mr. Haughey with the purchase of arms with moneys from the Vote. It is clear that this "evidence" was not first-hand evidence but hearsay, or even hearsay upon hearsay, or as the witness said as to part of it "speculation or rumour." In my opinion the Committee was entitled to receive information in this way, not by way of proof, but as a line of inquiry to be investigated, although I think it should have been obtained in private or by way of preliminary statement and not at a public sitting; I also think that the witness was bound to divulge the sources of his information unless he could claim and legally sustain a claim of State privilege.

It is the fact that the Committee adopted rules of procedure which provided (inter alia) that:—"The Committee will allow witnesses to be accompanied solely for the purpose of consultation by counsel, solicitor or advisers, as may be determined by the Committee in each relevant case. Such counsel, solicitor or advisers will not, however, be permitted to examine any witness nor to address the Committee."

It is objected that this procedure disregards the constitutional right of Mr. Haughey to have his good name vindicated. If one witness before the Committee maligns another, the latter's good name is not protected if this procedure is resolutely maintained but the Committee, having adopted the procedure, is quite entitled to relax the rule and I am not prepared to assume that the Committee would not have done so in this case if a reasoned application had been made to it so to do. No such application was made; it could still be made and, were it so made, should, in my opinion, be granted. Therefore, I do not sustain this ground of objection.

DOUGLAS WILLIAM VICTOR GLOVER, PLAINTIFF, v. B.L.N. LIMITED, LINCOLN AND NOLAN LIMITED, LINCOLN AND NOLAN (SALES) LIMITED AND LINCOLN AND NOLAN (PARTS) LIMITED, DEFENDANTS.

Master and servant—Misconduct—Company—Post of technical director held upon terms of contract—Appointment terminable by company in event of misconduct being established in opinion of board of directors—Misconduct established—Summary dismissal—No notice given of charges of misconduct—Natural justice—Breach of implied term—Damages for wrongful dismissal.

By an agreement dated the 10th January, 1964, a holding company and its three subsidiaries appointed the plaintiff to be technical director of the four companies for a period of five years at an agreed salary, subject to termination in accordance with clause 12 (c) thereof. That clause provided that the plaintiff's appointment might be terminated, without giving rise to compensation, if he should be guilty of any serious misconduct or serious neglect in the performance of his duties which, in the unanimous opinion of the board of directors of the holding company, affected injuriously the business or property of the holding company or of any of the subsidiaries. On the 5th July, 1966, having considered several serious complaints made against the plaintiff, the board of the holding company found unanimously that the plaintiff had been guilty of serious misconduct and neglect affecting the business of one of the subsidiaries, and terminated the plaintiff's appointment as technical director. On the 13th July, 1966, each of the subsidiaries terminated the said appointment. The plaintiff was not given any prior notice of the complaints made against him. In an action brought by the plaintiff in the High Court in which he claimed damages from the four companies for wrongful dismissal and breach of contract, it was Held by Kenny J., in deciding the issue of liability for damages, 1, that the decision of the board of the holding company was amenable to review by the court.

Diggle v. Ogston Motor Co. (1915) 84 L.J.K.B. 2165 not approved.

2. That, in making their decision, the board of the holding company could only take into account the matters known on the 5th July, 1966.

Carvill v. Irish Industrial Bank Ltd. [1968] I.R. 325 applied.

3. That the evidence of the matters known to the board of the holding company on that date established that the plaintiff had been guilty of serious misconduct and neglect affecting injuriously the business of one of the subsidiaries.

4. That the plaintiff's position as the holder of an office, as distinct from being only an employee, required the application of the rules of natural justice to the termination of his appointment as technical director.

Ridge v. Baldwin [1964] A.C. 40 considered.

5. That since, in breach of such rules, the plaintiff had not been given prior notice of the charges made against him, his dismissal was invalid and he was entitled to damages.

Byrne v. Kinematograph Renters Society [1958] 1 W.L.R. 762 considered.

On appeal by the defendants it was Held by the Supreme Court (Ó Dálaigh C.J. and Walsh J., FitzGerald J. dissenting), in disallowing the appeal, 1, that the issue of liability depended upon the terms of the contract between the parties, whether the plaintiff was the holder of an office or an employee.

2. That the express provisions of clause 12 (c) specifying the procedure for summary dismissal for misconduct prevented a term being implied so as to exclude such procedure.

3. That, as the provisions of clause 12 (c) involved the holding of an inquiry to ascertain the relevant facts, it was an implied term of the agreement that such inquiry should be conducted fairly.

4. That the inquiry held by the board of the holding company had not been conducted fairly as the plaintiff had not been given prior notice of the charges made against him or an opportunity to refute those charges.

WITNESS ACTION.

By an agreement dated the 10th January, 1964, and made between a holding company and three subsidiaries and the plaintiff, the plaintiff was appointed to be technical director of the holding company and of the three subsidiaries, which were referred to as the operating company, the sales company and the factors company. The appointments were for a period of five years from the 1st April, 1963, until the 31st March, 1968, and thereafter from year to year unless terminated by the holding company or by the plaintiff by six months notice to expire on the 31st March, 1968, or on any day thereafter.

Clause 12 of the agreement provided :—"12. Mr. Glover's appointment as technical adviser of all the companies may be terminated without giving rise to any claim for compensation or damages upon the happening of any events following, namely . . . (c) if Mr. Glover shall be guilty of any serious misconduct or serious neglect in the performance of his duties or wilfully disobeys the reasonable orders directions or restrictions or regulations of the board of directors of any of the said companies which in the unanimous opinion of the board of directors for the time being of the holding company present and voting at the meeting injuriously affect the reputation business or property or management of either the holding company or the operating company or the sales company or the factors company . . ." At the trial and at the hearing of the appeal, the reference to "technical adviser" at the start of clause 12 was treated as being a reference to "technical director."

A meeting of the board of directors of the holding company was held on the 5th July, 1966, and the following persons were present at the meeting:—Mr. J. W. Freeman (Chairman); Mr. G. C. V. Brittain (Vice-Chairman); Mr. T. P. Hogan; Mr. P. A. Duggan and Mr. G. A. Brittain (Directors); and Mr. W. Meates (Secretary). The minutes of the meeting, having recited the attendances, continued:—"The minutes of the previous meeting were not produced. The Board having received from Mr. G. C. V. Brittain, Executive Vice-Chairman, a detailed report into the workings of the assembly plant of Lincoln and Nolan Limited it was unanimously resolved that Mr. Douglas William Victor Glover has been guilty of serious misconduct and serious neglect in the performance of his duties which in the unanimous opinion of the Board injuriously affect the business property and management of Lincoln and Nolan Limited. It was further resolved that Mr. Glover's service agreement dated 10th January 1964 with this company be terminated forthwith pursuant to clause 12 thereof. There being no further business the meeting concluded."

By letter dated the 8th July, 1966, the holding company wrote to the plaintiff as follows:—"At its meeting on 5th July 1966 the board of directors of B.L.N. Limited unanimously passed the following resolution:—'It was unanimously resolved that Mr. Douglas William Victor Glover has been guilty of serious misconduct and serious neglect in the performance of his duties which in the unanimous opinion of the board injuriously affect the business property and management of Lincoln and Nolan Limited.' On the instructions of the board of B.L.N. Limited I hereby formally give you notice terminating your service agreement dated 10th January 1964 pursuant to clause 12 thereof. Termination is to be effective forthwith, but as you are at present on holidays with pay your salary will be paid up to and including the 31st instant."

On the 13th July, 1966, at a board meeting of the operating company attended by Mr. J. W. Freeman, Mr.

G. C. V. Brittain, Mr. H. M. Brierley and Mr. P. A. Duggan, a resolution was passed stating that, in view of the resolution passed by the board of the holding company on the 5th July, 1966, in respect of the plaintiff, the board of the operating company "hereby terminates his service agreement dated 10th January, 1964, forthwith pursuant to clause 12 thereof," and the secretary of the operating company was directed to convey that decision by letter to the plaintiff. Identical resolutions were passed at board meetings of the sales company and of the factors company held on the same day and attended by the same individuals. By letters dated the 13th July, 1966, from the operating company, the sales company and the factors company the plaintiff was informed of the decisions of those companies.

The plaintiff did not receive any prior notice of the charges of serious misconduct and of serious neglect.

The plaintiff's action for damages for wrongful dismissal and breach of contract was commenced by plenary summons on the 27th July, 1966, and his statement of claim was delivered on the 15th December. A joint defence was delivered by the four defendant companies on the 9th March, 1967, in which they alleged that the plaintiff had been lawfully dismissed from his employment, as having been guilty of serious misconduct and serious neglect in the performance of his duties which, in the unanimous opinion of the board of directors of the first defendant present and voting at the meeting, had injuriously affected the business, property and management of the second defendant. The misconduct and neglect alleged was not specified by the defendants in their defence, and particulars of such misconduct and neglect were first given in a letter written by the defendants' solicitors a month after the defence had been delivered. Further allegations of misconduct and neglect were made by the defendants' solicitors in further letters written on dates from ten to thirteen months after the delivery of the defence.

v.
B.L.N. LTD.

July 31

KENNY J.:—

Lincoln and Nolan Ltd. ("the operating company") was incorporated as a private company in Ireland in 1923. Since 1933 its principal business has been the assembly of Austin motor cars, though for some time it also assembled Rovers and Heinkels: it imported the parts from the British Motor Corporation in a completely knocked-down condition and assembled them at a number of factories in Dublin. The parts for all the cars (except Minis) were sent from England in containers which were shipped through Rosslare and were brought to Dublin where they were unpacked: the parts for Minis were imported through the port of Dublin in cases and cartons.

Lincoln and Nolan (Holdings) Ltd. ("the holding company") was incorporated as a public company in 1950 to acquire the shares in the operating company. Its original capital was £300,000 divided into 100,000 preference shares of £1 and 800,000 ordinary shares of 5s. and it obtained a quotation for these on the Dublin Stock Exchange. It never assembled motor cars and it received from the operating company and from its other subsidiaries the sums which its directors considered prudent to distribute as dividends to the share holders. In May, 1966, its name was changed to B.L.N. Limited.

Lincoln and Nolan (Sales) Ltd. ("the sales company") was incorporated as a private company in 1950 and was a wholly-owned subsidiary of the holding company. International Sales Ltd. ("the factor company") was incorporated as a private company in 1958: its name was subsequently changed to Irish Motor Factors Ltd. and later to Lincoln and Nolan (Parts) Ltd. It was also a wholly-owned subsidiary of the holding company. Until April, 1966, the holding company and the other companies had the same persons as directors.

Mr. John W. Freeman, a well-known Dublin stockbroker and a director of many public companies, was the chairman of the holding company and its subsidiaries: he was never a whole-time or, as it is now called, an executive director of any of the companies and he did not claim that he had any technical knowledge about the assembly or sale of motor cars. Mr. H. Martin Brierley was the managing director of the holding company and of its subsidiaries and held these positions until he resigned in December, 1966. Mr. Brierley had no technical training in the assembly of motor cars; he concentrated on increasing the sales of Austin cars and lorries in Ireland. He believed that the best way to sell them was to build up goodwill and a favourable public image with the dealers who sell Austin cars. He succeeded in increasing the sales of cars assembled by the operating company from 2,400 in the financial year which ended in March, 1958, to about 10,000 in the financial year which ended in March, 1965: during this period the number of those employed by all the companies increased from about 300 to about 600.

This policy, which produced large increases in sales and excellent profits, imposed a very heavy strain on those who had to do the assembly work as the factories were scattered and the work could not be concentrated in one area. This became a particularly difficult problem when a strong demand for Mini cars developed in 1963: the directors of the operating company realised what a large market there was for these cars and it was not easy to produce about 10,000 cars in old buildings which had been acquired when a production of 2,500 was the aim.

The policy of building up goodwill included the carrying out by the operating company of alterations and repairs without charge to cars which had developed defects after the period mentioned in the warranty given by Austins had expired. This seems to me to have been a prudent approach for there is nothing more irritating to a motorist or to a dealer than to be asked to pay for making good some defect which has developed in a new car shortly after the warranty period has expired.

The other directors of the holding company and its subsidiaries were Mr. Patrick Duggan, Mr. Thomas P. Hogan and Mr. Arthur Phillips. Mr. Duggan is a chartered accountant and is a director of many insurance and investment companies. He has not any technical knowledge of motor assembly and was not at any time an executive director. He examined the weekly production charts carefully and commented on any fall in the productivity ratio. Mr. Hogan is an engineer who now specialises in management and is a director of a number of public companies: he did not make any claim to expert knowledge of motor assembly. Mr. Phillips had been a director when the plaintiff, Mr. Glover (whom I intend to call "Mr. Glover" to distinguish him from his son, Mr. David Glover), was appointed as technical manager, but died before 1966.

Mr. Glover, who was born on the 11th January, 1914, has many qualifications and a wide experience in mechanical engineering and in the assembly of motor cars. He had worked in the Nuffield organisation and with the British Motor Corporation. In 1957 the directors of the operating company were looking for a technical manager and asked the British Motor Corporation to recommend someone for this position. Mr. Glover was advised to write to Mr. Brierley and a meeting between them was arranged. On the 30th September, 1957, Mr. Brierley wrote to Mr. Glover offering him an immediate appointment as technical manager at a commencing salary of £2,500, with the right to become a member of a non-contributory pension scheme (established by the operating company) after a qualifying period of three years. Mr. Brierley stated that the capital sum assured under this scheme would be £14,878 which would be payable on death; that a pension of £1,334 for each year would be paid at the age of 65; and that, at the discretion of the board, a capital sum could be taken in place of it. In later letters Mr. Brierley stated that some form of production bonus would be given at a later date. Mr. Glover accepted the offer and took up his duties on the 1st November, 1957. In 1959, Mr. Glover was appointed a director of the holding company and of its subsidiaries and technical and production manager of the Lincoln and Nolan Group and was given a commission on the profits of the companies similar to that which he later got under the written contract made in 1964.

On the 1st April, 1959, Mr. Glover joined a retirement benefit scheme set up and managed by Irish Pensions Trust Ltd. for the operating company who paid all the contributions. The basis of this scheme was that the Pension Trust company were to take out policies of assurance as trustees on the lives of those employed by the operating company and were to hold these policies and their proceeds on the trusts stated in a declaration of trust made on the 20th July, 1950. These were that the Pension Trust company was to hold the policy and its proceeds for the employee if he retired at the age of 65 or if he did so with the consent of the operating company when he was between 55 and 65 years old; if he died while he was employed, the policy was to be held for his personal representative. If the employment was terminated before the employee reached 65 for any reason except fraud or misconduct, the policy was to be held for the employee; while if the employee was discharged before he reached 65 for fraud or misconduct (in relation to which a certificate by the operating company was to be conclusive), or if he voluntarily left the employment of the operating company before he was 65, the policy was to be held as the operating company should decide. Mr. Glover was 52 when he was dismissed. The result of this scheme was that, if he remained in the employment of the operating company until he was 65, Mr. Glover would have got a pension of two-thirds of his salary (the salary scale not to exceed £2,000) for the rest of his life with the right to take this in a lump sum which Mr. Early, an official of the Pension Trust company, valued at £14,192. However, if Mr. Glover left the employment of the operating company on the 31st March, 1968, when his contract on which this action is based would have expired, he would have been entitled to get a fully paid policy for £6,910 payable at 65 or earlier death, or to have received the sum of £4,701 14s. 0d. as the surrender value of the policy, or to have continued it until April, 1977, by paying an annual premium of £659. Thus, under the scheme, Mr. Glover had rights to large sums unless he was discharged for fraud or misconduct or unless he left the employment of the operating company voluntarily; these rights did not depend on the discretion or decision of anyone and they could have been enforced in a court of law.

As the profit history of the group of companies has been relied on by Mr. Glover, I propose to summarise it. When Mr. Freeman was speaking at the annual general meeting held in July, 1957, he stated that the average annual production of cars (which at that time included Rovers) from the time the holding company was formed was about 3,000. Substantial import levies were imposed on parts for assembly in March and July, 1956, and for the year which ended on the 31st March, 1957, the loss of all the subsidiary companies was £38,417 while the loss after allowing for tax which could be recovered and depreciation was £29,749. There was a substantial increase in sales in the year which ended on the 31st March, 1958, and there was a profit of £74,862 before payment of tax. For the year which ended on the 31st March, 1959, there was a profit of £78,733 before tax and a dividend of 15% was paid on the ordinary shares. In the year which ended on the 31st March, 1960, the profit was £108,400 and 3,819 motor cars and 525 commercial vehicles were sold. For the year which ended on the 31st March, 1961, the profit before tax was £104,158 and the sales of all vehicles were 4,892. For the year which ended on the 31st March, 1962, the profit was £159,379 and a dividend of 30% was paid on the ordinary shares. In the year which ended on the 31st March, 1963, the companies seem to have supplied the greater part of the market in Ireland for Minis and had a profit of £213,735. In January, 1964, retained profits amounting to £100,000 were capitalised and 400,000 fully-paid ordinary shares of 5/- were issued to the shareholders so that the ordinary share capital was 1,200,000 shares of 5/- each. In the year which ended on the 31st March, 1964, the profit before tax was £217,108 and the company sold 7,924 vehicles. In the year which ended on the 31st March, 1965, the profit before tax was £326,395 and the company sold 10,039 vehicles. From the 1st April, 1965, to the 26th March, 1966, when the amalgamation with Brittains (Dublin) Ltd. became effective, the profit before tax was £233,582 and sales of all vehicles fell to about 8,200.

Brittains (Dublin) Ltd. (which I shall call "Brittains") was a long-established private company which had been assembling Morris motor cars and commercial vehicles from 1933. The parts for these cars were manufactured by the British Motor Corporation and were exported by them to Ireland. The establishment of the European Economic Community, and the movement towards reductions in tariffs on imports into Ireland and England, made the future of the car assembly industry in Ireland uncertain: if it was to survive, it could do so only if its prices became competitive with imported cars and it seemed absurd that two companies should be assembling the products of one English company in different premises and with different staffs. Mr. George Vincent Brittain ("Mr. Brittain") realised that Brittains and the operating company would have to merge or amalgamate and so Brittains began in January, 1960, to buy the ordinary shares of the holding company on the Dublin stock exchange as a first step towards an eventual amalgamation. These purchases were not made in the name of Brittains but in the name of a nominee company and the identity of the purchaser was a well-kept secret. The directors of the holding company knew that someone was buying large numbers of the shares of their company but were not able to find out who it was until some time in 1963. These purchases continued until October, 1963, when Brittains had acquired about 25% of the ordinary shares of the holding company. Shortly before this date the directors of the holding company discovered the identity of the purchaser when a transfer to the nominee company, with the name of Brittains written on it in pencil, came before them for registration. The purchases of these shares were not made by Mr. Freeman or by his firm (Goodbody & Webb) and, though he was a friend of Mr. Brittain, he did not know who the buyer was. At the end of 1963 Mr. Brittain went to see Mr. Freeman and told him that he had purchased about 25% of the ordinary shares of the holding company with the aim of an amalgamation between the two companies. Before the directors of the holding company knew who the purchaser was, they had agreed to give service agreements for five years to Mr. Brierley and to Mr. Glover to protect their positions as whole-time executive directors if the holding company were taken over. Although the directors had agreed to give these contracts before October, 1963, Mr. Glover's agreement was not signed until the 10th January, 1964, though the five-year period ran from the 1st April, 1963. This, I think, is the explanation of Mr. Freeman's evidence that the contracts to Mr. Glover and Mr. Brierley were given before it was known who the purchaser was.

The agreement of the 10th January, 1964, was made between the holding company, the operating company, the sales company, the factors company and Mr. Glover. Each of the four companies thereby appointed Mr. Glover as technical director of each of them for a minimum period of five years from the 1st April, 1963, and thereafter from year to year unless the agreement was terminated by six

v.

months notice (given by the holding company or by Mr. Glover) expiring on the 31st March, 1968, or any day thereafter. It provided that during the currency of the agreement Mr. Glover was to devote his whole time and attention to the business and affairs of the four companies and that he was not, without the consent of the board of the holding company, to be interested directly or indirectly in any motor business which was or might or could be in competition with the businesses of the four companies or any of them. Clause 4 provided that he was to be paid by the holding company "as remuneration for his services hereunder to it and to the operating company, to the sales company and to the factors company" a fixed salary of £2,250 p.a. together with £250 expenses. Under clause 5 he was to receive as additional remuneration a commission of 1¼% on the excess over £30,000 up to £70,000 and a commission of 2½% on any excess over £70,000 for each financial year on the aggregate of the net profits or losses of the sales company and of the factors company: the amounts of these profits or losses were to be certified by the auditors of the operating company.

Clause 12 of the agreement (so far as it is relevant) provided:—"12. Mr. Glover's appointment as technical adviser of all the companies may be terminated without giving rise to any claim for compensation or damages upon the happening of any events following, namely:— . . . (c) if Mr. Glover shall be guilty of any serious misconduct or serious neglect in the performance of his duties or wilfully disobeys the reasonable orders directions or restrictions or regulations of the board of directors of any of the said companies which in the unanimous opinion of the board of directors for the time being of the holding company present and voting at the meeting injuriously affect the reputation business or property or management of either the holding company or the operating company or the sales company or the factors company." It has been wisely conceded by counsel that the words "as technical adviser" at the beginning of clause 12 are to be read as if they were "as technical director."

Mr. Brittain was co-opted as a director of the holding company on the 21st January, 1964, and of the operating company on the 16th of June of that year. He attended a meeting of the board of the operating company on the 28th July at which there was an embarrassing discussion between Mr. Glover and him about Mr. Glover's interest in a company called Motors and Machines Limited. Article 39 of the articles of association of the operating company provided:—"A director may hold any office of profit under the company (other than that of auditor), and may enter into contracts or arrangements or have dealings with the company, and shall not be disqualified from office thereby, nor shall he be liable to account to the company for any profit arising out of any such contract, arrangement, or dealing to which he is a party or in which he is interested by reason of his being, at the same time, a director of a company, provided that such director discloses to the board at or before the time when such contract, arrangement, or dealing is determined upon his interest therein, or, if such interest is subsequently acquired, provided that he, on the first occasion possible, discloses to the board the fact that he has acquired such interest. But no director shall vote as a director in regard to any contract, arrangement, or dealing in which he is interested or upon any matter arising thereout, and if he shall so vote, his vote shall not be counted. But he may be reckoned in estimating a quorum where any such contract, arrangement, or dealing is under consideration."

In September, 1961, Mr. Glover instructed Messrs. Gore & Grimes, who acted in a number of transactions for the holding company, to incorporate a private company called Motors and Machines Limited ("Motors and Machines"). On the 23rd September, 1961, 100 shares in this company were allotted. An allotment of 35 shares was made to Mr. David Glover, 10 to Mr. Glover, 10 to Mr. Glover's wife, 35 to Mr. John Bassett and 10 to Colonel John Bassett; and they became the first directors of the company of which Mr. Glover was chairman. In 1961 Motors and Machines succeeded in getting the sole agency in Ireland for a company called Electro Mechan Heat Ltd., the products of which company were recommended by the British Motor Corporation for use in the assembly of Austins. As the operating company required a large amount of new capital equipment for the assembly of Minis and other cars, it began to purchase it from Motors and Machines. The

v.

circumstances in which Mr. David Glover acquired this valuable agency show that Motors and Machines were formed by Mr. Glover and his son so that this capital equipment could be sold by it to the operating company. In the period from the 9th October, 1961, to the 31st March, 1963, Motors and Machines sold equipment and goods priced at £3,837 to the operating company; and in the year to the 31st March, 1964, the sales were priced at £12,444 out of total sales of £42,905. In many cases the goods consigned from England to Motors and Machines were collected at the docks by employees of the operating company and brought direct to their factories. Although Mr. Glover was the chairman, a director and a shareholder in Motors and Machines, he did not disclose to the directors of the operating company his interest in the contracts between that company and Motors and Machines. Before he had incorporated Motors and Machines, he had asked Mr. Patrick Duggan to act as that company's auditor and had told him that it would do agency work: he also said that he hoped to do business with the operating company. Mr. Duggan told him that this was undesirable (as it undoubtedly was) and Mr. Glover said that he only wanted to help his son. Mr. Duggan then gave Mr. Glover the good advice that the position would be regular if he confined himself to advising his son. I accept all Mr. Duggan's evidence about this conversation and I reject that of Mr. Glover.

Mr. Brierley and Mr. Hogan knew, from the end of 1961, that Mr. David Glover was managing Motors and Machines and that it was selling equipment to the operating company, and they probably knew that Mr. Glover had some interest in it but neither of them realised the size of the business with the operating company. Mr. Glover resigned his directorship of Motors and Machines on the 29th June, 1964, after Mr. Brittain had become a director of the operating company but before he had attended any of its meetings. Mr. Brittain, having heard about Mr. Glover's connexion with Motors and Machines, was determined to make Mr. Glover reveal his interest in contracts between Motors and Machines and the operating company. Mr. Glover did this most reluctantly and the other directors were embarrassed by the discussion. Mr. Brittain's motive in forcing the disclosure was not any concern with the niceties of company law but a conviction that a director of a company should reveal his interest in contracts between that company and another of which he was a director. Mr. Brittain regarded the transaction with Motors and Machines as dishonest. On the same day the board of the operating company recorded its view that expenditure of a capital or revenue nature should, in all cases, be supported by alternative quotations and that these should be made available at future board meetings and that, where a director was interested, the interest should be made known directly to the board. The result of this incident was that Mr. Glover and Mr. Brittain had a strong dislike of each other and it is an important part of the background to the stormy events of June and July, 1966.

Mr. Freeman, Mr. Brittain, Mr. Duggan and Mr. Hogan favoured an amalgamation of the operating company and Brittains; while Mr. Brierley and Mr. Glover were strongly opposed to it. The grounds for Mr. Glover's dislike of it were that he had hoped to become managing director of the holding company and of the operating company when Mr. Brierley retired, and he knew that he would never get this office if the amalgamation went through; Mr. Glover also knew that Mr. Brittain had strong and definite views about how a motor-assembly industry should be run and was going to see that these were applied. To these grounds must be added Mr. Glover's feeling that he was in charge of the assembly of Austin motor cars but that it was unlikely that he would continue to be the final authority if the amalgamation went through. The negotiations for amalgamation must have been long and tedious and I am sure that they involved many discussions with members of the legal professions. Compliance with what company law requires on a transaction such as this often irritates business men; there was the additional element that Mr. Freeman (like Dean Swift) has an intense dislike for lawyers and so his violent reaction to a solicitor's letter on the 21st June can be understood. The ultimate basis of the amalgamation was that as the issued ordinary share capital of the holding company was 1,200,000 ordinary shares of 5/- each, the shareholders in Brittains were entitled to an allotment of 850,000 fully-paid ordinary

shares in the holding company for the transfer of their shares. However, they did not wish to take all the purchase price in shares and so they were allotted 500,000 ordinary shares in the holding company and were paid £350,000. It is an indication of the financial strength of the holding company that this was paid out of its resources. The 500,000 ordinary shares were issued at a price of £1 for each 5/- share because this was their value at that time. There were other assets in Brittains which it was decided should not be transferred and these, amounting to £452,245, were converted into cash which was paid to the shareholders. Another term of the amalgamation was that Mr. Brierley and Mr. Glover were to retire from the board of the holding company. It was suggested during this case that Mr. Glover's resignation from that board was sought so that he could subsequently be removed from his position as technical director: it will be recalled that he could be removed only by an unanimous resolution of the directors of the holding company. I am convinced that this suggestion is incorrect. Mr. Freeman and Mr. Brittain wanted Mr. Glover and Mr. Brierley to resign from the board of the holding company because, if they remained, it would have been necessary to make two other executive directors of Brittains members of the board, and this would have made it too large to be efficient. At a meeting of the board of the holding company on 19th April, 1966, Mr. Glover was told that he was expected to resign from his position as a director of it: he was most reluctant to do this and took legal advice about his position but resigned on the 29th April. The terms of the amalgamation were announced on the 2nd May; it was to be effective from the 26th March and it was completed on the 26th May, 1966, when Mr. Brittain was made executive vice-chairman of the holding company and Mr. George Brittain was made a director of it.

The amalgamation of two large companies always creates many problems: rivalries have to be forgotten, hopes of promotion may have to be abandoned and fears of redundancies and dismissals arise. All of us support change and rationalization in the professions and businesses which other people carry on: we are not enthusiastic about them in our own. Mr. Brittain wanted the amalgamation to be successful because he thought that it would benefit the shareholders of the holding company and because, having made the decision, he was determined to see it carried out.

[The judge reviewed further portions of the evidence, including the fact that at a board meeting of the holding company held on the 5th July, 1966, Mr. Brittain had read a lengthy report upon the condition and the maintenance of the defendants factories, and that the report concluded by stating that the plaintiff had been guilty of gross dereliction of duty. The judge referred to the resolution[1] passed at that board meeting terminating the plaintiff's service agreement, and to the letter of the 8th July giving the plaintiff notice of such termination, and to the fact that the plaintiff had not been given prior notice of any of the complaints made against him in the report and at the said board meeting. The judge continued . . .]

The defendants submitted that the decision of the board that Mr. Glover had been guilty of serious misconduct and of serious neglect, and that these had injuriously affected the business and property of the defendants, could not be challenged in any court and was conclusive unless the plaintiff established that the decision was dishonest; they cited the judgments in Diggle v. Ogston Motor Co.[2] as authority for this. The wording of clause 12(c) refutes this contention because it requires that Mr. Glover should be guilty of serious misconduct or serious neglect ascertained objectively before he could be dismissed: it does not make the opinion of the directors conclusive on this matter. Also I think that that decision was plainly wrong and should not now be followed. In it, the defendants employed the plaintiff as a shop superintendent for one year subject to his carrying out his duties "to the satisfaction of the directors." Before the year had ended the plaintiff was dismissed because he had not carried out his duties to the satisfaction of the directors. The jury found that the directors of the defendants were genuinely dissatisfied with the way in which the plaintiff did his duties but that they had no good grounds for this and on these findings the County Court judge entered judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed to a Divisional Court (Ridley and Lawrence JJ.) of the High Court, and

the judges did not find it necessary to reserve judgment. They held that a bona fide dissatisfaction by the directors was sufficient to entitle them to terminate the agreement which should not be read as requiring reasonable satisfaction. However, it has been held in many cases that when work is to be done to the satisfaction of the owner of property, the Court will imply that this means reasonable satisfaction: the cases on this matter are conveniently summarised on p. 248 of Hudson on Building Contracts (7th ed.). I do not see why contracts of employment should be in a different category. The reasons given for the decision are also completely inconsistent with what Lord Radcliffe said in Nakkuda Ali v. Jayaratne.[3] I, therefore, reject the defendants' first submission.

I come now to consider whether Mr. Glover was guilty of serious neglect in the performance of his duties. If the directors dismissed him for this, they can rely only on the acts and omissions which they knew of on the 5th July, 1966, and so they are confined to the serious neglect mentioned in the report of the 4th July, 1966. In Carvill v. Irish Industrial Bank Ltd.[4] it was held that the only grounds which could be relied on to justify the immediate dismissal for misconduct of an employee who was employed on a yearly basis, and whose contract did not contain provisions for summary dismissal, were those known to the board which dismissed him when they did so; and it was held that the views expressed in Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Ansell[5], that an immediate dismissal for misconduct may be justified on grounds discovered subsequently, were wrong. The same principle must, I think, apply when the contract provides for summary dismissal for serious neglect of duty or for serious misconduct.

[The judge examined the evidence relating to 18 allegations that the plaintiff had been negligent in the performance of his duties. The judge found that all except one of the allegations had not be established. The judge continued . . .] In my opinion, all the charges of serious neglect of duty, except those connected with the condition of the fuse board in the East Wall factory, fail.

I come now to consider the charges of serious misconduct.

It is impossible to define the misconduct which justifies immediate dismissal. In giving the advice of the Privy Council in Clouston & Co. Ltd. v. Corry[6] Lord James of Hereford said:—"There is no fixed rule of law defining the degree of misconduct which will justify dismissal. Of course there may be misconduct in a servant which will not justify the determination of the contract of service by one of the parties to it against the will of the other." What is or is not misconduct must be decided in each case without the assistance of a definition or a general rule. Similarly, all one can say about serious misconduct is that it is misconduct which the court regards as being grave and deliberate. And the standards to be applied in deciding the matter are those of men and not of angels: see Jupiter General Insurance Co. v. Shroff[7] and the decision of Mr. Justice Budd in Flynn v. Great Northern Railway Co. (Ir.) Ltd.[8] The burden of establishing serious misconduct rests on the defendants: I do not accept Mr. Costello's argument that the defendants discharge this if they establish a prima facie case of serious misconduct. The case on which he relied, Federal Supply and Cold Storage Company of South Africa v. Angehrn[9], is not an authority for this. It establishes that when the defence to a charge of misconduct is that it was done for the benefit of the master the burden of establishing this rests on the employee; but this presupposes that the employer has proved misconduct.

The main charge of serious misconduct related to the sale of capital equipment and goods to the operating company by Motors and Machines[10] when Mr. Glover was a shareholder in this company which was managed by his son. I have no doubt that until 1964 these transactions were serious misconduct because Mr. Glover had not disclosed his interest in the company to his co-directors. From 1964, however, all the directors of the operating company knew that Mr. Glover had this interest and they could have checked on the dealings between the two companies. Some of the purchase authorisations were not countersigned by Mr. Brierley as they should have been and the agencies were obtained in a remarkable way. But all these considerations are outweighed by the absence of any evidence establishing that the operating company suffered any loss from these transactions. Mr. Brittain admitted that he could not establish this and a comparison of prices charged by Motors and Machines and by other companies shows that some of the contracts were favourable to the operating company: the directors of the holding company could not reasonably conclude that the dealings with Motors and Machines injuriously affected the property or business of the operating company. Mr. Costello urged that it was serious misconduct for Mr. Glover to put himself in a position where his duty to the operating company clashed with his interest in promoting the sales of Motors and Machines, and said that it was irrelevant that the operating company had not suffered any loss in these contracts. In support of this he cited a passage from the judgment of Cotton L.J. in Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Ansell[11] at p. 357 of the report:—"If a servant, or a managing director, or any person who is authorized to act, and is acting, for another in the matter of any contract, receives, as regards the contract, any sum, whether by way of percentage or otherwise, from the person with whom he is dealing on behalf of his principal, he is committing a breach of duty. It is not an honest act, and, in my opinion, it is a sufficient act to shew that he cannot be trusted to perform the duties which he has undertaken as servant or agent. He puts himself in such a position that he has a temptation not faithfully to perform his duty to his employer. He has a temptation, especially where he is getting a percentage on expenditure, not to cut down the expenditure, but to let it be increased, so that his percentage may be larger." I do not accept this as a correct statement of the law.

It is not misconduct to put oneself in a position where duty and interest clash: it is a counsel of prudence not to do so but the misconduct is in failing to reveal the position to those likely to be affected by it, so that they cannot decide whether the performance of the duty will be influenced by the competing interest. The modern view of the position of directors of companies (who often have this problem) is shown in s. 194 of the Companies Act, 1963, and in

Article 84 of the model articles for public companies and in Article 7 of those for private companies in Table A to that Act. These show that when a conflict between duty and interest arises, a director is bound to disclose the nature of his interest to his co-directors and, in my opinion, the same rule applies to those employed for it would be ridiculous that there should be one principle of conduct for directors and another for employees.

The Supreme Court has decided in Carvill v. Irish Industrial Bank Ltd.[12] that one ground of the decision in the Boston Case[13] was incorrect: I am not prepared to accept any part of it. The members of the Court of Appeal did not reserve judgment and some of the statements of the reasons are astonishing. One of the arguments in the case was that the act relied on was an isolated act and so could not be misconduct. Lord Justice Cotton dealt with this contention at p. 358 of the report in these words:—"As far as we know it may have been an isolated transaction, but if we find at the very beginning of the employment that this agent, whose duty it was not to receive anything from the persons with whom he was dealing, did in fact do so, and in fact kept the receipt secret for months after the money was received, I am not satisfied that he did not do other things equally inconsistent with his duty to his principals . . ." At p. 370 of the report Fry L.J. dealt with this argument by stating:—"We have no other ground upon which we can conclude this to be an isolated case except the absence of success on the part of the plaintiffs in proving any other case except that to which I shall shortly refer, and the oath of Mr. Ansell that it is such. I do not feel judicially satisfied that it is an isolated case." These two passages mean that, if an employer establishes that an employee has committed one act of misconduct, the court may infer that he has committed many others although there is no proof that he did. I reject this view. The argument based on the Motors and Machines transactions fails because the directors could not reasonably conclude that the contracts injuriously affected the business, property or management of any of the companies; and so the directors could not terminate Mr. Glover's agreement under clause 12(c) on this ground.

v.
B.L.N. LTD.

A further charge of misconduct is that Mr. Glover authorised or allowed Motors and Machines to recondition petrol pumps for cars for £1 17s. 6d. when this work could have been done by the operating company. Mr. Golding, an employee of the operating company, arranged that Mr. Douglas Glover would purchase the necessary parts from the operating company for £1 10s. 0d., that he would then do the work and would be paid £1 17s. 6d.; 496 pumps were reconditioned. There has been no evidence that the operating company could have done the work at the same or a lower price or that Mr. Glover knew that the work had been given to Motors and Machines. This is the type of small job that most owners of large factories are reluctant to undertake and I am not prepared to hold that what was done was misconduct.

The next charge relates to the work done on four motor cars. The facts about the first two of these were known to Mr. Brittain when he made his report and are mentioned in it: the facts about the third and fourth cars were discovered afterwards. The work on the first two cars was done in the rectification department in Upper Mayor Street which was established to deal with defects found in cars after the warranty period had expired, and to do repairs to cars owned by the company. No charge was made for any work done in this department unless Mr. Glover directed the foreman to do so. Mr. Brierley and Mr. Glover believed that the operating company could get useful publicity by entering teams for motor rallies: in some of these the drivers of the Austin team drove their own cars and in others they drove company cars. Many of the Austin cars which were driven in rallies were tuned in the rectification department and those which were damaged were repaired there without charge. The rallies were a reasonable form of advertisement and the decision to do the tuning and repair work on the cars entered for them without charge was not misconduct. The first car was submerged in a flood in Dublin in June, 1963. The owner had it comprehensively insured and it was brought for repair to the operating company and examined. The owner did not wish to keep it as it had been flooded (a view reasonably held by all motor car owners) and wanted the insurance company to treat it as a total loss. The operating company then made an estimate of the 20th June for £200-250 in which the work necessary to restore the car was described in detail. I am prepared to assume in Mr. Glover's favour that this was drawn on a generous scale and that some of the work described was not subsequently carried out in the rectification department. The insurance company were not, however, prepared to treat the car as a total loss: they paid £4 10s. 0d. to the operating company for bringing the car from Stillorgan Road and they paid the owner an amount, which was not proved, for the damage. Mr. Glover then bought the unrepaired car from the owner for £170 and the registration book was sent to him on the 26th June. Mr. Glover had the car brought to the rectification department where it was repaired; the damage to the upholstery and to the electrical parts was made good. Some of the parts for this work were obtained on Mr. Glover's instructions from the East Wall Road factory and were subsequently replaced. No time sheets were kept in the rectification department so that the cost of the work is unknown: I estimate that the labour and material cost of the work without any addition for profit or overhead expenses was £125. No charge was ever made for any of the work and Mr. Glover paid nothing for it. Mr. Wood suggested to Mr. Glover that the transaction was bare-faced robbery and got the remarkable answer that it was not theft but that Mr. Glover was not making any excuse for it. I accept the evidence of Mr. O'Grady about the work done on this car and I reject that of Mr. Glover in so far as it conflicts with it. Mr. Glover could not have thought that he was entitled to have this work done without charge because it was a perquisite of his office. Although the amount involved was the comparatively small sum of £125, I have no doubt that what Mr. Glover did and his failure to pay the cost price of the work was serious misconduct. I am sure that many of the staff knew of this transaction and it set an utterly deplorable example to all of them. Those in the high office of director cannot expect the employees of their company to act honestly if they do not set a high standard.

An attempt to excuse what Mr. Glover did in relation to cars, and the work done in his own home, was made on the ground that the other directors were taking benefits

Kenny J.

v.

from the company and were having their cars tuned and repaired without charge. The only allegation against Mr. Freeman was that a client of his (Mr. Hutchinson), whose wife was an invalid, wanted his car altered so that she could get into it easily. Mr. Freeman asked Mr. Glover to have this done and no charge was made for it. Mr. Freeman never suggested to Mr. Glover that the work should be done without charge and did nothing to induce this belief: the omission to charge resulted from Mr. Glover's view that Mr. Hutchinson should have the work done for nothing because he was a friend of Mr. Freeman. It was suggested by Mr. Glover that Mr. Hogan had had work done without charge though this charge was withdrawn by Mr. Lardner. Mr. Hogan had purchased an unusual car from the company and it did not run well. He had got assurances about work which would be done and he brought the car back to have it made right. Mr. Duggan paid for all the work which was done on cars owned by his wife or by him and I accept his evidence that, when a private company with which he was associated was buying a new Princess car, he bought it through a dealer instead of buying it at cost price plus 10%, which were the terms on which directors could buy from the operating company. The standard to be applied in judging whether something is misconduct is an objective one, and Mr. Glover's belief (if he had it) that he was entitled to have work done without charge does not excuse him.

The second car, which was owned by the operating company, was badly damaged in an accident in April, 1964. The operating company estimated that the cost of repairs would be £326 and the insurance company decided to pay them £340 which was the pre-accident value of the car. The agreed salvage value was £80 and the insurance company paid £260 to the operating company from whom Mr. Glover bought it for £80. Repair work was done on it by his son but he could not jig it and it was brought to the Merchant's Road factory where repairs to the body were carried out for which Mr. Glover paid £14 10s. 0d. It was then brought by Mr. Glover to the rectification department where he instructed Mr. O'Grady to take the engine out of the sub-frame, to fit a new sub-frame and to put the engine back into it. The cost of the materials used was £15 19s. 0d. and the cost of labour was £1 and no payment for this was ever made by anyone. Mr. O'Grady did not charge for this because bills were sent for work in the rectification department only when he was instructed to do so. My view is that what Mr. Glover did was misconduct but the small amount involved prevents it from being serious misconduct.

Mr. Glover's dealings with the third and fourth cars were not known when he was dismissed and they cannot, in my view, give any ground for the termination of his contract. However, it has been argued by the defendants that they are entitled to rely on them because a general charge of corruption is made in the report. This seems to me to be incorrect because clause 12(c) required that there should be serious misconduct which, in the opinion of the directors, injuriously affected the company's property or business and I cannot understand how they could form any view on this until they knew the details of each transaction. As my view on this may be incorrect, I think I should deal with each of the transactions. The third car was owned by Mr. Glover; it was involved in a crash when he was driving it to a rally in which he was taking part. He had the car repaired in the rectification department: the cost was £154 11s. 9d. which he did not pay. As a decision had been made to take part in rallies, I think that he may have believed that he was entitled to have the car repaired at the company's expense. The defendants have not proved that he acted dishonestly and, in my view, what was done was not serious misconduct. Mr. Glover's conduct in relation to the fourth car was serious misconduct because it was grossly dishonest. The car, which was owned by Mr. Glover, had an insurance excess of £75. It was involved in an accident and an estimate of £282 16s. 0d. for the cost of the repairs was prepared by the operating company. The insurance company subsequently paid £206 15s. 5d. (their estimate of the cost of repairs less the £75 excess) to the operating company. The repairs on a labour and material basis (excluding profit) cost £113 4s. 0d. and Mr. Glover was given credit in his personal account with the operating company for £92 18s. 4d. He never paid the £75 and he said that he did not notice that he had got credit for the £92 18s. 4d. I do not believe this evidence. The

v.
B.L.N. LTD.

£92 18s. 4d. belonged either to the insurance company or to the operating company: Mr. Glover could not have believed that he had any claim to it.

The next series of complaints related to work done by employees of the operating company for Mr. Glover during the hours when they were employed by it and for which no charge was ever made. I accept the evidence of Mr. Stephen Grant on this. It establishes that Mr. Grant and Mr. Kenny worked for two or three weeks in Mr. Glover's house at Sandycove, for four weeks in his house at Step-a-Side and for about four weeks in a flat occupied by Mr. Douglas Glover. When these employees worked outside their usual hours they were paid by Mr. Glover. The materials used in the work of building wardrobes, preparing floors and constructing a small bar came from the operating company. The work was done when there was no work for carpenters in Mayor Street. Mr. Glover estimated that the total length of time for which the men worked in his houses was about 20 days. Mr. Grant had done work for Mr. Brierley in his house and Mr. Brierley said that he regarded this as being a legitimate perquisite of his office. I do not think it was and I have no doubt that what was done was misconduct by Mr. Glover. But was it serious misconduct? If the operating company had been a small private company in which nearly all the shares were owned by one person, I would not have regarded what happened as being serious misconduct because the difference between a small private company and a privately-owned business is one which is understood by few. But the operating company was wholly owned by a public company whose shares were quoted on the stock exchange and which employed about 600 people. After much consideration I have come to the conclusion that it was serious misconduct.

Other acts of misconduct were relied on. Work was done on a boat owned by Mr. Glover and no charge was made for this. Mr. Costello candidly admitted that this was not serious misconduct and I agree with his view. Some small items of furniture were made for Mr. Glover but this was not serious misconduct. He was paid sums ranging from £86 to £96 as Christmas boxes for five years, but he did not seek these and they were got for him by Mr. Brierley. It was also said that he had obtained payment of his commission when he knew that this was calculated on a wrong basis. He did not do the calculations and certificates for the amount of the commission were not obtained from the accountants. In my view, none of these matters was misconduct.

My view then is that Mr. Glover was guilty of serious neglect of duty and of serious misconduct which the directors could reasonably have considered as injuriously affecting the business, property and management of the operating company. However, it has been argued by counsel for Mr. Glover that, if this was the position, the termination of the contract before it expired was invalid because the rules of natural or constitutional justice were not observed: see the judgment of Mr. Justice Walsh in McDonald v. Bord na gCon.[14] In this connexion they relied on the speech of Lord Reid at p. 63 of the report of Ridge v. Baldwin.[15] The principle of natural justice invoked is that when a charge is made against someone and when a person or body of persons has to decide whether it is well founded or not, the person against whom it is made should have notice of the matters alleged against him and be given a fair opportunity of making his case to the person or body which has to decide it. I do not propose to review the many cases on this matter because Lord Reid has done this in Ridge v. Baldwin.[15] His survey shows that the courts have never stated a general rule which makes it possible to say when the principle applies: they have, as always, decided each case by holding that, in some circumstances the principle applies and that in others it does not. Some rules in this connexion are, however, well established. The first is that the principle is not limited in its application to judicial or semi-judicial tribunals but extends to an administrative body which is not administering justice: see the decision of the Supreme Court in Foley v. Irish Land Commission[16] and the speech of Lord Hodson in Ridge v. Baldwin.[15] The second rule is that it does not apply to the removal of the holder of an office which is held at the will or pleasure of another. The third rule is that it applies to the removal of a person who holds an office for a term of years when he is discharged before the term

B.L.N. LTD.

has expired. The fourth is that it does not apply to the dismissal of a person who is employed under a contract of service when it is terminated under a clause in it which authorises dismissal for misconduct or when the employee is discharged under the term implied in most contracts of employment that he may be summarily dismissed for misconduct; in this case there is no such implied term because it is excluded by clause 12. The fifth is that when someone is deprived of property rights by a decision of any tribunal or body of persons, the Courts, in the absence of a statutory provision excluding the necessity for giving him notice of the charges and an opportunity of making his case, hold that justice requires that he should be given a hearing before a decision is made: see Lord Reid's speech in Ridge v. Baldwin.[17]

But does the principle apply when a person holds the office of director and has a contract under which he is entitled to retain it for a fixed period? The defendants say that Mr. Glover was an employee of the companies and nothing more, and that he cannot rely on the principle. The characteristic features of an office are that it is created by Act of the National Parliament, charter, statutory regulation, articles of association of a company or of a body corporate formed under the authority of a statute, deed of trust, grant or by prescription; and that the holder of it may be removed if the instrument creating the office authorises this. However, the person who holds it may have a contract under which he may be entitled to retain it for a fixed period: see the decision of the Supreme Court in O'Brien v. Tipperary Board of Health[18] and in Carvill v. Irish Industrial Bank Ltd.[19] This is Mr. Glover's position because he held the office of director of three of the companies at the date of his dismissal and had a contract under which he could retain them for five years. But the holder of an office does not hold it under a contract: he holds it under the terms of the instrument which created it and so, if he has not a contract, he cannot recover damages if he is removed. So justice requires that he should not be removed until the body with power to do this knows his answer to the case against him so that it can reach a correct decision. But as the holder of an office may have a contract, the presence or absence of it cannot be the feature which distinguishes an office from employment so far as the principle of natural justice is concerned. It follows, I think, that someone who has a contract of service may successfully invoke the principle of natural justice if his position under the contract resembles that of the holder of an office and the question in every case of this type is :— "Should the person who has been dismissed be put into the category of the holder of an office or should he be regarded as an employee only?" These were the considerations which Lord Reid had in mind in Ridge v. Baldwin[20] when he said at p. 65 of the report :—"The law regarding master and servant is not in doubt. There cannot be specific performance of a contract of service, and the master can terminate the contract with his servant at any time and for any reason or for none. But if he does so in a manner not warranted by the contract he must pay damages for breach of contract. So the question in a pure case of master and servant does not at all depend on whether the master has heard the servant in his own defence : it depends on whether the facts emerging at the trial prove breach of contract. But this kind of case can resemble dismissal from an office where the body employing the man is under some statutory or other restriction as to the kind of contract which it can make with its servants, or the grounds on which it can dismiss them." It was not argued that Mr. Glover could be removed from his office only under the articles of association of the companies of which he was a director. It was assumed that the termination of the contract under clause 12 had the effect of removing him from these offices and I have not considered the issue whether his removal from the office of director was valid under the articles or the application to this clause of the decision in Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd. v. Shirlaw.[21]

[19][1968] I.R. 325.

Clause 12(c) of the contract imposes restrictions on the companies as to the grounds upon which the holding company might terminate it. Mr. Glover could not be validly dismissed for serious neglect of duty or for serious misconduct : the directors had to be unanimous that the neglect or misconduct injuriously affected the reputation, business, property or management of any of the companies. Therefore, the directors of one company had to decide whether the misconduct or neglect affected the reputation, business or property of another company which did not have the same persons as its board of directors and which was obliged to give effect to the resolution of the board of the holding company. Mr. Glover's position as a director and an employee of the operating company, of the sales company and of the factors company, seems to me to have resembled that of the holder of an office because his directorship of and his contract with these three companies could be terminated by the directors of another company. Then there is the feature that Mr. Glover's pension rights, which included an accrued right to a fully paid-up policy, were enforceable against the operating company and not against the holding company. These were created before the contract was signed and were not affected by it. Clause 12(c) therefore gave the directors of the holding company the power to deprive Mr. Glover of his rights against another company. Lastly, Mr. Glover had the safeguard that the decision of the board was to be unanimous.

B.L.N. LTD.

All these considerations lead me to the conclusion that Mr. Glover's position should be regarded as that of the holder of an office and not that of an employee only, and that the principle of natural justice applies to a termination under clause 12(c).

But should I, having listened to speeches and evidence for 22 days and having heard Mr. Glover's answer to the charges, substitute my conclusions for those which the directors might have reached if they had given him an opportunity to make his case ? In Byrne v. Kinematograph Renters Society[22] one of the plaintiff's complaints was that the rules of natural justice had not been observed because the tribunal refused to hear a witness whom he wished to call. Mr. Justice Harman (as he then was) said that he had heard the evidence and that it would not have affected the decision of the tribunal if it had been heard, and he refused to set the verdict aside. I have no doubt that Mr. Glover was guilty of serious neglect of duty and of serious misconduct and that these injuriously affected the business, property and management of the operating company, but I do not know what conclusions the directors would have reached if they had heard him and whether their decision would have been unanimous. They might have allowed him to retain his pension rights if he had offered to resign immediately. I cannot say that the resolution[23] of the 5th July, 1966, would have been passed if they had heard him.

As Mr. Glover did not get notice of the charges against him and as the directors of the holding company did not give him an opportunity to make his defence, the termination of his contract by the resolution of the 5th July and the letter of the 8th July was invalid and he is entitled to damages against the defendants.

It was argued by Mr. Lardner that the termination was invalid because the charges were not stated in sufficient detail in the report[24] to make it possible for the directors to conclude that serious misconduct or serious neglect had been established. In my opinion, so far as serious neglect was involved, the photographs of the fuse boards were sufficient to enable the directors to decide this matter. The report does not state the amount of the losses which Mr. Glover's serious misconduct had caused to the operating company but the details given were sufficient to enable the directors to decide that it injuriously affected the property and management of the operating company.

Counsel have agreed that the assessment of damages would be dealt with after I had decided whether the defendants were liable to Mr. Glover.

On the 25th November, 1968, damages were assessed[25] at £9,694. This sum, as to £4,701 thereof, represented the surrender value of a policy of assurance issued for the plaintiff under the second defendants' retirement benefit scheme, for which the plaintiff had had to make no payment. The remaining £4,993 was in respect of the plaintiff's loss of salary, director's fees and commission, and of his loss of use of the car which had been made available to him under his contract of employment.

The defendants appealed to the Supreme Court against the judgment of Mr. Justice Kenny, while the plaintiff cross-appealed against so much of that judgment as found that the plaintiff had been guilty of serious neglect of duty or of serious misconduct and that such neglect of duty and misconduct were of a nature which the directors of the first defendants could reasonably have considered to have injuriously affected the business, property or management of the second defendants.

The first paragraph in the grounds of appeal stated in the defendants' notice of appeal was in the following terms:—

"1. The learned trial judge misdirected himself in law and on the facts (a) in holding that someone who has a contract of service may successfully invoke the principle of natural justice if his position under the contract resembles that of the holder of an office; (b) in holding that the plaintiff's position should be regarded as that of the holder of an office (or as resembling that of the holder of an office) and not that of an employee only; (c) in holding that the principle of natural justice applied to the termination of the plaintiff's employment under clause 12(c) of his contract of employment; (d) in holding that as the plaintiff did not get notice of the charges against him and as he was not given an opportunity to make his defence the termination of the plaintiff's contract was invalid; (e) in holding that he had no jurisdiction to substitute a conclusion which he might have arrived at for that which the directors might have reached if they had given the plaintiff an opportunity to make his case; (f) in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to damages by reason of the failure of the defendants to give the plaintiff notice of the charges against him and the failure of the directors of the holding company to give him an opportunity to make his defence; (g) having decided that the plaintiff was guilty of serious misconduct and serious neglect of duty and that these injuriously affected the business, property and management of the operating company in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to damages; (h) in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to damages in the absence of any or any sufficient proof that the directors of the holding company would or would probably have dealt with the plaintiff otherwise than as they did in the event of its directors having given the plaintiff an opportunity to be heard."

By an order dated the 13th March, 1970, the Supreme Court (Ó Dálaigh C.J., Budd and FitzGerald JJ.) directed with the consent of the parties that the hearing of the appeal be confined in the first instance to the issues raised by para. 1 of the defendants' grounds of appeal (supra).

At the hearing of the defendants' appeal to the Supreme Court, the title of the action was altered by the substitution of Brittain Smith & Co. Ltd., Smith Manufacturing Ltd., Lincoln and Nolan Ltd. and Brittain Smith (Service) Ltd. as defendants in place of B.L.N. Ltd., Lincoln and Nolan Ltd., Lincoln and Nolan (Sales) Ltd. and Lincoln and Nolan (Parts) Ltd. respectively.

E. M. Wood S.C. and D. D. Costello S.C. (with them K. O'Shaughnessy), for the defendants:—

Assuming the correctness of the finding of the trial judge that the plaintiff's position vis-à-vis the defendents was analogous to that of the holder of an office, the proper relief to have given him in this case was a declaratory order, with an inquiry as to damages; in view of the serious misconduct and neglect found against the plaintiff, that inquiry should have resulted in a finding that no damages were due.

The trial judge has misapplied the decision of the House of Lords in Ridge v. Baldwin[26] which does not decide that a servant is entitled to damages for breach of contract where he has been dismissed for good cause, but without having been given an opportunity at the time of his dismissal to defend himself against the charges made against him. Vine v. National Dock Labour Board[27] is distinguishable from the present case since in that case the terms of the plaintiff's employment were governed by a statutory scheme of employment.

An employer, in dismissing an employee, is not exercising a quasi-judicial function. If he were, the employee would be, as it is agreed that he is not, entitled to an order of certiorari against the employer: Vidyodaya University

Council v. Silva.[28] [They also referred to Nakkuda Ali v. Jayaratne[29]]

If the plaintiff's contract of employment had provided that he should be heard before being dismissed, he could have enforced that term of the contract, but that was not the case here. The plaintiff appears to have been regarded by the trial judge as seeking both a declaration that his dismissal from his employment was a nullity and damages for wrongful dismissal. The two remedies are normally alternative, not co-extensive: Barber v. Manchester Regional Hospital Board.[30] [They also referred to Palmer v. Inverness Hospitals Board[31]; Malloch v. Aberdeen Corporation[32]; Glynn v. Keele University.[33]]

The courts' power to interfere with the dismissal of an employee is conditional on such dismissal either being made on frivolous or futile grounds, or having been carried out in such a way as to lead to a "real substantial miscarriage of justice" (per Lord Evershed in Ridge v. Baldwin[34]). None of these pre-conditions exist here, where we have the anomalous position that the trial judge has held that the defendants, having made a full inquiry, were fully justified in dismissing the plaintiff but that nonetheless the plaintiff is entitled to damages for wrongful dismissal.

G. J. W. Lardner S.C. (with him C. B. McKenna S.C. and J. Grattan Esmonde), for the plaintiff:—

The plaintiff was already a director of all four defendant companies when he was employed as technical director under the service agreement which was terminated. As such, he was an office-holder of the four companies, and not a mere servant of the companies.

The power to remove him from his office of director under clause 12(c) involved the fair investigation of any charges of misconduct or neglect made against him. This, in turn, involved acquainting the plaintiff with such charges and giving him an opportunity of meeting them. The power of removal could be exercised only after an objective investigation of the charges for the purpose of deciding (a) whether serious misconduct or neglect of duty by the plaintiff was established and (b) if so, whether such misconduct or neglect had injuriously affected any one of the four companies. Even after a full investigation, the members of the board could only dismiss the plaintiff if they were unanimous on both these points.

A director of a company is not to be regarded as being on the same footing as a servant of the company: In re Newspaper Proprietary Syndicate Ltd.: Hopkinson v. Newspaper Proprietary Syndicate Ltd.[35] and see Bowen L.J. in Hutton v. West Cork Railway Co.[36] His position is that of an office holder: McMillan v. Guest.[37] [He also referred to s. 2 of the Companies Act, 1963] Where a person is removed from an office, or from a position analogous to an office, his employer is required to act judicially: Ridge v. Baldwin[38]; McClelland v. Northern Ireland General Health Services Board[39]; The State (Curtin) v. Minister for Health.[40] [He also referred to Cox v. Electricity Supply Board.[41]]

Quite apart from the plaintiff's contractual position, the defendants, in exercising their powers of dismissal, must act by reference to constitutional principles of natural justice and may not deprive the plaintiff of a property right without notice to him, or giving him an opportunity to be heard: Ridge v. Baldwin[38]; Fisher v. Jackson[42]; Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works[43]; Maunsell v. Minister for Education and Breen[44]; Wood v. Woad.[45] [He also referred to the Constitution of Ireland, 1937, Article 40, s. 3, sub-ss. 1 and 2; McDonald v. Bord na gCon[46]; East Donegal Co-operative v. The Attorney General[47]; The Queen v. Smith[48]; Foley v. Irish Land Commissioner[49]; and The State (O'Sullivan) v. Buckley.[50]]

The board of the first defendants was under a constitutional obligation not to deprive the plaintiff of his position, and his pension rights, without giving him due notice of the charges made against him and an opportunity of being heard. meeting of the board of directors of the holding company held on the 5th July, 1966; to the letter dated the 8th July, 1966, from the holding company to the plaintiff; and to the resolutions passed by the boards of the operating company, the sales company and the factors company on the 13th July, 1966. The judge then continued . . .]

For the purpose of this limited[58] appeal only, it is unnecessary to go into details of the particular complaints. I proceed on the assumption that the learned trial judge's assessment of the facts and his conclusion that the plaintiff was guilty of serious neglect of duty and of serious misconduct were correct, and that the nature of the neglect and misconduct was such that the directors could reasonably have considered them to have injuriously affected the business, property and management of the operating company.

At the time the plaintiff was given his notice of dismissal he knew nothing of these charges because he was not given notice of them nor was he given any opportunity to answer them. In fact, he did not find out what the charges were until April, 1967. On the 27th July, 1966, the plaintiff issued proceedings for damages for wrongful dismissal. His statement of claim was delivered on the 15th December, 1966. The defendants delivered their defence on the 9th March, 1967, and alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of misconduct and neglect and that the defendants acted in lawful exercise of their rights under the agreement. On the 13th March the plaintiff's solicitor asked for particulars of the alleged misconduct and neglect and, in a long and detailed reply of the 12th April from the defendants' solicitors, the plaintiff learned for the first time the charges upon which the defendants sought to justify his dismissal. The plaintiff in his reply, which was delivered on the 24th May, denied that he was guilty of the alleged or any misconduct or neglect and claimed that the boards were acting in excess of the authority vested in them under the service agreement to dismiss the plaintiff. The reply also claimed that the opinion formed by the board was not a bona fide one based upon any fair or proper inquiry or investigation into the circumstances of the case or upon any reasonable or justifiable grounds, and that it was formed without reasonable or probable cause. It also claimed that the several boards of directors, in passing the resolutions, acted contrary to the principles of natural justice.

GLOVER v. B.L.N. LTD.

Mr. Justice Kenny held that, as the plaintiff did not get notice of the charges against him and as the directors of the holding company did not give him an opportunity to make his defence, the termination of the plaintiff's contract by the resolution[59] of the 5th July and the letter of the 8th July, 1966, was invalid; the judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages against the defendants. Mr. Justice Kenny reviewed the various cases he mentioned in his judgment, in particular the decision of the House of Lords in Ridge v. Baldwin[60]; the speech of Lord Reid in that decision led him to the conclusion that the plaintiff's position should be equated to that of the holder of an office, and not that of an employee only, and that the principles of natural justice applied to a termination under clause 12(c) of the plaintiff's agreement.

In my opinion, this case hinges entirely upon clause 12(c) of the service agreement. The defendants have relied upon this particular clause to justify their summary dismissal of the plaintiff. I agree with Mr. Justice Kenny when he states that, because of the express provisions of this clause, no implied term is to be read into the contract that the plaintiff might be summarily dismissed for misconduct. On the contrary, the clause expressly provides that the plaintiff could not be validly dismissed for misconduct unless it was serious misconduct and was of a kind which, in the unanimous opinion of the board of directors of the holding company present and voting at the meeting, injuriously affected the reputation, business or property of either that company or of the subsidiary companies. The question of whether or not such a contract could be terminated summarily for breach of fundamental condition on the part of the plaintiff was not raised in this case and was not relied upon by the defendants so I do not feel any need to offer any view upon that point. It appears to me quite clear that the operation of clause 12(c) would necessarily involve (a) the ascertainment of the facts alleged to constitute serious misconduct, (b) the determination that they did in fact constitute serious misconduct, and (c) that the members of the board present and voting should be unanimously of opinion that the serious misconduct injuriously affected the reputation, business or property of the holding company or of the subsidiary companies. The parties by their conduct explicitly set up the machinery for dismissal specified in clause 12(c); that machinery designated the board of directors as the tribunal, and required unanimity of opinion upon the effect of such serious misconduct if it should be proved.

In my view, it was necessarily an implied term of the contract that this inquiry and determination should be fairly conducted. The arguments and submissions in this Court ranged over a very wide field particularly in the field of constitutional justice: see the judgments of this Court in McDonald v. Bord na gCon[61] and East Donegal Co-operative v. The Attorney General.[62] The Constitution was relied upon; in particular Article 40, s. 3, of the Constitution. This Court in In re Haughey[63] held that that provision of the Constitution was a guarantee of fair procedures. It is not, in my opinion, necessary to discuss the full effect of this Article in the realm of private law or indeed of public law. It is sufficient to say that public policy and the dictates of constitutional justice require that statutes, regulations or agreements setting up machinery for taking decisions which may affect rights or impose liabilities should be construed as providing for fair procedures. It is unnecessary to decide to what extent the contrary can be provided for by agreement between the parties. In the present case the provisions of clause 12(c) do not seek expressly or by implication to exclude the right of any of the parties to a fair procedure.

The plaintiff was neither told of the charges against him nor was he given any opportunity of dealing with them before the board of directors arrived at its decision to dismiss him. In my view this procedure was a breach of the implied term of the contract that the procedure should be fair, as it cannot be disputed, in the light of so much authority on the point, that failure to allow a person to meet the charges against him and to afford him an adequate opportunity of answering them is a violation of an obligation to proceed fairly.

Having regard to the evidence which was given at the trial, one could not say with any degree of certainty that the members of the board of directors would have come to the same conclusion on the facts as Mr. Justice Kenny did, or that they would have arrived at a unanimity of opinion on the effects of such misconduct as they might have found proved, particularly when one has regard to the close personal relationships which existed between some members of the board and the plaintiff and their knowledge of his activities in the firm since he joined it. But even if one could say with certainty that, if he had been given a fair hearing, the result would still have been the same, in my view that does not offer any ground for validating retroactively a procedure which was clearly invalid. It is to be noted that the board acted with great haste in dismissing the plaintiff, and on a report which did not contain complaints or allegations of misconduct set out with the particularity with which they were set out subsequently in the reply to the plaintiff's notice for particulars. Furthermore, as was settled by this Court in Carvill v. Irish Industrial Bank Ltd.[64], an employer, in defending an action by an employee for wrongful summary dismissal, cannot rely upon misconduct which was not known by the employer at the time of the dismissal. I would add that the misconduct, if known but not in fact used as a ground for dismissal at the time, cannot be relied upon afterwards in an effort to justify the dismissal.

For the reasons I have already stated, I am of opinion that the plaintiff was wrongfully dismissed in that the dismissal was a violation of the provisions of clause 12(c) of the service agreement because of the failure to inform him of the charges against him and the failure to give him an adequate opportunity of answering them.

I am conscious of the fact that Mr. Justice Kenny's conclusion that the defendants had acted in breach of the contract is based on somewhat different grounds and, therefore, I should deal with Mr. Justice Kenny's reasons. He placed great reliance upon the speech of Lord Reid in Ridge v. Baldwin[65] and quoted with apparent approval the passage at p. 65 of the report in which Lord Reid said:— "The law regarding master and servant is not in doubt. There cannot be specific performance of a contract of service, and the master can terminate the contract with his servant at any time and for any reason or for none. But if he does so in a manner not warranted by the contract he must pay damages for breach of contract." This particular point does not arise for decision in this case but I wish to expressly reserve my opinion on the correctness of this statement if it is intended to convey that a court cannot make a declaration which would have the effect of reinstating a person wrongfully dismissed. I do not think that the decision in Ridge v. Baldwin[66] is directly applicable to the present case. In that case the appellant was a Chief Constable and by a statutory provision the watch committee had power to suspend or dismiss him when they thought him negligent in the discharge of his duty or otherwise unfit for the same. The Chief Constable was not the servant of the watch committee, or of any one else, and he was the holder of an office from which he could be only dismissed in accordance with statutory provisions. It was held that the power of dismissal of this officer, contained in the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, could not have been exercised until the watch committee had informed the officer of the grounds on which they proposed to proceed and had given him a proper opportunity to present his case in defence. It was a prerequisite that the question of neglect of duty should be considered in a judicial spirit and that could not be done without giving the officer in question the opportunity to defend himself against such a charge, and he would therefore have to be told what was the alleged neglect of duty. As that had not been done the decision was a nullity.

Unlike the present case, Ridge v. Baldwin[66] was not governed by the terms of a contract. In my view, once the matter is governed by the terms of a contract between the parties, it is immaterial whether the employee concerned is deemed to be a servant or an officer in so far as the distinction may be of relevance depending on whether the contract is a contract for services or a contract of service. In the present case it is immaterial whether the plaintiff is an officer or a servant of his employers and, in my view, the case does not fall to be decided upon that distinction but rather upon the actual terms of the contract for the reasons I have already given.

Mr. Justice Kenny attached importance to the fact that the plaintiff's position with any of the four companies involved could be terminated by the directors of one of them (namely, the holding company) and that this was a characteristic which equated his position to that of an officer. This particular position was the result of a contract between the parties, including the plaintiff, and clause 12(c) of the service agreement gave the directors of the holding company the final decision in whether or not he should be dismissed. I agree with Mr. Justice Kenny in so far as he says that this situation strengthened the plaintiff's position in his claim to have a fair hearing, but it leads me to the conclusion that this right was an implied term of the contract by reason of the particular machinery set up by clause 12(c) and, therefore, it is not necessary to examine what might have been the plaintiff's position if such a machinery had not been provided. The relationship between the plaintiff and the defendants was a contractual one in so far as this particular matter is concerned.

Even if there had not been a pre-existing contractual relationship and the plaintiff had been invited to attend such an inquiry, it is probably correct to say, as Harman J. held in Byrne v. Kinematograph Renters Society[67], that a contract between the plaintiff and the defendants that the inquiry would be fairly conducted could be implied. It never appears to have been doubted in cases decided in England that, if the basis of the jurisdiction to conduct such an inquiry was based on statute or on the agreement of the parties, public policy prevents the exclusion of the rules of what in England is called natural justice where they ought to be observed. It is unnecessary in this case to enter into an examination of the other aspects of this problem which have engaged English courts, namely, whether the obligation to observe the rules of natural justice can be relied upon in a case where the relationship

Lastly, I come to deal with the defendants' contention that, if a hearing had been given to the plaintiff, there was nothing he could usefully have said and the result would have been the same. I think this proposition only has to be stated to be rejected. The obligation to give a fair hearing to the guilty is just as great as the obligation to give a fair hearing to the innocent. Furthermore, in this case, by reason of the provisions of clause 12(c), it would not be simply a case of establishing guilt or innocence, because the most important and effective power of the board of the holding company was one which was mainly a discretionary power, namely, to form the opinion or not that the plaintiff's misconduct injured any of the four companies.

For the reasons I have already given, I am of opinion that the defendants' appeal on all the matters set out in para. (1) of the said notice of appeal[68] should be dismissed. This appeal, which took the form of an appeal confined in the first instance to the issues set out in the said paragraph of the notice of appeal, was heard pursuant to the order of this Court of the 13th March, 1970, which gave liberty to the parties to have the appeal on these issues heard in the first instance. Summarised briefly, the issues set out in para. (1) of the notice of appeal were whether the plaintiff was entitled to receive notice of the charges against him and to be given an opportunity to reply to the same, by virtue of clause 12(c) of the service agreement, before he could be dismissed; and whether he was entitled to damages for wrongful dismissal when he did not receive such notice before his dismissal. I am expressing no view on what damages the plaintiff should receive, or on what basis they should be calculated, as that aspect of the appeal has not yet been heard.

FITZGERALD J.:—

In my opinion the defendants' appeal in this case should be allowed. It appears to me that by the agreement of the 10th January, 1964, between the four companies and the plaintiff, the relationship of master and servant was [68] See p. 418, ante.

Supreme Court 1972

GLOVER v. B.L.N. LTD.

FitzGerald J.

created and the plaintiff thereby became the technical director of all four companies. His duties were set out in the agreement as including an obligation to obey, conform, and comply with the orders of the directors of the respective boards. He was obliged to devote his whole time to the business of the companies and was precluded from having an interest in any competitive concern. His basic salary for his services to the four companies was fixed at £2,250 p.a. plus £250 expenses. In addition provision was made for commission to be paid to him by the holding company dependent on the net profits, if any, of the operating company. The employment was for five years with provision for its extension. I take the view that the plaintiff was a servant of the four companies and not an "officer" or "official", as was submitted on his behalf.

Clause 12 provides for the termination of his employment by the four companies. The material clause for consideration is clause 12(c) which is as follows:—

"12. Mr. Glover's appointment as technical adviser[69] of all the companies may be terminated without giving rise to any claim for compensation or damages upon the happening of any events following, namely . . . (c) if Mr. Glover shall be guilty of any serious misconduct or serious neglect in the performance of his duties or wilfully disobeys the reasonable orders directions or restrictions or regulations of the board of directors of any of the said companies which in the unanimous opinion of the board of directors for the time being of the holding company present and voting at the meeting injuriously affect the reputation business or property or management of either the holding company or the operating company or the sales company or the factors company."

Other than the necessity for the decision of the directors of the holding company being unanimous, no procedure for the holding of the directors meeting is stipulated. The directors of the holding company met on the 5th July, 1966, and unanimously decided[69] on his dismissal. The directors' decision falls within the provisions of clause 12(c) of the contract.

report:— "The law regarding master and servant is not in doubt. There cannot be specific performance of a contract of service, and the master can terminate the contract with his servant at any time and for any reason or for none. But if he does so in a manner not warranted by the contract he must pay damages for breach of contract. So the question in a pure case of master and servant does not at all depend on whether the master has heard the servant in his own defence: it depends on whether the facts emerging at the trial prove breach of contract." I accept that as being a correct statement of the law. The many cases quoted in support of the plaintiff establish that a person holding an office created by statute or statutory regulation, or subject to prescribed procedure imposed by statute, statutory regulation or the contract of employment itself, is entitled to insist upon the prescribed procedure being followed and upon being given full opportunity of meeting any charges or complaints against him. In my opinion, the plaintiff in the present case is not entitled to such safeguards. His rights are to be found solely within the contract of his employment as the servant of the four companies.

The decision of Mr. Justice Kenny, following a full hearing of the facts, was that the plaintiff's conduct would have justified dismissal and yet he was awarded over £9,000 damages for wrongful dismissal; this appears to me to be inconsistent in itself and it fortifies my view that the plaintiff should have been non-suited and that this appeal should be allowed.

There has been a judicial determination by Mr. Justice Kenny that the plaintiff's conduct amounted to a breach by him of his contract which his employers were entitled to treat, and have treated, as a breach of his contract; and I fail to see how he can be awarded damages against them in this action.

Words and phrases – "Duties" – "Tasks" – Employment Equality Act 1998 (No. 21).

The Employment Equality Act 1998, as amended, provides, inter alia, as follows:-

"16.–(1) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as requiring any person to recruit or promote an individual to a position, to retain an individual in a position, or to provide training or experience to an individual in relation to a position, if the individual—

(a) will not undertake (or, as the case may be, continue to undertake) the duties attached to that position or will not accept (or, as the case may be, continue to accept) the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed, or

(b) is not (or, as the case may be, is no longer) fully competent and available to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, the duties attached to that position, having regard to the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed.

(3)(a) For the purposes of this Act, a person who has a disability is fully competent to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, any duties if the person would be so fully competent and capable of reasonable accommodation (in this subsection referred to as 'appropriate measures') being provided by the person's employer.

(b) The employer shall take appropriate measures, where needed in a particular case, to enable a person who has a disability—

(i) to have access to employment,

(ii) to participate and advance in employment or

(iii) to undergo training, unless the measures would impose a disproportionate burden on the employer.

(c) In determining whether the measures would impose such a burden account shall be taken, in particular, of—

(i) the financial and other costs entailed,

(ii) the scale and financial resources of the employer's business, and

(iii) the possibility of obtaining public funding or other assistance."

The respondent was employed as a special needs assistant by the appellant school, which catered for children with various disabilities and needs. The respondent became paralysed from the waist down and was required to use a wheelchair. Following a course of rehabilitation, the respondent sought to resume her employment. The appellant conducted an assessment process, which identified a number of tasks that the respondent could no longer undertake in light of her disability. The redistribution of some of the tasks identified in the assessment process was not considered by the appellant. A report completed by an occupational therapist for the appellant suggested that the respondent might be suitable for the role of a floating special needs assistant, although no such role existed within the school. An informal inquiry was made about the feasibility of funding for the role of a floating special needs assistant but was not followed up. Ultimately, the appellant decided that the respondent was not in a position to return to her work as a special needs assistant.

The respondent brought an application to the Equality Tribunal claiming that the appellant's actions were discriminatory and that the appellant had failed to provide her with reasonable accommodation or appropriate measures to enable her to return to work. The Equality Tribunal found that the respondent was no longer fully competent to undertake, or fully capable of undertaking, the duties attached to the role of special needs assistant.

The Labour Court reversed the decision on the basis, inter alia, that the appellant had failed to comply with s. 16(3) of the 1998 Act. The Labour Court found that the appellant had failed in its duty to fully consider the viability of a reorganisation of work and a redistribution of tasks among all of the school's special needs assistants so as to relieve the respondent of those duties that she was unable to perform.

The appellant appealed to the High Court on points of law. The appellant submitted, inter alia, that the Labour Court ignored significant evidence to the effect that, even with the most extensive measures, the respondent was not fit for the role of special needs assistant in the school. The appellant further submitted that the Labour Court in effect concluded that s. 16 of the 1998 Act could be construed so as to require the employer to reorganise and restructure the job so that the employee would only be required to carry out the essential duties of the job so restructured rather than the original job itself. The High Court (Noonan J.) upheld the decision of the Labour Court (see [2015] IEHC 785).

The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal (Ryan P., Finlay Geoghegan and Birmingham JJ.), which allowed the appeal and reversed the decision of the High Court (see [2018] IECA 11). The Court of Appeal held, inter alia, that s. 16 of the 1998 Act required full competence as to tasks that were the essence of the position and that the respondent was unable to perform the essential tasks of a special needs assistant in the particular school.

The respondent sought leave to appeal to the Supreme Court, inter alia, on the grounds that the decision of the Court of Appeal introduced significant qualifications to the obligations on employers to consider the redistribution of tasks to facilitate persons with disabilities in the workplace. The respondent was granted leave to appeal by the Supreme Court (see [2018] IESCDET 103).

Held by the Supreme Court (O'Donnell, MacMenamin, Dunne and O'Malley JJ.; Charleton J. dissenting in part), in allowing the appeal and remitting the case to the Labour Court, 1, that, read together, s. 16(1) and s. 16(3) of the 1998 Act provided that while an employer was not required to retain an individual in a position if that person was no longer fully competent and available to undertake the duties attached to that position, a person with a disability who could be reasonably accommodated was deemed to be capable of performing the job as if they had no disability. This was subject to the condition that reasonable accommodation should not impose a disproportionate burden on the employer.

2. That the requirement to take appropriate measures to enable a person with a disability to have access to employment, to participate and advance in employment or to undergo training was a mandatory primary duty on the part of an employer.

3. That an employer was required to give the question of redistribution of duties full consideration and, in considering the question of removing or redistributing duties as a means of reasonable accommodation, there was no distinction to be made between the words "duties" and "tasks" contained in s. 16 of the 1998 Act. The test was whether, with reasonable accommodation, the employee was fully capable of undertaking the duties attached to the position and it was a test of fact, to be determined in accordance with the employment context.

Per Charleton J. (concurring): Occluding the legislation with a legal mist of fine distinctions as between various terms for work or tasks and asking such questions as to core competencies and attempting a perfect definition of any particular form of employment in distinction from the commonsense and honest appraisal that the legislation clearly required was to do a disservice to the human rights of disabled individuals. It was always a question of what could be done and whether it would really help the person who had a disability to do their job. If the ability to be "fully competent", with "reasonable accommodation", was not there, then there was no discrimination according to the legal definition if the person could not do the work.

4. That the test to determine whether what was required to allow a person employment was reasonable accommodation was one of reasonableness and proportionality. An employer was not under a duty to re-designate entirely or create a different job to facilitate an employee.

5. That, in considering the provision of reasonable accommodation, an employer had a mandatory duty to examine the possibility of obtaining public funding or other assistance.

6. That while an employer did not have a mandatory duty to consult with an employee at every stage when assessing the provision of reasonable accommodation, a prudent employer would provide an employee with meaningful participation. However, the absence of consultation could not, in itself, constitute discrimination under s. 8 of the 1998 Act.

7. That, as a matter of fair procedures, parties were entitled to be provided with an appropriate level of reasoning and definitions for the level of compensation awarded.

8. That in failing to address relevant evidence that had the potential to be determinative of an issue, if not the claim, before it, the Labour Court did not fulfil its statutory duty. While the court would be slow to interfere with a decision of an expert administrative tribunal, it had to intervene where there was a substantial failure of compliance with statutory duty such that the relevant determination was ultra vires.

Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 and Attorney General v. Davis [2018] IESC 27, [2018] 2 I.R. 357 considered.

9. That the court could not act as a surrogate Labour Court, which was charged with a statutory function, and thus the only appropriate order was to remit the matter to the Labour Court for further consideration in accordance with the totality of the evidence adduced, together with such further limited evidence as might be necessary, and the law as explained by the court.

Per Charleton J. (dissenting): What was done, in giving the respondent an opportunity to consult with a doctor and to engage with every aspect of the case as to the effect which her disability had on the highly responsible and demanding work of a special needs assistant, sufficed as a procedure. It was for an employer to be open to the prospects for engagement and to consider what could in good faith be done and there was nothing in the papers before the court whereby the genuineness of either side could be doubted.

Appeal from the Court of Appeal

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgments of MacMenamin and Charleton JJ., infra.

By judgment delivered on 11 December 2015 and order made on 13 January 2016, the High Court (Noonan J.) dismissed the appellant school's appeal from the Labour Court determination overturning the decision of the Equality Tribunal ([2015] IEHC 785). The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal (Ryan P., Finlay Geoghegan and Birmingham JJ.) which, by judgment dated 31 January 2018 and order dated 21 February 2018, allowed its appeal ([2018] IECA 11).

By way of application for leave and notice of appeal dated 20 March 2018, the respondent sought leave pursuant to Article 34.5.3° of the Constitution to appeal to the Supreme Court. On 6 July 2018, the Supreme Court (O'Donnell, Dunne and O'Malley JJ.) granted leave to the respondent to appeal the decision of the Court of Appeal (see [2018] IESCDET 103).

By order made on 9 October 2018, the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission was granted liberty to appear before the Supreme Court as amicus curiae in the proceedings.

The appeal was heard by the Supreme Court (O'Donnell, MacMenamin, Dunne, Charleton and O'Malley JJ.) on 14 March 2019.

Oisín Quinn S.C. (with him Matthew Jolley and Katherine McVeigh) for the respondent.

O'Donnell J. 31 July 2019

[1] I have read the judgment about to be delivered by MacMenamin J. and I agree with it.

MacMenamin J.

[2] The respondent, Marie Daly, began work as a special needs assistant ("SNA") in the appellant school in the year 1998. She is also a qualified nurse. The Nano Nagle School in Killarney ("the school") caters for children on the autistic spectrum, and those with mild to profound disabilities. In July 2010, the respondent sustained very serious injuries in an accident whilst on holiday. As a result, she was paralysed from the waist down. Since then she has had to use a wheelchair. She undertook an extensive course of rehabilitation. By the beginning of 2011, she was anxious to resume her employment. The school, as her employer, initiated an assessment process for this purpose. The job of an SNA is a challenging one, and has a significant physical aspect. Ultimately, following a process described in this judgment, the school board refused the respondent permission to return to work.

The equality officer

[3] Advised and assisted by her trade union, the respondent brought an application under s. 83 of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2011 ("the Act") to the Equality Tribunal, now merged into the Workplace Relations Commission (see the Workplace Relations Act 2015). She claimed that the school's decision constituted unlawful discrimination under ss. 6, 8, and 16 of the Act, and that the employer had failed to comply with its statutory duty under s. 16(3) and (4) of the Act to provide "reasonable accommodation" or "appropriate measures" to accommodate her disability, which would have allowed her to return to work. The claim was first heard by an equality officer appointed under the Act. His decision dated 3 December 2013 (see DEC-E2013-168) determined the respondent was no longer fully competent and available to undertake, and no longer fully capable of undertaking, the duties attached to the position. He concluded the school had given consideration to the provision of what are called under s. 16 of the Act "appropriate measures" to enable the respondent to return to work, but that these measures gave rise to "a cost other than a nominal cost", and the school was entitled to rely on s. 16(3) of the Act as a defence. It appears that, referring to nominal cost, the officer was under a misapprehension as to the applicable law; the nominal cost test had been removed by s. 9 of the Equality Act 2004; and replaced by the amendment outlined later. This was not the sole basis of his decision, however, as he held the school had a good defence on the basis of incapacity, that there was no discrimination, and the respondent was not entitled to any remedy under the Act.

The Labour Court

[4] The respondent appealed to the Labour Court, which reversed the decision (see EDA 1430, 12 August 2014). It held there had been a failure to comply with s. 16(3) of the Act, and held that, in making its decision on the question of reasonable accommodation, the school had failed to consult with the respondent, who was awarded €40,000 in compensation.

The High Court [2015] IEHC 785 and Court of Appeal [2018] IECA 11

[5] The school appealed to the High Court on points of law. There, Noonan J. upheld the decision of the Labour Court (see [2015] IEHC 785). The school then appealed to the Court of Appeal (Ryan P., Finlay Geoghegan J.; Birmingham J. concurring in both judgments), which upheld the school's appeal, and reversed the decision of the High Court in two judgments, delivered by Ryan P. and by Finlay Geoghegan J. on 31 January 2018 (see [2018] IECA 11). The respondent then applied for leave to appeal to this court, which application was granted in a determination dated 6 July 2018 (see [2018] IESCDET 103).

The leave determination [2018] IESCDET 103

[6] In the leave application, the respondent submitted that the decision of the Court of Appeal introduced significant qualifications to the obligations on employers to consider the redistribution of tasks to facilitate persons with disabilities in the workplace. The panel of this court pointed out that the application appeared to raise the issue of a tension between the duties involved in a particular post, and the tasks which may be distributed or redistributed by way of reasonable accommodation.

[7] The issues which arise are, undoubtedly, of significant importance, not only to the respondent, but in the broader field of disability law. The appeal has been elaborately argued on agreed facts, and counsel have helpfully provided extensive and welcome academic commentary, as well as the normal material required for compliance with the practice directions of this court. Counsel for the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission, as amicus curiae, also made helpful written and oral submissions. While the issues turn largely on the interpretation and application of s. 16 of the Employment Equality Act 1998 (as amended), other ancillary questions also arise from the Labour Court's determination.

This appeal

The Act – general background

[8] A general overview of the legislation may be helpful as a starting point. The purpose of the Employment Equality Act 1998 ("the 1998 Act") is, inter alia, to promote equality between employed persons, and make further provision with respect to discrimination in, and connection with, employment. The 1998 Act outlaws discrimination in connection with work-related activities on nine distinct grounds, including disability. Whether the respondent, an employee with a disability can be reasonably accommodated with what are called "appropriate measures" is a core issue arising from s. 16 of the 1998 Act. The difficulty arises with the identification of what the duties of a position are. The section undoubtedly requires that tribunals, and courts, should decide what those duties are. But, even before the 1998 Act was enacted, scholars expressed concern that the then-proposed legislation was insufficiently specific, as it lacked a clear definition of what the "essential" and "non-essential" duties of a work-position were. It was suggested this lack of clarity raised the possibility that the provisions of the 1998 Act might be interpreted "narrowly", so that it would be necessary for an employee with a disability to demonstrate that they could undertake all the duties of the position, whether with or without reasonable accommodation. (cf. Quinn and Quinlivan, "Disability Discrimination: the need to amend the Employment Equality Act 1998 in light of the EU Framework Directive on Employment", ch. 9 in Costello and Barry (eds.), Equality in Diversity: The New Equality Directives (Irish Centre for European Law, 2003) at pp. 24 and 25). The respondent submits that the Court of Appeal so interpreted s. 16, as it now provides, so as to render it necessary for a disabled person, on reasonable accommodation, to be able to perform all of what were seen as the core duties of a position of employment. The respondent and the amicus curiae submit that such an interpretation is unwarranted by the words of the section and would defeat the Act's purpose. Counsel for the school stands over the Court of Appeal judgments, submitting that, when properly interpreted, they express the true meaning and effect of s. 16 of the Act.

[9] The 1998 Act, later amended by the Equality Act 2004, repealed the Anti-Discrimination (Pay) Act 1974, and the Employment Equality Act 1977, although re-enacting parts of that legislation with amendments. Insofar as relevant, the purpose of the amendments provided by the Equality Act 2004 was to give effect to those provisions of Council Directives 2000/43/EC, 2000/78/EC and 2002/73/EC, which still required to be implemented in the State. At the time of the amending enactment in 2004, there was some renewed concern that the new provisions of the Equality Act 2004 did not go far enough in transposing the three Directives.

The 1998 Act, as now amended

[10] Section 2(a) of the 1998 Act defines "disability". The definition includes a partial absence of a person's bodily function. There is no doubt the respondent comes within this category. Section 6 defines "discrimination". It provides that, for the purposes of the Act, discrimination shall be taken to occur where, on any of the grounds defined in s. 6(2), a disabled person is treated less favourably than another person would be treated. This is referred to as the "disability ground". Section 8 deals with discrimination by employers. It provides, in relevant part, that an employer shall not discriminate against an employee in relation to access to employment, conditions of employment, access to employment, or classification of posts (see s. 8(1)(a), (b) and (e)). Under s. 8(4)(b), an employer is prohibited from having rules or instructions which would result in discrimination against an employee, or class of employees, including in relation to access to, or conditions of, employment, or in the classification of posts. The prohibition therein contained also relates to a "practice" which results, or would be likely to result, in such discrimination. Section 8(6) provides that, without prejudice to the generality of s. 8(1), an employer shall be taken to discriminate against an employee in relation to conditions of employment if, on any of the "discriminatory grounds", the employer does not afford to that employee (a) the same terms of employment (other than remuneration and pension rights), (b) the same working conditions, and (c) the same treatment in relation to overtime, shift work, short time, transfers, lay-offs, redundancies, dismissals and disciplinary measures, as the employer offers or affords to another person or class of persons.

[11] Section 8(7) provides that, without prejudice to the generality of s. 8(1), an employer shall be taken to discriminate against an employee in relation to training or experience for, or in relation to, employment if, on any of the "discriminatory grounds", that employer refuses to offer or afford to that employee the same opportunities or facilities for employment counselling, training, and work experience as the employer offers or affords to other employees, where the circumstances in which that employee and those other employees are employed are not materially different. It is unnecessary for a claimant to prove there was an intention to discriminate.

Section 16 of the 1998 Act

[12] Section 16 of the 1998 Act, as amended by s. 9 of the Equality Act 2004, deals directly with disabilities in the context of work. Section 16(1) provides that nothing in the 1998 Act is to be:-

> " … construed as requiring any person to recruit or promote an individual to a position, to retain an individual in a position, or to provide training or experience to an individual in relation to a position, if the individual—
>
> (a) will not undertake (or, as the case may be, continue to undertake) the duties attached to that position or will not accept (or, as the case may be, continue to accept) the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed, or
> (b) is not (or, as the case may be, is no longer) fully competent and available to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, the duties attached to that position, having regard to the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed" (emphasis added).

Seen in isolation, these emphasised words might convey that an employer does not have to retain an individual who is no longer capable of performing the duties in that position. But the section must be read in its entirety. An important issue arises from the word "duty" or "duties". The same word is not used throughout s. 16. Later, the drafter used the word "tasks" (see s. 16(4)(b)). Do the words "duties" and "tasks" have the same meaning, or not? The Court of Appeal held that the law permitted, and required, the distribution of "tasks", but that there was no obligation to remove from a disabled employee, or distribute to other employees, what were referred to as the "main duties", or "essential functions" of a position. The respondent submits that the section does not contain any words such as "core duties", or "essential functions". Counsel for the school argues the words

"tasks" and "duties" have different meanings, the first connoting peripheral features of a job; the second the central or core elements.

[13] Section 16(2) is not material. But s. 16(3) then provides:-

> "(a) For the purposes of this Act a person who has a disability is fully competent to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, any duties if the person would be so fully competent and capable on reasonable accommodation (in this subsection referred to as 'appropriate measures') being provided by the person's employer.
>
>
> (i) to have access to employment,
>
> (ii) to participate and advance in employment, or
>
> (iii) to undergo training,
> unless the measures would impose a disproportionate burden on the employer" (emphasis added).

The words emphasised above are also keys to understanding the section. The section then identifies criteria for identifying what is a "disproportionate burden". Section 16(3)(c) therefore provides:-

> "In determining whether the measures would impose such a burden account shall be taken, in particular, of–
> (i) the financial and other costs entailed,
>
> (ii) the scale and financial resources of the employer's business, and
> (iii) the possibility of obtaining public funding or other assistance" (emphasis added).

The issue of "public funding or other assistance" is considered later.

The main issue

[14] In a sense, the fundamental issue arises because of the way in which s. 16(1) and s. 16(3) are sequenced. The Court of Appeal held that s. 16(3) of the 1998 Act must be seen as being subject to what is contained in s. 16(1). In standing over that decision, counsel for the school submits this must mean that a court or tribunal should look first to s. 16(1), in order to assess the main duties of a position, and thereafter determine whether, on reasonable accommodation under s. 16(3), an employee was fully competent or capable of undertaking these main duties. On this reading, main duties form the starting point for consideration. As reflected in the decision of the Court of Appeal, the school's case is that, if it is shown that an employer has formed a bona fide belief that an employee with disabilities was not fully capable of performing the duties for which he or she was employed, there is a complete defence to a claim of discrimination. Thus, it is argued, the first stage of any analysis requires identification of the duties required for any job based on an assessment of the structure and needs of the particular organisation, and the role required to be performed. Once these main duties of a role are identified, a disabled person should be assessed in accordance with those duties in order to determine their capacity to perform the job. If they cannot perform these duties, then the next question is whether an employer can undertake any reasonable accommodation to render the employee capable of performing those duties. But, if the disabled employee remains unable to perform these main duties after reasonable accommodation, then there is a full defence. The school submits that it arranged to have the duties associated with an SNA assessed by an expert, Ms. Ina McGrath, who identified sixteen duties attached to the position. The respondent could wholly or partly perform nine duties, but was unable to perform seven. Counsel for the school submits that the Court of Appeal correctly held that no adaptation or accommodation could make the respondent able to carry out the job. She submits that there is no requirement to "strip away" some duties associated with a particular job, as this is not required by the section. Counsel submits this would be to create an entirely new position, which is not mandated at either national or European level. But counsel acknowledges that a distribution of "tasks" is acceptable. But these "tasks" are to be seen as those peripheral to the main duties; that is, that they would be secondary or marginal in nature.

[15] Rather confusingly, s. 16(4) contains two sets of subparagraphs, both identified as "(a)", "(b)" and "(c)". The first set relates to the identification of an "employer" and is immaterial. But s. 16(4) then provides that the words "appropriate measures", to be found in s. 16(3)(a) and (b) "in relation to a person with a disability", are to be interpreted as meaning:-

> "(a) … effective and practical measures, where needed in a particular case, to adapt the employer's place of business to the disability concerned."

Then the subsection first mentions the word "tasks" in these terms:-

> "(b) without prejudice to the generality of paragraph (a), includes the adaptation of premises and equipment, patterns of working time, distribution of tasks or the provision of training or integration resources, but
> (c) does not include any treatment, facility or thing that the person might ordinarily or reasonably provide for himself or herself" (emphasis added).

The Court of Appeal felt that the word "tasks" had a different connotation to "duties", and that an employer's obligation was to consider only the distribution of tasks, but not core duties, which were essential to the job.

[16] It is necessary then to touch on the provisions for redress. Section 75 of the Act provided that investigations by an equality officer were to take place under the aegis of the Director of Equality Investigations. The Act sets out the forum for seeking redress, the appeals procedure to the Labour Court, and further appeal, on a point of law, to the High Court. Section 82 of the 1998 Act sets out the forms of redress that can be awarded. These include an order for compensation in the form of arrears of remuneration for a limited period; and that a successful claimant may receive an order for compensation for the effects of acts of discrimination or victimisation that occurred not earlier than six years before the date of the referral of the case under s. 77. The 1998 Act also allows for an order that an employer be directed to take a particular course of action, or an order for re-instatement or re-engagement, without or without an order for compensation. The level of compensation is subject to a maximum of 104 weeks' pay or €40,000 (see s. 82(4)(a) of the 1998 Act). The practice of the tribunal in determining the level of compensation is to place the complainant in the position he or she would have been in had the discriminatory treatment not taken place (see A v. Public Sector Organisation (DEC-E-2006-056, Equality Tribunal, 16 November 2006).

The EU background

[17] Counsel for the respondent, and counsel for the amicus curiae, submit that, by interpreting s. 16(3) as being subject to s.16(1), the Court of Appeal erred. The primary argument is based on the wording of s. 16. They also place reliance on EU legal instruments and case law. The EU law is undoubtedly a useful point of reference. But whether it is even necessary to resort to EU law is a point to be determined. It is true that the amending Equality Act 2004 put in legislative form, and reflected, the provisions of Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, referred to as the "Framework Directive". It is also true that the recitals of the Framework Directive identify measures intended to play an important role in combating discrimination on grounds of disability. But counsel for the school argues that the mere fact that the Oireachtas used some of the terms employed in the recitals does not, itself, elevate those words to anything beyond guidance for the Framework Directive itself.

The Framework Directive

[18] Recital 17 of the Framework Directive sets out:-

> "This Directive does not require the recruitment, promotion, maintenance in employment or training of an individual who is not competent, capable and available to perform the essential functions of the post concerned or to undergo the relevant training, without prejudice to the obligation to provide reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities" (emphasis added).

[19] Recital 20 provides:-

> "Appropriate measures should be provided, i.e. effective and practical measures to adapt the workplace to the disability, for example adapting premises and equipment, patterns of working time, the distribution of tasks or the provision of training or integration resources" (emphasis added).

It will be seen, therefore, that the recital expresses the precept that an individual's workplace must be adapted to the disability and not vice versa.

[20] Recital 21 reflects some of the wording of s.16(3)(c) of the Act. It provides:-

> "To determine whether the measures in question give rise to a disproportionate burden, account should be taken in particular of the financial and other costs entailed, the scale and financial resources of the organisation or undertaking and the possibility of obtaining public funding or any other assistance."

[21] Article 5 mandates that there must be provision to facilitate persons with disabilities to obtain, and to participate as fully as possible in employment:-

> "Article 5
>
> Reasonable accommodation for disabled persons
> In order to guarantee compliance with the principle of equal treatment in relation to persons with disabilities, reasonable accommodation shall be provided. This means that employers shall take appropriate measures, where needed in a particular case, to enable a person with a disability to have access to, participate in, or advance in employment, or to undergo training, unless such measures would impose a disproportionate burden on the employer. This burden shall not be disproportionate when it is sufficiently remedied by measures existing within the framework of the disability policy of the Member State concerned" (emphasis added).

Article 5 undoubtedly contains terminology similar, if not identical to, what is to be found in s. 16.

Section 16: a summary

[22] To summarise, looking to s. 16 itself, the term "reasonable accommodation" was defined by statute as including "appropriate measures" (see s. 16(3)(a) and (b)). The question of "disproportionate burden" under s. 16(3)(b) is to be evaluated by taking into account financial and other costs, the scale and financial resources of a business, and the possibility of obtaining public funding or other assistance (see s. 16(3)(c)). Section 16(4)(a) defines "appropriate measures" as meaning effective and practical measures "where needed" in a particular case to adapt the employer's place of business on the basis of the disability concerned. Section 16(4)(b) provides that, "without prejudice" to the generality of para. (a), this duty would also include the adaptation of premises and equipment, patterns of working time, distribution of tasks, or the provision of training or integration resources.

The Framework Directive: a summary

[23] Turning then to the Framework Directive, recital 17 states that the directive does not require the "maintenance in employment" of an individual to perform the essential functions of the post concerned, but "without prejudice" to article 5 of the Framework Directive, which provides that employers shall take appropriate measures where needed in a particular case to enable a person with a disability to have access to, or participate in, employment, unless such measures would place a disproportionate burden on the employer. Such measures shall not be deemed "disproportionate" when sufficiently remedied by measures existing within the framework of the disability policy of the member state concerned.

The United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities

[24] At this point it is necessary only to advert to one other feature of the legislative background. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities ("the CRPD") was approved by the European Community by Council Decision 2010/48/EC of 26 November 2009. The CRPD was ratified by Ireland on 20 March 2018, two months after the Court of Appeal judgment.

[25] Article 1 of the CRPD recites that the purpose of the Convention was to:-

> "… promote, protect and ensure the full and equal enjoyment of all human rights and fundamental freedoms by all persons with disabilities, and to promote respect for their inherent dignity…"

[26] Article 2 provides that discrimination on the basis of disability means any distinction, exclusion, or restriction on the basis of disability that has the purpose or effect of impairing or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment or exercise on an equal basis with others of all human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural, civil, or any other field. This includes all forms of discrimination, including denial of reasonable accommodation. It defines reasonable accommodation as being necessary and appropriate modification and adjustments not imposing a disproportionate or undue burden where needed in a particular case, to ensure to persons with disabilities the enjoyment or exercise on an equal basis with others of all human rights and fundamental freedoms.

[27] Article 5 deals with equality and non-discrimination. Article 5(2) provides, insofar as material:-

> "States Parties shall prohibit all discrimination on the basis of disability and guarantee to persons with disabilities equal and effective legal protection against discrimination on all grounds" (emphasis added).

[28] Article 5(3) provides that:-

> "In order to promote equality and eliminate discrimination, States Parties shall take all appropriate steps to ensure that reasonable accommodation is provided" (emphasis added).

ECJ case law: HK Danmark (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11)

[29] In HK Danmark v. Dansk almennyttigt Boligselskab (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11) [2013] I.C.R. 851 the European Court of Justice ("ECJ") considered the meaning to be ascribed to the term "disability" for the purposes of the Framework Directive. The issue which arose in that case was the distinction between "disability" and "illness". But the ECJ also made significant observations on whether the obligation under the Framework Directive to provide a disabled worker with reasonable accommodation included an obligation to reduce her working hours, in circumstances where she was unable to work full-time due to her disability. The court considered the extent of the duty imposed on employers to provide a disabled worker with reasonable accommodation. It addressed whether that duty included an obligation to offer a disabled worker a facility to work part-time. But the ECJ pointed out that the EU had ratified the CRPD in 2010, and observed that, in accordance with Article 216(2) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU), the European Union had pronounced that international agreements were binding on its institutions, and therefore prevailed over acts of the European Union (see Air Transport Association of America v. Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Case C-366/10) [2011] E.C.R. I-13755). As a consequence, the ECJ held that the primacy of international agreements concluded by the European Union meant that instruments of secondary legislation of the European Union were to be interpreted, insofar as possible, in a manner consistent with those agreements. Thus, it followed that the Framework Directive, insofar as it related to disability, was thereafter to be interpreted in harmony with the CRPD.

[30] Referring to article 5 of the CRPD, the court held an employer was required to take appropriate measures in particular to enable a person with a disability to have access to, participate in or advance in employment. It referred, at para. 49, p. 876, to recital 20 in the preamble to the Framework Directive which gave a non-exhaustive list of such measures, which may be "physical, organisational and/or educational." It concluded that, in accordance with the second paragraph of article 2 of the CRPD, reasonable accommodation was to be understood as being necessary and appropriate modification and adjustments, not imposing a disproportionate or undue burden, where needed in a particular case, to ensure to persons with disabilities the enjoyment or exercise on an equal basis with others of all human rights and fundamental freedoms. Thus, it held:-

> "53. It follows that that provision prescribes a broad definition of the concept of 'reasonable accommodation'" (emphasis added).

> "54. Thus, with respect to Directive 2000/78, that concept must be understood as referring to the elimination of the various barriers that hinder the full and effective participation of persons with disabilities in professional life on an equal basis with other workers …"

At paras. 55 and 56, it went on to hold that recital 20 in the preamble to the Framework Directive and the second paragraph of article 2 of the 2009 Convention envisaged not only material but also organisational measures. It noted the term "pattern" of working time must be understood as the rhythm or speed at which the work is done. The court concluded, at para. 55, p. 877, therefore, that a reduction in working hours may constitute one of the "accommodation measures referred to in article 5 of that Directive" . It pointed out, at para. 56, p. 877, that the list of appropriate measures to adapt the workplace to the disability in recital 20 in the preamble to the Framework Directive was not exhaustive. Consequently, even if it were not covered by the concept of 'pattern of working time', a reduction in working hours could be regarded as an accommodation measure referred to in article 5 of the Framework Directive, in a case in which reduced working hours "make it possible for the worker to continue employment, in accordance with the objective of that article".

[32] While the court referred to recital 17 of the Framework Directive as not requiring the recruitment, promotion or maintenance in employment of a person who was not competent, capable and available to perform the essential functions of the post concerned, it held, at para. 57, p. 877, that this was "without prejudice to the obligation to provide reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities, which includes a possible reduction in their hours of work" (emphasis added). What is in question, therefore, is a balancing process identifying what is reasonable and proportionate.

[33] Having pointed out that, in accordance with article 5 of the Framework Directive, the accommodation that persons with disabilities are entitled to must be reasonable, but it must not constitute a disproportionate burden on the employer, the court went on to hold that it was for a national court to assess whether a reduction in working hours, as an accommodation measure, represents a disproportionate burden on the employers.

[34] The passage must be read as a whole. Seen in this way, it conveys that the principle, laid down in para. 57, p. 877, of HK Danmark v. Dansk almennyttigt Boligselskab (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11) [2013] I.C.R. 851, must be seen as being without prejudice to the obligation on employers to provide reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities.

[35] At para. AG88, p. 430, in his opinion in Z. v. A. (Case C-363/12) [2014] 3 C.M.L.R. 20, Advocate General Wahl described the judgment in HK Danmark v. Dansk almennyttigt Boligselskab (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11) [2013] I.C.R. 851 as marking a "paradigm shift" in ECJ case law, whereby, departing from a narrower definition, the EU concept of disability was explicitly aligned with the CRPD, noting that the court's definition of disability only covered professional life, as opposed to society at large. While not referred to in HK Danmark v. Dansk almennyttigt Boligselskab (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11), article 27(1) of the CRPD provides, inter alia, that:-

"States Parties shall safeguard and promote the realization of the right to work, including for those who acquire a disability during the course of employment, by taking appropriate steps, including through legislation, to, inter alia: …

(b) Protect the rights of persons with disabilities, on an equal basis with others, to just and favourable conditions of work, including equal opportunities and equal remuneration for work of equal value …" (emphasis added) (cf. opinion of Advocate General Wahl in Z. v. A. (Case C-363/12) [2014] 3 C.M.L.R. 20 at para. AG117, p. 434).

The facts

[36] The factual description which now follows is taken from the agreed facts, but must also refer to the Labour Court determination. But counsel for the respondent criticises the fact that the Labour Court failed to resolve an important evidential issue. This concerned contacts between the school principal and the National Council for Special Education ("NCSE") about appointing the respondent as a "floating SNA". Counsel for the respondent submits this was an important point, and could have been easily resolved. But counsel for the school submits that, while recording much of the testimony, the Labour Court omitted any reference to what is said to be highly important evidence which could have had a direct bearing on the outcome of the claim. She submits that this evidence raised serious question marks as to whether, even with the most extensive appropriate measures, the respondent could perform the duties of an SNA. These questions can only be answered by consideration of the evidence before the Labour Court.

[37] One can only be conscious of the fact that the following description of the evidence is lengthy, but one can only understand the objections to the determination, and the judgments of the Court of Appeal and the High Court, when set in their full factual context.

The school

[38] The school is situated near Killarney in County Kerry. It operates under the aegis of the NCSE, a State agency which is the funding authority. At the relevant time, there were 73 children attending the school. These were divided into 10 classes. Each class contained between 6 and 8 pupils. The school employed 12 teachers and 27 SNAs. It also employed ancillary therapy workers, bus staff, a caretaker, a secretary, as well as receiving volunteer help. Two of the classes in the school were designated for pupils with severe or profound difficulties. The pupils in the other classes were classified as having more moderate disability, though the school principal testified that the challenges facing staff members were nonetheless significant, even with those pupils.

The work

[39] Each SNA worked in tandem with a teacher. In general, two SNAs, plus one teacher, were assigned to each classroom. But in three classrooms, graded on the basis of pupils' disabilities, the teacher was accompanied by three SNAs. Prior to her accident, the respondent worked in one of these classes. The role of an SNA was described in a Departmental Circular (SP.ED 07/02). Those duties were of a non-teaching nature. They included preparation and tidying up of classrooms; escorting pupils in alighting and using school buses; providing them with special assistance; helping physically disabled pupils engaging in typing or writing; helping with clothing, feeding, toileting, and general hygiene; assisting in out-of-school visits, walks, and similar activities; supplementing teachers in the supervision of pupils with special needs during assembly, recreational, and dispersal periods; accompanying individuals or small groups who might have to be withdrawn temporarily from the classroom; providing general back-up to the class-teachers; and, where necessary, assisting in catering for the needs of a specific pupil. As the respondent was a qualified medical nurse, she fulfilled a number of roles in the school, and also undertook some secretarial duties from time to time.

Consideration of return to work

[40] By late 2010, the respondent had completed her five-month period of rehabilitation in the National Rehabilitation Centre ("NRC"). She was assessed there by a senior occupational therapist, who formed the view that she could return to work as an SNA on a phased basis. The respondent was discharged from the NRC on 19 December 2010.

[41] The respondent contacted the school in January 2011 to discuss resuming work. She met the school's occupational physician, Dr. David Madden of Medmark, which is a medical consultancy. Dr. Madden himself is a general practitioner and a consultant in occupational health. He informed the school principal that the respondent had agreed to a possible return to work on 8 March 2011. During the month of February 2011, the school asked the respondent to assist on a number of days in carrying out secretarial and administrative duties. Dr. Madden furnished a report to the school board on 1 March 2011. He confirmed the respondent had completed a satisfactory recovery, and that, despite her ongoing injury, she was fit to return to many of the duties of an SNA. But he expressed the reservation that the school should commission an assessment to ensure that the respondent could carry out the work safely, and to identify potential work activities which might prove challenging to her. In March 2011, the school arranged for an excursion for some of the children to Florida. The respondent was asked to go on this trip in order to assist the teachers and other staff. However, she declined this request due to having been away from her own children for a considerable period during her stay in the NRC.

The Southern Safety risk assessors' report

[42] The school organised a risk-assessment later in the month of March. This was performed by Southern Safety Risk Assessors on 14 and 15 March 2011. The report recommended that, in order to accommodate a return, the respondent's work practices should be rearranged so that her role would be less challenging; that she should rotate from room to room so as to assist in generally less intensive tasks; and that a system be implemented so that she was not alone with children and, where, when necessary, she could call for assistance. It recommended the respondent should not have to carry out challenging or lifting activities. It proposed an occupational therapist be engaged in order to assess the tasks that the respondent could perform, and to assist in setting up a suitable system of work. The report recommended that the occupational therapist should carry out fortnightly, and then monthly, assessments. The report concluded that the principal, deputy principal, and staff members would all have to work together in order to accommodate the respondent, in a process which would require the full commitment of all school staff. It recommended that the school management, as well as the Department of Education, should facilitate the principal and her staff in the process of reintroduction.

[43] In the light of later evidence on this issue, it is worth noting that this report proposed that, if recommended, extra resources be obtained from the Department of Education to maintain the level of care for the children whilst accommodating the respondent's reintegration, that the respondent should be consulted in all of these matters and fully included in the process.

These recommendations acquire a greater significance when the whole picture is considered later.

[44] The consultants proposed all this should be carried out on a trial basis, and then reviewed. The school board considered this report, and thereafter reverted to Dr. Madden, who recommended a further report. The respondent, too, requested a different risk assessment be carried out.

Ms. Ina McGrath's report

[45] Subsequently, Ms. Ina McGrath, who was qualified as an occupational therapist and in ergonomics, was asked to carry out a second assessment following on that conducted by Southern Safety. Her report, based on assessments on 2 September 2011 and 9 September 2011, was sent to the school on 29 September 2011. The respondent was present on the second day, but not the first. The report contained a description of the broad range of activities which staff members undertook, and the way in which the students progressed through the school. Ms. McGrath's report, which assessed the respondent in the school environment, is one of the evidential keystones of the case. Some of what follows is set out in paras. 38 to 48, pp. 264 to 267, of Ryan P.'s judgment in the Court of Appeal. But what is contained in the report must be set out here in a little more detail. Ms. McGrath noted that the respondent had already passed her driving test as a wheelchair user. She had good extremity range of motion and strength. She was able to pick up items from the floor. She could lean to one side but not forward, as there was a risk of unbalancing. She was independent with her own care needs. She needed assistance with getting items from higher shelves which were outside of her reach, and in using sinks which were all at standing height.

[46] The report compels admiration for the valuable work carried out in the school, both by staff and students. But it also showed the extent to which the job of an SNA had a significant physical aspect to it. The report must be considered in detail. Without that detail, there is a risk that the determination and judgments of this and other courts will be misunderstood. Ms. McGrath assessed the position in relation to the suitability of each of the classes. The "reception class", which catered for new pupils needing considerable physical assistance, was ruled out. Classes where the students had autism were also ruled out as unsafe, as there was the potential for students who would regularly need to leave the classroom, or might "act out", possibly needing physical hands-on care in the event of what were called "outbursts". A senior special class was also seen as off-limits, as it was a step-up from the junior special class, where again the children would require a high level of physical assistance.

[47] Two senior classes were ruled out completely as the children were by then older and were being taught skills to help them become independent in the community. The students in those senior classes went into Killarney to use facilities to go shopping and to participate in work-experience activities in the community. But Ms. McGrath considered the respondent would not have the ability to self-propel her chair for such long distances. Additionally, there were "very strong" young adult males in those classes, which might not be a safe environment for the respondent.

[48] Ms. McGrath identified the junior and middle two classes as those with the greatest classroom and bathroom accessibility, and the least amount of safety risk for the respondent and students. The respondent was asked to come in and spend half a day in each of those classes. She had not assisted in any of those classes previously.

The junior class

[49] The average age of the students in the junior class chosen was nine years. Three of the students had been diagnosed with autistic spectrum disorder ("ASD"). Many of the students had been in the class for three years. They could walk independently, although two of them required supervision. One child required assistance with toileting. Another child needed close supervision secondary to "acting out". One child had dyspraxia, resulting in the risk of accidents and falls. Ms. McGrath described that a new child who had joined the class engaged in serious "acting out" behaviour, and tried to make physical contact with another child. In order to stop this conduct, the SNA permanently working in that class had to remove the newly arrived student to the sensory integration room. There was a further such incident later in the morning. The teacher and the other SNA had to intervene to prevent injury to staff and to other students. Two SNAs had to remove the student from the classroom. Some of the staff members involved reported that, on the previous week, they themselves had had to move out of the way when a shelf was pushed over.

[50] Ms. McGrath found that accessibility did not pose an insurmountable problem. The respondent was able to engage in adequate supervision of four of the children. However, she would not have been able to assist with the child who required assistance in toilet hygiene, or with the child with ASD, as the conduct of that child was said to be "inconsistent" and "physical".

[51] Ms. McGrath had earlier described the student who had created a problem in junior class being brought to a sensory integration room. The respondent brought one of the other students with dyspraxia into the same room to work on therapy exercises. The other SNA worked with the student with ASD at all stages, while the respondent focused on the child with dyspraxia. The respondent was able to give directions to the child she was assisting on using some specific toys, but was limited to minimal physical assistance. Whilst she was able to verbally prompt the child to use other facilities, she was unable to herself demonstrate correct use of these pieces of equipment. She was able to provide verbal prompts. Ms. McGrath pointed out that, on occasions, with some children, an SNA might, occasionally, have to lie or kneel on a mat to complete a therapy activity. She also pointed out that the respondent could not turn her wheelchair quickly if a child ran behind her or towards the door. Children removed their shoes in the room, and there was a risk of the wheels of the wheelchair going over a child's foot. When returning to the classroom, Ms. McGrath asked an SNA who had worked with the child with ASD if she had felt safe at the time going to, from, and during, her time in the sensory integration room. The SNA "honestly" felt that the child she was supervising needed two physically able SNAs as there was a potential the child might act out physically.

The middle class

[52] In the middle class there were eight children, one teacher and "2.5 SNAs". The "0.5", or "half-SNA", was a person shared with the reception class. Three of these children required assistance with mobility. One had epilepsy and needed physical assistance when walking. Two SNAs escorted this child to the bus. One child with ASD needed to be escorted to a quiet room. Another child with gait difficulties needed physical assistance. The other five children were independently mobile. The respondent was able to assist another SNA with two children who needed assistance with toileting. She provided "good assistance" with one child who was able to assist her in divesting clothing in the course of toileting, but had difficulties with another child who, for physical disability reasons, could not provide the same assistance. Some of the children needed hygiene supervision. The respondent could provide the verbal cues and physical prompts to complete these tasks. The respondent was able to carry out many, but not all, of the functions in that classroom. Suitable adaptation would have required the sinks to be lowered, but this, in turn, would have created difficulties for a person standing normally. The respondent was able to assist children with taking out books and working on a one-to-one activity; however, was unfamiliar with the children and their programmes of care, which made it difficult for her to get involved. Of the three children in the middle class who needed physical assistance, one was having difficulties, and walking about in a disruptive manner, although not aggressively. The teacher asked the SNAs to take her to a quiet area as the other children were being disruptive. Ms. McGrath stated that the respondent could not assist with escorting this child.

The jobs demand analysis

[53] Ms. McGrath also carried out an assessment in tabular form in a jobs demand analysis. The first column of the table, set out below, lists the duties an SNA performed in the school. Again, in hindsight, it is significant the second column broke down the "duties" into "tasks". The third column identified "tasks" which Ms. McGrath saw as a "best fit" for the respondent. The last column described any environmental or equipment-changes that could facilitate the in her role. A classification process, and an interpretation, of s. 16, in the light of "core duties", on the one hand, and "tasks", on the other, formed an important part of the Court of Appeal's approach. Whether such categorisation was either required or permitted by s. 16, or any other provision of the Act, is considered later. The table must also be considered in light of Ryan P.'s conclusion at para. 64, p. 272, in the Court of Appeal that, in fact, the respondent was regrettably unable to carry out many of the core elements attached to the position of an SNA. The respondent is, of course, referred to in the table as "Ms. Daly".

[54] The 16 "duties" in the jobs demand analysis were broken into a number of "task demands". It concluded that the respondent could do all, or part of, 9 out of the 16 duties identified, but could not perform 7 of them.

[55] Ms. McGrath commented that because the respondent was in a wheelchair, she was in a more vulnerable position than other staff members, perhaps in instances where a child was "acting out" by throwing items. She could not move as quickly to get herself out of the way if required, or to intervene to protect a child or a staff member. Students who acted out or who required physical assistance needed two physically able SNAs. Ms. McGrath expressed concern that the respondent would not be able to support the other SNA in the instance of a physical outburst that puts that SNA at risk. There might also be a concern regarding division of labour.

[56] The report concluded that it was clear the role of the respondent was limited in assisting with children with physical care needs; and that safety was a main concern for the respondent, staff, and students. Both of the classes assessed had students who could act out and needed hands-on intervention and escorting. This suggested that these classes would need two physically able SNAs to assist with these children. Accessibility was not a limitation, although some adjustments might be required to toilet facilities. Ms. McGrath recommended, therefore, that the respondent could act as a "floating" SNA. She would be able to work with children in certain categories, and could perform SNA duties with children who needed verbal or physical prompts. The report recommended against the respondent working with children who could act out physically. Ms. McGrath expressed a hope that the school would have resources to support the respondent, as it was evident that she was very motivated to return to work.

[57] Ms. McGrath's report went to Dr. Madden. The respondent was not given sight of the report. Following further conversations with the school principal, Dr. Madden then took the view that, whilst the respondent might be fit for some categories of work, such as a floating SNA, no such position existed in the school. He stated that the assessment confirmed that the respondent had difficulty in completing many of the more challenging aspects of her role as a SNA. He stated that it confirmed that she was not suitable to complete a series of routine work tasks safely. He, too, observed that she was not suitable to work with children who might act out physically, or with physically able children that might run off. Typically, two physically able SNAs were deemed suitable to meet the demands of such roles. The respondent would not be suitable to carry out such routine work tasks, with one other able-bodied SNA.

[58] Referring to the report and conversation with the principal, Dr. Madden pointed out that, while the report suggested that the respondent might be suitable for the position of a floating SNA, no such position existed. He had reviewed the risk assessment and shared the view that the respondent could not participate in many tasks. He understood from discussions that it was not possible to meet the level of accommodation required in order to ensure the safety of all those involved. He acknowledged that the number of roles where the respondent would need accommodation was significant. He concluded that the respondent was not medically fit for the position of SNA.

Consultation

[59] At the Labour Court hearing, the principal of the school testified that she did not consider allocating the respondent's duties among other SNAs. In her view, it would be difficult to relieve the respondent from some of her duties, and the respondent could return to work only if she was able to perform all the duties of an SNA, with assistance or otherwise. She expressed this view to Dr. Madden.

The areas of concern

[60] At this point, it is convenient to re-address the two areas in the determination where the parties express concern with the Labour Court's general approach. The respondent's concern is shorter and may be addressed first.

(a) Contact with the NCSE

[61] The minutes of the school board of management of 15 December 2011 indicated that, as part of the process, the school principal telephoned the Department of Education, and then the NCSE as funding authority, to inquire about "the feasibility of funding for a floating SNA". The minutes stated that, in this phone call, Marie Clifford, the NCSE official, stated the authority would not approve funding for an SNA, because "the NCSE appoints staff for pupils with disabilities, and not for adults". Thereafter, the board sent a letter to the respondent dated 27 December 2011, informing the respondent that she was medically unfit for the position of special needs assistant, and declining her request to return to work.

[62] The school principal accepted that the decision was made without any consultation or input from the respondent. In turn, the respondent accepted that her disability would prevent her from undertaking every one of the tasks normally associated with an SNA. After the school's decision was made known, and after she brought a claim to the Equality Tribunal, the school agreed to provide her with inspection facilities for an expert, but no such inspection took place.

An unresolved issue?

[63] In its determination, the Labour Court recorded that it had difficulty in discerning the meaning of the evidence concerning the NCSE. Counsel for the school makes the case that Ms. Clifford must have understood and appreciated the questions she was being asked. The respondent submits otherwise. But the Labour Court that heard the evidence noted that the official, Ms. Clifford, had not been called to give evidence, and considered the minuted record of the board meeting as "somewhat puzzling", and that there was never any suggestion that the respondent should work with adults (see p. 32 of the determination). The Labour Court went on to hold that, in fact, it was for the board of management to make its own assessment of the reasonableness and proportionality of the form of accommodation that was needed. It concluded that apart from seeking an opinion of the NCSE, there was no evidence that the board had ever independently considered that question. The determination found that the board was influenced in its decision by Dr. Madden's conclusion that the respondent was medically unfit to return to work on the understanding that the school would not, or could not, make the necessary adjustments in work organisation to accommodate the respondent, and to allow her to return to work part-time in a part-time secretarial role.

[64] In the Court of Appeal, Ryan P. commented, at para. 32, p. 269, that the Labour Court and High Court appeared to have some difficulty in "deciphering" the "shorthand message" conveyed by the official, whom the judgment erroneously identified as a male. The meaning of this minute was obviously a significant issue. But its true significance could have been explained if Ms. Clifford had been available to explain what her response meant. There might have been some significance in that the phone call did not appear to have been preceded by, or followed up with, any letter making a formal case to retain the respondent as a floating SNA, or in one or other of the capacities she had previously fulfilled. Seen in isolation, this might have possibly raised a question as to whether, under s. 16(3)(c) of the Act, the school had, in fact, taken real steps to identify "the financial and other costs" entailed by taking the "measure" of employing the respondent as a floating SNA, or "the possibility of obtaining public funding or other assistance" for such a proposal (cf. s.16(3)(c)(i) and (ii) of the 1998 Act).

[65] In my opinion, this was potentially an issue of some importance, and, ideally, should not have been left without clarification. There was no evidence that Ms. Clifford was unavailable, or that documents from the NCSE were unobtainable. The issue went to the question as to whether the school had, in fact, explored the possibility of obtaining public funding, or other assistance (cf. s.16(3)(c)(iii)). But, ultimately, this view must be seen in light of the observations later in this judgment as to legal duties on employers under the section, and also in the light of the questions a bona fide employer should explore and resolve prior to making a decision.

(b) Omitted parts of Ms. McGrath's evidence

[66] But counsel for the school submitted that the Labour Court had failed to outline, or address, important evidence from Ms. McGrath. It is correct to say she had conducted the more comprehensive of the only two risk assessments which dealt with reasonable accommodation. Prior to the appeal to the High Court on a point of law, the school applied for discovery of documentation relating to the record of evidence given during the course of the Labour Court hearing. It did not accept that the determination accurately reflected Ms. McGrath's oral evidence. The Labour Court voluntarily provided notes taken by the registrar's secretary.

[67] The Labour Court determination recorded Ms. McGrath as testifying, first, that she never considered furnishing the respondent with a draft report for comment before it was presented to the school; second, that the school should consider reallocating or reorganising tasks among SNAs so as to relieve the respondent from the requirement of the tasks she could not perform; and, third, that the respondent could "work with moderately disabled children".

[68] But the school's case is that this was a selective recounting of the evidence which, taken out of its context, suggested that the position was capable of being reorganised, and that the respondent would have been capable of working in the school in such a reorganised position. Counsel submits that by recording only part of Ms. McGrath's evidence, to the effect that the respondent could work with more moderately disabled children, the determination conveyed the erroneous impression that this was all Ms. McGrath had to say in relation to the respondent's ability and capacity to work as an SNA in the school. What follows is not disputed by the respondent

[69] Counsel for the school submits the Labour Court determination did not record the fact that Ms. McGrath already knew the respondent, and was familiar with the situation prior to being engaged with the school, despite the fact that this had been outlined at the outset of her evidence. It is said that, when Ms. McGrath indicated she had not appreciated prior to the assessment how demanding the role of an SNA was, she had also said that to perform the tasks associated with the role, a person needed to be able bodied. Counsel points out that, after she observed the respondent in the sensory integration room, Ms. McGrath approached the other SNA who expressed concerns to her that the respondent would not be able properly to assist the other SNA whilst in the room. Counsel submits that, in considering whether or not the respondent was suitable to perform the role of an SNA, Ms. McGrath had concluded that a person performing that role needed to be physically able, and that, having considered everything, she did not believe that the environment in the school was safe for the respondent, and that it was not possible to allow her to perform the role of SNA. It appears that, in response to the Chairman's question, Ms. McGrath had, in fact, testified that it was not possible to accommodate the respondent within the school, and had said that the level of dependency of the children in the school was too high, so that the respondent would be unable to manage. Furthermore, it is said the Labour Court did not accurately reflect Ms. McGrath's views in relation to the issue of a "floating SNA", a position which she acknowledged did not exist. Counsel submits that, in fact, Ms. McGrath certified that, having considered the matter, the respondent was not suitable for this type of role within the school either.

[70] Counsel submits that no account had been taken of the evidence that Ms. McGrath gave that the respondent was no longer capable of taking on the role of an SNA, and that the role of an SNA in the school was a most physically demanding role. Finally, it is said that, again in response to questioning, Ms. McGrath had testified that the respondent could not work as an SNA in an reorganised environment with the school, and that the role could not, in fact, be reorganised to accommodate the respondent.

[71] Counsel for the school points out that the respondent did not adduce any contradictory expert evidence. She submits that the determination did not record that Ms. McGrath had listed a series of "core functions" which the respondent was not capable of performing, irrespective of adaptations or specialist equipment being provided by the school. It is said this, too, was at odds with the account of Ms. McGrath's evidence set out in the Labour Court's determination.

[72] The school's objection in principle, therefore, was that highly relevant uncontradicted expert testimony was omitted, and had not been reflected in the Labour Court findings of fact. Counsel submitted this error was so egregious that no reasonable administrative tribunal could ever have come to the same conclusion when faced with the same testimony.

[73] Counsel for the school refers to the fact that, on the appeal, the High Court tended to be dismissive of the documentation which was provided in order to demonstrate the discrepancies in the Labour Court determination, and of the notes of the omitted evidence.

(c) The effect of the omitted evidence

[74] The Labour Court and its members perform a service of huge public value. The determination in this case is, in many respects, extremely thorough and meticulous. It contains an impressive outline of the developing case law, by highly experienced panel members, who drew the attention of the parties to the ECJ judgment in HK Danmark v. Dansk almennyttigt Boligselskab (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11) [2013] I.C.R. 851. But there is no doubt significant and relevant evidential material was not recorded or evaluated.

[75] A tribunal, or other decision-maker which is under a duty to give reasons for its decision, should, as part of this process, give some outline of the relevant facts and evidence upon which the reasoning is based. This does not in any sense, mean that a determination must set out all of the evidence; but it should set out such evidential material which is fundamentally relevant to its decision or determination; still more if such relevant evidence is not disputed. Obviously, the test as to the issue of materiality must be fact-specific, and dependent on the circumstances.

[76] There is already a rich and evolved jurisprudence on the duty of deciding bodies to give reasons, developed from the early days of Pok Sun Shum v. Ireland [1986] I.L.R.M. 593 to The State (Daly) v. Minister for Agriculture [1987] I.R. 165; International Fishing Vessels Ltd. v. Minister for Marine [1989] I.R. 149; and Mallak v. Minister for Justice [2012] IESC 59, [2012] 3 I.R. 297. It is also necessary to consider the statutory provision in question, and the general context. The statutory duty under which the Labour Court operated provides that, on request, it should set out a statement of "why" it reached its determination (cf. s. 88(1) of the 1998 Act). The omission to set out the omitted details of Ms. McGrath's evidence has added significance, not least because of the otherwise comprehensive nature of the Labour Court determination. Parties to a decision are entitled to know why they have won or lost, as a matter of fair procedure, and in order to decide whether to appeal. But parties are also entitled to be assured that, in making a decision, an administrative or curial tribunal has had regard to very relevant evidence which arguably had the potential to be potentially determinative of an issue, if not the claim, before it.

[77] It is abundantly clear that not part, but all, of Ms. McGrath's evidence played a significant role in the Court of Appeal decision. What was omitted was relevant. Evidence to the effect that the respondent was unable to perform any of the core functions of the job, that she could not work as an SNA in a reorganised environment, and that the role could not be rearranged to accommodate the respondent, should have been recorded and addressed. I do not say this would have determined the outcome. But alone, or taken in conjunction with the unresolved NCSE issue, this unfortunate omission can only lead to the conclusion that the determination did not fulfil its primary statutory role, and did not determine the complaint in accordance with relevant evidence. Put simply, by not addressing this relevant evidence, the Labour Court did not fulfil its statutory duty. How, in my view, this should be remedied is discussed later.

(d) The determination of the Labour Court: further observations

[78] The determination included an outline of evidence from the respondent, her husband, the school principal, and deputy principal, and the principal of another special school, as well as Dr. David Madden, as well as what was included in the account of Ms. McGrath's evidence. The determination considered legal analysis, based on Irish, English and EU judgments, including HK Danmark v. Dansk almennyttigt Boligselskab (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11) [2013] I.C.R. 851, which was considered in order to resolve any ambiguity in s. 16 of the 1998 Act, by reference to the Directive. There is reference, too, to the well-known decision of Marleasing SA v. La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA (Case C-106/89) [1990] E.C.R. I-4135. The Labour Court considered the recitals in the Framework Directive had been taken into account by the drafters of the statute, and, therefore, assisted in the process of interpretation. There was considerable focus on decided case law, perhaps in preference to a more straightforward and precise process of applying the words of s. 16 of the 1998 Act. As the judgment seeks to explain, the meaning of s. 16 can be seen within its own terms, and simply by legislative intention, rather than by having to resort to a more sophisticated approach.

(e) A freestanding obligation?

[79] The Labour Court ultimately concluded that the respondent was entitled to succeed on the basis that the board of management had failed to discharge a statutory duty under s. 16 to take adequate measures to provide the respondent with reasonable accommodation so as to allow her to continue in employment. The determination did not find that the respondent was competent to carry out the duties of a SNA. It concluded, rather, that the school had a duty fully to consider the viability of a reorganisation of work and a redistribution of tasks among all SNAs, so as to relieve the respondent of those duties which she was unable to carry out. It observed that it might have transpired that it was not possible to make the necessary adaptations.

[80] However, it concluded that, in circumstances where the school had failed to carry out such exploration, this, in itself, constituted a failure in its statutory duty. The determination observed that the school's response to the position was based on the belief that its duty was confined to providing the respondent with such accommodation as might enable her to undertake the full range of tasks expected from an SNA. But it observed that, regrettably, no amount of accommodation could produce that result. The determination concluded that the school had construed its duty too narrowly and had taken a mistaken view of what the law required in the prevailing circumstances, including the viability of a reorganisation of work, and distribution of tasks.

[81] Referring to Humphries v. Westwood Fitness Club [2004] E.L.R. 296, the Labour Court also observed that the school might reasonably have sought input from the respondent herself and her trade union before making its decision. Consideration might have been given to returning the respondent with modified duties for a trial basis. The determination held that the school had not given any real consideration to those possibilities, and that it was impossible to speculate as to what the outcome might have been if the school's board of management had given proper and adequate consideration to these or any other options that the respondent might have advanced if given the opportunity to make submissions in defence of her position. The school might have concluded that these were or were not viable or reasonable and proportionate in the circumstances prevailing. The determination also observed that it was significant that the school had not considered offering the respondent a renewal of her secretarial role.

[82] In the Court of Appeal, at para. 62, p. 271, Ryan P. strongly criticised the Labour Court's conclusion that there could be a "freestanding" obligation on an employer to carry out an evaluation of all the available options, irrespective of the fundamental question of whether the employee is actually capable of doing the job. He held there was a duty on the Labour Court to answer this fundamental question in the context of the facts of the case as adduced in evidence, not as an abstract proposition. As this judgment seeks to explain later, put in this way, the criticism has some force. This is a case brought under s. 16 of the 1998 Act. The purpose of the 1998 Act is to promote equality between employed persons, and to remove discrimination connected with employment. An obligation is not freestanding, and failure of compliance will not, in itself, give rise to a right to compensation. The effect of a "failure in that obligation" must be considered within the framework of s. 16 of the 1998 Act seen as a whole. Insofar as the respondent's case might suggest there is a freestanding obligation in this situation, I must reject that proposition as a matter of law. I expand on my reasons later.

(f) The basis for the compensation award

[83] There is a further issue: the appropriate form of redress was compensation in the maximum sum of €40,000. But how or why this particular sum was arrived at is unclear. The determination does not specify under which sub-heading of s. 82(4) it comes. The reasoning in the determination moves from a heading "Outcome" to that of "Redress", five lines later, without any explanation as to how this particular compensation sum was arrived at. In my view, as a matter of fair procedures, parties are entitled to be provided with an appropriate level of reasoning and definitions for the level of compensation. This is a protection against any accusation of an arbitrary or capricious decision-making. I do not say that the decision here comes within that category, but there should be some established, rational, connection between the level of compensation awarded, and the circumstances of the case, including the outcome. This is, a fortiori, true in the highly unusual circumstance here where, apparently, as the Labour Court determination recited, at p. 6, the respondent had never actually received a P45 from the school, and that she had been informed that the Department of Education still regarded her as being employed. This incongruity, and its possible consequences for the claim, were not explored.

Conclusions on the determination

[84] For all these reasons, I am unable to conclude that the determination by the Labour Court, as it stands, complies with s. 88(1) of the 1998 Act. Justice must be seen to be done. Part of that process must be that a deciding tribunal is seen to engage with the relevant evidence, and, in its decision, address it one way or another within the prism of the applicable law. When an award is made, there should be some explanation of the basis for the award, as compared to any other sum.

Interpretation and application to this case

[85] Reduced to its essentials, the interpretation issue as applied here could, at one level, be characterised as to whether s. 16(1) is to be seen as subject to s. 16(3), or vice versa. The terms of the section have been set out earlier. Section 16(1) sets out a premise. This is that an employer is not required to retain an individual in a position, if that person is no longer fully competent, and available to undertake the duties attached to that position, having regards to the conditions under which the duties are to be performed. But the effect of the terminology of s. 16(3) is unavoidable. It carves out an exception. It provides that, for the purposes of the 1998 Act, which includes the entirety of s. 16, a person with a disability is to be seen as fully competent to undertake any duties, if they would be so competent on reasonable accommodation. Thus, if a person with a disability can be reasonably accommodated, they are to be deemed as capable of performing the job as if they had no disability; subject to the condition that reasonable accommodation should not impose a disproportionate burden on the employer; including an assessment of the financial and other costs involved, the scale and financial resources of the employer, and the possibility of obtaining public funding or other assistance. But s. 16(3)(b) explicitly identifies the mandatory primary duty of an employer. He or she shall take appropriate measures where needed in a particular case to enable a disabled person to have access to employment, to participate and advance in employment, and to undergo training, unless these measures would impose a disproportionate burden. Section 16(4) then goes on to identify what appropriate measures should be taken. Although the definition is somewhat repetitive and circular, what is identified are effective and practical measures, where needed in a particular place, to adapt the employer's place of business, including the premises, equipment, patterns of working time, and distribution of tasks, or the provision of training or integration resources, but does not include any treatment facility or thing that the person might ordinarily or reasonably provide for himself or herself.

[86] In my view, the term "distribution of tasks" must be read in a manner which is consistent with the entirety of s. 16, and the purpose of the Act. If it is arguably ambiguous, it should be given an interpretation that reflects the plain intention of the Oireachtas, which can be determined from the Act as a whole (see s. 5 of the Interpretation Act 2005). Seen from the perspective of legislation, it could not have been the intention of the legislature to create a situation where, by deploying the term "tasks" to divide up the term "duties", an employer could effectively render an employee's duty incapable of performance. That would defeat the purpose of the 1998 Act, which is to achieve equality. It is arguable also that this would allow an employer to unlawfully "classify" a post in a discriminatory way (see s. 8(1)(e)).

[87] The Court of Appeal reversed the High Court judgment, and set aside the Labour Court determination, thereby allowing the decision of the Equality Officer to stand. The court did not consider it necessary to remit the case to the Labour Court, which is the forum charged with evaluating evidence. Both judgments of the Court of Appeal make references to the term "core duties", but no such distinction is to be found in the 1998 Act. One would have thought that if it was the intention of the legislature to identify the words "core duties" as creating some form of separate category, it would have been simple to do so. Similarly, the term "essential functions" does not occur in the section.

[88] Moreover, the distribution of some of the respondent's duties, in order to require her to do more of that which she could do, would not necessarily mean that she was not performing the duties of an SNA. The term "where needed" in a particular case, to adapt the employer's place of business to the disability (see s.16(4)(a)) must be read in the context of s. 16(4)(b), which provides that, without prejudice to the "generality" (that is, to adapt the place of business where needed), there are also specific duties which include adapting premises, equipment, working patterns, or task distribution. The limitation contained in these sections is only that of disproportionally.

[89] But to imbue the word "tasks" with an artificial value, or as some form of interpretative "trump card", defeats the purpose of the section and the 1998 Act. At any level, to seek to distinguish between tasks and duties would pose real problems, as to how the distinction is to be made, and who should make it. In the case of the respondent, how many of the "task demands" set out in the table can be seen as entirely divorced from duties? In my opinion, very few, if any, of them.

Limitation

[90] This does not, of course, mean that the duty of accommodation is infinite, or at large. It cannot result in removing all the duties which a disabled person is unable to perform. Then, almost inevitably, it would become a "disproportionate burden". If no real distinction can be made between tasks and duties, there is no reason, in principle, why certain work duties cannot be removed or "stripped out". But this is subject to the condition it does not place a disproportionate burden on the employer. But to create a new job will almost inevitably raise the question as to whether what is in contemplation is a disproportionate burden. It is necessary to ensure that, even with reasonable accommodation, proper value is imported to the words of s. 16(1), to ascertain whether an employee is, or is not, "fully capable of undertaking … the duties" attached to the position. But it is hard to see there would be any policy or common good reason why simply the distribution of tasks, or their removal, should be confined only to those which are non-essential. The test must be one of fact, to be determined in accordance with the employment context, instances of which are as illustrated in s. 16(3). The test is one of reasonableness and proportionality: an employer cannot be under a duty entirely to re-designate or create a different job to facilitate an employee. It is, therefore, the duty of the deciding tribunal to decide, in any given case, whether what is required to allow a person employment is reasonable accommodation in the job, or whether, in reality, what is sought is an entirely different job. Section 16(1) of the 1998 Act refers specifically to the "position", not to an alternative and quite different position.

[91] But I am forced to agree with counsel for the respondent: he is correct in saying the Court of Appeal "read in" words and intent to s. 16, which are simply not to be found there. Thus, when, at para. 54, p. 269, Ryan P. observed that the fundamental proviso in s. 16(1) "must be respected", this was, to my mind, to misunderstand the section. Neither the 1998 Act, nor the Framework Directive (were it necessary to refer to it), requires full competence, seen in isolation. Ryan P. was of the view that s. 16 required that there be full competence as to the tasks that are the essence of the position, otherwise s. 16(1), is rendered ineffective. I differ from this view: to the contrary, full competence is, rather, to be assessed as contingent upon there having been reasonable accommodation and appropriate measures.

[92] It is unnecessary to resort to the judgment of the CJEU in HK Danmark v. Dansk almennyttigt Boligselskab (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11) [2013] I.C.R. 851, or the Framework Directive, though all of these support the interpretation. But the analysis can be confined to the words of the section. The words of s. 16(3) provide that a person will be seen as fully competent if they would be fully competent on reasonable accommodation. Those terms, too, have meaning. They must be seen as being included in the legislative intention that what is contained in s. 16(1) can only be seen or understood in the context of what is provided for in s. 16(3) of the 1998 Act. Section 16(3) is not peripheral – it is fundamental to understanding the section. This conclusion, based on the words of the section alone, as it happens, accords with any interpretation of the section by reference to the reasoning of the ECJ in HK Danmark v. Dansk almennyttigt Boligselskab (Joined Cases C-335/11 and C-337/11). But this does not mean that s. 16(1) of the 1998 Act is irrelevant.

[93] It follows, therefore, that I am constrained to express respectful disagreement with the judgments of the Court of Appeal. The judgment of Ryan P., which forms part of the ratio, laid much emphasis on the evidence in the case, and carried out a careful consideration of Ms. McGrath's report. That evidence in its entirety cannot be ignored.

Issues addressed in the Court of Appeal [2018] IECA 11, [2018] E.L.R. 249

(a) Contact with the NCSE

[94] But the judgment also referred to the telephone contacts made with the NCSE. Ryan P. set out the school principal had followed up the floating SNA idea by contacting that body, but the proposal had not been approved.

Ryan P. observed that the official who had dealt with the request was named in the Labour Court, so that the school was specific as to the refusal of funding. Perhaps so, but this was unclear, and was not solely a matter for the school.

[95] The duty laid down under s. 16(3)(c)(iii) is mandatory. An employer is to explore "the possibility of obtaining public funding or other assistance". To my mind, the making of a phone call, where there was a potential for there having been a misunderstanding, required more. I do not think it could be held to be satisfied simply by making a phone call, where arguably there was misunderstanding (see para. 17.105, p. 287, in Purdy, Equality Law in the Workplace (Bloomsbury Professional, 2015), which refers to the existence of the government employment retention grant scheme for employers). This court has not been given any reason why such issues could not have been clarified further in the Labour Court.

(b) Consultation with co-employees

[96] Ryan P. also observed the principal should not be criticised for not approaching the other SNAs to take on physical aspects of the job. He held that the school had a decision to make about the respondent's capacity to work as an SNA. In his view, the principal was not required to canvass the other SNAs whether they would be willing to take on the work that the respondent could not do; even if they were willing, the principal and the board would still have had a decision to make. It would not have been sufficient to have a majority vote of the SNAs.

[97] Again, I think this conclusion did not have sufficient regard to the fact that the terms of the section are mandatory. They place a duty on the employer to show that if they have not carried out such a process, then it is only because the reorganisation necessary would be disproportionate or unduly burdensome. What is essential is that it be shown, objectively, that the employer has, in fact, given the question of redistribution full consideration.

[98] Ryan P. went on to observe that even if there could have been redistribution of some non-essential tasks, this was based on a mistaken premise, flowing from s. 16(1), as to the need for full capability. It is clear the reasoning in the judgments proceeds upon the basis that consideration of redistribution should only be of non-essential tasks. For the reasons outlined earlier, that is to introduce a new test, and new words, into the Act.

(c) Evaluation

[99] Addressing a "duty to consult", Ryan P. rejected, at para. 62, p. 271, in very firm terms, the proposition that there was a "freestanding obligation on an employer to carry out an evaluation, irrespective of the other circumstances of the case and without regard to the fundamental question as to whether the employee is actually capable of doing the job". He concluded, at para. 63, p. 271, that as practical adjustments cannot be made as objectively evaluated, the fact that the process of decision is flawed does not avail the employee. He rejected the proposition that the section, in terms, made the process of inquiry a ground of default, or that a failure to consult constituted a breach of the duty imposed. He commented at para. 62, p. 271, that this was "starkly stated" by the Labour Court, as a matter of law. This alleged failure was ultimately the basis for its conclusion that the respondent was entitled to compensation, on the basis that the employer had failed in its duty under the Act to make reasonable accommodation. Ryan P. concluded at para. 63, p. 271, there was nothing in s. 16 to justify a rule that there should be adequate consideration, absent which, an employer could not form a bona fide belief that measures to be taken were impossible, unreasonable, or disproportionate. He considered the proposal to create a floating SNA position was to create an entirely new position. Ryan P. went on to conclude, at para. 64, p. 272, that the central reality of the case was that the respondent was "unable to perform the essential tasks of a special needs assistant in this particular school". In his view, no accommodations could change that, unfortunately. In his view, the Labour Court had wrongly concluded that the obligation of the employer was to strip away things the respondent could not do, and then to ask whether she was able to perform the essential tasks that remained. He concluded, at para. 64, p. 272, that this discounted the consideration which the school gave to the new position arising from Ms. McGrath's report, and was erroneous.

[100] Finlay Geoghegan J. expressed similar views, in particular emphasising the distinction she perceived between the terms "tasks" and "duties". She considered at para. 30, p. 279, that the duty of the employer was only to consider a distribution of certain tasks. That duty would depend on the facts, and, in particular, whether the tasks in question were, or were not, all the tasks demanded of a particular duty attached to the position in question.

[101] Here I must respectfully differ. The duty to reasonably accommodate, or to take appropriate measures, where needed, is laid down in s. 16(3), in order for a person with a disability to have "access to employment", unless the measure would impose a disproportionate burden on the employer. The matters to which a decider should have regard in this connection include those outlined in s. 16(3)(c), including financial and other costs, etc. Finlay Geoghegan J. considered that the duty of an employer did not extend to considering the removal from a position or job of a duty, or duties, which might properly be considered a main duty, or an essential function of the position concerned, by the redistribution of all tasks demanded by that duty. But there is no such distinction in the section.

[102] As explained earlier, the term "distribution of tasks" to be found in s. 16(4)(b) is illustrative in nature. It must give way to the words in the main part of the section. The word "duty" or "duties" occurs five times in the section; "tasks" just once. An illustration cannot control the language of the section, although at times it may be a guide. It should not curtail or expand the meaning of the section. It does not derogate, or subtract, from the more general duty to be found in s. 16(4)(a) to provide "effective and practical measures", where needed in a particular case, to adapt the place of business to the disability concerned. The subsection is not to be interpreted as undermining or eroding the main purpose set out in s. 16(3)(a) which is to hold that a person with a disability is fully competent to undertake any duties, if they would be so competent and capable on reasonable accommodation being provided by the employer, provided that it is not disproportionate. The term "essential functions" is not to be found in the 1998 Act. What is required by s. 16, read in its entirety, is that consideration be given to distribution of essential duties, as part of a reasonable accommodation.

[103] Again, standing back from the facts of this case, a want of clarity, or vagueness, or imprecision, on this duty might permit employers to themselves categorise elements of a job as being "duties", rather than "tasks", thereby limiting the obligation to consider reorganisation of the way in which the work was done. I am unable, therefore, to agree with Finlay Geoghegan J.'s observations at para. 20, p. 270, that s. 16(1) contained a limitation, to the effect that nothing in the 1998 Act should be construed as requiring any person to retain an individual, if that individual is no longer competent or available to undertake the duties attached to the position. Section 16(1) is not freestanding, it is subject to s. 16(3).

[104] Finally, it should be noted that the Court of Appeal found, at para. 63, p. 271, that there was no justification for the rule outlined in the Circuit Court decision of Humphries v. Westwood Fitness Club [2004] 15 E.L.R. 296. In Humphries v. Westwood Fitness Club, Dunne J., then a judge of the Circuit Court, held that, in order to form a bona fide belief that a claimant was not fully capable of performing the duties for which she was employed, a respondent employer would normally be required to make adequate inquiries to establish fully the factual position in relation to the claimant's capacity. The nature of the inquiries would depend on the circumstances, but would, at minimum, involve looking at medical evidence to determine the level of impairment arising from the disability, and its duration. If it was apparent that the employee was not fully capable, the school was required, under s. 16(3), to consider what, if any, special treatment or facilities might be available, by which the employee could become fully capable, and account was to be taken of the cost of such facilities or treatment. But Dunne J. went on to hold that such an inquiry could only be regarded as adequate if the employee concerned was allowed a full opportunity to participate at each level, and, on the facts of that case, to present relevant medical evidence, and submissions.

[105] Ryan P. considered Humphries v. Westwood Fitness Club [2004] E.L.R. 296 at para. 63, p. 271, in the light of subsequent English case law (see Mid Staffordshire General Hospitals NHS Trust v. Cambridge [2003] I.R.L.R. 566; R. (Davey) v. Oxfordshire County Council [2017] EWCA Civ 1308, [2018] P.T.S.R. 281; Muzi-Mabaso v. Commissioners for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs [2016] EWCA Civ 1369, (Unreported, Court of Appeal of England and Wales, 27 October 2016); Burnip v. Birmingham City Council [2012] EWCA Civ 629, [2012] L.G.R. 954; A.H. v. West London Mental Health Trust and Secretary of State for Justice [2011] UKUT 74, (Unreported, United Kingdom Upper Tribunal (Administrative Appeals Chamber), 17 February 2011); Tarbuck v. Sainsbury's Supermarkets Ltd. [2006] I.R.L.R. 664, to which might be added Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police v. Jelic [2010] I.R.L.R. 744, and Royal Bank of Scotland v. Ashton [2011] I.C.R. 632. In his view, a statutory duty was "objectively" concerned with whether the employer complied with an obligation to make reasonable accommodation. In this State, however, our courts have always attached importance to fair procedures where employment is at stake (see Bolger v. Showerings (Ireland) Ltd. [1990] E.L.R. 184, and the recent judgment of Ní Raifeartaigh J. in Dublin Bus v. McKevitt [2018] IEHC 78, [2018] E.L.R. 193).

[106] I respectfully disagree with the Court of Appeal's conclusion on this issue, but I do not go so far as to say there is a mandatory duty of consultation with an employee in each and every case; the section does not provide for this, still less does it provide for compensation simply for the absence of consultation in an employment situation. But, even as a counsel of prudence, a wise employer will provide meaningful participation in vindication of his or her duty under the 1998 Act. But absence of consultation cannot, in itself, constitute discrimination under s. 8 of the 1998 Act.

[107] But I would again wish to emphasise these conclusions are not to be understood as requiring a situation where the duty of an employer is understood as having to provide an entirely different job. The duty of accommodation is not an open-ended one. There is no obligation to redefine the employment of an airline pilot as an airline steward, or vice versa. The question is, rather, to consider whether the degree of redistribution, or "accommodation", is such as to effectively create a different job entirely, which would almost inevitably impose a disproportionate burden on an employer. Even within the scope of compliance, a situation may be reached where the degree of rearrangements necessary, whether by allocation of tasks, or otherwise, might be such as to be disproportionate. It is a matter of degree, capable of being determined objectively.

A final issue: s. 16(1)

[108] Once consultation, or other necessary steps for compliance, have been taken, an employing entity may have to ask itself the ultimate question whether, having explored the modes of accommodation, and if, prudently having consulted with an employee, the position, as defined in s. 16(1) is, in fact, capable of adaptation so as to accommodate that claimant, and whether the claimant would be capable of performing that function thus adapted. But it is that "position" or job, not another one. If there is a challenge to this decision, this must be assessed objectively by the tribunal vested with the statutory duty of carrying out such an inquiry, and also vested with the expertise to carry out such assessment. If, on reasonable accommodation, a claimant is unable to fully undertake the duties attached to the position, then the 1998 Act provides there can be no finding of discrimination.

The High Court judgment [2015] IEHC 785

[109] In other circumstances, it might be that the decision of the High Court could then stand in place of that of the Court of Appeal. Regrettably, I cannot reach such a desirable conclusion, which would at least bring an end to this litigation. While there are significant areas of the legal reasoning where I find myself in respectful agreement with Noonan J., one cannot ignore the factual lacuna which arose in this case. In the High Court, Noonan

J. referred to the decision of this court in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34, where Hamilton C.J. observed that courts should be slow to interfere with decisions of expert administrative tribunals, save where the conclusions were based on an identifiable error of law, or unsustainable finding of fact. Noonan J. concluded he should be slow to interfere with the determination on that reasoning. I do not think Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare is the last word on this issue.

[110] But in the Attorney General v. Davis [2018] IESC 27, [2018] 2 I.R. 357, there is to be found a convenient summary of the present law, which is somewhat more nuanced than the judgment in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34. In a detailed judgment, McKechnie J., speaking for the court, at para. 55, p. 386, identified what may be regarded as issues of law which may be considered on a case stated. These included (i) findings of primary fact where there is no evidence to support them; (ii) findings of primary fact which no reasonable decision-making body could make; (iii) inferences or conclusions which are unsustainable by reason of any one or more of the matters listed above; or which could not follow or be deducible from the primary findings as made; or which were based on an incorrect interpretation of documents. If not included in that category, I would add a determination which is ultra vires, where there is a failure of statutory duty. Undoubtedly, deference is due to an administrative tribunal acting within the scope of its duty. But, when there is a substantial failure of compliance with that statutory duty, a court must intervene. The determination did not comply with the statutory duty laid down in the Act.

[111] It is a most unfortunate fact that this case has now been considered and analysed in some detail by five different tribunals, but there is now only one course available in my view.

Remedy

[112] The question of remedy is constrained by the fact that the approach adopted in each earlier legal forum was erroneous. The court is faced with a series of invidious choices. But this does not mean that the situation is entirely beyond remedy. While the Labour Court determination did not comply with the statute, what occurred can, in fact, and in law, be addressed. But, to my mind, it can only be remedied by remitting the appeal to the legal forum charged under the statute with evaluating the evidence in accordance with law – and applying the law to the facts. There are some issues yet be determined; which, in my opinion, can only be determined by the Labour Court itself. In this way, statutory compliance can be achieved. This court should not act as a surrogate Labour Court, which is charged with carrying out a statutory function. Regrettably, therefore, it seems that the only appropriate order is to remit the matter to the Labour Court for further consideration in accordance with the totality of the evidence adduced, together with such further limited evidence as may be necessary, and the law, as explained in this judgment. This court should not, in my view, seek to pre-empt, or short-circuit, that process. But the decision of the Labour Court must address the legal principles applicable in light of the full evidence. The Labour Court is under a statutory duty to carry out its function in accordance with the law enacted by the Oireachtas. This duty can result in having to make difficult decisions, as well as easy ones. It is to be hoped, however, that whatever ultimate conclusion is arrived at, based on an appreciation of the full factual background, and on a correct interpretation of the law, will bring an end to this overlong litigation.

What the Labour Court must address

[113] The issues which the Labour Court must address are:-

(a) the process of consultation with the NCSE; and

(b) the entirety of Ms. McGrath's evidence, and its legal consequences.

An ultimate legal question, however, is the extent to which it can be said that, even with reasonable accommodation, the respondent can return to the position of an SNA. That is what s. 16(1) provides for in this type of case. If it arises, the court will have to provide a reasoned basis for any award of compensation, having regard to the principles of rationality and proportionality, and the respondent's employment status. The scope of the inquiry is limited to whether the respondent was, in fact, the subject of unlawful discrimination, and, if so, what was the precise nature of that discrimination.

[114] The respondent obviously carried out her work to everyone's satisfaction prior to her accident. Her situation will inevitably attract much sympathy. The issues are important for employees who are disabled, but also for employers, who must know their duties. The fact that this case has not been otherwise resolved to date reflects the fact that the legal issues are not easy ones. The order proposed does not imply that there must be any predetermined outcome in the Labour Court's reconsideration. Ultimately, the duty of the Labour Court is to make a determination on the entire facts, by applying the law as enacted. The scope of the renewed hearing will inevitably be narrow. Other than these limited areas identified, no new issues can be introduced by either side. That would be to create an injustice. I would, therefore, propose that the appeal against the Court of Appeal order be allowed, and that the specific matters arising be remitted to the Labour Court for further consideration.

Dunne J.

[115] I agree with MacMenamin J.

Charleton J.

[116] The purpose of this judgment is to indicate the reasons for partly assenting in the analysis of MacMenamin J. but to also dissent as to the result proposed.

[117] Having suffered a dreadful accident in July 2010, the respondent's job in Nano Nagle School in Tralee, County Kerry, was held open for her. She is a qualified nurse and had worked there as a highly valued special needs assistant in a school which educates children with mild, moderate and severe disabilities. These include many children who have physical handicaps. After a long period of treatment and rehabilitation for a severed spine, and now using a wheelchair, the respondent sought to return to work. There was a serious engagement by the school in that process. To the regret of everyone, the decision was made that the nature of the work could not suit the respondent.

The legislation

[118] The 1998 Act has been much amended; including by the Equal Status Acts 2000 to 2004, the Equality Act 2004, the Civil Partnership and Certain Rights and Obligations of Cohabitants Act 2010, the Civil Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2011, the Education and Training Boards Act 2013, the Equality (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2015 and the Workplace Relations Act 2015. Central to the changes in the legislation is the drive by society to ensure that persons of varying ethnicity, language, religion, and orientation do not suffer from exclusion but are treated, as much as any majority, as valued members of the workforce and of society. This is part of an international and European drive to declare the value which is inherent in the dignity of all people and to combat discriminatory conduct. In this regard, the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities ("CRPD"), ratified by both the State and the European Union, is part of the necessary backdrop to this appeal. Article 27 of the Convention outlines the rights of persons with disabilities at work, which encompasses "the right to the opportunity to gain a living by work freely chosen or accepted in a labour market and work environment that is open, inclusive and accessible to persons with disabilities". State parties to the Convention have an obligation under this article to "safeguard and promote the realization of the right to work, including for those who acquire a disability during the course of employment" through measures such as reasonable accommodation and prohibition of discrimination. Directly relevant are Ireland's obligations under European law as expressed in EU Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, the Framework Directive. The Framework Directive prohibits employment discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation. It states in recital 16 that the provision of measures accommodating "the needs of disabled people at the workplace plays an important role in combating" such discrimination. The 1998 Act must be interpreted in the light of the Framework Directive. In turn, the Framework Directive requires to be seen in the light of the international obligations entered into by the European Union on ratifying the CRPD. Matters of interpretation cannot, however, change the clear wording of a statutory obligation. This is a line which the European Court of Justice declared cannot be crossed. In the joined cases of Pfeiffer v. Deutsches Rotes Kreuz, Kreisverband Waldshut eV. (Joined Cases C-397/01 to C-403/01) [2004] E.C.R. I-8835, the following observations were made by the court at pp. 8917 and 8918:-

> "111. It is the responsibility of the national courts in particular to provide the legal protection which individuals derive from the rules of Community law and to ensure that those rules are fully effective.
> 112. That is a fortiori the case when the national court is seised of a dispute concerning the application of domestic provisions which, as here, have been specifically enacted for the purpose of transposing a directive intended to confer rights on individuals. The national court must, in the light of the third paragraph of Article 249 EC, presume that the Member State, following its exercise of the discretion afforded it under that provision, had the intention of fulfilling entirely the obligations arising from the directive concerned (see [Wagner Miret v. Fondo de Grantía Salarial (Case C-334/92) [1993] E.C.R. I-6911], paragraph 20).

113. Thus, when it applies domestic law, and in particular legislative provisions specifically adopted for the purpose of implementing the requirements of a directive, the national court is bound to interpret national law, so far as possible, in the light of the wording and the purpose of the directive concerned in order to achieve the result sought by the directive and consequently comply with the third paragraph of Article 249 EC (see to that effect, inter alia, the judgments cited above in [Von Colson v. Land Nordrhein-Westfalen (Case C-14/83) [1984] E.C.R. 1891], paragraph 26; [Marleasing SA v. La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA (Case C-106/89) [1990] E.C.R. I-4135], paragraph 8, and [Faccini Dori v. Recreb Srl (Case C-91/92) [1994] E.C.R. 1-3325], paragraph 26; see also [BMW v. Deenik (Case C-63/97) [1999] E.C.R. I-905], paragraph 22; [Océano Grupo Editorial S.A. v. Murciano Quintero (Joined Cases C-240/98 to C-244/98) [2000] E.C.R. I-4941], paragraph 30; and [Adidas-Salomon AG v. Fitnessworld Trading Ltd. (Case C-408/01) [2003] E.C.R. I-2537], paragraph 21)."

[119] Section 2 of the 1998 Act defines disability as meaning:-

"(a) the total or partial absence of a person's bodily or mental functions, including the absence of a part of a person's body,
(b) the presence in the body of organisms causing, or likely to cause, chronic disease or illness,
(c) the malfunction, malformation or disfigurement of a part of a person's body,
(d) a condition or malfunction which results in a person learning differently from a person without the condition or malfunction, or
(e) a condition, illness or disease which affects a person's thought processes, perception of reality, emotions or judgement or which results in disturbed behaviour, and shall be taken to include a disability which exists at present, or which previously existed but no longer exists, or which may exist in the future or which is imputed to a person."

[120] Discrimination should not occur. That happens when persons with disabilities are excluded from work of which they are capable. Section 35 of the 1998 Act goes so far as to enable a person who cannot do a full shift of work, or a full week, to be engaged to do less than a person without a disability and for remuneration to be adjusted. Under s. 8 of the 1998 Act, discrimination is prohibited as regards "access to employment", "conditions of employment", "training or experience for or in relation to employment", "promotion or re-grading", or "classification of" employment posts. Section 6 of the 1998 Act provides that where "a person is treated less favourably than another person is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation on any of the grounds specified in subsection (2)", discrimination occurs. Declared as unacceptable to society are gender discrimination, civil status discrimination, family status discrimination, sexual orientation discrimination, religious discrimination, age discrimination for those over 18, disability discrimination, race discrimination, Irish Traveller Community discrimination, and discrimination because of pregnancy. Work of equal value must, under s. 7, be generally remunerated in an equal way. Advertisements containing discriminatory provisions are prohibited by s. 10 of the 1998 Act. Where contracts, and here the provision particularly concerns contracts related to employment, contain discriminatory terms, these are "null and void" under s. 9 of the 1998 Act. The provisions are equally applicable to men and women under s. 18 and both are entitled to equal remuneration under ss. 19 and 29.

[121] The legislation also provides at s. 16 that the imperative of the legislation is not to require "any person to recruit or promote an individual to a position, to retain an individual in a position, or to provide training or experience to an individual in relation to a position" where that individual cannot do the work, is not competent or qualified for the work, or will not do the work. That is specifically put in this way in s. 16(1) so that no employer, or prospective employer, or employment agency, is required to offer employment to, or continue in employment, or to search for employment for any individual who:-

> (b) is not (or, as the case may be, is no longer) fully competent and available to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, the duties attached to that position, having regard to the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed."

[122] This is not different to recital 17 of the Framework Directive which provides:-

[123] Both in the High Court and in the Court of Appeal in this case, and on this appeal, there was considerable discussion as to whether the anti-discrimination provisions in relation to disability in s. 16 of the 1998 Act ought to be construed on the basis that s. 16(1) is somehow dominant over the provision requiring reasonable accommodation for persons with disabilities in s. 16(3). All legislation is to be construed in accordance with an appropriate regard to other relevant provisions which provide the context for a proper interpretation. Sections 6 and 16 fit together to provide that while it is prohibited that "a person is treated less favourably than another person is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation" because of grounds ranging from disability to race, that does not mean that an employer is required to engage those who are not willing to do the work or are not "fully capable" of performing the work. Both are sides of the same coin. They go together. What is thus, for example, specifically provided for is that those seeking a person to play as principal flute in a symphony orchestra do not have to engage someone who plays only the piano but expresses a willingness to start learning the other instrument. Thus, whether the person is 40 years old or 80 years old, gay or straight, an Irish-speaking individual descended from Brian Boru or a recently arrived Russian, a Christian or a Jewish applicant, any can and should be chosen once selection for employment is on the basis of competence and willingness. The general and imperative provisions of the legislation are, however, so wide that in s. 16(5) the legislature has felt it necessary to declare that nothing in the Act is to be taken as "requiring an employer to recruit, retain in employment or promote an individual" where that "employer is aware, on the basis of a criminal conviction of the individual or other reliable information, that the individual engages, or has a propensity to engage, in any form of sexual behaviour which is unlawful". To bring home that qualification, s. 16(6) provides that this saver is particularly applicable "where the employment concerned involves access to minors or to other persons who are vulnerable". Thus, while an employer cannot discriminate, an employer is entitled and expected to choose people to fill posts on the basis of ability. A person can be able but have criminal propensities which may, and should on any commonsense basis, disqualify him or her.

[124] The thrust of the legislation is thus to outlaw in the workplace only the kind of discrimination based on bigotry, prejudice or racism. To discern that a particular individual is not committed to the work, or that that person lacks the competence for the work or the capability to tackle the work, is not to deny someone employment through unlawful discrimination. That is not to deny the legislation its nuances; but merely to attempt a summary. This legislation, after all, is directed to employers and to employment agencies. It is not directed to accountants or tax specialists or lawyers. Occluding the legislation with a legal mist of fine distinctions as between various terms for work or tasks and asking such questions as to core competencies and attempting a perfect definition of any particular form of employment in distinction from the commonsense and honest appraisal that the legislation clearly requires is to do a disservice to the human rights of disabled individuals and the thrust of the CRPD and of the Framework Directive. Hence, it is difficult to see distinctions in relation to any discernible differences between duties, functions and tasks, or core duties and responsibilities as helpful. Nor is it particularly useful to see disability as medical in nature. A person with a disability remains a person, an individual with human dignity who is required to be treated as such. Then the issue is as to how the workplace treats that person. The ideals in the CRPD are translated into practical measures through the Framework Directive and through the 1998 Act.

[125] In reality, every job is different. A person who has pursued a vocation in police work could usefully serve in a vast range of functions in such a huge and multi-faceted sphere of employment. Hence, whether on the beat, or acting as a crime analyst or detective or in administration, a police officer is part of a vast organisation where the specific skills of police work may be more or less needed and where people may be redeployed to tasks which require discretion to be exercised but which back up those at the front line. In some cases, an employer may be able to redeploy people from a very physical task to an area in administration. Thus, in Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police v. Jelic [2010] I.R.L.R. 744, a police officer was diagnosed with chronic anxiety syndrome. The English Employment Appeals Tribunal found that it would have been a reasonable adjustment to swap the jobs being undertaken by the claimant and another policeman, or to offer him re-employment in a civilian job within the police force which was being advertised at the relevant time. A person who lays bricks is different, because qualities such as a keen eye and physical strength backed by experience are there demanded. If someone is employed to build, losing those attributes through an accident means the loss of the trade. United Kingdom authorities including Archibald v. Fife Council [2004] UKHL 32, [2004] I.C.R. 954 and Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police v. Jelic suggest that redeployment is part of the duties of an employer in the United Kingdom under the relevant legislation in force at the time they were handed down: s. 6 of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 referred to the employer's duty to make adjustments including "transferring [a person] to fill an existing vacancy". This legislation has since been replaced by the UK Equality Act 2010. Sections 20, 21 and 22 of the 2010 Act impose a duty to make reasonable adjustments for disabled persons, but do not reference redeployment. The requirement to redeploy does not arise under the 1998 Act in this jurisdiction. Thus, such cases as cited above from the UK jurisdiction, would not carry the same imperative here. But even under that legislative model, not wishing to work directly with prisoners, as in Irish Prison Service v. A prison officer (EDA1837, Labour Court, 17 July 2018), or as in British Gas Services Ltd. v. McCaull [2001] I.R.L.R. 60, the necessity to have more than one operative, suggests a common sense interpretation of the legislation, and not one suffused with legal nuance.

[126] Hence, properly the focus is on the work. Again, this is not to be reduced to legal disputations. A job can best be seen by looking at what is involved on the ground. Seeing that job carried out through observation, or experience of that employment, can define the nature of a post much better than any contract of employment or any paper exercise. That was the approach in this case and that approach is right. This is a practical exercise.

[127] Leeway to a reasonable degree is to be afforded to disabled persons in order to enable them to do a job. As mandated by s. 16(3) of the 1998 Act, those with a disability are "fully competent to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking" a job on "reasonable accommodation … being provided by the person's employer". Examples may assist. A person putting together exhaust manifests in a car factory requires to be both highly mobile and very strong, since the items are both heavy and cumbersome, as well as skilful in welding. A physical incapacity coming about while holidaying during employment may mean inability to do the job. On the other hand, a person sitting at a work bench and assembling ignition systems for a car may just as easily do that job from a wheelchair. That person's place of work or access to a workbench may need sensible adjustment. All these assessments are fact-based and legal analysis is not the object of the legislation, the Framework Directive or the Convention. Returning to an earlier example: the principal flute in the symphony orchestra becomes disabled through an accident and is in a wheelchair. She is still a brilliant flautist with a golden tone but, to get on stage, she needs a ramp. To go on tour, a hoist or other measures are needed to get her on the bus. To be fully comfortable, a disabled toilet needs to have easy access to the ladies' dressing room in the rehearsal venue or concert hall. These are what the legislation refers to as appropriate measures. And the 1998 Act requires that every "employer shall take appropriate measures, where needed in a particular case, to enable a person who has a disability" to get to their place of work, to "to participate or advance in employment" or to obtain "training". Those steps must be taken "unless the measures would impose a disproportionate burden on the employer". What is proportionate or disproportionate descends into cost analysis based on "the financial and other costs entailed", the scale of the employer, the state of the employer's financial health and "the possibility of obtaining public funding or other assistance". Section 16(4) amounts to a reiteration in stating that what needs to be done, if it can reasonably be done, is to take "effective and practical measures, where needed in a particular case, to adapt the employer's place of business to the disability concerned". That can include "the adaptation of premises and equipment, patterns of working time, distribution of tasks or the provision of training or integration resources". Recital 20 of the Framework Directive is not contradictory of this analysis:-

> "Appropriate measures should be provided, i.e. effective and practical measures to adapt the workplace to the disability, for example adapting premises and equipment, patterns of working time, the distribution of tasks or the provision of training or integration resources."

[128] But, it is always a question of what can be done and whether it will really help that person who has a disability, or who has developed a disability while in the course of employment, to do their job. To go back to the example of the orchestral musician, if the disability is such as to destroy memory or concentration or ability to play at the top level, then as a matter of humanity, the employer may consider if it is possible to reassign. That is not a legal obligation. If the ability to be, as the 1998 Act says, "fully competent", with "reasonable accommodation" is not there, then there is no discrimination according to the legal definition if the person cannot do the work.

[129] Any analysis should focus on what happens on the ground. It is not appropriate for anybody charged with deciding employment matters to leave out large sections of a narrative given in good faith by an occupational therapist or doctor in order that a particular result may seem attractive. In that regard, the concerns expressed by MacMenamin J. are worrying. The test in the legislation is of full competence when reasonable accommodation is made. That test requires a plain analysis of the facts.

Remedy

[130] The appeal in this case was from the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission to the Labour Court. This reversed the finding of the former. That happened in circumstances of concern. The remedies available under s. 83 of the 1998 Act, following a hearing, are in practical terms those available already at first instance under s. 82. Hence, s. 82(1) provides:-

> "Subject to this section, the types of redress for which a decision of the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission under section 79 may provide are such one or more of the following as may be appropriate in the circumstances of the particular case:
> (a) an order for compensation in the form of arrears of remuneration (attributable to a failure to provide equal remuneration) in respect of so much of the period of employment as begins not more than 3 years before the date of the referral under section 77(1) which led to the decision;
>
> (b) an order for equal remuneration from the date referred to in paragraph (a);
>
> (c) an order for compensation for the effects of acts of discrimination or victimisation which occurred not earlier than 6 years before the date of the referral of the case under section 77;
>
> (d) an order for equal treatment in whatever respect is relevant to the case;
>
> (e) an order that a person or persons specified in the order take a course of action which is so specified;
>
> (f) an order for re-instatement or re-engagement, with or without an order for compensation."

[131] In turn, there are limitations as to monetary amounts. Thus, under s. 82(4):-

> "The maximum amount which may be ordered by the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission by way of compensation under subsection (1)(c) or (1)(f) shall be—
>
> (a) in any case where the complainant was in receipt of remuneration at the date of the reference of the case, or if it was earlier, the date of dismissal, an amount equal to the greatest of —
>
> (i) 104 times the amount of that remuneration, determined on a weekly basis,
>
> (ii) 104 times the amount, determined on a weekly basis, which the complainant would have received at that date but for the act of discrimination or victimisation concerned, or
> (iii) €40,000, or
> (b) in any other case, €13,000."

[132] Here, the award of the Labour Court was for €40,000. It was not that something specific be done or that the employment held open for the respondent in anticipation of a hoped-for recovery.

[133] Under s. 90 of the 1998 Act, upon a determination being made, either the Labour Court, or the parties, may "appeal to the High Court on a point of law" and the Labour Court may "if it thinks it appropriate, adjourn the appeal pending the outcome of the reference." Here, the errors of fact made in effectively rewriting the occupational therapy report amount to an error of law.

[134] On dismissal from employment for misconduct, a minimum form of fair procedures is required. Some contracts of employment may require more. Where ill-health is in issue then the principles laid out in Humphries v. Westwood Fitness Club [2004] E.L.R. 296 and Dublin Bus v. McKevitt [2018] IEHC 78, [2018] E.L.R. 193 apply. In Humphries v. Westwood Fitness Club, Dunne J. noted at pp. 300 and 301 the following in her analysis of s. 16 of the 1998 Act:-

> "This section, on which the respondent relies, can provide a complete defence to a claim of discrimination on the disability ground if it can be shown that the employer formed the bona fide belief that the claimant is not fully capable, within the meaning of the section, of performing the duties for which they are employed. However, before coming to that view the employer would normally be required to make adequate enquiries so as to establish fully the factual position in relation to the employee's capacity.
> The nature and extent of the enquiries which an employer should make will depend on the circumstances of each case. At a minimum, however, an employer, should ensure that he or she is in full possession of all the material facts concerning the employee's condition and that the employee is given fair notice that the question of his or her dismissal for incapacity is being considered. The employee must also be allowed an opportunity to influence the employer's decision."

[135] In Dublin Bus v. McKevitt [2018] IEHC 78, [2018] E.L.R. 193, Ní Raifeartaigh J. endorsed at para. 53, p. 206, the decision of Lardner J. in Bolger v. Showerings (Ireland) Ltd. [1990] E.L.R. 184, which held at p. 186 that where an employer wishes to dismiss an employee with poor health on grounds of incapacity, the onus is on them to show:-

(i) that it was the incapacity that was the reason for the dismissal;
(ii) the reason was substantial;
(iii) the employee received fair notice that the question of his dismissal for incapacity was being considered; and

(iv) the employee was afforded an opportunity of being heard.

[136] The decision not to start the respondent in employment was not due to any misconduct on her part. Procedural rights are thus not engaged in the sense of enabling the right to answer a charge of discreditable conduct. Instead, it was due to the unfortunate occurrence of the disability which the school realised could not enable it to employ the respondent as a special needs assistant. Certainly, had the board of the school sat down with the respondent and discussed the reports in this case, it may be that no case would ever have been taken. But, what was done, in giving the respondent an opportunity to consult with a doctor and to engage with every aspect of the case on the ground as to the effect which her disability had on the highly responsible and physically demanding work of a special needs assistant sufficed as a procedure. The legislation does not demand, and nor should this court impose, any further requirement such as one which demands some kind of procedure related to any scheme of accommodation that might be reached. It is for an employer to be open to the prospects for engagement and to consider what can in good faith be done.

Result

[137] On the papers before the court, there is nothing whereby the genuineness of either side could be doubted.

[138] The order of the Court of Appeal, perfected on 21 February 2018, was to "set aside the said determination of the Labour Court" and that the "award of compensation be vacated". That order should be upheld but on the narrow grounds herein explained.

BETWEEN:

LOUTH/MEATH EDUCATION AND TRAINING BOARD

APPLICANT/APPELLANT

THE EQUALITY TRIBUNAL

RESPONDENT

PEARSE BRANNIGAN

Judgment of Mr. Justice John MacMenamin dated the 13th day of July, 2016

1. The appellant now named in the title herein is the successor-in-title to the County of Louth Vocational Education Committee, the applicant, originally named in the proceedings. On occasion, therefore, this judgment contains references to the appellant as "the V.E.C.", where context or understanding so requires.

2. On the 24th July, 2009 the High Court, (McGovern J.), delivered judgment, dismissing the appellant's application for judicial review against the respondent ("the Tribunal"). The appellant appealed that judgment to this Court. It seeks to challenge what it claims was an unlawful decision on jurisdiction in an investigation conducted by Valerie Murtagh, an Equality Officer delegated by the Director of the Tribunal, under the Employment Acts, 1998 to 2004 ("the Acts").

3. The origins of the application lie in complaints to the respondent by the notice party, Pearse Brannigan (Mr. Brannigan). Mr. Brannigan was formerly employed as a teacher by the appellant. He complained of discrimination based on his sexual orientation. Ms. Murtagh, ("the Officer") was delegated to carry out an investigation concerning the complaints. She embarked on an investigation into issues raised by Mr. Brannigan concerning his former employment. Mr. Brannigan set out these complaints, first, in an initial 'EE1' form submitted to the Tribunal, and, later, in correspondence to that statutory body. The issue before the Court is as to parameters of that inquiry.

4. In the judicial review application, the appellant, among other claims, sought declarations to the effect that the Officer be limited to investigating complaints of discrimination made by Mr. Brannigan which had been lawfully referred to it, that is, matters said to have occurred within a period of 6 months, prior to 4th August, 2006, the date the Officer received Mr. Brannigan's first complaint. The appellant claimed it had not been accorded fair procedures in the process of the investigation into the complaints. In dismissing the application, McGovern J. held that the Officer had not made a final determination on the issue of the temporal limit of the complaint; and that the procedures which she had adopted were not unfair, or contrary to natural or constitutional justice.

5. The appeal before this Court is confined to the first, temporal limit, or "jurisdictional" issue. No point is now raised on the fair procedures question. The appellant seeks, rather, declarations, either to the effect that the Officer acted ultra vires, in purporting to conduct an investigation falling outside the lawful terms of the original complaint made by Mr. Brannigan, or, alternatively, an order requiring the Officer to confine her investigation to the issues set out in Mr. Brannigan's original complaint of the 4th August, 2006. The case is made that the time limits set out in the Acts debar her from investigating any other matters said to have occurred much earlier, and which were not described in the EE1 form. The appellant also seeks an injunction by way of judicial review, staying the investigation being conducted into the alleged discriminatory acts, save insofar as the investigation is confined to the two allegations contained in the complaint which Mr. Brannigan made to the Tribunal on the 4th August, 2006.

6. It is a matter of concern and regret that the matters raised in this appeal took place some considerable time ago. Nonetheless, the fact remains that there is still an investigation in being, and the progress of that investigation has remained in suspense pending the outcome of these proceedings. It is necessary now to look at the legal background to this application.

7. This judgment, insofar as it addresses matters before the Officer, addresses matters which are not in controversy. For reasons explained in more detail later, the judgment is not to be interpreted as expressing any view on the factual material to be considered in the investigation, or on the legal issues in controversy.

8. It will also be noted that, now, the Workplace Relations Commission has, among other functions, now superseded the Equality Tribunal (See Workplace Relations Act, 2015, s.83(1)(c)). But, the Acts of 1998 – 2004, relevant to this appeal, must still be seen in their broader purpose and context. The issue of equality in employment has been the subject matter of a number of Directives, inter alia, Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27th November, 2000, which established a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupations. Article 9 of that Directive provides as follows:

> 1. Member States shall ensure that judicial and/or administrative procedures, including where they deem it appropriate conciliation procedures, for the enforcement of obligations under this Directive are available to all persons who consider themselves wronged by failure to apply the principle of equal treatment to them, even after the relationship in which the discrimination is alleged to have occurred has ended."

9. By its long title, the 1998 Act sought to promote equality between employed persons, and to make provision with respect to discrimination in, and in connection with, employment, vocational training, and membership of certain bodies. The legislation was also intended to make provision in respect of harassment in employment and in the workplace.

10. The 1998 Act pre-dated the E.U. Directive. Nevertheless, the Act, and amendments subsequent to the year 2000, sought to implement these same principles, and are part of a standalone code.

11. Section 79(1) of the 1998 Act, as amended, created a duty on the Director to investigate the case, and, where mediation failed, went on to provide that the Director should "investigate the case and hear all persons appearing ... to be interested and desiring to be heard." Section 79(1) was subsequently substituted by the Civil Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 2011, s.24; the substituted provision does not now contain the words "and desiring to be heard".

12. Section 77 of the Act of 1998, as substituted by s.46 of the Act of 2004, and the Schedule thereto, provided:

> "(1) A person who claims -
>
> (a) to have been discriminated against or subject to victimisation,
>
> (b) to have been dismissed in circumstances amounting to discrimination, or victimisation,
>
> (c) not to be receiving a remuneration in accordance with an equal remuneration term
>
> (d) not to be receiving a benefit under an equality clause,
> may, subject to subsections (3) to (9), seek redress by referring the case to the Director."

13. A complaint, referred under this section, was to be delegated by the Director of the Tribunal ("the Director") to an Equality Officer. Such complaint might, thereafter, become either the subject of mediation, investigation, or, ultimately, after investigation, a decision by such officer.

14. It is clear that the process was intended to provide for a single, expeditious, hearing process, into all relevant matters, conducted without undue formality. Section 79(1A) of the 1998 Act, as amended, provided that a complaint of discrimination, made on more than one ground, should be investigated as a single case, and that discrimination claims, amounting to victimisation, might also be investigated in one case. Section 79(2) of the Act provided that such an investigation was to be held in private.

15. Pursuant to s.79(3A), the Acts then provided the Director, or an Equality Officer assigned to the case, might hold a preliminary hearing into specified matters, including:

> (d) any other related question of law or fact".

16. At the time relevant to this judgment, an appeal on a point of law to the High Court from a determination of the Tribunal on preliminary points, including those identified above (see s.79(7) of the Act of 1998, as inserted by s.35(d) of the Equality Act, 2004). Section 79(7) has now been deleted by s.83(1)(f) of the Workplace Relations Act, 2015.

17. The potential effect and impact of the range of orders made by an Equality Officer, under s.82 of the Act of 1998, was by no means insignificant. Consequently, the requirement for effectiveness and informality must be balanced with the principle that any investigations be carried out in a fair manner. Informality and constitutional fairness are not mutually exclusive requirements.

18. The statutory provisions as to time limits applicable to claim lie at the heart of this appeal. These were set out in s.77 of the 1998 Act, as amended by s.32 of the 2004 Act.

19. The relevant provisions were as follows:

> "(5)(a) Subject to paragraph (b), a claim for redress in respect of discrimination or victimisation may not be referred under this section after the end of the period of 6 months from the date of occurrence of the discrimination or victimisation to which the case relates or, as the case may be, the date of its most recent occurrence. (emphasis added)
> (b) On application by a complainant the Director or Circuit Court, as the case may be, may, for reasonable cause, direct that in relation to the complainant paragraph (a) shall have effect as if for the reference to a period of 6 months there were substituted a reference to such period not exceeding 12 months as is specified in the direction; and, where such a direction is given, this Part shall have effect accordingly."

It is beyond controversy, therefore, that these provisions had the intent that, in general, a complaint was to be made within a time limited, at least by reference, to the most recent occurrence in question.

20. Section 77(6) of the 1998 Act, as amended by s.32 of the Equality Act, 2004, provided for a situation where the time may be extended where there has been a misrepresentation by a respondent. On the facts now presented, that situation does not arise here. However, s.77(6A) is of particular relevance. It provided as follows:

> "(6A) For the purposes of this section -
>
> (a) discrimination or victimisation occurs -
>
> (i) if the act constituting it extends over a period, at the end of the period,
>
> (ii) if it arises by virtue of a term in a contract, throughout the duration of the contract, and
>
> (iii) if it arises by virtue of a provision which operates over a period, throughout the period,
> ..." (emphasis added)

21. The interpretation of these provisions, taken together, is, undoubtedly, an issue in the investigation. But, the role of the Superior Courts in considering fact and law issues emerging from a tribunal, such as the respondent, has recently been considered by this Court (see Barry v. The Minister for Agriculture [2015] IESC 63). That role is significantly circumscribed. At this stage it is sufficient to emphasise that it is not, generally, the function of the courts to substitute their own views for those of an Equality Officer on questions of fact. Nor should a court, in a judicial review, or an appeal therefrom, seek pre-emptively to exercise a statutory jurisdiction on legal issues which is vested, in the first instance, in an Equality Officer.

22. In the pending investigation, the substantial issues of fact, and law, are yet to be determined. In fact, the true question which arises in this appeal is whether the appellant, in seeking the jurisdictional declarations identified earlier, has established a basis in law for a court to grant such relief. A court does not grant "advisory" opinions, or declarations on a hypothesis. Nor will a court grant a declaration where there is insufficient evidence that a wrong has occurred, or might occur. Simple inference by one party of a potential apprehended denial of rights will seldom be sufficient to ground a declaration, unless it is supported by real evidence upon which a court might safely act.

Chronology

23. In order to make his original complaint, Mr. Brannigan used the "EE1 Form". Unlike the T10 application form, until recently used in claims to the Employment Appeals Tribunal prior to its dissolution in 2015, the EE1 form, as used in this complaint, was not mandatory. The content or status of the form was not laid down by statute (see by way of distinction the consideration of the Employment Appeals Tribunal T10 form in Bank of Scotland (Ireland Ltd.) v. EAT and Grady [2002] IEHC 119; and IBM v. Feeney [1983] ILRM 50). Judging from its layout, the EE1 form, applicable here, appears to have been intended by the Tribunal, to allow a claimant to give a general account of the basic details of the complaint. But, even its very format did not allow for a full description of a complaint; rather, it simply allowed a claimant to present the claim, often in "box" form, in some instances even carried out by a simple "box ticking" exercise. In the present case, it is said Mr. Brannigan completed the form by himself, and did not then have legal advice or assistance, although it appears that at the time he did have a solicitor acting for him in his dispute with his former employer. His solicitor is, in fact, named in the EE1 form.

Background

24. The following matters appear not to be in dispute. It is accepted the notice party was employed by the appellant. He brought a complaint to the Tribunal on the 4th August, 2006. He claimed that the appellant had engaged in discrimination, harassment and victimisation against him, contrary to s.77 of the 1998 Act, as amended. He contended that this alleged unlawful conduct derived from the fact of his sexual orientation as a gay man.

25. Under the heading "Grounds on which discrimination is claimed", in the EE1 Form, Mr. Brannigan ticked a box headed "gender", underlining the word "male" beside that box. He did not tick the box for "marital status". He underlined the word "single" beside the box, and ticked a box for "sexual orientation", underlining the word "homosexual" beside it. Under the heading "Description of claim", Mr. Brannigan ticked the boxes for "promotion/regrading", "conditions of employment", "harassment", and "victimisation". Under the heading "Details of complaint", he set out a "date of the first occurrence" of the discriminatory act as being the 16th December, 2005. He set out the "date of the most recent occurrence" of discrimination as being the 10th March, 2006 (see s.77(5)(a) of the 1998 Act, as amended by s.32 of the Equality Act, 2004, quoted earlier). Mr. Brannigan gave a brief account of two events which occurred when he had been employed as a teacher, in a school run by the appellant. It will be noted that a period of 6 months from the latter of the two events, 10th March, 2006, expired on the 10th September, 2006. Thus, this 6 month period elapsed a little more than one month after Mr. Brannigan submitted the EE1 form, on the 4th August, 2006.

26. More than one year elapsed before the next significant event. On the 17th September, 2007, Mr. Brannigan made another submission at the Officer's request. This also set out allegations of harassment and discrimination. On this occasion, however, rather than simply dealing with the two occurrences referred to earlier, Mr. Brannigan also described further events said to have occurred dating from 1997 up to the date of the end of his working with the V.E.C., apparently, at the end of August, 2006. He complained of alleged mistreatment and discrimination, by more senior teachers, and by other colleagues at the same level of seniority as himself. The complaints related to interactions between various staff members, some said to have been insulting, others more serious, as well as concerns as to how complaints regarding teaching quality, teaching assignments and supervisory duties were dealt with by more senior teachers.

27. The Officer requested the appellant to provide a response to these submissions by the 31st January, 2008. That deadline passed. No response was received. Ms. Murtagh, of her own accord, granted the appellant an extension of time until the 7th November, 2008. In fact, the appellant did not put in its written submissions until the 21st January, 2009. That timing was significant. The submission came in on the day prior to the first scheduled oral hearing of the investigation. This was to commence on the 22nd January, 2009. The appellant's written responses, which were detailed, addressed all Mr. Brannigan's submissions. However, it can be safely said that those responses dealt in greater detail with the more recent complaints. For the first time, these responses raised an issue in relation to what might be characterised as the "time issue".

28. I should mention now that Mr. Brannigan also sought other forms of legal redress concerning his employment. He instituted High Court personal injury proceedings against the appellant. These were dated 4th July, 2007. Those proceedings were brought after his first submission on the 4th August, 2006, but before his second letter to the Tribunal dated 12th September, 2207. The High Court proceedings contained allegations of bullying and harassment causing personal injury, which were said to have undermined Mr. Brannigan's role as a teacher. The pleadings also described matters allegedly going back to the year 1997. Mr. Brannigan claimed that the effect of this conduct was that he reached a point where he was constrained to cease work at the end of August, 2006.

29. In this judicial review, Mr. Brannigan deposes in his grounding affidavit that his solicitors informed the appellant of his intention to apply for early retirement on grounds of ill-health on the 11th September, 2007. This was confirmed by a formal letter on the following day. A letter from the appellant dated the 11th January, 2008, indicated this application had been granted. Mr. Brannigan deposed that, from the 6th November, 2006, to the 18th February, 2006, he was without any means of income.

30. While counsel for Mr. Brannigan accepted in argument before this Court that there might be some degree of overlap between the two claims, he contended that the High Court case was in the nature of a personal injuries matter, whereas the complaint arising before the Tribunal related to victimisation and discrimination, based on sexual orientation. This is not a matter which requires determination here. The issue of the settlement sum of the High Court proceedings does not arise in this judgment either.

The Investigation Hearing

31. On the initial day of the investigation hearing, 22nd January, 2009, all parties were in attendance before the Equality Officer. Arising from concerns relating to the pending High Court action, the investigation was adjourned, apparently, by consent.

32. Subsequently, on the 9th February, 2009, Mr. Brannigan submitted a further written rejoinder to the V.E.C.'s responses. A resumed hearing of the investigation took place on the 12th February, 2009.

33. At that resumption, junior counsel for the appellant then raised two preliminary concerns. First, she again sought a stay on the investigation pending the outcome of the pending High Court action. The Officer rejected the application on that ground, holding that she was under a statutory duty to carry out the investigation. No challenge has been brought to that decision.

34. The second issue concerned the temporal scope of the issues. Counsel for the V.E.C. submitted to the Officer that Mr. Brannigan was not entitled to give evidence concerning the "historic issues", (going back to 1997), as set out in his second set of submissions of the 17th September, 2007. She submitted that the Officer had no jurisdiction to deal with any matters prior to the 16th December, 2005, which was the date identified in the EE1 Form as being the first occurrence of the discrimination. She referred to the provisions of the Acts, outlined above, laying emphasis on the alleged date of the "most recent occurrence" of discrimination.

35. As mentioned earlier, s.79(3A) of the 1998 Act, as amended, provided that a party may apply to an Equality Officer to determine certain matters (including time limitations), as preliminary issues. While one might infer that implied subtext to the appellant's case is the suggestion that the Officer might have directed a preliminary hearing, no such complaint was made in the judicial review proceedings. On the basis of the authority of Aer Lingus Teo v. The Labour Court [1990] ILRM 485, considered later, such an application would have been very unlikely to succeed. The principle is that the Officer should conduct the investigation without interruption. Also, prior to the hearing, the Officer directed that a number of the V.E.C.'s witnesses who were in attendance at the hearing should wait outside. Those witnesses were other teachers, said to have witnessed, or been involved in, the various alleged events over the years. This was within the officer's powers. The hearing proceeded and Mr. Brannigan set out his case.

36. It must be taken as a given that the investigation can be conducted informally and flexibly. That said, what actually occurred is not entirely easy to follow. By the end of the first hearing-day, Mr. Brannigan had apparently given evidence, and been questioned by the officer, but had not been fully cross-examined. This Court was informed the appellant had, in fact, called one witness, Mr. Ger Rooney, a teacher. Why Mr. Brannigan's cross-examination had not been completed is unclear. The procedure is, frankly, puzzling.

37. At the end, the Equality Officer endeavoured to identify further potential dates, but then difficulties arose. No resumed hearing ever took place. These judicial review proceedings were brought to the High Court within two weeks after the second hearing day, on the 27th February, 2009. O'Neill J., in the High Court, granted leave to the appellant to seek judicial review. The appellant originally sought a broader range of judicial review remedies, including certiorari.

38. Prior to a consideration of the High Court judgment now under appeal, it is helpful to touch on some of the key matters contained in the affidavits sworn herein. Put at its simplest, the appellant's case is that the Officer exceeded her jurisdiction by considering Mr. Brannigan's evidence on the "historical incidents".

39. Mr. Winters, the appellant's Acting Chief Executive Officer, set out his concerns in this way:

> "23. ... the respondent (referring to Ms. Murtagh) indicated that she had heard the submissions made by this applicant (i.e. the County Louth VEC) in respect of the historic nature of many of the complaints, but wanted to get on with hearing the evidence from Mr. B. It became clear that the respondent's officer was not hearing the evidence for the purpose of considering the issue of whether the Notice Party's earlier complaints were "statute barred", rather, she heard evidence from the Notice Party in respect of matters dating as far back as 1997, and then proceeded to ask questions/conduct her investigation into those matters.
> 24. I say and believe that it is now clear to me*, and I believe the Notice Party and his advisors, that the Officer conducting the investigation is of the view that she has jurisdiction to entertain all* aspects of the allegations made by the [Notice Party]. She had, in effect, rejected the submissions advanced on behalf of the applicant as to the proper scope of her investigation. She is now conducting a far reaching inquiry into the past twelve years or more, during which the Notice Party was employed by the applicant. Apart from issues of fairness referred to below, I am advised she has no jurisdiction to do so ..." (interpolation identify the parties, and emphasis added by myself)

40. It is noteworthy that Mr. Brannigan, as notice party, says squarely in his replying affidavit that there is nothing in the applicable Employment Equality legislation which would preclude the Tribunal from investigating alleged discrimination which occurred more than 6 months prior to the referral of a claim either, for example, as an instance of continuing discrimination, or as contextual evidence relevant to a complaint. Mr. Brannigan deposed that his complaint, in fact, related to what he characterised as continuing discrimination over a long period, culminating in the two identified incidents, said to have occurred in December, 2005, and March, 2006.

41. What is said in the Officer's affidavit is, however, critical. Ms. Murtagh absolutely refuted Mr. Winters' inference that the reason she had permitted the historic evidence to be given was that she had already made a decision on the contested issue of her jurisdiction to hear, consider, and determine on these matters. She also refuted any suggestion that she had rejected the V.E.C.'s submissions as to the proper scope of the investigation. She deposed "I say that I have not made any such decision". She continued:

> "14. I did consider that for the sake of expediency that it was best to hear all the evidence together and then make all relevant decisions on facts and law, pursuant to my investigation. This will include a decision on the contested issue raised before me by the Applicant as to the lawful ambit of the investigation ... ". (emphasis added)

42. Ms. Murtagh was not cross-examined in the judicial review proceedings before the High Court. This Court is, therefore, faced with a situation where there is a clear denial that any decision on the jurisdictional issue has been made. Instead, the appellant's concerns are based on inference, or apprehended potential detriment.

The High Court Judgment

43. In the High Court, McGovern J. appears to have held that the EE1 Form was intended only to set out the nature of the complaint in broad outline, and that it was possible to amend a claim, so long as the general nature of the complaint remained the same. The judge considered that Mr. Brannigan, in his second submission, had simply submitted further and better particulars of his claim, albeit in the context of an expanded period of time. He concluded that, under the legislation, complaints made within an expanded period were not time barred, but that any respondent to a claim must be given a reasonable opportunity to deal with the complaints, and observed the procedures adopted in that regard must be fair and reasonable.

44. Applying the principles outlined in the case law cited earlier, insofar as any findings as to time issues, and the effect of the EE1 form, are part of the High Court judgment, I would set aside these parts of the judgment. They are pre-emptive. As yet, questions of fact or law fall to be determined first by the Officer. The relevant facts of the investigation simply have not been elicited or determined. The Equality Officer has not made any legal ruling on the time issue. Without these, it would be inappropriate, and premature, to express views on legal issues which hinge on evidence as yet not ascertained.

The Appellant's Case

45. In this appeal, in essence, senior counsel for the appellant, Mr. Feichín McDonagh, S.C., submits that, even at this stage, a court should declare it is simply not open to the Equality Officer to investigate, or deal with, any material which is not dealt with in the EE1 Form. Counsel submitted that the officer has no jurisdiction to explore the "historic matters" at all. However, counsel did accept in argument that it might be open to an Officer to allow evidence of matters which occurred outside the statutory time limitation period, as context, but only insofar as those matters might (or might not) be relevant to the specific issues which are complained of in the EE1 Form.

46. Counsel relies on the provisions of s.77(6)(a) of the 1998 Act, as amended. He contends that the Officer may investigate matters which allegedly occurred more than 6 months prior to the date upon which a particular claim was submitted to the Tribunal, but only as background in relation to a complaint lawfully made in respect of those matters. Counsel submits that there may be no investigation of complaints that are not made in accordance with the time-limit provisions of the Act. As a separate point, counsel submits also that the Tribunal cannot, by a process of fact finding, confer upon itself a jurisdiction which it would not otherwise enjoy under its governing statutes. He contends that, following the lodgement of the EE1 claim with the Tribunal, Mr. Brannigan was invited to provide a further written submission to the Tribunal, which he did on the 17th September, 2007. Counsel says this further document was submitted more than 12 months after Mr. Brannigan had ceased to be employed by the appellant, and more than 12 months after the notice party had made his original claim. More fundamentally, senior counsel submits that the additional materials strayed far outside the terms of the complaint being investigated, and are, effectively, time barred, pursuant to s.77 of the 1998 Act, as amended by s.32 of the Equality Act, 2004. In making these submissions, Mr. McDonagh, S.C. refers to the fact that the later submission concerned different allegations of alleged discriminatory acts on the part of the appellant's employees and staff.

Consideration

47. It is well established that the purpose of a deciding body or tribunal, such as the respondent Tribunal, is to provide speedy and effective redress in cases of alleged discrimination. It is not in dispute the procedures employed may be both informal and flexible. It is true, as Mr. Gerard Durcan, S.C., counsel for the Tribunal, submits, that the range of claimants before such a Tribunal do not fit into any one category. They may or may not be legally represented and, therefore, flexibility is both warranted and necessary.

48. The question is, are there grounds for any declaration? It has been observed, more than once, and not only in this jurisdiction, that it is not in the public interest, nor the intent of the legislation, that investigations, or inquiries, of this nature should be intermittent, or be interspersed with unnecessary representations or counter-representations, or by premature applications made to the courts (see, by way of illustration, the remarks in Pearlberg v. Varty [1972] 2 All.ER, cited in the High Court judgment delivered by Carroll J. in Aer Lingus Teoranta v. The Labour Court [1990] ILRM 485). However, this precept does not mean that a court might not, ultimately, grant relief were it shown that a deciding officer had, in fact, exceeded jurisdiction.

The Form of Relief Claimed

49. As part of the consideration of this appeal, it is necessary to point to the rules-rubric under which this application was initiated. Essentially, what is sought now is a simple declaration, although an injunction is part of the claim. There is a subtle, but important, distinction between the various forms of relief which may be claimed in judicial review. Order 84, Rule 18(1) provides:

> "(1) An application for an order of certiorari, mandamus, prohibition or quo warranto shall be made by way of an application for judicial review in accordance with the provisions of this Order.
> (2) An application for a declaration or an injunction may be made by way of an application for judicial review, and on such an application the Court may grant the declaration or injunction claimed if it considers that, having regard to -
>
> (a) the nature of the matters in respect of which relief may be granted by way of an order of mandamus, prohibition, certiorari, or quo warranto,
>
> (b) the nature of the persons and bodies against whom relief may be granted by way of such order, and
>
> (c) all the circumstances of the case,
> it would be just and convenient for the declaration or injunction to be granted on an application for judicial review." (emphasis added)

50. Elsewhere, Order 19, Rule 29, provides that no action or pleading is to be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgement or order is sought thereby. A court may, if it thinks fit, make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not.

51. While, historically, remedies such as declarations or injunctions were merely ancillary to the public law remedies just identified, this is no longer the case. The existence of declaratory proceedings provides a useful remedy in a wide range of circumstances, where, perhaps, the traditional judicial review remedies may not be appropriate. But, the question which arises, on the facts of this case, is whether a declaration should be granted? It is said the Officer has already strayed beyond her remit in allowing historical evidence at all.

52. There are a number of factors which militate against granting a declaration. First, the question arises in circumstances where it is very doubtful whether, in principle, the remedy of certiorari would be available at this stage. The officer has denied she has made any decision or order which might be impugned by judicial review. This has not been disproved to the requisite level of probability. On the face of things, she is acting within jurisdiction, or rather it has not been shown that she has exceeded her jurisdiction.

53. Second, it is necessary to, again, point out that this is an inquiry which is still in the course of hearing. It has commenced. Much is still to be adduced. Should a court, even by declaratory order, seek to direct the manner in which the Equality Officer should carry out her task, not only in circumstances where she has sworn that she has not reached any conclusion in relation to jurisdiction, but where the hearing is still in being? I think not. A declaration is not to be seen either as a surrogate for certiorari or for an injunction. I would hold that neither certiorari, nor an injunction, could be granted restraining the hearing at this stage. Such an application would be premature.

54. Further, in order to obtain relief, even by way of declaration, it would be necessary for the appellant to demonstrate that it is in imminent danger of suffering a diminution of rights, or a detriment. But, as yet, there has been no determination of rights or interests.

55. This is a situation where, by analogy, similar principles apply as arose in Blanchfield v. Harnett (3) [2002] 3 I.R. 207, Director of Public Prosecutions v. Special Criminal Court [1999] 1 I.R. 60, and the recent decision of this Court in Stirling v. Collins [2014] JIC 2603. In each of these authorities, the courts have emphasised that judicial review was an available remedy which might, in principle, permit challenges to decisions, made in the course of a trial, but only in truly exceptional circumstances. The courts have consistently held that, although decisions of a court of trial might, ultimately, be subject to certiorari, such relief was scarcely ever granted during the course of a trial. The fundamental principle, more recently reiterated in Stirling, is that, save only in the most exceptional circumstances, a trial should have "the unity and continuity of a play" (see O'Dalaigh C.J.'s remarks in the People (Attorney General) v. McGlynn [1967] I.R. 232). The circumstances in which certiorari was granted in Stirling were truly exceptional, and clearly went to jurisdiction. It would be an incongruity were this Court now to rule on a jurisdictional issue, in an investigation of this type, where the Equality Officer has not herself delivered a decision on that question.

56. The position here has some resonances too in the decisions of the High Court, and this Court on appeal, in Aer Lingus Teoranta v. The Labour Court [1990] ILRM 485. As Carroll J. pointed out in the High Court judgment in Aer Lingus, it is not obligatory for an Equality Officer to rule on a time issue "any more than a court is obliged to hear a preliminary issue on whether a claim is statute barred or not". That judge laid emphasis on the fact that tribunals, engaging in this important form of work, must be allowed a discretion in the running of their affairs, as to whether to have a preliminary hearing, or whether to deal with all questions, including that of receivability, at one hearing. Subject to comments in the conclusion section of this judgment, I agree with this observation.

57. On appeal in this Court, in Aer Lingus, Walsh J. approved this observation, expressing the view that it would be "far preferable" that matters should not be brought to the High Court on a point of law, until after the determination of the Labour Court, as to any matter of law arising, had been made. Walsh J. laid emphasis on the fact that Carroll J.

had "correctly" mentioned the fact that the Labour Court had not made any findings on the merits of the case, and that, if that had been the position, he would have been content to let the matter go back to the Labour Court.

58. I mention here, however, that in Aer Lingus, this Court did find it necessary to make adjudications in relation to the jurisdiction of the Labour Court, and reversed the High Court judgment in that regard. This was because the High Court judge had, in Walsh J.'s words, "elected" to go into questions of whether the acts complained of were capable of constituting unlawful discrimination, and expressed views on whether the relevant legislation had retrospective effect. This was in circumstances where the respondent had not fully concluded its deliberations in these issues. The situation which arose in Aer Lingus reinforces the inference that a court should guard against premature expressions of views on facts or law, and for that reason, I would set aside any part of McGovern J.'s judgment which might be interpreted as having expressed such views.

59. The position here is not analogous, either, to that which pertained in Cox v. Ireland [1992] 2 I.R. 503, where the plaintiff challenged a "decision" of civil servants to apply the provisions of s.34 of the Offences Against the State Act, 1939 to his circumstances, while also challenging the validity of the section. In Cox, this Court ruled that the civil servants in question had not made a "decision", in that, the two defendants named had no alternative but to apply the provisions of s.34

OASA, 1939, to the case of the plaintiff, until the provisions in question were declared unconstitutional. But, this Court, nonetheless, granted a declaration by way of judicial review, that the section in question was unconstitutional. No such claim is brought here.

60. As Order 84, Rule 18(1) makes clear, the issue in this appeal concerns the question of whether or not it is "just and convenient" to grant a declaration. I do not consider that it would be either "just" or "convenient". The hearing is still proceeding. It is to be presumed it will be fair. It is to be presumed that the Equality Officer will act within jurisdiction. The policy of this Act, and the courts generally, lean against interference in a pending hearing, save in the most exceptional circumstances. There has been no detriment, or denial of rights or interests, nor has it been sufficiently shown that there is an imminent danger of the appellant suffering such detriment.

Conclusion

61. I would, however, venture some further observations. It goes without saying, first, that the duty of the Equality Officer is both statutory, and, ultimately, delimited by constitutional considerations. As part of fair procedures, it is necessary that all parties be aware, in a timely way, of the case which they must meet. Consequently, it would be wrong, were a situation to evolve in this investigation, where one or other of the parties was under a misapprehension of precisely the range of legitimate inquiry. Second, it is hardly necessary to reiterate that it is not possible for any tribunal, upon which a particular jurisdiction has been conferred by statute, to extend or confine the boundaries of that jurisdiction by an erroneous determination of fact (see State (Attorney General) v. Durkan [1964] I.R. 279, approved in Killeen v. DPP [1998] ILRM 1). There may also be circumstances in which a tribunal, although holding jurisdiction to enter upon an investigation or inquiry, may render its decision a nullity by, for example, a denial of fair procedures. It is no part of the case made that in conducting the hearing, as she has, the Officer is pursuing some fixed policy.

62. To my mind, it would not be appropriate to grant a declaration. Subject to my findings on the observations made by the High Court judge on facts and law, I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal. I would remit the matter to the Equality Officer for further investigation and final determination, in accordance with law. I would uphold the High Court judgment and order, to the extent that it held that the application is premature.

THE SUPREME COURT

JUDICIAL REVIEW

[Appeal No. 336/2009]

McKechnie J.

MacMenamin J.

O'Malley J.

BETWEEN

COUNTY LOUTH VOCATIONAL EDUCATION COMMITTEE:
(NOW KNOWN AS LOUTH AND MEATH EDUCATION AND TRAINING BOARD)

APPLICANT/APPELLANT

RESPONDENT

PEARSE BRANNIGAN

NOTICE PARTY

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice William M. McKechnie delivered on the 13th day of July, 2016

Introduction:

1. This case arises out of proceedings before the Equality Tribunal concerning an allegation of discrimination on grounds of gender and sexual orientation made by the notice party against his former employer, the appellant. The original claim, which it is accepted was validly made, identified two specific incidents only. Although still somewhat difficult to decipher, the substantive point at issue is whether the equality officer is confined, in her inquiry, to those particular incidents, or whether for redress purposes she may also investigate other alleged incidents, stretching back over a decade, which were first notified after the statutory time period for the making of a complaint had passed.

2. This Court is not called upon to directly assess that question in these proceedings as in the first instance this is a matter for the Tribunal, which has not as yet made a ruling on it. To succeed, however, on what is in issue on this appeal, the appellant would have to show that the equality officer assigned to the case can only decide the contested issue at the point when it was raised by the Committee and that any other decision would be demonstrably wrong in law. That, in my view, is a step too far and a barrier too high for the VEC to overcome. Moreover, even if it could do so, the appeal would still have to be dismissed in circumstances where the undisputed facts are that the officer in question has yet to make any decision on the point and where it cannot be shown that she lacks jurisdiction to do so. The reasons for this conclusion follow.

Background:

3. Between 1981 and 2007, Mr. Brannigan (also referred to as "the complainant" or "the notice party") was employed as a teacher in a number of institutions under the control of the County Louth Vocational Education Committee, now known as the "Louth and Meath Education and Training Board", and in this judgment also referred to as "the appellant", "the applicant" or "the VEC". Apparently, for many years the relationship between the parties was at least strained, if not difficult, and perhaps even downright fractious on occasions. In March, 2006, Mr. Brannigan was certified absent from work on grounds of ill health. He returned to work for three days in August of that year, but left, not to return, after this period. As and from September, 2007, he ceased employment entirely, having been approved for early retirement on grounds of ill health.

4. Arising out of this relationship, howsoever one might describe it, the notice party instituted two sets of proceedings against the VEC, the first of which was a claim under the Employment Equality Acts 1998-2004 ("the 1998 Act"), and the second of which, commenced by a Personal Injury Summons, made allegations of bullying and harassment; fortunately, this matter has been compromised by way of an out of court settlement. This second action, therefore, although not entirely irrelevant, plays but an incidental role in the instant case.

5. On the 4th August, 2006, Mr. Brannigan made a complaint, addressed to the Equality Tribunal, alleging discrimination during the course of his employment, for which he claimed the VEC was responsible. The basis of such complaint was that as a known homosexual, he had been discriminated against on the grounds of his sexual orientation. In August, 2008, Ms. Valerie Murtagh, an equality officer, was assigned to the case. Prior to that the notice party had also furnished a "Submission" to the Tribunal on the 19th September, 2007, which the VEC responded to on the 21st January, 2009, the day immediately prior to the commencement of the hearing. As it happened, the investigation was deferred, at the request of both parties, until the 12th February, 2009, by which date a short replying submission had also been served on behalf of Mr. Brannigan.

6. At the outset of the hearing, the appellant made the following three submissions to Ms. Murtagh:-

(i) That the hearing should be adjourned until the plenary proceedings had been finalised as there was a considerable overlap between both. The officer refused to so do and no issue arises out of that decision.

(ii) That the manner in which the officer proposed to conduct the inquiry, in particular by her refusal to allow a number of VEC witnesses, being fellow teachers and former colleagues of the complainant, to be present when the complainant's evidence was being given, was unlawful. In short, this was a fair procedures point. Whilst this objection formed part of the instant proceedings and was therefore dealt with in the High Court judgment, it has not been pursued as an appellate point to this Court. It thus has no continuing relevance.

(iii) It is solely the third issue which agitates this appeal. That issue is the subject matter of this judgment.

7. In the filed document of complaint known as the EE1 Form, Mr. Brannigan referred to two instances of discrimination only, both specific as to date: the first was alleged to have occurred on the 16th December, 2005, and the second on the 10th March, 2006. In the Part 8 of the form, where he was asked to give the "date of the first occurrence of the discriminatory act", he specified "Dec 16 2005" as being that date.

8. Based on this information the VEC submitted to the equality officer that she had jurisdiction to investigate these nominated incidents only, and that she could not consider the additional matters upon which the complainant also intended to rely (the "historical evidence"); such matters being those as outlined for the first time in his submission of September, 2007, and again addressed in his replying submission of February, 2009 (para. 33 infra). The appellant therefore wanted a ruling on this issue when the submission to that effect was made. Ms. Murtagh declined to do so; rather, her decision essentially was that she would firstly hear the entirety of the evidence, and would then rule on the jurisdictional objection as made. Her decision to adopt that approach led directly to the institution of this judicial review, which in turn has resulted in the hearing before her being adjourned midstream the evidence, and thereafter indefinitely stayed pending the final outcome of these proceedings. That situation, whether inevitable or not, is most regrettable.

High Court Judgment:

9. Having obtained leave to challenge 'the situation as it then stood', and following a fairly far reaching debate in the High Court, McGovern J. delivered his judgment on the 24th July, 2009. He held, inter alia:-

(i) That the case of Bank of Scotland (Ireland) v. Employment Appeals Tribunal & O'Grady, (Unreported, High Court, Ó Caoimh J., 15th July

2002), did not assist the VEC "as it is clear, on the facts, that the claim by the notice party was made within time and in that way it differs from this case";

(ii) That Aer Lingus Teoranta v. Labour Court (Unreported, Supreme Court, 20th March 1990) was in favour of the respondent in that both the High Court and the Supreme Court held that there was no obligation on the Tribunal in question, being the Labour Court in that case, to conduct a preliminary hearing so as to "deem the claim admissible": rather, this and any related point could properly be dealt with as part of the substantive hearing;

(iii) That the EE1 Form, which had no statutory footing and which was merely an administrative document, had as its purpose the setting out, in brief outline, of the nature of the complaint; as such, a complainant was not limited to its contents.

(iv) That as a result, by analogy with court proceedings, there was no reason why the claim as formulated could not be amended so long as the general nature of the complaint remained the same;

(v) That the submissions of the notice party delivered post the 4th August, 2006, should be regarded, in effect, as the furnishing of further and better particulars of the claim, albeit in an expanded period of time: such complaints so made, even within this period, were not time barred under the legislation; and, finally,

(vi) That fairness would, of course, have to ensure that the VEC had an opportunity of properly dealing with all such matters.

Accordingly, the application for relief was dismissed, with the appellant moving to this Court only on the single issue above stated.

10. With regards to the Bank of Scotland (Ireland) case, and the point mentioned at the first indent above, I assume that what the trial judge meant was that Ms. Grady, the notice party in that case, was out of time in submitting her claim for unfair dismissal; clearly he could not have been suggesting that Mr. Brannigan was out of time in the instant case. To the extent that this was what the learned trial judge intended, I would agree that the Bank of Scotland (Ireland) case does not assist the applicant.

11. However, it is perhaps worth noting another aspect of that case, namely that a claim for redress under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 "shall be initiated by giving a notice … to the Tribunal … within the period of 6 months beginning on the date of the relevant dismissal" (s. 8(2)(a) of the Act). O'Caoimh J., the trial judge, following the decision of the High Court in The State (IBM Ireland Ltd) v. The Employment Appeals Tribunal [1984] I.L.R.M. 31, held that compliance with such provision was mandatory if the Tribunal was to have jurisdiction to embark upon and determine the submitted claim. Whilst the issue turned on whether "any" claim had been made within the time period, unlike the instant case, nonetheless the language used in the section is not altogether that dissimilar from the relevant provisions of the 1998 Act.

The Relief Prayed For/Grounds Asserted:

12. Although, as is altogether too common, leave was granted to seek multiple declarations, in essence those set out in the Motion paper at subparagraphs (a) and (d) were the focus of the argument in both the High Court and in this Court. These read as follows:-

> "(a) A Declaration that the Respondent has acted ultra vires in purporting to conduct an investigation of alleged discriminatory acts (within the meaning of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2004) against the Notice Party herein which fall outside the scope of the terms of the complaint made by the Notice Party received by the Respondent on 4th August, 2006;
> (d) A Declaration that the Respondent is limited to investigating complaints of discrimination made by the Notice Party which have been lawfully referred to it and which occurred within a period of six months from 4th August, 2006."

Declarations (b) and (c) as set out in the said Motion are omitted from this judgment on the basis that they seek essentially the same relief as that intended by para. (a), above, namely, that the equality officer be required to confine her investigation to the two specific incidents of discrimination contained in the complaint referred to the Equality Tribunal on the 4th August, 2006. Thus their inclusion would add nothing to this appeal.

13. However, before leaving the reliefs as sought, in particular that outlined at para. (d), above, one should note the potential distinction for investigation purposes between a complaint "which has been lawfully referred" to the Tribunal and one "which has occurred" within six months from the date of the EE1 form. If a complaint is out of time and thus fails to satisfy a condition precedent, and remains so found after inquiry, then it cannot be said to have been "lawfully referred" to the Tribunal, such that it may properly be investigated for redress purposes (see para. 19 infra). The effect of such a ruling would be that the rejected complaint, from that point on, could not be considered as a potential discriminatory act. It would therefore have to be disregarded to that end. On the other hand, as paras. 20-26 of this judgment show, the Tribunal, in certain circumstances, may be fully justified in looking into acts or incidents of discrimination which long pre-dated the six-month period. This is a point which I will further refer to later in the judgment.

14. The bare recital of the above declarations is not of itself sufficiently explanatory of the precise point which, at the substantive level, is directly behind this appeal. In order to help elucidate that issue, it is therefore necessary, firstly, to outline some of the grounds upon which leave was granted and, secondly, to set out sections of the legislation and my interpretation of the relevant provisions thereof. Having done so, I will then identify what I believe is the core point of the VEC's argument.

15. The formal grounds relied upon in support of the application for the reliefs above set out included the following:

> "(a) The Respondent acted unlawfully and in excess of its jurisdiction in refusing to limit its investigation into complaints of discrimination brought by the Notice Party herein against the Applicant on grounds of his gender and sexual orientation to the incidents the subject matter of a complaint received by the Respondent on the 4th August, 2006;

(b) The Respondent acted unlawfully and in excess of its jurisdiction in refusing to limit its investigation into complaints of discrimination brought by the Notice Party herein against the Applicant on grounds of his gender and sexual orientation to incidents occurring after the 16th December, 2005, being the date nominated by the Notice Party as being the first occurrence of discrimination;

(c) The Respondent erred in law and acted outside jurisdiction in purporting to investigate alleged discriminatory acts (within the meaning of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2004) against the Notice Party herein which allegedly occurred prior to the 16th December, 2005".

16. In summary form the grounds of appeal allege that McGovern J. erred in law and/or in fact in holding 1) that the issue before him related to the furnishing of further and better particulars of the complaint made on the 4th August, 2006; 2) that Mr. Brannigan's September, 2007 submission came within the terms of the complaint received in August, 2006; 3) that, in the alternative, the September, 2007 submission represented a lawful and timely amendment of Mr. Brannigan's original complaint; 4) that Ms. Murtagh had not made a final determination on the issue of the temporal limit of the complaint; and, finally, 5) that the learned judge failed to address the issue of the jurisdiction of the Equality Tribunal to investigate matters which had not been the subject of a complaint to the Director of the Equality Tribunal in accordance with the terms of the 1998 Act.

The Legislation:

17. The 1998 Act and its subsequent amendments were introduced against the backdrop of what may in short be regarded as the Equal Pay Directive (C.D. 75/117/E.E.C. of 10 February 1975 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the application of the principle of equal pay for men and women) and the Equal Treatment Directive (C.D.76/207/E.E.C. of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions). As such, domestic interpretive provisions must reflect this context. Apart from being conscious of that background, however, I do not see that the principle of conforming interpretation is otherwise directly in play on the live issue before us. Therefore, the EU dimension against which the legislation was enacted is not on point as such.

18. The 1998 Act provides for the appointment of a Director of the Equality Tribunal, who is to perform the functions conferred on him or her under the Act, and also provides that the office of such person shall be known as the Equality Tribunal (s. 75(1) and (2) of the 1998 Act). That Director can appoint from amongst his staff any person to be an "equality officer", and can in respect of that individual delegate to him or her any function conferred on the Director under the 1998 Act or any other relevant enactment (s. 75(4B). No issue arises in this case as to the status of Ms. Murtagh, or as to the validity of the delegation so made by the Director.

19. It is quite clear that neither the 1998 Act as a whole nor any of its relevant sections are self-executing, in the sense that the individual standing of an applicant and the subject matter of the complaint must fall within its provisions before the Tribunal can exercise the jurisdiction vested in it. In a case such as the instant one, the effect of this is that, firstly, the complainant must commence the process of seeking redress by referring the case to the Director (s. 77(1)(a)); secondly, he must show that he has been discriminated against on any one or more of the grounds set out in s. 6(2) of the Act, or that he has been victimised within the provisions of s. 74(2) thereof; and, thirdly, he must establish, if in issue, that each of the other qualifying requirements are satisfied. In this case the only contested condition is that referable to the time period.

20. Under s. 77(5)(a) of the 1998 Act, a claim for redress in respect of discrimination "may not be referred under the section after the end of the period of 6 months from the date of occurrence of the discrimination or … as the case may be, the date of its most recent occurrence". Subsection (6A), inserted by s. 32 of the Equality Act 2004, provides that:-

> "(6A) For the purpose of this section—
> (a) discrimination … occurs—
>
> (i) if the act constituting it extends over a period, at the end of the period,
>
> (ii) if it arises by virtue of a term in a contract, throughout the duration of the contract, and
> (iii) if it arises by virtue of a provision which operates over a period, throughout the period."

It is clear, therefore, that the "six month period" applies whichever provision may be invoked.

21. The 1998 Act also has some relieving measures regarding the time limit for submitting a claim. For example, where the delay has resulted from a misrepresentation by the respondent, the date of occurrence shall be regarded as the date when the misrepresentation came to the notice of the complainant (s. 77(6) of the Act). In addition, the 6 month period can be extended by the Director or by the Circuit Court for a further period of equal duration, in total not exceeding twelve months, for reasonable cause (s. 77(5)(b) of the Act). If granted, such an extension would not otherwise affect the date of occurrence for limitation purposes. No such application has ever been made in this case.

22. It has not been suggested, nor could it be, that the outer limit of the six month period within which "the case" seeking redress must be lawfully referred to the Tribunal (s. 77(1) of the 1998 Act) can, as a matter of discretion, be extended other than as above noted, even where the complainant is a lay individual and is one entirely unassisted by legal representation. In addition, the statutory measure does not operate as a defence point or its equivalent only (see para. 13 supra). It must therefore be treated as a condition precedent to the exercise of the Tribunal's jurisdiction and cannot be stood down, save in accordance with the provisions of the Act. Accordingly, there will be cases where, because of this time period, evidence is excluded as of itself being the basis of discrimination for redress purposes. This simply implements legislative policy, presumably enacted having regard to the varying and at times competing interests involved.

23. At the outset it is important to understand that both ss. 77(5)(a) and (6A) are intended to capture quite different circumstances (County Cork VEC v Hurley EDA1124 (Labour Court, 26th July, 2011)). Subsection (6A) deals with situations where a single act occurs and where it continues to occur over a lengthy period, such as discrimination based on a regime, rule, practice or principle of an ongoing nature. A term in a contract is a good specific example of the provision's more general meaning. In such a case the six month period initiating the process will only start to run when the offending regime or practice ceases; or, put another way, the discriminatory act will be regarded for limitation purposes as having occurred only when such basis has ceased to exist.

24. On the other hand, s. 77(5)(a) of the 1998 Act deals with a situation in which there are a series of separate acts or omissions on the part of, say, an employer, which, whilst not forming part of a regime, rule, practice or principle ("regime or practice"), are sufficiently connected so as to constitute a continuum of discrimination. In effect, this deals with a situation whereby there are separate manifestations of the same disposition to discriminate (Bolger, Bruton and Kimber, Employment Equality Law (Dublin, 2012) at para. 16–47). In such a case, once a complaint is made within six months from the date of the last act or omission, all conduct found to form part of the continuum will be regarded as having occurred within time.

25. At the level of principle, therefore, where such a regime or practice exists or where a sufficient linkage can be established between separate acts, it is possible to plead matters which have occurred on a date or dates far beyond the six month period. In theory, such could extend for several years prior to the date of complaint. Even if that should occur, however, provided that the circumstances intended to be covered by the subsections are established, all such incidents will be regarded as being within time and thus will be within the competence of the Equality Tribunal to investigate for redress purposes. However, one should note the specific provisions of s. 82(1) of the 1998 Act in respect of the periods for which compensation may be given.

26. Finally, it is clear from the aforegoing that when bringing a complaint, it is necessary to bear in mind the question of when the six month period begins to run: subject to the alleviating measures mentioned above, it will be either from the most recent date of the offending conduct (subs (5)(a)) or from the ending of the discriminatory regime or practice (subs (6A)). In cases of isolated complaints this should be easily discernible for the purposes of the provision first mentioned, and, likewise, there should be no real difficulty in establishing when a particular regime or practice has ceased. Much the same situation should apply even where the acts or omissions said to constitute discrimination have been ongoing over an extended period, even over a number of years.

27. Although the 1998 Act has subsequently been amended by the Workplace Relations Act 2015 ("the 2015 Act"), it is clear that the later enactment has no application to a claim referred to the Director under s. 77 of the 1998 Act prior to the 1st October, 2015 (s. 83(2) of the 2015 Act).

The Precise Point:

28. In the context, inter alia, of my interpretation of the provisions of s. 77 of the 1998 Act, it cannot be the VEC's true intention to argue that a literal meaning should be given to the latter aspect of the second declaration prayed for (para. 12 supra), as it is palpably not the case that only incidents of discrimination which have actually

"occurred" within the six month period can be investigated into. This seems to be accepted by the VEC itself as despite the wording of that particular relief it acknowledges that the December, 2005 incident can be inquired into. I am therefore assuming that the appellant is not making this argument but if it is, it is in my view plainly wrong. Rather, I believe that both declarations when read together are intended to convey the proposition that the scope or remit of a complaint must be determined by what has lawfully been referred to the Tribunal within that six month period.

29. What therefore is to be made of the situation, as here, where a claim, specific to two particular instances, is validly made within time but where notification of other instances, said to form part of an overall continuum, is given for the first time significantly after the six month period has expired. I refer to a 'continuum' in the context of s. 77(5)(a) for, whilst this remains in the first instance a matter for the Tribunal to decide, it is very difficult to see how Mr. Brannigan's complaint could at all fall within subs (6A) of s. 77 of the 1998 Act. Put succinctly, does the Equality Tribunal have jurisdiction over events which were not the subject matter of a timely notification, but rather were bolted on at a much later date?

30. Again, approaching the issue in a slightly different way, one can ask whether the Tribunal, where a claim for redress, specifying two particular incidents, is made within time, has jurisdiction to investigate, for the purposes of finding continuous discrimination under either subs (5)(a) or subs (6A) of s. 77 of the 1998 Act, other incidents within the same discriminatory ground which were said to have occurred on occasions during the previous ten years but which have only been notified to the Tribunal well outside the six month period? This I believe to be the real point. As so understood this notification point is therefore the contested jurisdictional issue between the parties.

EE1 Form:

31. As is evident from the aforegoing (para. 19 supra), the initiating step for engaging with the provisions of the 1998 Act is that an applicant "... seeks redress by referring the case to the Director" (s. 77(1) of the 1998 Act). In the absence of any statutory rules to facilitate such a process, the Tribunal itself, in the form of guidelines, has drafted and published what is an appropriate form to use in this regard. It is, of course, the "EE1 Form" which, as above stated, Mr. Brannigan used to lodge his complaint in this case. On the page which requires details of the complaint (para. 7 supra), there is a printed footnote indicating that time limits apply and referring the applicant to the published explanatory notes which are said to be applicable. At Note 4, the Tribunal refers to the six month period and gives an example of when it ends in a single incident situation and also when it ends where the discrimination extends over a period of time. Although the commentary is in no way binding, nevertheless it is both informative and instructive in alerting the reader to be conscious of such period.

32. I agree with the view that there is nothing sacrosanct about the use of an EE1 Form to activate the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. I see no reason why any method of written communication could not, in principle, serve the same purpose; in fact the Tribunal itself has so held in A Female Employee v. A Building Products Company DEC-E2007-036. Indeed, it is arguable that even a verbalised complaint would be sufficient to this end. The point at issue, however, is not about the form of initiation and certainly not whether its content is rigidly prescriptive or not. I can readily understand how, if utilised by a lay individual, the entirety of a complaint in terms of scope and detail may be somewhat lacking. Evidently it would defeat the spirit of the legislation if "court formalities" were required: as Hedigan J. said in Clare County Council v. Director of Equality Investigations & Ors [2011] I.E.H.C. 303, one cannot expect lay persons to articulate complaints in the same way as professionally qualified advocates. None of these general matters are in issue as such. Nor is it on point to ask whether the Tribunal can assist in this respect or, as put somewhat disparagingly by the VEC, can reformulate the complaint. This is not really the issue. Rather, the substantive dispute is that as set out at paras. 28-30 supra.

33. There is no doubt but that the EE1 Form, or the terms of complaint, refers only to two specific incidents, the first of which is stated to have occurred in December, 2005, and the second in March, 2006. Thus, on its face and without more, the outer time limit for seeking redress is six months from the incident in March, 2006, i.e. September of that year. That a complaint as such was made within this time cannot be disputed; indeed, Mr. Brannigan could have varied or altered that complaint or made an entirely new one at any time up to the end of that period. That did not occur; instead he made a further submission one year later, in September, 2007, which unarguably considerably extends the incidents of alleged discrimination as outlined in the EE1 Form. In that submission Mr. Brannigan referred, inter alia, to:-

- the then principal calling him honky tonks in 1997;
- disparaging remarks made when his long time partner called at the school in October, 1998;
- discriminatory treatment in 1999;

- how the VEC dealt with complaints by students in April, 1999;
- being called a queer and bastard, although dates are not given, nor details mentioned.

These are but examples, as is evident from the 2009 submission where, in addition to outlining further incidents, the term "continuing discrimination" is used for the first time.

34. The substantive question remains: in light of the statutory provisions which I have mentioned and in the context of the relevant dates, i.e. six months from the latest incident, which period expired on the 10th September, 2006, can the matters identified in either or both of the submissions above referred to, in and of themselves be investigated by the equality officer for the purposes of redress. It is these matters which constitute what is termed the "historical evidence" in this judgment (see also para. 8 supra).

Role of Tribunal:

35. It is both a trite and historical principle of law that a creature of statute must live by the statute. Its jurisdiction is found solely within the provisions of the enabling Act. It has no inherent capacity, unlike, say, that of a constitutional court. It is therefore bound by what has been conferred on it. It has no further competence and it cannot create, add to or enlarge the jurisdiction so vested in it. Killeen v. Director of Public Prosecutions [1997] 3 I.R. 218. It is bound by what jurisdiction it has and must act accordingly.

36. Therefore, when considering the substantive issue, it must be remembered that the Tribunal inquires into referred incidents of discrimination: it looks at prohibited conduct of which it is notified. It has no function in a situation such as this to embark upon a wide ranging inquiry into discrimination generally, or to generally investigate such discrimination; it does not conduct investigations proprio motu into discrimination which has not been the subject of a statutory referral to the Tribunal. Rather, it determines what lawfully has been referred to it with a view to providing redress to that applicant for any discrimination as found. The Tribunal cannot as such freelance its inquiry.

37. Once a complaint is made to the Director within the six month period, then "that" complaint has been made within time: it can thus be said that it has been lawfully referred. However, an issue might still arise, as it does in this instance, as to what is lawfully within the scope or remit of such complaint. Such an issue must be resolved, but by whom? Almost invariably it will be the entity, body or tribunal so created. In this case that competence is expressly recognised, or at least can be strongly inferred from the provisions of s. 79(3A) of the 1998 Act. That provision, in its material parts, reads as follows:-

> "(3A) If, in a case which is referred to the Director … a question arises relating to the entitlement of any party to bring or contest proceedings under that section, including:-
> (a) whether the complaint has complied with the statutory requirements relating to such referrals,
>
> (b) …

or

(d) any other related question of law or fact,

the Director may direct that the question be investigated as a preliminary issue and shall proceed accordingly."

Whilst the focus of that provision is on the manner in which any disputed question might be resolved, i.e. as a preliminary issue, nonetheless it would seem quite futile to have such a measure unless the officer in question could adjudicate on such matters.

38. Even in the absence of this statutory provision, however, I would be quite prepared to imply such a jurisdiction from the conferring provisions of the Act. Where, as in this case, a body is entrusted with the power to investigate and thereafter to adjudicate, it must in my view likewise have the authority to determine whether a claim is or is not within its jurisdiction. This must be taken as the situation unless the legislation stipulates otherwise: no such indication appears in this case.

39. The judgment of Davitt P. in The State (Attorney General) v. Judge Durcan [1964] I.R. 279 supports the proposition that a statutory body, such as a tribunal, is the appropriate entity to determine in the first instance whether the claim before it is within its jurisdiction. The learned President stated at p. 289 of the report that:-

> "[W]here the Legislature clearly provides that a Court is to have a limited jurisdiction dependent upon the existence of a certain state of affairs, the Court, before purporting to exercise its jurisdiction, will inquire and decide whether the requisite state of affairs does exist; but its decision is not the factor upon which its jurisdiction depends. If its decision is wrong and the requisite state of affairs does not exist in fact, then what the Court does in purported exercise of its jurisdiction is done without, and in excess of, jurisdiction."

Similarly, it was acknowledged in Ryanair v. The Labour Court [2007] 4 I.R. 199 that the Labour Court was the appropriate body to inquire into its own jurisdiction, albeit that it is not entitled to make legal errors when doing so.

40. The VEC has also submitted that if the equality officer should find that the historical evidence comes within the six month period, then by such finding she would in effect be conferring a jurisdiction not vested in her by the 1998 Act. I reject that submission. In my view, it is a misunderstanding of her role in this context. It is the legislature which has given the officer power to make such a finding, and which has also provided for the consequences of that finding (paras. 23-25 supra). If such should come to pass, the resulting jurisdiction would be statutory based and not self created by the officer in question.

The Preliminary Hearing Issue:

41. In a slightly different context, I have earlier referred to s. 79 of the 1998 Act (para. 37 supra), but that provision is also relevant for different reasons. Under subs. (3A) of that section, as one can see, the Director is given power to determine by way of a preliminary issue any of the matters therein mentioned.

42. No formal application has ever been made for the holding of such a hearing but, at least on one reading, the submission made by the VEC at the commencement of the inquiry, though advanced very late in the day, may be considered to be such a request. That was refused by Ms. Murtagh. It is clear that the provision in question is discretionary and that she is not bound in any way to accede to such a request.

43. Even without such a statutory provision, however, I would be quite satisfied that, subject to overall fair procedures, an equality officer has a sizeable degree of latitude in deciding how the hearing before her should be conducted. This conclusion is supported also by the decision in the case of Aer Lingus Teoranta v. Labour Court [1990] I.L.R.M. 485 where it was held, albeit in the context of the Labour Court, that such a body could decide whether the complaints were made within time or not, either by way of a preliminary inquiry or as part of a unitary hearing involving also the merits of the case. Walsh J., speaking for the Court, put the matter as follows: "The Labour Court is quite free to have [a preliminary] hearing if it wishes but I do not think it is correct to claim that it must have such a hearing." I respectfully agree and would apply the same dicta to s. 79 of the 1998 Act.

44. The type of decision made by Ms. Murtagh in this case can also be regarded as somewhat akin to a case management type decision, rather than one raising any issue of law. Even so, however, and whilst I would be very slow to interfere with an officer's procedural autonomy, nonetheless that is not to say that she is totally at large in what decision she might make. There could, for example, be cases which would greatly benefit both the parties and the Tribunal in terms of efficiency, expedition and cost savings if the issues, or at least a decisive issue, were determined on a preliminary basis, rather than by way of a full hearing. Whilst I am not in any way suggesting that if faced with such circumstances her decision would be other than appropriate, I simply make the point to emphasise that, in certain admittedly rather exceptional circumstances, such a procedural decision may be amenable to judicial review. In the overall context, however, a significant degree of self determination will be respected, subject to the overriding principles of natural and constitutional justice (see Calor Teoranta v. McCarthy [2009] I.E.H.C. 139).

45. It must be noted that whilst at the outset of these proceedings the VEC made certain submissions on this point, nonetheless that body ultimately acknowledged that the actual decision so made by the officer could not be regarded as being a misapplication of her powers under s. 79 of the 1998 Act. Therefore, the resolution of this appeal does not turn on that particular decision so made by Ms. Murtagh.

Conclusion:

46. The critical issue of substance which remains alive between the parties is whether the legislative process demands, howsoever achieved, that the incident or series of incidents in respect of which redress can lawfully be sought must be notified within the statutory time limit, obviously with due regard to the date of occurrence, if that should be appropriate. If it does, is it correct to say that any matter notified outside of this period, whether or not of the same general nature as those asserted within the period, cannot of itself constitute an act of discrimination? It follows, if such be the case, that an equality officer would have no jurisdiction to investigate such matters for that purpose. Certainly, if this analysis is correct, any claim which does not meet this condition precedent cannot be admitted as such.

47. However, even if that proposition is correct, the same does not mean that such evidence cannot be received in any circumstances. That is not the situation. If such evidence is tendered for a reason or purpose not contemplated by the limitation period, then it will not be declared inadmissible on that ground. The instant case is a good example of the distinction which I make. It is accepted by the VEC that the historical evidence may be offered for a purpose or reason which does not offend s. 77 of the 1998 Act. Such a purpose might, for example, be by way of background, or to enlighten or inform the content of the EE1 Form. In fact, any evidence which is relevant to and has probative value in respect of any facts in issue in relation to matters captured by the complaint, if timely made, could in principle be admitted. It is to prevent the use of such evidence to ground a discriminatory act for redress purposes which s. 77 is focused on.

48. It is not seriously in issue but that Ms. Murtagh has not made a "formal" decision regarding either the admissibility of the historical evidence or the use to which it may be put, which as pointed out are two quite distinct issues. In other words, she has not determined the substantive point as raised by the VEC in its submission to her. In fact, such a contention would be wholly unsustainable given the evidence of the equality officer which has not been contradicted. In several different paragraphs of her affidavit she states and frequently repeats the averment that she has made no decision on that crucial issue. She goes on to point out that when all of the evidence is heard, she will at that point make the decision on this contested issue. That being so it is quite clear, given the views which I have previously expressed, that she is the person vested with the lawful authority to make such decision in the first instance. Consequently, despite the force of the VEC's submission that by the course of conduct pursued she should be regarded as having made an "informal" decision, rejecting its view point, I am satisfied that such an inference cannot override the stated position of the officer.

49. Having said that, however, and despite the discretion which the equality officer undoubtedly has, I must confess that I have considerable difficulty in understanding why she feels it necessary to hear the entirety of the evidence before determining the contested issue. I could readily see why such a course would be entirely appropriate if the issue was whether or not certain acts could be linked to other acts for the purposes of establishing a continuum under s. 77(5)(a) of the Act, or as part of her inquiry into a regime or practice of ongoing discrimination under s. 77(6A) of the Act, as both provisions are understood in the case law. If either were in issue, then of course embarking upon a full hearing in appropriate circumstances would be understandable.

50. But that is not the inquiry which she must address. It is, as previously stated, whether, irrespective of the nature of the historical evidence and irrespective of whether or not it might form a continuum under either provision, such matters in their own right can, in the absence of notification within time, be the subject matter of a lawful investigation by her for discriminatory purposes. Perhaps there is some reason not immediately obvious which I am missing as to why she decided to proceed as she has: in any event, though not without some hesitation, I believe that no judicial intervention should take place before a decision is made on the VEC's application.

51. In addition, in accordance with long established principle, there is a presumption that both the process of making the decision and the decision itself will have due regard to natural and constitutional justice and, furthermore, will be made in accordance with law and therefore within the jurisdiction conferred on her under the 1998 Act. Accordingly, there could be no basis for this Court to intervene and in some way anticipate or infer that she will act unlawfully. In these circumstances, the appeal will have to be dismissed.

52. Given this conclusion, it would not be appropriate to make any comment on the facts as disclosed, much less on whether the relevant statutory provisions permit the reception of the historical evidence as of itself forming the basis for a discriminatory finding. This appeal is not an appeal on the discrimination claim and neither is it any form of a consultative case stated or the like. Moreover, the Court is not asked for a view as to how Ms. Murtagh should decide the application standing before her upon which she emphatically claims that no decision has yet been made. In fact, it was strongly submitted on behalf of the Tribunal and supported by the notice party that in the first instance such a decision should be made by her, and her alone, and that she intends to do so in accordance with law. That is how the appeal was presented and essentially argued. Whilst I appreciate that the approach which I have adopted may give rise to further litigation, I have no reason to believe that it necessarily will. In fact, I sincerely hope that it does not.

53. Accordingly, I do not believe that any views on the substantive law should be offered. I therefore regard many of the observations made by the learned trial judge as being purely obiter: in particular in this regard, I would expressly decline to endorse his views which I have summarised at paras. 9(iv) and (v) above. I do so because at the forefront of the respondent's case is that such matters are, in the first instance, solely for the Tribunal to decide. Therefore, noting the nature of these proceedings, it would be to infringe that right to offer any advisory views on the course which she should take and the decision which she should make. I therefore reserve for another case any views which I may have on these issues.

54. In the same context, it should also be noted that no application to amend the terms of complaint has been made. This is not what is facing the equality officer. If it was, quite different considerations might come into play and some reference to court procedure may or may not be appropriate, depending on the circumstances. What she has to decide is whether the correct interpretation and application of, inter alia, ss. 77, 79 and 82 of the 1998 Act permits the classification of the historical evidence to come within the EE1 Form for redress purposes. This evidently is quite distinct from entertaining an application to amend that form. Again, therefore, I will make no comment on what the law might be if such an application had been made. In these circumstances, I would again regard the observations made by the learned trial judge relative to this point as being purely obiter.

55. The effect of this decision, therefore, is that the inquiry must be resumed, it being hoped that with the cooperation of all the parties, it can be brought to a swift conclusion in the near future. How best to process the continuation of the investigation is, of course, a matter for Ms. Murtagh. Furthermore, if the VEC wishes to submit that there is an overlap for the purposes of s. 101 of the 1998 Act between the plenary proceedings and the instant inquiry, then evidently that matter can be raised and addressed by both parties if such should arise.

56. For the above reasons the appeal will be dismissed.

Barry McKelvey, Plaintiff v. Iarnród Éireann/Irish Rail, Defendant [2019] IESC 79, [S.C. No. 178 of 2018]

Supreme Court 11 November 2019

Employment law – Interlocutory injunction – Disciplinary process – Fair procedures – Legal representation – Entitlement to legal representation at internal disciplinary hearing – Test for intervention in ongoing disciplinary process – Whether court intervention restraining commencement of disciplinary process appropriate – Whether application for relief premature – Whether legal representation necessary – Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice on Grievance and Disciplinary Procedures) (Declaration) Order 2000 (S.I. No. 146) – Industrial Relations Act 1990 (No. 19), s. 42.

The plaintiff, an employee of the defendant, was subject to an investigation concerning the misappropriation of company property. As a result of that investigative process, the defendant proposed to commence disciplinary proceedings alleging theft. Solicitors on behalf of the plaintiff asserted an entitlement to represent him at any hearings that might take place as part of that disciplinary process. However, the defendant stated that it did not consider that the plaintiff was entitled to be so represented since there was no provision for legal representation in the defendant's disciplinary code; rather, this code provided for representation by a fellow employee or a trade union official.

On application by the plaintiff, the High Court (Murphy J.) granted an injunction restraining the defendant from commencing disciplinary proceedings in respect of the plaintiff unless his entitlement to be legally represented was granted. The defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal (Irvine, Whelan and Baker JJ.), which allowed the appeal and discharged the injunction (see [2018] IECA 346). The plaintiff was granted leave to appeal to the Supreme Court (see [2019] IESCDET 50).

Held by the Supreme Court (Clarke C.J., MacMenamin, Dunne, Charleton and O'Malley JJ.), in dismissing the appeal, 1, that where an employee sought to restrain a disciplinary process on the basis that there was an implied entitlement to legal representation that was being denied, the court had to determine whether it was clear at that stage in the disciplinary process concerned that the process could not be regarded as fair unless the employee was afforded legal representation. A court should not restrain a disciplinary process prior to its conclusion unless it was clear, at the stage when an injunction was sought, that something had occurred that was sufficiently serious and incapable of being cured so that there was no realistic prospect of a legally sustainable conclusion being reached at the end of the process.

Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355 applied.

2. That a regime, whether contractual or statutory, that provided for a disciplinary process contained an implied term, if there was no express term to the same effect, that the relevant process would be fair; however, precisely what was required to ensure that a process was fair was dependent on a variety of factors and might well vary from case to case.

3. That when considering whether any process was fair, in the context of representation, the question was not whether a particular type of representation might give some added value, but whether its absence could be said to leave the person concerned without an adequate level of representation; the level that would be considered adequate would depend on an overall assessment of all of the circumstances of the process envisaged.

R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex p. Tarrant [1985] Q.B. 251 and Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682 approved. The State (Healy) v. Donoghue [1976] I.R. 325 and Carmody v. Minister for Justice [2009] IESC 71, [2010] 1 I.R. 635 considered.

4. That the proper approach to the question of whether a disciplinary process could be regarded as unfair because of the absence of an entitlement to legal representation was for the court to consider the seriousness of the charge and of the potential penalty; whether any points of law were likely to arise; the capacity of a particular person to present his or her own case; any procedural difficulty; the need for reasonable speed in making the adjudication; the need for fairness between the parties; and any other appropriate factors. These considerations were not matters that needed to be separately established but rather were factors to be taken into account in an overall assessment as to whether a fair process could take place without legal representation. The overarching principle was that legal representation would only be required as a matter of fairness in exceptional cases.

Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682 explained.

5. That an internal disciplinary process was not a criminal trial. While the process had to be fair, the formal rules of evidence or the procedures that governed either criminal or civil proceedings did not necessarily apply. What was required was that the plaintiff and his trade union representative be given a reasonable opportunity to challenge the evidence against him on any reasonable basis.

Per Charleton J. (concurring): While criminal trial rights were not universally applicable to all inquiries, there were minimum standards which, despite anything written in a contract of employment, could not be infringed. These were set at a level which recognised that the introduction of criminal trial structures into a procedure that was supposed to be implemented by people without legal training, but through the application of fairness, common sense and shrewdness, was not required as a matter of law.

6. That the fact that the allegation was one of theft and an adverse result to the process could result in dismissal was a factor to be taken into account but did not, of itself, bring a case into a category where it could be shown that legal representation was necessitated.

7. That although the fact that theft could also be a criminal offence was a relevant factor, it was a factor that was of limited weight because any result of a disciplinary process could have no bearing on a criminal trial where the guilt of an accused would have to be established beyond reasonable doubt.

Obiter dicta, per Charleton J.: 1. The place to start, and often to end, was the contract of employment: if the contract or the statute governing a person's employment contained a procedure whereby the employment could be terminated, it usually would be sufficient for the employer to show that he had complied with that procedure.

Mooney v. An Post [1998] 4 I.R. 288 approved.

2. Where the grievance procedure contained in the contract of employment clearly stated that the employee was entitled to be represented at a disciplinary hearing by a colleague or a registered trade union official but not by any other person or body unconnected with the enterprise, that, as a matter of contract, disposed of the argument that the procedures involved require the presence of lawyers.

3. Such cases as supported the proposition that a lawyer was sometimes, but very rarely, necessary in employment matters were derived from public law and should be confined within a public law context.

Appeal from the Court of Appeal

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgments of Clarke C.J. and Charleton J., infra.

By application for leave and notice of appeal dated 7 December 2018, the plaintiff sought leave pursuant to Article 34.5.3° of the Constitution to appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment ([2018] IECA 346) and order of the Court of Appeal (Irvine, Whelan and Baker JJ.), dated 31 October 2018 and 12 November 2018 respectively, allowing the defendant's appeal and setting aside the order and judgment of the High Court (Murphy J.) dated 28 July 2017.

By determination dated 25 February 2019, the Supreme Court (O'Donnell, MacMenamin and Finlay Geoghegan JJ.) granted the plaintiff leave to appeal ([2019] IESCDET 50).

The appeal was heard by the Supreme Court (Clarke C.J., MacMenamin, Dunne, Charleton and O'Malley JJ.) on 17 October 2019.

Cur. adv. vult.

Clarke C.J. 11 November 2019

1. Introduction

[1] There are very many recent cases in which both first instance and appellate courts have had to consider the circumstances in which it is appropriate to grant injunctions in the context of workplace disciplinary proceedings. It might well have been thought that the law in this area is reasonably well settled. However, the particular, and important, issue which came into focus in these proceedings before both the High Court and the Court of Appeal was the question of the entitlement of an employee who was the subject of disciplinary proceedings to be legally represented at an internal hearing to be conducted by his employer as part of an agreed code.

[2] The plaintiff/appellant ("Mr. McKelvey") is an employee of the defendant/respondent ("Iarnród Éireann"). In circumstances which it will be necessary to outline in a little more detail in due course, he was initially subject to an investigation concerning what was said to be the potentially irregular purchase of fuel using a company card. As a result of that investigative process, Iarnród Éireann proposed to commence disciplinary proceedings alleging, in substance, misuse of the card in question amounting to what might reasonably be called theft of fuel. Solicitors on behalf of Mr. McKelvey raised various issues concerning the process but, so far as the appeal to this court is concerned, asserted an entitlement to represent Mr. McKelvey at any hearing or hearings which might take place as part of that disciplinary process. Iarnród Éireann made clear that they did not consider that Mr. McKelvey was entitled to be so represented.

[3] In those circumstances, an injunction was sought from the High Court to prevent the disciplinary process going ahead. A number of grounds were relied on, including the assertion that Mr. McKelvey was entitled to legal representation and that Iarnród Éireann had declined to recognise this fact. For the reasons set out in its judgment delivered on 28 July 2017, the High Court (Murphy J.) granted Mr. McKelvey an injunction in the following terms:

> "It is ordered that the defendant Iarnród Éireann/Irish Rail be restrained from commencing with the disciplinary hearing in respect of the said plaintiff unless his entitlement to be legally represented is granted."

[4] Iarnród Éireann appealed to the Court of Appeal. For the reasons set out in the judgment of Irvine J. (Baker and Whelan JJ. concurring) ([2018] IECA 346), the appeal was allowed and the injunction discharged. Thereafter, Mr. McKelvey sought and obtained leave to appeal to this court. It is appropriate, therefore, to start with the basis on which leave to appeal was granted.

2. The leave to appeal

[5] In the application for leave filed, it was asserted by Mr. McKelvey that leave to appeal to the Supreme Court should be granted on the basis that the issue of the circumstances in which an employee ought to be afforded the benefit of legal representation at a workplace disciplinary hearing was a matter of general public importance. Mr. McKelvey further sought to query the extent to which an employer can rely on the code of practice issued under the Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice on Grievance and Disciplinary Procedures) (Declaration) Order 2000 (S.I. No. 146) in order to refuse a request for legal representation. In the respondent's notice, Iarnród Éireann, opposing the application for leave, asserted that Mr. McKelvey's application for an interlocutory injunction was premature and that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be further affirmed on this ground.

[6] In a determination of this court dated 25 February 2019 ([2019] IESCDET 50), leave was granted on the grounds set out in the application for leave, on the basis that an issue of general public importance had been raised. The court held, at para. 6 thereof, that:

> "… the court is satisfied that the question of the circumstances in which it can be said that an employee or office holder, other than a prison officer, is entitled to legal representation in disciplinary proceedings raises an issue of general importance which merits consideration by this court."

[7] For reasons which I hope will become apparent, it is clear (and was not an issue of any dispute between the parties) that the entitlement to be legally represented at internal disciplinary proceedings can be dependent on facts associated with the nature of the allegations which form the subject of the process and on the likely course of the process itself. For that reason, it is important to provide some background as to the disciplinary process which Mr. McKelvey sought to restrain.

3. The disciplinary process

[8] Mr. McKelvey had been an employee of Iarnród Éireann since 1999 and was promoted to the position of per way inspector in 2013. He was assigned to division 3, where his responsibilities included managing employees charged with maintaining the Cork to Dublin railway line. In the course of his work, he had been provided with fuel cards to facilitate the refuelling of company vehicles and machinery. Other Iarnród Éireann employees also have the use of such cards.

[9] In July 2016, concerns arose within Iarnród Éireann regarding the level of expenditure on fuel cards issued to the employees within division 3. In broad terms, the apparent irregularities in fuel purchasing involved the purchase of fuel in amounts significantly higher than that of other divisions, indicating excessive use of the fuel cards, the purchase of both diesel and unleaded petrol using small plant cards, in circumstances where such cards were normally used to purchase small quantities of unleaded petrol to fuel small plant equipment, and the purchase of fuel in locations and at times which did not appear to be consistent with proper usage nor in accordance with the activities of the division.

[10] As a result, a preliminary investigation into the matter was carried out, in the course of which a number of employees were interviewed. Mr. McKelvey was interviewed on a number of dates between August 2016 and February 2017, the notes of which meetings have been exhibited to the court by way of affidavit. It is apparent that the concerns of Iarnród Éireann regarding the purchasing irregularities were put to Mr. McKelvey and that his individual usage of fuel cards was queried. It was suggested by Mr. McKelvey, in response, that such purchases could have been made by other staff members using his cards.

[11] By letter dated 13 March 2017, Mr. McKelvey was informed that he was being suspended on basic pay until further notice as a result of the investigation into the use of fuel cards. Two other employees were also suspended on the same basis. On 8 May 2017, Iarnród Éireann formally commenced disciplinary proceedings against Mr. McKelvey by issuing a Disciplinary Advice Form A document in respect of the charge of:

> "Theft of fuel through the misuse of a company fuel card(s), which has resulted with the company suffering a significant financial loss."

[12] The allegations levelled against Mr. McKelvey, which it is understood that he will have to meet at the disciplinary hearing, are set out in a document which could be properly characterised as a charge sheet, as contained in the "evidence file" furnished to him by Iarnród Éireann at his request in May 2017. This document refers to both individual transactions made using the fuel cards which were provided to Mr. McKelvey (being both, it appears, a small plant card to fuel small plant equipment and a personal fuel card to fuel a company vehicle for business use) and broader patterns of fuel purchasing between 2015 and 2016 involving the use of Mr. McKelvey's fuel cards and the fuel cards assigned to division 3.

[13] In that document, it is asserted that excessive amounts of fuel were purchased using Mr. McKelvey's fuel cards during this time and at various locations around the country. It is said that Mr. McKelvey's fuel cards were often in use at weekends, on public holidays and during periods when he was on annual leave and that they were occasionally used in different locations in quick succession. The details included a suggestion that a large number of transactions were made on Mr. McKelvey's personal fuel card between 2015 and 2016, totalling 3,386 litres of diesel, many of which indicated purchases apparently in excess of the fuel tank capacity of his car. For a number of months in 2015, the small plant card provided to Mr. McKelvey was used to purchase diesel, as against usual practice as outlined above, but from September 2015 onwards, the card was said to have been used to purchase large amounts of petrol. Further, upon the expiry of Mr. McKelvey's small plant card in 2016, it was alleged that Mr. McKelvey proceeded to use cards assigned to division 3 to purchase excessive amounts of fuel. Mr. McKelvey is also alleged to have used a vehicle in division 3 without authorisation on one specific occasion. This contention is not important for the purposes of these proceedings.

[14] In response, Mr. McKelvey stated during his interviews that the large amounts of diesel purchased were for the purposes of fuelling the tower lights equipment and that another possible explanation for the patterns of fuel purchasing was that his fuel cards were taken and used by other staff members without his knowledge. In this respect, the evidence file also alleges that Mr. McKelvey attempted to influence staff to say that they had used his fuel cards but that the staff concerned refused to do so and denied that they would ever have used the cards. This contention had not been put to Mr. McKelvey during the course of the investigation.

[15] Following the receipt of the Form A document in May 2017, Mr. McKelvey requested a personal hearing. Correspondence was subsequently exchanged between Iarnród Éireann and solicitors acting on behalf of Mr. McKelvey, in the course of which it was requested that Mr. McKelvey be allowed representation by a solicitor and counsel at the disciplinary hearing, given what was said to be the complexity of the allegation and what Mr. McKelvey perceived was a lack of information in relation thereto. In particular, in an affidavit sworn by Mr. McKelvey, it is apparent that he considers the fact that two other employees were accused of the same offence to be a significant "complicating factor", in circumstances where he had not been furnished with their statements and was unaware whether the disciplinary hearing would involve all three accused employees.

[16] Mr. McKelvey's request for legal representation was refused by Iarnród Éireann on the basis that there was no provision for representation by solicitor and/or counsel in the formal procedures prescribed by the Grievance and Disciplinary Policies and Procedures of Iarnród Éireann ("the Iarnród Éireann Disciplinary Code"). Rather, this code provides the employee with "the right to representation by fellow employee or trade union representative". In an affidavit which is before this court sworn by Mr. Danaher, an employee of Iarnród Éireann, it is deposed that Mr. McKelvey's trade union representative, Mr. Cullen, is considered to be an experienced official, highly familiar with Iarnród Éireann's disciplinary procedures. Mr. McKelvey deposes that Mr. Cullen's representation of his co-accused in the disciplinary hearing gives rise to a conflict.

[17] It should be noted that, at this juncture, a separate dispute had arisen between the parties in relation to the provision, in advance of the proposed hearing, of documentary evidence concerning the allegation made against Mr. McKelvey. However, this dispute is not relevant to this appeal. Prior to the proposed date of the disciplinary hearing, Mr. McKelvey had been provided with the "evidence file", which comprises the charge sheet referred to above, a spreadsheet entitled "Tower Lights on Site 2015/2016" and an untitled spreadsheet recording hundreds of transactions made using the fuel cards of division 3. In accordance with the procedures outlined in the Iarnród Éireann Disciplinary Code, Mr. McKelvey should be furnished with any outstanding documentation which he considers relevant at the commencement of the hearing and can request an adjournment to the hearing in order to consider same.

[18] The procedures contained within the Iarnród Éireann Disciplinary Code were agreed between Iarnród Éireann and the relevant trade unions representing its employees and were accepted by a ballot vote of staff in 1994. It was accepted by the parties that the code is in compliance with the code of practice set out in the Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice on Grievance and Disciplinary Procedures) (Declaration) Order 2000 (S.I. No. 146), the purpose of which is to provide guidance to employers, employees and their representatives on the general principles which apply in the operation of grievance and disciplinary procedures and which itself is silent as to the question of legal representation of employees during a workplace disciplinary process. Paragraph 4.4 of the code set out therein defines an "employee representative" as including "a colleague of the employee's choice and a registered trade union but not any other person or body unconnected with the enterprise".

[19] This statutory instrument was published pursuant to s. 42 of the Industrial Relations Act 1990. Subsections (4) and (5) thereof, as amended, provide:

> "(4) In any proceedings before a court, the Labour Court, the Commission, the Employment Appeals Tribunal, Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission or a rights commissioner, a code of practice shall be admissible in evidence and any provision of the code which appears to the court, body or officer concerned to be relevant to any question arising in the proceedings shall be taken into account in determining that question.

(5) A failure on the part of any person to observe any provision of a code of practice shall not of itself render him liable to any proceedings."

[20] Notwithstanding that the Iarnród Éireann Disciplinary Code refers only to an employee's right to representation by a fellow employee, it has not been disputed by the parties that Iarnród Éireann has a discretion to permit Mr. McKelvey to be legally represented at the disciplinary hearing. Further, it is not disputed that the Iarnród Éireann Disciplinary Code was notified to Mr. McKelvey as part of his contract of employment.

[21] It was against that background that these proceedings were launched. It will be necessary to examine the legal principles in more detail in due course, both in the context of analysing the decisions of the High Court and of the Court of Appeal and of setting out the basis on which I would propose that this court address the matter. However, in brief summary, there are two questions of law which potentially arise on this appeal, both of which derive from legal propositions to be found in recent case law. It is perhaps appropriate to briefly set out those propositions at this stage.

4. The legal principles

[22] In the course of both the written and the oral procedure before this court, it was accepted by both sides that the decision of Geoghegan J., speaking for this court in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682, represented the law concerning the entitlement to have legal representation at a disciplinary process such as that which is at issue here. There was some debate between counsel as to the proper interpretation of what this court decided in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison, but it is clear that both the High Court and the Court of Appeal also operated, quite correctly, on the basis that the fundamental principles applicable to the question of whether there is an entitlement to legal representation can be found in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison.

[23] The second legal principle which is of some relevance is the question of the appropriateness or otherwise of a court intervening either before or during (as opposed to at the end of) a disciplinary process. In that regard, the most recent decision of this court is to be found in my judgment in Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355.

[24] While it will again be necessary to refer in a little more detail to the judgment in that case in due course, it is fair to say that the basic principle identified is to the effect that courts should be reluctant to intervene while a disciplinary process is ongoing but rather should wait until the process has come to an end and then decide whether the result of that process is sustainable in law. However, the judgment in Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355 also recognises that there may be cases where it is clear that the process has, as it were, "gone off the rails" to such an extent that there could be no reasonable prospect that any ultimate determination could be sustainable in law. In such cases, it is clear that the court can and should intervene at an interlocutory stage to prevent a process continuing in circumstances where the result of that process will almost certainly be redundant.

[25] It was in the context of those broad principles that the courts below determined the issues arising, although clearly taking a different view as to the proper application of those principles to the circumstances of this case. It is next appropriate, therefore, to consider the reasoning of both the High Court and the Court of Appeal in reaching those different conclusions.

5. The judgments in the lower courts

[26] As mentioned above, both the High Court and Court of Appeal considered that the fundamental principles applicable to the question of whether there is an entitlement to legal representation were to be found in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682. In the High Court, Murphy J. relied in particular upon a set of criteria to be considered in the context of a request for legal representation, as first identified by Webster J. in R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex p. Tarrant [1985] Q.B. 251, and approved by Geoghegan J. in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison as a series of factors which should serve as "starting off points" from which to approach such a request. These were set out at para. 14, p. 688, of the judgment of Geoghegan J. as:

"1. the seriousness of the charge and of the potential penalty;
2. whether any points of law are likely to arise;
3. the capacity of a particular prisoner to present his own case;
4. procedural difficulty;
5. the need for reasonable speed in making the adjudication, that being an important consideration; and
6. the need for fairness as between prisoners and as between prisoners and prison officers."

[27] Applying those criteria to the facts of these proceedings, and in light of what was described as the "complexity" of the case, the High Court judge held that it was clear that Mr. McKelvey satisfied the test for the provision of legal representation and she granted the reliefs sought. Each criterion, as set out above, was considered in turn; first, it was held that the charge of theft alleged against Mr. McKelvey was very serious and that both the potential penalty of dismissal and the potential for reputational damage which the charge carried were significant. The High Court judge then found that multiple points of law were likely to arise in the disciplinary hearing, including issues of alleged flaws in the investigation, of imprecision in the charges levelled against Mr. McKelvey and of whether the defendant must establish loss.

[28] In respect of the third criterion, the High Court judge considered, in light of what she considered to be the convoluted facts and multiple witnesses likely to be involved in the hearing, that "[t]he notion that the plaintiff has the capacity to navigate such a process unaided is frankly ridiculous". In terms of procedural difficulty, the High Court judge found that the procedures to be adopted during the disciplinary hearing were unclear and this was therefore an area in which Mr. McKelvey might well require the assistance of legal representation.

[29] Addressing the need for reasonable speed in making the adjudication, it was held that while allowing legal representation would slow the disciplinary process down, the negative impact of this delay on Iarnród Éireann was "relatively minor" due to the fact that Mr. McKelvey was suspended. Finally, in respect of the need for fairness as between the parties, the High Court judge found that as Iarnród Éireann had chosen to allege theft against Mr. McKelvey, he had an entitlement to defend himself and to rebut the charges.

[30] Irvine J., delivering judgment in the Court of Appeal, held that the High Court judge erred in law and in fact in concluding that Iarnród Éireann incorrectly exercised its discretion in refusing Mr. McKelvey legal representation. Irvine J. held that while the criteria as considered in the High Court were a useful starting point from which to approach the issue, the core question which is to be determined in proceedings such as these, as set out by Geoghegan J. in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682, is whether a disciplinary hearing could be said to be unfair or in breach of the principles of natural and constitutional justice by reason of the fact that the employee does not have legal representation. In particular, Irvine J. relied on the proposition set out at para. 13, p. 688, of Geoghegan J.'s judgment, that "[t]he cases for which the respondent would be obliged to exercise a discretion in favour of permitting legal representation would be exceptional".

[31] Following the principle that it is undesirable to involve lawyers in workplace investigations, in light of the delay and increased costs which would result, unless it is established that there is something exceptional about the matters in question, Irvine J. held that there were no special or exceptional circumstances to warrant the conclusion that Mr. McKelvey would not receive a fair hearing in the absence of legal representation. In reaching this conclusion, she addressed the criteria which were considered by the trial judge in light of the evidence.

[32] While it was held that the charge alleged against Mr. McKelvey was properly classified as serious, Irvine J. considered that it was likely that the High Court judge ascribed undue weight to this factor. Further, it was held that the possibility that criminal proceedings may be instituted as a result of the conduct under investigation was not a particularly significant factor, as any finding made against Mr. McKelvey in the course of the disciplinary hearing would not be admissible as evidence against him in any such proceedings and it did not mean that the disciplinary hearing was of an exceptional nature, particularly given that the charge of theft was considered to be of a relatively straightforward nature. Irvine J. also considered that, in the circumstances of workplace disciplinary procedures, there was nothing exceptional about the sanction of dismissal to which Mr. McKelvey might be subjected, nor about the consequences of any adverse findings for his reputation and future employment prospects and, as such, these factors could not be dispositive of his entitlement to legal representation.

[33] Irvine J. disagreed with the conclusion of the High Court judge that multiple points of law were likely to arise in the course of the disciplinary hearing. It was held that the circumstances did not involve any issues of legal complexity; there was no evidence to suggest that any legal issue was likely to arise in respect of any possible flaws which there may have been in the preliminary investigation, as the charge will have to be established based on evidence adduced at the disciplinary hearing, and in addition, Irvine J. did not consider that there was anything imprecise about the charge of theft. Finally, issues of proof were held to involve questions of fact and it was considered that proof of loss would follow as a matter of fact if the evidence established that Mr. McKelvey used his fuel card for the improper purchases of fuel.

[34] Furthermore, it was held that there was no evidence to support the finding that Mr. McKelvey lacked the capacity to defend his interests at the disciplinary hearing, in circumstances where he was to be represented by Mr. Cullen, an experienced trade union official. Finally, Irvine J. rejected the High Court finding that there was a lack of clarity surrounding the procedures to be deployed at the disciplinary hearing and held that this was not a consideration to be correctly taken into account in the context of Mr. McKelvey's request for legal representation, particularly in light of the procedures clearly set out in Iarnród Éireann's Disciplinary Code. It was stressed that should an issue of legal complexity arise in the course of the disciplinary hearing, it would still be open to Mr. McKelvey to seek that the hearing be postponed in order to enable him to obtain legal representation.

[35] As noted earlier, Mr. McKelvey raised a number of issues before the High Court. One of the orders which he sought was that the disciplinary hearing be restrained pending the provision of documentation to him. However, the trial judge considered that this application was premature given that the hearing had not yet commenced and that the Iarnród Éireann Disciplinary Code provided for the provision of documentation at the beginning of the process.

[36] Insofar as the question of legal representation was concerned, neither the High Court nor the Court of Appeal dealt expressly with the question of the appropriateness or otherwise of intervening in advance of or during the disciplinary process. However, at the hearing before this court, it was accepted by both parties that the principle identified in Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355 was such that the court should only intervene if it was clear that legal representation was required. It seems to me that such was the correct approach. If it is clear that legal representation is required in a disciplinary process, then a denial of such representation would undoubtedly meet the criteria identified in Rowland v. An Post, for it would be equally clear that it would be highly unlikely that any decision made at the end of such a process would be sustainable. On the other hand, if it is not clear that legal representation is necessarily required, then it would follow that it would be premature for the court to intervene, for the court should not assume that legal representation would be wrongfully refused in circumstances where it had subsequently become clear that the process necessitated such representation in order that it be fair.

[37] In the light of that analysis, I turn next to the principles applicable to legal representation at internal disciplinary processes.

6. The principles applicable to legal representation

[38] I should start by indicating that I see no reason to depart from the approach adopted by Geoghegan J. in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682. No argument was made on this appeal on behalf of Iarnród Éireann to the effect that it did not have a discretion to allow legal representation in a disciplinary hearing and that such representation might be required where it might be necessitated in accordance with the principles set out in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison. In those circumstances, it does not seem to me that questions arise for resolution on this appeal as to whether it may be possible to exclude by contract any entitlement to legal representation in a private law employment dispute. For like reasons, no issues arise as to the extent to which different considerations might apply where an employer is a statutory undertaking. Finally, no disputes seem to me to arise in this case as to the type of language which would need to be set out in a disciplinary process in order to exclude a right of legal representation in all circumstances (assuming that this is legally possible). I would, therefore, leave those and related questions over to a case in which they clearly arose and were the subject of argument on behalf of the parties.

[39] It follows that I accept, at least for the purposes of this case, that there may be circumstances in which, in line with the reasoning in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682, Mr. McKelvey might be entitled to legal representation in the context of the type of disciplinary process which he faces. Before going on to consider the various factors which might be relevant in an assessment of whether an entitlement to legal representation exists, which were identified in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison by reference to the judgment of Webster J. in the United Kingdom in R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex p. Tarrant [1985] Q.B. 251, it does seem to me to be clear that the overarching principle identified by Geoghegan J. is to be found at p. 688 of his judgment, where he states:

> "13. …The cases for which the respondent would be obliged to exercise a discretion in favour of permitting legal representation would be exceptional … In any organisation where there are disciplinary procedures, it is wholly undesirable to involve legal representation unless in all the circumstances it would be required by the principles of constitutional justice."

[40] It is, of course, clear that a regime (whether contractual or statutory) that provides for a disciplinary process will contain an implied term (if there is no express term to the same effect) that the relevant process will be fair. However, it is also clear that precisely what is required to ensure that a process is fair in that sense will depend on a variety of factors and may well vary from case to case. The statement of Geoghegan J. to the effect that legal involvement may be necessary in some limited circumstances but ordinarily will not be necessary involves a finding that it is only in those cases where legal representation is necessary to achieve a fair hearing that any implied entitlement to such representation can be said to exist.

[41] In passing, it should be observed that a disciplinary scheme can, of course, make express provision for an entitlement to legal representation and, if it does, an employee will undoubtedly be entitled to be represented by a lawyer if such comes within the scope of whatever the scheme provides. Likewise, an employer will always be entitled to allow someone to be represented by a lawyer even if the person concerned may not have a legal entitlement in that regard. However, these proceedings are concerned with a disciplinary scheme which does not confer an express entitlement to a lawyer and where the employer does not wish to allow representation. It follows that the ultimate issue which any court has to determine in a case such as this is as to whether disciplinary proceedings continuing without legal representation would amount to unfair proceedings and thus be in breach of the implied term as to fairness. It follows, in turn, that such a breach could only be established where it can be shown that legal representation is "necessary" to ensure a fair process.

[42] It seems to me that the criteria of "necessity", as thus identified, requires further explanation. There may be many cases where the forensic skills of an experienced advocate with a legal qualification may enable the presentation of a case in a more favourable light. But it seems to me that to say that a case might be somewhat better presented by a lawyer falls a long way short of saying that the presence of a lawyer is necessitated in order for the process to be fair.

[43] It can hardly be doubted that the particular skills brought to bear by the most experienced and able counsel may add something to a case, whether in the courts or anywhere else, over and above that which might be brought to bear by a fully competent but not, perhaps, quite so experienced advocate. Even in the sphere of criminal law, not every accused will be able to have the benefit of the most outstanding defence counsel of the day. The fact that such a counsel might arguably bring something added to the case over and above its conduct by a perfectly competent and suitably experienced colleague could not lead to a contention that a trial was unfair simply because it might have been possible to find someone who might have been able to bring something additional to the table.

[44] When considering whether any process is fair, in the context of representation, the question is not whether a particular type of representation might give some added value but whether its absence can be said to leave the person concerned without an adequate level of representation. The level which will be considered adequate will depend on an overall assessment of all of the circumstances of the process envisaged. In that context, I would, at the level of principle, agree with the submission made by counsel for Mr. McKelvey to the effect that the proper approach to the approval by Geoghegan J. of the criteria identified in R. v. Secretary of State for the Home

Department, Ex p. Tarrant [1985] Q.B. 251 does not involve treating those criteria as elements which need to be necessarily separately established but rather that they, and any other appropriate factors, go into the overall evaluation made in the context of reaching an assessment as to whether legal representation is necessary in order for the process to be fair (as opposed to a consideration of whether legal representation might give some added value).

[45] It follows that the appropriate assessment to be made is as to whether it has been demonstrated that, in all of the circumstances of this case, legal representation is truly necessary in that sense. Before going on to apply that principle to the facts of this case it is, perhaps, worth mentioning the case of Carmody v. Minister for Justice [2009] IESC 71, [2010] 1 I.R. 635. While that case did involve the question of the level of legal representation to which an accused was entitled (rather than an entitlement to legal representation in the first place), and while it also involved a summary criminal trial, it seems to me that nonetheless some guidance can be obtained from the approach of the court. The issue was as to whether the accused was entitled under the legal aid scheme to counsel as well as a solicitor in the context of a summary trial of charges under the provisions of the Diseases of Animals Acts 1966, as amended, the European Communities (Registration of Bovine Animals) Regulations 1996, and the Brucellosis in Cattle (General Provisions) Order 1991, as amended. These charges involved the alleged wrongful movement and irregular registration of cattle. The evidence before the court came first from the solicitor assigned under the legal aid scheme to represent Mr. Carmody. He indicated that he was an experienced solicitor and regularly represented persons in summary trials before the District Court. However, he indicated that, in the particular circumstances of the case in question, he did not feel that he could do a proper job in defending the accused. That position was supported by an affidavit from a particularly experienced local solicitor who equally indicated that he almost always did his own defence work in the District Court but that he, too, would have instructed counsel in the case in question. Furthermore, it was clear that the prosecution intended to be represented by counsel. It was in the light of that powerful body of evidence, that the court concluded that it was necessary, in order that there be a fair trial, that counsel be instructed.

[46] That decision was, of course, against the background of the constitutional position identified in The State (Healy) v. Donoghue [1976] I.R. 325, which made clear that, in certain circumstances, an accused who could not provide for their own defence was entitled, as part of the requirement that they be tried in due course of law, to have legal assistance provided at the State's expense. As part of that entitlement, the court in Carmody v. Minister for Justice [2009] IESC 71, [2010] 1 I.R. 635 held that there were circumstances, admittedly unusual, where such an entitlement might extend to the requirement to have counsel instructed in summary District Court proceedings on the basis, in substance, that a trial without that level of legal representation would not be fair nor would it be a trial "in due course of law". But it is clear that there was very substantial evidence before the court to indicate that experienced criminal defence solicitors did not consider that they would be able to provide an adequate defence without instructing counsel. Doubtless there may be cases which are likely to be tried in the District Court on a summary basis where it might be said that the instruction of experienced defence counsel might add something to the defence. However, it is clear from Carmody v. Minister for Justice that it is necessary to go much further. It must be shown that the instruction of counsel is necessary in order for there to be a fair trial. If such considerations apply in the context of a criminal trial where the constitutional right to liberty is at play, then they apply with much greater force in the context of an internal disciplinary process.

[47] It follows that it is next necessary to consider whether there are any circumstances established on the evidence in this case which make clear that legal representation is necessary to ensure a fair process rather than, potentially, being merely of some possible advantage to the relevant employee.

[48] In addition, it is necessary to have regard to the principles identified in Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355. What is sought here is an interlocutory injunction to restrain a disciplinary process before it has begun. The same principles apply here as would apply in respect of an attempt to restrain an ongoing disciplinary process before it has come to its natural conclusion. The process should only be restrained where it is clear that things have gone sufficiently off the rails such that no decision at the end of the process is likely to be sustainable in law.

[49] In passing, I would add that it seems to me that the principle identified in Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355 really forms part of the balance of convenience consideration that goes into the overall assessment which is to be made at an interlocutory stage, which in turn leads to the fashioning of a result which runs the least risk of injustice. The regular halting of a disciplinary process because of the possibility that something might have gone wrong (on merely the basis of an arguable case) potentially operates to defeat the orderly conduct of employer/employee relations and thus leads to a material risk of injustice to the relevant employer if an injunction is granted but the claim ultimately fails. However, requiring a process to continue in circumstances where it is almost inevitable that the result will have to be set aside at the end creates a real risk of injustice.

[50] The overall question which must be asked in this case is, therefore, as to whether it is clear at this stage that allowing this disciplinary process to go ahead without legal representation would result in a final decision which, if averse to Mr. McKelvey, would be most unlikely to be sustainable in law.

[51] In that context, it is not appropriate to consider mere speculation as to issues or questions which might arise in the course of a hearing. Almost any disciplinary process, no matter how simple, might theoretically take a turn which would give rise to very difficult legal questions where the benefit of legal advice and assistance might be necessary. But the theoretical possibility of such an eventuality does not justify a decision that legal advice and representation is necessary from the beginning in order that there be a fair process. As the Court of Appeal pointed out, nothing in the judgment of that court was to be taken as indicating that Mr. McKelvey might not, at some stage, become entitled to legal representation if the situation demanded it. The question both for the courts below and for this court is as to whether it is clear at this stage that Mr. McKelvey cannot have a fair process without legal representation — is legal representation necessary rather than merely potentially being of some advantage? I turn now to that question.

7. The circumstances of this case

[52] At its heart, the allegation against Mr. McKelvey is relatively straightforward. It is said that he used, or allowed to be used, his fuel cards in an improper way so as to obtain either for himself or others fuel which was not intended to be used for the purposes of his employment. That allegation is easy to understand.

[53] The evidence from which it might be inferred that such conduct occurred is undoubtedly a little more complex. It involves an analysis of the patterns of the use of the cards concerned. In addition, it may well be that issues may arise concerning the truth or otherwise of the suggestion that others may have used Mr. McKelvey's cards without his permission, or that, alternatively, he attempted to get others to say that they had done so. But these again are straightforward questions of fact.

[54] In addition, the procedures to be followed are well established and would be well known to any experienced trade union official who was experienced in the conduct of disciplinary procedures involving Iarnród Éireann. I have to say that I cannot see anything in either the allegations, the likely evidence or the process likely to be followed which would place these disciplinary proceedings beyond the competence of an experienced trade union official.

[55] It should be recalled that an internal disciplinary process such as this is not a criminal trial. While the process must be fair, the formal rules of evidence or the procedures which govern either criminal or civil proceedings do not necessarily apply. The position of persons who may also have been the subject of investigation and the question of any evidence which they might give is not necessarily governed by the procedures or rules of evidence which would apply in a similar situation in the courts. Of course, the credibility of such persons may, in an appropriate case, be questioned on the basis of their own possible involvement. But they do not necessarily have to be treated in exactly the same way as a potential accomplice, co-accused or co-defendant in court proceedings. What is required is that Mr. McKelvey and his trade union representative be given a reasonable opportunity to challenge the evidence of any such persons on any reasonable basis. In those circumstances, it does not seem to me that there is, at least at present, any real basis for suggesting that legal issues of any substance will emerge.

[56] It is true that the allegation is one of theft and that an adverse result to the process could result in dismissal. That is undoubtedly a factor to be taken into account, but it does not seem to me that it can, of itself, bring the case into a category where it can be shown that legal representation is necessitated. The fact that theft may also be a criminal offence is of some marginal relevance but is, in my view, of limited weight having regard to the fact that any result of this disciplinary process could have no bearing on a criminal trial where the guilt of an accused would need to be established beyond reasonable doubt. If, coupled with the seriousness of the allegation and of the potential consequences, there are particularly difficult issues of law or extremely complex facts, then the cumulative effect of each of those matters might lead, in an exceptional case, to the view that legal representation was required. However, it does not seem to me that this is such a case.

[57] There is nothing in the evidence which would lead to the sort of conclusion which this court reached in Carmody v. Minister for Justice [2009] IESC 71, [2010] 1 I.R. 635, which was to the effect that the representation being provided (in that case, a solicitor without counsel) was inadequate to secure a fair trial. Likewise, I am not satisfied that there is anything in the evidence in this case which would satisfy a court that representation by an experienced trade union official would not be adequate to secure a fair process.

[58] That leads finally to a consideration of the point made to the effect that it may be that the trade union official concerned might have a conflict of interest by reason of the fact that there may be others accused of similar offences whose interests may not coincide with those of Mr. McKelvey, such that the trade union official concerned could not fairly and legitimately represent those competing interests. That may or may not turn out to be the case. But if such a conflict does transpire, there is nothing in the evidence to suggest that another experienced trade union official might not be able to take over the role of representing Mr. McKelvey so as to remove any risk of conflict of interest should it arise. To suggest that there will necessarily be a conflict of interest is purely speculative. But to suggest that such a conflict could not be resolved should it arise is to place a further speculation on top of the first.

[59] In all those circumstances, I am not satisfied that it has been established that there is a clear case that the representation of Mr. McKelvey in these disciplinary proceedings by an experienced trade union official would not be adequate to meet the needs of a fair process. It follows in turn that, in my view, the circumstances which would justify the grant of an interlocutory injunction at this stage are not made out.

8. Conclusions

[60] For the reasons set out in this judgment, I have concluded first that the true question which the court must address is as to whether this is a case where it is clear at this stage in the disciplinary process involving Mr. McKelvey that the process concerned could not be regarded as fair unless he were to be afforded legal representation. As already noted, Mr. McKelvey seeks to restrain a process which, in substance, has only just begun. It is well settled that a court should not restrain a disciplinary process prior to its conclusion unless it is clear at the stage when an injunction is sought that something has occurred which is sufficiently serious and incapable of being cured so that there was no realistic prospect that a legally sustainable conclusion could be reached at the end of the process.

[61] I am also satisfied that the proper approach to the question of whether a disciplinary process can be regarded as unfair because of the absence of an entitlement to legal representation is as set out in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682. I am also satisfied that the various considerations identified in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison are not matters which need to be separately established but rather are factors to be taken into account in an overall assessment as to whether a fair process can take place without legal representation. I am also satisfied that the observation to be found in the judgment in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison to the effect that legal representation will only be required as a matter of fairness in exceptional cases provides overall guidance to the proper approach.

[62] For the reasons set out earlier in this judgment, and applying the approach adopted in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682, I am not satisfied that it has been established that this is the sort of clear case where it can now be said that a fair process cannot ensue without legal representation. On that basis, I am satisfied that the Court of Appeal was correct to allow the appeal from the High Court in this case and to decline to grant Mr. McKelvey an injunction restraining the process. As I have noted, it does not seem to me that this necessarily would bar Mr. McKelvey from asserting at a subsequent stage in the process that he was entitled to legal representation because of the way in which the process had evolved.

[65] While the analysis in this judgment reaches the same conclusion as that of Clarke C.J., that this employee has no entitlement to be legally represented at a disciplinary hearing about alleged misappropriation of property, a different analysis of the legal route is possible. Contract governs the relationship between the parties even though a dismissal may be the result of the disciplinary process against an employee. Whereas, because of the position of Iarnród Éireann, as a publicly supported national transport company running the nation's railway network, public law applies, nothing in the employment contract made between Barry McKelvey and the company requires that criminal trial rights of representation by lawyers and a right to cross-examine should intrude into the issue of his conduct as an employee. Essentially, the company wish to enquire into what is claimed to be the theft of company property. If that theft is supported as probable and the employee as an actor in the misappropriation, the ultimate penalty of dismissal will be contemplated. Preliminary enquiries have already been made and certain facts, apparently, uncovered. In response, the employee has given an explanation. It is now proposed to have an employment hearing in the context of disciplinary procedures that were agreed upon collectively. At that disciplinary hearing the employee may, as a matter of his contract, be represented by a fellow employee or by a trade union official. There is no requirement in the contract, or by the application of public law, for acceding to the employee's request that a solicitor and barrister represent him at his own expense.

Background

[66] It is best to mention the facts only briefly. These are subject to findings that may or may not be made at the disciplinary hearing. Hence, what follows is merely an outline and, in any event, the papers make presumptions as to knowledge which is perhaps well known in the company but with which, as the argument on appeal demonstrated, even the best of outside legal representatives may struggle

[67] Two interviews are recorded with the employee in the appeal papers. The second will be referenced here as it seems based on a process of investigation that gained detail over time. The employee was with the company for about 20 years and had become a works inspector at Kildare. Prior to that, he was in Carlow. On the railways, various machines are driven by fuel-powered generators. This is not surprising given the need to work at a distance from stations on railway track, rolling stock and supporting signalling equipment. These include power spanners, impact wrenches, boring machines and light towers to illuminate work in the deep countryside. For this, credit cards chargeable to the company are issued to employees at inspector level. It appears that staff at this employee's level, in travelling, can fill up their cars on the cards. All are PIN protected, the same way as any ordinary card but not as securely, it is claimed, since the cards may be shared among people of the same grade and the PIN also passed on. What is concerned here, in part, is petrol usage from 2014 through to 2016. An allegation is made of a shift from petrol to diesel over 2014 through to 2015. Some use may have been made of the card at a distance of 100km from the home station. Some use may have been made simultaneously of a card or cards at two locations distant from each other at or around the same time. A large amount of fuel is involved. Another central focus of the enquiry is that the usage of diesel fuel is inconsistent with purchases for travel for work and this is claimed to be worth considering because of the 53-litre capacity of the employee's car and the purchase on one fill of considerably more fuel than that. As to explanations given, this is not a criminal trial process and hence the contractual duty of care and fidelity requires the employee to state what the answer to an issue is; see the judgment of Barrington J. in Mooney v. An Post [1998] 4 I.R. 288 at p. 298 and that of Clarke J. in Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355 where at para. 43, p. 368, he states that a "Bart Simpson" attitude does not accord with the nature of an employment contract. The explanations given by the employee include that someone else was using the card, that the card was left behind in the depot and taken by another, that fuel was stored in jerry cans for legitimate purposes and that on occasion the employee forgot his wallet in which the card was left. As with many such reports, the person doing the enquiry and the employee share a common knowledge that tends to puzzle outsiders. Here, the proper usage for company or employee vehicles on company business is unexplained, the equipment and how it is fuelled is based on a shared understanding and the significance of distance from a depot must be known to people within the company, as must the system generally.

[68] Another issue raised by the employee is that the company has statements from some fellow employees and, apparently, they claim that on occasion the employee approached them and asked them to say that they had borrowed his card. That issue is asserted to raise a difficult point of law. In reality it does not. Evidence, whether in a criminal trial setting or in the more informal situation of a disciplinary hearing, should be probative. That means that in terms of logic it supports a conclusion being drawn from it, either on its own or through the consideration of that evidence with other evidence. It can be an admission for a person to ask another person to cover for him or her so as to make it appear that he or she had no connection with an incident. That is because, as a matter of logic, to ask someone to assert something wrongly so as to take responsibility on another's behalf can justifiably lead to the conclusion that the person making the request required an answer at variance with reality. Obviously, whether this happened or not is not something within this court's competence on appeal, but it should be a fact that is capable of being found or not. No legal issue is engaged. If a proposed piece of evidence is merely prejudicial, such as that an employee has a particular sexual orientation, that has no place in logic in terms of proving that there has been a breach of employment duties. In criminal cases, prior convictions by an accused are not ordinarily admitted in evidence. But a prior conviction can logically help lead to a conclusion relevant to the case. Thus, in The People (Attorney-General) v. Kirwan [1943] I.R. 279 it was logical to prove that the accused had learned butchery while serving a sentence for a prior offence, since the victim of the murder with which he was charged had been dismembered with professional skill. It is not merely prejudice and neither is it a big issue as to whether a person asked another to take responsibility for something he is suspected to have done.

Contract

[69] There are few enough employees, apart from those on fixed-term contracts, gardaí and members of the Defence Forces being examples, who do not come within the scope of entitlement to redress under s. 2 of the, heavily amended, Unfair Dismissals Act 1977. Section 14(1) provides that an "employer shall, not later than 28 days after" entering "into a contract of employment with an employee, give to the employee a notice in writing setting out the procedure which the employer will observe before and for the purpose of dismissing the employee". Representation is at the core of this since subs. (3) provides that the procedure referenced is one "that has been agreed upon by or on behalf of the employer concerned and by the employee concerned or a trade union or an excepted body within the meaning of the Trade Union Act 1941, representing" the employee or which has "been established by the custom and practice of the employment concerned". Under subs. (2), employees should be notified of any alterations in procedure.

[70] It is thus to be expected that through collective agreement, or by custom, both employees and employers will be able to look to a written document in the event that an issue arises, to use the language of s. 6 of the 1977 Act, in relation to "the capability, competence or qualifications of the employee for performing work of the kind which" the employee "was employed by the employer to do" or "the conduct of the employee" or "the redundancy of the employee" or restrictions by law requiring dismissal, such as the employment of non-pharmacists in filling prescriptions. To again use the language of the legislation, at s. 6, the employer must show that a dismissal was fair and that will not be so unless "having regard to all the circumstances, there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal".

[71] Dismissal is therefore about substance; whether an employee is competent or qualified to do the job, or whether misbehaviour is involved. Section 5(b) of the Unfair Dismissals (Amendment) Act 1993 introduced an entitlement to the Workplace Relations Commission to look at procedure and as to "the reasonableness or otherwise of the conduct (whether by act or omission) of the employer in relation to the dismissal" and "the extent (if any) of the compliance or failure to comply by the employer, in relation to the employee, with the procedure" agreed for dismissal. In Connolly v. McConnell [1983] I.R. 172, at p. 178, a basic approach to disciplinary proceedings was set as requiring that employers must not remove an employee "without first according to him natural justice". Thus an employee "must be given the reasons for [any] proposed dismissal, and an adequate opportunity of making his [or her] defence to the allegations made against him [or her]". Hence, there should be as full an investigation of the relevant events as is reasonable in the circumstances before disciplinary action is taken, the employee should be notified of this so as to enable an answer to be given by him or her and to have the matter impartially decided.

[72] There may be employment situations where more than those centrally important principles are required by agreement or statutory instrument to be observed, for instance in the Garda Disciplinary Code, there involving what is, in terms of procedures, essentially a civil trial on a stated "charge". Just because, however, some employees or some sectors have a different or enhanced approach, does not mean that employment disciplinary or grievance hearings should move towards a tribunal-of-inquiry model of legal representation, cross-examination and evidential objections: that will not help anyone. What should be involved, instead, is a search for the truth with the employee enabled to make a contribution to that process by stating whatever explanation is available to him or her. After all, while this is not a two-stage process where rights are afforded at a second stage, as in McNamee v. Revenue Commissioners [2016] IESC 33 and the cases therein cited, once a complaint is validly made to the Workplace Relations Commission, the burden of justifying dismissal is on the employer through the calling of evidence, and the parties may there be legally represented.

Procedures

[73] Many contracts incorporate the Industrial Relations Act 1990 code of practice on grievance and disciplinary procedures, as set out in the Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice on Grievance and Disciplinary Procedures) (Declaration) Order 2000 (S.I. No. 146). That was the case here. These do not include any entitlement to legal representation. Instead, as helpfully recounted in Meenan, Employment Law (Round Hall, 2014) at pp. 885–886:

> "18-04 … the general procedures for dealing with issues reflect the varying circumstances of enterprises and organisations, which must comply with the general principles of natural justice and fair procedures, which include that employee grievances are fairly examined and processed; details of any allegations or complaints are put to the employee concerned; the employee concerned is given an opportunity to respond fully to any such allegations or complaints; the employee concerned is given an opportunity to avail of the right to be represented during the procedure; and the employee concerned has the right to a fair and impartial determination of the issues concerned, taking into account any representations made by or on behalf of the employee and any other relevant or appropriate evidence, factors or circumstances. Section 3 of the code records the necessity to ensure that disciplinary matters are dealt with in accordance with natural justice. Paragraph 6 of Pt 4 of the Schedule then sets out, depending on the organisation, the matters which ought to be satisfied so as to ensure compliance with the principles of natural justice and fair procedures. These include '[t]hat the employee concerned is given the opportunity to respond fully to any such allegations or complaints' and '[t]hat the employee concerned is given the opportunity to avail of the right to be represented during the procedure'."

[74] Thus, the place to start, and often to end, is the contract of employment. That much is clear from the judgment of Barrington J. in Mooney v. An Post [1998] 4 I.R. 288 where at p. 298 he said:

"If the contract or the statute governing a person's employment contains a procedure whereby the employment may be terminated, it usually will be sufficient for the employer to show that he has complied with this procedure. If the contract or the statute contains a provision whereby an employee is entitled to a hearing before an independent board or arbitrator before he can be dismissed then clearly that independent board arbitrator must conduct the relevant proceedings with due respect to the principles of natural and constitutional justice. If however the contract (or the statute) provides that the employee may be dismissed for misconduct without specifying any procedure to be followed, the position may be more difficult.

Certainly the employee is entitled to the benefit of fair procedures but what these demand will depend upon the terms of his employment and the circumstances surrounding his proposed dismissal. Certainly the minimum he is entitled to is to be informed of the charge against him and to be given an opportunity to answer it and to make submissions."

[75] Because, in other cases, or indeed in this one, concessions have been made whereby a duty to call live evidence has been accepted as part of procedures, or where this has been incorporated in a collective agreement, or where cross-examination is allowed on a case-by-case basis, these entitlements are specific to individual hearings. An instance of that is Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355, but the procedures that are mentioned in that case, in the context of an argument for ever more elaborate procedures, are not of general application.

[76] A difficulty may arise where an employment contract is silent as to grievance procedures, thus involving a breach of s. 14(1) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977. No comment is here made as to whether the appropriate course is to apply the standard grievance procedure promulgated under the Industrial Relations Act 1990. That would appear to many to be a sensible course, bearing in mind the procedures were invented to assist in coming to the truth and, in a proper case, are not an end in themselves. Here, the grievance procedure clearly states that an employee is entitled to be represented at a disciplinary hearing and that for "the purposes of this Code of Practice" that "includes a colleague of the employee's choice and a registered trade union official". In case that might be ambiguous, the definition proceeds to state that an employee is not entitled to be represented by "any other person or body unconnected with the enterprise". As a matter of contract, that disposes of the argument by the employee that the procedures involved require the presence of lawyers.

[77] Issues may arise where standard procedures are not those sensibly derived from the 1990 Act but are, instead, incorporated into a contract of employment given to an employee at the commencement of his or her employment or are negotiated collectively with the trade union involved. Mistakes can be made. One of these might be that a person making the accusation of, for instance, bullying, is entitled to sit on the final hearing deciding on whether there was misconduct and what the results should be. It might be argued that a sensible interpretation of the contract, perhaps based upon the officious bystander rule, would lead to a sensible solution. Another situation, which has occurred in practice, was that the decision of a father would be appealed under the contract to an appellate body entirely composed of that man's son. With good sense, these issues can be resolved so that a fair determination can take place with the object of arriving at the truth.

[78] But such examples propose that there are minimum standards which, despite anything written in the contract, cannot be infringed. As much is said by Barrington J. in Mooney v. An Post [1998] 4 I.R. 288 but these are set at a level which recognises that the introduction of criminal trial structures into a procedure that is supposed to be implemented by people without legal training, but through the application of fairness, common sense and shrewdness, is not required as a matter of law. Such cases as support the proposition that a lawyer is sometimes, but very rarely, necessary in employment matters are derived from public law and should be confined within a public law context that is specifically limited.

[79] Thus, in R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex p. Tarrant [1985] Q.B. 251, while those facing a disciplinary process were prisoners, and therefore subject to such penalties as close confinement for two months and the loss of liberty by the release date being put back through removing remission for up to six months, the reality of the case was that a lawyer was seen as necessary because the prison authorities decided to propose a charge of mutiny; a concept akin in complexity to that of treason. Thereafter, the research in this case has struggled to find any case which followed that precedent because more sensible courses have been followed, most especially that of simply asking whether certain facts did or did not occur. Hence, in R. v. Board of Visitors of H.M. Prison, The Maze, Ex p. Hone [1988] A.C. 379, the two applicants were prisoners and were charged respectively with throwing a cup of tea into a prison officer's face and assaulting another prison officer, causing severe injuries to his face. In essence, these were allegations of fact; if true, and if charged as such, they would constitute criminal offences of assault causing harm. Lord Goff, at pp. 391–392, rejected the proposition that anyone charged with a crime, or the equivalent thereof in terms of facts to be proven in a civil context, and liable to punishment would be entitled as a matter of natural justice to legal representation. In the public law sphere, the context determined what the requirements of natural justice would be. Similarly, in Burns v. Governor of Castlerea Prison [2009] IESC 33, [2009] 3 I.R. 682, while approving a list of factors derived from R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex p. Tarrant [1985] Q.B. 251, Geoghegan J., in this court, was not prepared to impose legal representation for a disciplinary hearing related to the proper charging of expenses and claiming of overtime.

[80] Finally, it is worth noting that in a public law context, where an inquiry on behalf of the community takes place, it is not necessarily the case that a procedure derived from In re Haughey [1971] I.R. 217 is necessary. Yet, it is precisely there that some discussions of what are or are not fair procedures begin and, furthermore, with the consideration of the case in a completely separate sphere, namely The State (Healy) v. Donoghue [1976] I.R. 325 judgment of Gannon J. at p. 334 about legal aid on serious criminal charges. Clarke J. in Atlantean Ltd. v. Minister for Communications and Natural Resources [2007] IEHC 233 describes basic procedures applicable where someone is to lose rights. A person so affected "is entitled to" some reasonable notice of what might be described as "the charge against him", with cross-examination or a public hearing not coming into the equation necessarily, that person must "be given an opportunity to answer [the charge] and the chance to make submissions". That idea, fair notice and a chance to comment, with no doubt an objective investigation as part of the matrix, is also key to Mooney v. An Post [1998] 4 I.R. 288. Then there is the practice, derived from the decision of the English Court of Appeal in In re Pergamon Press Ltd. [1971] 1 Ch. 388. That concerned an investigation in the public interest by statutory company inspectors about the conduct of a company collapse and how directors, including Robert Maxwell, abided by directors' ethics. There, in that very serious process, the procedure followed was to make enquiry in the absence of representation by those who may be blamed for public misdemeanours and with no right by them to cross-examine. Instead, on this procedure, a report is drawn up and a draft of preliminary findings together with the material on which this is based is sent to any person who may be criticised. In seeking and in considering whatever comments followed, the duty to consider representations is fulfilled. The various judgments in Shatter v. Guerin [2019] IESC 9 emphasise that what might be called full criminal-trial rights are not necessary in all circumstances and return instead to the duty to take on board the point of view and of fact of a person who may lose rights and to record that viewpoint and fairly consider it before reaching a conclusion; a procedure echoing In re Pergamon Press Ltd. even though what was involved in Shatter v. Guerin was not supposed to be an inquiry at all.

[81] These are issues which may require consideration in an appropriate case and are merely outlined as to the central point involved, which is that criminal trial rights are not universally applicable to all inquiries.

Injunction

[82] The principles as to allowing a measure of appreciation to tribunals to act in good faith in the choice of procedures, where not obvious from an employment contract, not to assume unfairness and deprecating premature interventions by application to court, as derived from the judgments of Clarke J. in Becker v. St. Dominic's Secondary School [2006] IEHC 130 and Rowland v. An Post [2017] IESC 20, [2017] 1 I.R. 355, have not been challenged on this appeal. These stand as a proper interpretation of the circumstances where the courts should or should not intervene to divert a disciplinary procedure derived from contract from its ordinary course. Essentially, it is only where something has gone so wrong that contract rights to fair procedures are lost and cannot be corrected that an intervention by the courts is justified.

Result

[83] The plaintiff is entitled by contract to have a fellow employee assist him at the disciplinary hearing, or to be represented by a trade union official. By contract, no other or outside individual may represent him.

Úna Ruffley, Plaintiff v. The Board of Management of St. Anne's School, Defendant [2017] IESC 33, [S.C. No. 24 of 2016]

Supreme Court 26 May 2017

Employment law – Bullying – Test – Definition of workplace bullying – Meaning of "repeated" behaviour – Meaning of "inappropriate" behaviour – Meaning of "behaviour reasonably capable of undermining dignity at work" – Whether unfair disciplinary process resulting in psychiatric injury actionable as workplace bullying without evidence of malicious intent – Whether conduct not witnessed by other persons capable of undermining dignity of employee – Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice Detailing Procedures For Addressing Bullying in The Workplace) (Declaration) Order 2002 (S.I. No. 17).

The Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice Detailing Procedures For Addressing Bullying in The Workplace) (Declaration) Order 2002 defines "workplace bullying", in para. 5 to the Schedule, as follows:-

> "Workplace Bullying is repeated inappropriate behaviour, direct or indirect, whether verbal, physical or otherwise, conducted by one or more persons against another or others, at the place of work and/or in the course of employment, which could reasonably be regarded as undermining the individual's right to dignity at work. An isolated incident of the behaviour described in this definition may be an affront to dignity at work but, as a once off incident, is not considered to be bullying."

The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a special needs assistant. Following an incident where she was found to have locked the door of a room in which she was working with a pupil, and a second incident relating to a paperwork error, the plaintiff was subjected to a disciplinary process, which led to a final written warning being issued. The plaintiff maintained that locking the door in such circumstances was a common practice amongst special needs assistants and that she had never been told not to do so.

The plaintiff complained that the manner in which the disciplinary process was conducted offended against the principles of natural justice, inter alia as she was not given the precise details of the complaint against her, she was not given an opportunity to be heard, and when the plaintiff sought to appeal, the same body considered the appeal. She also made a number of complaints concerning the conduct of the school principal, including that in a meeting between only the two of them, the plaintiff was subjected to denigration that "belittled, humiliated and reduced her to tears".

Following a further incident, where the plaintiff was reprimanded by the school principal, the plaintiff left her employment on sick leave and did not return to work at the school or elsewhere following her departure. The plaintiff claimed that the conduct of the defendant in relation to the disciplinary process amounted to workplace bullying constituting negligence and breach of the employer's duty of care, as a result of which she had suffered psychiatric injury.

The High Court (Ó Néill J.) found in the plaintiff's favour and awarded damages totalling €255,276 (see [2014] IEHC 235). The defendant appealed and the Court of Appeal (Ryan P. and Irvine J.; Finlay Geoghegan J. dissenting) allowed the appeal on the basis that the conduct of the defendant did not amount to workplace bullying, as defined (see [2015] IECA 287). The plaintiff sought to appeal to the Supreme Court and was granted leave to appeal on two questions: (1) whether an unfairly carried out disciplinary process resulting in psychiatric injury was, in itself, capable of being actionable in damages on the basis that it amounted to workplace bullying without evidence of malicious intent on the part of the employer; and (2) whether behaviour not witnessed by other persons in the workplace was capable of undermining the dignity of an employee (see [2016] IESCDET 52).

Held by the Supreme Court (Denham C.J., O'Donnell, McKechnie, MacMenamin, Dunne, Charleton and O'Malley JJ.), in dismissing the appeal, 1, that the terms "repeated", "inappropriate" and "reasonably capable of undermining dignity at work" in the definition of bullying in the 2002 Order should not be viewed as separate and self-standing issues as if in a statutory definition. While each component could usefully be considered separately and sequentially, they took their colour from each other and the concepts were incremental. Accordingly, while analysis might be facilitated by looking at the separate elements, the 2002 Order provided a single definition and a single test: was the defendant guilty of repeated inappropriate behaviour against the plaintiff which could reasonably be regarded as undermining the individual's right to dignity at work?

Per Charleton J. (Denham C.J., O'Donnell, MacMenamin, Dunne, Charleton and O'Malley JJ. concurring): That the test required all of the elements to be fulfilled. It should be considered sequentially. It was objective, not subjective.

2. That the concept of repeated behaviour could usefully be contrasted with an isolated or once-off incident, but it could not be defined negatively, as merely something that is not "once-off" or "isolated". It was not enough to point to two different events. In order for behaviour to be "repeated", there must have been a pattern of behaviour and what must have been repeated was behaviour that was inappropriate and that undermined personal dignity.

3. That it was not enough to satisfy the requirement of repeated behaviour that what was alleged to constitute unfair procedures was comprised of a number of different steps unless each of those steps could be said in itself to be inappropriate and to undermine human dignity.

4. That inappropriate behaviour did not necessarily need to be unlawful, erroneous or a procedure liable to be quashed or otherwise wrong in law; it was instead behaviour that was inappropriate at a human level. The test looked to the question of propriety in human relations, rather than legality, and was illustrated by the more familiar examples of bullying: purposely undermining an individual, targeting them for special negative treatment, the manipulation of their reputation, social exclusion or isolation, intimidation, aggressive or obscene behaviour, jokes that were obviously offensive to one person, intrusion by pestering, spying and stalking – those examples all shared the feature that they were unacceptable at the level of human interaction.

5. That the making of a decision to impose a disciplinary sanction on an employee following an unfair disciplinary process could not, without more, be "inappropriate" for the purposes of a workplace bullying claim.

6. That the requirement of conduct "undermining dignity at work" was a separate, distinct and important component of the definition of bullying which identified the interests sought to be protected by the law and, just as importantly, limited the claims that might be made to those that could be described as outrageous, unacceptable, and exceeding all bounds tolerated by decent society.

7. That the requirement that the behaviour be repeated, inappropriate and undermining of dignity was a test that used language deliberately intended to indicate that the conduct which would breach it was both severe and normally offensive at a human level.

Per Charleton J. (Denham C.J., O'Donnell, MacMenamin, Dunne, Charleton and O'Malley JJ. concurring): That men and women were to be judged with the appropriate measure of appreciation for human nature and that, hence, conduct was be judged according to the standard of human beings, and not of angels. The standard also had to be set at a level where giving advice, telling people off, temperamental reaction or emotional interaction were not allowed to disrupt the duty of managers to see that work was done, and the entitlement to healthy satisfaction that actually justifying one's wages represented.

8. That while the "singling out" or "targeting" of an individual for disciplinary purposes was capable of being a component of bullying, the use of the verbs in those formulations was important and it was not enough that, after the fact, it was possible to say that a person had objectively been treated differently and worse than others in a similar situation.

9. That where an employer was not aware of a general practice of non-compliance with a disciplinary rule when a disciplinary process was initiated, the process could not be treated as a singling out of the plaintiff. If, following the initiation of the process, an employee raised the contention that other employees had also broken the rule, a failure to investigate that allegation could go to the fairness of the procedures followed by the employer but fell short of the type of conduct captured by a bullying claim.

10. That conduct which occurred in private could be a component of a claim for bullying. It was possible to treat someone inappropriately and undermine their dignity, without that conduct being witnessed. However, any element of humiliation in public would strengthen a claim.

Obiter dicta, per O'Donnell J.: 1. A disciplinary process could in theory constitute bullying if it were established that the process had been instituted maliciously, and as part of a campaign to victimise an individual, even if the process itself was conducted in accordance with the rules of fair procedures, and irrespective of the outcome of the process.

2. An employer was entitled to expect ordinary robustness from its employees.

Croft v. Broadstairs and St Peter's Town Council [2003] EWCA Civ 676, (Unreported, Court of Appeal of England and Wales, 15 April 2003) approved.

3. The law in the developing field of workplace bullying was somewhat anomalous. The parties accepted without question that no separate tort of bullying existed and that workplace bullying was a sub-species of an employer's duty of care. However, the courts had recognised the concept of "corporate bullying", for which the employer could be directly responsible. Furthermore, an employer could be liable for direct and deliberate conduct in circumstances where the bully was not so liable and no indemnity could be sought. The developments in the field, while anomalous, indicated some important felt constraint upon a more widespread liability.

4. So long as the cause of action for bullying remained a subhead of the employer's duty of care, it was difficult to see that intent on the part of the bully was an essential feature of the claim: the employer owed a duty of care to the employee to protect him or her from conduct or matters causing distress amounting to a recognisable psychiatric injury.

5. To establish corporate liability for bullying, the conduct had to be intentional and calculated to cause distress.

Obiter dictum, per Charleton J.: There was no distinctive tort of bullying or harassment. The question was to be resolved in the context of employer's liability, by asking whether the employers took reasonable care not to expose the plaintiff to the risk of injury from such conduct.

Appeal from the Court of Appeal

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of O'Donnell J., infra.

On 28 April 2011, the plaintiff instituted proceedings seeking damages for bullying and harassment. On 9 May 2014, the High Court (Ó Néill J.) granted the relief sought (see [2014] IEHC 235).

The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court against the judgment and order of the High Court. By order made on 4 July 2014, the Supreme Court directed the defendant to pay a sum of €100,000 to the plaintiff pending the hearing of the appeal, as a condition of placing a stay on the remainder of the order of the High Court. The defendant's appeal was subsequently transferred to the Court of Appeal pursuant to the provisions of Article 64 of the Constitution.

The Court of Appeal (Ryan P. and Irvine J.; Finlay Geoghegan J. dissenting) allowed the appeal (see [2015] IECA 287).

By application for leave and notice of appeal dated 8 March 2016, the plaintiff sought leave to appeal the decision of the Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court (Denham C.J., Charleton and O'Malley JJ.) granted the plaintiff leave to appeal against the decision of the Court of Appeal on 27 April 2016 on two specified grounds (see [2016] IESCDET 52).

The appeal was heard by the Supreme Court (Denham C.J., O'Donnell, McKechnie, MacMenamin, Dunne, Charleton and O'Malley JJ.) on 15 and 16 December 2016.

Patrick Keane S.C. and Marguerite Bolger S.C. (with them Cathal Ó Currain) for the plaintiff.

Kieran Fleck S.C. and Mark Gerard Connaughton S.C. (with them Adrianne Fields) for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Denham C.J. 26 May 2017

[1] I have read the judgments about to be delivered by O'Donnell and Charleton JJ. and I agree with them.

O'Donnell J.

[2] This case has already been the subject of a detailed High Court judgment ([2014] IEHC 235, (Unreported, High Court, Ó Néill J., 9 May 2014)) and three considered judgments of the Court of Appeal (Ruffley v. Board of Management of St. Anne's School [2015] IECA 287, (Unreported, Court of Appeal, 8 December 2015)). Normally in such circumstances, it would not be necessary to repeat the facts in particular detail. However, this is an unusual case, and since there has been considerable disagreement as to how to characterise the facts in this case, it is necessary to give some account of the background to this complex case.

[3] By the time of the events in 2009 and 2010 which are the subject matter of these proceedings, the plaintiff, Úna Ruffley, had been employed as a special needs assistant ("SNA") in St. Anne's School at the Curragh, County Kildare for more than ten years, without notable incident. That school, although treated as a national school, catered exclusively for children with intellectual disabilities and indeed took children from the age of 4 up to 18 years of age. The school had been founded by KARE, an organisation of parents of children with physical and intellectual disabilities. St. Anne's was under the patronage of KARE, and the chief executive of that body, Mr. Christy Lynch, was also the chairman of the board of management of St. Anne's.

[4] St. Anne's is a small institution catering for between 70 and 75 children, and in 2009 employed 14 teachers and 26 SNAs. The school also had available to it external services such as occupational therapy. It was not in dispute that until the events here described, she had performed her work satisfactorily and enjoyed good relations with the teachers, other SNAs and the principal, Ms. Dempsey, who figures significantly in the account of this case.

[5] For about five years prior to September 2009, the school had a sensory room used to develop the sensory perception of pupils by exposing them to a variety of experiences such as music, vibration, movement, light and colour. The room had previously been used as a store room for computer equipment. It could be locked from the outside with a key, although the evidence was that was never used. It could also be closed from the inside by simply turning a lock to either open or close the door in a fashion which it was said was similar to that in use on a standard toilet door. That lock gave rise to a dispute which has meant that the plaintiff has not worked in St. Anne's or anywhere else for more than six years now, and which has led, through an eleven day hearing in the High Court, and a two day appeal to the Court of Appeal, to this court.

The events

(i) 14 September 2009

On this day the plaintiff was in the room working with a young pupil. Unusually, as he was normally an extremely active child who suffered from attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), he fell fast asleep. The plaintiff went out and phoned the teacher Ms. Rachel Bramhall, to ask for instructions. She was told to leave the child asleep, and if he had not awoken within 20 minutes to bring him back to the class. The teacher, however, being concerned, contacted the headmistress in turn. Ms. Dempsey went to the room where she discovered that the door had been locked from the inside, and only gained entry on her third attempt. However, the issue of the door being locked was not raised then.

(ii) 15 September 2009

The following day the plaintiff attended work and was asked by Ms. Dempsey to come to her office. Once there, Ms. Dempsey informed her that she was handling the incident as a disciplinary matter. The plaintiff initially thought that this was because the child had been asleep, but Ms. Dempsey explained it was because the door had been locked. It appears from Ms. Dempsey's note referred to in the judgment of the High Court that the plaintiff said at this point that she hoped the principal would deal with the other SNAs that did this. The principal's response was apparently that this was another issue for another day. The plaintiff was requested to return to the office at 2.30 p.m. and informed that someone could attend with her, if she wished.

(iii) 15 September 2009: 2.30 p.m.

The plaintiff returned to the principal's office accompanied by Ms. Louise Webb, a fellow SNA. The principal had also arranged for Ms. Bramhall, the teacher involved, to be there also. The plaintiff accepted that she had locked the door and said it had been her practice to do so for a number of years both to prevent other pupils entering and disrupting the session and to prevent children, some of whom were very active, from running out of the room. Such children were often described as "runners" and as it happened the child involved here was known to be a "runner". The plaintiff also claimed that the door had been locked on other occasions including one in April 2009, when she alleged the principal had brought visitors to the room. Ms. Dempsey responded apparently that she had never been aware that the room had been locked and, if so, would have raised the issue. There was some further discussion of the care of the child in question. It is not suggested that any specific disciplinary action was discussed or suggested at this meeting.

(iv) 18 September 2009
There was a further meeting between the plaintiff, the principal, and Ms. Bramhall. This meeting discussed the care to be given to the child, and it was agreed that over a four week period the plaintiff would complete a weekly form indicating the manner in which the therapy for the child had progressed.

Letter of 18 September 2009 (?)
It is important to note at the outset, that this letter is disputed. The principal gave evidence however that she had handed a letter to the plaintiff dated 18 September 2009. That letter recorded that as the plaintiff did not appear clear as to the protocol surrounding the use of the room "we are not going to take disciplinary action". The letter also recorded however that the plaintiff's care of the child in question would be reviewed over a three month period. It continued "if the required improvement is not made or if there is any such breach of discipline in any aspect of your work performance, this may result in disciplinary action". The plaintiff emphatically denied ever having received the letter and the trial judge accepted she had not been given that letter then or since.

(v) Four weeks later (October 2009)
In the review, Ms. Bramhall observed that the plaintiff had ticked a box on the forms indicating that she had succeeded in getting the child to lie on the swing, which was an item of equipment in the room, and one recognised measurement of progress. This was queried by Ms. Bramhall, and the plaintiff immediately confirmed that she was wrong and asked to correct the form. The teacher refused to do so and recorded this matter on the form as a "miscommunication".

(vi) 19 October 2009
A further meeting took place between the plaintiff and the principal Ms. Dempsey. The plaintiff contended that the events of this meeting took place on 12 November 2009, but the trial judge considered that she was wrong in this regard at least. At the meeting, the principal challenged the plaintiff in relation to the completion of the form, in part erroneously because she thought the child was not supposed to use the swing. She considered that the incorrect completion of the form amounted to falsification and a further disciplinary issue which justified her in bringing the matter to the board. The trial judge found that the plaintiff made it clear at this meeting that she considered she was being treated unfairly. The trial judge considered that the form and the plaintiff's error in that regard had been used by the principal "as a trap for the plaintiff" (para. 35).

(vii) 12 November 2009
There was a further meeting between the plaintiff and the principal as a result of which the plaintiff was moved to another teacher's classroom. According to the principal, this was necessitated because Ms. Bramhall with whom the plaintiff had been working was leaving the school. It was not suggested that there was anything sinister in this move, and the new teacher confirmed that the plaintiff had worked satisfactorily in the classroom thereafter.

(viii) 23 November 2009: board meeting
The principal considered that she should bring the matter of the plaintiff's performance to the attention of the board meeting which was held on this date. She spoke to the chairman, Mr. Lynch, in advance, who readily agreed to the matter being raised as he considered that the locking of the door was wholly unacceptable because of the child protection implications involved. The plaintiff was told in advance of the meeting that the matter was going to be raised, but not given any further details. In the discussions with the board, the plaintiff was not identified. The minutes of the board meeting recorded that the principal outlined "issues" she had with an individual SNA. She wanted the support of the board to issue a verbal or written warning and the board agreed. Evidence was given in relation to this meeting by both the principal Ms. Dempsey, and the chairman Mr Lynch. It appears that the other four members of the board, who it was suggested were parents of children attending the school, wanted the plaintiff to be instantly dismissed and it took some persuasion from Ms. Dempsey and the chairman to dissuade them.

The para. 48 findings

At para. 48 of his judgment, the trial judge made important findings about this meeting:-

> "The evidence of Ms. Dempsey was that she outlined the full history of the matter to the board. The extreme, if not, downright intemperate, reaction of the board to whatever they were told, suggests that as a matter of probability, the account given by Ms. Dempsey to the board of the history of the matter was almost certainly untrue, highly biased, coloured, and grossly and unfairly damnified the plaintiff. Whilst I would readily accept that the members of the board would be hyper-vigilant on all issues relating to child protection, and rightly so, as a group of probably fair-minded people, I do not think they would have reached conclusions so adverse to the plaintiff, unless grossly misled as to the true circumstances prevailing."

There is no doubt that the plaintiff was not informed of the detail of what was said, was not invited to the meeting, or allowed to be represented or given any opportunity of having her views conveyed to the board. The trial judge concluded at para. 50:-

> "To say that the conduct of Ms. Dempsey in relation to the lead up to this board meeting and what happened at it was a departure from all the norms of natural justice is a feeble understatement."

(ix) 21 December 2009

Nothing, however, was said to the plaintiff in the immediate aftermath of the meeting. It appears that the principal was to obtain advice and liaise with human resources in KARE. On 21 December 2009, just before the Christmas holidays, she informed the plaintiff that she was to get a final stage part four warning and would be given a formal notification in the new year. When asked how long the warning would remain in place, Ms. Dempsey told the plaintiff that it would be on her file for six months.

(x) 18 January 2010
Whilst on yard duty, the plaintiff was asked to come to a meeting in the principal's office with the principal and Mr. Lynch. The plaintiff was accompanied by a fellow SNA. She was told by Mr. Lynch that she would receive a final stage part four warning which would be on her record for eighteen months. This period was specified because it appeared that this was provided for in the disciplinary policy and the reference to six months given before Christmas was a mistake. The trial judge found that the plaintiff indicated dissatisfaction and said she had been in touch with her union, IMPACT, and she wanted to appeal the decision.

(xi) 20 January 2010
The plaintiff called to the principal's office and was handed a copy of the letter from the board of management signed by Mr. Lynch. While the letter informed the plaintiff of the sanction, and the period of 18 months during which it would remain on her file, it contained the following statement:-

> "This warning is being issued as a result of the investigation which was carried out at the request of the board of management into an incident that occurred on 14 September 2009, whereby you locked yourself and a child into the sensory room."

The trial judge pointed out in his judgment that no investigation had been held into the matter whether at the request of the board or otherwise.

(xii) 27 January 2010
The plaintiff was asked to come to a meeting with Ms. Dempsey which it was said was to get "closure" on the matter. There was a total conflict of evidence as to what transpired. The trial judge, at para. 65, accepted the plaintiff's evidence that she was subjected to a variety of denigration which "belittled, humiliated and reduced her to tears" (see para. 64).

(xiii) 29 January 2010
The plaintiff's union representative, Mr. Phillip Mullen of IMPACT, wrote to Mr. Lynch referring to the final warning issued and stating that they wished to appeal on the following grounds:-

"(1) Process: we believe that the process applied to the investigation did not accord [the plaintiff] the right to adequately defend herself.
(2) The procedures in place in St. Anne's had not made it clear that locking the safety room was a health and safety breach. That is not to say it was acceptable, but rather, that the practice was known and had not been objected to previously.
(3) Sanction: We believe that given the circumstances a final written warning is too severe a sanction in this case.
I would very much welcome an opportunity to elaborate on these points at your convenience and would appreciate if you would let me have copies of the relevant documentation (disciplinary procedure, original complaint, minutes of meetings, etc.).
I would also appreciate if you could confirm if any other disciplinary matters relating to [the plaintiff] are outstanding.
I look forward to your early response."

(xiv) 23 March 2010
A meeting was arranged between Mr. Lynch, Ms. Dempsey, the plaintiff and Mr. Mullen. As a result of the meeting Mr. Lynch asked the principal to ascertain whether or not there was a practice of locking the door. Ms. Dempsey said she had asked approximately 70% of SNAs, none of whom admitted to locking the door. Immediately after this meeting the plaintiff devised a rudimentary questionnaire which she distributed to her colleagues. It only contained two questions: "Have you ever locked the sensory room door?" and "Have you ever been asked by Pauline Dempsey 'have you ever locked the sensory room door?'". Four colleagues answered, all of whom answered the first question "yes". One of the colleagues answered the second question "no".

(xv) 22 April 2010
Mr. Mullen wrote to Mr. Lynch attaching a copy of the questionnaire and asking that it be taken into account and asking to be informed of the board's decision.

(xvi) 26 April 2010
There was a board meeting which discussed the letter.

(xvii) 20 May 2010
Mr. Lynch wrote to Mr. Mullen responding that the board stood over its original decision.

(xviii) 8 June 2010
There was a further board meeting which referred to the correspondence and appears to have endorsed the decision to stand over the original sanction. The trial judge was satisfied that the board did not give any meaningful consideration to the contention that there was a common practice of locking the room.

(xix) 27 May 2010 or 22 June 2010
A letter was sent to the school by the plaintiff's solicitors. There is confusion as to the date on the letter, but none as to the contents. The letter required the board to acknowledge that it had received confirmation from other staff that it was "common practice that the sensory room was locked" and demanded an apology to the plaintiff. It appears that it was contended in this letter that the plaintiff had been bullied and harassed.

(xx) 24 September 2010
The board sent a lengthy reply to the plaintiff's solicitors. On the question of any practice of locking the door, it said:-

> "Whilst it may very well may be that from time to time it would appear that certain members of staff have, on very rare occasions, seen fit to lock the door of the sensory room at St. Anne's School, this is not the policy of the school and it is strongly advised that members of staff not do this, for reasons, as we are sure you will understand, that include the safety and wellbeing, not only of the children, but also of the staff member concerned."

The letter concluded:-

> "You are correct in saying that IMPACT represented your client at various points in the course of correspondence about this matter. It was indicated to your client at that time that so long as everything ran smoothly, there should be no reason to revisit these matters. The fact that they are now being revisited is a matter entirely for your client who failed to see what, if anything is to be gained at this stage in continuing with this correspondence."

The trial judge considered, at para. 78, that this paragraph of the letter was a "further rebuff" by the defendant of the plaintiff's primary assertion namely that the locking of the sensory door was a common practice among SNAs; a practice which the earlier paragraph appeared to implicitly, if not expressly, acknowledge to have existed.

(xxi) 24 September 2010
The principal appears to have informed staff on this occasion that the door of the sensory room should not be locked. Thereafter there was further correspondence between the solicitors and the school. The trial judge concluded that the plaintiff had done her utmost to pursue her grievance through the internal procedure of the defendant.

[7] The matters set out above appear to be the matters upon which the trial judge made his findings of liability. However, he also recorded a further event of 27 September 2010, when a further incident occurred within the school. The plaintiff contended that she had arrived on time but had moved her car because there was car park line painting going on. When she went back into the school, she was reprimanded by the principal for being late. As the trial judge observed this would normally be a trivial incident and of little consequence, but for the plaintiff it was the last straw and she left work on that occasion and, regrettably has not returned to the school, or, it appears, worked anywhere else.

Observations on the facts

[8] I have set out the events in this case comprehensively because much of the difference of opinion in this case depends on the assessment of the cumulative impact of the individual events, many of them unremarkable in themselves. It is, I think, useful to analyse these matters in a little more detail. Although the entire process complained of occupied a year between September 2009 and September 2010, all the incidents of direct engagement with the plaintiff occurred between September 2009 and March 2010 (with the exception of the events just recorded which occurred in September 2010 leading to the plaintiff taking sick leave). Indeed, the meetings between the plaintiff, Ms. Dempsey, and others occurred between September and January 2010. Some of these meetings cannot reasonably be the subject of any complaint such as the meeting on 18 September 2009, agreeing that the plaintiff's care of the child would be monitored or the meeting of 12 November 2009, to rearrange the plaintiff's work with a new teacher. Other matters recorded such as the communication of an incorrect period of time for the duration of the warning do not appear significant. The trial judge's most trenchant criticisms were directed towards the procedure. This analysis suggests that the plaintiff's essential complaint was what was done (i.e., the procedures adopted or the lack of them) rather than the manner in which it was done (personal remarks, or offensive behaviour etc.). Indeed the object of most criticism is a meeting (23 November 2009) at which the plaintiff was not present and was not identified by name to the members of the board and whose identity was not known to anyone other than the principal and the chairman. What is alleged therefore is that the disciplinary process should not have been contemplated or continued once she raised the question of other SNAs locking the door, the treatment of the incorrect completion of the form as a serious matter justifying the reactivation of the disciplinary issues, the fact that she was not represented at the board meeting which decided to issue the warning to her, the excessive nature of that sanction, and the fact that the board considered an appeal against its own decision. The Court of Appeal was correct in my view therefore to identify the core issue as whether a claim for unfair procedures leading to an unfair result could itself amount to bullying.

[9] One difficulty of this case however is that although it was framed with a heavy emphasis on fairness of procedures, (and indeed it was conceded that the procedures were flawed, even botched), the claim was not directed to a declaration of invalidity of a process or any sanction. There was therefore no close analysis of the precise manner in which a requirement for fair procedures was not adhered to. This was a small school. The core incident itself was not in dispute. The principal was the witness to the fact that the door was locked, and that was not disputed as a matter of fact. Nor indeed does it appear to be disputed that it was inappropriate and improper to lock the door. It is said, and I agree, that once the plaintiff maintained that this was a common practice among SNAs, that that question should have been addressed at least having regard to the sanction to be imposed, and on the judge's view, in order to consider whether the disciplinary process should be pursued at all. There is also no doubt that at a minimum, the plaintiff ought to have been able to have been able to put her side of the story to the board, and put forward any evidence in support of her position. I do not think that any elaborate hearing was required, but in any event none was provided. Perhaps one of the difficulties of this case is, paradoxically, if there had been a stark conflict of evidence, it might have been more apparent that a hearing was necessary.

However, no hearing of any sort was held. Furthermore, it was probably undesirable that Ms. Dempsey should take any part in the decision (even though it appears that she argued for a lesser sanction). Although her account was not being contested in relation to the question of whether the door was locked or not, and no allegation had yet been made against her, nevertheless she was a participant in the matter. For all these reasons, and perhaps more, the procedure was clearly defective and liable to be so declared by any court. For my part however, I do not see anything malicious in the way in which this was carried out, and more importantly there was no such finding by the judge. It is not unusual in small institutions which do not have extensive human resources expertise (and sometimes even in businesses with such expertise), that errors can be made, particularly in cases which appear obvious, and where the sanction does not involve suspension or dismissal.

[10] It is also said that the fact that the board considered the plaintiff's appeal was itself a further egregious breach of fair procedures. Certainly, if this was considered to be an appeal it would be plainly wrong that the same body would hear an appeal against itself. However, Mr. Mullen of IMPACT who made the "appeal" appears to have directed it to the board, and did not raise any issue as to the composition of the board hearing the matter. It is not suggested there is a provision for appeal in the disciplinary procedures which applied, nor is an appeal a necessary component of a fair procedure. In the nature of this school, there could be no prospect of an internal appeal to another body. However, if this process was simply considered to be a review, or a reconsideration of a decision, then it is not so obviously flawed as a procedure. I do not think that too much should be read into the use of the word "appeal" by Mr. Mullen, unless it was specifically contended that this disciplinary code required such an appeal and was being invoked. If the board had reconsidered the entire matter and removed the sanction, I do not think it would be said that the procedure was itself flawed simply because the board had reconsidered the issue, even under the rubric of "appeal".

[11] In my view, the reconsideration by the board of this matter did not cure the defects of the original board meeting decision of 23 November 2009, but in my view at least, it did not itself constitute a separate heading of unfair procedures. Overall, what occurred here, in my view at least, is an unfortunately not unusual instance of a flawed procedure. Many similar examples are regularly encountered in courts. Many defective and flawed procedures are carried out and where appropriate the courts will declare them invalid or quash them pursuant to judicial review. Here however the plaintiff claims that these matters have had a serious impact on her mental health and seeks to recover substantial damages as a result.

[12] The plaintiff had experienced two earlier incidents of depression, one post-partum, and one in reaction to bereavements. During the period of the events set out above, she suffered from headaches, insomnia, diarrhoea and anxiety which her G.P. put down to bullying-related stress. Evidence was given by a psychiatrist, Dr. Byrne, that her past periods of depression meant that she was predisposed to further depressive illness. The trial judge was satisfied that she suffered from an anxiety and depressive disorder resulting in a high state of anxiety, loss of confidence and inability to cope with life. On review in 2014, she was found to be suffering from a severe anxiety state and severe depression although the judge thought it probable that at this stage the impending litigation was worsening her symptoms. He also concluded, at para. 94, that it was probable that "when this litigation is concluded, there is likely to be significant improvement in her anxiety and depressive state."

[13] The trial judge concluded that the matters set out above constituted bullying. He accepted the definition of bullying found in the Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice Detailing Procedures For Addressing Bullying in The Workplace) (Declaration) Order 2002 (S.I. No. 17) as follows:-

> "Workplace Bullying is repeated inappropriate behaviour, direct or indirect, whether verbal, physical or otherwise, conducted by one or more persons against another or others, at the place of work and/or in the course of employment, which could reasonably be regarded as undermining the individual's right to dignity at work. An isolated incident of the behaviour described in this definition may be an affront to dignity at work but, as a once off incident, is not considered to be bullying."

This has been accepted as an appropriate working definition for the purposes of the claim.

[14] At para. 63, the trial judge concluded that the treatment throughout the process of the plaintiff by the principal was entirely "inappropriate" within the meaning of the definition. At para. 88, he concluded:-

> "Thus, in my opinion, the plaintiff has demonstrated to my satisfaction that the inappropriate behaviour of the defendants was not merely an isolated incident but was persistent over a period of in excess of one year. There can be no doubt but that this persistent, inappropriate behaviour of the defendants wholly undermined the plaintiff's dignity at work."

Accordingly he concluded at paras. 95 to 97 that she was entitled to damages calculated as follows:-

Psychiatric injury to date	€75,000.00
Future psychiatric injury	€40,000.00
Loss of earnings up to 6 March 2014	€93,276.39
Future loss of earnings	€47,000.00
Total:	€255,276.39

Proceedings on appeal

Court of Appeal

[15] The Court of Appeal by a majority (Ryan P. and Irvine J.; Finlay Geoghegan J. dissenting) allowed the defendant's appeal ([2015] IECA 287). It appears to have been accepted however that there was no evidence supporting the claim to future loss of earnings and that amount should be deducted leaving the award in issue at €208,276. Ryan P. reviewed the evidence carefully and in some detail. His conclusions on the matter were set out succinctly at pp. 26 to 28 of his judgment:-

"74. This was not a case of bullying because:-

(i) the motive was child protection in a school devoted exclusively to children with special needs;

(ii) it was accepted all round that it was legitimate in the interests of child protection to ensure that the sensory room door was not locked – see the comments of the trial judge and of Mr. Mullen, the trade union official;

(iii) the chairman, Mr. Lynch, thought that the plaintiff, as an experienced special needs assistant, should have known not to lock the door; this view does not have to be held to be correct and it was not disputed that it was honestly held;

(iv) the defence that others also locked the door was mitigation but not a full answer to the complaint;

(v) the individual encounters may reasonably be viewed in a different light e.g. the report by Ms. Bramhall on the plaintiff's completion, inaccurately, of the Form 6, which undermines the conclusion that the process constituted bullying;

(vi) this was a disciplinary process, perhaps arising from a misunderstanding, but honestly pursued in the interests of the children;

(vii) there was nothing in the process of investigation that constituted a sustained campaign maliciously pursued in order to intimidate or humiliate or denigrate the plaintiff;

(viii) the person who would have been most alert to bullying was Mr. Mullen, the plaintiff's trade union representative, who did not suggest that this was such a case;

(ix) at worst this was a botched disciplinary process and not a case of repeated offensive behaviour intended to destroy the plaintiff's dignity at work;

(x) the definition of bullying has to be stretched beyond breaking point to fit this case;

(xi) if the trial judge's conclusions are permitted to stand, this judgment will widen the tort of bullying to all kinds of situations that it was never intended to cover;

(xii) the definition is carefully drafted so as to convey the particular nature of the activity that is the subject of the wrong and which is required to be addressed by the employer. It is important that the courts should respect the precision of the definition and its limitations and confine it to the proper circumstances in which it applies. This is not such a case."

[16] For her part, Irvine J., having conducted a careful review of the evidence and the law, agreed with the conclusions of Ryan P. She focused on the requirement that the conduct be repeated, inappropriate and undermine dignity. She considered in particular that to constitute repetition, the events relied on had to be reasonably proximate to each other otherwise there might be no more than individualised stated events. She gave the example where three events occurring within a month of each other might amount to bullying, whereas the same three events occurring over a three year period would not. She did not consider, at para. 46, p. 17, that the conduct of a body acting outside its jurisdiction should be considered to be "inappropriate" in the sense intended by the definition of bullying. She accepted however that a right to dignity at work entitled a person to be treated with reasonable fairness. She also considered that while in most cases of bullying there would be a public element to the undermining of the dignity of the individual, it was not essential that the conduct occur in public. Irvine J. concluded however that the matters alleged here did not amount to bullying. She was critical of the inferences drawn by the trial judge. Two in particular are illustrative. First, she addressed the conclusion that it could be inferred from what the High Court concluded at para. 48 of that judgment was the "downright intemperate" sanction imposed that the board at its meeting of 23 November 2009, had been given an "almost certainly untrue, highly biased, coloured" account by Ms. Dempsey of the plaintiff's conduct which "grossly and unfairly damnified the plaintiff". Of this Irvine J. said at pp. 31 and 32:-

> "74. Once again, I regret to say I am not satisfied that this inference can objectively be sustained by reference to the evidence. First, there was Mr. Lynch's unchallenged evidence that Ms. Dempsey favoured the imposition of a grade 2 or grade 3 warning and was against a more severe sanction. Secondly, even when it could be stated with absolute certainty that the board was fully aware of the plaintiff's case, namely that other SNAs locked the door and that she had not been instructed not to do this, it was unwilling to withdraw the sanction which it had considered appropriate to impose. Thirdly, it was never suggested to Mr. Lynch, the chairman of the board, in the course of cross-examination, that Ms. Dempsey had presented the case to the board in the manner so found by the trial judge."

[17] Irvine J. was also not prepared to accept the inference that no proper consideration was given to the facts of the plaintiff's case before the board rejected her appeal. At pp. 36 and 37 of her judgment she said:-

> "82. As to the inference drawn by the trial judge that no proper consideration was given to the facts of the plaintiff's case before the board rejected her appeal, I have to say that this is an inference about which I have grave reservations particularly in circumstances where Mr. Lynch, the chairman of the board, was never challenged on the matter.
>
> 83. Leaving that fact aside, I ask myself what could be the matters to which the trial judge considered the board did not give consideration? It had received in writing the case made by IMPACT in its letter of 29 January 2010. That letter referred to the fact that [the plaintiff] was making the case that it had not been made clear to her that it was a health and safety breach to lock the sensory room door and that the practice had not previously been objected to. The board also had the second letter from IMPACT enclosing the result of [the plaintiff's] questionnaire of 22 April 2010, to demonstrate that other SNAs had also engaged in the same practice. It also had the details of the submissions made by Mr. Mullen on [the plaintiff's] behalf at the meeting set up following the receipt of the appeal.
> 84. It seems to me that the trial judge's inference that the plaintiff's case was not properly considered can only be ascribed to his subjective view that such was the strength of the plaintiff's case that the board would have reversed its decision if it had properly applied its mind to the full facts.

[18] The conclusion to which Irvine J. came was set out at p. 41 of her judgment:-

"94. All of these factors afforded the plaintiff substantial grounds upon which she might have instituted plenary proceedings seeking a declaration as to the invalidity of both the original decision of the board and the decision which it made on the appeal. For whatever reason, she chose to eschew such an approach in favour of an action for damages for breach of duty on the part of her employer in respect of bullying in the workplace.

95. However, the fact that the board may have conducted the investigative and disciplinary process in the hopelessly flawed manner last described does not bring its conduct anywhere close to meeting the definition of bullying as set out in Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding Ltd. [2005] IEHC 71 & [2008] IESC 44, [2009] 1 I.R. 349. On the facts of this particular case, objectively ascertained, the defendant could not be considered guilty of the type of repetitive inappropriate conduct which undermined the plaintiff's right to dignity in the workplace for a period of over a year as was found by the trial judge."

[19] Finlay Geoghegan J. dissented. Her judgment is particularly relied on by the plaintiff in this appeal. She observed at para. 8, p. 3, that while the claim was often referred to colloquially as a claim for bullying, it had been said that there was no separate tort of bullying or harassment (see: Kelly v. Bon Secours Heath System Limited [2012] IEHC 21, (Unreported, High Court, Cross J., 26 January 2012) and Nyhan v. Commissioner of An Garda Síochána [2012] IEHC 329, (Unreported, High Court, Cross J., 26 July 2012)). The claim was a species of a claim for breach of the general duty owed by an employer to an employee. She considered at para. 8, p. 4, that the necessary "proofs on the part of a plaintiff may differ" depending on whether the alleged perpetrator was a fellow employee or whether the conduct alleged to constitute bullying was carried out by the employer or management. She cited with approval an extract from a leading work, McMahon & Binchy, Law of Torts (4th ed., Bloomsbury Professional, 2013), at para. 18.80:-

> "There is no distinctive tort of bullying or harassment: the question is to be resolved, in the context of employers' liability, by asking whether the employers took reasonable care not to expose the plaintiff > to the risk of injury from such conduct. The answer will depend in large part on what facts ought to have been known to the employer. Naturally, matters are different where the plaintiff's claim is that he or she is the victim of 'corporate bullying', where the allegation is that the management of the enterprise is implicated in the bullying activity. Such claims have succeeded in some recent cases, and failed in others."

[20] In a careful judgment, Finlay Geoghegan J. addressed this definition. She concluded at para. 20, p. 9, that "repeated" behaviour was to be contrasted with the "isolated incident" or the "once-off" incident also referred to in the code of practice. While the consideration of what behaviour would constitute "repeated" for the purposes of the test "must depend on an assessment of all the facts", a disciplinary process which continued over a number of months with several interactions between the plaintiff, the principal, and the chairman, could not "be considered to be either an isolated incident or a once-off incident".

[21] Finlay Geoghegan J. also considered at para. 18, p. 8, that it was also difficult and probably dangerous to try and define at a level of principle what would be the threshold for "inappropriate" behaviour. In a workplace context that had to depend on the relationship and relative positions of the individual and the "full factual context". She was satisfied however that the behaviour here was indeed inappropriate.

[22] Finally, Finlay Geoghegan J. addressed the question of conduct undermining the right to dignity at work. At pp. 10 and 11, she found that satisfied by the breach of fair procedures in this case:-

> "22. Whereas on the facts of this case the court is considering the right of the plaintiff as [an] employee to dignity at work in a context of her treatment by the principal of the school and the board of management in relation to a disciplinary process, such right to dignity must include, it appears to me, a right to be treated with respect, fairly and not less favourably than other colleagues in a similar position. It must include a right not to be singled out for disciplinary treatment in relation to a practice which whilst not acceptable was engaged in by other similar colleagues. It is obvious that an employee must expect, in a situation where it is contended that her performance has been less than what is expected or required that she may be subjected to a disciplinary process. However, it appears to me that her right to dignity at work includes a right to be treated with respect and fairly in the above sense and not singled out unfairly from colleagues in a similar position in such [a] disciplinary process."

[23] At para. 43, p. 18, of her judgment, Finlay Geoghegan J. made it clear that she was not relying on the inferences drawn by the trial judge at para. 48 of the High Court judgment, which had been challenged by the defendant. However, she considered that the remaining evidence justified a finding of bullying, and accordingly upheld the award of damages subject only to the deduction of the award in future loss of earnings.

Supreme Court

[24] In its determination Ruffley v. Board of Management of St. Anne's School [2016] IESCDET 52, the Supreme Court granted the plaintiff leave to appeal on two questions:-

1) whether an unfairly carried out disciplinary process resulting in psychiatric injury is, in itself, capable of being actionable in damages on the basis that it amounts to workplace bullying without evidence of malicious intent on the part of the employer; and
2) whether behaviour not witnessed by other persons in the workplace is capable of undermining the dignity of an employee.

During the hearing of the appeal, it became apparent that to address only these issues might not result in a complete resolution of the case, since even if both questions were answered positively that would not necessarily lead to the overturning of the decision of the Court of Appeal. Accordingly the court invited the parties to address the question more comprehensively and to consider if the finding of bullying by the High Court was sustainable, because if that were the case, it would follow that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed. However, this meant that the court did not perhaps have the range of materials and depth of submissions as might have been provided if the broader issue had been addressed from the outset, and so my conclusions as to the law must be subject to some qualification and the possibility of refinement in future cases.

[25] It should be noted that prior to the granting of leave in this case, there had already been some brief discussion in this court about what constitutes bullying in the workplace in Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding Ltd. [2005] IEHC 71 & [2008] IESC 44, [2009] 1 I.R. 349. In that case the plaintiff had worked in a business for 21 years and had become the fourth most senior employee. The business changed hands on a number of occasions before being acquired by the defendant, and later closed down. Evidence was given by the plaintiff and others of the "terrible domineering demeanour" of the new plant manager towards the plaintiff (para. 24, p. 356). A shop steward described the "animosity" of the plant manager towards the plaintiff (para. 24, p. 356). Other evidence was given of humiliating behaviour by the plant manager and the new managing director when discussing a voluntary redundancy package, and of humiliating and demeaning references to the plaintiff being made to other employees about the plaintiff. The manager often stood on a box only eight feet behind the plaintiff's work station "with the effect of intimidating the plaintiff" (para. 13, p. 354). Other remarks were made suggesting the plaintiff was not capable of performing even basic functions, and needed "some broom training" (para. 13, p. 355). Neither the plant manager nor the former managing director were called in evidence so the detailed evidence of victimisation was not challenged.

At p. 371, Fennelly J. accepted counsel for the defendant's submission that:-

> "[14] … bullying must be:-
> - repeated;
> - inappropriate;
> - undermining of the dignity of the employee at work."

Fennelly J. elaborated further on the issue of bullying in the context of causation, observing at p. 372 that:-

> "[19] 17. The plaintiff cannot succeed in his claim unless he also proves that he suffered damage amounting to personal injury as a result of his employer's breach of duty. Where the personal injury is not of a direct physical kind, it must amount to an identifiable psychiatric injury."

[26] The trial judge in this case referred to the above dicta of Fennelly J. in Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding Ltd. [2005] IEHC 71 & [2008] IESC 44, [2009] 1 I.R. 349. Although Fennelly J. recognised the "comparative novelty of the cause of action" in Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding Ltd. [2005] IEHC 71 & [2008] IESC 44, he observed at para. 5, pp. 368 and 369, that the court "[had] not been asked to decide any principles of law" because "[t]he parties were ad idem as to the nature of the wrong of harassment or bullying and the standard which should be applied". In any event, the appeal was allowed on a question of causation. It is the case that Fennelly J. stated that the conduct there amply met the criteria of being repeated, inappropriate and undermining of the dignity of the plaintiff at work. It will be useful to compare the facts of Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding Ltd. to the current proceedings, but it remains the case that this case presents the first opportunity for the Supreme Court to give extended consideration to the law of bullying in the workplace.

Discussion

[27] This case raises a number of issues. First, as counsel for the plaintiff observed at the outset of the appeal, the case may appear to be a storm in a teacup. The core issue, whether a door should have been locked, or perhaps more precisely what the school (principal, chairperson, and board) should have done once it became aware of the fact and that the plaintiff was contending that this was a common practice, seems a relatively minor and routine matter that ought to have been capable of being addressed in a small school where personal relationships were important and where the plaintiff had worked for ten years. Hindsight is easy, but it is difficult to think that it would not have been better for all sides if this had been sorted out with more sensitivity and goodwill at any of the number of points on which it may have been possible to resolve it without litigation, and perhaps most obviously when the plaintiff's union became involved. That would have avoided the stress and considerable expense of a High Court action extending over 11 days trawling through the minutiae of personal relationships.

[28] I think it is clear that the case is not one that fits squarely into the core understanding of bullying at work. Although questions of unfair dismissal and bullying can overlap (such as in Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding Ltd. [2005] IEHC 71 & [2008] IESC 44, [2009] 1 I.R. 349 and Eastwood v. Magnox Electric plc [2004] UKHL 35, [2005] 1 A.C. 503, referred to therein), I am not aware of any case which presents the issue raised in this case of unfair procedures being alleged, without more, to constitute bullying or where a bullying claim relied on similar matters. Although there is an oblique reference at para. 61 of the High Court judgment that the behaviour of the principal was hard to understand without an element of bad faith, it is not alleged or found that there was any individual personal animosity traceable to any incident or event. The behaviour was considered to be "strange", "odd" and "difficult to understand" but not malicious. Indeed the board was unaware of the identity of the plaintiff when it made the initial decision, so there can be no inference of personal animus on the part of the other board members. Yet they were the members pressing for the most severe sanction. With the exception of the incident on 27 January 2010, when the plaintiff was reduced to tears, and to which the High Court judge does not appear to have attributed critical significance, there is no suggestion of personally offensive behaviour. It is not suggested that there was ridicule, personal antagonism, or exclusion from a group. Nor was there shouting in public, or the making of disparaging remarks in public or private about work, appearance, gender or sexuality, status or racial origin. There is no allegation of intimidation or the circulation of damaging gossip, or the use of aggressive and obscene language or repeated requests to do tasks which were either menial or impossible to perform in the time required. Here the complaint relates to unfair procedures in a disciplinary process including what was alleged to be the unfair singling out of the plaintiff for punishment for conduct which others had admitted to, and which the trial judge considered a common practice and perhaps in any event, not unduly serious. This is not to say that such matters cannot constitute bullying, but rather that it compounds the difficulty of this case, that it involves conduct which on any view is at the margins of conduct alleged to be bullying.

[29] It is apparent that the plaintiff is a sensitive person. There is no suggestion however that the employer here was aware of the earlier episodes of depression, or that the case should be approached in that light, i.e., that the school should have known that the plaintiff had a predisposition to such matters. It is also disturbing that the remedy (in this case protracted litigation), if not worse, then certainly resembles the wrong in its impact on the individual concerned. It is apparent that by the time the case came on in the High Court, the plaintiff's experience of stress, anxiety and depression were bound up with the stress necessarily involved in court proceedings so that the judge considered that the symptoms recounted on examination were attributable to the litigation as much as the original complaints about the school. Furthermore, the trial judge was confident that once the case was resolved, it would be possible for her to return to work within six months even though she had at that point been absent for almost four years. It may be said that this is an unavoidable consequence of any claim that goes to court, but it is certainly the case that court proceedings, with all the pressures involved, are a less than ideal method of dealing with complaints of workplace stress. It should also be recognised that such cases impose their own stresses on other people involved because necessarily their own characters and reputation will come under scrutiny in a more personal way than in an ordinary personal injuries claim.

[30] A further feature which is not unconnected to the stresses involved are the considerable costs involved of a hearing of this nature which has now extended over 14 days in 3 courts. If the High Court judgment is upheld then the award of damages and costs and the defendant's own costs, will on any view be very substantial indeed. On the other hand, if the Court of Appeal decision is upheld, and if it followed that costs were awarded against the plaintiff, then that could easily be ruinous for her. Even if only required to bear her own costs, and her lawyers, as lawyers acting for individuals in unsuccessful cases often do, were willing to reduce their fees, the financial impact would still be very substantial indeed.

[31] In my view, these features of the case mean that this case, difficult in itself as a factual controversy, must be looked at more broadly. At some level this novel case will set a benchmark for all bullying claims. The purpose of the law of tort, and in particular the identification of new claims or areas of liability, is not merely to adjust matters fairly between the individual parties (difficult though as that may be in a particular case) but by doing so to enable other cases to be settled without proceeding to a hearing, and many more to be avoided entirely. As Dean Guido Calabresi memorably observed, if a person is held liable for the damage and loss they caused to others, this person will eventually refrain from carrying out the harmful activity: Calabresi, "Some Thoughts on Risk Distribution and the Law of Torts" (1961) 70 Yale L.J. 499. One justification therefore for the law of torts and the stresses and costs it entails is that it provides a potent incentive to alter general behaviour. It is necessary therefore to have regard to the impact, well beyond this case, of any finding or rejection of liability.

[32] Normally in such circumstances it will become particularly important to pay close attention to the facts of the case. However, this case illustrates two truths which may not be immediately apparent to the law student encountering the common law through the medium of reported decisions. First, cases do not come pre-packaged under the headings in the text books. It is not simply a case of concluding which side has acted well, and who has been injured and who should pay. It is an important issue to consider how the case should be analysed as a matter of law. Here for example, as Irvine J. observed, there is little doubt that the disciplinary process engaged in by the school here was flawed, and that a court if asked to do so would have declared the disciplinary sanction invalid. It is not necessary to speculate on the range or type of proceedings or the extent of remedies involved. However, it does not follow from the fact that the plaintiff was wronged by the defendant in some sense, that therefore the plaintiff should recover in excess of €200,000 damages. That is so, even if it is accepted that the plaintiff's depression, anxiety and stress were caused in whole or in part by the treatment she received. To take just one obvious example, in the field of administrative law where judicial review on the grounds of fair procedures is commonplace, invalid administrative action does not given rise itself to a claim for damages.

[33] It is also important to keep in mind the role of fair procedures in this case. They clearly loom large in the High Court judge's assessment of the case, and were relied on to a significant extent in the dissenting judgment of Finlay Geoghegan J. in the Court of Appeal. However, it is not necessary to establish a breach of fair procedures to succeed in a bullying claim, and conversely, the presence of unfair procedures does not establish bullying. Bullying often involves a question as to how something was done rather than what was done. In theory it is possible that a disciplinary process conducted in accordance with the rules of fair procedures might still constitute bullying, even irrespective of the outcome of the process. An ostensibly fair process and punishment for an established breach may constitute bullying if it is established it was instituted maliciously, and as part of a campaign to victimise an individual. It is important therefore not to blur the distinction between these two different claims by assuming that there is any logical connection between a breach of procedures and a claim of bullying entitling a party to substantial damages.

[34] Furthermore, when appellate courts refer to the facts, and when the facts of a case, if reported, are presented in a compressed format in a headnote, it is easy to think that these are fixed and immutable points. On this approach, fact-finding may be difficult, but once found, facts are hard-edged and clear. But this case illustrates something the fact-sceptic branch of legal realism identified some time ago: facts are more malleable and the lines between fact, inference, supposition and speculation are more blurred than the confident finding of facts and pinning down of conclusions in a judgment might suggest. It seems clear that the two judges who would have upheld the plaintiff's claim in this case viewed, and more importantly, characterised, the events in this case quite differently from the two judges in the Court of Appeal who rejected the plaintiff's claim. One side sees the plaintiff as unfairly subjected to a disciplinary process which itself was unfair. The sanction produced was so severe and a refusal to reduce it so incomprehensible that the whole process can only be explicable as bullying. On the other hand, the majority of the Court of Appeal viewed the evidence as portraying a bungled, perhaps seriously bungled, disciplinary process but carried out in relation to an incident the school was entitled to consider serious, and by people including the board, whose integrity there was no reason to impugn.

[35] This difference of approach makes it difficult to review the facts, and indeed to apply the traditional tools of appellate review. In this case, many of the findings of the trial judge are bound up in and difficult to distinguish from inferences he drew. It is very clear that the trial judge took a very strong view of the facts in favour of the plaintiff, and against the defendant.

[36] In fact little if anything turns on this appeal on the finding of contested primary facts in this case which is the area in which an appellate court will most readily defer to the trial court. It appears to me that there are perhaps only three areas in which there were contested issues of fact resolved by the trial judge: two in favour of the plaintiff, and one in favour of the defendant, but that none of these conclusions appear to have had a significant impact on the outcome of the case. The trial judge accepted the plaintiff's evidence that Ms. Dempsey had not handed to her a letter dated 18 September 2009 at the meeting on that date, or indeed at all. In another case this might be significant. However the terms of the letter are not themselves particularly important to the resolution of this case. Of course, if the trial judge had found that the letter had been deliberately fabricated after the event, to in some way cover or bolster the defendant's position, that might be significant, and indeed have an impact on the assessment of the credibility of witnesses, if that had been an issue. However, no such finding was made, and the case is not dependent on the credibility of witnesses. Instead it is largely dependent on the assessment of facts which themselves are not in contest. In fairness to all parties, I should also observe that there was a degree of confusion on both sides as to the exchange of correspondence and the sequence of events.

[37] The second issue is when the plaintiff and Ms. Dempsey met to consider the teacher's review of the plaintiff conducted by Ms. Bramhall and recorded on an SNA staff assessment form. The plaintiff described the events as occurring at a meeting on 12 November 2009, but the judge was satisfied that the meeting occurred on 19 October 2009. Again, in other circumstances this might be significant, but nothing appears to turn on it, at least for the purposes of the trial judge's conclusions. Finally, there was a total conflict of evidence between the plaintiff and Ms. Dempsey as to what occurred at a meeting on 27 January 2010. In that regard the trial judge accepted, at para. 64, the plaintiff's evidence that she was subjected to a "considerable variety of denigration which belittled, humiliated and reduced her to tears". It would certainly be helpful for the purposes of appellate review if in addition to the conclusion of denigration, belittling, and humiliation, the specific matters alleged to have been said were set out, but this is clearly a matter in respect of which the judge was entitled to make a finding as between the conflicting accounts. However, while denigration, belittling, humiliation and reducing a person to tears, even in a private meeting, is clearly potentially relevant to any claim of bullying, it does not appear to have loomed large in the trial judge's conclusion because before recounting his findings in respect of that meeting, the trial judge had in the immediately preceding paragraph already concluded that the "treatment of the plaintiff throughout this process by Ms. Dempsey was entirely 'inappropriate' within the meaning of the definition of bullying in the workplace." Nevertheless, I accept that the finding at para. 64 in favour of the plaintiff in respect of the meeting of 27 January 2010 is something within the province of the trial judge: there was conflicting evidence and he accepted entirely one version. I also accept for the purposes of this judgment that such a finding of conduct, even occurring at a private meeting between only two individuals, is capable of constituting conduct which is inappropriate and capable of undermining the plaintiff's dignity at work, and therefore if repeated, capable of constituting bullying. To that extent this is a finding of primary fact, and therefore important, although not central, to the conclusion of the trial judge.

[38] I accept this finding with some reluctance however, because cogent criticisms have been directed towards the analysis of the facts in the High Court and in particular the finding at para. 48 of the judgment that at the meeting of 23 November 2009, Ms. Dempsey outlined the history of the matter to the board, which was "almost certainly untrue, highly biased, coloured, and grossly and unfairly damnified the plaintiff". As already noted, Finlay Geoghegan J., who otherwise upheld the conclusions of the High Court judge, did not rely on the finding at para. 48 because it was challenged by the defendant. It is necessary to explain in a little more detail why that is so, and why in my view Finlay Geoghegan J. was certainly correct, at a minimum, to avoid relying on that finding.

[39] This finding cannot really be characterised as an inference, but rather as speculation alleged to follow ineluctably from certain facts. The finding here is alleged to follow from the fact that a group of reasonable people could not possibly have come to the "downright intemperate" conclusion which they did, namely, if not a recommendation for the decision to dismiss the plaintiff then at least the issuance of a final stage part four warning, unless the account they had been given was almost certainly untrue, highly biased, coloured, and grossly and unfairly damnifying of the plaintiff. There are however a number of difficulties with this conclusion. First, the only evidence given of the events at the meeting of 23 November 2009 was that given by Ms. Dempsey and Mr. Lynch. Neither gave any evidence that would allow the judge to conclude that what Ms. Dempsey said to the board was untrue and highly biased. This is a conclusion derived entirely therefore from the judge's view of what he describes as the extreme reaction of the board. This conclusion is dubious as a matter of logic (there could be other reasons, whether good or bad, for the board's reaction other than an unfair account by Ms. Dempsey, such as that, rightly or wrongly, they took a more serious view of the matter than the judge did) but, as the majority of the Court of Appeal pointed out, it is in any event difficult to square with other uncontested facts: first, that Ms. Dempsey and Mr. Lynch did not encourage the board in its conclusion, but sought a lesser sanction and sought to dissuade the board from recommending dismissal; second, that the plaintiff was not identified by name and there could be therefore no question of any personal animus at least on the part of the other members of the board; and finally, that when the board was apprised of the case being made on behalf of the plaintiff, namely that the sanction was too severe in and of itself, and in the circumstances where other SNAs had engaged in the practice, the board nevertheless reaffirmed its decision. But there is perhaps an even more fundamental objection, which must have particular weight in a case such as this, concerned at its heart with fair procedures: this assertion was not put to either Ms. Dempsey or Mr. Lynch in cross-examination on behalf of the plaintiff or indeed by the judge, even though the conclusion arrived at in the judgment, of an untruthful, biased, and grossly unfair account, is one necessarily damaging to Ms. Dempsey's reputation, and also and inescapably meant that Mr. Lynch's account of the meeting must have been, at a minimum, both partial and inaccurate in a very material respect.

[40] I cannot accept therefore the finding at para. 48 of the High Court judgment as a finding of fact. Furthermore, I consider that an erroneous conclusion arrived at by an experienced trial judge who had so clearly and obviously engaged carefully with the facts of this case, is its own warning against any over-simplification of the facts in this case. It is apparent however, that Finlay Geoghegan J. in the Court of Appeal was able to uphold the trial judge's finding without relying on the finding at para. 48. I have some reservations about this course because it is not clear to me that a court can apply the normal test of deference towards the findings and assessments of the trial judge if it has concluded that in some important and material respect findings have been made which cannot be supported. This must apply particularly in a case such as this which is dependent upon there being a number of incidents and a pattern of behaviour which can satisfy the legal requirement of repeated inappropriate behaviour undermining dignity at work. If one or more incidents relied on by the trial judge is properly rejected by an appellate court, can the overall conclusion of the trial court, that there had been repeated conduct sufficient to establish bullying, be one to which the appellate court must continue to defer? It is apparent that something similar occurred in relation to the inference drawn by the trial judge at para. 75 that he was satisfied that the board did not give any meaningful consideration to the case being made by the plaintiff. As is pointed out by Irvine J., this was not put to Mr. Lynch in cross-examination either. I am not convinced therefore that it is appropriate to merely subtract these findings and then consider whether the balance of matters can justify a finding of liability when we do not and cannot know if the trial judge would himself or herself have so considered. However, given the importance of this case both to the individuals and more widely, I think it is desirable to proceed to consider the other issues in the appeal on the assumption that it is possible to excise para. 48, and consider if the remaining matters can support a finding of bullying.

[41] I regret to say that it appears to me also that despite the welter of evidence of the day-to-day interactions, and the communications and correspondence between the parties, there is nevertheless an absence of evidence on an issue which I consider to be important, if not central. An important component of the High Court finding of bullying was that the original incident – the locking of the sensory room door – was a relatively trivial matter which ought to have been resolved simply, and did not itself merit being brought to the board. In this regard the trial judge takes a contrary view to the principal, Ms. Dempsey, and the chairman, Mr. Lynch, who both considered it should be brought to the board's attention, and by definition, the other members of the board who treated the matter so seriously. This accordingly involves the trial judge substituting his judgment for that of the decision-makers. It is rare for courts to do this, when asked to review the decision of a decision-maker otherwise than by way of direct appeal. The guarantee of fair procedures is based on the theory that if fair procedures are followed, a fair result will ensue, but there is inevitably a range of decisions which a reasonable decision-maker may take even if a judge on the same material would not make the same decision. A court exercising judicial review is not a court of appeal on the merits. A similar test is applied when reviewing the fairness of dismissals from employment. If procedural fairness is to be a component of the tort claim, a similar approach should apply.

[42] Here it is very clear that the trial judge considered that the decision of the board was not only reached after an unfair and flawed procedure, but was a decision which was wrong in the sense that it was a decision that he himself would not have come to. It may be inferred that he would also have considered that it was a decision to which no reasonable board could properly have come. But that is a conclusion on an issue which, at a minimum, would have been greatly assisted by evidence from experienced care professionals as to whether the practice of locking the door from the inside was a breach of proper procedures and perhaps critically, if it was, how serious a matter it was.

[43] The manner in which the High Court dealt with the first component of this issue is worthy of some note. Initially the judgment simply records the plaintiff's surprise at being reprimanded because it was said no instruction had been given either to lock or not lock the room. These and further references seem to suggest that the appropriateness of the conduct was a matter of some reasonable debate. However, at para. 42 the trial judge accepted, readily, that it was reasonable of the defendant both for health and safety reasons and more probably for reasons of child protection to insist on a prohibition of locking the door. Later, at para. 44, "with the benefit of due consideration and also hindsight", it was acknowledged that it could "easily be said that … the overriding necessity to observe child protection standards … meant, unequivocally, that … this door should never be locked". Later again however, it is stated at para. 58 that the locking of the door was something "the defendant was entitled to regard as unacceptable". Given the importance of this issue, it could have benefitted from independent evidence which might have established the seriousness or appropriateness of the conduct beyond dispute. There seems little doubt however, that the locking of the door in this way was not acceptable conduct. Indeed, that is precisely what the Mr. Mullen, the plaintiff's union representative, acknowledged when he argued merely that the punishment was too severe. If there is any doubt it is worth considering for a moment what analysis might have been offered in court if in an individual case a child had sought to leave the room and had become agitated and distressed or suffered an injury because of the fact that the door was locked. Again, it is worth considering what the position would be if it had been alleged that a child had been abused in some way while restrained in the room. It is easy in either case to imagine that the practice of locking of the door would have been the subject of very severe criticism, and the fact that it was not in accordance with KARE practice would have been emphasised, and the absence of a specific prohibition in a code of conduct treated as irrelevant.

[44] The judgment ultimately does seem to proceed on the basis that the practice was unacceptable, although in my view it would have been desirable that such a conclusion had the support of independent evidence. However there was no evidence whatsoever on what is perhaps a critical question at the heart of much of the division of opinion in this case: how serious a default was this as a matter of best practice? That question was central to this case because the trial judge found, at para. 62, that the disciplinary process should not have taken place at all and, at para. 48, that the board's response in treating the issue as serious was "extreme, if not, downright intemperate". At a minimum, these conclusions would have been more soundly grounded if there had been evidence as to the seriousness with which such an incident should or could be viewed by a reasonable employer of SNAs caring for children with intellectual disabilities. On the other hand, if there was evidence in addition to that offered by Mr. Lynch, that the practice was regarded as a serious default which should have been known by any conscientious SNA, then the case could be viewed in a very different light.

[45] I accept that a specific component of the trial judge's conclusion that the process should not have taken place was his view that there was a common practice among SNAs of locking the door and that accordingly the plaintiff had been "singled out" for punishment unfairly. Again the evidence however is less than clear-cut. There were 26 SNAs employed in the school (para. 5 of the High Court judgment). The plaintiff devised a rudimentary questionnaire containing two questions the first of which was "Have you ever locked the sensory room door?" (emphasis added). The questionnaire was answered by only four SNAs who all answered "yes". The evidence of the plaintiff and the SNAs who gave evidence was to the effect that more SNAs would have answered affirmatively if they had been able to do so anonymously. Later in the judgment this limited evidence becomes a finding at para. 62 that "there was a common practice of doing this" (emphasis added), and indeed at para. 87 that the board was "aware that several other SNAs also occasionally locked the sensory room door" (emphasis added). At para. 41, there is a finding that "there was a general practice amongst many of the SNAs, probably a majority, of locking the sensory room door" (emphasis added). Again, in my view, the evidence recounted in the judgment is a less than secure basis for the conclusion that there was a general practice among the majority of SNAs of locking the sensory room door, even though that was fundamental to the finding that the process should not have been commenced, and that the plaintiff was singled out. Even on the plaintiff's case this was not the type of clear-cut singling out or targeting for a punishment that is sometimes discussed in an employment context, and which can give rise to a finding of unfair dismissal. A classic case is where it is known as a matter of fact that a certain practice is widespread, but in that knowledge, only one person is selected for punishment, in circumstances which give rise to the reasonable inference that the objective is not to put an end to conduct, but to victimise the individual. In the field of unfair dismissal, consistency in applying procedures may be a component of unfairness. If an employer has previously tended to interpret a disciplinary rule lightly, a sudden decision to dismiss employees for breaking the rule may be unfair (see Redmond, Dismissal Law In Ireland (Butterworth Ireland Ltd., 1999), para. 13). Here however, even on the plaintiff's case, it is not suggested that Ms. Dempsey, still less the board, was aware when the disciplinary process was initiated, of the general practice found by the trial judge based on the limited evidence set out above, and therefore, at least in its initiation, the disciplinary process cannot be treated as a singling out of the plaintiff. What happened was something rather more complex: the plaintiff, having been found to have been engaging in a practice which it appears to have been accepted, even if grudgingly, was inappropriate and unacceptable, and when informed that the matter was being treated as a disciplinary matter, raised the contention that other (unspecified) people had done this on other occasions (also unspecified). The trial judge found that this allegation should have been investigated and that of course goes to the fairness of the procedures followed, but, as Irvine J. suggested in the Court of Appeal, it is certainly a less clear-cut example of being singled out for punishment. Once again it may ground a finding of imperfect and flawed procedures, but it falls short in my view of the type of conduct captured by a bullying claim.

[46] One further observation is necessary. One issue left unresolved by the decision of the High Court is any plausible explanation for the conduct criticised. Most cases of workplace bullying involve bullying by an individual or a group excluding and victimising a person, and which in either case the employer fails to prevent or remedy. There may also be so called "corporate bullying" involving a superior, or indeed management more generally, in the treatment of the individual. Where more than one person is involved as where the individual is ostracised, or subjected to ridicule, it will usually involve some obvious concerted action. However, here, it is not clear what is being alleged or indeed found in this regard. It is not for example alleged merely that Ms. Dempsey bullied the plaintiff, and the school failed to prevent or remedy it. It is clear that Mr. Lynch is also criticised and found culpable although it is not suggested he was involved from the outset. Nor is it suggested that the remaining members of the board were misled by Ms. Dempsey, alone or together with Mr. Lynch, but instead it appears the members of the board were criticised as somehow being participants themselves in the bullying. It seems, although it is not clear, that the teacher Ms. Bramhall may also have been considered a party to the bullying insomuch as she was not prepared to allow the plaintiff correct the weekly forms.

[47] If this case was merely about unfair procedures, then the fact that there were a number of disparate actors would not pose a difficulty, and indeed at some level might enhance the claim: the school would be responsible for the procedures followed, and the cumulative impact of them, and any lack of cohesion and organisation might only give weight to the plaintiff's case. However, it is I think rather different where it is alleged that reprehensible conduct at a personal level such as bullying is involved. It is not clear if the individuals (Ms. Dempsey, Mr. Lynch, Ms. Bramhall, and the other four members of the board) are alleged to have separately engaged in bullying, or in some form of collective action, or that there was some hidden arrangement or agreement between them arising perhaps out of some pre-existing animus. The absence of any explanation why these different people became parties to a pattern of what was considered to be wholly inappropriate behaviour undermining the dignity of the plaintiff as a person, makes it difficult to defer too readily to the conclusions of the trial judge. Accordingly, I think it is difficult to address this merely at the level of the facts found and inferences drawn, although there is considerable force, in my view, in the analysis of those findings in the judgments of the majority in the Court of Appeal. This appeal can be best approached and resolved on a question of law: do the facts found, or not in contest in the High Court, amount to bullying at law?

[48] In this regard the trial judge's approach was to record the facts as found by him, and his strong view of them, and then conclude that this amounted to bullying, without any extended consideration of the law. Thus at para. 63, he determined that the treatment of the plaintiff was "inappropriate". Later at para. 88, having stated at para. 87 that the board persisted in its unfair and inappropriate treatment of the plaintiff, he concluded:-

> "Thus, in my opinion, the plaintiff has demonstrated to my satisfaction that the inappropriate behaviour of the defendants was not merely an isolated incident but was persistent over a period of in excess of one year. There can be no doubt but that this persistent, inappropriate behaviour of the defendant wholly undermined the plaintiff's dignity at work."

[49] On this approach the only analysis of the question of undermining of dignity at work is that it is treated as a necessary consequence of the finding of any inappropriate conduct which was itself persistent. While I recognise that this is a developing area of law, and the facts and evidence in this case were perhaps unusually difficult, I do not think it is sufficient to resolve the legal issue in this way. The requirement of undermining of dignity is an important part of the definition. The matter is dealt with in greater detail in the analysis of the dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal of Finlay Geoghegan J. and it will be necessary to turn to that in due course. Before doing so, it will I hope be useful to look at the question of liability for bullying in a somewhat broader perspective.

A detour: is there a separate tort of bullying or harassment?

[50] While it does not arise directly on this appeal, I consider that the statement of law, accepted without question in this case, that no separate tort of bullying exists or can exist, that bullying is in a sense a subspecies only of an employer's duty of care, but that there can be nevertheless a concept of "corporate bullying" for which the employer is directly responsible, is more than a little puzzling and worthy of some consideration. I discuss these matters, however, not to raise further uncertainties as to the law, but rather because these matters and the questions they raise cast a helpful light, in my view, on the issues to be determined in this case.

[51] There is no doubt that in addition to specific duties imposed by statute, an employer owes extensive duties of care to an employee at common law. Those duties include the duty to provide a safe place of work, a safe system of work, to ensure fellow employees are competent, and that equipment used in the workplace is safe. That duty can clearly extend beyond the direct actions of the employer, and to the actions of other individuals which are or ought to be foreseeable, including the actions of other employees, or indeed third parties. Thus for example, employers have been held responsible for a failure to foresee and take steps to prevent criminal assaults suffered by an employee: Walsh v. Securicor (Ireland) Ltd. [1993] 2 I.R. 507. Another example might be the employee horseplay cases. If the employer knows or ought to have known of the practice, and did not take effective steps to prevent or stop such practices, then an employer may be liable to the injured employee. In addition, an employer may also be vicariously liable for the acts of an employee without proof of fault on the employer's part if the actions of the other employee are so closely connected with the employment as to justify the imposition of vicarious liability. But in either case, at least in theory, the fellow employee is also a tortfeasor, either negligent in respect of the safety of another, or, in some cases, the perpetrator of a deliberate wrong in the nature of an assault for which the employer is vicariously liable. It is not necessary here to discuss the mechanism by which the law as devised to avoid perhaps the full logical consequences of this so that an employer cannot normally seek contribution and indemnity for the acts of an employee tortfeasor, but the theory that the co-employee is guilty of a tort remains an important component of the basis upon which liability, vicarious liability or in negligence, is imposed upon an employer. It is, I think, difficult to conceive of circumstances under which an employer may be held liable for the conduct of another person where that person's conduct is not in itself, at least in theory, itself a tort.

[52] However, if bullying conduct is not itself wrongful (or at least actionable), and is only a subspecies of the employer's duty of care to an employee, certain surprising consequences follow. First, it would mean that actions for bullying could only occur in the employment context. Yet it is plain that there are other areas in which bullying can be encountered. Second, if we take for this purpose a clear-cut example of an extreme case of individual vindictive bullying by one person of another, and where one employee cruelly and mercilessly torments another, with perhaps serious psychiatric consequences for the victim – the bully would nevertheless have no liability to the victim even if the bully was also sufficiently wealthy to pay compensation, and even if, on this hypothesis, the employer was not. Furthermore, under this scenario an employer could escape liability by demonstrating that it had taken all reasonable steps to prevent the bullying. In such a case, a victim of concealed bullying would have no remedy even if the bullying was closely connected to the employment and even if in similar circumstances an employer would be vicariously liable for physical rather than psychiatric injury caused to a victim. Finally, there is a difficulty in reconciling the contention that bullying is only actionable as a subclass of the employer's duty of care with the statement that the employer can nevertheless be liable for something labelled "corporate bullying". In such circumstances, it appears that an employer (who can be a single individual) may be made liable for conduct which is voluntary, deliberate and direct. This is not negligence or a breach of a duty of care, any more than deliberate assault is a breach of some separate duty of care. It is instead a separate intentional tort. It appears rather anomalous therefore that an employer can be liable for direct and deliberate conduct, in this case bullying, when in any other circumstance a bully is not.

[53] It is clear therefore, that the law as stated in this developing field is somewhat anomalous. This is not by any means a fatal objection however, as it is now well recognised, that the lifeblood of the law has not been logic but rather felt experience. The fact that the law has not pursued the logic of a proposition to a remorseless conclusion may often be an indicator, not of lack of principle, but rather of some important felt constraint upon more widespread liability. Disturbances in the pattern of the common law are often instructive instances, meriting investigation rather than merely anomalies to be removed.

[54] It seems likely that these developments in the law in Ireland reflect forces and considerations which may be detected in developments in the jurisprudence of other common law countries. It is useful therefore at this point to briefly survey some relevant developments in other jurisdictions which may cast a light upon the issues to be decided in this case.

International comparisons

[55] The question of liability for intentional or negligent infliction of mental distress has been a difficult topic for the law of torts since at least the decision in Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 Q.B. 57. By the 1990s some consideration had been given to the development of a separate tort of harassment in cases such as Khorasandjian v. Bush [1993] Q.B. 727. In the United Kingdom those developments were overtaken by statute, and the enactment of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, which created both criminal and civil liability for harassment. Subsequently, it was confirmed that there was no scope for the further development of the common law. The statute itself did not define harassment but it included "causing the person distress" (s. 7(2)). It has been held that the conduct "must be grave" and that in any event "in life one has to put up with a certain amount of annoyance: things have got to be fairly severe before the law, civil or criminal, will intervene": Ferguson v. British Gas Trading Ltd. [2009] EWCA Civ 46, [2010] 1 W.L.R. 785 at paras. 17 and 18, p. 791. Later again, Lord Hoffman observed in Wainwright v. Home Office [2003] UKHL 53, [2004] 2 A.C. 406 at p. 426:-

> "46 … In institutions and workplaces all over the country, people constantly do and say things with the intention of causing distress and humiliation to others. This shows lack of consideration and appalling manners but I am not sure that the right way to deal with it is always by litigation."

In Dowson v. Chief Constable of Northumbria Police [2010] EWHC 2612, (Unreported, High Court of England and Wales, 20 October 2010), Simon J. offered a summary of the necessary features of a claim under the legislation at para. 142:-

"(1) There must be conduct which occurs on at least two occasions,
(2) which is targeted at the claimant,

(3) which is calculated in an objective sense to cause alarm or distress, and
(4) which is objectively judged to be oppressive and unacceptable.
(5) What is oppressive and unacceptable may depend on the social or working context in which the conduct occurs.
(6) A line is to be drawn between conduct which is unattractive and unreasonable, and conduct which has been described in various ways: 'torment' of the victim, 'of an order which would sustain criminal liability'."

[56] In Hatton v. Sutherland [2002] EWCA Civ 76, [2002] 2 All E.R. 1, which concerned the field of workplace stress claims, Hale L.J. offered a further detailed list of factors to be considered before any claim for damages for workplace stress. This is undoubtedly an aspect of the employer's duty of care to an employee. Such workplace stress encompasses bullying, but clearly includes other factors. These matters are helpfully considered in Cox, Corbett and Ryan, Employment Law in Ireland, chapter 16, "Legal Obligations for the Employer in Respect of Workplace Stress and Bullying" (Clarus Press, 2009), pp. 565 to 615. In Hatton v. Sutherland [2002] EWCA Civ 76 at para. 43, pp. 19 and 20, Hale L.J. set out 16 propositions which can I think be understood as permitting claims for stress or bullying, but also seeking to limit and control such claims. It is for example noteworthy that one principle was that identified at (11), that an employer who offered a confidential advice service, with referral to appropriate counselling or treatment services, is unlikely to be found in breach of duty.

[57] The law has developed differently in other common law jurisdictions. In the United States of America, the early development of the law in the early 20th century was influenced by the legal realists and their acceptance of contemporaneous developments in psychiatry. Accordingly, U.S. law in a number of states was willing to accept the possibility at least of claims for intentional or negligent infliction of an emotional injury. Dean William Prosser was a key influence in this development. The most striking thing for present purposes however, is that notwithstanding a willingness to contemplate recovery for emotional distress and psychiatric injury, the law still sought significant limiting devices such as Prosser's concept of "extreme outrage". Thus, Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts (5th ed., West Publishing Co., 1984) at pp. 60 and 61, expressed the general principle in striking terms:-

"In special situations of extreme misconduct recovery is allowed

> So far as it is possible to generalise from the cases, the rule which seems to have emerged is that there is liability for conduct exceeding all bounds usually tolerated by decent society, of a nature which is especially calculated to cause, and does cause, mental distress of a very serious kind. The requirements of the rule are rigorous, and difficult to satisfy."

[58] This approach is reflected in Restatement of the Law (Second) Torts (American Law Institute Publishers, 1977), which provides at § 46:-

> "One who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress to another is subject to liability for such emotional distress, and if bodily harm to the other results from it, for such bodily harm."

The conduct in question must be "conduct which in the eyes of decent men and women in a civilized community is considered outrageous and intolerable" (§ 46(g)).

[59] It is not necessary to engage in a further survey of these difficult issues and the development of the law of tort to which so much learning has been devoted in common law countries. It is sufficient for present purposes to observe, that in dealing with claims that an individual who claims to suffer a mental or psychiatric injury as a result of the wrongful act of another, the common law has proceeded cautiously. In those cases where recovery is permitted, the common law has sought to set a number of limiting devices, and in particular a requirement that the injury must be measurable and the conduct severe. It is not surprising that this should be so. Returning to the observations made at the outset of this judgment, litigation is extremely costly and demanding, both in financial terms and in the resources which must be applied to it. In addition to this there is the broader cost of claims which must be settled because a plausible claim can be made, and the further social cost that the possibility of such litigation will inevitability lead to the adjustment of behaviour as parties seek to avoid the risk of exposure to costly claims. Where this results in the improvement of workplace practice and behaviours, and the protection of individuals from intolerable behaviour, it is a proper and valuable function of the law of tort. If however, the test adopted leads schools or employers to avoid pressing disciplinary matters so as to avoid the risk of exposure to liability, then the cost is negative. Few people subjected to reprimand or discipline accept it stoically: it is human nature to be offended and indeed to experience a sense of injustice and resentment, all the more so if there is some justification. If bullying claims may be maintained in any such circumstance, and are not clearly and precisely defined, then prudent employers may opt to avoid the action which exposes them to the risk. This is not to say that bullying should be tolerated, or that victims should not be compensated nor indeed that employers should not adapt their behaviour to protect employees from bullying either direct or indirect. It does suggest however, that as Oliver Wendell Holmes observed, quoting Plato's Phaedrus, that when making a new rule, the law should seek "to carve nature at its joint". In this case that means setting a test which achieves the objective of compensating the victim of a serious wrongdoing, deterring damaging behaviour, and encouraging prudent and sensible practices without encouraging a proliferation of claims more generally, and inhibiting workplace activity to an excessive degree.

[60] Turning to the legal issue which arises in this case, it is I think significant that the claim relates to a disciplinary process, and circumstances which are not encompassed by the classic conceptions of workplace bullying. It is undoubtedly a case at the margins at best, and as a result may help define the limits of actionable claims. Here the Court of Appeal set itself the question "[c]ould a flawed disciplinary procedure which goes on over a number of months and takes a number of steps ever be considered to be 'repeated inappropriate behaviour' for the purposes of the definition?" With the addition that the conduct must also be capable of undermining the person's right to dignity at work, this is, I consider, the correct question as a matter of law.

[61] I agree with Finlay Geoghegan J. in particular that this issue involves a careful focus on at least three terms used in the Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice Detailing Procedures For Addressing Bullying in The Workplace) (Declaration) Order 2002 (the "2002 Order"):-

(i) repeated behaviour;
(ii) inappropriate behaviour; and
(iii) behaviour reasonably capable of undermining dignity at work.

I also agree that each component can usefully be considered separately and sequentially. However I would caution against viewing these three matters as separate and self-standing issues as if in a statutory definition. To some extent these terms take their colour from each other and the concepts are incremental. It is, in my view, important, for example, to recognise that in considering the question of repeated conduct, it is necessary to remember that what is required to be repeated is inappropriate conduct undermining the individual's dignity at work and not merely that the plaintiff be able to point to more than one incident of which he or she complains. Ultimately, while analysis may be facilitated by looking at the separate elements, it must be remembered that it is a single definition and a single test: was the defendant guilty of repeated inappropriate behaviour against the plaintiff which could reasonably be regarded as undermining the individual's right to dignity at work?

[62] I sympathise with the cautious approach which Finlay Geoghegan J. adopted and which led her to suggest that the consideration of whether conduct was both inappropriate and repeated must depend on the relationship and the relative decisions of the individuals and the "full factual context" (para.18, p. 8), and on an "assessment of all the facts." (para. 20, p. 9). Many difficult cases force courts to make qualifications such as this, but unless an appellate court can offer some more precise definition, it offers little guidance not merely to lower courts, but, as importantly, to litigants and potential litigants. If everything depends upon the facts (and necessarily the view courts take of them), then it will not be possible to determine whether bullying has occurred, in any case, until the final court of appeal has made its determination. It will also not be possible to advise plaintiffs whether or not to pursue claims, or defendants whether or not to defend them, with any confidence. As a result, the number of claims which will be advanced, and settled at some level, will necessarily proliferate. It is therefore necessary to look carefully at the concepts involved.

[63] In my view, a telling feature of the definition used in the 2002 Order and adopted in the case law is the distinctive language used in the statutory definition. At each point the statutory drafter has chosen a term at a markedly elevated point in the register: conduct must be repeated, not merely consist of a number of incidents; it must be inappropriate, not merely wrong; and it is not enough that it be inappropriate and even offensive: it must be capable of being reasonably regarded as undermining the individual's right to dignity at work.

[64] At para. 20, p. 9, of her judgment, Finlay Geoghegan J. contrasted the phrase "repeated" with the last sentence in the definition which required that the conduct be something other than an "isolated incident of the behaviour": it "may be an affront to dignity at work but, as a once-off incident, is not considered to be bullying." The judge continued, "[it] therefore appears to me that 'repeated' in the definition is being used for the purpose of connoting behaviour which is more than either an 'isolated incident' or a 'once off incident'". I agree that the concept of repeated behaviour can usefully be contrasted with an isolated or once-off incident, but I do not think it can be defined negatively, as merely something that is not "once-off" or "isolated". It is not enough to point to two different events. What must be repeated is inappropriate behaviour undermining the personal dignity of the individual. That is relevant in this case in two respects. First, it is noteworthy that the plaintiff relies on the conduct of a number of different individuals. Second, the core complaint relates to a flawed disciplinary process, or unfair procedures. In considering such unfair procedures as part of a claim for the invalidity of a disciplinary process, it is appropriate to take into account a number of events. But the reality of the plaintiff's claim here is that overall the process was unfair. It is not sufficient in my view to say that because that process extended over a period of time and a number of different events that it necessarily therefore satisfied the requirement that the conduct be "repeated". Again, this can best be understood by considering a classic case of bullying. There may be individual and occasional incidents of a superior speaking aggressively, losing his or her temper, or making jokes or comments which are hurtful or offensive. This in itself does not give rise to a claim of bullying. It is when a pattern of behaviour emerges that it can be said that the behaviour is repeated for the purposes of a definition. What must be repeated is the behaviour which is inappropriate and which undermines personal dignity. It is not enough that what is alleged to constitute unfair procedures is comprised of a number of different steps unless each of those steps can be said in themselves to be inappropriate and undermine human dignity. However, I do not consider this to be the most important aspect of the case because to some extent it is dependent upon the question as to whether a defective and flawed disciplinary process can be "inappropriate behaviour" for the purposes of the definition.

Inappropriate behaviour

[65] It is suggested that the behaviour here is inappropriate because it was in breach of fair procedures. I cannot agree. Inappropriate behaviour does not necessarily need to be unlawful, erroneous or a procedure liable to be quashed or otherwise wrong in law: it is instead behaviour which is inappropriate at a human level. The test looks to the question of propriety in human relations, rather than legality. Again, the more familiar examples of bullying illustrate this. Purposely undermining an individual, targeting them for special negative treatment, the manipulation of their reputation, social exclusion or isolation, intimidation, aggressive or obscene behaviour, jokes which are obviously offensive to one person, intrusion by pestering, spying and stalking – these examples all share the feature that they are unacceptable at the level of human interaction. That in turn is consistent with the concept of human dignity being protected. I agree that the judge's finding that Ms. Dempsey humiliated the plaintiff and reduced her to tears at the meeting of 27 January 2010 is a finding of behaviour that is inappropriate in this sense. By contrast, the fact that the board proceeded to make a decision to impose a disciplinary sanction on the plaintiff without informing her of that possibility, the matters relied on, or giving her an opportunity to present her case, was unfair, flawed and liable to be quashed or declared invalid and unlawful. However, it cannot in my view be said, without more, to be inappropriate in the sense in which that word is used in the definition.

[66] Perhaps the most important aspect of the definition is the question of undermining dignity at work because it relates closely to the value which is sought to be protected by the law. As I understand it, that is the idea that there is dignity in and at work. The fact that a person may be employed by another and may be required to accept instructions, discipline and control during the working day, does not mean that they are to be treated either by the employer, or fellow workers, in a way which undermines their essential dignity as a human person. This is, in my view, a central feature of the test. It is noteworthy therefore, that both the High Court judge and the dissenting judge in the Court of Appeal do not appear to approach this limb of the definition as providing any separate or additional test. Thus, Finlay Geoghegan J. considered at para. 22, pp. 10 and 11, that "in relation to a disciplinary process such right to dignity must include, it appears to me, a right to be treated with respect, fairly and not less favourably than other colleagues in a similar position". She concluded "[h]owever, it appears to me that her right to dignity at work includes a right to be treated with respect and fairly in the above sense and not singled out unfairly from colleagues in a similar position in such disciplinary process". The plaintiff argues therefore that the fact that the disciplinary process was unfair is enough to satisfy this component of the definition.

[67] In my view, the manner in which the plaintiff's argument approaches this limb of the test drains it of much of its meaning. The conduct is said to be repeated because more than one event is relied upon. It is inappropriate because it is in breach of fair procedures, and accordingly, it must be undermining of dignity at work. This is illustrated by para. 88 of the trial judge's conclusion:-

> "There can be no doubt but that this persistent, inappropriate behaviour of [the defendant] wholly undermined the plaintiff's dignity at work."

In my view for the reasons already set out, it seems to me that the requirement of conduct undermining dignity at work is a separate, distinct and important component of the definition of bullying which identifies the interests sought to be protected by the law, and just as importantly limits the claims which may be made to those which can be described as outrageous, unacceptable, and exceeding all bounds tolerated by decent society.

[68] The word dignity carries a considerable charge with a distinct moral component. The preamble of the 1937 Constitution was, it appears, the first time the word was used in the context of a fundamental rights guarantee. It has now come to be seen as a vital component in the protection of human rights in the post-war world. It is, for example, no coincidence that dignity is afforded a preeminent status in the post-war constitutions of both Germany and Israel. In the Irish context, it has been invoked in the context of marital privacy (McGee v. Attorney General [1974] I.R. 284), the criminalisation of male homosexuality (Norris v. The Attorney General [1984] I.R. 36 (Henchy J. dissenting)), the withdrawal of treatment from a patient in a permanent vegetative state (In re a Ward of Court (withholding medical treatment) (No.2) [1996] 2 I.R. 79), and the prohibition on assisted suicide (Fleming v. Ireland [2013] IESC 19, [2013] 2 I.R. 417). Walsh J. said in Quinn's Supermarket v. Attorney General [1972] I.R. 1, at pp. 13 and 14, that the guarantee of equality under Article 40.1 was not a:-

> "… guarantee of absolute equality for all citizens in all circumstances but it is a guarantee of equality as human persons and (as the Irish text of the Constitution makes quite clear) is a guarantee related to their dignity as human beings and a guarantee against any inequalities grounded upon an assumption, or indeed a belief, that some individual or individuals or classes of individuals, by reason of their human attributes or their ethnic or racial, social or religious background, are to be treated as the inferior or superior of other individuals in the community".

The denial of fair procedures is never a trivial matter but I do not think it can be comfortably said in this case to be undermining of human dignity, particularly when it is the same breach of procedures which is also contended to be inappropriate. More importantly I consider that the requirement that the procedure be repeated, inappropriate and undermining of dignity is a test which uses language deliberately intended to indicate that the conduct which will breach it is both severe, and normally offensive at a human level.

[69] I am aware that Finlay Geoghegan J. lays stress on the fact that she considered the plaintiff had been treated unfairly by reference to other SNAs. She considered at para. 22, pp. 10 and 11, that a right to dignity at work included a right to be treated "with respect, fairly and not less favourably than other colleagues in a similar position", and not to be "singled out unfairly from colleagues in a similar position in such disciplinary process". I accept that the "singling out" or "targeting" of an individual for disciplinary purposes is capable of being a component of bullying. However, the use of the verb in these formulations is important. It is not enough in my view that after the fact it is possible to say that a person has objectively been treated differently and worse than others in a similar situation, even if that, in certain circumstances, may give rise to a different claim. I accept for example as set out at para. 45 above that in the context of dismissal proceedings, an apparent deviation from prior practice may itself be evidence of unfairness. But in many cases in which it can be said a person has been "targeted" or "singled out" for disciplinary sanction and which constitutes at least part of a finding of bullying, the fact of a general practice will have been known to the superior prior to the initiation of any disciplinary process, and in such circumstances may give rise to the inference that the disciplinary proceedings are not being pursued bona fide because of a concern about the practice or behaviour, but rather as a form of punishing and perhaps humiliating the individual concerned.

[70] In my view that is not what occurred here. While I have some concerns about the manner in which the limited evidence in this case becomes converted into a finding of general practice, it is not suggested that Ms. Dempsey, still less the board, were aware of any such practice, limited or general, at the time the disciplinary process was initiated against the plaintiff. In Ms. Dempsey's case, she went to the sensory room, could not gain access, and therefore had immediate first hand evidence of what the plaintiff had done. In relation to both Mr. Lynch and the board, it is not suggested that they were aware of any practice. On the contrary, it is suggested that they should have been told by Ms. Dempsey of the point raised by the plaintiff that other SNAs had done this. But that in my view cannot constitute targeting or singling out of the plaintiff. It is suggested that once aware of this fact, Ms. Dempsey, Mr. Lynch and the board ought to have conducted a more thorough examination of the extent to which there was a practice among other SNAs. Somewhat surprisingly, the trial judge goes so far as to conclude that this meant that the disciplinary process against the plaintiff should not have proceeded at all. But any such investigation was only relevant to the extent of the sanction to be imposed on the plaintiff: as was submitted on her behalf by her union, the part four final warning was alleged to be "too severe". Of its nature, any such inquiry would not have yielded evidence as clear cut and direct as emerged when Ms. Dempsey sought access to the sensory room on 14 September 2009. It is of course suggested in retrospect that the sanction imposed on the plaintiff was disproportionate having regard to the evidence that was available or potentially available in relation to the practices of other SNAs. This, if comprehensively established, might well sustain a challenge to the sanction imposed. In my view however it would significantly expand the concept of bullying if this type of analysis were sufficient to establish that charge.

[71] It may be that lurking in the plaintiff's case, and the acceptance of it by the trial judge, and the dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal, is indeed a belief that Ms. Dempsey, Mr. Lynch and the rest of the board were not bona fide in their pursuit of the disciplinary process which was in fact targeted at and intended to victimise the plaintiff. If this suggestion is to be made by the plaintiff, it should be made explicitly, put to all the relevant parties, and then be the subject of an express finding by the trial judge setting out the evidence leading to such a conclusion to allow appellate review. The judgment in the High Court, while forceful in favour of the plaintiff, stops well short of such a conclusion. At their height, the facts found in the High Court judgment which are capable of being upheld on appeal do not constitute bullying. Accordingly, the appeal must be dismissed.

[72] It may also be appropriate here to address the two questions upon which leave to appeal was granted. It is the case for example that in jurisdictions where there is a separate tort then, as set out in the Restatement of the Law (Second) Torts (American Law Institute Publishers, 1977), it is necessary to show some intent to injure and cause distress or recklessness at least. That is necessary under the rule in Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 Q.B. 57. In the cases where the conduct does meet the high threshold required, this may not indeed be a particularly onerous requirement, given the presumption that a person intends the natural and probable consequences of his or her actions. In most cases of bullying it will be obvious that there is malicious intent. However so long as the cause of action remains a subhead of the employer's duty of care, it is difficult to see that intent on the part of the bully is an essential feature of the claim: the employer owes a duty of care to the employee to protect them from conduct or matters causing distress amounting to a recognisable psychiatric injury. That duty also extends to workplace stress claims which may have no individual actor involved. It is difficult to see why, if the employer's duty is to protect an employee from conduct which is damaging, there should be a necessity that the conduct be actuated by malicious intent. The so-called corporate liability for bullying is slightly different. The conduct must be intentional and calculated to cause distress. I would reserve the question whether malice, in the sense of intent to injure, is an essential component of such a claim. But even if not, malice is not certainly irrelevant. A claim for bullying will certainly be strengthened significantly by proof of malice. This was illustrated by Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding Ltd. [2005] IEHC 71 & [2008] IESC 44, [2009] 1 I.R. 349 where it was recorded at para. 13, p. 354, that the manager said he would "sort out the granddads". Consciousness on the part of the victim (and others) that they are being pursued vindictively will certainly make it easier to establish that conduct was inappropriate and undermined dignity at work. On the second question, I consider further that conduct which occurs in private can be a component of a claim for bullying. It is possible to treat someone inappropriately, and undermine their dignity, without that conduct being witnessed. Again however any element of humiliation in public will certainly strengthen a claim.

Resolution of this case

[73] The difficulties in this case are not however limited to the findings of fact or the legal definition of bullying. The plaintiff succeeded in this case at first instance. The High Court refused any stay on its award. The Supreme Court (to which appeal then lay) imposed a partial stay on the judgment on terms that the defendant was obliged to pay the plaintiff the sum of €100,000. That occurred over two and a half years ago. The plaintiff has not been in employment since she left this school in 2010. There is furthermore the conclusion upon which all judges who have heard this matter are agreed, that the disciplinary procedures followed by the school were inadequate and impermissible, and could and would have been declared invalid in proceedings brought for that purpose. The entire process including the seven years of litigation has been extremely stressful to the plaintiff who it seems likely is particularly vulnerable to such stresses. While in my view the matters alleged here do not give rise to a successful claim for bullying, I readily acknowledge that the degree of judicial disagreement demonstrates that this is by no means clear-cut. In those circumstances, it may be necessary to hear argument as to any consequential orders but I should indicate a provisional view that I would be very slow to order the plaintiff to repay to the defendant the sum of money paid as a condition of obtaining the partial stay, or to pay costs. It may indeed be necessary to reflect the fact that the plaintiff would have been justified in coming to court to have it determined that the procedures applied to her were flawed. It would be desirable that the parties could reach their own agreement on these matters but in the event that there is no such agreement, I would be prepared to hear argument and make a final decision in that regard.

[77] Of itself, bullying is not a tort. That obnoxious perversion of the ordinary human duty of give and take may, nonetheless, give rise to tortious liability. No overall theory of what constitutes a tort has yet emerged from the apparently random declaration of individualised wrongs that mark out the parameters of this area of law. Generally it is because people are expected to behave in a particular way in relation to matters under their control, or are required to organise their affairs so as to avoid harming others, or have a responsibility fixed at law towards those who act on their behalf, which mark out the individual principles upon which a series of disparate civil wrongs are based. As Professor Winfield in The Province of the Law of Tort (Cambridge, 1931) put the matter at p. 32:-

> "Tortious liability arises from the breach of a duty primarily fixed by the law: such duty is towards persons generally and its breach is redressible by an action for unliquidated damages."

[78] Crime and tort had a common origin in the taking charge by an increasingly ordered society, through its judicial system, of private retribution for personal wrongs. In the formation of such rules defining liability, people were instructed through individual decisions as to how the rule of law would both replace individual reaction and place into the category of a wrong any attempt at repayment of one wrong by another. Historically, this began by giving civil as well as criminal remedies for wrongs to the person and this was later extended to a person's reputation. The development of tort law has been piecemeal. Prior to the decision in Rylands v. Fletcher (1868) L.R. 3 H.L. 330, issues as to the use or abuse of land were more properly an aspect of the duties and responsibilities of servient and dominant interests. Interference with contractual relations emerged out of the decision in Bowen v. Hall. (1881) 6 Q.B.D. 333, perhaps because in some circumstances it would be unjust to answer a claim of wrong with a "no privity" defence. In reaction possibly to the balance of influence as between the interests of society and the representation of employees, intimidation was recognised as a tort in Rookes v. Barnard [1964] A.C. 1129. Whereas up to Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562, negligence was an element of tortious liability, thereafter it became a defined aspect of an overarching wrong, subject only, it appears, to public policy limiting its application. So much did the tort of negligence apparently emerge as the answer to every plaintiff's needs, pleaded as it has been as an alternative to every other defined wrong, this court had to warn in the majority judgments in Cromane Seafoods Ltd. v. Minister for Agriculture [2016] IESC 6, [2017] 1 I.R. 119 that this tort has not dissolved the existing definitions of other wrongs or submerged them.

Inflicting illness by manipulating emotion

[79] It was with the decision in Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 Q.B. 57 that a joke in very bad taste, leading to the unfortunate plaintiff almost losing her reason and suffering obvious physical effects, could give rise to liability. A practical joke is of its nature designed to cause at least momentary amazement, if not shock, but, as in that case, it can go too far: so far that the law must find a remedy. Hence, as Professor Heuston comments at pp. 32 and 33 of the classic 17th edition of Salmond on the Law of Torts (17th ed., Sweet & Maxwell, 1977):-

> "… the law of torts is not a static body of rules, but is capable of alteration to meet the needs of a changing society. One word of warning should be added. It is often rather hastily assumed that any desirable alteration in the law of torts must result in the expansion of the field of liability. But social needs may require contraction as well as expansion. Thus it can hardly be doubted that the courts have been > justified in refusing to introduce new heads of tortious liability to enable a witness to be sued for perjury, or conspiracy to defame. Again a tort may be invented or discovered only to have little use made of it. So for a century little has been heard for excluding the plaintiff from a public office to which he is legally entitled."

[80] No overall theory has emerged as to why the courts should develop a tort. In our system, it may be because a wrong under the Constitution has been committed, but only where no existing remedy will provide redress, as in Meskell v.Córas Iompair Éireann [1973] I.R. 121. Professor Fleming instances moral wrong as the foundation for liability in tort, morphing into the principle that there should be no liability without fault: Sappideen and Vines eds., Fleming's The Law of Torts (10th ed., Thomson Reuters, 2011) at paras. 1.40 to 1.50. Professor Heuston comments that reasonable foresight has not come to be used as the overarching principle which it was once thought to be, while public policy has had a restraining influence in addition to the traditional analysis of the conduct of the defendant and the legitimacy of the interest of the plaintiff: see Heuston ed., Salmond on the Law of Torts (17th ed., Sweet & Maxwell, 1977) at p. 33, cited above.

[81] As O'Donnell J. remarks in the principal judgment, the range of the expansion of tort liability and its extension into relationships at a distance from the conduct found to be at fault is part of the scheme of the law to order society. It is only on a careful analysis of the balance of not only where legitimate activity should be protected, but also where those who suffer in consequence of the wrongs of others should be compensated, that decisions as to redress for civil wrong develop. Hence, usual dangers such as flooding are tolerated in the tort of the escape of dangerous things; but the building of a repository for toxic gas will lead to a different decision on liability. Making a joke is socially acceptable, and bad taste is tolerated, but sending a person into immediate distress to the detriment of their long-term health is not. Commenting negatively on those who enter willingly into the discourse of public life is different to factual but inaccurate statements about those same individuals under the law of defamation. Whereas vulgar abuse is unpleasant, it is only actionable where it assumes the shape of an assertion of fact that takes away another's character.

[82] In considering, therefore, any extension of the law on negligent or intentional infliction of harm into the workplace, decisions must be informed by what has so often been said in the context of family disputes: that men and women are to be judged with the appropriate measure of appreciation for human nature and that, hence, conduct is be judged according to the standard of human beings, and not of angels.

[83] There are two strands of potential liability for a plaintiff to employ against a bully. Firstly, conduct may be so egregious, deliberate and malicious as to engage the rule in Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 Q.B. 57. In so far as there may be a debate as to whether corporate bullying is a separate tort, this first strand of liability seems to provide the answer. For an employer to persistently and repeatedly engage in unnecessary and nasty conduct over an appreciable time outside the ordinarily tolerated range of correction or discipline necessary in the workplace, in such a way as to undermine the employee's dignity, so that coming to work becomes not merely difficult but dreaded, according to the standards of robust human reaction, is to engage that tort where organic depression or other physical illness is the consequence. The standard has to be set at a level where giving advice, telling people off, temperamental reaction or emotional interaction is not allowed to disrupt the duty of managers to see that work is done, and the entitlement to healthy satisfaction that actually justifying one's wages represents. In this context, joining in an unacceptable standard of conduct may engage an employer in the intentional infliction of harm.

[84] That line of liability, however, does not seem to be one which has been analysed to a plaintiff's success in any written decision concerned with bullying to date. Most probably that is so because the tort retains an intentional element which most often may be inferred from the evidence, if it is not otherwise admitted, perhaps in an internal workplace email, but where, as in the original case, the conduct carries obvious connotations. The analysis in the various judgments of the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom in O. v. Rhodes [2015] UKSC 32, [2016] A.C. 219 also indicates a debate as to the precise elements of this tort. In that and in other English cases, there has been doubt cast on the definition provided in Heuston and Buckley, eds., Salmond and Heuston on the Law of Torts (21st ed., Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1996) at p. 215, which provides that "one who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress to another is liable for such emotional distress, provided that bodily harm results from it". The principle, however, must remain that an individual who, through utterly unacceptable conduct, deliberately distresses another to the point where they suffer a recognised psychiatric condition, is liable in damages.

[85] In the United States of America, the application of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress in the employment context has confined liability. The elements of this tort are set out in Womack v. Eldridge 215 Va. 338 (1974) at para. 28:-

> "… a cause of action will lie for emotional distress, unaccompanied by physical injury, provided four elements are shown: One, the wrongdoer's conduct was intentional or reckless. This element is satisfied where the wrongdoer had the specific purpose of inflicting emotional distress or where he intended his specific conduct and knew or should have known that emotional distress would likely result. Two, the conduct was outrageous and intolerable in that it offends against the generally accepted standards of decency and morality. This requirement is aimed at limiting frivolous suits and avoiding litigation in situations where only bad manners and mere hurt feelings are involved. Three, there was a causal connection between the wrongdoer's conduct and the emotional distress. Four, the emotional distress was severe."

[86] In Handbook of the Law of Torts (4th ed., West Publishing Co., 1971), Prosser comments at p. 56 that so far "as it is possible to generalise from the cases", liability will only be established on the basis of "conduct exceeding all bounds usually tolerated by decent society, of a nature which is especially calculated to cause, and does cause, mental distress of a very serious kind". In Earl v. H.D. Smith Wholesale Drug Co. (United States District Court for the Central District of Illinois, Springfield Division, 22 June 2009), it was acknowledged at p. 9 that courts will "recognize a workplace claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress only in the most extreme circumstances".

[87] The second strand of potential liability is that which protects employees from harm in the workplace. An employer is obliged to take reasonable care to protect employees from injury. That duty however is not absolute; it is not that of an insurer. The duty is to remove risks which can be removed, to train employees for the workplace tasks and to organise the workplace in such a way as injury may be avoided. Employees have a duty to take care but, generally in workplace accidents, it is usually not an absence of care or training by an employer which establishes liability, but instead carelessness imputed to the employer through vicarious liability in an action where one employee causes injury to another. Injury can be caused by bullying.

[88] In New Zealand and in Australia, the law is based on the general safety of employees and the duty of employers to secure it. Necessarily, the conduct whereby a recognised psychiatric illness will attract damages, if shown to have been caused by conduct at work, has been restricted. In Attorney-General v. Gilbert [2002] 2 N.Z.L.R. 342, the Court of Appeal held at para. 72, p. 357, that general legislation providing for safety at work makes "no distinction between physical, psychiatric or psychological illness or injury." At para. 83, pp. 359 and 360, the court consequently held that the employer must take reasonably practicable steps to ensure that employees do not suffer from psychological harm resulting from work-place stress:-

> "An employer does not guarantee to cocoon employees from stress and upset, nor is the employer a guarantor of the safety or health of the employee. Whether workplace stress is unreasonable is a matter of judgment on the facts. It may turn upon the nature of the job being performed as well as the workplace conditions. The employer's obligation will vary according to the particular circumstances. The contractual obligation requires reasonable steps which are proportionate to known and avoidable risks."

[89] This exercise involves a court reconstructing what an employer ought to have known at the time when repeated actions by fellow employees were undermining the plaintiff's dignity at work. That is a traditional tort exercise. In Koehler v. Cerebos (Aust) Ltd. [2005] HCA 15, (2005) 222 C.L.R. 44, the Australian High Court held at para. 35, p. 57, that "[t]he relevant duty of care is engaged if psychiatric injury to the particular employee is reasonably foreseeable" (emphasis in original). As a result, the "central inquiry remains whether, in all the circumstances, the risk of a plaintiff … sustaining a recognisable psychiatric illness was reasonably foreseeable, in the sense that the risk was not far-fetched or fanciful" (para. 33). As Hayne J. put it in Vairy v. Wyong Shire Council [2005] HCA 62, (2005) 223 C.L.R. 422, at para. 126, p. 461, when a plaintiff makes a claim for damages for personal injury caused by the defendant's negligence, the court becomes engaged in an inquiry into "breach of duty", hence the court "must attempt to identify the reasonable person's response to foresight of the risk of occurrence of the injury which the plaintiff suffered." What this involves is an "attempt, after the event, to judge what the reasonable person would have done to avoid what is now known to have occurred" (emphasis in original). Conduct giving rise to liability in that jurisdiction seems to be of an extreme kind.

[90] In Naidu v. Group 4 Securitas Pty Ltd. [2005] NSWSC 618, (Unreported, Supreme Court of New South Wales, 24 June 2005), the plaintiff was a security operative, assigned to a TV news channel, and later became the defendant's assistant, the defendant being the news channel's security and fire manager. In this role, the defendant subjected the plaintiff to racist and demeaning name calling, aggressive and threatening communications, indecent sexual acts, sexual harassment, and directed him to work unpaid hours which cut his sleep to unsustainable levels. The plaintiff was threatened on multiple occasions that he would lose his employment if he did not accede to his manager's requests. The manager also said he would kill the plaintiff and repeatedly threatened his life if he told anyone about the indecent sexual acts and other bullying behaviours. The manager also threatened him with physical violence and subjected him to racial abuse, requiring him to work on Saturdays at his property, work for which the plaintiff was not getting paid. The Supreme Court of New South Wales found that the plaintiff's employers owed him a duty of care and that the treatment of the plaintiff amounted to workplace bullying, to such an extent that Adams J. found at para. 205 that it was "reasonably foreseeable that such an illness might well result from the infliction of that conduct upon the plaintiff". He described the behaviour of the defendant, the manager, at para. 17 as "so extreme" that "he well knew, or would have known had he reflected as any reasonable man should have" that the result of what the judge described as prolonged misconduct "could reasonably be expected to expose him to the real risk of such psychological injury".

[91] In this jurisdiction, the High Court has correctly emphasised in a series of decisions that what is involved in bullying as a compensatable wrong is a breach of the standard of care owed by an employer to employees: see Sweeney v. Board of Management of Ballinteer Community School [2011] IEHC 131, (Unreported, High Court, Herbert J., 24 March 2011); Kelly v. Bon Secours Health System Limited [2012] IEHC 21, (Unreported, High Court, Cross J., 26 January 2012); Nyhan v. Commissioner of An Garda Síochána [2012] IEHC 329, (Unreported, High Court, Cross J., 26 July 2012); and Browne v. Minister for Justice [2012] IEHC 526, [2013] E.L.R. 57. An employer has a general duty of care towards employees. In McMahon & Binchy's Law of Torts (3rd ed., Butterworths, 2000) at para. 18.105, the authors state that:-

> "An employer may be personally liable for sexual harassment or bullying of an employee, either on the basis that the employer ought to have been aware of the offending employee's propensity to act in this way or on the basis of an unreasonable failure to provide a safe system of work."

[92] In the 4th edition (Bloomsbury Professional, 2013), it is correctly stated at para. 18.80 that:-

> "There is no distinctive tort of bullying or harassment: the question is to be resolved, in the context of employers' liability, by asking whether the employers took reasonable care not to expose the plaintiff

> to the risk of injury from such conduct. The answer will depend in large part on what facts ought to have been known to the employer. Naturally, matters are different where the plaintiff's claim is that he or she is the victim of 'corporate bullying', where the allegation is that the management of the enterprise is implicated in the bullying activity. Such claims have succeeded in some recent cases, and failed in others."

[93] With regard to forming the elements of a tort of wrongful conduct that embraces workplace bullying, the common law in Ireland has not developed through judicial decision according to necessity and justice but instead has been subject to an intervention in the shape of para. 5 of the schedule to the Industrial Relations Act 1990 (Code of Practice Detailing Procedures for Addressing Bullying in the Workplace) (Declaration) Order 2002 (S.I. No. 17). This defines workplace bullying as "repeated inappropriate behaviour", which may be "direct or indirect, whether verbal, physical or otherwise" engaged in by an individual or a group against the plaintiff at the workplace and which "could reasonably be regarded as undermining the individual's right to dignity at work." Whereas under the strand of tort liability derived from Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 Q.B. 57, an isolated but sufficiently grave incident from which intention to cause severe distress may suffice if psychiatric injury results, bullying is by its nature a repeated activity. A consideration of workplace codes of practice from other jurisdictions tends to reveal the same elements – behaviour completely beyond the tolerable, that undermines dignity at work, and which is repeated so that it forms a pattern which genuinely undermines a person's ability to come to work and serve in his or her position.

[94] Whether the courts were obliged, pursuant to the statutory mechanism under which this code of practice was established, to accept this definition has not been argued in this case. In the light of the relevant case law, this seems beside the point. The definition was accepted by the High Court in Quigley v. Complex Tooling and Moulding Ltd. [2005] IEHC 71 & [2008] IESC 44, [2009] 1 I.R. 349, where the plaintiff claimed that he had been a victim of workplace bullying by his manager, which allegedly resulted in mental distress and psychiatric injury. The plaintiff was awarded damages. In the Supreme Court, the award of damages was overturned on the basis that causation of the plaintiff's depression had not been proved to have resulted from the bullying, but was rather ascribable to him having lost his job when the factory went out of business. At para.17, p. 372, Fennelly J., however, accepted the code of practice definition and described what the plaintiff had been subjected to as "a unique amalgam of excessive and selective supervision and scrutiny … unfair criticism, inconsistency, lack of response to complaint and insidious silence".

[95] The test requires all of the elements to be fulfilled. It should be considered sequentially. It is objective. Not subjective. It cannot be right to formulate liability on the basis of how people see the conduct of their colleagues in the workplace, but instead only on the basis of how that conduct would be objectively viewed: see Glynn v. Minister for Justice [2014] IEHC 133, [2014] E.L.R. 236 at p. 248. An employer is entitled to expect ordinary robustness from its employees: Croft v. Broadstairs and St Peter's Town Council [2003] EWCA Civ 676, (Unreported, Court of Appeal of England and Wales, 15 April 2003). Correction and instruction are necessary in the functioning of any workplace and these are required to avoid accidents and to ensure that productive work is engaged in. It may be necessary to point to faults. It may be necessary to bring home a point by requesting engagement in an unusual task or longer or unsocial hours. It is a kindness to attempt to instil a work ethic or to save a job or a career by an early intervention. Bullying is not about being tough on employees. Appropriate interventions may not be pleasant and must simply be taken in the right spirit. Sometimes a disciplinary intervention may be necessary. In Yapp v. Foreign and Commonwealth Office [2014] EWCA Civ 1512, [2015] I.R.L.R. 112, the Court of Appeal of England and Wales considered a disciplinary procedure which was alleged to have resulted in the plaintiff suffering from depression. Underhill L.J. noted at pp. 126 and 127:-

> "104 It is a normal characteristic of the employment relationship that employees may be criticised by the employer and sometimes face disciplinary action or other such procedures. And in an imperfect world it is not uncommon for such criticism or disciplinary process to be flawed to some extent: there will be a spectrum from minor procedural flaws to gross unfairness. The message of [Croft v. Broadstairs and St Peter's Town Council [2003] EWCA Civ 676, (Unreported, Court of Appeal of England and Wales, 15 April 2003)] is that it is not usually foreseeable that even disciplinary action which is quite seriously unfair will lead the employee to develop a psychiatric illness unless there are signs of pre-existing vulnerability."

These facts

[96] In every respect, and by ordinary human standards, the school authorities were at fault in their treatment of the plaintiff. She was a valued special needs assistant. By no standard could it have been expected that she would have subjected any of the children in the school to any form of ill-treatment. As there is no full transcript before the court, it has not been possible to work out whether the door which was locked on 14 September 2009 incorporated a glass panel. Most school doors do but this, apparently, was a storage room called into action due to pressure for space. She was worried about the child running from the room, and the evidence was that he had that propensity, and she chose a remedy which was contrary to the not very well publicised school policy: that a child and a teacher should not be behind a locked door. Had the child bolted out the door and perhaps escaped into the street, it is possible that there could have been either disquiet or injury. Then there would really be need for an inquiry. Other people, completely responsible people, had locked the door in these circumstances. Once the informal survey conducted on her behalf disclosed that her offence was not unique, and that is what the survey did, any attempt at disciplinary action against her should have come to a complete stop. It was then the responsibility of those in charge to acknowledge, and this does not require any formal process, that there was a fairly widespread practice of teachers and special needs assistants locking themselves into a room with children; and that because this could expose them to false claims or could frighten the children, this practice should immediately stop. Thereafter, but only thereafter, a breach of that policy might become serious.

[97] In the age of judicial review, disciplinary procedures are necessarily subject to procedural infirmity and may fail due to the principles which are so ingrained in lawyers, being alien to those who are engaged in administration or education. It is also well to take into account the degree to which emotion on both sides may have influenced what has gone wrong here. O'Donnell J. is correct to call para. 48 of the judgment of Ó Néill J. into question. While in most circumstances this could be regarded as coming within the principle set out in Hay v. O'Grady [1992] 1 I.R. 210 at p. 217, being that inferences of fact drawn from witnesses should be treated by appellate courts with especial respect, in reality other explanations were reasonably forthcoming for what had occurred. These include emotional reaction, worry about possible claims and genuine concern for the children. People in such circumstances do not need to have their emotions whipped up but perhaps an equal explanation is that the school board just became overwrought.

[98] In all of this, instead of sensibly stepping back, the school authorities allowed the juggernaut of disciplinary action to continue in an unfair fashion and this included an incident where no closure was brought to matters and where one particular meeting was fraught with emotion of an unpleasant kind directed against the plaintiff.

[99] What is involved here was a disciplinary process where the school authorities, for reasons best known to themselves, entrenched themselves in a dugout of justification whereby they could admit no fault. This is not bullying. The conduct was not at that extreme and repetitive level. It is, instead, a disciplinary process that has gone wrong. It must clearly be acknowledged, however, that the reason that it went wrong had nothing to do with the plaintiff but was entirely down to a lamentable failure to re-think by the school.

[100] The consequence of this has been obvious emotional distress caused to someone who should otherwise have been valued. Her contribution to the education of those with learning difficulties should be acknowledged by the court. The school should acknowledge that it was in the wrong and the plaintiff should be encouraged to return to her duties. There has been enough litigation about this matter and this part of it is not at all to the credit of the school in any way.

Costs and discretion

[101] Not every wrong, even one which results from unfair or unfortunate circumstances, gives rise to a cause of action. Given that the test for bullying is of necessity to be set very high, these are not circumstances which can attract damages. There are, however, circumstances under which the discretion of the court in relation to costs under O. 99 of the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986 can enable an acknowledgement that extreme circumstances have occurred. This can result in, and could reasonably be argued to mean here that, the costs of the litigation in the High Court and in the Supreme Court being awarded to the losing party. The circumstances that might justify this, in this one exceptional instance, also include that the relevant law has been clarified by the litigation in a manner which would be of benefit to existing and future cases and to insurers, none of whom can claim, in consequence, this exceptional circumstance. It is also rare for a court to come across an instance where one side is completely at fault, but fails to acknowledge any such failing even in the context where Ó Néill J. was required to make particularly trenchant findings of fact.

[102] The issue as to costs requires separate consideration, but by no sensible reckoning was this litigation complex. This was an ordinary tort case involving the resolution of straightforward facts: was a door locked, why was it locked, was it a breach of procedures to lock the door, was the plaintiff the only person to lock the door while inside with a child, how would school authorities ordinarily react to such a minor breach of procedures, was it necessary to invoke a formal investigation and reprimand, was a disciplinary note justified, should that have been backed away from once the facts became clear that it was not just the plaintiff who had made that understandable mistake, what happened at the meeting of the school board, and what happened on the various occasions when the plaintiff and the school authorities met? In terms of discovery, it is hard to see more being involved than the gathering of internal human resources management and disciplinary files together with a trawl of relevant emails. In the light of whatever submissions are made as to the principal judgment of O'Donnell J. and this judgment, the costs issue and the final form of the order should then be decided.

O'Malley J.
[103] I also agree with O'Donnell and Charleton JJ.

[Reporter's note: On 17 July 2017, the Supreme Court heard the submissions in relation to costs and the question of repayment of the €100,000 paid to the plaintiff by the defendant pursuant to the Supreme Court's order of 4 July 2014. The Supreme Court ordered the defendant to pay 50% of the plaintiff's High Court costs, and made no order in relation to the repayment of the €100,000 paid to the plaintiff by the defendant.]

EMPLOYMENT APPEALS TRIBUNAL

EX-TEMPORE JUDGMENT delivered on the 14th day of November 1989 by WALSH J.

This is an appeal from the order of Mr. Justice Murphy. The order is supported by a very detailed and a very carefully written judgment. The result of his order was that he refused to quash the order in respect of the main argument in this case but did give relief in respect of the sum involved, so the latter matter does not arise for consideration here.

With regard to the main issue here, that is to say the question of what happened at the Tribunal, I take the view that Mr. Justice Murphy was incorrect in his conclusions and I would allow the appeal.

This case arises from a matter which came before the Employment Tribunal, which is one of a number of tribunals set up to relieve people of what is regarded as the undue technicalities of courts and the expense and the delay. It has a fairly rapid procedure and it sits locally, and is, in many ways, intended to be somewhat informal.

This present case indicates a degree of formality, and even rigidity, which is somewhat surprising. It is a rather ironic turn in history that this Tribunal which was intended to save people from the ordincary courts would themselves fall into a rigidity comparable to that of the common law before it was modified by equity. When we come to deal with what is the main point in the case, so far as the High Court decision is concerned, it is the question of "erring within jurisdiction". I must confess that I am not very impressed by that because everything depends on what the error is. However there is not any jurisdiction in any court or tribunal to be unfair. The question here is whether what happened was so unfair as to be a fundamental issue in the case.

This arises out of an alleged dismissal from employment determined to be a constructive dismissal which is what it was claimed to be by the applicant before the Tribunal. I want to make it clear that nothing in the decision of this Court in any way offers any view on the merits or the facts of the case so far as the facts concern the dismissal or the relationship between Mr. Neary and his former employers.

Proceedings were launched before the Tribunal by the originating notice which was issued was dated the 12th August 1987. The documents indicate that the beginning of August seems to be a holiday period in Ballyhaunis and that, in a letter, Mr. Neary had been somewhat indignant about the fact that there seemed to be nobody to deal with the case around the beginning of August. Be that as it may it was received by the solicitors' office in Ballyhaunis on the 20th August 1987 and an appearance was entered twenty four days later, namely, the 14th September 1987 which was out of time. This was acknowledged on the 15th September. Eventually the papers were sent back looking for more particulars of the claimed defence and then a number of mishaps seemed to have occurred for which nobody can really be blamed. These type of mishaps, non-delivery of letters and matters like that was coupled with the fact that the Secretariat of the Employment Tribunal did not fully furnish all the documentation, which turned out to be necessary, for the hearing in Ballyhaunis. These are matters which happen from time to time, but that is all the more reason why the system should remain as flexible as possible because when the Tribunal goes out to hear these cases it is exercising its jurisdiction in the very useful way of coming to the people. Thus one of the advantages of coming to the people is that matters of this kind can be checked almost immediately if it is all on the spot. Nevertheless the point was taken at the Tribunal that because the appearance was out of time that it should not be permitted. Reliance was placed on Rule 5, and the Tribunal took a rather rigid view in that they felt they were precluded from doing otherwise than to refuse in effect to hear the defence. It is not apparent that they gave their minds to considering the question of their discretion to do so which they have by reason of a rule made subsequent to the original rule. They were entitled to extend the time at their discretion. There is a very useful rule in the Rules of the Superior Courts which says that "non-compliance of these rules" shall not invalidate any proceedings unless the Court so orders. It is somewhat odd to find practically the reverse in a tribunal of this nature. Be that as it may it does not appear that this question of the discretion was seriously considered by them. They felt bound to do what they did and in my view they were erroneous in that. The matter at issue here was a most fundamental one namely, the right of a party to meet the case made against them. Attention has been drawn to the provisions of section 8, subsection 1 of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, whereby they are bound to hear both sides. Nevertheless it must be conceded that rules and regulations can be made which will regulate how that may be done. One may reach a point where because of recalcitrance or reluctance of one party or the other to bring forward the necessary materials to the Tribunal to enable the satisfactory hearing of a claim to be accomplished. The Tribunal might just have to dispose of the matter without that material. That however is quite different from taking an absolutely rigid view on the basis that, irrespective of the merits of the matter, once the time has passed nothing can be done. This is a fundamental matter which has been the subject of many cases in our Courts, not least in the decision of this Court in the case of In re Padraig Haughey 1971 I.R. 217. One cannot effectively prevent persons from being heard in their own defence must less prevent them cross examining the other side's case.

There is a distinction also to be drawn between the right to test your opponent's case and the right to put up a case, as has arisen in this Court several times. Counsel may not be permitted to make points which were not made in the High Court save in exceptional circumstances. But at no time is it envisaged that one is not permitted to try to demolish the arguments of the other side.

In this case the Notice of Appearance appears to me to be in a somewhat odd form. It already has two readymade answers written into it, apparently circulated by the Tribunal. One is that one claims or pleads that the four statutes referred on the top of the notice are not either together or separately conceded as being applicable to the case. Even if there was nothing else in the case that is an objection. The alternative is that one is not making that point. The Secretariat of the Tribunal sent the matter back to the solicitor for further grounds. It was not rejected out of hand nor did the Tribunal do so then. Up to that stage the case appeared to be quite alive and the Tribunal wished to learn the grounds of the case to be made by the respondents.

Furthermore there is the fact that the Tribunal has power to decide the case against an applicant, not simply on the grounds advanced even by the defendant but on any other grounds which seem proper to them and which may have arisen in the case before them. It appears to me that an effort to restrict a respondent, even in this indirect way, from pleading anything or arguing anything, except what he has expressly pleaded, is not in accordance with the tenor of the Act.

In this case it is my opinion that the rigidity went far beyond "erring within jurisdiction". It amounted in effect to a refusal to accept jurisdiction to hear half of the case. It went even further in refusing the respondent the right to cross-examine the case being made against him. It is the duty of all adjudicating bodies to act justly. That is a constitutional obligation imposed on all tribunals as on all the Courts set up under the Constitution. By definition all unfair procedures must necessarily be an infringement of the fundamental rights of the citizens as to have fair procedures in all adjudications determining rights or imposing obligations. What the ultimate justice in this case is I do not know. We are not concerned with that. What the Court is concerned with at the moment is that the procedure adopted led to what the High Court Judge described as "the awesome consequence which completely shut out the defendants".

There is a query, partly raised by myself, as to what the Circuit Court can do in such an event. I am impressed by the view expressed by Judge Clarke in Mulvey v. Kennedy and Fox 1989 ILT 28 as to what could be done in such a case but the matter was not argued to any great extent here. It is not a fundamental point in the case and the learned High Court Judge expressed some doubts about what could be done in a Circuit Appeal concerning the point at issue here. This Court is not at present in a position to give a definitive judgment on the full extent of the Circuit Judge's jurisdiction. The words used are not quite the same as those dealing with the jurisdiction in appeals to or from the Circuit Court and other cases. Be that as it may I am satisfied that in refusing to exercise a discretion in this case the Tribunal failed in one of the most fundamental requirements of justice namely, to give a fair hearing. There was no particular difficulty about it. All the parties were there. There was no hint of any prejudice or injustice to anybody. The case was made before the Tribunal by Dr. Redmond that this was merely a device to get in a matter which had not been expressly pleaded namely, the question of the alleged fraud in the Revenue. We are not here to decide what the facts of that are but on the case law of the Tribunal in Farrell's case, it appears it would be a material factor in deciding whether they would deal with the case at all. Once the point had been made known to the Tribunal I think they should have taken more notice of the matter. But even if that matter was never raised the suggestion that the appearance was only put in by the defendants for that purpose it really is not the point in this case. The point in this case is that the employers wish to make a case. It does not matter whether it is a good case or a bad case but they were at the hearing and they were ready to make their case. Nobody was going to be taken by surprise. If there was to be a surprise then there was no difficulty in adjourning it until the matter could be studied more fully by the parties involved.

In all the circumstances of the case I am satisfied that the order of certiorari should go on the grounds that this fundamental requirement of justice was not observed. There had not been a proper hearing of the case by reason of the refusal to permit cross-examination and the discretion to hear the other side had not been exercised.

I would allow the appeal on those grounds.

EMPLOYMENT APPEALS TRIBUNAL

EX-TEMPORE Judgment of McCarthy J., delivered the 14th day of November 1989.

I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

The most fundamental requirement of justice is that both sides should be heard; so far as this employer is concerned that he, the other side, should be heard. The requirement of section 8 sub-section 1 of the 1977 Act, appears to bear that out even if it did not expressly so state; it would have to be modified in order to comply with the constitutional requirement of fair procedures. Mr. O'Reilly as I understand it has sought to challenge the making of the order on two grounds:-

1. That in effect the fair procedures argument is being used for the purpose of raising an illegality in regard to the contract which might deny Mr. Neary his right to be treated as being a dismissed employee within the terms of the Act and

2. That the existence of the Circuit Appeal itself constitutes a bar or a reason for exercising a discretion in regard to the granting of an Order of Certiorari.

Whilst to some it may appear that the raising of the illegality by the employer has a shabby nature to it in making a defence to a man who, if his case is well-founded, has been wrongfully dismissed. That is in no way an answer to the fundamental question as to whether or not fair procedures were used at the time when the Employment Appeals Tribunal made its decision not to hear Mr. O'Dwyer or any witnesses or to allow him to take part in the procedure before it. So far as the Circuit Appeal point is concerned, I am far from concluding that the existence of a Circuit Appeal in any circumstances negatives the duty of the High Court, and consequently, this Court to embark on an inquiry as to whether or not an Order of an inferior tribunal, District Court or otherwise was made within jurisdiction. The Circuit Appeal cannot cure a defect that was fundamental to the procedure itself; I would wait for another day to decide whether or not under any circumstances the existence of an appeal to the Circuit Court can itself be used to deny a discretionary order which must ordinarily be made out of the requirements of justice. The appeal must be allowed and the Order of Certiorari should go.

Prisons – Prison officers – Discipline – Oral hearing – Legal representation – Governor – Exercise of disciplinary jurisdiction – Whether accused entitled to legal representation – Whether governor having discretion to permit legal representation – Factors to be considered – Prison (Disciplinary Code for Officers) Rules 1996 (S.I. No. 289), r. 8(2).

Rule 8(2) of the Prison (Disciplinary Code for Officers) Rules 1996 provides as follows:-

"The accused officer shall be present throughout an oral hearing and may put forward his or her answer to the allegation and call any relevant witness."

The applicants were prison officers against whom complaints were made, as a consequence of which the respondent held a disciplinary hearing. The respondent decided, at the hearing, that the Prison (Disciplinary Code for Officers) Rules 1996 did not allow for legal representation and found that the applicants had breached discipline and imposed a penalty on the applicants. The applicants sought and obtained leave to seek judicial review of the respondent's decision on the ground that, inter alia, legal representation ought to have been granted to them.

The High Court (Butler J.) quashed the penalty determination by the respondent (see [2005] IEHC 76). The respondent appealed to the Supreme Court.

Held by the Supreme Court (Denham, Geoghegan and Kearns JJ.), in allowing the appeal, 1, that in any organisation where there were disciplinary procedures, it was undesirable to involve legal representation unless in all the circumstances such was required by the principles of constitutional or natural justice.

2. That, as a starting point, the criteria to be considered in the context of a request for legal representation were the seriousness of the charge and of the potential penalty, whether any point of law were likely to arise; the capacity of a particular prisoner to present his own case; any procedural difficulty; the need for reasonable speed in making the adjudication; and the need for fairness as between prisoners and as between prisoners and prison officers. But ultimately the essential point for a governor to consider was whether legal representation was needed in the particular circumstances of the case.

Reg. v. Home Sec., Ex p. Tarrant [1985] 1 Q.B. 251 approved.

3. That the cases for which the governor of a prison would be obliged to exercise a discretion in favour of permitting legal representation would be exceptional and not necessarily related to the objective seriousness of the charges if the issues of proof were ones of simple fact.

4. That a decision not to deal with a matter under r. 5 of the Prison (Disciplinary Code for Officers) Rules 1996 would not provide an entitlement to legal representation in every case where an oral hearing under r. 8 was held.

Obiter dictum: That a "Memorandum of Understanding" linked to the Prison (Disciplinary Code for Officers) Rules 1996 could not be used for the purpose of interpreting the Rules.

Appeal from the High Court

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of Geoghegan J., infra.

On the 31st July, 2003, the High Court (Murphy J.) granted leave to the applicants to apply for judicial review for an order quashing the respondent's decision. The High Court (Butler J.) heard the matter on the 22nd and 23rd February, 2005, and an order quashing the respondent's decision was made on the 3rd February, 2006. By notice of appeal dated the 12th April, 2006, the respondent appealed to the Supreme Court. The appeal was heard before the Supreme Court (Denham, Geoghegan and Kearns JJ.) on the 23rd March, 2009.

James O'Reilly S.C. (with him Andrew James Walker) for the respondent.

Roddy Horan S.C. (with him Paul Murray) for the applicants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Denham J. 2nd April, 2009

[1] I agree with the judgment about to be delivered by Geoghegan J.

Geoghegan J.

[2] The net question which arises on this appeal is whether a prison officer, against whom complaints have been made of alleged breaches of the Prison (Disciplinary Code for Officers) Rules 1996, is entitled to legal representation at an oral hearing before the governor of the prison established under the Rules of 1996. The issue comes before this court in the form of an appeal from an order of the High Court (Butler J.) quashing a penalty determination by the respondent in an application for judicial review brought by the applicants, the two accused prison officers.

[3] Rule 8(2) of the Rules of 1996 reads as follows:-

> "The accused officer shall be present throughout an oral hearing and may put forward his or her answer to the allegation and call any relevant witness."

The mandatory part of that sub-rule required the accused prison officers to be present at the hearing. In obedience to that provision, both applicants were present but the respondent, conducting the hearing, was informed that they were only present for that reason and were not going to participate in the hearing as the respondent had, both in prior correspondence and at the hearing itself, expressly refused them legal representation. Significantly, the express grounds given by the respondent for the refusal was that the Rules of 1996 did not provide for legal representation.

[4] The High Court Judge took the view that the charges were sufficiently serious to warrant legal representation and that in those circumstances such representation ought to have been provided notwithstanding the absence of any specific mention of such representation in the rules. I will be giving details of the charges in due course and I will also return to the judgment of Butler J. I would like to refer first to the legal case put forward on behalf of the respondent in this court.

[5] Counsel for the respondent argued strongly in support of the view which the respondent had taken that, under the rules, legal representation is not provided for and is, therefore, not permissible. The rules do provide for advocacy assistance but only from officers within the prison service. It would appear, however, that, as in this particular case, it was common practice for trade union representatives to act as advocates. It was not clear to me as to whether they were in the nature of seconded officers of the prison service. Counsel for the respondent, in accordance with his instructions, was anxious to protect the principle enunciated by the respondent that the rules did not permit legal representation and he fully conceded that that was the ground on which the respondent refused it. For this reason, he appeared understandably reluctant to engage with the court on the question of whether, even if the norm would be to disallow legal representation, there would be a discretion open to the respondent to permit it in an appropriate case. Examples of the kind of cases where it might arise were usefully listed by Webster J. in Reg. v. Home Sec. Ex p. Tarrant [1985] 1 Q.B. 251. I would adopt that list as a broad guideline and I will return to it later on in this judgment.

[6] Counsel for the applicants has sensibly agreed that if this court takes the view that the respondent had a discretion as to whether to allow legal representation or not, this court can then go on to decide whether in all the circumstances the decision which the respondent in fact made would have been the correct one on any exercise of that discretion. This will avoid futile and unnecessary expense in returning the matter either to the respondent or to the High Court.

[7] I turn now to the basic facts of which it is necessary only to give a brief outline. The applicants were, at all material times, prison officers in Castlerea prison. On the 26th April, 2002, they were detailed to escort a prisoner from the prison to Merlin Park hospital in Galway for a medical examination. The applicants left the prison with the prisoner at 10.25 a.m. on that morning and returned to the prison at 6.25 p.m. that evening. As a consequence of a report made following a routine check by Assistant Governor Melvin three days later, the Assistant Governor reported that he had discovered that "the prisoner's business" was completed at 12.40 p.m. and that the escort returned to the prison at 6.35 p.m. There was an immediate prima facie allegation that the length of time in which the applicants were on the escort was wholly excessive with the consequence of an improper overtime claim. When Assistant Governor Melvin reported to the respondent, the latter directed further investigations. Statements were made in due course by the applicants. The investigations culminated in complaint forms pursuant to the Rules of 1996 being sent to the applicants on the 15th July, 2003. The complaints were threefold and read as follows:-

"1. that on the 26th April, 2002, while assisting on the escort to Merlin Park Hospital, Galway i/c of prisoner Anthony Massey, you made a false and inaccurate statement with intent to deceive;
2. that on the 26th April, 2002, while assisting on an escort to Merlin Park Hospital, Galway i/c of prisoner Anthony Massey, you failed to carry out your duties in a prompt and diligent manner;
3. that on the 26th April, 2002, while assisting on an escort to Merlin Park Hospital, Galway, you knowingly solicited an unauthorised gratuity."

In each of these complaint forms, the accused officers were referred to a summary of the evidence on which the allegations were based in Assistant Governor Melvin's report of the 25th April, 2002.

[8] Following on the oral hearing already referred to, identical letters were written to each of the applicants by the respondent dated the 8th July, 2003, and in the following terms:-

> "I refer to the oral hearing held on the 7th July, 2003, in accordance with the Prison (Disciplinary Code for Officers) Rules 1996 on charges issued against you on the 15th January, 2003.
>
> In response to the charges as outlined against you, you stated through your advocate that you were 'not taking any part in the hearing because of deprivation of legal representation'.
>
> As pointed out to you at the hearing and indeed to your legal representatives in a correspondence of the 18th June anno. the code does not allow for any such legal representation in these matters.
>
> I am satisfied, based on the evidence presented and in the absence of any rebuttal of this evidence, that the alleged breaches of discipline have been proved.
>
> I am satisfied that there was unnecessary delay on the departure and intentional delay during the escort.
>
> Your conduct on this escort was totally unacceptable, created unnecessary overtime and contravened Governor's orders regarding escorts.
> As a consequence of your breaches of discipline I am reprimanding you with entry on your record sheet and I am recommending to the Minister that you should suffer reduction in pay by way of forfeiture of one increment for twelve months."

[9] The letter was then signed by the respondent, Daniel J. Scannell. Further letters in identical terms dated the 8th July, 2003, and also signed by the respondent were sent to each of the applicants and each of those letters read as follows:-

> "Following upon the adjudication of charges placed against you on the 7th July, 2003, I am directing, for operational reasons, that future duties assigned to you shall be performed within the prison complex. This direction shall be reviewed after a period of twelve months.
> I am satisfied that the time you spent on the escort was excessive and that a reasonable return time would be 3.30 p.m. as against 6.35 p.m. as you claimed. You are required to make good these three hours overtime payment which has been paid to you."

[10] Nothing particularly turns on this, but I would be quite satisfied that stipulations contained in that second letter did not form part of the penalty as such but did, of course, arise as a consequence of what happened. The prison authorities clearly decided that if the applicants were unreliable escorts their duties should henceforth be internal. It was an operational decision as it is clearly stated to be. The requirement of reimbursement of three hours overtime payment was also simply a claim for a sum considered now to be due to the State.

[11] The applicants obtained leave to seek judicial review of the respondent's decision. That judicial review was based on some additional grounds over and above the ground that legal representation ought to have been granted. However on the appeal the legal representation issue was the only issue and that is the only matter with which I intend to deal. On that primary issue the operative part of the judgment of Butler J. in the High Court makes clear that the High Court Judge quite rightly was of the view that the absence of reference to legal representation in the rules did not necessarily preclude it (see [2005] IEHC 76, Unreported, 16th March, 2005). He claimed to be reinforced in that view by the judgment of Ó Caoimh J. in Garvey v. Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform (Unreported, High Court, Ó Caoimh J., 5th December, 2003) where in a somewhat analogous situation that judge held that if the code was to exclude legal representation it could easily have done so by the use of clear and plain language. While that observation is valid, the Constitution itself might require legal representation in exceptional cases irrespective of the wording. The High Court Judge pointed out that Ó Caoimh J. in Garvey v. Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform in considering the very same rule had observed as follows at p. 41:-

> "While these rules provide for representation by a fellow officer, I am satisfied that they do not either expressly or impliedly restrict any right to legal representation."

[12] Butler J. rightly followed this approach. The question which I have to consider is whether he was correct in his view that on any proper exercise of the discretion by the respondent, legal representation would have been permitted. Butler J. expressed his views this way:-

> "The breaches with which the applicants stood accused were not in the least trivial, in that, at the very least, they suggested dishonesty on the part of the applicants in carrying out their duty. The potential penalties which the applicants faced included recommendations for a reduction in rank and dismissal from the prison service. I am satisfied that in the instant case natural or constitutional justice required that the applicants should be entitled to legal representation."

[13] While there is obviously room for legitimate difference of opinion as to the proper exercise of a discretion in any given set of circumstances, I would take the view that legal representation was clearly unnecessary in this case. On one view, none of the charges were serious enough in the objective sense. However, I am reluctant to use that terminology given that at least one of them involves the alleged making of a deliberately false statement with intent to deceive. From a human point of view, that is a serious allegation in the mind of an accused but in the context of the factual matrix to this case, the charges could very easily be defended without a lawyer. The issues were factual issues connected with the day to day running of the prison. It is difficult to see why a lawyer would be required. The rules specify who is to be an advocate and, therefore, subject to the overall obligation of fairness, they should be followed. The cases for which the respondent would be obliged to exercise a discretion in favour of permitting legal representation would be exceptional. They would not necessarily be related even to the objective seriousness of the charges if the issues of proof were purely ones of simple fact and could safely be disposed of without a lawyer. In any organisation where there are disciplinary procedures, it is wholly undesirable to involve legal representation unless in all the circumstances it would be required by the principles of constitutional justice.

[14] I mentioned earlier in this judgment the case of Reg. v. Home Sec. Ex p. Tarrant [1985] 1 Q.B. 251. The criteria to be considered in the context of a request for legal representation as set out by Webster J. in that case have stood the test of time in the United Kingdom and I think that on a prima facie basis they could safely be adopted in this jurisdiction. I would add a rider however. In listing them, I am merely suggesting that they are the starting off points to be considered. Even if the case falls within one of these categories, in the context say of the Rules of 1996, the respondent would still be entitled to consider whether a fair hearing would require a lawyer. The six matters suggested by Webster J. are as follows:-

1. the seriousness of the charge and of the potential penalty;
2. whether any points of law are likely to arise;
3. the capacity of a particular prisoner to present his own case;
4. procedural difficulty;
5. the need for reasonable speed in making the adjudication, that being an important consideration; and
6. the need for fairness as between prisoners and as between prisoners and prison officers.

[15] I would approve of that list but it is a list merely of the kind of factors which might be relevant in the consideration of whether legal representation is desirable in the interests of a fair hearing. Ultimately, the essential point which the relevant governor has to consider is whether from the accused's point of view legal representation is needed in the particular circumstances of the case. I would reiterate that legal representation should be the exception rather than the rule. In most cases the provisions of the Rules of 1996 will simply apply.

[16] There are two other matters which I should mention. The first is that in the hearing in the High Court (see [2005] IEHC 76), Butler J. on the prompting of counsel had regard to a document called "Memorandum of Understanding" which preceded the Rules of 1996, in interpreting those rules. However, since the delivery of the judgment of the High Court in this case on the 16th March, 2005, this court, in a judgment delivered on the 18th July, 2005, by Hardiman J. and with which McCracken and Laffoy JJ. concurred in the case of Curley v. Governor of Arbour Hill Prison [2005] IESC 49, [2005] 3 I.R. 308, has held that the "Memorandum of Understanding" may not be used for the purpose of interpreting Rules of 1996. For that reason, I have made no reference to that memorandum but at any rate consideration of it would have made no difference to the view I take on this appeal.

[17] The second matter relates to an argument made on behalf of the applicants based on rule 5 of the Rules of 1996. That rule reads as follows:-

> "Nothing in these rules shall affect the right of a Governor or any officer whose duties include the supervision of another officer to deal informally (whether by advice, caution or admonition as the circumstances may require) with a breach of discipline of a minor nature."

[18] The argument was made that since the respondent thought fit to hold an oral hearing under r. 8 and not deal with the matter under r. 5, he was thereby accepting that the breaches of discipline in this case were not of a minor nature and that it further followed from that that any hearing in relation to them required legal representation. I would wholly reject that argument. Indeed if it was sound, the effect of it would be that there would be an entitlement in every case where there was an oral hearing to have legal representation. That would be contrary both to the clear intention of the Rules and to any requirement of constitutional or natural justice.

[19] For the reasons which I have set out therefore, I would allow the appeal and I would consider that the court should make an order setting aside the order of the High Court quashing the respondent's decision.

The Minister for Education and Skills, Applicant v. The Labour Court, Respondent and Anne Boyle and Committee of Management of Hillside Park Pre-school, Notice Parties [2018] IESC 52, [S.C. No 47 of 2017]

Supreme Court 1 November 2018

Employment law – Part-time workers – Teachers – Employer – Comparator – Less favourable treatment – Contract of service – Whether teacher and full-time comparator sharing same employer – Whether Minister employer – Whether relationship between teacher, committee of management and Minister constituting contract of service between teacher and Minister – Payment of Wages Act 1991 (No. 33), s. 1 – Employment Equality Act 1998 (No. 21), ss. 2 and 77 – Protection of Employees (Part-Time Work) Act 2001 (No. 45), ss. 3, 7 and 9.

Section 9(1) of the Protection of Employees (Part-Time Work) Act 2001 provides that a part-time employee shall not, in respect of his or her conditions of employment, be treated in a less favourable manner than a comparable full-time employee.

Section 3(1) of the 2001 Act defines an "employee" as "a person of any age who has entered into or works under … a contract of employment …"

Section 3(1) of the 2001 Act further defines "contract of employment" as meaning:-

> "(a) a contract of service or apprenticeship, and
>
> (b) any other contract whereby an individual agrees with another person, who is carrying on the business of an employment agency within the meaning of the Employment Agency Act, 1971, and is acting in the course of that business, to do or perform personally any work or service for a third person (whether or not the third person is a party to the contract),
> whether the contract is express or implied and, if express, whether it is oral or in writing".

Section 3(1) of the 2001 Act further defines an "employer" as meaning, "in relation to an employee, the person with whom the employee has entered into or for whom the employee works under (or, where the employment has ceased, entered into or worked under) a contract of employment, subject to the qualification that the person who under a contract of employment referred to in paragraph (b) of the definition of 'contract of employment' is liable to pay the wages of the individual concerned in respect of the work or service concerned shall be deemed to be the individual's employer".

Section 7(2) of the 2001 Act makes provision for the identification of a "comparable employee" in relation to a part-time employee:-

> "(2) For the purposes of this Part, an employee is a comparable employee in relation to the employee firstly mentioned in the definition of 'part-time employee' in this section (the 'relevant part-time employee') if—

(a) the employee and the relevant part-time employee are employed by the same employer or associated employers and one of the conditions referred to in subsection (3) is satisfied in respect of those employees …"

The first notice party worked as a teacher at a pre-school for children from the Traveller community. Funding for Traveller pre-schools was provided by the applicant by means of a grant to assist management committees in engaging staff. The first notice party's salary was discharged both from a grant received by the second notice party from the applicant and from funds of the second notice party that were raised through fund-raising efforts. The grant was paid by the applicant into a bank account held in the name of the second notice party and covered 98% of the first notice party's salary. This method of payment was phased out by the applicant over several years and was replaced by a system of direct payments by the applicant to the teachers concerned.

Following the introduction of a universal pre-school scheme, the applicant ceased grant-aiding segregated pre-schools for children from the Traveller community. The pre-school managed by the second notice party closed thereafter and the first notice party was made redundant.

The first notice party sought access from the applicant to the National School Teachers' Superannuation Scheme. The applicant refused the first notice party access to the scheme on the basis that she was not a national school teacher employed in a national school.

The first notice party brought a complaint to a rights commissioner seeking that the terms and conditions of the superannuation scheme be applied to her. She argued that she was being treated less favourably than what she asserted was a full-time comparator, being a national school teacher working in an "early start" unit in a primary school. The first notice party submitted that she was a relevant part-time employee as she and her comparator shared the same employer, namely the applicant. The rights commissioner concluded that the applicant was not the first notice party's employer or an associate employer within the meaning of the 2001 Act.

The first notice party appealed the decision of the rights commissioner to the respondent. The respondent concluded that the first notice party and her comparator were both employed by the applicant. The respondent directed that the applicant should admit the first notice party to the superannuation scheme.

The applicant challenged the decision of the respondent by way of judicial review in the High Court, arguing that the respondent erred in law in concluding that the first notice party and her chosen comparator were both employees of the applicant. The High Court (O'Malley J.) concluded that school teachers whose salaries were publicly funded had to be deemed, for the purposes of the 2001 Act, to be employed by the applicant ([2015] IEHC 429). Consequently, the High Court upheld the finding of the respondent that the first notice party was employed on the same basis as national school teachers, that the first notice party had been treated less favourably than her full-time comparator, and that she was therefore entitled to redress under the 2001 Act. However, the High Court held that the respondent was not empowered to order that the first notice party be admitted to the superannuation scheme. The matter was remitted to the respondent for further consideration as regards the question of compensation.

The applicant appealed to the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal agreed with the conclusions of the High Court regarding the status of the applicant as employer of both the first notice party and her comparator ([2017] IECA 39).

The applicant was granted leave to appeal to the Supreme Court on the question as to whether the applicant could be said to be an employer of the first notice party in relation to pay-related matters for the purposes of the 2001 Act ([2017] IESCDET 58).

Held by the Supreme Court, in allowing the appeal and quashing the determination of the respondent, 1, that it was not possible to characterise the relationship between the applicant and the first notice party as involving a contract of service to which the applicant was a party. The ordinary meaning of a "contract of service" implied an arrangement whereby one party agreed to work for the other and, subject to the terms of the contract, under the control of that person as to how they carried out their work. The applicant had no entitlement to direct the type of work that the first notice party was to do and, applying the ordinary and natural meaning of "contract for service", it was the school management that was the other party to her contract of employment.

O'Keeffe v. Hickey [2008] IESC 72, [2009] 2 I.R. 302 considered.

2. That while there might be circumstances where a minister would incur a liability in respect of persons whom a minister chose to pay directly, or where the minister was effective paymaster even though the payment may be made by an intermediary, each such case had to be considered in the light of established legal principles applicable to the area in question. In the context of the 2001 Act and its reliance on the term "contract of service" (with only one, non-applicable exception in relation to agency workers), it was not intended that other categories of persons, beyond those who could, as a matter of contract law properly construed, be regarded as an employer involved in a contract of service with a claimant, should come within its scope.

Obiter dictum, per Clarke C.J. (nem. diss.): As a matter of statutory construction, the fact that an officer of the State took a different approach to the interpretation and application of two different statutes that were worded in the same fashion did not, of itself, require the court to take that fact into account in coming to a view as to what the legislation meant.

Cur. adv. vult.

1. Introduction

[1] The unusual triangular or tripartite arrangement whereby much education in Ireland is funded and controlled has given rise to a number of important and difficult legal questions over the years. The practical manner in which that system operates is not in dispute, but the legal rights and obligations which derive from it have given rise to difficult issues. While it will be necessary to refer to the facts of this case in due course and while there is one aspect of the relationship between the parties to this case which is, perhaps, somewhat different to what might be described as an entirely typical situation in the field, nonetheless the broad system applies in a very great number of situations within the State-funded educational system.

[2] At its most basic, schools are under the management and day-to-day control of management boards or the like, although the precise structure may vary somewhat as and between primary and secondary schools. In very many cases the salaries of all teachers are, however, paid directly by the applicant/appellant ("the Minister") with the terms and conditions of employment being agreed from time to time between the Minister and representatives of teachers, or, in the absence of such agreement, being fixed by the Minister. Even in the case of fee-paying secondary schools, a significant number of teachers' salaries are paid in that way by the Minister, with the fees contributed by parents going to additional expenditure, whether relating to the employment of a larger number of teachers than governmental schemes support or additional facilities or courses.

[3] At its simplest, the triangular or tripartite system means that, for the purposes of ordinary day-to-day control including hiring, allocation of duties and the like, teachers have their contractual relations with a board of management. The relationship of the majority of teachers (that is, those who are paid by the Minister) with their paymaster can, however, complicate matters to the extent that legal issues can arise as to how to characterise as a matter of law the relationship between a teacher whose salary is paid by the State and the Minister who is responsible for making those payments and, to a very large extent, also fixes the terms on which those payments are to be made.

[4] It will again be necessary to set out in somewhat greater detail the way in which courts and other bodies with decision-making power in the employment law field have approached those legal issues. However, the narrow question which arises on the facts of this case concerns the proper legal characterisation of that relationship for the purposes of the Protection of Employees (Part-Time Work) Act 2001 ("the 2001 Act"). In simple terms, the question is as to whether the Minister can be regarded as an employer of the first notice party/respondent ("Ms. Boyle") for the purposes of that legislation, or at least for the purposes of that legislation insofar as it relates to financial or pay matters.

[5] That question has been before a rights commissioner, the Labour Court, the High Court on judicial review and the Court of Appeal. The decision of the Labour Court was in favour of Ms. Boyle and held that the Minister was an employer for those purposes. Both the High Court and the Court of Appeal refused the Minister an order quashing that decision on the grounds of being erroneous in law. It is as against that decision of the Court of Appeal that the Minister has brought an appeal to this court. In order to understand the precise basis on which the matter comes before this court, it is, perhaps, appropriate to start with a brief outline of the course of these proceedings to date.

2. The course of the proceedings to date

[6] In 2009, Ms. Boyle sought access from the Minister to the National School Teachers' Superannuation Scheme ("the Superannuation Scheme"). This scheme was established under the Teachers Superannuation Act 1928, and provides pension benefits to teachers employed in national schools. The Minister refused access to Ms. Boyle on the basis that she was not a national school teacher employed in a national school. Rather, Ms. Boyle was a qualified secondary teacher who was working as a teacher at Hillside Park, which was a pre-school for children from the Traveller community.

[7] On 16 March 2009 Ms. Boyle brought a complaint to a rights commissioner seeking that the terms and conditions of the Superannuation Scheme be applied to her. She argued that she was being treated less favourably than what she asserted was a full-time comparator, being a national school teacher working in an "early start" unit in a primary school. This unfavourable treatment was said to be contrary to s. 9(1) of the 2001 Act. Ms. Boyle argued in support of this position that she was a relevant part-time employee as she and her comparator shared the same employer, namely the Minister. The rights commissioner concluded that the Minister was not Ms. Boyle's employer within the meaning of s. 3(1) of the 2001 Act, nor an associate employer within the meaning of s. 7(5) of that Act. For reasons which will become clear, it was essential in the context of this claim that Ms. Boyle and her asserted comparator had the same or an associated employer. The rights commissioner therefore rejected the complaint as not well founded.

[8] Ms. Boyle appealed the decision of the rights commissioner to the Labour Court. In its decision, the Labour Court first addressed the issue of whether the Minister ought to be regarded as Ms. Boyle's employer for the purpose of her complaint. The Labour Court stated that it was bound by the decision of the High Court in Catholic University School v. Dooley [2010] IEHC 496, [2011] 4 I.R. 517. The Labour Court concluded that, as a consequence of the decision in Catholic University School v. Dooley [2010] IEHC 496, the Minister was to be regarded as Ms. Boyle's employer. Secondly, the Labour Court considered whether Ms. Boyle and her chosen comparator were engaged in like work for the purposes of s. 9(1) of the 2001 Act. Ultimately, the court concluded that Ms. Boyle and her comparator were both employed by the Minister, thus satisfying s. 7(2)(a) of the 2001 Act. Furthermore, the court concluded that Ms. Boyle and her comparator were engaged in work of equal value within the meaning of s. 7(3)(c) of the 2001 Act. Consequently, the Labour Court concluded that Ms. Boyle's complaint was well founded and that the decision of the rights commissioner ought to be reversed. The Labour Court directed that the Minister should admit her to the Superannuation Scheme, effective from 21 September 2008 and pay her €10,000 in compensation.

[9] The Minister subsequently sought to challenge that decision of the Labour Court by way of judicial review in the High Court, arguing that the Labour Court acted contrary to fair procedures, acted ultra vires, and that it erred in law in concluding that Ms. Boyle and her chosen comparator were both employees of the Minister. It followed, it was said, that the Labour Court was incorrect to direct that Ms. Boyle be admitted to the Superannuation Scheme and also that the Labour Court erred in awarding compensation for discrimination found to have been suffered by Ms. Boyle. The High Court ([2015] IEHC 429, [2015] 26 E.L.R. 278) concluded that school teachers whose salaries are publicly funded must be deemed, for the purposes of the 2001 Act, to be employed by the Minister. Consequently, the High Court upheld the finding of the Labour Court to the effect that Ms. Boyle was employed on the same basis as national school teachers, that Ms. Boyle had been treated less favourably than her full-time comparator, and that she was therefore entitled to redress under the 2001 Act. However, the High Court held that the Labour Court was not empowered to order that Ms. Boyle be admitted to the Superannuation Scheme. The matter was remitted to the Labour Court for further consideration as regards the question of compensation.

[10] The Minister appealed the above decision of the High Court to the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal ([2017] IECA 39) agreed with the ultimate conclusions of O'Malley J. in the High Court regarding the status of the Minister as employer of both Ms. Boyle and her comparator. In particular, Hogan J. concluded that the relationship between the Minister and Ms. Boyle gave rise to an implied contract of employment between the two parties in relation to pay-related matters. The Court of Appeal further agreed with the High Court in holding that the Labour Court was not empowered to order Ms. Boyle's admittance to the Superannuation Scheme.

[11] While it will be necessary to analyse the reasoning of the various relevant bodies or courts in due course, it is appropriate next to turn to the basis on which the Minister obtained leave to appeal to this court.

3. The grant of leave to appeal

[12] On 29 March 2017, the Minister applied for leave to appeal to this court, which leave was granted on 19 June 2017 ([2017] IESCDET 58). The court granted leave to the Minister to pursue the appeal on the following ground:-

> "[W]hether, in all the circumstances of this case, the Minister can be said to be an employer of Ms. Boyle in relation to pay-related matters for the purposes of the 2001 Act."

[13] Ms. Boyle did not seek leave to cross-appeal on the question of admittance to the Superannuation Scheme. That issue, therefore, no longer forms part of the case.

[14] While the issue on which leave was granted is substantially one of law, it is necessary to consider that legal question against the backdrop of the facts which, as noted earlier, were not in serious contention. I therefore set out the agreed facts.

4. The agreed facts

[15] Hillside Park was a segregated pre-school in Galway which provided for children from the Traveller community. It was set up in 1981 by a committee under the patronage of the local bishop. That committee ("the Management Committee") is the second notice party but did not take an active role in these proceedings as it is, in effect, now defunct. Ms. Boyle worked in Hillside from 1989 until the pre-school closed in 2011. Hillside opened for three hours a day, five days a week, during the normal school year. During her time there, Ms. Boyle was the only teacher in the school.

[16] Hillside Park was managed by the Management Committee which was a voluntary committee. The Management Committee controlled Ms. Boyle in the discharge of her duties. It should be noted that the Management Committee was not a board of management in respect of a recognised school, as provided for in Part IV of the Education Act 1998. Furthermore, as was noted above, while Ms. Boyle was qualified to teach in a post-primary school, she was not a qualified national school teacher. Hillside Park was not a national school, nor any other type of recognised school within the meaning of the Education Act 1998. It should be further noted that Ms. Boyle was herself a member of the Management Committee, and that correspondence between the Minister and the committee was often sent to Ms. Boyle's home address.

[17] Funding for Traveller pre-schools was provided by the Minister by means of a grant to assist management committees in engaging staff. Ms. Boyle's salary was discharged both from the grant which the Management Committee received from the Minister and from funds of the Management Committee which were raised through fundraising efforts. The grant from the Minister equated to 98% of the salary of a national school teacher pro rata to the number of hours worked. The grant was paid by the Minister into a bank account held in the name of the Management Committee. This included the amount payable as employer's PRSI. The Minister also paid a per capita grant in respect of the children enrolled in the pre-school and an equipment grant to the Management Committee. Ms. Boyle's entitlement to sick leave, maternity leave, annual leave and compassionate leave was determined by the extent to which the grant payable by the Minister provided for such leave periods.

[18] In 2006, as a result of a new Traveller education strategy, there was a change in educational policy to the effect that inclusive pre-school education of children was favoured over segregation of Traveller children. The Minister decided to cease grant-aiding segregated pre-schools for children from the Traveller community following the announcement in 2009 of a universal pre-school scheme which was to commence the following year.

[19] As noted above, the complaint at the heart of these proceedings was brought by Ms. Boyle to a rights commissioner on 16 March 2009.

[20] In 2011, following the cessation of funding for segregated Traveller pre-schools, and the death of the founder of the school (Mr. Neylon), Hillside Park closed. Ms. Boyle received a redundancy payment of €18,000 directly from the Minister in the summer of 2011. This equated to her statutory redundancy entitlement.

[21] As is clear from the above, for at least the vast majority of her time at Hillside Park, Ms. Boyle's salary was not paid directly by the Minister. Rather, an arrangement was come to between the Minister and Hillside Park to the effect that the Minister would pay a grant equating to 98% of the salary of a national school teacher to cover Ms. Boyle's salary, with Ms. Boyle's entitlements to annual leave, sick leave and the like being determined in effect by the Department of Education ("the Department"). It follows that there was a significant engagement between the parties from time to time concerning aspects of Ms. Boyle's entitlements. A brief history of that engagement is also potentially of relevance to the issues which arise in this case.

[22] As noted above, Ms. Boyle was a member of the Management Committee. As it happens, some of the correspondence referred to below is addressed to the committee, or the chairperson, but was sent to Ms. Boyle's home address. Similarly, it appears that in some instances Ms. Boyle received correspondence addressed directly to her at her home address rather than receiving the correspondence on behalf of the committee.

[23] Between 1989 and 1992 Ms. Boyle was paid an hourly rate. In 1992, however, the Minister introduced a scheme establishing "Pro-Rata Pay and Conditions for Eligible Part-Time Teachers in Special Schools and other Institutions". The scheme was open only to part-time teachers who were wholly or mainly dependent for their livelihood on their earnings from part-time teaching, and who were fully qualified, or part-time teachers who, though not fully qualified, had been sanctioned in their posts by the Department and who had at least one year's service prior to 1 September 1990. The pro rata aspect was by reference to the earnings of full-time national school teachers.

[24] The terms of the scheme specifically stated that it did not provide for any amendments to the then current regulations in relation to superannuation. It also stated that "[t]he employment or re-employment of a teacher under the scheme is a matter for the employer i.e., the management authorities of special schools or other institutions".

[25] On 30 September 1992 a letter was sent to Ms. Boyle from the Department setting out the differences in her entitlements under the existing part-time teacher rate and the new scheme referred to above. The letter advised Ms. Boyle that "the main advantage of the EPT [eligible part-time] scheme is the fact that you will be on a fixed annual salary which will continue to be paid during periods of sick leave or maternity leave". Ms. Boyle's application to the scheme was acceded to.

[26] Ms. Boyle became an "eligible part-time" teacher in 1992. Her salary was set at the first point of the scale with an allowance for her degree and her higher diploma in education. Ms. Boyle was informed that, as she was not a fully qualified national teacher, she would remain on this point of the scale.

[27] On 26 April 1996 a letter was sent to Ms. Boyle from the Department concerning her application to receive an allowance for a master's degree in education, which degree had been conferred on Ms. Boyle in 1995. Ms. Boyle was advised that, as it was not possible to hold three qualification allowances under the existing salaries scale for teachers, her master's qualification would be substituted for one of the two existing allowances. Consequently, the grant payable in respect of Ms. Boyle's salary was increased.

[28] In 2000 the Minister decided that, due to a shortage of teachers, qualified secondary teachers taking up posts in national schools in a temporary or substitute capacity would be paid at a rate applicable to qualified primary teachers. This was set out in circular 0024/2000. Ms. Boyle successfully applied to be included in the new arrangement and accordingly was placed on the second point of the scale. Thereafter, the incremental salary scale was applied to her and she continued to progress through the incremental scale for the rest of her employment. However, the grant remained capped at 98% of what would have been payable had she been employed by a national school.

[29] As noted above, the way in which the grant provided by the Minister was disbursed was via a system of payment of a grant to the school as opposed to direct payment to the teacher to whom the grant related. However, in 2008 the Department issued circular 2008/88, which altered the grant system on a phased basis to direct payments to the teacher. This was done with a view to reducing the administrative burden on schools and also to help ensure the terms of the 2001 Act were fully implemented for part-time teachers. This new direct payment system was implemented in January 2011 for Traveller pre-schools.

[30] On 12 January 2010 a letter was sent from the Department to the chairperson of the Management Committee explaining that the grant in respect of Ms. Boyle's salary was reduced proportionately so as to reflect the reduction in the salary of national school teachers provided for under the Financial Emergency Measures in the Public Interest (No. 2) Act 2009 ("FEMPI").

[31] In November 2010, in a circular (0070/2010) sent by the Department, it was explained, in relation to a question as to whether certain staff who had not been subject to the pension levy introduced in earlier legislation were subject to pay reductions under FEMPI, that all staff employed by a recognised school or VEC come within the definition of public servant "solely for the purposes of the Act." Under the heading of "categories of staff who will now be affected" the circular referred to "teachers employed in Traveller preschools".

[32] Against that factual backdrop it is then necessary to look at the relevant legal issue which arose at each stage of these proceedings. The legal framework operates within the ambit of the 2001 Act to which it is now necessary to turn.

5. The 2001 Act

[33] It is first appropriate to look at the relevant provisions of the 2001 Act itself. The long title of the 2001 Act states that it is an act "to provide for the implementation of Directive 97/81/EC of 15 December 1997 [the part-time workers Directive] …"

[34] Section 9(1) of the Act provides:-

"Subject to subsections (2) and (4) and section 11(2), a part-time employee shall not, in respect of his or her conditions of employment, be treated in a less favourable manner than a comparable full-time employee."

[35] Section 7(1) defines the term "part-time employee" as follows:-

"'[P]art-time employee' means an employee whose normal hours of work are less than the normal hours of work of an employee who is a comparable employee in relation to him or her".

[36] Section 3(1) defines the term "contract of employment" as meaning:-

"(a) a contract of service or apprenticeship, and

(b) any other contract whereby an individual agrees with another person, who is carrying on the business of an employment agency within the meaning of the Employment Agency Act, 1971, and is acting in the course of that business, to do or perform personally any work or service for a third person (whether or not the third person is a party to the contract), whether the contract is express or implied and, if express, whether it is oral or in writing".

[37] The term "employee" is defined as:-

"… a person of any age who has entered into or works under (or, where the employment has ceased, entered into or worked under) a contract of employment and references, in relation to an employer, to an employee shall be construed as references to an employee employed by that employer; and for the purposes of this Act, a person holding office under, or in the service of, the State (including a civil servant within the meaning of the Civil Service Regulation Act, 1956) shall be deemed to be an employee employed by the State or Government, as the case may be, and an officer or servant of a local authority for the purposes of the Local Government Act 2001 (as amended by the Local Government Reform Act 2014), or of a harbour authority, or health board, or a member of staff of an education and training board shall be deemed to be an employee employed by the authority or board, as the case may be."

[38] The term "employer" is defined as follows:-

"'employer' means, in relation to an employee, the person with whom the employee has entered into or for whom the employee works under (or, where the employment has ceased, entered into or worked under) a contract of employment, subject to the qualification that the person who under a contract of employment referred to in paragraph (b) of the definition of 'contract of employment' is liable to pay the wages of the individual concerned in respect of the work or service concerned shall be deemed to be the individual's employer."

[39] Section 7(2) of the 2001 Act makes provision for the identification of a "comparable employee" in relation to a part-time employee:-

"(2) For the purposes of this Part, an employee is a comparable employee in relation to the employee firstly mentioned in the definition of 'part-time employee' in this section (the 'relevant part-time employee') if—

(a) the employee and the relevant part-time employee are employed by the same employer or associated employers and one of the conditions referred to in subsection (3) is satisfied in respect of those employees,

(b) in case paragraph (a) does not apply (including a case where the relevant part-time employee is the sole employee of the employer), the employee is specified in a collective agreement, being an agreement that for the time being has effect in relation to the relevant part-time employee, to be a type of employee who is to be regarded for the purposes of this Part as a comparable employee in relation to the relevant part-time employee, or

(c) in case neither paragraph (a) nor (b) applies, the employee is employed in the same industry or sector of employment as the relevant part-time employee is employed in and one of the conditions referred to in subsection (3) is satisfied in respect of those employees, and references in this Part to a comparable full-time employee in relation to a part-time employee shall be construed accordingly."

[40] Section 7(3) of the 2001 Act goes on to provide:-

"(3) The following are the conditions mentioned in subsection (2)—

(a) both of the employees concerned perform the same work under the same or similar conditions or each is interchangeable with the other in relation to the work,

(b) the work performed by one of the employees concerned is of the same or a similar nature to that performed by the other and any differences between the work performed or the conditions under which it is performed by each, either are of small importance in relation to the work as a whole or occur with such irregularity as not to be significant, and

(c) the work performed by the relevant part-time employee is equal or greater in value to the work performed by the other employee concerned, having regard to such matters as skill, physical or mental requirements, responsibility and working conditions."

[41] Section 16 of the 2001 Act makes provision for the making of complaints under the Act to a rights commissioner. Section 17 concerns appeals from decisions of a rights commissioner to the Labour Court.

[42] It is important, therefore, to note the structure of the Act. In order for a successful claim to arise under the legislation it is necessary that one of the three conditions set out in s. 7(2) of the 2001 Act is met. As can be seen, each of those provisions involves a comparison with what is described in the legislation as a comparator who is in substance a full-time employee meeting the conditions set out in one or other of the subsections of s. 7(2).

[43] As already noted, in the circumstances of this case, a decision was made under s. 7(2)(a) which requires both the claimant employee and the comparator to be in the same employment. As also noted earlier, the comparator in this case was a qualified national school teacher who worked in an "early start" unit for pre-school age children within a national school. Thus, in order for the Labour Court to have been correct to come to the conclusion that s. 7(2) was met, it would be necessary also to conclude that both Ms. Boyle and that other relevant teacher had the same or an associated employer, with it following that, for practical purposes, it would be necessary to determine that, as a matter of law, both could be regarded as being in the employ of the Minister.

[44] It is in that specific legal context that the question of whether it can properly be said that Ms. Boyle was, at least for financial and pay purposes, an employee of the Minister comes into proper focus. That is, thus, the net issue which this court has to determine.

[45] As part of the process of considering that question, it is necessary to have regard to a number of decisions of both courts and other bodies in the employment law sphere which have considered the status of persons in the triangular or tripartite teacher-type arrangements which are at the heart of these proceedings and their legal relationship with the Minister for the purposes of other legislation. I would propose, therefore, to review the case law on other legislation in that context.

6. The case law on other legislation

[46] In their submissions, counsel for Ms. Boyle have highlighted at least two instances where they argue that the Minister has accepted that he is the appropriate respondent to claims made by teachers on pay-related matters. First, under the Payment of Wages Act 1991 ("the 1991 Act") and secondly under the Employment Equality Acts 1998-2015 ("the Employment Equality Acts").

[47] Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] 9 E.L.R. 217 is a decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal, on appeal from a decision of a rights commissioner, concerning a complaint made under the 1991 Act. The claimant teacher argued that she had been wrongly denied access to a particular qualification allowance and that this amounted to an unlawful deduction of wages within the meaning of the 1991 Act. The Minister contended among other things that he was not the employer of the claimant, but was merely a "paying agent". At this stage, it is worth briefly setting out the relevant provisions of the 1991 Act before turning to the decision of the tribunal.

> "(a) a contract of service or of apprenticeship, and
>
> (b) any other contract whereby an individual agrees with another person to do or perform personally any work or service for a third person (whether or not the third person is a party to the contract) whose status by virtue of the contract is not that of a client or customer of any profession or business undertaking carried on by the individual, and the person who is liable to pay the wages of the individual in respect of the work or service shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be his employer,
>
> whether the contract is express or implied and if express, whether it is oral or in writing".

[49] The term "employee" is defined as:-

> "a person who has entered into or works under (or, where the employment has ceased, entered into or worked under) a contract of employment and references, in relation to an employer, to an employee shall be construed as references to an employee employed by that employer; and for the purpose of this definition, a person holding office under, or in the service of, the State (including a member of the Garda Síochána or the Defence Forces) or otherwise as a civil servant, within the meaning of the Civil Service Regulation Act, 1956, shall be deemed to be an employee employed by the State or the Government, as the case may be, and an officer or servant of a local authority for the purposes of the Local Government Act 2001 (as amended by the Local Government Reform Act 2014), a harbour authority, a health board or a member of staff of an education and training board shall be deemed to be an employee employed by the authority or board, as the case may be."

[50] Finally, the term "employer" is defined as:-

"… the person with whom the employee has entered into or for whom the employee works under (or, where the employment has ceased, entered into or worked under) a contract of employment."

[51] The tribunal rejected the Minister's argument in Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] 9 E.L.R. 217 that he was not the employer of the complainant for the purposes of the 1991 Act. The tribunal set out its conclusions in this regard in the following terms at p. 222:-

"The Tribunal does not accept that the Department is not the employer. The board of management or other managing authority of a school may well have a role in the day to day running of the school and indeed in engaging teachers, interviewing etc. The reality is that such boards of management or other managing authority in relation to State schools have little or no role when it comes to the question of remuneration of teachers which is a most important element and aspect of the relationship between teachers and their employers. The Tribunal considers that the role of the Department of Education goes beyond that of 'paying agent'. The Department is empowered to negotiate teachers' salaries and qualification allowances and makes policy decisions in relation to the type of degree which Ms. Sullivan and other teachers have studied for in relation to the status of such degree as regards qualification allowances. The Department has a role in the whole area of maintaining appropriate pupil/teacher ratio indirectly and regulates the number of teachers in any particular school as in the scheme of redeployment. If ultimately redeployment in the case of any particular teacher cannot be settled by agreement, the Minister is empowered to withhold the grant of the sum of money which would go towards paying that particular teacher's salary and effectively has the power to deprive a particular teacher of his or her salary."

[52] Later, in its decision in Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] 9 E.L.R. 217, the tribunal stated at p. 222:-

"Furthermore because of the minimal role which the board of management or other managerial authority exercises in relation to the whole question of teachers' remuneration especially in the case of a full-time teacher it follows that where a teacher has a complaint/query in relation to his or her salary or takes issue with it the teacher in question is likely to end up dealing with the Department and not the school. When it comes to the question of remuneration, for the Department to say that it > is not the employer would effectively mean that as far as the question of remuneration would go the teacher would have no employer which is inconceivable. If a deduction is made from a teacher's salary the school is likely to say that it, having no role in the question of payment of remuneration, cannot be considered to have made such deduction and the Department may say that it is not the employer for the purposes of any aspect of the teacher's employment. It is inconceivable that all of the teachers in the country should not have the benefit of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. It is difficult to see how the board of management could, short of ordering the Department to make a deduction, actually make a deduction from any particular teacher's remuneration."

[53] Thus, counsel for Ms. Boyle place reliance on the conclusions of the tribunal in this context as supporting their argument that the Minister is Ms. Boyle's employer for the purposes of the 2001 Act. Indeed, it was pointed out that the Minister now accepts the conclusions of the tribunal in Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] 9 E.L.R. 217 in this regard. However, it must be noted that there are differences in the wording of the relevant definitions in the 1991 Act and the 2001 Act, and the Minister points to these differences as justification for distinguishing claims arising under each Act from one another. In particular, the definition of "contract of employment" in the 1991 Act refers to:-

> "… any other contract whereby an individual agrees with another person to do or perform personally any work or service for a third person (whether or not the third person is a party to the contract) whose status by virtue of the contract is not that of a client or customer of any profession or business undertaking carried on by the individual, and the person who is liable to pay the wages of the individual in respect of the work or service shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be his employer, whether the contract is express or implied and if express, whether it is oral or in writing" (emphasis added).

[54] Such a deeming clause is absent from the definition of "contract of employment" in the 2001 Act. It is important to note, however, that the 2001 Act does have a different deeming provision concerning agency workers. Counsel for the Minister suggested that the presence of one deeming provision but the absence of a deeming provision such as appears in the 1991 Act points strongly against any contract of employment being implied or deemed to exist with a person liable to pay wages.

[55] Counsel for Ms. Boyle also refer to the decision of the Workplace Relations Commission ("WRC") in Horgan v. Department of Education and Skills (DEC-E2016-041, Workplace Relations Commission, 4 March 2016).

The dispute in that case concerned a claim by the complainants, who were primary school teachers, that they were discriminated against by the Department of Education and Skills, the Department of Finance, the Department of Public Expenditure and Reform, the Government of Ireland, Ireland and the Attorney General on the grounds of age in relation to their rates of remuneration. They contended that they performed "like work" to a named comparator and were entitled to equal remuneration under the Employment Equality Acts. Again, an aspect of this decision was the question of whether the respondents were the proper respondents for the purpose of the applicable legislation.

[56] Section 77(4)(b) of the Employment Equality Act 1998 ("the 1998 Act", which forms part of the Employment Equality Acts) states that, "[i]n this Part, in relation to a claim referred under any provision of this section", "the respondent" is defined as the person "who is alleged to have discriminated against the complainant or, as the case may be, who is responsible for providing the remuneration to which the equal remuneration term relates or who is responsible for providing the benefit under the equality clause or who is alleged to be responsible for the victimisation".

[57] Section 2(1) of the 1998 Act defines "employer" as:-

> "'[E]mployer', subject to subsection (3), means, in relation to an employee, the person with whom the employee has entered into or for whom the employee works under (or, where the employment has ceased, entered into or worked under) a contract of employment".

[58] Subsection (3) states:-

> "For the purposes of this Act—
>
> (a) a person holding office under, or in the service of, the State (including a member of the Garda Síochána or the Defence Forces) or otherwise as a civil servant, within the meaning of the Civil Service Regulation Act, 1956, shall be deemed to be an employee employed by the State or Government, as the case may be, under a contract of service,
>
> (b) an officer or servant of a local authority for the purposes of the Local Government Act, 1941, a harbour authority, a health board or a member of staff of an education and training board shall be deemed to be an employee employed by the authority or board, as the case may be, under a contract of service,
>
> (c) in relation to an agency worker, the person who is liable for the pay of the agency worker shall be deemed to be the employer."

[59] At para. 3.1 of the WRC decision in Horgan v. Department of Education and Skills (DEC-E2016-041, Workplace Relations Commission, 4

March 2016), it is noted that the respondents submitted that they were not the correct respondents, and that the correct respondents were the boards of management of the schools where the complainants were working at the time they referred their claims. However, later in the decision, at para. 4.1, the WRC notes:-

> "The complainants named six respondents who, in their written submissions, they contend all have responsibility for the pay of the complainants. Whilst in their written submission the respondents contended that the correct respondents are the Boards of Management of the schools where the complainants were first appointed as teachers. At the hearing the Department of Education and Skills conceded that they were responsible for the remuneration of the complainants."

[60] Again, counsel for Ms. Boyle argue that this creates a somewhat strange situation in that the Minister has acknowledged that he is the proper respondent to claims made by teachers in relation to pay-related matters arising under the Employment Equality Acts but does not acknowledge the same in relation to Ms. Boyle's claim under the 2001 Act. However, counsel for the Minister submit that the Minister has merely acknowledged that he is the appropriate respondent within the definition of that term in the Employment Equality Acts. The Minister submits that this is not the same as conceding that the Minister comes within the definition of "employer" as that term is used in the 2001 Act. The Minister submits that there is therefore no inconsistency in approach between the stance taken in relation to the Employment Equality Acts and that adopted in the present case. It should, however, be noted that there would be a significant question about the extent to which a court could properly be influenced in objectively construing a statute even if it were shown that a party, such as the Minister, had adopted inconsistent interpretations of similarly worded legislative provisions.

[61] At this stage it might also be useful to refer to the decision of the High Court in Catholic University School v. Dooley [2010] IEHC 496, [2011] 4 I.R. 517. That case concerned a claim under the 2001 Act brought by part-time teachers who were paid by their school out of privately raised funds. They chose as their comparators full-time teachers at the same school but whose salaries and benefits were paid by the Department of Education. There was no dispute as to the fact that the claimants were treated less favourably. The Labour Court upheld the claim and the school appealed to the High Court on a point of law. An aspect of the appeal in the High Court was a question as to whether the claimants had chosen an appropriate comparator for the purposes of the 2001 Act. This in turn required an analysis of whether it could be said that the claimants and their comparators were employees of the same employer.

[62] In her judgment in the High Court, Dunne J. engaged in an analysis of the relevant legislative provisions and case law, particularly the decision of the Supreme Court in O'Keeffe v. Hickey [2008] IESC 72, [2009] 2 I.R. 302. O'Keeffe v. Hickey concerned the issue of vicarious liability in the context of the tripartite relationship between teacher, school and the Department. Dunne J. stated in this regard at p. 540:-

> "[50] There is no doubt that the school is the employer of the claimants. Bearing in mind the decision in O'Keeffe v Hickey [2008] IESC 72, [2009] 2 I.R. 302, it appears that the school is also the employer of the chosen comparators for the purpose of issues of vicarious liability. That decision highlights the unusual tripartite relationship between the department funded teacher, the Department and the school. However, the provisions of s. 24 of the Education Act 1998 are also of importance. Section 24 (3) makes it clear that the task of appointing teachers funded by the State falls on the board of management of a school. Section 24 (5) makes it clear that the terms and conditions of teachers funded by the State shall be determined by the Minister, with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance.
> [51] In a private school there will be a cohort of Department funded teachers and usually there will also be a cohort of privately paid teachers. The paymaster for each cohort is different. In O'Keeffe v Hickey [2008] IESC 72, [2009] 2 I.R. 302, the unusual nature of the tri-partite agreement was described; the board of management was found to be the employer of the teacher concerned in that case, which involved the question of vicarious liability, although the teacher was paid by the Department. There is no tripartite arrangement in the case of the claimants."

[63] Dunne J. later went on to consider the decision in Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] 9 E.L.R. 217, which was referred to above. Dunne J. stated at p. 541:-

> "[52] The decision in that case highlights the different and complicated employment arrangements as between department funded teachers and privately funded teachers. One wonders what relief, if any, could have been obtained by the claimant in that case had she pursued her case against the school concerned as opposed to the Department. It is hard to see how the tribunal in that case could have come to any other conclusion. The recognition of qualifications and the payment of a qualification allowance was always a matter to be dealt with by the Department of Education, because it set the criteria for the payment of that allowance. That case provides one small example of the different contractual arrangements that exist between department funded teachers and the school in which they are employed and privately funded teachers and the school in which they are employed."

[64] Dunne J. concluded that the Department had to be viewed as the employer of the chosen comparators in Catholic University School v. Dooley [2010] IEHC 496, [2011] 4 I.R. 517. This conclusion was expressed as follows at pp. 541 and 542:-

"[53] Although the chosen comparators appear to come within the definition of comparable full time employees as defined in the legislation, I have come to the conclusion that because of the fact that the Minister for Education determines the terms and conditions of the department funded teacher and the school determines the terms and conditions of the privately paid teachers, the Labour Court has fallen into error in finding that the claimants were entitled to choose a full time department funded teacher as a comparator. The school has no hand, act or part in determining the salary and other terms and conditions of the department funded teacher. In determining the employer for the purpose of the legislation in relation to agency workers, the legislation expressly provides that the party paying the worker is, for the purposes of the legislation, the employer. I think the school is in an analogous position. I do not accept that the chosen comparators have the same type of employment contract or relationship as the claimants with the school. To that extent, it seems to me that the Department has to be viewed as the employer of the chosen comparators for the purpose of the legislation."

[65] It might be noted that the decision in Catholic University School v. Dooley [2010] IEHC 496, [2011] 4 I.R. 517 was followed by Hedigan J. in Blackrock College v. Browne [2013] IEHC 607, (Unreported, High Court, Hedigan J., 20 December 2013). However, it should be said that the operative part of the judgment of Dunne J. in Catholic University School v. Dooley was concerned with whether the chosen comparators had the same type of employment contract. The court found that the Labour Court was in error in determining that the claimants in that case were entitled to choose a full-time Department funded teacher as a comparator. The clear and obvious comparator in that case was a full-time privately funded teacher. There was however no discrimination between those two groups. It is clear that the result in Catholic University School v. Dooley can be sustained without the conclusion that the Minister was the employer in that case. The analysis relating to the identity of the claimant's employer for the purposes of the Act was, to that extent, obiter, for the claim would have failed on the basis of the choice of an inappropriate comparator in any event.

[66] Having reviewed the relevant case law I now propose to analyse the issues which arise.

7. Analysis

[67] Counsel for the Minister did draw attention to the fact that different language was used by various decision-makers and courts to describe the legal nature of the relationship between Ms. Boyle and the Minister in the circumstances of this case. The Labour Court simply considered itself bound by the decision of the High Court in Catholic University School v. Dooley [2010] IEHC 496, [2011] 4 I.R. 517. O'Malley J., in the High Court in this case, concluded at para. 147, p. 54, that persons in a position such as Ms. Boyle "must be deemed" to be employed by the Minister. Hogan J., writing for the Court of Appeal, concluded that the relationship between the parties gave rise to an implied contract of employment in relation to pay related matters.

[68] I am not, however, convinced that too much turns on the different language used. In substance each of the tribunals or courts concerned were required to consider whether the relationship was such as to bring the Minister within the ambit of employer for the purposes of the 2001 Act. It seems to me to follow that the provisions of that Act must be central to any analysis. As noted earlier it is necessary, in order for a sustainable decision of breach of the 2001 Act to arise, that both the claimant and the comparator are employees and, in the case where, as here, the finding is made under s. 7(2)(a), that they are employees of the same or an associated employer. An employee is defined by reference to someone who has "a contract of employment". That term is in turn defined as being a contract of service or apprenticeship or, in circumstances not relevant to this case, certain situations arising in the context of employment agency.

[69] It follows, therefore, that in order for a claimant under the 2001 Act to succeed, at least in circumstances where reliance is placed on s. 7(2)(a), then that person must have a contract of service with the same employer as the comparator put forward.

[70] It seems to me to follow that the real question which arises is as to whether there is any sense in which it can be said that Ms. Boyle, and indeed the primary teacher comparator put forward, can be said to have a contract of service with the Minister. If that cannot be said to be the case as a matter of law, then it is clear that no finding of breach of the 2001 Act can properly be made in the circumstances of this case. The net question is, therefore, whether the unusual relationship which exists between a teacher, a board or committee of management and the Minister can properly be construed as involving, at least in part, a contract of service between a teacher and the Minister. In addition, there is the added question which arises where, as here, the Minister did not always pay the teacher directly but rather paid a grant to a school based on a calculation by reference to the teacher's salary, bearing in mind of course that this system was gradually phased out (see para. 29 above). Before going on to consider that question it is appropriate to look to the reasons why both the High Court and the Court of Appeal were satisfied that the Labour Court was correct to conclude as it did.

8. The decisions of the High Court and the Court of Appeal

[71] As noted previously, the decision of the High Court was delivered by O'Malley J. ([2015] IEHC 429, [2015] 26 E.L.R. 278). The trial judge began her analysis by reviewing the relevant authorities, including O'Keeffe v. Hickey [2008] IESC 72, [2009] 2 I.R. 302, Catholic University School v. Dooley [2010] IEHC 496, [2011] 4 I.R. 517, and the decision of this court in McEneaney v. Minister for Education [1941] I.R. 430. She went on to note that much of the focus in the authorities is on the relationship between the school management and the teacher. O'Malley J. states at pp. 310 and 311:-

> "130. … it is clear beyond argument that the former holds responsibility for hiring, discipline and dismissal. These aspects are the ones that are likely to give rise to issues of vicarious liability, since that is a concept that is related to control of an employee's behaviour. Questions as to the responsibility of the State for the actions of teachers have been answered in the light of this aspect of the triangular relationship."

[72] O'Malley J. then turned to the question of funding of the education system in Ireland, noting that this system is funded to a significant degree by the State. However, at p. 311, it is further noted that the State has a large degree of control over the conditions under which the funds it provides may be disbursed, particularly with regard to the paying of teachers' salaries:-

> "131. … [The State] sets the rules according to which it pays the salaries of teachers, where they are not paid out of privately sourced funds. Salaries will not be paid by the Department unless the teachers chosen by the management have the qualifications required by the Department, and unless the allocation of posts by the Department to the school in question permits appointments to be made. The rates of pay, including allowances for qualifications, posts of responsibility and so on, are negotiated by the Department in a collective bargaining process under the auspices of a statutory body (the Teaching Council) rather than being set by the individual school management bodies negotiating with individual teachers. In other words, the Department carries out, in respect of State funded teachers, the role normally carried out by an employer with regard to payment of employees."

[73] O'Malley J. further noted the point made above, in the context of the Employment Appeals Tribunal decision in Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] 9 E.L.R. 217, to the effect that the State now concedes that it is to be considered the employer for the purposes of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. O'Malley J. stated at p. 311:-

"132. … It is of course the case that the definitions in that Act are different to those under consideration, but the definition from the Payment of Wages Act … is premised on the concept of a person who is 'liable to pay the wages'. The Minister is, therefore, accepting that he is that person. This position is now confirmed by the provisions of the Education Act 1998 as amended, s. 24 of which provides for the powers of the Minister in relation to teachers' pay.

133. This, in my view, is one of the results of the unique tripartite arrangement in relation to education in this State. In relation to teachers whose salaries are paid by the State the role of employer is, uniquely, split. Part of it is played by the management of an individual school and part by the Department of Education. The former has the right to hire, discipline, dismiss and generally direct a teacher in the day-to-day running of the school. The Department, on the other hand, sets the rules about, and pays, the salaries. Since it thereby takes on what would normally be the rights of an employer in relation to pay, it follows, in my view, that it carries the legal duties of an employer associated with pay."

[74] Following this discussion, O'Malley J. went on to consider the factual reality of how the tripartite relationship between teacher, school and State operates. She stated at p. 312:-

"137. If the Department did not act in this manner, it is difficult to imagine how the school system could function. It is not just the sheer impracticality of making individual members of boards of management legally responsible for teachers' payment issues in State-funded schools – if that were the law, and it was known to be such by members of school boards, it would seem unlikely that they would be willing to act. The situation in this regard is as the Supreme Court [in McEneaney v. Minister for Education [1941] I.R. 430] saw it in 1940s Ireland, when it described the proposition put forward by the Minister as 'quite at variance with reality'. There is also the fact that the school boards, unlike other employers, do not have control over the salary rates paid to their employees. It is therefore difficult to see how they could be responsible for paying them. As Dunne J. said of the EAT decision in [Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] 9 E.L.R. 217], that case could hardly have been decided any other way, given the unlikelihood that a claim could be made against the school in relation to a matter controlled by the Department."

[75] Regarding the fact that Ms. Boyle was not employed in a school recognised under the Employment Act 1998, O'Malley J. did not consider this to support the Minister's contention that he was not Ms. Boyle's employer. She stated at p. 313:-

"140. … there is no legislation, or other rule of law, to prevent the Minister from entering into the kind of arrangement under which Ms Boyle was employed for over 20 years. During that time, she was paid at a rate determined by the Minister. In accordance with rules promulgated from time to time by the Minister, she was paid qualification allowances by the Department, put on a 12-month salary with provision for sick leave and maternity leave, put on an incremental scale, and, ultimately, paid redundancy. While she was still in employment the Department adopted a policy of phasing in direct payment to teachers in her position, rather than via the management committee. All of this is consistent with the legal responsibility of an employer for pay-related issues.

141. The Minister argues that Ms Boyle has no entitlement to a pension because she was not a national school teacher, and the pension scheme is limited to national school teachers. It seems to me that this is a matter that goes to the appropriateness of the remedy rather than Ms Boyle's substantive rights under the Act. If one accepts, as I do, that for the purposes of the Act she must be deemed to be employed by the Minister, then what she has to do is demonstrate that she has been treated less favourably than full-time employees who are doing comparable work within the definition of the Act. The Labour Court found in her favour on this aspect, and that finding is not challenged in these judicial review proceedings. The mere fact that she worked in a different type of establishment cannot in itself be a bar to redress, and the Minister would bear the burden of showing that there was objective justification for the different treatment" (emphasis in original).

[76] As a result of the foregoing, O'Malley J. concluded that school teachers whose salaries are publicly funded must be deemed, for the purposes of the 2001 Act, to be employed by the Minister for Education.

[77] The decision of the High Court was appealed to the Court of Appeal. As noted earlier, Hogan J. delivered the judgment of that court. Hogan J. engaged in a review of the jurisprudence concerning the tripartite relationship between teacher, school and the State. In particular, it might be noted that Hogan J., in considering McEneaney v. Minister for Education [1941] I.R. 430 and Fox v. Higgins (1912) 46 I.L.T.R. 222, referred, at para. 59, p. 20, to "a note of realism" in these early Supreme Court decisions "looking beyond the contractual formalities to the substance of that relationship".

[78] Following this review of the authorities, Hogan J. turned to consider the question of whether the Minister is an employer of Ms. Boyle for the purposes of the 2001 Act. At the outset, Hogan J. stated at p. 29 that there is no easy answer to that question:-

> "78. … Specifically, the nature of the triangular pact identified by Gibson J. in Fox v. Higgins (1912) 46 I.L.T.R. 222 over 100 years ago still defies any standard conceptual analysis, at least for the purposes of the general law of contract."

[79] Hogan J. went on to consider the fact that it is the Minister who pays the salary of the teacher and all other employment benefits. Furthermore, Hogan J. noted at para. 80, p. 30, that when the decision was taken in 2009 to cut the pay of public servants, it was not suggested that as teachers "were not employees of the Minister, the Oireachtas had no business in interfering with the contractual arrangements agreed between schools and their employees". Hogan J. went on to state at p. 30:-

> "81. That in itself should be a powerful practical indicator that the national school teachers are, indeed, employees of the Minister, at least for the purposes of pay-related issues arising from social and employment legislation such as the 2001 Act which has been enacted for the benefit of such employees. One might otherwise ask: why is the Minister engaged in the payment of these salaries and benefits for persons who are for all purposes the employees of others? This is scarcely gratuitous benevolence on the part of the Minister, but rather reflects an underlying reality which transcends the formal contract of employment between the school and its teachers."

[80] Hogan J. then turned to O'Malley J.'s analysis in the High Court with regard to how the triangular or tripartite relationship should be viewed in different legal contexts and in particular the practical division of labour between the board of management of a school and the Minister with regard to certain aspects of the employer/employee relationship – the management taking responsibility for the day-to-day running of the school and control of teachers in the discharge of their duties, and the Minister being responsible for the payment of salaries and the making of rules in that regard. Hogan J. noted that this division is not inconsistent with the conclusions of the majority of the Supreme Court in O'Keeffe v. Hickey [2008] IESC 72, [2009] 2 I.R. 302.

[81] Hogan J. went on at p. 34 to consider the somewhat unusual position of Ms. Boyle:-

> "87. It is true, of course, that the position of Ms. Boyle was slightly further removed from the Minister than that of the ordinary primary teacher. For most of the period of her employment, 98% of her salary was paid by the Minister to the school's management committee rather than to her directly. But even then this was just a method of payment which was in the course of being phased out by the Minister and was, over time, to be replaced by a system of direct payments by the Minister to the teachers concerned."

[82] Furthermore, Hogan J. noted that Hillside Park was not a recognised national school, but went on to state at p. 35:-

> "88. … Ms. Boyle's appointment and employment for over 20 years was nonetheless contingent on the approval and consent of the Minister and she was paid at a rate determined by the Minister in the manner envisaged by s. 24(2) of the 1998 Act (as amended). Furthermore, in accordance with rules promulgated from time to time by the Minister, she was paid qualification allowances by the Minister with provision for sick leave and maternity leave and was placed on an incremental scale."

[83] Hogan J. further noted in this regard that it was a decision of the Minister to withdraw funding for segregated Traveller pre-schools which ultimately led to the closure of Hillside, and which in turn brought about the termination of Ms. Boyle's employment. Furthermore, the Minister paid Ms. Boyle's redundancy.

[84] Hogan J. went on to record his approval of O'Malley J.'s comments in the context of the practical operation of the 2001 Act and the protections it affords employees. In particular, Hogan J. referred to the comments in the High Court judgment, which are quoted earlier, concerning the impracticality of making individual members of boards of management legally responsible for teachers' payment issues and the fact that, were the Minister's position to be accepted and were the Minister to set without justification rates of pay which are less favourable to part-time employees, the only redress available to such employees would be as against the school. Hogan J. concluded at pp. 36 and 37 in this regard:-

> "91. Viewed from these perspectives, it seems idle to deny that as a matter of reality the Minister was in substance the employer of Ms. Boyle, at least so far as matters relating to remuneration and employment legislation designed for the benefit of part-time employees such as the 2001 Act is concerned. It is true that there was no actual express contract of employment between the parties, but I find myself coerced to conclude in these circumstances that there must have been an implied contract of employment between the Minister and Ms. Boyle in relation to pay-related matters within the meaning of the definitions of 'contract of employment' and 'employee' contained in s. 3(1) of the 2001 Act.
> 92. It follows in turn that in view of that statutory definition that there must have been an implied contract of service between Ms. Boyle and the Minister in relation to pay-related matters. But this should not in itself be a surprising conclusion. If, for example, Ms. Boyle had not performed her teaching duties, could she have expected that the Minister would have been under a continuing obligation to pay her? Or, to take the example given by O'Malley J., if pay-rates had been introduced for part-time teachers which could not be objectively justified in comparison with the pay paid to full-time teachers, is to be said that the part-time teacher's only remedy was against the school? The very fact that the answers to these questions are so obviously in the negative illustrates in its own way why it would be unrealistic to conclude that there was anything other than an implied contract of service between these the Minister and the teacher, at least for pay-related matters in the context of the 2001 Act."

[85] Finally, Hogan J. compared the definitions of "employers" in the 1991 Act and the 2001 Act and in particular the lack of a deeming provision in the latter instance, as referred to earlier in this judgment. Hogan J. set out several reasons which he considered explain the difference between these two statutory definitions. First, he noted that the 1991 Act is a "particular, special" act, which is not necessarily to be construed in common with the 2001 Act. Hogan J. considered this view to be supported by the fact that the 2001 Act makes provision for the collective construction of several pieces of employment legislation, but does not refer to the 1991 Act. Secondly, Hogan J. stated at pp. 38 and 39 :-

> "97. It is clear that the deeming technique employed in the 1991 Act is not expressed to be general and all encompassing. It is rather more specific in its purpose and range: it is a deeming provision used for the purposes of the 1991 Act and for that purpose only. The fact that this artificial deeming technique was not replicated in the 2001 Act does not lead to the inexorable conclusion that there was no such implied contract of service between the Minister and the teacher for the purposes of the 2001 Act if the legal realities of the relationship between the parties in truth suggest otherwise."

[86] Finally, it is noted that the purpose of the 2001 Act, as set out in its long title, is to transpose a variety of EU directives. As such, the use of an artificial deeming technique in the earlier, purely national, piece of legislation should not be held to mean the 2001 Act, which was drafted in the context of the transposition of EU law, should be interpreted in light of the 1991 Act.

[87] Ultimately, Hogan J. concluded at pp. 39 and 40:-

"99. It is also true that all of this leads to the rather unsatisfactory conclusion – at least viewed from the perspective of orthodox principles of contract law – that Ms. Boyle had two employers and, furthermore, that whereas she had an express contract with the school, her contract with the Minister was merely implied. Nor is it satisfactory that Ms. Boyle must be regarded to be an employee of the Minister only for some purposes (such as, for example, availing of employment protections in matters relating to pay and remuneration contained in the 1991 Act and 2001 Act respectively) and not for others (such as vicarious liability as per O'Keeffe v. Hickey [2008] IESC 72, [2009] 2 I.R. 302). Yet any other conclusion seems at variance with the underlying realities and would represent the triumph of contractual formalism over the substance of employment rights. In the context of the employment rights conferred by the 2001 Act – which in turn sought to transpose an EU Directive designed to protect a group of vulnerable employees in relation, inter alios, to pay related matters – it is surely the substance of that employment relationship which should count."

[88] It should be noted that both the High Court and the Court of Appeal concluded that the Labour Court was not empowered to order that the Minister admit Ms. Boyle to the superannuation scheme. However, as this point was not pursued by Ms. Boyle on appeal to this court, the reasoning of the lower courts in this regard is not relevant for present purposes.

[89] In the light of those decisions the issue for this court really comes down to a question of whether the reasoning which led both the High Court and the Court of Appeal to conclude, in substance, that there was a contract for service between the Minister and Ms. Boyle was correct. I turn to that question.

9. Discussion

[90] It is important to recall, as noted earlier, that, in order for the decision of the Labour Court to be correct in law, it is necessary that both Ms. Boyle and the comparator teacher be regarded as employees of the Minister for the purposes of the 2001 Act. There are, of course, additional factors which arise in the case of Ms. Boyle which do not apply in the case of many teachers. So far as most teachers are concerned, the payment of their salary, as well as the fixing of its terms and conditions, is always actually done by the Minister. In the case of Ms. Boyle there was, at least when she was first employed and for a significant period, an added layer of distance. It is true that the grant paid by the Minister to Hillside Park covered almost all of Ms. Boyle's salary (98%) and that the grant in question went up and down by reference to the salary which someone in the position of Ms. Boyle might have been paid had she been a teacher paid in the ordinary way by the Minister (at least as the arrangements between the parties ultimately developed). Certainly, as a matter of form there is, therefore, a significant difference between her case and that of any teacher whose salary was at all times paid directly by the Minister, although, as has been noted above, this system of payment to the school as opposed to the teacher was phased out gradually over several years.

[91] It is also important to note that, while the particular arrangements which applied in Ms. Boyle's case were somewhat unusual, the issues which arise in this case have the potential to affect a much wider category of employment arrangement. There are a wide range of situations where, to a greater or lesser extent, a third party may be said to provide the funding for a contract of employment. Obviously the direct payment by the Minister of many teachers involves a particularly striking example. However, many employees in the health sector are, in effect, funded by Government with a greater or lesser degree of State control over terms and conditions. Likewise, charities or NGOs may provide funding which, in substance, allows for the payment of staff providing services which are considered to be of benefit to the aims of the organisation concerned. Again, the degree of control over financial terms and conditions may vary from case to case. Most third parties (including the State in this context) which provide funding are likely to at least impose some relatively detailed conditions as to the financial terms on which employees whose contracts may be funded out of a financial provision made are to be employed. Such funders are unlikely to give a blank cheque to the organisations which they support. There are likely, therefore, to be many cases where there is at least an indirect funding in substance of a contract of employment and a material measure of control by the funder over the financial terms and conditions of the contract of employment.

[92] Be that as it may, it is necessary also to analyse the particular features of the arrangements which applied in this case and which are relied on to support the suggestion that the practical reality of the situation was such that Ms. Boyle could be regarded as having had a contract of service with the Minister. It is true, as just noted, that as a matter of practical reality Ms. Boyle's salary was fixed by the Minister. However, that being said it is worth recording that there was evidence that other teachers involved in Traveller pre-school education, who were employed in schools run by Barnardos, were admitted to the general Barnardos pension scheme. Therefore, at the level of principle, the fact that Hillside Park did not provide for a pension for its sole teacher, Ms. Boyle, was dependent not on any rule or practice emanating from the Minister but rather on the fact that it would seem that Hillside Park did not have access to the same level of resources as were available to Barnardos. The lack of a pension scheme for Ms. Boyle was, therefore, more a matter of the resources available to Hillside Park rather than any issue connected with the Minister.

[93] As I understand the evidence, the resources made available by the Minister to Barnardos in respect of any individual teacher in a Traveller preschool context were the same as those available to Hillside Park. The difference stemmed from the fact that Barnardos had access to additional resources. It is possible, therefore, in my view, to exaggerate the extent to which all of the terms and conditions on the financial side which were applicable to Ms. Boyle can be said to have been definitively determined by the Minister. They were at least in material part influenced by the financial resources available to Hillside Park (or more accurately the lack of them) when compared to other similar employers.

[94] It also seems to me to be necessary to pay particular regard to what this court decided in O'Keeffe v. Hickey [2008] IESC 72, [2009] 2 I.R. 302. It is true that the specific legal issue which was under consideration in that case involved the question of whether the Minister or the State could be said to be vicariously liable for the wrongful acts of someone working in a school. But the reasoning of this court in that case was clear. It was accepted that the contract of the wrongdoer in question was with the management of the relevant school rather than with the Minister. While that finding was a means towards the end of determining whether vicarious liability arose, it was nonetheless an essential part of the reasoning of the court. I do not see any reason to depart from the rationale of O'Keeffe v. Hickey. Other questions might arise as to whether there might be any other basis, rather than through the route of a contract of employment, whereby wrongdoing on the part of a teacher might be visited on the State. Those issues do not arise in the circumstances of this case. Furthermore, as already noted, the wording of any particular statute may have the potential to impose a liability on persons who may not, strictly speaking, be an employer in the ordinary sense in which that term is used. However, O'Keeffe v. Hickey is clear and recent authority for the proposition that, in the ordinary way, it is the school management rather than the Minister who is taken to be the other party to a teacher's contract of employment.

[95] The question of other statutory regimes leads me next to consider the argument based on the fact that the Minister appears to have accepted rulings of other decision makers or courts which placed liability on the Minister in the context of the other statutory employment regimes to which reference has been made. However, in that context I am satisfied that there are, as counsel for the Minister pointed out, material differences in the wording of the relevant legislation which fixed the Minister with liability under that other legislation but which is different to the language used in the 2001 Act.

[96] As counsel noted, the 1998 Act in its definition of "respondent" includes a wide range of potential parties, including a person "who is responsible for providing the remuneration" or a person who is "alleged to be responsible for the victimisation". Thus, under the 1998 Act, a person may be a respondent even if not an employer as such.

[97] Likewise, the definition of "contract of employment", for the purposes of the 1991 Act, clearly includes any person "who is liable to pay the wages" of the relevant person.

[98] There are no similar provisions in the 2001 Act, and it does not seem to me that the ultimate conclusions which were reached under other legislation, differently worded, are of any particular weight in construing the definition of a contract of service for the purposes of this legislation. Indeed, the very fact that the legislator, in the 2001 Act, went so far as to provide one deeming provision (being that in respect of agency workers) is an indication that it was not intended that other categories of persons beyond those who can, as a matter of contract law properly construed, be regarded as an employer involved in a contract of service with a claimant, should come within the scope of the Act.

[99] On that basis I am satisfied that there is no inconsistency between the position which the Minister has adopted in respect of this legislation compared with the position which the Minister appears to accept applies under the other legislation in the employment field to which reference has been made. However, I would go further. Even if there were some inconsistency there must be significant limitations on the extent to which any such difference of approach on the part of a Minister could impact on the proper construction of a statute. Certainly, as a matter of statutory construction, the fact that an officer of the State has taken a different approach to the interpretation and application of two different statutes which are worded in the same fashion could not, of itself, require the court to take that fact into account in coming to a view as to what the legislation means.

[100] While it is not necessary to consider the point in this case because, for the reasons already identified, I am not satisfied that there is any inconsistency of approach, there might be questions as to whether a legitimate expectation might arise in some circumstances of that type although, here again, a party might run into difficulties such as those encountered in Wiley v. The Revenue Commissioners [1989] I.R. 350 where this court held that there could be no legitimate expectation to the effect that a previous error would be repeated.

[101] A contract of service is a term which has formed part of the law of contract for a very considerable period of time. It ordinarily refers to an employer as the person who can direct the way in which an individual providing services is to do their job. Its most important function, as a formal legal term, is to distinguish such arrangements from a so-called "contract for services" where an independent contractor agrees to provide services but not with the degree of control over the way in which they are to work which applies in the case of a contract of service.

[102] The ordinary meaning of the term "contract of service" implies an arrangement whereby one party agrees to work for the other and, subject to the terms of the contract, under the control of that person as to how they carry out their work. In its ordinary and natural meaning, and applying that definition to the facts of this case, it seems to me that Hillside Park was the other party to the contract for service with Ms. Boyle. It might theoretically be possible that a person might work under a contract for service where there were two parties on the other side as it were, although the absence of any examples is telling. Certainly the axiom that a man cannot serve two masters reflects much of the law as well as common sense. As with any contract, a contract for service ultimately depends on its terms both for its construction and for how it should properly be characterised. The real question is as to whether it is possible to say that the tripartite or triangular arrangement which applied in this case can properly, as a matter of law, be construed as involving the Minister as at least an employer of Ms. Boyle, for there is no basis on which it could be said that Hillside Park was not itself an employer. It should also be emphasised that any contract of service involves a reciprocal arrangement between employer and employee whereby the employee agrees to do work under the legitimate direction of the employer. It is accepted that, in the circumstances of this case, the Minister had no entitlement to direct the type of work which Ms. Boyle was to do.

[103] The Court of Appeal placed significant reliance on the fact that Hillside Park had no control over the financial terms and conditions applicable to Ms. Boyle's contract. For the reasons already analysed, I am not sure that that is quite as fully the case as the Court of Appeal appeared to consider. If, for example, to take the hypothetical case mentioned by Hogan J., the Minister sought to impose terms of employment concerning pay and financial conditions which were unlawful, then Hillside Park would not, in my view, have been obliged to impose those terms on Ms. Boyle. Rather it could have made clear to the Department that it was not willing so to do and that it would provide Ms. Boyle with lawful terms and conditions. If, in such a scenario, the Minister was not prepared to provide funding to permit Hillside Park to make whatever payments would have been required to comply with law then, of course, it might have been necessary for Hillside Park to bring Ms. Boyle's contract to an end. But in truth such a situation is no different than applies in the case of any grant-aided employment as, indeed, demonstrated by what actually happened in this case. As soon as grant aid provided under the former policy of segregated pre-school Traveller education was withdrawn, the school closed and Ms. Boyle was made redundant.

[104] All in all, I have come to the view that it is not possible to characterise the relationship between the Minister and Ms. Boyle in all the circumstances of this case as involving a contract of service to which the Minister was a party. To do so would involve an extension of the law of contract beyond any known boundaries. I accept that for various legal purposes, including statutory regimes, there may well be circumstances where a Minister may incur a liability in respect of persons whom a Minister chooses to pay directly or where the Minister is the effective paymaster even though the payment may be made by an intermediary. But each such case must be considered in the light of established legal principles applicable to the area in question. It is for that reason that the result may differ depending on the precise legal or statutory scheme under consideration.

[105] But in the context of this legislation and its reliance on the term "contract of service" (with only one, non-applicable, exception being in relation to agency workers), I think it would be stretching things much too far to suggest that there is a contract of service involving the Minister.

[106] I should finally touch on the issues of European law mentioned by the Court of Appeal. It is, of course, the case that this legislation is designed to transpose mandatory measures of European law into Irish law. However, there is no suggestion that this is a case where European law would mandate that Ms. Boyle would be entitled to succeed in these proceedings and that the only problem standing in her way is because of the wording of an Irish transposing measure. On the contrary, it is clear that Ms. Boyle would not be entitled to succeed in a case where Irish legislation exactly replicated EU law in this area. She could only succeed, if at all, because of what might be said to be a quirk in the Irish legislation. In that context I do not see that there is an EU dimension to this case at all.

10. Conclusions

[107] While there can be no doubt that the unusual tripartite or triangular relationship which exists between the Minister, a board or committee of management and a teacher in much of the Irish educational context gives rise to difficult questions concerning the proper interpretation or characterisation of that relationship for various legal purposes, I am, however, satisfied that this case comes down to one of deciding whether it can be said that the Minister is involved in a contract of service with Ms. Boyle.

[108] For the reasons analysed in this judgment I am not satisfied that the relationship between the parties can be so characterised. There are significant differences between the 2001 Act and other legislative regimes in which the Minister has been held to have been responsible in an employment context. Even on the facts of this case Ms. Boyle is somewhat more remote from the Minister than many teachers for she was not, at the time of her initial employment and for the vast majority of her time at the school, paid directly by the Minister but rather by Hillside Park out of a grant provided by the Minister. Other employees of a different employer supported by the same grant scheme provided their employees with improved terms and conditions in the form of access to a pension scheme. To make that point is not to criticise Hillside Park, for they just did not have the resources to provide enhanced terms. However, that possibility emphasises the fact that, even at the financial level, Ms. Boyle's terms and conditions were not, at the level of principle, wholly governed by the Minister.

[109] It being the case that the finding of the Labour Court was based, as it had to be, on a decision that Ms. Boyle was employed by the Minister, I can only conclude that the finding of the Labour Court was wrong in law and must be quashed.

[110] I would, therefore, allow the appeal and would hear counsel further on the precise order which should be made.

Caroline A. Carney, Barrister

Charles Mooney, Plaintiff v. An Post, Defendant [S.C. No. 132 of 1994]

Supreme Court 20th March, 1997

Employment - Dismissal - Natural Justice - Fair procedures - Criminal proceedings against employee - Employee acquitted - Employee dismissed - Whether entitled to oral hearing - Whether employee entitled to rely on acquittal in criminal case as answer to civil complaint - Whether dismissal in breach of fair procedures.

The plaintiff had been employed by the defendant as a postman for fifteen years. In 1984, the defendant received complaints about the plaintiff's conduct. Following investigations, criminal charges were proffered against the plaintiff. In 1985, the plaintiff was acquitted of all charges.

Following his acquittal, the plaintiff failed to answer certain queries raised by the defendant. The plaintiff sought the holding of an oral inquiry by the defendant into the allegations being made against him. The defendant refused to hold such an inquiry. The plaintiff was dismissed in 1987.

The plaintiff contended that he was entitled to rely upon his acquittal in the criminal case to defeat the civil complaint against him. He further argued that the dismissal was in breach of fair procedures in that he was entitled to have the matters of complaint investigated at an oral hearing before an independent chairman.

Held by the Supreme Court (Hamilton C.J., O'Flaherty and Barrington JJ.), in dismissing the appeal, 1, that it would be absurd if a party who had failed to establish a proposition beyond all reasonable doubt should, by that fact alone, be debarred from attempting to establish the same proposition on the balance of probabilities.

McGrath v. Commissioner of An Garda Síochána [1991] 1 I.R. 69, distinguished.

2. That, while an employee was entitled to the benefit of fair procedures, what they demanded depended upon the terms of his employment and the circumstances surrounding his proposed dismissal.

3. That the minimum the employee was entitled to expect was to be informed of the charge against him and to be given an opportunity to answer it and to make submissions.

4. That, while the plaintiff was not entitled to a hearing before the board of the defendant, nor to see the report of an investigating officer, it was clear that he did receive the benefits of fair procedures.

Glover v B.L.N. Ltd. [1973] I.R. 388; Gunn v. Bord an Choláiste Náisiúnta Ealaíne is Deartha [1990] 2 I.R. 168 considered.

5. That dismissal proceedings were not criminal proceedings and that it was not sufficient for a person in the position of the plaintiff to make no statement to the defendant concerning the matters alleged against him. To attempt to introduce the procedures of a criminal trial into an essentially civil proceeding served only to create confusion.

Appeal from the High Court.

The facts are summarised in the headnote and are fully set out in the judgment of Barrington J., infra.

By notice of appeal dated the 31st March, 1994, the plaintiff appealed the order of the High Court (Keane J.) which delivered its judgment in favour of the defendant on the 11th February, 1994, (H.C. Nos. 7308P of 1994 and 10482P of 1997). The appeal was heard by the Supreme Court (Hamilton C.J., O'Flaherty and Barrington JJ.) on the 14th February, 1997.

The facts

As appears from the judgment of the trial judge in the present case, the plaintiff was employed as a postman by the defendant and had been so employed for a period of fifteen years at the time of the events giving rise to these proceedings. Until the enactment of the Postal and Telecommunications Act, 1983, his status was that of a civil servant who could be dismissed at will by the Government. Under that Act, the control and operation of the national postal service was transferred from the Minister for Posts and Telegraphs to the defendant which was incorporated as a company under the Companies Acts, 1963 to 1991, pursuant to s. 9(1) of the Act. The Act of 1983 also provided that the plaintiff's terms and conditions of employment should continue to be regulated by the provisions of the Civil Service Regulation Act, 1956.

On the 27th March, 1984, a complaint was received from an employee of a haulage firm, Groupage Ltd., at Coolock industrial estate, that a postman had been seen acting suspiciously on waste ground at that company's property that morning. An investigation branch officer and a detective garda from Coolock garda station visited the premises. A number of badly mutilated postal packets as well as fragments of cheques and postal orders (made payable to the Irish Messenger) had been found earlier. At least 80 postal packets were involved.

On the 30th March, 1984, the haulage firm employee positively identified the plaintiff, after seeing approximately 100 postmen, as being the person whom she had seen acting suspiciously on the 27th March, 1984. She later made a signed statement to that effect. Part of the defendant's problem in this case was that this lady, Mrs. Gaughan did not, initially, wish to get involved in any proceedings which might be brought against the plaintiff and gave her co-operation in return for an undertaking that she would not be called upon to give evidence.

On the 4th April, 1984, the defendant, in order to check on suspicions which it now entertained concerning the plaintiff, prepared three test postal packets and had them placed among items due to be dealt with by the plaintiff. Two of these items were due for delivery by him and were delivered. The third item, containing two United States five dollar bills and addressed to the "Apostleship of Prayer" should have been rejected by the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not, however, reject it and this test item was never delivered and was never subsequently found.

The plaintiff was then interviewed by the defendant's investigating officer who described his attitude as "both aggressive and obstructive". This description has been criticised by counsel for the plaintiff on the grounds that the plaintiff clearly submitted to a search of his person and consented to a search of his home. It would appear however that the investigating officer was referring to the fact that the plaintiff denied all knowledge of the missing test packet and of the mistreated postal packets recovered from waste ground at Coolock on the 27th March, 1984, and when asked if he had been at the said waste ground on the day and time referred to replied that he could not "remember back to yesterday week".

The plaintiff did however agree to take part in an identification parade, and on the 4th April, 1984, he was identified at an identification parade by another employee of the haulage company, Groupage Ltd., as being the person he had seen on the 27th March, 1984, in the vicinity of the waste ground where the mistreated postal packets were discovered. This employee however refused to place his hand on the plaintiff's shoulder at the identification parade because of the fact that both men lived in the same area.

Later on the 26th October, 1984, and the 8th November, 1984, statements were obtained by an investigation officer from two further employees of Groupage Ltd. who had initially refused to co-operate in the investigation but who said that they had observed a postman on the waste ground in question on the 27th March, 1984. One of these employees stated that he saw a postman acting in a suspicious manner at the waste ground and that he had a bunch of envelopes in his hand and that he had moved away when the witness approached. Another of these employees said he had seen a postman tearing up papers on the date in question.

On the 18th December, 1985, the plaintiff was acquitted by a jury of all charges arising out of the complaints in these proceedings.

A protracted correspondence took place between the plaintiff and his solicitors on the one part and the defendant and its solicitors on the other part. This correspondence is set out in considerable detail in the judgment of the learned trial judge. In the course of the correspondence the defendant made perfectly clear to the plaintiff the nature of the allegations against him and the general nature of the evidence on which it was based. They furnished him with copies of written statements which they had received from witnesses but with the names of the witnesses deleted. The plaintiff also had the book of evidence prepared for his trial. The defendant offered him an opportunity to make a statement or representations and warned him that, in the absence of any explanation from him, it might draw adverse inferences from the evidence already in its possession. The plaintiff and his solicitor, on the other hand, while denying the charges, concerned themselves with procedural matters and demanded an inquiry presided over by an independent chairman and an oral hearing at which the plaintiff would be entitled to cross-examine through counsel any person prepared to give evidence against him. The defendant refused to grant such an oral hearing but did offer to meet the plaintiff and his solicitor in the presence of the investigating officer and to discuss the evidence against the plaintiff and to hear any reply or any representations that he might wish to make. The plaintiff did not take up this offer.

As already stated the correspondence between the parties was protracted and was analysed by the learned trial judge. Nevertheless one should refer to some salient letters. On the 13th January, 1986, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff in the following terms:-

"Dear Mr. Mooney,

It is proposed to recommend to the Board of this company that you be dismissed from your post as postman.

As a result of detailed investigations, we are of the opinion that you wilfully mistreated postal packets on the 27th March, 1984, at Coolock industrial estate. This opinion is based on the statements of four people who worked on the estate. We are also of the opinion that you were responsible for the disappearance of a postal packet addressed to the Apostleship of Prayer, 37 Leeson Street, St. Stephen's Green, containing two American five dollars bills on the 3rd April, 1984. This opinion is based on statements made by members of the staff of this company.

In order to afford you an opportunity of furnishing any further explanation or making any representations you wish to offer or make, no further action will be taken by us for a period of fourteen days.

Yours faithfully,"

On the 17th September, 1986, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors, a letter headed:-

"Re: Charles Mooney.

Dear Sir,

Please refer to your letter of the 8th July, 1986, about the above.

Before proceeding further with this matter we are prepared to give Mr. Mooney and his legal representatives an opportunity of meeting company management concerned in the case so that he can seek clarification of any points of which he may be in doubt and to respond in any way he may wish to the points put to him in my letter of the 13th January, 1986. I should mention that we will arrange to have Mr. J. Cosgrave present at any meeting which might take place. Mr. Cosgrave is the officer who carried out the investigations into the case and is fully familiar with all aspects of it.

If you wish such a meeting to take place perhaps you would ring me to arrange a mutually convenient time and date.

Yours sincerely,

R. Bergin,

Head of Personnel Services."

The plaintiff not having taken up this offer, the defendant wrote again on the 30th December, 1986, in the following terms:-

"Re: Charles Mooney.

Dear Sir,

Please refer to your letter of the 14th November, 1986, about the above.

We will meet Mr. Mooney and his legal representatives and will be prepared to listen to matters which they and any other relevant persons may wish to place before us. As frequently pointed out before the matter of Mr. Mooney's dismissal is now in question but insofar as you wish to say anything about his suspension we would be prepared to listen to and consider those matters as well.

We will arrange for Mr. Joseph Cosgrave, the officer who investigated the matter to attend so that he may give assistance as required.

I am satisfied that your client is being afforded a fair opportunity to make all appropriate representations and inquiries by means of the above procedure. I am concerned that this matter should, in fairness to your client and An Post, go ahead at the earliest opportunity.

Please contact me so that a suitable early date can be arranged upon which the above hearing can be held.

If I do not hear from you within twenty-one days I would be obliged to consider Mr. Mooney's case and if I consider Mr. Mooney should be dismissed, so recommend, without having your further assistance in the matter.

Yours sincerely,

R. Bergin, Head of Personnel."

No reply having been received to the above letter, the Board of the defendant at its meeting on the 4th March, 1987, decided to dismiss the plaintiff from his employment.

On the 15th April, 1987, the defendant in response to a query from the plaintiff's solicitors wrote as follows:-

"Dear Sirs,

I refer to your letter dated the 31st March, 1987. In the letter of the 13th January, 1986, An Post sought your client's explanation in relation to a number of matters. No satisfactory explanation was received and your client was dismissed by the Board of An Post for the matters set out in that letter.

Yours faithfully,"

Findings of fact

On the evidence before him the learned trial judge made certain findings of fact. He held:-

1. That there was not the slightest doubt that the plaintiff was informed by the defendant fully and accurately of the charges against him.
2. That the plaintiff was afforded an ample opportunity to adduce evidence and to make representations.
3. That the defendant took into account any representations made by or on behalf of the plaintiff.

There was ample evidence to support all these findings of fact and none of them can be impeached in this court.

Legal issues

There are only two issues in the present case which create any difficulty. These are whether the plaintiff was entitled to rely upon his acquittal in the criminal case to defeat the civil complaint against him and, secondly, whether, in all the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff was entitled to have the matters of complaint investigated at an oral hearing before an independent chairman.

Plaintiff's acquittal on criminal charges

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that his contention that the plaintiff's acquittal on the criminal charges was a sufficient answer to the civil complaints was supported by the decision of this court in McGrath v. Commissioner of An Garda Síochána [1991] 1 I.R. 69.

McGrath v. Commissioner of An Garda Síochána was an application by way of judicial review for an order of prohibition. The applicant, a member of An Garda Síochána, was charged before the District Court with embezzlement of three sums of money received by him by virtue of his employment, contrary to s. 17(2)(b) of the Larceny Act, 1916. The charges related to three sums of money paid to him on foot of court orders imposing fines. The applicant admitted that he had not issued official receipts for any of those payments; as a result, the orders have been returned to the District Court as unexecuted and persons who had paid their fines had been in peril of being imprisoned on foot of those orders. While the applicant had not issued official receipts for the fines it would appear that, in at least some cases, he had issued unofficial receipts.

He was returned for trial before the Circuit Court and was acquitted by a jury on all three charges. He subsequently received notification that he was to be charged with breaches of garda discipline, including three charges of corrupt or improper practice; the particulars alleged failure to account for the three sums of money which were the subject matter of the criminal charges.

The applicant applied by way of judicial review for an order prohibiting the respondent from holding an inquiry into the alleged breaches of discipline.

It appears that some of the breaches of discipline alleged against the applicant arose out of the mere fact that he had been charged in court with embezzlement. In the High Court, Lynch J. held that such a complaint could not lie because any disgruntled person could bring charges against a member of An Garda Síochána and no matter how emphatic the acquittal, the fact that such proceedings had been brought could be alleged to be a breach of discipline. He found such a proposition to be so untenable as to merit granting an order of prohibition in relation to those charges. He also granted an order of prohibition against charges alleging "corrupt practice" though he allowed charges alleging "improper practices" to stand.

The Commissioner did not appeal against so much of the order of Lynch J. as had granted an absolute prohibition against proceeding with the charges of breach of discipline based on the mere fact of having been charged. It is clear however that the fact that such oppressive charges had been brought influenced the attitude of the Supreme Court towards the balance of the case.

The Commissioner did appeal against so much of the order of Lynch J. as had prohibited him from proceeding with charges of "corrupt" as distinct from "improper" practices. The Supreme Court rejected this appeal partly because it doubted if the facts disclosed could support a charge of "corrupt" practices. But the judgment of Hederman J. (who delivered the principal judgment in the case) also contains (at p. 72) the following significant passage:-

> "The hearing of the alleged breaches of discipline before the disciplinary inquiry would seek to repeat the same ground as in the criminal trial. It was conceded by counsel for the respondent that this had never been done in practice in the past and could not be done under the new regulations in the future: See reg. 38 of the Garda Síochána (Discipline) Regulations, 1989, (S.I. No. 94) - in force from the 1st June, 1989, but not applicable to the present proceedings by virtue of reg. 5 thereof which deals with proceedings which were commenced and which had not been concluded before the commencement of those Regulations."

Hederman J. went on to find at p. 74 that for "this member of the garda" to be tried again before a disciplinary tribunal on charges identical to those in respect of which he had been acquitted by a jury would "having regard to the narrow purview within which the inquiry must be held ... involve a form of unfair and oppressive procedures which calls for the intervention of the Court". He added "I expressly abstain from finding that there is any question of res judicata."

Finlay C.J. concurring in the judgment of Hederman J. stressed that to permit the garda investigation to proceed into a complaint of corrupt practices would "in the particular circumstances of this case amount to an unfair procedure".

Griffin and McCarthy JJ. agreed with these conclusions. McCarthy J. went on to add at p. 75:-

> "Lest it be considered that acquittal on a criminal charge necessarily precludes a disciplinary investigation into the facts arising out of which a criminal charge was brought I reject such a proposition."

The learned trial judge therefore was right in concluding that McGrath v. Commissioner of An Garda Síochána [1991] 1 I.R. 69, was not a precedent to which the plaintiff in the present case could usefully appeal. Moreover and even assuming the employer in the present case and the prosecutor in the criminal trial were the same person, it would be absurd if a party who had failed to establish a proposition beyond all reasonable doubt should, by that fact alone, be debarred from attempting to establish the same proposition on the balance of probabilities.

Oral hearing

Two passages which appear in the judgments in Gunn v. Bord An Choláiste Náisiúnta Ealaíne is Deartha [1990] 2 I.R. 168, have caused difficulties to trial judges in that they cast doubt on the relevance to Irish law of the speech of Reid L.J. in Ridge v. Baldwin [1964] A.C. 40 and on the reasoning of Kenny J. in Glover v. B.L.N. Ltd. [1973] I.R. 388.

The first is a passage which appears in the judgment of Walsh J. (at p. 181) reads as follows:-

> "There is one other matter I wish to refer to, to clear up what appears to be misapprehension concerning the application of the rules of natural justice or of constitutional justice. The application of these rules does not depend upon whether the person concerned is an office holder as distinct from being an employee of some other kind. I mention this because it is a subject which is referred to in the course of the judgment of the learned judge of the High Court in his reference to Glover v. B.L.N. Ltd. [1973] I.R. 388. The quality of justice does not depend on such distinctions."

The second is that of McCarthy J. which appears at p. 183 and reads as follows:-

> "I share the view of Walsh J. that, in the absence of any particular prescribed procedure, the principles of natural justice or constitutional justice would govern the relationship between the plaintiff and An Bord. These principles are not the monopoly of any particular class."

The third member of the court, Griffin J. agreed with both of these judgments.

It has been said that, because the Supreme Court held that the plaintiff in that case was in fact an office holder that the passages quoted were in fact obiter. But the purpose of the passages was to emphasise that the difference between employee and office holder was not the determining issue as to whether the principles of natural and constitutional justice applied. Certainly the court appears to have gone out of its way to emphasise this point. It appears to me that what the court was saying is that society is not divided into two classes one of whom - office holders - is entitled to the protection of the principles of natural and constitutional justice and the other of whom - employees - is not. Dismissal from one's employment for alleged misconduct with possible loss of pension rights and damage to one's good name, may, in modern society, be disastrous for any citizen. These are circumstances in which any citizen, however humble, may be entitled to the protection of natural and constitutional justice.

The terms natural and constitutional justice are broad terms and what the justice of a particular case will require will vary with the circumstances of the case. Indeed two of the best known precepts of natural and constitutional justice may not be applicable at all in certain cases. As the learned trial judge has pointed out the principle of nemo judex in sua causa seldom applies in relation to a contract of employment where the employer judges the issue and is an interested party. Likewise it is difficult to apply, to a contract of employment, the principle of audi alteram partem which implies the existence of an independent judge who listens first to one side and then to the other.

If the contract or the statute governing a person's employment contains a procedure whereby the employment may be terminated, it usually will be sufficient for the employer to show that he has complied with this procedure. If the contract or the statute contains a provision whereby an employee is entitled to a hearing before an independent board or arbitrator before he can be dismissed then clearly that independent board or arbitrator must conduct the relevant proceedings with due respect to the principles of natural and constitutional justice. If however the contract (or the statute) provides that the employee may be dismissed for misconduct without specifying any procedure to be followed, the position may be more difficult.

Certainly the employee is entitled to the benefit of fair procedures but what these demand will depend upon the terms of his employment and the circumstances surrounding his proposed dismissal. Certainly the minimum he is entitled to is to be informed of the charge against him and to be given an opportunity to answer it and to make submissions.

It is significant that in Gunn v. Bord an Choláiste Náisiúnta Ealaíne is Deartha [1990] 2 I.R. 168, Walsh J. dealing with the submission that the dismissal of the plaintiff was effected by means of a procedure which violated the plaintiff's rights to fair procedures stated at p. 179:-

> "With regard to the submissions the first thing to be observed is that the statute itself provided no procedures for dismissals, and therefore no question of any departure from any procedure laid down by statute arises. If no other procedure were provided then the matter would have to be judged in the light of the circumstances which attended the dismissal, and it is quite clear that persons cannot be dismissed from what is in effect public office by a procedure which did not inform them of the grounds of their dismissal or afford them an adequate opportunity to rebut, or attempt to rebut, any accusations of misconduct which would justify a dismissal."

This passage re-echoes a passage from the judgment of Walsh J. in Glover v. B.L.N. Ltd. [1973] I.R. 388 at p. 425, where he said:-

"The plaintiff was neither told of the charges against him nor was he given any opportunity of dealing with them before the board of directors arrived at its decision to dismiss him. In my view this procedure was a breach of the implied term of the contract that the procedure should be fair, as it cannot be disputed, in the light of so much authority on the point, that failure to allow a person to meet the charges against him and to afford him an adequate opportunity of answering them is a violation of an obligation to proceed fairly."

In the present case the plaintiff was employed by the defendant on the same terms as those on which he had formerly been employed by the Government. Formerly he held office at the will of the Government and could have been dismissed by the Government. If however he were to be dismissed for misconduct he would have been entitled to know what the charges against him were and to have had an opportunity to answer those charges. On the other hand, he would never have been entitled to a hearing by the Government nor could he complain if the Government had acted, as no doubt it would have acted, not only on the evidence in the case but also on the report of one of its inspectors. He would not, normally, have been entitled to see the report of the Government's investigating officer and neither is he, in the circumstances of the present case, entitled to a hearing before the board of the defendant or to see the report of the investigation officer. On the other hand, it is clear from the findings of the trial judge that he has received the benefits of the fair procedures referred to in the passages quoted above from the judgments of Walsh J.

The matter however does not rest there. The plaintiff claims that he is entitled to the benefit of an oral hearing before an independent arbitrator and to cross-examine, by counsel, those prepared to give evidence against him. This claim calls for a closer examination of the nature of the plaintiff's employment and of the circumstances surrounding his dismissal.

The plaintiff was a postman which is a position of trust. The defendant received complaints which caused it to have misgivings about the integrity of the postal service and about the conduct of the plaintiff. It appears to me that the defendant was entitled to expect a candid response from the plaintiff when they put these misgivings to him and that it was not sufficient for the plaintiff simply to deny responsibility and to say that he could not "remember back to yesterday week".

On the 4th April, 1984, the plaintiff made a statement to the gardaí in the following form:-

> "I have been cautioned that I am not obliged to make a statement or to answer any question and that anything I do say would be taken down in writing and may be given in evidence. I understand that. I have given Detective Sergeant McLoughlin permission to carry out a search of my house and that's the only statement I want to make."

It was of course the plaintiff's right to remain silent while the criminal proceedings were hanging over him. But the plaintiff was acquitted on the 18th December, 1985, and from then until the date of his dismissal on the 4th March, 1987, the plaintiff made no further statement concerning the matters alleged against him. The plaintiff raised no issue of fact which needed to be referred to a civil tribunal. It is important to emphasise that the dismissal proceedings were not criminal proceedings and it was not sufficient for a person in the position of the plaintiff simply to fold his arms and say:-

> "I'm not guilty. You prove it."

To attempt to introduce the procedures of a criminal trial into an essentially civil proceeding serves only to create confusion.

It is necessary also to consider the position of the defendant. It was not in a position to set up an independent tribunal with power to subpoena witnesses even had it wished to do so. At the same time it had received serious complaints from members of the public touching the integrity of the postal services. The defendant could not responsibly ignore these complaints even though the members of the public did not wish to become involved before any court or tribunal. Under these circumstances it appears to me that the defendant was entitled to receive a proper explanation from the plaintiff and that they did not receive it.

What happened in the High Court in the present case can have no effect upon the validity of the disciplinary proceedings conducted by the defendant. It is however interesting to note that the plaintiff did not give evidence in the High Court. Mrs. Gaughan, on the other hand, dropped her cloak of anonymity and she gave evidence in accordance with her statement that the plaintiff was the postman she had seen attempting to dispose of a letter on waste ground at Coolock on the 27th March, 1984. She was not cross-examined.

I would dismiss the appeal.

Court of Appeal 29 March 2017

Employment – Equality – Discrimination – Equality claim and personal injuries claim arising from same facts – Statutory provisions – Rule in Henderson v. Henderson – Whether claim before Equality Tribunal precluded common law claim for personal injuries – Employment Equality Act 1998 (No. 21), ss. 77(1) and 101(1) and (2).

Practice and procedure – Striking out proceedings – Abuse of process – Multiplicity of proceedings – Whether claim before Equality Tribunal precluded common law claim for personal injuries – Whether personal injuries claim arising from same underlying facts as equality claim an abuse of process – Whether plaintiff abusing process of court by raising issues that had been or could have been raised before statutory tribunal.

Section 77(1) of the Employment Equality Act 1998, as amended, provides:-

"A person who claims-

(a) to have been discriminated against or subjected to victimisation,

(b) to have been dismissed in circumstances amounting to discrimination or victimisation,

(c) not to be receiving remuneration in accordance with an equal remuneration term, or

(d) not to be receiving a benefit under an equality clause,

in contravention of this Act may, subject to subsections (3) to (9), seek redress by referring the case to the Director."

Section 101 of the 1998 Act, as amended, provides inter alia:-

"(1) If an individual has instituted proceedings for damages at common law in respect of a failure, by an employer or any other person, to comply with an equal remuneration term or an equality clause, then, if the hearing of the case has begun, the individual may not seek redress (or exercise any other power) under this Part in respect of the failure to comply with the equal remuneration term or the equality clause, as the case may be.

(2) Where an individual has referred a case to the Director … under section 77(1) and either a settlement has been reached by mediation or the Director … has begun an investigation under section 79, the individual—

(a) shall not be entitled to recover damages at common law in respect of the case …"

The plaintiff was a former employee of the defendant. He contended that during his employment he had been subjected to bullying, victimisation and isolation at work and that as a consequence he had been left with psychological and physiological symptoms.

The plaintiff made a complaint to the Equality Tribunal pursuant to the provisions of the 1998 Act, stating that he was subject to discriminatory treatment for several years, which culminated in a constructive dismissal. The plaintiff subsequently issued High Court proceedings in which he sought damages for personal injuries arising from his employment.

The plaintiff's complaint before the Equality Tribunal was heard and was rejected. Subsequently, by motion on notice, the defendant sought to have the plaintiff's personal injuries proceedings in the High Court struck out as an abuse of process or for being a duplication of the plaintiff's case before the Equality Tribunal.

The High Court (Kearns P.) considered that to allow the plaintiff to proceed with his common law claim would be to breach the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 and would also fail to give effect to the intention of the legislature in relation to s. 101(2)(a) of the 1998 Act. Accordingly, the plaintiff's personal injuries claim was dismissed (see [2015] IEHC 46).

The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Held by the Court of Appeal (Peart, Irvine and Hogan JJ.), in allowing the appeal, 1, that s. 101 of the 1998 Act served to bar complementary claims for discrimination before the Equality Tribunal and at common law in respect of claims based on failure to comply with an equal remuneration term or an equality clause. It did not bar subsequent personal injuries claims per se where an earlier discrimination claim before the Equality Tribunal had failed.

2. That it was necessary when considering the meaning of s. 101 of the 1998 Act to give it a holistic interpretation, applying the interpretive principle of noscitur a sociis. The phrase "entitled to recover damages at common law in respect of the case" in s. 101(2) of the Act was referable back to the language of s. 101(1), i.e. a claim at common law in respect of the failure to comply with an equal remuneration claim or an equality clause.

The People (Attorney-General) v. Kennedy [1946] I.R. 517 applied.

3. That the rule in Henderson v. Henderson required that the plaintiff must have been able to have brought forward his claim in the second proceedings in the first proceedings, and this rule was not automatically applicable in the special case of separate claims required to be made under a statutory scheme on the one hand and at common law on the other, even where both claims arose from the same set of underlying facts.

Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 applied. S.M. v. Ireland [2007] IESC 11, [2007] 3 I.R. 283 considered.

4. That the plaintiff could not have combined a common law claim for personal injuries along with the statutory claim for discrimination in the one set of proceedings. Just as the Equality Tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain the common law claim, the High Court had no first instance jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the statutory claim for discrimination or harassment under the 1998 Act.

Obiter dictum, per Hogan J.: It would be open to the court of trial to determine that a subsequent personal injuries claim – or, at least, parts of that claim – should fail on the ground that it amounted in substance to a collateral attack on a decision of the Equality Tribunal.

Appeal from the High Court

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of Hogan J., infra.

In September 2009, the plaintiff made a complaint to the Equality Tribunal pursuant to the provisions of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2008. In February 2011, whilst that claim was in being, the plaintiff issued a personal injuries summons in the High Court against the defendant.

The plaintiff's case before the Equality Tribunal was rejected on 14 August 2014.

By notice of motion dated 28 July 2014, the defendant sought an order striking out the plaintiff's proceedings before the High Court as an abuse of process or duplication of the plaintiff's equality claim against the defendant. By order dated 6 February 2015, the High Court (Kearns P.) struck out the plaintiff's claim for personal injuries (see [2015] IEHC 46).

By notice of appeal dated 4 March 2015, the plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal from the order dismissing his claim for personal injuries.

By order of 12 January 2016, the Court of Appeal granted liberty to the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission to appear as amicus curiae.

The appeal was heard by the Court of Appeal (Peart, Irvine and Hogan JJ.) on 9 March 2017.

Michael Forde S.C. (with him Timothy F. Sheehan) for the plaintiff.

[3] Few issues have dominated our law of civil procedure over the last two decades or so as have those arising from a multiplicity of litigation. The law reports from this recent period are teeming with examples of where the courts have been obliged to wrestle with issues of res judicata, issue estoppel per rem judicatam, the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 and abuse of process.

[4] This appeal presents a slightly different version of this problem of the multiplicity of litigation in different fora: can a plaintiff present a complaint of discrimination in the workplace before the Equality Tribunal on the grounds of harassment, victimisation and exclusion from the body of workplace and then, in the event that this complaint should prove unsuccessful, ultimately sue the employer for personal injuries arising out of the same alleged set of facts? In the High Court Kearns P. considered that this multiplicity of litigation was per se abusive and violated the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100. He accordingly struck out the personal injuries proceedings as an abuse of process: see Culkin v. Sligo County Council [2015] IEHC 46 (Unreported, High Court, Kearns P., 6 February 2015). The plaintiff now appeals to this court against that decision. Before exploring these issues it is, however, first necessary to set out the background to the litigation.

[5] The plaintiff is a retired engineer who was employed by Sligo County Council ("the Council") in various capacities over a period of 39 years. He had first commenced work with the Council as an apprentice technician in 1970. He attained two diplomas in engineering during the course of his employment, together with an undergraduate engineering degree. The plaintiff was promoted a number of times until he reached the rank of senior executive technician. The plaintiff contends that he began experiencing difficulties at work in or around 1996 when a new supervisor was appointed.

[6] His case against the Council was that he was subjected to bullying, victimisation and isolation at work. It was thus claimed that information regarding training courses and opportunities was deliberately withheld from him; that malicious rumours were spread about him; that he was ordered to perform tasks below his level of competence; that he was excluded and isolated socially; that he was denied pay increments and promotion opportunities; that his opinions and views were neglected despite his experience, and that he was generally treated with hostility. The plaintiff alleged that this behaviour has left him suffering with a number of psychological and physiological symptoms.

[7] The plaintiff retired from the Council in May 2009. On 10 September 2009 the plaintiff made a complaint to the Equality Tribunal pursuant to the provisions of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2008. The plaintiff's complaint form to the Equality Tribunal states that he was subject to discriminatory treatment in relation to "access to employment, promotion/regrading, training, conditions of employment, discriminatory dismissal [and] victimisation", culminating in a constructive dismissal. After completing his engineering degree in 2005, the plaintiff applied for a number of engineering positions only to be deemed "not qualified" for promotion. He complained that he was continuously frustrated in his attempts to obtain relevant engineering experience within the Council because of his age and his disability, which he contends was induced by historic bullying and harassment. He instituted a grievance procedure in early 2000 but states that this was unsatisfactorily concluded in 2005 following "gross procrastination". It is the plaintiff's position that the respondent failed to deal appropriately with systematic bullying and exclusion until he was ultimately constructively dismissed in May 2009.

[8] The plaintiff also pursued a personal injuries case in addition to his equality complaint. He accordingly obtained an authorisation from the Personal Injuries Assessment Board in relation to his High Court proceedings on 19 November 2010 and a personal injuries summons against the Council issued on 2 February 2011.

[9] The plaintiff's case before the Equality Tribunal was heard on 25 July 2012, 9 April 2013, 10 April 2013, 26 June 2013 and 21 July 2014. Mr. John Moran, senior executive officer in the defendant Council, has stated on affidavit that a preliminary submission was made to the Equality Tribunal expressing the Council's view that the matters before the Equality Tribunal were the same as those being pursued in the High Court proceedings and that the plaintiff was precluded from pursuing both claims.

[10] Mr. Moran averred that rather than seeking to have the matter before the Equality Tribunal adjourned however, the plaintiff requested that the equality officer nonetheless continue to hear the case. This may well be so, but it should also be noted that this issue does not appear to feature in the decision of the Equality Tribunal dated 14 August 2014. In any event, this issue is fundamentally an issue of law and is governed by the interaction of the relevant statutory provisions (namely ss. 77 and 101 of the Employment Equality Act 1998 ("the 1998 Act")) with standard legal principles such as res judicata and the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100.

The relevant statutory provisions

[11] It is next necessary to examine the relevant statutory provisions. The procedure for making a complaint to the Equality Tribunal is governed by the 1998 Act, as amended. Section 77(1) of the 1998 Act provides:-

> "A person who claims-
>
> (a) to have been discriminated against or subjected to victimisation,
>
> (b) to have been dismissed in circumstances amounting to discrimination or victimisation,
>
> (c) not to be receiving remuneration in accordance with an equal remuneration term, or
>
> (d) not to be receiving a benefit under an equality clause,
>

[12] Section 101 of the 1998 Act addresses the question of alternative avenues of redress and provides as follows:-

> "(1) If an individual has instituted proceedings for damages at common law in respect of a failure, by an employer or any other person, to comply with an equal remuneration term or an equality clause, then, if the hearing of the case has begun, the individual may not seek redress (or exercise any other power) under this Part in respect of the failure to comply with the equal remuneration term or the equality clause, as the case may be.

(2) Where an individual has referred a case to the Director … under section 77(1) and either a settlement has been reached by mediation or the Director … has begun an investigation under section 79, the individual-

(a) shall not be entitled to recover damages at common law in respect of the case, and

(b) if he or she was dismissed before so referring the case, shall not be entitled to seek redress (or to exercise, or continue to exercise, any other power) under the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 1993 in respect of the dismissal, unless the Director … having completed the investigation and in an appropriate case, directs otherwise and so notifies the complainant and the respondent."

The High Court judgment [2015] IEHC 46

[13] In his judgment Kearns P. placed particular emphasis on the earlier judgment of Hedigan J. in Cunningham v. Intel Ireland Limited [2013] IEHC 207, [2013] 24 E.L.R. 233. In Cunningham v. Intel Ireland Limited [2013] IEHC 207, the plaintiff had instituted a claim for discrimination against the defendant in relation to access to employment, promotion and regrading, conditions of employment, and harassment. The Equality Tribunal rejected the complaint and, as in the present case, an appeal to the Labour Court was pending at the time of the application before Hedigan J. It was claimed that the same events caused the alleged personal injury and the defendant objected to having to defend the same claim in two sets of proceedings. Hedigan J. stated that all matters and issues arising from the same set of facts or circumstances must be litigated in the one set of proceedings save for special circumstances. The judge held at p. 237:-

"10. … it is clear from her own pleadings and submissions in the two sets of proceedings that both her employment claim and her personal injury claim arise out of the same matters, i.e. alleged mistreatment in her working environment. This, she alleges, commenced on the announcement of her pregnancy, continued through her commencement of maternity leave, through that leave and culminated in her dissatisfaction with the way she was treated on her return to work.

The plaintiff in issuing these personal injury proceedings after her employment equality complaints, in my view, drew an artificial distinction which does not stand up to analysis.

11. In terms of the reliefs sought, the claim in the personal injury proceedings is for compensation for the stress and the health problems arising therefrom. It is clear that such a remedy may be awarded by the Labour Court in the employment equality proceedings …

12. Thus the plaintiff is not precluded from recovering compensation in the Labour Court in respect of the personal injury she alleges she has suffered. Moreover, the defendant herein has stated unequivocally in open court in this application that they will not oppose the plaintiff bringing into her claim before the Labour Court her complaints dating from her announcement of her pregnancy."

[14] Having referred with approval to the reasoning in Cunningham v. Intel Ireland Ltd. [2013] IEHC 207, Kearns P. proceeded to state at pp. 9 to 11:-

"I have carefully considered the relevant statutory provisions and the submissions of both parties and am satisfied that the plaintiff's personal injuries proceedings must be dismissed. The rule in Henderson v Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 is well established and is frequently applied as part of the policy of the courts to avoid double litigation of the same issues, as considered by the Supreme Court in A.A. v. Medical Council [2003] 4 I.R. 302. This rule is in the interests of all parties to a case, who should not be expected to prosecute or defend the same proceedings repeatedly, and to the public, who have an interest in ensuring that court time is not wasted.

The plaintiff in these proceedings issued a complaint before the Equality Tribunal on 10 September 2009. His EE1 form details the nature of the bullying he was allegedly subjected to and he was afforded a four day hearing before the Equality Tribunal. At the outset of the Equality Tribunal hearing, following a preliminary submission by the defendant, the option of pursuing his Equality Tribunal complaint or his common law claim was made clear to the plaintiff and he opted to pursue a remedy before the Equality Tribunal. I am satisfied that the plaintiff is now estopped from resiling from this position after having had his claim rejected by the Equality Tribunal.

To allow the plaintiff to proceed with his common law claim would be to breach the rule in Henderson v. Henderson and, in my view, would also fail to give effect to the intention of the legislature in relation to s. 101(2)(a) of the Employment Equality Act 1998. As sub> mitted by counsel for the defendant, s. 77(1) cases are purely statutory in nature. To interpret the provision in the manner contended for by the plaintiff would render subs. (a) entirely redundant, for there is no entitlement to recover damages at common law in respect of such cases. The term 'case' therefore must be taken to include the underlying facts which give rise to the complaint …

>
> The matters complained of in the plaintiff's common law and Equality Tribunal proceedings both date from the time a new supervisor was appointed and arise from the very same alleged incidents of mistreatment. The rule in Henderson v. Henderson, coupled with the provisions of s. 101(2)(a), requires that where there is such a considerable degree of overlap the plaintiff should be precluded from pursuing his High Court proceedings. The plaintiff's right of appeal to the Labour Court remains, and his right to an effective remedy is therefore unaffected.
>
> For the reasons outlined above, the plaintiff's personal injuries claim is dismissed."

The scope of the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100

[15] In the light of the judgment of Kearns P. it is necessary next to reconsider the modern application of the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100. The general approach of the courts to the issue of a multiplicity of proceedings has been, broadly speaking, to adopt a merits-based approach. In other words, doctrines designed to prevent a multiplicity of proceedings and thereby ensuring the administration of justice is not abused – such as the rule in Henderson v. Henderson – are applied flexibly and not by reference to some inexorable and unforgiving logic. The courts have generally fought shy of adopting an ex ante, automatic exclusion of any second set of proceedings and much will depend upon whether the second proceedings raise questions which might sensibly and reasonably have been raised in the first proceedings.

[16] All of this is illustrated by the judgment of Kearns J. for the Supreme Court in S.M. v. Ireland [2007] IESC 11, [2007] 3 I.R. 283. As this is probably the leading contemporary decision on the essentially non-automatic nature of the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100, it may be convenient to set out the court's reasoning at a little length. In S.M. v. Ireland [2007] IESC 11 the plaintiff had originally been charged with a set of sexual offences under s. 62 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 ("the 1861 Act"). He then sought an order of prohibition restrain-ing the prosecution on the grounds of undue delay, but these judicial review proceedings did not succeed. Some time later the plaintiff was then charged with a second tranche of s. 62 offences in relation to different complainants. At that point the plaintiff sought to challenge the constitutionality of s. 62 of the 1861 Act, but was later met with the objection that he had thereby breached the rule in Henderson v. Henderson in that he might have – but did not – raise this constitutional question in the first judicial review proceedings.

[17] While this argument initially prevailed in the High Court, the Supreme Court disagreed. Kearns J. observed that the issue of the constitutionality of the section could not have been challenged in the judicial review proceedings. In any event, no proceedings had been issued by the plaintiff concerning the second tranche of s. 62 offences which concerned other complainants.

> "[36] Ultimately, the key issue in the case is to consider whether the order granting dismissal of the plaintiff's claim for abuse of process is justified by application of the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100.
>
> [37] As already noted, the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 effectively means that a litigant may not make a case in legal proceedings which might have been but was not brought forward in previous litigation. In that case Wigram V. C. formulated that principle as follows at pp. 114 to 115:-
>
> > 'In trying this question, I believe I state the rule of the Court correctly, when I say, that where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in, and of adjudication by, a court of competent jurisdiction, the Court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not (except under special circumstances) permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward, only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the Court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time.'"

[19] Kearns J. then continued thus at pp. 295 and 296:-

"[38] The purpose of the rule is to uphold an important principle of public policy which demands, in the interests of justice, that defendants are not exposed to successive suits where one would do …

[40] However, it is equally clear on the authorities that the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 must not be applied in a rigid or mechanical manner so as to deprive the court of any discretion to hold otherwise in an appropriate case …

[42] It follows therefore that a limitation such as that provided for by the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 should not be blindly or invariably applied, particularly where there are special circumstances in the case which would suggest that the imposition of the limitation would be either unfair, excessive or disproportionate. Thus in Landers v. Director of Public Prosecutions [2004] IEHC 31, [2004] 2 I.R. 363 the rule in Henderson v. Henderson was not applied in circumstances where the applicant, who had been charged with road traffic offences, brought judicial review proceedings in which an order was granted restraining the District Court Judge from further conducting the trial of the applicant. No order was sought prohibiting the prosecution of the applicant and, on being informed that the charges against him would be heard before another District Court Judge, the applicant issued fresh judicial review proceedings seeking an order to restrain the respondent from further prosecuting him. The respondent contended that the applicant was not entitled to prohibition by reason of his failure to seek it in the first set of judicial review proceedings, but this contention was rejected on the basis that the applicant and his advisors could not reasonably have anticipated that the [Director of Public Prosecutions] would seek to prosecute afresh having regard to existing jurisprudence in relation to an unconstitutional first hearing in the District Court."

[20] At p. 296, Kearns J. noted that by contrast:-

"[43] In A.A. v Medical Council [2003] 4 I.R. 302 no reason was ever advanced as to why the point ultimately taken (i.e., the absence of legal aid) had not been raised in the earlier proceedings. There had been no change of circumstances in the intervening period insofar as the applicant was concerned. The applicant's financial position had not worsened in the interval; he was impecunious at all material times."

[21] Kearns J. then concluded at pp. 297 and 298:-

"[45] It seems to me that in the instant case the defendants have failed to put forward any evidence or reasoning to support a case of abuse or misuse of process based on any collateral attack of a decision made in the prior judicial review proceedings …

[46] The current plenary proceedings … raise a discrete constitutional point which could not 'sensibly' have been raised as part of the judicial review proceedings. An explanation, albeit not the most meritorious, has been offered as to why the point was not adverted to at an earlier time. However, that does not lead inexorably to a conclusion that the raising of the constitutional issue at a later time was an abuse of process. Nor can the present proceedings be characterised as dishonest or tantamount to the unjust harassment of any party. The defendants themselves have merely contended that the plaintiff could have raised his constitutional point either in the judicial review or in parallel plenary proceedings brought at the same time.

[47] Unlike A.A. v. Medical Council [2003] 4 I.R. 302, there were changed circumstances operating in the plaintiff's case, because eight additional charges involving different complainants were added to those which were the subject matter of the judicial review. There has been no litigation of any sort to date in relation to the second tranche of charges.

[48] Secondly, the parties to the present proceedings are not the same, given that the [Director of Public Prosecutions] was the opposing party in the judicial review proceedings but is not a party to the plenary proceedings. Furthermore, the plaintiff is not here seeking to reopen the same subject of litigation. He is not seeking to challenge a related procedural defect which might, and which should have been argued in the context of his delay type judicial review in 1998. What the plaintiff seeks to achieve in the present proceedings is a discrete and distinct subject of litigation, namely, that of seeking to have the statutory sentencing regime as set out in s. 62 of the Offences against the Persons Act 1861 declared unconstitutional. The dictum of Barrington J. in Riordan v. An Taoiseach (No. 2) [1999] 4 I.R. 343 makes it clear that this was not a relief to be claimed appropriately in the judicial review proceedings.

[49] Finally, any case on the 'parallel proceedings' argument seems to me to have the fatal flaw that such proceedings could not address charges not yet in being at the time of the judicial review proceedings and in respect of which no legal proceedings were ever brought. In another case, however, that argument might well prove conclusive in favour of a defendant."

[22] The reasoning of the Supreme Court in S.M. v. Ireland [2007] IEHC 11, [2007] 3 I.R. 283 is very instructive so far as the present case is concerned. That decision not only stresses the non-automatic nature of the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100, but it also focuses on the type of relief which might sensibly have been sought and obtained in the first set of proceedings. This, of course, was the background to Henderson v. Henderson itself precisely because in that case the claim in relation to the account of the intestate's estate had already been determined by the Newfoundland Supreme Court. The English courts then ruled in respect of a second set of proceedings that, absent special circumstances, the matter could not then be re-opened before them. This, of course, is what Wigram V.C. had in mind when he spoke, at p. 115, of the rule applying to prevent the parties "to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as part of the subject in contest, but which was not …"

[23] The rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 is thus closely linked with the doctrine of issue estoppel and estoppel per rem judicatam. In fact, the rule might be said to represent a potentially wider application of both of these doctrines in that it captures both the strategic withholding of claims which might have been usefully brought forward in the first set of proceedings (along with the negligent failure to do just that) as well as subsequent litigation which amounts either to a direct or collateral attack on the earlier judgment.

[24] Nevertheless, as I have already stated, the focus of Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 is on the relief which might have been obtained in the first proceedings. This is why the rule is not automatically applicable in the special case of separate claims which are required to be made under a statutory scheme on the one hand (such as in the present case) and regular personal injuries claims on the other, even if both claims arise from the same set of underlying facts. To repeat once again, the rule in Henderson v. Henderson requires that the plaintiff must have been able to have brought forward the claim in the second proceedings in the first proceedings.

[25] This is where I fear that both Kearns P. in the present case and Hedigan J. in Cunningham v. Intel Ireland Ltd. [2013] IEHC 207, [2013] 24 E.L.R. 233 have, with respect, fallen into error. Even if he had wanted to, the plaintiff could not have combined a common law claim for personal injuries along with the statutory claim for discrimination in the one set of proceedings. Just as the Equality Tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain the common law claim, the High Court had no first instance jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the statutory claim for discrimination or harassment under the 1998 Act.

[26] The discrimination and harassment claim before the Equality Tribunal must, in any event, be linked to one or more of the nine specific grounds identified in s. 6(2) of the 1998 Act, namely, gender, civil status, family status, sexual orientation, religion, age, disability, race and membership of the Traveller community. The corollary of this is that the Equality Tribunal has no jurisdiction under the 1998 Act to deal with a claim for free standing claim for discrimination or harassment which is independent of these specific statutory grounds. Putting this another way, while the Equality Tribunal has jurisdiction to deal with a harassment claim which was linked with the gender of the claimant, it would, for example, have no such jurisdiction where the claim simply was that the victim had been harassed by a fellow employee who just happened to dislike him or her.

[27] It follows, therefore, that the discrimination claim and the personal injuries claim are different claims, with different time limits and different rules as to both liability and quantum. As Ryan has put it, the identification of "the ambit of the two (or more) sets of proceedings pursued by a litigant, and in particular whether that ambit overlaps impermissibly, would appear to be central to the determination of whether Henderson … precludes the bringing of … further claims" (Ryan, "Parallel Proceedings in Employment Law: An Analysis of the High Court Judgments in Cunningham and Culkin" (2015) 38 D.U.L.J. 219, at p. 224). In that sense, therefore, it was simply not possible for the plaintiff to have brought forward his "whole case" before the Equality Tribunal in the sense envisaged by Wigram V.C. in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 simply because that statutory body would have had no jurisdiction to entertain a workplace personal injuries claim.

Conclusions on the Henderson v. Henderson issue

[28] It follows, therefore, that I consider that Kearns P. was in error inasmuch as he applied what in effect was an ex ante and automatic application of the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 so as to bar the present personal injuries claim in limine. That, admittedly, is not to say that the plaintiff can proceed entirely unhindered to pursue his personal injuries claim against the Council. It may be, for example, that the trial judge hearing the personal injuries case would conclude that that case should ultimately fail because it amounted in substance to a collateral attack on the earlier Tribunal decision. But that is not at all the same thing as saying that the claim should be struck out in limine on Henderson v. Henderson grounds.

Section 101 of the 1998 Act

[29] One may, in any event, arrive at this conclusion independently by reference to the language of the 1998 Act itself. Section 101 of the 1998 Act addresses the issue of complementary remedies.

[30] The key subsection so far as the present case is concerned is that contained in s. 101(2)(a). This provides that where a case under s. 77(1) – which includes a case for discrimination and harassment – has been referred to the Equality Tribunal and the case has either been settled following mediation or the Director of the Equality Tribunal has commenced an investigation under s. 79, then the claimant "shall not be entitled to recover damages at common law in respect of the case".

[31] The argument here – which found favour in the High Court – is that s. 101(2)(a) should be interpreted as precluding a common law claim for personal injuries where the individual has already pursued a claim before the Equality Tribunal. It is true that, as Kearns P. noted in his judgment, the claims before the Equality Tribunal are entirely statutory in nature. He considered that the words of s. 101(2)(a) ("in respect of the case") must refer to the facts of the underlying claim and not simply to the relief claimed before the Equality Tribunal. Any other conclusion would, he thought, render these words of the subsection effectively otiose and redundant, since a claimant could never have recovered at common law in respect of a claim of which the Equality Tribunal had jurisdiction.

[32] I agree that if the subsection is viewed in isolation it might well lend itself to this interpretation. But I think that the section must be viewed as a whole and particularly with reference to the immediately preceding subsection, namely, s. 101(1). Section 101(1) addresses the converse case of where a plaintiff makes a claim for damages at common law in respect of a failure "by an employer or any other person, to comply with an equal remuneration term or an equality clause", by providing that if then the hearing of the case has begun, the individual "may not seek redress … under this Part in respect of the failure to comply with the equal remuneration term or the equality clause, as the case may be".

[33] It is, however, necessary to give s. 101 a holistic interpretation, as any endeavour to look at s. 101(2)(a) in isolation and without regard to the statutory provision which immediately precedes it may serve to give a misleading construction. As Black J. explained in The People (Attorney-General) v. Kennedy [1946] I.R. 517, at p. 536:-

> "A small section of a picture, if looked at close-up, may indicate something quite clearly; but when one stands back and views the whole canvas, the close-up view of the small section is often found to have given a wholly wrong view of what it really represented.
> If one could pick out a single word or phrase and, finding it perfectly clear in itself, refuse to check its apparent meaning in the light thrown upon it by the context or by other provisions, the result would be to render the principle of ejusdem generis and noscitur a sociis utterly meaningless; for this principle requires frequently that a word or phrase or even a whole provision which, standing alone, has a clear meaning must be given a quite different meaning when viewed in the light of its context."

[34] If one applies this principle in the context of s. 101, it is plain that the phrase "entitled to recover damages at common law in respect of the case" in s. 101(2)(a) is referable back to the language of s. 101(1), i.e., a claim at common law in respect of the failure to comply with an equal remuneration claim or an equality clause. Not only is this natural sequence of language for the reader of the section – because, at the risk of stating the obvious, s. 101(2)(a) comes immediately after s. 101(1) – but any other conclusion would also lead to an absurdity. It would mean, for example, that a claimant could pursue a personal injuries claim which was unrelated to a failure to comply with an equal remuneration term or an equality clause and then be free to pursue a discrimination claim before the Equality Tribunal (s. 101(1)) but that a claimant who first pursued a discrimination claim before the Equality Tribunal was not free to maintain a personal injuries claim before the courts (s. 101(2)(a)).

[35] It is, accordingly, by checking the meaning of s. 101(2)(a) by reference to the context of s. 101(1) in the manner indicated by Black J. in The People (Attorney-General) v. Kennedy [1946] I.R. 517 that the meaning of the phrase "damages at common law in respect of the case" becomes clear. In this context, the language of s. 101(2)(a) refers to that already described in s. 101(1), namely, a claim for damages at common law in respect of the failure to comply with an equal remuneration term or an equality clause. When viewed in the light of s. 101(1), these words in s. 101(2)(a) must, accordingly, be regarded as having the more limited meaning I have suggested and not the wider, broader meaning which found favour in the High Court. As thus construed, the construction of s. 101(1) and s. 101(2)(a) presents virtually a textbook example of the application of the interpretative principle of noscitur a sociis ("known by its companions").

Conclusions on s. 101 of the 1998 Act

[36] Summing up, therefore, s. 101 serves to bar complementary claims for discrimination before the Tribunal and at common law in respect of claims based on failure to comply with an equal remuneration term or an equality clause. But it has no wider meaning and, specifically, it does not bar subsequent personal injuries claims per se where an earlier discrimination claim before the Tribunal has failed.

Overall conclusions

[37] For the reason stated, therefore, I would allow the appeal insofar as Kearns P. held that the personal injuries claim must automatically fail in limine as an abuse of process by reason of the plaintiff's failure to prevail before the Equality Tribunal. But, for the reasons I have also stated, it would also be open to the court of trial to determine that the personal injuries claim – or, at least, parts of the claim – should fail on the ground that it amounted in substance to a collateral attack on the decision of the Equality Tribunal.

KARSHAN (MIDLANDS) LIMITED T/A DOMINO'S PIZZA

APPELLANT

- AND –

THE REVENUE COMMISSIONERS

RESPONDENT

JUDGMENT of Ms. Justice Máire Whelan delivered on the 31st day of May 2022

Introduction

1. This appeal was brought by Karshan (Midlands) Ltd. ("Karshan") from the judgment and order of O'Connor J. made in the High Court on 21 January 2020 in a case stated by the Tax Appeals Commissioner for an opinion pursuant to s. 949AQ of the Taxes Consolidation Act 1997 ("TCA") heard over three days in July 2019. The decision of the Appeal Commissioner made on 8 October 2018 had determined that pizza delivery drivers engaged by Karshan who had worked during the years of assessment 2010 and 2011 ("the relevant years") had done so pursuant to contracts of service and as such were taxable pursuant to Schedule E of the TCA.

Consultative case stated

2. The case stated posed nine questions for the opinion of the High Court. Questions 1 to 4 were as follows: -

> "(1) Whether upon the facts proven or admitted I was correct in law in my interpretation and application of the concept of mutuality of obligation as set out at pages 20 – 28 (paras. 53 – 87 of my determination).
> (2) Whether upon the facts proved and admitted I was correct in law to determine that it was not necessary to consider whether the overarching contract contained mutuality of obligation, for the reasons set out at pages 49 – 52 (paras. 156 – 166) of my determination.
>
> (3) Whether upon the facts proved or admitted I was correct in law in the interpretation and application of the concept of "integration" contained at paras. 36 - 39 (paras. 114 – 125) of the determination.

The trial judge responded "yes" to the above questions. It followed from same that the answers provided by the trial judge to questions 5 to 9 – as to whether the Appeals Commissioner had in each stated respect erred in law – were in the negative.

3. For the reasons outlined hereafter, I am satisfied that the High Court judge correctly answered each of the questions posed and rightly concluded that the Appeals Commissioner was correct in her conclusions that the relationship between the appellant and the driver in each case gave rise to a contract of service. I differ in certain respects with the trial judge in regard to some aspects of the approach whereby he reached his determination on the case stated but not his conclusions. Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal on all grounds.

4. It is to be borne in mind that the findings of the Commissioner in the first instance were not to be disturbed by the High Court unless there was no evidence on which she could have reasonably reached the conclusions which she did or she erred in her application of the law. As was stated by Hamilton C.J. in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1997] IESC 9, [1998] 1 I.R. 34:-

> "Where conclusions are based upon an identifiable error of law or an unsustainable finding of fact by a tribunal such conclusions must be corrected. Otherwise it should be recognised that tribunals which have been given statutory tasks to perform and exercise their functions as is now usually the case with a high degree of expertise and provide coherent and balanced judgments on the evidence and arguments heard by them it should not be necessary for the Courts to review their decisions by way of appeal or judicial review." (pp. 37-38)

Background

5. The consultative case stated arose in the context where the central issue confronting the Appeals Commissioner was whether drivers engaged in the delivery of pizzas for the appellant (Karshan) in the relevant years were independent contractors working under contracts for services or whether, as the Appeal Commissioner determined, they worked under contracts of service and as such were employees.

6. Karshan is engaged to the manufacturing and delivery of pizzas and both elements are integral to its business model. The relevant retail outlets are situated at Athlone, Mullingar and Tullamore. Delivery of takeaway food within each catchment hinterland requires drivers. Without doubt drivers are integral to and a central element of the company's organisation.

7. Each driver was obliged to execute an overarching contract of open ended and indefinite duration. In addition, the Appeals Commissioner found that individual contracts were operated in practice in the course of dealing between the drivers and the individual branches whereby the individual drivers submitted details of their availability and in reliance on same the pizza shop manager prepared weekly rosters. Acceptance of the offer to work for the roster period was communicated when the roster was circulated to the individual drivers each week by the store manager.

8. Karshan contend that the said delivery drivers work under contracts for services. The Revenue Commissioners argue that on its true construction the contractual relationship between Karshan and its pizza delivery drivers constituted a hybrid contract, comprising of two distinct elements - each considered separately below - the anterior overarching contract and the discrete individual contracts operating under the overarching contract in respect of specific weekly assignments of driving work giving rise to contracts of service. The overarching terms were intended to apply both to the general engagement and to each individual contract entered into.

9. The practical issue is whether Karshan should deduct income tax and other relevant contributions from the payments it makes to drivers whom it engages to effect delivery of pizzas at its Domino pizza outlets in the Midlands. The liability to make such deductions depends on establishing that the relationship between the company and each driver is governed by a contract of employment (otherwise a contract of service) rather than a contract for services under which they would operate as independent contractors. The Appeals Commissioner assessed the appellant company on the basis that the drivers are in effect employees engaged under contracts of service. The appellant contends that she erred and that the drivers are self-employed.

Asymmetrical nature of overarching agreement

10. Statements in written agreements disavowing any intention to create a relationship of employment cannot prevail over the true legal effect of the agreement's terms. In that behalf, regard must be had to the asymmetrical nature of a transaction where one party is the exclusive author of the instrument and the other can only generate an income in an arrangement with the company by signing the document. Hence the labels to be found in the overarching agreement cannot by themselves be determinative of any issue as to status.

11. The contract under consideration here was asymmetrical being crafted and framed by Karshan and its legal advisers with no input from the individual drivers. Since the contracts were all identical and there was no evidence to the contrary, it can reasonably be inferred that same were offered to prospective drivers on a "take it or leave it" basis.

Terms of Overarching agreement

Clauses 1 and 17

12. Clause 1 and Clause 17 stated that the driver was being retained by the appellant as an independent contractor. The categorisation of a relationship by the parties themselves can be taken into account but is not dispositive of status which falls to be determined as a mixed question of fact and law. Insofar as Clauses 1 and 17 describe the driver as an "independent contractor", it is to be borne in mind that the drivers had no input whatsoever into the drafting of the agreement. Ultimately, categorisation is an objective test and it is manifest that parties cannot establish a particular categorisation merely by describing it in such a fashion.

13. In regard to the issue of the weight to be afforded to a bare statement such as Clause 1 of the agreement, assistance can also be gleaned from decisions such as that of the English

Court of Appeal in Autoclenz Limited v. Belcher [2009] EWCA Civ. 1046, upheld on appeal by the UK Supreme Court in Autoclenz Limited. v. Belcher [2011] UKSC 41, which reaffirmed that in determining the issue of status a court or tribunal must always take an objective approach. Further, that decision is authority for the proposition that a person should not be estopped from contending that he was an employee "merely because they have been content to accept self-employed status for some years." (para. 57) This approach was supported by Lord Clark's judgment in the Supreme Court.

14. This approach to the characterisation of the relationship between parties has well-established pedigree including the judgment of Elias L.J. in Quashie v. Stringfellows Restaurant Limited [2012] EWCA 1735 at para. 52 where he observed: -

> "It is trite law that parties cannot by agreement fix the status of their relationship: that is an objective matter to be determined by an assessment of all the relevant factors. But it is legitimate for a court to have regard to the way in which the parties have chosen to characterise the relationship, and in a case where the position is uncertain, it can be decisive…"

Also relevant in this regard is the judgment of Lord Denning in Massey v. Crown Life Insurance Co. [1978] 2 All E.R. 576 which accords with Calder v. H. Kitson Vickers & Sons (Engineers) Ltd [1988] I.C.R. 259. This analysis accords in turn with the views of Keane J. in the Supreme Court in Henry Denny that "each case must be considered in light of its particular facts" (p. 49). The input, if any, of the individual into the terms of any contract is such a "particular fact".

15. In reality, the only way to obtain work as a driver in a Midland Domino's pizza branch was to execute the overarching contract. It was tendered on a "take it or leave it" basis. There is no suggestion that drivers or representatives of drivers had any input into the content of the contracts including Clauses 1 or 17.

Clause 3

16. This clause provides that the company would pay drivers depending on the amount of deliveries which were successfully undertaken by them. However, in addition remuneration was being paid for "branded promotion through the wearing of fully branded company supplied clothing and/or the application of company logos affixed temporarily to the contractor's vehicle" as per Clause 3 of the overarching contract. This applies throughout the entire shift and not just to apparel being worn during the course of a delivery.

Thus, attending at the pizza shop in uniform constituted active engagement in the core work of the appellant. The uniform comprised of a crew shirt, baseball cap, name tag and driver jacket. According to the evidence, managers checked the uniforms to ensure they were in order. The rate of pay in respect of the wearing of uniform was on an hourly basis: "The brand promotion or advertising rate was €5.65 per hour" (para. 34 of determination). That payment was augmented depending on the amount of deliveries undertaken during the shift. However, an hourly rate was payable even if there was no driving work at all arising and accordingly it was available to both sides to calculate in advance once the available hours were communicated by the driver to the manager and the roster was drawn up accordingly. Obviously the additional sum in respect of the amount of deliveries remained to be ultimately calculated. Thus, this manner of payment coupled with the fact that during downtime between deliveries, the clear evidence of at least one of the company's managers was that he required drivers to make pizza boxes and a driver was subject to a significant sanction for refusing to do so, namely, being sent home with an ensuing loss of their hourly rate of payment and the opportunity to make deliveries during that shift. That fact, coupled with the overall analysis of Clause 3 and in light of the evidence before the Commissioner pointed to a significant integration of drivers into the company's enterprise. It further points to the relevant level of control consistent with the relationship of employer and employee subsisting between the parties.

Clause 5

17. It is contended by the appellant in support of the appeal:-

> "Clause 5 provided that the drivers would insure their own vehicles (although Clause 4 stated if the driver did not have his own vehicle that he could apply to rent a company vehicle from the appellant)." (p. 9)

This contention was not established in my view. It would appear from the evidence that was adduced that Clause 4 never operated as between the parties and in practice no delivery vehicles were available for rent from the company. Furthermore, Clause 5(a) significantly modifies the initial obligation to insure and expressly states: -

> "If the contractor does not have the appropriate business use insurance the company is prepared to offer same (third party only) at a pre-determined rate."

In its totality, Clause 5 could point more towards the relationship of employer and employee, particularly insofar as the company anticipates that an individual driver could encounter difficulties, financial or otherwise, in obtaining business use insurance, and agrees to discharge same "at a pre-determined rate". The assumption of a further obligation on the part of the driver to discharge the business use insurance premia to the company might be expected to incentivise the submission of availability sheets on an ongoing basis in connection with the creation of rotas and rosters to facilitate the discharge of that sum to the company.

Clause 9

18. Clause 9 provides:-

> "The company points out to the contractor that in keeping with all self-employed individuals the financial risks and/or rewards associated with providing the services as outlined in this contract are strictly under the control of the contractor, and the company bears no responsibility whatsoever for same. In particular, the company does not warrant a minimum number of deliveries. Consequently, the contractor undertakes to operate his/her own accounting system. He furthermore agrees to provide a weekly invoice with the information necessary to agree the amount owed by the company."

19. This clause must be stress tested against the evidence. The Appeals Commissioner identified in the Determination including at paras. 110 and 111 several countervailing factors which pointed towards the existence of a contract of service. The said provisions betrayed a grip by Karshan on a driver's economy inconsistent with him being a truly independent contractor. Requirements imposed by Karshan on a driver under the overarching agreement including uniforms, branded apparel, vehicle markings, restrictions on freedom to work specified in clause 11, were capable of constituting, in the language of Wilson L.J. in Pimlico Plumbers v. Smith [2018] UKSC 29 at para. 48 "…lapses which shed light on [the] true nature" of the agreement between the parties. It is apparent from para. 110 of the determination that the Appeals Commissioner is alive to the relevance of such factors to the exercise she was undertaking.

20. The evidence was that on an approximately weekly basis the rosters were circulated. For the hours rostered, the driver was entitled to the remuneration which at the time in respect of the branding promotion aspect entitled a payment of €5.65 per hour with a delivery rate fixed per drop in addition. Drivers gave evidence that in practice the company pre-prepared invoices for the drivers to sign. This is arguably more consistent with a relationship of employer/employee. Whereas Clause 9 did not warrant a minimum number of deliveries, it has to be borne in mind that it could not do so since they could not definitively anticipate in advance the number of orders as might be placed on any given day or evening for a food delivery. However, what is not stated but was the case, is that when the weekly roster was drawn up by the company based on the availability sheets and circulated to the drivers, the company did warrant to pay for the specified number of hours in relation to the brand promotion/advertising aspect at €5.65 per hour.

21. Clause 11 is of crucial importance in that it cast obligations on the driver during the periods between his work on rostered driving assignments for Karshan and not just during the performance of the successive or discrete rostered assignments as were provided to him in the weekly rosters. It is indicative of an ongoing level of subordination of the driver to the Karshan even on the days and times between rostered assignments. Its terms are considered in detail below.

Clause 12

22. The substitution clause on its face, considered in the context of the latter part of Clause 14, appears to confer a right of substitution on the driver. The Commissioner and the High Court judge (at para. 55) erred in finding that the overarching agreement "required" the driver to find a substitute when unavailable. However, that error in itself does not operate to alter the validity of the Commissioner's conclusion at para. 164 or the High Court judgment at para. 60. On its true construction, this clause created a right on the part of the driver to proffer a substitute if the narrow circumstances contemplated arose. Such right does not necessarily reduce the binding nature of the work contract and does not eliminate its obligational core. It does not amount to a genuine entitlement on the part of the individual to subcontract the work out to whomsoever he/she chose. This is consistent with the company exercising a far higher degree of control than the language of Clause 12 implies. That degree of control over substitution is more consistent with the relationship of employer and employee. Substitution for a shift when a driver was unavailable did not alter the contractual obligation of the driver to work the balance of the unworked shift for the rostered period.

23. Personal performance was the norm but it was not an absolute requirement. Decisions such as Mirror Group Newspapers Limited v. Gunning [1986] I.C.R. 145, Sheehan v. Post Office Counters Limited [1999] I.C.R. 73 and, from the point of view of tax, IRC v. Post Office Limited [2003] I.R.L.R. 199 have construed the definitional requirement of personal performance of imposing merely an obligation that personal performance must be the "predominant purpose" of the contract rather than an absolute requirement. In this case Karshan offered no evidence that personal performance was other than the norm.

I am satisfied that the trial judge was correct in his conclusion not to interfere with the decision of the Commissioner in regard to the operation of Clause 12. The worker had a right but not an obligation to engage a substitute. As stated above, I am satisfied that there was no evidence to suggest that the substitutes were conventionally third parties with no contractual relationship with the appellant. Otherwise it could not be said that such an individual was "capable of performing the contractor's contractual obligations in all respects" as Clause 12 itself mandated.

24. This exclusion clause is noteworthy. It indicates that there is no obligation on the part of the company to offer work. This speaks to the inherent and subtle imbalance between the rights of the company and those of drivers within the overarching agreement which in its terms and tenor favours the company. Significantly, as stated above, Clause 14 does not state anywhere that there is no obligation on the driver to accept work. A far more modified position is ordained for the driver by its terms. It is crafted in favour of the company. The use of the word "unavailability" does not connote freedom to gratuitously refuse to carry out a previously agreed rostered shift. There is an ongoing obligation operating at all material times under the overarching agreement that the driver makes himself available for work on "certain days and certain times" of his own choosing to be identified by him and communicated to the company. Submission weekly by the driver of an availability sheet represents the discharge of that ongoing obligation.

As an exclusion clause, Clause 14, in the overarching contract requires to be stress-tested as to its effect against the operational reality of the relationship between the parties. The overarching contract falls to be interpreted in a realistic manner and in accordance with the operating facts. That is what the trial judge did. The construction advanced by the appellant that the clause conferred a freedom on a driver to work when he or she chose is not supported by the language of the clause. No driver gave evidence of so operating or understanding the said term. The trial judge was entitled to prefer the common sense construction contended for by Revenue, which he implicitly did; that Clause 14, in its true context, objectively viewed and in light of the evidence, implicitly required a driver to initiate an individual agreement with the company in relation to his availability for work.

General principles for ascertaining employment status

25. The locus classicus for the definition of a contract of service is the judgment of MacKenna J. in Ready Mixed Concrete v. Minister of Pensions [1968] 2 Q.B. 497 which identified the three key elements of a contract of service as being: -

(i) The servant agrees that, in consideration of a wage or other remuneration, he would provide his own work and skill in the performance of some service for his master.

(ii) He agrees, expressly or impliedly, that in the performance of that service he will be subject to the other's control in a sufficient degree to make that other master.

(iii) The other provisions of the contract are consistent with it being a contract of service.

26. The Ready Mixed test has demonstrated its resilience and has withstood the test of time because of its inherent flexibility and overall applicability to a significant variety of scenarios in both the Revenue and employment domain. The Ready Mixed principles are to be understood in this jurisdiction in the context of later jurisprudence including the judgments of the Supreme Court in Denny & Sons (Ireland) Limited v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 and Edwards J. Minister for Agriculture v. Barry [2008] IEHC 216 and inter alia, the principle of mutuality of obligation.

27. In light of the extensive jurisprudence including the taxonomy posited by Edwards J. at para. 44 of Minister for Agriculture and Food v. Barry ("Barry"), and the observations of the Supreme Court in Denny & Sons (Ireland) Limited v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 ("Denny"), the ascertainment of the true status of an individual in the context of work or alleged employment prima facie necessitates in the first instance a thorough examination of the facts and circumstances, not alone in relation to any formal written contract but in relation to the operational day to day arrangements that obtain.

Economic Reality & Work Contracts

28. Harvey on Industrial Relations and Employment Law (LexisNexis Butterworths, 2021) notes the importance of a court having regard to the economic reality of the relationship between the parties. The approach is explained thus at paragraph 35: -

> "The particular advantage of the economic reality test is that it enables the court to see through the disguise with which the parties sometimes clothe their relationship. An employer may prefer to arrange a contract for services rather than a contract of employment, for it can thereby escape many statutory restrictions and free itself from its proper responsibilities. The worker may readily acquiesce, for the independent contractor enjoys a favourable tax position as compared with the employee; and the worker may be willing to sacrifice the long term security of the employment protection laws for the short term advantage of a larger pay packet. Even if the parties honestly believe they have a contract for services, the court may say they have a contract of employment."

29. The gig economy can throw into sharp relief the inequality of bargaining power between an individual who seeks work and those in a position to provide it. It is appropriate therefore that strict commercial law principles governing the construction of contracts not be unduly rigidly applied in the context of work. In my view, work-type cases require to be considered more broadly and account can be taken of factors such as whether the contract was prepared entirely by the company alone which drafted all documentation without any input from the individual providing the work or where there was no opportunity offered or available to vary any contract terms or where a contract was presented on a "take or leave it" basis or where the individual offering to work did not obtain independent legal advice prior to entering into or signing an agreement in determining the true nature of such an agreement. What has to be ascertained is, in its totality, the true nature of the agreement concluded between the parties as gleaned from the documentation and from the operation of the agreement in question in practice over time.

Construction of Contracts as to Status

30. Our Supreme Court, in the analogous context of landlord and tenant law, has repeatedly made clear that in construing an agreement as to status the terms of a written agreement will not necessarily determine the matter. In Whipp v. Mackey [1927] I.R. 372 at p. 382, Kennedy C.J. observed;

> "Neither the application of the term "rent" to the annual payment nor the description of [the grantee] as "the tenant" would be sufficient to determine the character of the document as a grant or demise, or agreement for a grant or demise, rather than a licence or agreement for a licence."

31. As was made clear by Griffin J. in Gatien Motor Co. Ltd v. Continental Oil Co. Ireland Ltd. [1979] I.R. 406, the court in evaluating any written agreement said to be probative as to status between parties attaches significant weight as to whether it was negotiated at arm's length;

> "The parties negotiated at arm's length, both were fully legally advised, and the Caretaker's Agreement which was signed by [the tenant] expressed the intention of the parties and was entered into at the behest of the solicitors for the tenant". (p. 415)

It is to be inferred from that judgment that purposive approaches to construction are required for contracts where there is a material imbalance between the parties in the negotiation of the written agreement and the availability of independent legal advice.

Kenny J. in that case observed at p. 420;

> "The existence of the relationship…is determined by the law on a consideration of many factors and not by the label which the parties put on it."

32. The Supreme Court has demonstrated that it is astute to the risks that a written agreement as to status may not represent the true status of the parties. In Irish Shell & B.P. Ltd v. Costello [1981] I.L.R.M. 66, a majority of the court found that a purported licence had created the relationship of landlord and tenant, Griffin J. stating at p. 70;

> "Although a document may be described as a licence it does not necessarily follow that, merely on that account, that it is to be regarded as amounting only to a licence in law."

33. In this regard, in the context of work-related contracts, I find helpful the observations of Lord Clark in the English Supreme Court in Autoclenz Limited v. Belcher [2011] UKSC 41 – a decision that echoes the dicta of the Irish Supreme Court in Gatien Motor Co. Ltd v. Continental Oil Co. Ireland Ltd. [1979] I.R. 406 - that the court will have regard to inequality between the parties and access to independent legal advice in evaluating a contract's ostensible terms - where Clark L.J. observed at para. 34: -

> "The critical difference between this type of case and the ordinary commercial dispute is identified by Aikens LJ in para [92] as follows:
> > 'I respectfully agree with the view, emphasised by both Smith and Sedley LJJ, that the circumstances in which contracts relating to work or services are concluded are often very different from those in which commercial contracts between parties of equal bargaining power are agreed. I accept that, frequently, organisations which are offering work or requiring services to be provided by individuals are in a position to dictate the written terms which the other party has to accept. In practice, in this area of the law, it may be more common for a court or tribunal to have to investigate allegations that the written contract does not represent the actual terms agreed and the court or tribunal must be realistic and worldly wise when it does so…'"

"35. So the relative bargaining power of the parties must be taken into account in deciding whether the terms of any written agreement in truth represent what was agreed and the true agreement will often have to be gleaned from all the circumstances of the case, of which the written agreement is only a part. This may be described as a purposive approach to the problem. If so, I am content with that description."

34. Briggs J. in Weight Watchers (UK) Ltd v. Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2012] STC 265 observed at para. 20:-

"…before leaving Autoclenz Ltd. v Belcher, it is necessary to note that the Supreme Court also resolved an issue which had emerged in previous decisions about whether in the employment context the court was constrained by an apparently complete written contract to conclude that its terms represented the true agreement, unless the application of the traditional doctrine of sham (which required proof that both parties intended the written contract to paint a false picture) permitted a different conclusion. The Supreme Court held that no such constraint is rigidly to be implied in the employment context because of the normally superior bargaining position of the employer, and its consequential ability to dictate the terms to be included in the written contract: see per Lord Clarke at [20]–[35]. In passing, he approved the following passage in the judgment of Elias J in Kalwak v Consistent Group Ltd. [2007] IRLR 560:

> '[57] The concern to which tribunals must be alive is that armies of lawyers will simply place substitution clauses, or clauses denying any obligation to accept or provide work in employment contracts, as a matter of form, even where such terms do not begin to reflect the real relationship. Peter Gibson LJ was alive to the problem. He said this (p. 369)
>
> > "Of course, it is important that the industrial tribunal should be alert in this area of the law to look at the reality of any obligations. If the obligation is a sham it will want to say so."
>
> [58] In other words, if the reality of the situation is that no one seriously expects that a worker will seek to provide a substitute, or refuse the work offered, the fact that the contract expressly provides for these unrealistic possibilities will not alter the true nature of the relationship. But if these clauses genuinely reflect what might realistically be expected to occur, the fact that the rights conferred have not in fact been exercised will not render the right meaningless.
>
> [59]. … Tribunals should take a sensible and and robust view of these matters in order to prevent form undermining substance …'

[21] Lord Clarke concluded, at [35] as follows:

> 'So the relative bargaining power of the parties must be taken into account in deciding whether the terms of any written agreement in truth represent what was agreed and the true agreement will often have to be gleaned from all the circumstances of the case, of which the written agreement is only a part. This may be described as a purposive approach to the problem. If so, I am content with that description.'"

Context not Label

35. Where, as in the instant case, the written (overarching) agreement does not reflect the sum total of the key elements of the work relationship between the parties, it is necessary to consider the evidence as to the individual personal work relations and in particular to look beyond the label imposed on the arrangement particularly where one party alone has drafted the agreement, to evaluate whether on its true construction an agreement accords with the label ascribed to it by its drafter.

36. It is not the function of a court to re-cast a party's bargain. That said, the denomination or characterisation accorded to an agreement or the ostensible intentions of the parties embodied therein ought not preclude a thorough examination of the true circumstances underpinning its creation and operation so that an informed determination as to its true characterisation can be arrived at.

37. There are a variety of scenarios which can emerge and the prism through which one considers an arrangement can pivot that assessment in one direction or another. Work might be carried out under a single contract which, on the facts when properly considered and understood, might fall to be classified as either a contract of service or a contract for services. Alternatively, on each occasion that work is performed the individual might be considered to have entered a new contract which, again depending on the circumstances, might fall to be classified as either a contract for services or a contract of service. A third potential scenario (which arises in the instant case) is what in effect has come to be known in practice as a hybrid or overarching contract whereby there is "an over-arching contract in relation to certain matters, supplemented by discrete contracts for each period of work" (Weight Watchers UK Limited v. HMRC [2011] UKUT 433 TCC, para. 30). As in the instant case, generally speaking, overarching contracts are in writing whilst the individual arrangements are conventionally not in written terms. Another possible hybrid contractual relationship was contemplated by Edwards J. at para. 44 of Barry, although on the facts of this case, the described scenario is not particularly relevant.

38. From an employment perspective, the authors Maeve Regan and Ailbhe Murphy in Employment Law (2nd edn, Bloomsbury Professional, 2017), at para 2.30 comment:-

> "The parties may agree that the relationship is one of employment or otherwise. However, any label such as 'independent contractor' or 'employee' is a conclusion as to the nature of the relationship. The label means nothing if the reality of the relationship does not accord with it. As Murphy J held in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd v Minister for Social Welfare:
>
> > '[The provisions of the contract are] not of decisive importance. In my view their value, if any, is marginal. These terms are included in the contract but they are not contractual terms in the sense of imposing obligations on one party in favour of the other. They purport to express a conclusion of law as to the consequences of the contract between the parties. Whether Ms Mahon [the shop demonstrator engaged by Denny] was retained under a contract of service depends essentially on the totality of the contractual relationship express or implied between her and the appellant and not upon any statement as to the consequence of the bargain.'"

Discrete Contracts

39. Revenue's contention in the instant case is that on each occasion when a driver is rostered by the shop manager, an individual contract comes into existence which operates as a contract of service. The issue is whether individual rostered weekly assignments worked by a driver, in respect of which the Appeals Commissioners claimed the company was liable for the payment of income tax, did or did not amount to a contract of service in its own right. A similar issue was considered by Waite L.J. in McMeechan v. Secretary of State for Employment [1997] I.R.L.R. 353 at 564 – 565: -

> "That is a question which, though it remains essentially one of fact and degree (O'Kelly's [1983] IRLR 369 case at p.382 …) …is one which largely falls to be determined on the interpretation of the conditions.
> Those must however be construed according to the context afforded by a specific, as opposed to a general, engagement."

40. The issue whether the individual rostered weekly contracts in their operation constitute contracts of employment is legally distinct from the issue as to whether the overarching contract itself gives rise to a contract of service. It is to be observed that the terms of the overarching contract are not decisive in that assessment, but they are certainly relevant and were considered by the High Court judge.

41. The Appeals Commissioner concluded that the individual contracts were contracts of service and that it was unnecessary to proceed to consider the overarching contracts in that regard. Logically, given the hybrid nature of the agreement, it is sufficient for Revenue's purposes if either the overarching contract or the individual contract is one of service as long as that is also the contract pursuant to which the remuneration or sums in question have been paid. As is evident from para. 164 of the Determination, a discrete bilateral contract came into existence weekly on foot of which work was done and payment was calculated and discharged.

42. In the judgment of Waite L.J. in McMeechan, the focus of the court's consideration was a single stint of four days' work carried out in the month of January 1992. Relying, inter alia, on the English textbook Harvey on Industrial Relations and Employment Law, Waite L.J. considered that where a claim relates to pay for a single stint it was logical to "relate the claim to employment status to the particular job of work in respect of which the payment is sought". He noted that Harvey had stated, "The better view is not whether the casual worker is obliged to turn up for, or do, the work but rather, if he turns up, and does the work, whether he does so under a contract of service or for services." (paragraph A [53]) He concluded that there was no incongruity in determining that the individual was an employee in respect of each stint actually worked even if he was not an employee under the general terms of engagement i.e. the overarching contract.

43. The judgment of the English Court of Appeal in McMeechan is also instructive in regard to its analysis of the earlier decision of O'Kelly. Waite L.J. noted that in O'Kelly the overarching contract and the individual work contracts had been considered separately. This he considered to be the correct approach, citing with approval the view expressed by Sir John Donaldson M.R. in O'Kelly that it was an irresistible inference that a Tribunal determining the status of a claimant is under a positive duty in such circumstances to consider the terms of both the overarching contract and the individual contract. I agree.

44. Such an approach applies in the instant case where the overarching terms were intended to apply both to the general engagement and to each individual contract entered into. The parties are thus entitled to have the contractual status of each determined separately. This does not mean that the Appeals Commissioner was obliged to separately determine the status of the overarching contract. Had Revenue contended that drivers were employees taxable under Schedule E in the periods between individual contracts the position would have been different.

45. Mark Freedland FBA and Nicola Kountouris in The Legal Construction of Personal Work Relations (Oxford University Press, 2012) explore the binary divide that has emerged over time to signify the dichotomy between a contract of employment and a contract for services. Though it is an English text book, nevertheless its analysis is useful. At p. 107 they observe:-

> "Three basic approaches seem to compete or interact with each other:
> (1) the working person is to be regarded as an employee employed under a contract of employment if but only if he or she works under the control of the employer (using the idea of control in a loose and extended sense);
>
> (2) the working person is to be regarded as an employee employed under a contract of employment if but only if he or she is integrated into the organization of the employer; and
> (3) the working person is to be regarded as an independent contractor employed under a contract or contracts for services if but only if he or she is in business on his or her own account."

46. The authors use the terminology of "working person" as "a categorically neutral one to identify the relational roles of the persons who, in the context of contracts of employment, figure as 'employees'". The authors continue at p. 107 –

> "There is a deep lack of resolution between these three approaches, and moreover therefore the disagreements about the way in which any of these approaches, or any combination of them, is to be operated. Further doctrines emerge which seem to modify or elaborate those three basic approaches to the test for the binary divide but without making their application or their interrelationship especially clearer. These modifications may be expansive or restrictive of the scope of employment under a contract or contracts of employment. The 'economic reality test' seems to be an inclusionary modification to the effect that a personal work relationship is to be regarded as giving rise to a contract of employment if there is an 'economic reality' of dependence by the working person for security of employment and income upon the work-purchaser, even if there is an appearance of absence either of control over the working person on the part of the work-purchaser or of integration into the organisation of the work-purchaser. On the other hand, the court's 'mutuality of obligation test' is an exclusionary modification, amounting to a rule that employment under a contract or contracts of employment exist only if the working person and the work-purchaser are in a state of continuing mutuality of contractual obligation."

47. The authors posit that some features of a personal contract for services "seem to be ascertained by deducing that they must be different from or indeed opposite to the corresponding attributes of the contract of employment." They continue at p. 111 –

> "This would seem to be especially true with regard to certain structural features and implied terms which are deemed to be expressive of the fundamental nature of the contract of employment; it seems accordingly to be assumed that personal contracts for services must have different or opposite structural features, or implied terms in those particular respects."

They identify three key areas: -

> "Firstly, almost throughout its development during the last twenty years, the implied obligation of mutual trust and confidence seems to have been regarded as a special attribute of the contract of employment: it seems to have been assumed that no such implied obligation would attach to a contract for services, even if that were a personal contract for services."

Secondly, the authors note: -

> "… the emergence during the last decade or so of a doctrine to the effect that the notion of mutuality of obligation applies either in a unique way or at least with special force to the contract of employment. Hence we encounter the view that the presence of mutuality of obligation has become not only a prerequisite for the existence of a contract of employment but also a basis for distinguishing between the contract of employment and the contract for services. In this way it has become an assumption that the contract for services, even when it is a personal contract, does not exhibit mutuality of obligation in the way that the contract of employment must necessarily do."

The authors further contend that the obligations of mutual trust and confidence and of mutuality of obligation:-

> "…can both be regarded as in some sense derived from the idea of the contract of employment as a specially personal one, and so also might we regard the special application of the doctrine of restraint of trade to contracts of employment, and also the special approach to remedies for wrongful termination which has developed with regard to contracts of employment." (p. 112)

Grounds of appeal 1 & 2 – Mutuality of obligation

48. Karshan contends for six distinct errors by the High Court judge on his approach to mutuality of obligation. Citing paras. 50 and 51 of the High Court judgment it is asserted:-

> "The High Court (O'Connor J.) erred in its application of the law concerning mutuality of obligation. The High Court adopted an approach which is significantly out of line with the existing binding precedents on mutuality of obligation, and fails to distinguish sufficiently, or at all, those binding precedents." (p. 4 of submissions)

Mutuality of obligation – General principles

49. Edwards J. in Barry observed:-

> "The requirement of mutuality of obligation is the requirement that there must be mutual obligations on the employer to provide work for the employee and on the employee to perform work for the employer. If such mutuality is not present, then either there is no contract at all or whatever contract there is must be a contract for services or something else, but not a contract of service. It was characterised in Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd v Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 … as the 'one sine qua non which can firmly be identified as an essential of the existence of a contract of service'…in Carmichael v. National Power plc [1999] I.C.R. 1226 at 1230 it was referred to as 'that irreducible minimum of mutual obligation necessary to create a contract of service.' Accordingly the mutuality of obligation test provides an important filter." (para. 47)

50. Edwards J. in Barry confirmed that the English jurisprudence on mutuality of obligation was part of Irish law and one important factor in establishing the legal nature of a work relationship. On its own, it is never outcome-determinative as to status. Edwards J. in Barry does not reference the terms of any particular clauses contained in the written agreement between the parties. The decision is entirely consistent with the principle that the ongoing working or operational practice between the parties may demonstrate the necessary mutuality of obligation irrespective of the express terms of any written agreement between the parties.

51. Analysis of the true nature of the relationship between the parties involves an evaluation as to whether there are mutual obligations on the part of the company and the individual concerned. In a case such the present, where the individual contract was not in writing, the ascertainment of its true operational terms is informed primarily by the ongoing nature of the relationship and the course of conduct and dealings between the parties over time. There is no authority for the proposition that exact symmetry is essential to mutuality of work-related obligation.

52. In Windle v. Secretary of State for Justice [2016] EWCA Civ. 459 Underhill J. in the English Court of Appeal held that in determining whether a claimant is an employee an essential question is not to what extent he is acting "under direction" or is in a "subordinate" position while at work. Underhill L.J. observed at para. 23: -

> "…the ultimate question must be the nature of the relationship during the period that the work is being done. But it does not follow that the absence of mutuality of obligation outside that period may not influence, or shed light on, the character of the relationship within it. It seems to me a matter of common sense and common experience that the fact that a person supplying services is only doing so on an assignment-by-assignment basis may tend to indicate a degree of independence, or lack of subordination, in the relationship while at work which is incompatible with employee status…Of course it will not always be so…its relevance will depend on the particular facts of the case; but to exclude consideration of it in limine runs counter to the repeated message of the authorities that it is necessary to consider all the circumstances."

53. The judgment in Windle followed the earlier decision of Elias L.J. in Quashie v. Stringfellows Restaurant Limited [2012] EWCA Civ. 1735 which had held: -

> "10. An issue that arises in this case is the significance of mutuality of obligation in the employment contract. Every bilateral contract requires mutual obligations; they constitute the consideration from each party necessary to create the contract. Typically an employment contract will be for a fixed or indefinite duration, and one of the obligations will be to keep the relationship in place until it is lawfully severed, usually by termination on notice. But there are some circumstances where a worker works intermittently for the employer, perhaps as and when work is available. There is in principle no reason why the worker should not be employed under a contract of employment for each separate engagement, even if of short duration, as a number of authorities have confirmed: see the decisions of the Court of Appeal in [Mc]Meechan v Secretary of State for Employment [1997] IRLR 353 and Cornwall County Council v Prater [2006] IRLR 362.…

12. …However, whilst the fact that there is no umbrella contract does not preclude the worker being employed under a contract of employment when actually carrying out an engagement, the fact that a worker only works casually and intermittently for an employer may, depending on the facts, justify an inference that when he or she does work it is to provide services as an independent contractor rather than as an employee. This was the way in which the employment tribunal analysed the employment status of casual wine waiters in O'Kelly v Trusthouse Forte plc [1983] IRLR 369, and the Court of Appeal held that it was a cogent analysis, consistent with the evidence, which the Employment Appeal Tribunal had been wrong to reverse." (emphasis added)

54. It may be borne in mind that the observations of Elias L.J. in Quashie were directed towards facts which contended that an unfair dismissal had taken place. Further, it is to be borne in mind that the judgment pertained to status and whether the claimant could be characterised as a "worker" pursuant to s. 230(3) of the Employment Rights Act (UK) 1996, a provision with no counterpart in this jurisdiction. That provision has no relevance to this case. That said, the dicta regarding mutuality of obligation are germane to the exclusionary modification aspect of the assessment of whether a contract of service exists or not on given facts.

55. Is it material or relevant that either side could hypothetically walk away without sanction at the conclusion of a roster period? In my view it is not, since all the material individual contracts considered by the Appeals Commissioner had been fulfilled. The options of the parties regarding future individual contracts are not germane to the issue. The question is rather whether the fact that either side could choose not to fulfil individual contracts and the extent to which, if at all, that occurred in practice without any possibility of sanction is material.

56. The McMeechan decision as well as the other jurisprudence relied upon, though not binding on this court, is of course of interest in the context of the evolution of the common law in this particular area. That line of authority demonstrates that it is not necessary to find mutuality of obligation in the overarching contract provided it is located within the context of each single engagement entered into thereunder, and further: -

(1) The question of whether a single engagement gives rise to a contract of employment is not resolved by a decision that the overarching contract does not give rise to a contract of employment.

(2) In particular, the fact that there is no obligation under the overarching contract to offer, or to do, work in the event that it is offered or indeed where there are to be found clauses expressly negating any such obligation is not in and of itself determinative that a single engagement cannot give rise to a contract of employment and the relationship of employer and employee.

(3) The nature of each contract is a distinct question to be examined and considered in light of the facts.

(4) A single engagement can give rise to a contract of employment if work which has in fact been offered is in fact carried out by the worker for payment.

The decision reinforces the correctness of the view of the Commissioner at paras. 156-160 and in particular at para. 164 of the Determination.

57. The appellants cited in argument the decision of Upper Tribunal in Commissioners for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs v. Professional Game Match Officials Limited [2020] UKUT 147 (TCC) which at the date of this appeal hearing was under appeal to the English Court of Appeal. Since the decision in the said appeal was delivered subsequently to this hearing and consequently was not the subject of argument its relevance, if any, to the matters in issue herein will fall to be considered on another occasion.

58. The evidence in this case demonstrated that the completed roster when submitted to the driver amounted to an acceptance by the appellant of the offer he/she had previously made when he/she initially signified the days and times of availability for work for the week in question. That process gave rise to a bilateral contract on each separate occasion which ended at the conclusion of the transaction covered by the roster in question and when invoices were submitted for payment.

Weight Watchers

59. One would have thought that the statement of Briggs J. at para. 42 of Weight Watchers UK Limited v. HMRC [2011] UKUT 433 TCC was uncontroversial:

> "Putting it more broadly, where it is shown in relation to a particular contract that there exists both the requisite mutuality of work-related obligation and the requisite degree of control, then it will prima facie be a contract of employment unless, viewed as a whole, there is something about its terms which places it in some different category. The judge does not, after finding that the first two conditions are satisfied, approach the remaining condition from an evenly balanced starting point, looking to weigh the provisions of the contract to find which predominate, but rather for a review of the whole of the terms for the purpose of ensuring that there is nothing which points away from the prima facie affirmative conclusion reached as the result of satisfaction of the first two conditions."

It is unnecessary to approach the definition of the obligation which is required on the employer's side upon too narrow a basis. Briggs J. cited with approval the judgment of Sir Christopher Slade in Clark v. Oxfordshire Health Authority [1998] I.R.L.R. 125. At para. 27 Briggs J. noted:

"In Clark v Oxfordshire Health Authority (1997) 41 BMLR 18, [1998] IRLR 125, in the Court of Appeal, it was held that the requisite mutuality of obligation must subsist 'over the entire duration of the relevant period': see per Sir Christopher Slade (41 BMLR 18 at 24, [1998] IRLR 125, para 22). In its context, the reference in the passage quoted above to 'the relevant period' meant the period of the existence of the contract alleged to amount to a contract of employment."

60. It is noteworthy that Sir Christopher Slade in Clark had also stated at para. 41:-

"…The mutual obligations required to found a global contract of employment need not necessarily and in every case consist of obligations to provide and perform work. To take one obvious example, an obligation by the one party to accept and do work if offered and an obligation on the other party to pay a retainer during such periods as work are not offered would in my opinion, be likely to suffice. In my judgment, however …what the authorities require is to hold that some mutuality of obligation is required to found a global contract of employment."

61. The decision in Weight Watchers suggests that a contract which entitles a worker to find a replacement for an agreed shift but where the company actually pays is not inconsistent with an employment relationship.

62. The headnote for the Weight Watchers' decision in Simon's Tax Cases succinctly notes;

"In relation to any specific meeting or series of meetings, leaders conducted them pursuant to specific contracts for the taking of those meetings. In addition to those meeting-specific contracts, there was an over-arching or umbrella contract (constituted by the conditions, the MOA and the policy booklets) between WWUK and each leader, dealing in particular with obligations of leaders affecting them otherwise than when taking meetings. The umbrella agreement was no more than an agreement to agree, requiring a further and distinct contract-making process for the conduct of any particular meeting or series of meetings. The initiative was on the leader who had to propose the relevant timing, date and venue of any meeting or series of meetings for WWUK's agreement. Those meeting-specific agreements satisfied the mutuality of obligation condition. The condition which permitted a leader not to take a particular meeting was not unfettered; the leader was required to show some good reason for proposing not to take a meeting, to seek to find a suitably qualified replacement, to notify WWUK if he was unable to do so, and to conduct all subsequent meetings in the series which had been agreed. That condition did not make the replacement leader the original leader's delegate but gave rise to a new contract in relation to that particular meeting between WWUK and the replacement leader. Further, looking at the contractual provisions as a whole, there was sufficient control by WWUK over the leaders. On a review of the contractual relationship between WWUK and its leaders as a whole, the indicators of employment constituted by the requisite mutuality of obligation and degree of control were not overridden by some other relevant aspect of the relationship. On balance, the leaders were employees of WWUK rather than independent contractors."

63. In my view there is a strong analogy with the instant case. The overarching agreement was an agreement to agree and the rosters embodied the "further and distinct contract-making process". It contained provisions – such as Clause 11 - which affected, restricted or controlled drivers at times outside those when they were actually delivering pizzas. The initiative was on the driver to propose his "days" and "times" of availability to drive for Karshan's agreement and there is a strong alignment with Clause 6 of the Weight Watchers contract in that regard. The roster once agreed satisfied the mutuality of obligation condition. It obliged Karshan to engage the driver for the shifts and to pay him accordingly and required him to attend for driving duties save where "at short notice" he became "unavailable". Under the discrete contract the freedom of a driver not to drive was not unfettered and was envisaged to arise exceptionally where "unavailability" arose "at short notice". This connotes exceptionality and is not consistent with a general unfettered right not to show up for a rostered shift. Since unavailability for one shift did not terminate the discrete rostered contract there was a continuing obligation to work the subsequent shifts remaining on the roster. While the worker was not obliged to find a replacement there was a qualified entitlement to propose a driver who met the criteria of being "capable of performing the contractor's obligations in all respects". The appellant's argument that Weight Watchers is distinguishable on its facts does not stand up to scrutiny.

64. In my view the substitution provision was analogous to that in Weight Watchers in its operation. Briggs J. observed at para 33 – 34:-

> "[33] At the other end of the spectrum, contracts for work frequently provide that if the worker is for some good reason unable to work, he or she may arrange for a person approved by the employer to do it, not as a delegate but under a replacement contract for that particular work assignment made directly between the employer and the substituted person. In MacFarlane v Glasgow City Council [2001] IRLR 7, a qualified gymnastic instructor was entitled, if unable to take a particular class, to arrange for a replacement from a register of coaches retained by the council, upon the basis that the replacement would be paid for taking the class directly by the council, rather than by the originally appointed instructor. The Employment Appeal Tribunal had no difficulty in concluding, distinguishing Tanton, that this provision was not necessarily inconsistent with a contract of employment between the council and the instructor.
> [34] The true distinction between the two types of case is that in the former the contracting party is performing his obligation by providing another person to do the work whereas in the latter the contracting party is relying upon a qualified right not to do or provide the work in stated circumstances, one of the qualifications being that he finds a substitute to contract directly with the employer to do the work instead."

65. It is to be borne in mind that each individual case is substantially fact-driven. The case-law is of general interest but often decisions are no more than examples of a court's application of broad underlying principles to very specific and often highly individualised sets of facts. It is not necessarily profitable or indeed prudent to mine the authorities in the expectation of extrapolating a definitive answer to the issues raised in this appeal.

66. It is to be borne in mind that the term "mutuality of obligation" does not have a single universal definitive meaning. It can operate differently in different contexts. There is a risk of selectively extrapolating judicial observations from a myriad of different authorities to illustrate a proposition. The assignment of mutual obligation – which the Respondents correctly acknowledge is the sine qua non of an employment relationship - to an arrangement is in each case substantially fact dependent.

67. The terms of an overarching agreement are to be construed against evidence of any sustained course of dealing between the parties and the terms and operation of any individual contract. In general, the existence or non-existence of a contract of service ought not to be decided by a rule of thumb but rather by an evaluation of all the various indicia having due regard to the authorities and having regard to the distinguishability of cases decided in various areas such as revenue and employment law.

68. A key factor to be taken into account in assessing the issues in this appeal is what was/were the actual contract(s) governing the relationship between the parties? Whilst the relationship in question was governed by the overarching contract there were also individual contracts triggered and operated on foot of the weekly rosters and performed by the drivers and the company as bipartite arrangements. The sums which are the subject matter of the claim by revenue were paid pursuant to the individual contracts.

69. The first alleged error in relation to the trial judge's approach to mutuality of obligation is stated thus: -

> "The conclusion of O'Connor J. to the effect that Minister for Agriculture and Food v Barry [2008] IEHC 216 can be distinguished because the claims in Barry were for redundancy payments is not borne out by either the wording of the judgment in Barry itself or indeed by the subsequent decision of the High Court in McKayed v Forbidden City Limited trading as Translations.ie [2016] IEHC 722.
> McKayed did not concern eligibility for redundancy payment but instead dealt with the claim under the unfair dismissal's legislation. There is no suggestion in either Barry or McKayed that the legal statement of the nature of mutuality in Barry was limited to any such context of statutory redundancy payments or other statutory employment rights protection. On the contrary, the language of mutuality in Barry and McKayed is universal and all encompassing: mutuality is a sine qua non for all contracts of service. This is not dependent on the context in which the issue of mutuality of obligation is raised for determination in the absence of any different statutory test." (p. 5 of the Notice of Appeal)

This criticism is unduly wide and also unsound. The characterisation of the status of an individual as an employee or an independent contractor can be context dependent.

Context

70. The jurisprudence, particularly in England and Wales, confirms that an employment tribunal or court may regard an individual as an employee for the purposes of, say, unfair dismissal or redundancy, notwithstanding the fact that the revenue authorities have determined that that individual is self-employed for tax purposes. The decision in Airfix Footwear Limited v. Cope [1978] I.R.L.R. 396, [1978] I.C.R. 1210, which was cited by Edwards J. in Barry is illustrative of that principle.

71. Furthermore, one legal forum be it an employment tribunal or otherwise may, depending on context, regard the same individual as an employee for certain purposes but not for others. There are many authorities in this regard including Denham v. Midland Employers Mutual Assurance Limited [1955] 2 Q.B. 437, [1955] 2 All ER 561 a decision of the English Court of Appeal and Cross v. Redpath Dorman Long (Contracting) Limited [1978] I.C.R. 730. These and other cases illustrate the principle that for instance, depending on the facts and the context in which the issue falls to be determined, there may be held to be a sufficient degree of control to render an individual vicariously liable for the torts of another on a master and servant basis but nonetheless insufficient control to render that same entity liable to pay employers contributions in respect of the individual.

72. The trial judge's statement at para. 51 that "overarching and hybrid contracts require more ongoing commitments in unfair dismissal, redundancy and other labour rights cases due to the statutory triggers based on defined periods of employment" is correct as Airfix, Denham and Cross v. Redpath show.

73. To contend, as the appellant appears to, that the absence of a statement in either Barry or McKayed "that the legal statement on the nature of mutuality in Barry was limited to any such context of statutory redundancy payments or other statutory employment rights protection" constitutes evidence that the observations of Edwards J. are of "universal or all-encompassing application" is unsound. Edwards J. at no point contended or implied that his observations were intended to be of universal application.

74. The appellant contends that "in concluding that mutuality existed, the trial judge appears to regard this conclusion as determinative of the question of whether the drivers were employees". This is asserted to be inconsistent with the approach of the High Court in Barry where Edwards J. cautioned: -

> "If mutuality of obligation is found to exist, the mere fact of its existence is not, of itself, determinative of the nature of the relationship and it is necessary to examine the relationship further." (para. 13)

The appellant continues –

> "O'Connor J.'s judgment does not explain how the decision of the High Court in McKayed where a contract of service was rejected on facts even more compelling in pointing towards that status than those in the instant case – can be distinguished from the facts of this case." (p. 5 of the Notice of Appeal)

A consideration of the judgment of the High Court under appeal as a whole does not support this contention, however. A case such as McKayed, an alleged statutory unfair dismissal, considered hereafter, turns on its own particular facts and the specific language and provisions of the written contract in that case.

75. The appellant complains that the judge regarded a conclusion on the issue of mutuality of obligation as determinative of the nature of the relationship itself. A failure by the trial judge to exhaustively and expressly engage with various dicta in the Barry decision does not support such a complaint. The High Court judge had clearly read and gave adequate consideration to Barry. The High Court judge gave significant attention to the mutuality of obligation issue in the context of the multiple individual contracts. That reflects the importance accorded to it by the appellant. He also properly engaged with the other issues arising such as whether a finding that the overarching contract encompassed mutuality was necessary, substitution, integration, and the inter-relationship between the written overarching agreement and "how the contract worked out in practice" and he correctly did so in a manner consistent with the decisions in Henry Denny and Castleisland Cattle Breeding v. Minister for Social Welfare [2004] IESC 40, [2004] 4 I.R. 150.

76. Indeed, a substantial aspect of the judgment focuses on the approach that the High Court should adopt towards previous decisions of that court including the decisions of Clarke J. in the matter of Worldport Ireland Limited (in liquidation) [2005] IEHC 189, Khadri v. Governor of Wheatfield Prison [2012] IESC 27. The fundamental difference between the cases lies in the tenor and language of the contract in each case.

77. Contrary to the contentions advanced on behalf of the appellant, neither in his judgment or in his conclusions, did the trial judge treat mutuality of obligation as, in and of itself, determinative of the question as to whether the drivers were employees.

78. The decision in McKayed turns on its own facts, which cannot be said to be "even more compelling" than the facts of the instant case. The issue centred on an alleged unfair dismissal rather than tax law. Another significant distinguishing factor is that McKayed was an appeal from the Employment Appeals Tribunal, the expert body nominated by statute to decide the issue of status in that case. That body after a comprehensive hearing had concluded that the plaintiff was not an employee of the defendant. It is noteworthy that Ní Raifeartaigh J. did not disturb that finding. Significantly, in the context of the facts of the instant case, in McKayed there was no evidence of rosters of work being prepared and agreed weekly on an ongoing basis.

79. On the facts Ní Raifeartaigh J. concluded that there was no mutuality by reason that the plaintiff's contract did not guarantee him work from the defendant. Her observation at para. 39 that, "the fact that work was given regularly for a period of time is not determinative of whether one party has had a legal obligation to provide the other party with work" is indeed true in the context of the facts. However, the fact that in a given case an individual worked regularly over an appreciable period of time in return for remuneration can, in light of the economic reality and when coupled with other factors, including the control test and the indicia of the integration test be a significant indicator that a contract of service exists and that the relationship between the parties is that of employer and employee. Observations made in specific or exceptional cases such as in the decision in McKayed v. Forbidden City Limited trading as Translations [2016] IEHC 722 ought not to be elevated into universal propositions.

80. The third alleged error is characterised thus: -

> "O'Connor J.'s conclusion that the Appeal Commissioner's decision in relying upon Weight Watchers UK Limited v HMRC [2011] UKUT 433 TCC 'did not go against Irish law but rather recognised the necessity to adapt modern means of engaging workers' was incorrect in:
>
> (i) making reference to 'workers' which is the statutory intermediate category at issue in Weight Watchers under s. 230 of the Employment Rights Act, 1996 but which is of no application in Irish employment law and

(ii) being inconsistent with the separation of powers in that any such policy change is a matter for the legislature and not the courts." (p. 5 of the Notice of Appeal)

Reliance was placed by the appellant on a judgment of Underhill L.J. in Uber BV v. Aslam [2018] EWCA Civ. 2748, where he cautioned that if a court concludes that the scope of protection does not go far enough then "the right answer is to amend the legislation", adding at para. 164 that "courts are anxious so far as possible to adapt the common law to changing conditions, but the tools at their disposal are limited, particularly when dealing with statutory definitions."

81. Dealing with the last point first, reliance is being placed here on a dissenting judgment of the English Court of Appeal. Underhill L.J's view did not find favour with either the majority of that court itself. However, while the decision of Underhill L.J. in Uber BV v. Aslam [2018] EWCA Civ. 2748 was relied on, it is noted that following the conclusion of the hearing of this appeal a judgment of the UK Supreme Court was delivered in that case. Consideration of that decision's relevance to any issue arising in this appeal will fall to be considered on another occasion.

82. The findings of the High Court judge were based on his evaluation of the correctness of the approach of Appeals Commissioner to the construction exercise undertaken. Legislation was not required to construe the terms of the contractual relationship. Neither does such an exercise in this instance trench on the separation of powers. O'Connor J. did not find that the Appeals Commissioner had proceeded to "adapt the law" in the strict sense. The complaint selectively distorted the import of the judge's findings in that regard. Reading the judgment in the context of the determination, the judge's observations mean nothing more than that the Appeals Commissioner used the approach of "looking beyond the label" imposed by Karshan on the arrangement to identify the true nature of the relationship between the parties. This approach was approved by Murphy J. in the Supreme Court decision in Henry Denny and reflects other Supreme Court decisions such as Gatien and Irish Shell.

83. It is readily understood by any reasonable reader of the judgment under appeal that the use of the word "workers" by the High Court judge is to be taken as connoting an individual engaged under contract of service or an individual carrying out tasks in return for remuneration depending on the context. On no reasonable construction could the word "workers" in the High Court judgment be construed as referring to a statutory category under UK legislation which has no analogue under Irish law. The judge was obviously aware of the distinction as para. 62 of the judgment makes clear. Cases from England and Wales that consider the concept of mutuality of obligation sometimes concern statutory "workers" and some such judgments are of assistance to the issue. Nowhere was the construction of that concept misapplied by the trial judge as the appellant contends.

84. The fourth contention is characterised thus:-

> "The learned trial judge did not determine the appellant's arguments that the Commissioner (at para. 49 of her determination) misapplied Weight Watchers UK Limited v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2011] UKUT 433 TCC, [2011] All ER (D) 229 in the absence of an identified contractual obligation on a driver to make oneself available for work. The judge did not determine the arguments concerning the Commissioner's important finding that a driver was contractually obliged to initiate an agreement based on this judgment. The relevant finding made by the judge was:

‘49. The description by the Commissioner about an obligation for drivers to initiate an agreement should be taken in context. The court understands that the initiation of the relevant contract for each roster depended on a driver making himself available. The Commissioner did not err in characterising the overarching and hybrid agreements.’”

85. The objection continues: –

> “The focus of argument was – as it must be – on any alleged obligation to initiate, not whether same occurred as a matter of practice. In finding that ‘the case is concerned with whether the Commissioner misstated or misunderstood the law about the mutuality of obligation’ the judge ignored the arguments that arguments were also made about the manner in which the law was applied to the facts of the case.” (p. 6 of the Notice of Appeal)

86. These complaints are not sustainable, and no error is identified in the approach of the trial judge in his assessment in turn of the approach of the Commissioner. Perhaps the trial judge’s process of analysis and reasoning could have been more thoroughly laid out. It is to be understood from his judgment that the trial judge did analyse the Weight Watchers decision, the Commissioner’s treatment of it and, considered the criticisms of same by the appellant unpersuasive. In my view he was correct in that regard for, inter alia, the reasons identified at para. 50 of his judgment.

87. No Irish authority was identified by the appellant which was inconsistent with or expressly rejected the reasoning of Briggs J. in Weight Watchers UK Limited v. Revenue and Customs Commissioners. The conclusion of Briggs J. in Weight Watchers that cancelling a shift did not relieve the individual of work -related obligations is consistent with common sense. The same outcome could readily have been arrived at by the Appeal Commissioner based on the ordinary principles of contract interpretation irrespective of Weight Watchers.

88. The appellant contends that the Commissioner "became hopelessly confused because of her reading of Weight Watchers." (p. 37 of Transcript) that assertion was not made out. I am satisfied that "unavailability" "at short notice" for a single shift did not relieve a driver from his other obligations including the rostered. Furthermore the evidence of Mr. Paliulis that " there would be follow up if an employee did not attend work having been rostered." (para. 24. of Determination) contradicts Karshan's contention. Since Karshan was free to accept or reject the next offer of availability by a driver to work a roster of days, that reality operated as a powerful ongoing disincentive – if not an implicit sanction -for failure of a driver to work the agreed shifts.

89. I am not satisfied that the trial judge ignored arguments made regarding the manner in which the Commissioner applied the jurisprudence to the facts of the case. Indeed, a fair minded consideration of paras. 49 to 66 inclusive demonstrates that he broadly engaged with the jurisprudence and considered the approach of the Commissioner to its application in arriving at her determination.

90. Paragraphs 53 to 55 of the judgment are clear: -

> "The written overarching contract did indeed require a driver to initiate an agreement with the appellant.
>
> 54. I cannot criticise the Commissioner's findings that –
>
> (i) A driver who wanted to work had to put his name on the availability sheet.
>
> (ii) Once rostered by the appellant, there was a contract which retained mutual obligations.

55. In the circumstances the right to cancel a shift at short notice imposed obligations to engage a substitute and work out the remainder of the shifts in the series."

91. Implicit in the High Court's findings was that the Appeals Commissioner was correct in concluding that that there was an obligation on the driver to trigger individual contracts. There was clear evidence supporting that conclusion.

92. Take for instance Clause 14: "The company does not warrant or represent that it will utilise the contractor's services at all". There is no reciprocal provision that the driver does not warrant or represent that they will work for the company at all. That is very significant. If one delves more closely into the contract a combination of clauses 14 and 12, considered in the context of the established hebdomadal practice of drivers submitting time sheets of their availability which operated on an ongoing basis, it does become clear that operationally the mutual understanding, expectation and intention of the parties was that the driver had an ongoing contractual obligation to make himself available by filling out weekly availability sheets. If Karshan intended that a driver had no obligation to drive then one would expect Clause 14 to state "The driver does not warrant or represent that he will ever drive for the company at all", or words to that effect.

93. The language of Clause 14 in that regard viewed against the ongoing practice as found by the Commissioner regarding the creation of rosters is instructive. At Clause 14 the company "recognises the contractor's right to make himself available on only certain days and certain times of his own choosing". Hidden in plain sight within the delimiting language ("only certain days") of that clause is the implicit ongoing positive obligation of the driver to make himself available to drive on "certain days". This contrasts fundamentally with cases such as O'Kelly where workers reserved the right not to work and the company reserved the equal right not to engage them. The deftness of the drafting does not dilute the positive obligation on the driver to "make himself available" for work which is embedded in the language of the clause. The ongoing weekly engagement via creation and circulation of rosters reflected the actual terms of that clause. The judge was entitled to find that the Commissioner had not misunderstood or misapplied the law.

94. The trial judge was correct in his assessment of the Commissioner's approach in having regard to what occurred in practice. It independently corroborated her reasonable construction of Clause 14, namely the ongoing obligation imposed on the driver underpinning the words "the contractor's right to make himself available on only certain days and certain times of his own choosing" on its true operational construction. At para 38 she had found, "Based on the witness evidence together with the documentary evidence, I find … as a material fact that practice was that drivers would fill out an "availability sheet" approximately one week prior to a roster being drawn up."

95. The fifth error contended for is that:-

> "The learned trial judge erred in holding that 'mutuality of obligation can occur under an overarching contract' in circumstances where the Appeal Commissioner found that it was not necessary to consider whether the overarching contract contained mutuality of obligations." (p. 6 of the Notice of Appeal)

96. The judgment demonstrates that the trial judge was in no doubt as to the determination of the Commissioner. At para. 13 he observed:-

> "The Commissioner held in this case that there was an overarching contract supplemented by individual contracts in respect of each assignment or roster of work. The requirement of mutuality was satisfied in the individual contracts."

His approach was comprehensive in that regard and was correct. An analysis of the overarching contract from the perspective of mutuality of obligation can be relevant and can have a reinforcing impact in arriving at a rounded and comprehensive view of the true nature of the relationship between the parties – but it is not necessary to establish mutuality with regard to the overarching contract where it is demonstrated to exist in each of the individual agreements.

Mutuality of obligation – Alleged error no. 6

97. The appellant contends that:-

> "The learned trial judge erred in holding that mutuality of obligations existed in circumstances where the workers were not obliged to make themselves available for work and were not compelled to attend work and the appellant was not obliged to provide work." (p. 6 of the Notice of Appeal)

98. This assertion is wrong and premised on an erroneous understanding of the individual contracts. The company had an ongoing need for pizza drivers as an integral part of its daily operations.

Obligations of Driver

99. The following obligations can be inferred from Clause 14:

(a) the driver had an ongoing obligation to make himself available to drive (Clause 14);

(b) that obligation extended to "certain days" (Clause 14) (noted to be plural) on which he made himself available;

(c) the driver had to commit to identified shifts - the "certain times" within the days in question that he made himself available;

(d) The driver's obligation to make himself available to drive was given effect to by submitting in advance the days and times of availability for a forthcoming week

(e) The company created driving rosters based on stated availability of the driver thereby creating binding individual contracts with each.

(f) The company circulated the rosters to the drivers in advance each week.

(g) The company was obliged to provide work for "the days and times" (Clause 14 of Overarching Agreement) specified in the weekly roster circulated.

(h) If the driver should become unavailable to drive for a pre-agreed shift, he was obliged to notify the company in advance.

(i) The company was obliged to pay the worker - a "drop rate" of €1.20 plus an additional 20 cent payable to the driver in respect of insurance.

(j) By wearing the necessary Domino's branded promotion apparel the company was obliged to pay the driver an hourly "advertising rate" of €5.65.

Thus it cannot be stated that the driver had no obligation on foot of the reasonable construction of the overarching agreement to make himself available to drive.

100. The operational modalities whereby that obligation was discharged were gleaned by the Commissioner from the evidence of the nine witnesses who testified. Their evidence demonstrates that the performance of Clause 14 (i.e. assignments of work) was effected by the filling out of the availability sheets approximately one week prior to a roster being drawn up by the company. This roster was found to be drawn up by the store manager and based on the availability sheets. Merely because it was the driver rather than Karshan who triggered the process by submitting the availability sheet prior to the creation of each roster does not detract from its significance. That factor is crucial to understanding the operating dynamic underpinning the relationship between the company and the drivers.

101. Rosters came into being and were devised based on two factors:

(a) the availability sheets of the driver submitted for the relevant days/times each week; and,

(b) the anticipated need of the company for food deliveries for the like time frame.

In that context, Clause 14 of the overarching agreement is text which falls to be construed in context. Hypothetically, the company did not warrant that it would utilise a driver's services but there was no evidence that the company in practice ever operated Clause 14 to withdraw work hours previously agreed under a roster created after a driver had indicated days of availability to drive. Presumably that clause could be availed of were the company not open for any reason on a given day/week and when, accordingly, it had no need for drivers. In practice, the creation of the individual contracts arose after the drivers submitted details of availability as required by Clause 14 which enabled the creation and circulation of the rosters.

102. For the Appeals Commissioner to determine that a contract of service existed, it was not necessary that she should find that the appellant was "required to accept any such invitation or offer". It was sufficient that the evidence demonstrated that such offers were routinely accepted. There was no evidence adduced on behalf of the appellant at the hearing that store managers ever disregarded indications of drivers' availability when fixing rosters.

103. Further it is material that there was, apparently, no evidence put before the Commissioner that the company ever purported to repudiate an agreement once a roster had been created and circulated to drivers, agreeing to work times ("certain days and certain times") chosen by them. There was no evidence that the company thereafter ever purported to unilaterally prevent a driver from working a pre-agreed shift except for a threat to send home a driver for failure of a driver to make up pizza boxes. Thus, the first sentence of Clause 14 came to be modified in practice on each occasion that the manager created a roster which accepted some/all of the days/hours offered by a driver to drive.

104. The ongoing obligation of the drivers to make themselves available for work is located in the true construction of Clause 14, as stated above. In the opening words of Clause 14, it is expressly stated that "the company does not warrant or represent that it will utilise the contractor's services at all". The omission of a reciprocal statement that a driver was not obliged to ever be available for work at all, coupled with the actual balance of Clause 14, is fatal to the appellant's contention in this regard. If it were intended that the drivers were never obliged to make themselves available for work, that would have been expressly stated. The finding at para. 38 (a) of the determination is entirely consistent with the tenor of Clause 14.

105. Regarding the appellant's contention that workers were "not compelled to attend work", neither the language of the overarching contract nor the evidence with regard to the operation of the individual contracts support that contention. Clause 14 "recognises the contractor's right to make himself available on only certain days and certain times of his own choosing". However, nowhere does it state that having indicated his availability for the said "certain days and certain times" in question, he is then entirely free to habitually or routinely proceed not to show up for work. The language in Clause 12 references unavailability "at short notice". This speaks to some exceptionality that might arise. Unavailability in the context of Clause 14 pertains to "a previously agreed delivery service" which arises under a binding individual contract. This strongly indicates that it is a single once-off state of affairs rather than the driver who had submitted his availability and received a designated roster being entitled to decide not to work a shift or the balance of a roster for the week in question. Work obligations under the individual contract resume once the exigency has passed in accordance with the ordinary principles of contract law.

106. Para. 81 of the Appeals Commissioner's determination ought not to be taken out of context but rather is to be read in light of the totality of the Determination and the fact that the findings and conclusions were expressly confined to the individual contracts actually worked. True enough the company had no obligation to offer work as Clause 14 of the Overarching Agreement makes clear. But in practice, the operative ongoing arrangement under the hybrid agreement meant that the driver was obliged to submit weekly availability details in advance based upon which the company invariably created the weekly rosters allocating driving work to the said drivers giving rise to binding contracts for work and wages which encompassed, inter alia, mutuality of obligation between the parties albeit triggered by the driver rather than the company.

107. Counsel for the appellant argued that the test must be applied before the workers actually "do the work". No authority for this proposition was identified. It merely aims to retrofit a hypothetical version of the relationship between the parties that did not occur in practice. It requires the court to disregard the way in which individual contracts actually came about and were concluded in practice whereby the employer in circulating the weekly roster assumed an obligation to provide work to the employee who had triggered Clause 14.

108. At the level of the individual contract, once the company accepted the offer to work by circulating the roster, the parties were contractually bound to perform it subject to any exceptional eventuality. There was no evidence that, having provided a roster, the company ever considered itself at liberty to repudiate same by declining to permit a driver who had become "unavailable at short notice" on one day of a roster to work the balance of that agreed roster. Thus, this contended error is not supported by any evidence and is misconceived.

109. A further factor is that, in circumstances where drivers were standing around waiting for pizza orders, the evidence was that the appellant would ensure that the drivers would only get one delivery on any occasion when another driver was also awaiting a delivery assignment. This tends to point towards an understanding on the part of the appellant of an obligation to provide actual delivery work and behave in an equitable fashion as between drivers notwithstanding that, for instance, two deliveries might efficiently and more cheaply be carried out by one driver on the occasion in question. Such conduct points towards a mutuality of obligation and an underlying mutual trust and confidence between the parties which is consonant with contract of service.

Rostering

110. Key findings of fact on the part of the Commissioner led her to conclude that the drivers worked under multiple contracts of service and were taxable in relation to the emoluments arising therefrom in accordance with s. 112 TCA without having to determine conclusively whether there was mutuality of obligation under the overarching agreement. That conclusion, in my view, was inevitable and entirely sufficient for the Appeals Commissioner's purposes and arose from the witness evidence, referred to at paras. 21, 22 and 23 of the Determination and findings of fact on the part of the Commissioner referred to at para. 38 (a) of the Determination, particularly in relation to the ongoing obligation on the driver to trigger individual contracts and the rostering process. Particularly significant in that regard was that the witnesses who gave evidence included the appellant's own operations director, Mr. Fergus McDonnell, Mr. Martynas Paliulis, a former store manager and area manager with the appellant's sister company, and Mr. Arkadiusz Milczarek, a former driver of the appellant company. Thus her findings at para. 49 of the Determination was based on a clear and logical foundation having due regard to the evidence combined with para. 14 of the Overarching Agreement and her analysis of, inter alia, the decision of Briggs J. in Weight

Watchers (UK) Ltd at para. 42- 48. At para. 38 she had made clear that her material findings of fact were; "Based on the witness evidence together with the documentary evidence … as a material fact that practice was that drivers would fill out an "availability sheet" approximately one week prior to a roster being drawn up.".

111. The appellant faults the High Court's decision to uphold of the findings of the Commissioner in regard to rostering, contending that there is no finding as to the basis on which a driver was rostered. However, I conclude that such criticism does not withstand scrutiny. This was a hybrid agreement. A key material finding of fact by the Commissioner at para. 38(a) of her determination was that the "practice was that drivers would fill out an "availability sheet" approximately one week prior to a roster being drawn up indicating their availability for work and that the roster would be drawn up by a store manager based on the availability sheets". Thus, the substance of the transactional relationship embodied in the individual discrete contracts was predicated on the prior identification by the driver of anticipated availability for driving work and the prior identification by the manager of anticipated driving needs on a weekly (or so) basis.

112. In my view the trial judge was entitled to uphold the Commissioner's determination even on the basis alone that the language of Clause 14 did impose an obligation on the driver to initiate the agreement via engagement with the roster. The Commissioner had heard the witnesses in regard to, inter alia, rostering at para. 38(a). The rosters created contracts. The Commissioner was entitled to conclude, as she did at para 49 "[o]nce the appellant rostered a driver for one or more shifts of work, there was a contract in place in respect of which the parties retained mutual obligations." The trial judge was correct in his analysis and conclusions in this regard at para. 53 and 54 of his judgment.

113. Mutuality of obligation was not the only criterion to be fulfilled and the individual contracts operating as outlined herein met all of the other relevant criteria including control, integration, obligations of mutual trust and confidence subsisting between the parties and the relationship of employer and employee accorded with the economic reality of the arrangement in all material respects.

The reasoning in Pimlico Plumbers and Autoclenz

114. At para. 81 of the Determination, the Commissioner said she had regard to the reasoning in Pimlico Plumbers and Autoclenz, to the effect that a clause which provides that the provider of work has no obligation to offer work and the putative recipient no obligation to accept work does not mean that mutuality of obligation is absent, and that same was of assistance to her analysis and approach accords with settled Irish jurisprudence long before Autoclenz and Pimlico Plumbers were decided as the decisions of the Irish Supreme Court outlined above and J.C.W. Wylie Landlord and Tenant Law (3rd edn, Bloomsbury Professional, 2014) in his observations at para. 2.30 illustrate:-

> "…the courts are well aware of the danger that the written agreement, however explicit its terms, may not represent the true agreement of the parties. In particular, unlike in the Gatien case, the parties may not be in an equal bargaining position and fully advised, so that the courts are astute to spot the "sham" agreement and will not be blinded by clever draftsmanship."

115. The Commissioner cannot be criticised in her approach at para. 81 et. seq.- particularly in light of the jurisprudence above. Her approach in that limited aspect is entirely consistent with the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court outlined above. I construe Clause 14 as imposing an obligation on a driver to submit details of days and hours of availability.

116. The decisions of the UKSC in Autoclenz and Pimlico Plumbers was informed by landlord and tenant jurisprudence and the challenge of "sham" arrangements. Lord Clark

S.C.J. in Autoclenz found that the written documentation was not the same as the "true agreement" that subsisted between the parties. He observed that:

> "…the relevant bargaining power of the parties must be taken into account in deciding whether the terms of any written agreement in truth represent what was agreed and the true agreement will often have to be gleaned from all the circumstances of the case, of which the written agreement is only a part. This may be described as a purposive approach to the problem.

117. The decision in Autoclenz echoes the Supreme Court's observations in cases such as Gatien Motor Co v. Continental Oil, particularly since Autoclenz demonstrates the assistance to be derived from landlord/tenant jurisprudence in evaluating the economic reality in contracts with apparent bargaining imbalances between the parties in employment law. This "purposive" approach to characterisation is entirely consistent with the jurisprudence from the Supreme Court in the field of landlord and tenant law and clearly entitled the Appeals Commissioner to disregard 'terms inconsistent' with independent contractor status in the written overarching contract insofar as those terms did not reflect the reality of the working arrangements

Ground of Appeal 2 – Mutuality of Obligation under the Overarching Contract

118. In light of her conclusions regarding the individual contract, the Appeals Commissioner did not need to proceed to determine whether, inter alia, mutuality of obligation was established under the overarching contract. The appellant has not identified any basis on which Appeals Commissioner was obliged to separately determine mutuality of obligation under the overarching contract. Had Revenue contended that drivers were employees taxable under Schedule E in the periods between individual contracts the position would have been different.

119. Was the driver obliged to accept engagements under the roster? The appellant contends that the driver was not so obliged. However, the tenor of the overarching agreement, the inferences to be drawn from its structure, considered in the context of the genesis of individual contracts coupled with the absence of evidence of any kind suggesting that assignments previously agreed to and rostered were routinely or normally declined by drivers without valid reason and with no consequence for their continued engagement by the company for driving activity undermines that contention.

120. It is clear from the jurisprudence, particularly the judgment of Murphy J. in Henry Denny (with which the Chief Justice agreed) that great care is to be taken where a document purports to express a conclusion of law as to the consequences of its execution between the contracting parties. The initial commencement and recitals indicate that the company wished to subcontract the delivery of pizzas, promote its brand logo and the parties are characterised as "the company" and "the contractor" respectively. The labels attached are not to be taken at face value or probative, without more, as to status. Hence, at Recital No. 1 the phrase, "The contractor shall be retained by the company as an independent contractor" is not dispositive of any issue.

121. The continuing mutual obligations on the part of the company appear to include that he/she – the contractor – is retained by the company (Recital 1). From the company's perspective it assumes the obligation to pay the driver "according to the number of the deliveries successfully undertaken and in addition to pay for brand promotion as specified in Clause 3." The significance of this is considered below.

122. Analogous to the facts in the instant case, the company in the Denny case maintained a panel of individuals. A retail store would contact the local customer service manager requesting a demonstration on a specified day or days as required. Three or four days prior to a demonstration day in a supermarket a demonstrator from the panel was telephoned enquiring as to availability to provide her services on a particular day at a particular shop premises. The Supreme Court found that she worked under a contract of service. As Keane J. found: -

> "Generally speaking, neither the demonstrator nor the appellant knew prior to this time whether or not a demonstration was to be given at any particular shop or store during the immediately following weekend. If the demonstrator was available, it was agreed that the service should be provided." (p. 39)

123. Indeed, in the instant case it could be said that drivers by submitting their schedules of availability in advance for the purposes of creations of rosters on a weekly basis approximately, enjoyed a far greater continuity of expectation of work that did a demonstrator on one of the Henry Denny panels.

124. Whilst the overarching contract contemplates the availability of a delivery vehicle for rent, in practice this clause did not operate between the parties. No inference as to status arises from that fact.

125. The obligation imposed at Clause 7 accords at least as much with the contract of employment as with the contract for services insofar as the driver acknowledges that when effecting deliveries by motorbike or moped, "it is necessary to use and wear protective clothing, helmets and other items as approved and mandated by the Department of the Environment or such regulatory authority as such department may approve of." Were the company of the view that the driver was truly an independent contractor, the company would be unlikely to control the driver's conduct or require the use and wearing of protective clothing. The necessity for a provision in the contract in terms of Clause 7 would likely not arise were the relationship on its true and strict construction, that of a contract for services.

Implicit permanent duration

126. The overarching agreement is not expressed anywhere on its face to be a temporary arrangement, neither is it expressed that it will determine or be extinguished after any specific period of time, duration or event. It encompasses a state of affairs and an intention that the relationship between the parties thereunder will be open ended and of indefinite duration.

127. The putting in place by Karshan of insurance for the benefit of the driver in a manner provided for at Clause 5(a) speaks to the anticipated continuous nature of the arrangement between the parties. Each party anticipates some continuity and is not consistent with a unitised or "spot" exchange of work for remuneration akin to a "once-off" taxi journey. Clause 5(a) is consistent with an expectation of a continuing contractual relationship between the parties.

128. Furthermore, Clause 6 also accords with the mutual commitment and anticipated expectation implicit in a continuing arrangement. It obliges, in the event that the driver has insurance withdrawn, that the company is to be notified immediately "so that the company is aware that the contractor might not be in a position to continue to provide services under this agreement".

Hybrid agreement

129. The issue as to whether a contract of employment in truth came into existence could not be resolved merely by an analysis of the overarching agreement alone. The trial judge had to consider whether in fact there was evidence before the Commissioner entitling her to find that the contractual relationship between the parties comprised a hybrid agreement consisting of what had variously been described as an overarching contract supplemented by individual contracts in respect of assignments of work.

130. The presence of mutuality of obligation per se is not the sole qualifying test for the existence of a contract of employment. Its absence is, however, fatal. Its presence opens the gateway to comprehensively evaluating the relationship including aspects such as control and integration. As Edwards J. has made clear in Barry, the court has to have regard to all the circumstances in the round, evaluating the facts in their operational context before determining whether on its true construction it gave rise to a contract of employment.

131. The existence, kind and degrees of continuing mutual obligation to be located within a work supply relation is ultimately a matter of construction of the operational arrangement rather than an evaluation of the apparent craftsmanship, deft deeming and skill inherent in the language of the overarching agreement itself. As the commissioner found at para. 164 it was located within the individual contracts.

Continuity of relationship contemplated even when driver not engaged in driving

132. The continuity of the relationship in the sense of continuously spanning both periods when the driver was "driving" or "at work" and periods when he/she was not, when viewed from the perspective of the continuing obligations operating and imposed on either party speaks potentially to continuous mutuality of obligation subsisting even under the overarching agreement.

133. For instance, on days when no driving work was being provided or required, the company continued to maintain the "appropriate business use insurance" for the benefit of the driver in accordance with Clause 5(a) of the overarching agreement and the worker had a continuing obligation to defray the "predetermined rate" for same. Likewise, the obligation of the driver to provide information of events that might compromise or cause the lapse of an insurance policy was a continuing obligation to be found in Clause 6 and operated and could only be construed as being directed towards the clear anticipation on the part of the company of an ongoing mutual expectation that "the contractor would be in a position to continue to provide services under the agreement." This speaks to the intended nature and contours of an ongoing relationship as anticipated on the part of the company.

134. In construing Clause 11 in its totality, the continuing obligations and concomitant lack of freedom inherent in its provisions operated to circumscribe the work options available to the driver at all times throughout the duration of the overarching agreement and operated for the benefit of the company. In its intent and operation, Clause 11 was consistent only with a continuing obligation imposed on a driver of a kind that it characteristic of a contract of service which subsisted for so long as "this contract is in force".

135. When considered from an operational context on a week-by-week basis, whilst the appellant is correct that Clause 12 conferred a right on the driver to effect a substitution should they become "unavailable at short notice", it did not impose an obligation to do so.

Ground of appeal 3 - Integration

136. The appellant further contends that the trial judge erred in his approach to the test of integration as follows: -

> "The appellant contends that the relevant enquiry under the 'integration' test is not solely whether the kind of work done by the putative employee is integral to the business of the putative employer, but rather asks whether the particular individual putative employee concerned is himself or herself so personally integrated into the business of the putative employer as to lead to the conclusion that the contract amounts to a contract of service. See generally Re. Sunday Tribune Limited [1984] IR 505." (p. 6 of the Notice of Appeal)

137. It will be recalled that the trial judge considered the Sunday Tribune decision and arguments at paras. 44 and 45 of his judgment. The contention of the appellant was that drivers were to be regarded as "only accessory" to the business of the appellant:-

> "If the broader integration test had been applied [i.e. did the drivers from part of the appellant's organisation?] there should have been a finding of contracts for services between the drivers and the appellant because the drivers, as opposed to their work, were not integrated into the business of the appellant."

138. Unsurprisingly, this construct of the integration test did not find favour with the trial judge.

139. The Sunday Tribune decision arising from the winding up of the Sunday Tribune almost 40 years ago in 1982 is instructive insofar as there were three individual claimants who sought priority for sums due in the context of the winding up. The first was a subeditor of the newspaper. The second wrote a weekly column which was submitted to the newspaper for publication and the third wrote articles from time to time as might be commissioned separately by the company. Carroll J. had no difficulty in finding that the first and second claimants ought to be construed as employees rendering their debts preferential debts in the winding up.

140. Carroll J. observed: -

> "The determining factor is whether the work which was done by each claimant was done on foot of a contract of service which created the relationship of employer and employee or whether it was done on foot of a contract for services which did not create that relationship. The court must look at the realities of the situation in order to determine whether the relationship of employer and employee in fact exists, and it must do so regardless of how the parties describe themselves: see Ferguson v John

Dawson & Partners [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1213. The simple test is whether the employer possessed the right not only to control what work the employee was to do but also the manner in which the work was to be done. However, the test is no longer of universal application. In the present day, when senior staff with professional qualifications are employed, the nature of their employment cannot be determined in such a simplistic way." (p. 508 of the judgment)

141. Carroll J. cited Beloff v. Pressdram Limited [1973] 1 All E.R. 241, a decision in the context of journalists, and the judgment of Denning L.J. in Stevenson, Jordan and Harrison Limited v. McDonald [1952] 1 T.L.R. 101 which is considered to be the source of the "integration test" where at p. 111 it was stated: -

"…under a contract of service, a man is employed as part of the business, and his work is done as an integral part of the business; whereas under a contract for services, his work although done for the business, is not integrated into it but is only accessory to it."

142. It is to be observed that the test laid down by Lord Denning has oft been criticised for its vagueness. It appears that his intention was that the integration test as articulated by him would replace the control test (cf. Bank Voor Handel En Scheepvaart Nv v. Slatford [1953] 1 Q.B. 248, [1951] 2 All E.R. 777, CA). Ultimately, over time, the so called integration test did not entirely supplant the control test which tends to be a factor coupled with mutuality of obligation considered essential to the existence of a contract of service both in this jurisdiction an in England and Wales.

143. Having considered the relevant dicta in Stevenson, Jordan and Harrison Limited v. McDonald and Beloff, Carroll J. observed regarding the first claimant: -

> "…His employment satisfies the simple test of control by the employer. He worked at specified times under the guidance of the chief sub-editor and to his instructions. The fact that he worked part time does not change the nature of his employment. A person may be an employee even though employed part time: Market Investigations v Minister of Social Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173." (p. 510)

A similar view was taken of the second journalist. In regard to the third journalist, the judge considered that she was an independent contractor, "She was under no obligation to contribute on a regular basis". (p. 510)

144. That key determination contrasts starkly with the facts in the instant case. Drivers were integral to the company's day to day pizza delivery business. Delivery was its unique selling point. Without drivers its business model could not operate. I am satisfied further, that in contrast with a third individual in the Sunday Tribune case, each driver had an obligation to fill in an availability sheet at approximately one week intervals on foot of which a roster was drawn up by the appellant. In each case, it was drawn up by the store manager based on the availability sheets. That is what happened in practice, as was found by the Commissioner, and that was what was implicitly required from the driver in each case having due regard to Clause 14 of the overarching agreement.

145. Hence the factual matrix of the third claimant in Sunday Tribune is wholly distinguishable with the facts in the instant case. The drivers had more in common with the first and second claimants in that case, both of whom were held to be employees than the third claimant because they were contractually obliged to submit weekly or so availability sheets and work the ensuing rostered days.

146. In his judgment, the trial judge had regard to the material distinguishing element in the instant case from the facts in Sunday Tribune which Revenue had asserted, namely that in the Sunday Tribune case each of the reporters had different roles within the newspaper. By contrast, in this appeal the drivers were engaged under similar terms and conditions which fact, Revenue correctly contended, also supported the integration of the drivers.

147. Insofar as the appellant contends that the trial judge erred in his interpretation and application of the concept of "integration", the judge clearly articulated the appellant's relevant contentions at inter alia para. 44 of the judgment. It was open to the trial judge to evaluate the approach adopted by the Commissioner including her consideration of Uber BV v. Aslam. I am satisfied that the trial judge was correct, firstly, at para. 63 when he observed:-

> "Despite the indignation expressed on behalf of the appellant, the distinction between 'a worker' and an 'employee' in the UK legislation was not central to the reliance placed by the Commissioner on the Uber and the other UK judgments cited in the determination for the integration and mutuality issues."

Secondly, he correctly noted: –

> "This case stated is not a judicial review of the procedures adopted by the Commissioner. The court repeats that the appellant bears the onus of satisfying this court that the Commissioner erred in her application of the law in relation to integration." (para. 64)

148. The trial judge was correct in his approach. It was self-evidently clear that the Commissioner was alive to the relevance under UK legislation of the concept of "worker" and the statutory definition. She sets this out expressly at para. 117 of her determination. The factors identified by the trial judge at para. 65 as having been taken into account by the Commissioner at paras. 120 to 125 of her determination supported her finding as he correctly concluded. There was ample evidence before the trial judge entitling him to find that the Commissioner was correct in law in the interpretation and application of the concept of integration as stated in the determination.

The issues of control and integration

149. The issue of control of the individual contracts is to be approached from the perspective of whether it can be said, having due regard to the totality of the evidence, that there was a sufficient framework of control in light of the relationship between the parties. The terms of the overarching contract are potentially relevant to the question as to whether there was a sufficient framework of control in respect of individual contracts.

150. The operation of the rosters and the weekly allocation of work under the individual contracts could operate as a significant lever with which to influence the performance by drivers of their individual engagements and is plainly capable of being relevant to the questions of control and integration.

151. The individual contract was formed when the driver submitted to the branch manager a schedule of available dates and times for the relevant week. The branch manager then created a shift rota for the week and circulated it to the drivers. That amounted to acceptance on the part of the company under the ordinary law of contract. The driver showed up for work on the nominated shift and was integrated into the company's enterprise by the activities engaged in including activities such as the making up of pizza boxes and the wearing of branded apparel and the attachment of branding to their vehicle. There was no evidence that a branch manager on receipt of an availability sheet from a driver had ever failed to roster such a driver for driving duties in the relevant week.

152. A practical limitation on the ability to intervene in the real time performance of a task does not in and of itself mean that there is not sufficient control to create the relationship of employer and employee. What is significant is the entitlement of the company to give directions or to impose sanctions such as sending a driver home for refusal to make up pizza boxes. The company had control over the manner drivers dressed, the time drivers were there as specified in the roster, the number and extent of deliveries drivers were to undertake and the particularities with regard to insurance etc. in relation to vehicles.

153. It is noteworthy that there was no provision that the contract would end if a driver did not accept an offer to drive or failed to show up for a rostered period.

154. In addition to the specific driving assignments under the individual contracts, its terms continued to operate for the duration of the entire week in question in circumstances where the driver had an obligation to prepare and create weekly invoices and submit same to the company. Arguably each individual contract was completed when the invoices for the drivers in question were submitted. It would appear that the local branch was actively involved routinely in the preparation and filling out of such invoices in question which is reflective of control and integration of the drivers into the company's enterprise.

155. On its true construction the overarching agreement goes far beyond providing a mere framework for a series of successive ad hoc contracts for services. By contrast with much of the case law relied upon, where the requirement for services could be exceptional, episodic or occasional e.g. banqueting staff for special events and weddings (O'Kelly) tour guides for power stations (Carmichael) the need for drivers was a continuing and fixed requirement integral to the business being operated by the company.

156. The undisputed evidence of the appellant's own witness was that a manager was entitled to call upon a driver who was awaiting a driving job to fold pizza boxes. This evidence was not contested or disputed by any witness. Furthermore, it is significant that the evidence of the consequence for a driver who refused to make up pizza boxes was not disputed either namely, that the manager or assistant manager was entitled to send the driver home for the remainder of that shift. That was a considerable sanction consistent with the relationship of employer and employee.

157. That fact demonstrates the degree of control exercised by the company over the driver, the extent of the driver's integration into the company's enterprise and the lack of freedom on the part of the driver to decline to do other work on the premises. It is not correct in the circumstances to suggest, as the appellant has done, that there was no evidence either of any obligation on the part of the driver to assemble boxes or of any payment or any other consideration for doing so. In particular the company's witness, Mr. Milczarek gave evidence that where drivers refused to make boxes the managers would issue a warning to such a driver that they would be sent home. This demonstrates that the drivers were under the company's control and were expected to engage in activities integral to the company's enterprise in pizza making as well as delivery and failure to do so would potentially have economic consequences. The risk of being sent home in the event of a driver refusing to assemble boxes did have an immediate and direct potential impact on payments.

The enterprise test in context of control and integration

158. In this context, the decision of Market Investigations Limited v. Minister of Social Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, [1969] 2 W.L.R. 1 (considered by Carroll J. in Sunday Tribune) is of no little significance. It was considered also in the Barry and McKayed judgments referenced above. In essence, the question is: was the driver in business on his own account and their own boss (akin almost to a taxi driver of pizzas) rather than an employee?

159. Market Investigations involved a consultative case stated. At p. 8 Cooke J. observed:-

> "I think it is fair to say that there was at one time a school of thought according to which the extent and degree of the control which B. was entitled to exercise over A. in the performance of the work would be a decisive factor. However, it has for long been apparent that an analysis of the extent and degree of such control is not in itself decisive."

The court cited cases and examples illustrative of the proposition that in certain instances "the absence of control and direction in that sense can be of little, if any, use as a test." Cooke J. continued:-

> "If control is not a decisive test, what then are the other considerations which are relevant? No comprehensive answer has been given to this question, but assistance is to be found in a number of cases."

Having considered some of the authorities he noted –

> "The observations of Lord Wright, of Denning L.J. and of the judges of the [US] Supreme Court suggest that the fundamental test to be applied is this:
>
> > 'Is the person who has engaged themself to perform these services performing them as a person in business on his own account?'" (p. 9)

> "If the answer to that question is 'yes', then the contract is a contract for services. If the answer is 'no' then the contract is a contract of service. No exhaustive list has been compiled and perhaps no exhaustive list can be compiled of the considerations which are relevant in determining that question, nor can strict rules be laid down as to the relative weight which the various considerations should carry in particular cases. The most that can be said is that control will no doubt always have to be considered, although it can no longer be regarded as the sole determining factor; and that factors which may be of importance are such matters as whether the man performing the services provides his own equipment, whether he hires his own helpers, what degree of financial risk he takes, what degree of responsibility for investment and management he has, and whether and how far he has an opportunity of profiting from sound management in the performance of his task."

Applying the principles to the facts before him, Cooke J. noted:-

> "It is apparent that the control which the company had the right to exercise in this case was very extensive indeed. It was so extensive as to be entirely consistent with Mrs. Irving's being employed under a contract of service. The fact that Mrs. Irving had a limited discretion as to when she should do the work was not in my view inconsistent with the existence of a contract of service…Nor is there anything inconsistent with the existence of a contract of service in the fact that Mrs. Irving was free to work for others during the relevant period. It is by no means a necessary incident of a contract of service that the servant is prohibited from serving any other employer." (p. 11)

In the instant case, inter alia, Clause 11 of the overarching agreement is strongly indicative of significant continuing control by the company over the driver inconsistent with a contract for services.

Control and Clause 11

160. Clause 11 of the overarching contract imposes significant limitations on the driver's freedom to work which operated continuously even at times and days between individual contracts when the driver was not rostered by the company. The structure of the clause is noteworthy, not least the usage of the words "at the same time" in the second sentence. Those words however, derive their colour and meaning from the first sentence in Clause 11 which modify the words as follows: "at the same time as this contract is in force".

161. This points towards the existence of a very high level of control by the company over the freedom of the driver to take other driving work even in the time between individual contracts. It places restraints on the general freedom of a driver to earn a livelihood as a driver performing like work. It prohibits delivery of "similar type products into the same market area from a rival company at the same time where a conflict of interest would be possible." This is a continuing obligation on the part of the driver for the benefit of the company for which the driver receives per se no remuneration or compensation. It is noteworthy that this continuing obligation is not expressly confined to the delivery of pizzas for rival companies but extends to anything that might be characterised as "similar type products" to those being delivered for the appellant. "Similar type products" are nowhere defined in the overarching agreement.

162. Thus, at all material times while the overarching contract is operative – and not just during the operation of individual contracts – the Clause 11 restrictions imposed on the driver continue. It is consistent with the existence of continuing obligations of mutual trust and confidence characteristic of a contract of service. The continuing obligation of the driver to the company embodied in this clause in and of itself is, arguably, inconsistent with a driver being characterised as an independent contractor. The point was not argued. It is raised merely to illustrate the importance of approaching the issue of status in light of the totality of the terms governing the relationship between the parties. It is understandable that the appellant might object to the close analysis being carried out by the trial judge of the overarching contract. I am not satisfied that the trial judge was precluded from considering its tenor and whether it shed light on the distinct issues arising in relation to the individual contracts such as control and integration, in addition to mutuality of obligation. The issue is also considered at para 175 post.

163. The Commissioner's relevant findings in that regard were noted at para. 17 of the judgment under appeal. It was appropriate for the trial judge to look at the overarching contract from the perspective of mutuality of obligations since it was a hybrid contract and indeed that is borne out by the jurisprudence, including para. 30 of Weight Watchers. The trial judge specifically cites that dicta at para. 21 of his judgment. The approach of the judge was correct in law. That the ambit of his consideration was in part wider than that of the Appeals Commissioner reflects its comprehensiveness. It was indicative of his careful approach to the issues presented in the consultative case stated. The contentions of the appellant to the contrary in substance amount to an argument that in any given case an unduly narrow construct be imposed on the legal exercise of ascertaining whether a work-wage bargain has been concluded between parties so as to give rise to a contract of service. There is no authority identified for such a proposition or for such an approach.

Ground of appeal 4 – Substitution

164. The appellant contends that the trial judge erred in interpreting and applying the law and the facts regarding substitution. The error is characterised thus: -

> "At para. 58 of the judgment the learned trial judge erred in holding that:-
>
> > 'The reliance by the appellant on the Supreme Court judgment in Castleisland conveniently overlooks the fact that the inclusion of terms requiring approval for substitutes occurred in that social welfare appeal due to the necessity to comply with statutory regulations for artificial inseminators. The appellant imposed the terms about substitution.' (p. 6)
>
> In Castleisland Cattle Breeding Society Limited v. Minister for Social and Family Affairs [2004] 4 I.R. 150 the Supreme Court (Geoghegan J.) expressly stated at pp. 161-162:
>
> > 'I see no significance whatsoever…in the inclusion in the contract of terms which require the approval of Castleisland to any substitute inseminator or the ability to assign the contract. Indeed, even if there were no statutory regulations they would obviously be in the interests of Castleisland's business to ensure competence and therefore to include such a provision.'"

The appellant continues:-

> "Nowhere in the judgment of the High Court does the learned trial judge explain why he rejected the contention that the distinction posited in Weight Watchers Ltd. between two distinctive forms of substitution is not recognised in Irish Law.
> That distinction is between a situation where on the one hand, there is a right to substitute in a manner which allows for another person wholly or substantially to do the promised work, and on the other, a situation where a contract provides that in the event of the worker being unable to work he or she may arrange for a person approved by the employer to do it, not as a delegate but under a replacement contract made directly between the employer and the substituted person." (p. 7)

At para. 8 of the judgment the trial judge noted that "the appellant confined its challenge under the 'substitution' and 'terms of the written contract' to the application of the law by the Commissioner."

165. At the appeal hearing, counsel on behalf of the appellant acknowledged (p. 28 of the transcript): -

> "…the finding by the Commission as a matter of fact was that frequently the driver didn't nominate a substitute and it was the company itself which nominated the substitute."

166. Clause 12 of the Overarching Agreement envisages substitution arising where the driver became "unavailable at short notice"; language which speaks to an unexpected or unforeseen exigency. There is a limited right conferred on the driver to engage a substitute delivery person in such circumstance. It is not a right at large. It was very extensively fettered. In practice, as is clear from Clause 12, only other drivers who had executed an overarching agreement and were on the books of the company as drivers met the threshold since a substitute had to be "capable of performing the contractor's obligations in all respects". (emphasis added)

167. In practice, neither under individual contracts nor under the terms of the overarching agreement did a driver have a general right or entitlement to substitute another to work a shift save in the exceptional circumstances and terms provided. It was a conditional right. This is reinforced by the final sentence of Clause 14 of the overarching agreement which obligated the driver to notify the company in advance of any unavailability to undertake a previously agreed delivery service. There was no evidence adduced by the appellant to suggest that the right of substitution was exercised otherwise than on a limited or occasional basis. Whilst the observation of the Commissioner complained of by the appellant was indicative of an obligation to find the substitute, the determination when read in its entirety elsewhere clearly demonstrates that she was aware that the terms of the agreement between the parties did not impose such an obligation.

Finding of Commissioner on Substitution

168. The Commissioner's analysis is to be found at para. 24, 38(b), 82 and 90 of the Determination. At para. 24 it was noted that," [d]rivers were entitled to substitute another of the Appellant's drivers in the event they were unavailable to attend for a registered work shift." (emphasis added). Para. 38(b) stated "I find as a material fact that the substitution clause permitted drivers to substitute another of the appellant's drivers when they were unavailable…" (emphasis added). Para. 90 states "…if a driver was rostered for a shift but was unable to turn up, he had an entitlement under clause 12 of the written agreement, to arrange for the work to be done by another…" (emphasis added).

169. Para.82, which attracted particular criticism by the appellant warrants being considered in full; "…the right of the driver to cancel a shift was qualified by the requirement to engage a substitute, to provide advance notification to the appellant and to work out the remainder of the shifts in the series which had been agreed" (emphasis added). It considers three distinct factors in the context of her analysis of the right to cancel a driving shift. Two factors, namely, providing advance notification and the obligation to work out the remaining shifts were requirements but the engagement of a substitution was not. Thus the statement is partially correct. It is clear from her analysis of Clause 12 of the written agreement and paras. 24, 38(b) and 90 in the Determination that the Commissioner was well aware that substitution was an "entitlement" or "permitted" and not a "requirement". The reference to a requirement to engage a substitute (repeated in para. 105) is not correct. However that error does not undermine her overall conclusions has no bearing on the conclusion at para. 155 "…that these contracts are contracts of service."

170. In my view in light of the terms of the agreement the trial judge erred at that part of para. 55 where he finds that obligation were imposed on the driver cancelling a shift at short notice to find a substitute. However, that error is also not material to the outcome. The more limited the right of substitution a worker has, the more consistent the contract is with the obligation for personal performance inherent in a contract of service.

171. Wilson L.J. in Pimlico Plumbers observed at para 22;

> "… in his classic exposition of the ingredients of a contract of service in Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd v Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1968] 2 QB 497, Mac[K]enna J added an important qualification. He said at p 515:

> ‘Freedom to do a job either by one’s own hands or by another’s is inconsistent with a contract of service, though a limited or occasional power of delegation may not be …’”

He cited Atiyah’s Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts (1st edn., Butterworth, 1967), in which it was stated at p. 59 that “it seems reasonably clear that an essential feature of a contract of service is the performance of at least part of the work by the servant himself”. The decision of Barr J. in McAuliffe v. Minister for Social Welfare [1995] 2 I.R. 238 also supports MacKenna J.’s proposition.

172. The appellant placed reliance on para. 76 of the determination which observed: -

> “The appellant contended that the drivers had no obligations whatsoever as they could choose not to turn up for any shift, safe in the knowledge that no sanction will be imposed. However, the contract envisages cancellation ‘should the Contractor be unavailable at short notice’, together with the requirement of advanced notification in accordance with Clause 14. Thus, the contract aims, to some extent, to regulate the circumstances of cancellation by a driver”

173. At p. 40 of the transcript it is stated on behalf of Karshan –

> “…Clause 12…doesn’t impose any obligation on the contractors. On the contrary, it is saying that even should the contractor be unavailable and even if he is unavailable at short notice, the company accepts that he still has the right to engage a substitute delivery person. And of course, a fortiori, he has the same right if in fact he gives a longer notice period to the company.
> So, whether he gives a short notice period or a long notice period makes no difference. He doesn’t have any obligations in consequence of that. On the contrary, Clause 12 is giving him a right and an entitlement.”

174. The analysis of the Commissioner, for instance at paras. 90 – 102, rejects the appellant's contentions as "incorrect". The ambit of time encompassed by the words "at short notice" in Clause 12 is nowhere defined. The dominant feature of the contract was an obligation of personal performance by the driver. A driver's facility to appoint a substitute was confined to significantly limited circumstances: implicitly the substitute had to come from the ranks of Karshan drivers, in other words from those bound to Karshan by an identical suite of obligations as the overarching contract's words demonstrate, "such person must be capable of performing the contractor's contractual obligations in all respects" (Clause 12). Paras. 103-104 of the Determination correctly analyses the substitution issue. In the words of Wilson L.J. in Pimlico Plumbers at para. 34;

> "It was the converse of a situation in which the other party is uninterested in the identity of the substitute, provided only that the work gets done."

175. The scenario postulated at para. 76 of the determination as representing the position of the appellant before the Commissioner discloses a fundamental error at the heart of the appellant's position. Contrary to what is contended, once the drivers submitted their availability sheets and the rosters were furnished and circulated to them there was a binding individual contract between the parties and the ordinary rules of contract applied as between the drivers and the company. A gratuitous failure to turn up for work for a shift was a breach of contract. Whether or not a sanction would be imposed is wholly immaterial to the issue. It was in the hands of Karshan what stance to take in such circumstances. Substitution and cancellation are two distinct propositions. Insofar as para. 82 of the determination is criticised, a perusal of the determination in its entirety (particularly paras. 24, 90 and 38(b)) demonstrate, that the Commissioner was under no misapprehension as to the true meaning and operational effect of the key relevant clause, namely Clause 12, in the agreement.

176. She correctly identified that a significant distinguishing factor from the Ready Mixed Concrete v. Minister for Pensions case (which has been long accepted as good law in this jurisdiction) was that in Ready Mixed the court had concluded that a driver was an independent contractor in circumstances where a clear substitution clause had provided that in the event the driver was unavailable he had a general entitlement to engage others to work for him in driving the vehicle and the person appointed by the driver would work for and be paid by the driver and not by the driver's employer.

177. The facts in Castleisland are distinguishable. The individuals had been employed by the Department of Agriculture under contracts of service. Each was offered redundancy on negotiated optional terms. One option was six times the statutory redundancy entitlement on the basis of a severance. Another option provided for twice the statutory redundancy on the basis that they would thereafter be free to take other work and operate as independent contractors. The claimants in question had executed contracts for valuable consideration expressly stating that they were independent contractors. Conducting artificial insemination of animals in a context of preserving the health and welfare of the national herd in accordance with regulatory control and the terms of relevant statutory instruments cannot fairly be compared to the activity of delivering food from takeaways to customer's homes or places of work. Castleisland is distinguishable on its facts.

178. Thus the factual matrix underpinning the Castleisland decision is fundamentally different. In the instant case overarching contracts were presented on a "take it or leave it" basis. There was no evidence that drivers or any driver the subject of the determination had hitherto worked as an employee of the appellant. In reality, drivers did not have the entitlement to substitute other drivers in their place such as to give rise to a subcontracting of the work in a manner inconsistent with the existence of a contract of employment.

179. I am satisfied on its true construction that each driver assumed a personal obligation to carry out the work of delivering the take away food to customers both under the overarching agreement and by the terms of the individual contracts. Nowhere is there an unfettered right to substitute another person to do the work of driving characteristic of a contract for services. The tenor of Clauses 12 and 14 implicitly speak to the exceptionality of an exigency arising whereby a driver would become unavailable at short notice and what might ensue and is characteristic of employment contracts and not indicative of a contract for services.

180. In general, a conditional right to substitute another to perform the activity in question may or may not be inconsistent with personal performance depending on the conditionality in question. Castleisland turns on its own facts given the statutory regime and regulatory requirements that obtained. The right to engage a substitute expressly provided for in Clause 12 was quite narrow. The substitute was drawn from the company's panel or bank of drivers: "such person must be capable of performing the contractor's contractual obligations in all respects" (emphasis added). This illustrates that there was no unfettered discretion to substitute at will. The entire tenor of Clause 12 speaks to its exceptionality; that it was capable of arising on an occasional basis and the substitution activity, albeit being possible, was not an obligation imposed on the driver. The company paid the substitute directly.

181. Contrary to the contentions of the appellant all those factors are relevant, in particular the latter factor. An entitlement/right of substitution confined to a circumstance where the driver was unable to carry out the work at short notice on the facts of this case was consistent with personal performance. In practice, the absence of any express obligation to find a substitute coupled with an absence of opportunity for profit by sub-contracting which is characteristic with being in business on one's own account, supports the respondent's contention rather than that of the appellant.

182. The trial judge recounted the objections on the part of the appellant with the determination of the Commissioner to rely on the reasoning of Briggs J. in Weight Watchers (UK) Limited and the assertions and contentions of both parties are set out in detail inter alia at paras. 15 and 21 of the judgment. He noted at para. 39: -

> "The appellant contends that the distinction posited in Weight Watchers between two distinct forms of substitution is not recognised in Irish law. The appellant further submits that the right of an employer to approve substitutes does not indicate an employment relationship. The fact that the appellant exercised a significant measure of control of the drivers' choice of delegates is insufficient to indicate the existence of an employment relationship, according to the appellant."

183. It would have been preferable had the trial judge analysed the Weight Watchers decision with greater particularity, it is implicit from his judgment that he preferred the submissions of the Revenue Commissioners in relation to this issue including that in reality pizza drivers did not have freedom to substitute but rather could nominate a replacement approved by and paid directly by the company. That approach is entirely consistent with Ready Mixed as in Weight Watchers, the substitution clause in the overarching contract did not permit the driver to discharge his contractual obligations in relation to the delivery of a pizza by the provision of another driver's services.

184. Despite the objections of the appellant, it did not identify any authority where, in the case of substitution, the fact that a substitute was not paid directly by the company was held not to be a relevant consideration in deciding status of the individual being substituted or in carrying out the multifactorial analysis as to whether a contract of service had come into existence between the parties. It is a material factor. In the ledger of indicia of factors, if payment for the substitute driver was not made to the driver being substituted in the first instance, it tends to suggest that the latter is an employee rather than an independent contractor.

185. The actual operation of the individual contracts does not support the assertion that such a degree of independence and autonomy was vested in the driver. In practice, the right to substitute was very narrow and only arose in exceptional circumstances where the driver became "unavailable at short notice". The evidence suggests that implicitly substitution had to be by another of the company's drivers who had already signed an overarching contract with the company since the substitute had to be capable of performing the contractual obligations "in all respects". The substitution clause did not enable a driver in any circumstance to deliver the promised driving work by another person and get paid for it himself as would be characteristic of a contract for services. Instead where, implicitly for a good reason, the driver was "unavailable at short notice" to work a shift he had a qualified right not to work that shift and another person, identified either by himself or the company could do it, not as a delegate but under a replacement contract with the company for that specific shift. This accords with Weight Watchers analysis incl. paras. 32-34.

186. A case such as Independent Workers Union of Great Britain v. Central Arbitration Committee (Roofoods trading as Deliveroo as an interested party) [2021] EWCA Civ. 952 ("Deliveroo") is wholly distinguishable concerning as it did provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights and issues around trade union recognition as well as payment for the substitute's shift directly to the unavailable driver – which do not arise in this case. Karshan sought to rely on its terms (p. 83 of transcript). I do not consider it to materially assist in resolving any issue in this appeal. Lest I am wrong, I would make the following observations. In that case the crafting of the substitution clause resulted in the negating of the necessary element of personal service; the crucial factor being that when a driver became unavailable he had total freedom to find a substitute driver and thereafter received the payment directly for the substitute's work from the company and in turn was free to deduct a percentage of that payment for himself (circa 15% - 20%) passing on the balance to the substitute. Thus, crucially, as in the Ready Mixed decision itself which is acknowledged to be good law in this jurisdiction, the Deliveroo driver was at liberty to send along another in substitution for himself and payments were made directly to the driver to be shared with the substitute factors which all pointed to substitution operating in the context of a contract for services in stark contrast to the position in this case. The decision merely reflects the independent contractor identified by Briggs J. in Weight Watchers at para 32 who delivers promised work via another person and gets paid for it himself – a scenario which has no application in the instant case.

187. By contrast, in the instant case substitution was significantly fettered under the express language of the overarching agreement. The driver had to be "unavailable at short notice". The word "unavailable" is telling, connoting as it does that the worker was not in a position to do the work as distinct from freely electing not to do it. The choice of substitution was very limited and the payment was always made directly to the substitute by the company. The exercise conferred no opportunity for profit on the driver as would be characteristic of an independent contractor.

188. In contrast to the Deliveroo and Ready Mixed cases, drivers for the appellant did undertake to personally do the work or services in question. That obligation became binding and certain on each occasion when the roster was circulated. The lack of any contractual obligation on the part of a driver to find a substitute undermines the appellant's contentions.

189. The judge observed at para. 37, "[t]his Court is only concerned with the application of the law which concerns "substitution" and is not concerned with the findings of fact made by the Commissioner." The High Court judge correctly concluded that:

"60. This factor of substitution does not avail the appellant as is urged on its behalf. The appellant has failed to satisfy this Court that the Commissioner erred in her application of the law in this regard."

Ground of appeal 5 – Contentions regarding natural and constitutional justice

190. The appellant contends that the trial judge erred in concluding that the Appeals Commissioner did not err in law in having regard to UK/English authorities which were decided after the appeal hearing before the Appeals Commissioner was completed in July 2016, and in failing to invite the parties to address her in relation to those authorities. The error contended for is: -

"The High Court should have held that the approach adopted by the Appeal Commissioner in this regard was not consistent with natural and constitutional justice and, in particular, fails to respect the audi alteram partem principle." (p. 7)

191. This ground of appeal was not pursued to any extent at the hearing.

Ground of appeal 6 – The application of UK authorities

192. The appellant contends that:-

"The High Court erred in concluding that the Appeal Commissioner did not err in law in having regard to United Kingdom/English authorities which are based on a different statutory regime, namely, s. 230 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 and… the…intermediate category of 'worker' as defined per that legislation." (p. 7)

193. Reliance was placed in particular on s. 230(3) of the UK Employment Rights Act 1996. The judge reviewed the approach of the Commissioner to the authorities such as the English decision in Uber. I am satisfied the trial judge was correct in his view that the Commissioner was entitled to consider the Uber decision and the distinction in the UK Act was not central to the Commissioner's consideration in the context of mutuality and integration. She was demonstrably alive to the fact that a different statutory dispensation operates in England and Wales and in particular a distinction obtains between a "worker" and an "employee" under the UK statute as she expressly pointed out. The Uber decision was capable of providing assistance to the Commissioner. Some English decisions, such as that of Mr. Recorder Underhill in Byrne Bros (Formwork) Limited (No 5) v. Baird [2002] I.C.R. 667, suggest that at least insofar as mutuality of obligation is concerned, the criteria relevant to assessing statutory "worker" status can be substantially similar to those for assessing whether a contract of service/employee status exists. It appears she considered Uber primarily in the context of the Integration Test which, it appears, is common to both statutory "workers" and employees.

194. The analysis by the English court in Uber of various principles were relevant and worthy of consideration by the Commissioner in deciding whether the relationship was in essence to be located in the field of dependent work relationships or whether it was in essence a contract between two independent business undertakings. I am satisfied that the trial judge was correct in his assessment and the criticisms of the Commissioner in that regard are not well made. Uber BV is of limited legal relevance in Ireland for two reasons. Firstly, the decision was fact-specific and secondly, under Irish law there is no intermediate category of worker falling between an employee and an independent contractor. But, as the trial judge correctly observed, the Commissioner's consideration of aspects of the judgment was in the context of mutuality of obligation and integration. Her approach was comprehensive. She took no shortcuts and engaged in a comprehensive assessment of all relevant factors in deciding as to which side of the boundary this particular case lay.

195. It would have been surprising in all the circumstances had the Commissioner omitted to consider the Uber decision. I reiterate that that case turned on its own particular facts. Reading the determination in its entirety, the High Court judge could be satisfied that the Commissioner was alive to the limitations of jurisprudence from England and Wales focused exclusively on statutory "workers" so found within the 1996 Act. That does not detract from the relevance of the said jurisprudence in the limited manner considered by the Commissioner in this instance as the trial judge correctly found.

196. The appellant further contends that "decisions such as Uber, which have identified drivers to be workers – and not employees – pursuant to an entirely distinct statutory regime in English law cannot safely or appropriately be relied upon in determining employment status in this jurisdiction". However, the relevant English jurisprudence she considered went well beyond a mere analysis of the English statutory regime and, as the trial judge correctly found, the Commissioner was entitled to have regard to same insofar as it was considered to be relevant. There was ample jurisprudence otherwise to support her conclusions and the trial judge was right not to interfere with it.

Ground of appeal 7 – Decision of the Social Welfare Appeals Office

197. The appellant contends: -

> "The High Court erred in holding that the Appeal Commissioner did not err in law in determining that she was not bound by a previous decision of the Social Welfare Appeals Office dated 19 August 2008 and when finding that the Social Welfare Appeals Office and the Tax Appeals Commission are different adjudication bodies subject to different statutory regimes, where she erred in law in failing to give any or adequate weight to the said previous decision as set out at pages 5 – 8 (paragraphs 11 – 20) of her determination". (p. 8)

The error contended for is that "greater weight should have been afforded by the High Court to this pertinent factual context in the interests of legal consistency." (p. 8)

198. I am satisfied that this ground of appeal is unmeritorious and can be swiftly dealt with. The appellant had sought at the original hearing to rely on a decision of the Social Welfare Appeals Office made in August 2008 which concluded that an individual delivery driver for K & M Pizza Ltd. was to be regarded as an independent contractor for social welfare purposes.

199. There was no evidence put before the Commissioner or the court as to the exact terms and conditions on foot of which the said individual operated as a delivery driver for K & M. Each of these cases is fact driven. It would be surprising to suggest that the Commissioner was bound in the context of tax by a decision of the Social Welfare Appeals Office concerning a pizza delivery driver in the context of welfare law unmoored from any facts and details of the actual terms and conditions on foot of which they were engaged to carry out driving in the first place. This ground of appeal is not maintainable.

Grounds of appeal 8 & 9 – Terms of express agreement

200. Under these grounds of appeal, the appellant firstly contends that: -

> "There are factual errors regarding substitution evident in the judgment, involving reliance on the Appeal Commissioner's determination, which are relevant to the question of deference."

The appellant contends that there was no requirement under the overarching contract for a driver to engage a substitute from the appellant's pool of previously approved drivers, and that the trial judge and Commissioner erred in suggesting otherwise, at paras. 42, 52 and 55 and paras. 105 and 82 of the judgment and determination, respectively.

201. These grounds require some analysis of the overarching contract. It is a question of nuance. The driver was not prohibited from suggesting a substitute driver. The driver was entitled to propose a substitute driver. The driver was not required to find the substitute driver. I am satisfied that the trial judge's and Commissioner's interpretation of the substitution clause was not a material error and did not affect the validity of her conclusions. Clause 12 states of such a substitute: "such person must be capable of performing the contractor's contractual obligations in all respects." An individual could only be said with confidence to be "capable of performing" the said contractual obligations "in all respects" if they had entered into a binding agreement with the appellant in like terms to those entered into by the driver. The language in Clause 12 necessarily contemplates that the substitute will effectively be bound by all the obligations and duties arising under the overarching agreement. Since a stranger has no privity and would be oblivious to all of the obligations and since the substitution arises in the context of an exigency where a driver becomes "unavailable at short notice", the most practical construction is the one deployed by the Commissioner and the High Court, namely that the replacement driver came from the pool of drivers maintained by the appellant.

202. In light of Clause 12, the burden rested on the appellant to demonstrate at the hearing by adducing appropriate evidence that a driver was not entitled to select a substitute driver from the world at large to carry out driving duties. There is no record that such evidence was adduced. The burden did not rest with the Commissioner to call evidence. The burden rested with the company to demonstrate how substitution under the contract operated in practice. If they omitted to put before the Commissioner such evidence, she was perfectly entitled to rely on the evidence and terms of the overarching contract, as she did at para. 105 of her determination.

203. Paragraph 55 of the trial judge's decision must be seen in context where elsewhere in his judgment (for instance paras. 35 and 60) the right of substitution was characterised as permissive in nature.

204. The objections to the use of the word "required" in para. 82 of the determination is overstated when set against the determination as a whole, as for instance summarised in the High Court judgment at paras. 2(i), 2(v), 34, 35, 39, 40, 59. The appellant's criticisms of the of the trial judge's judgment in this regard are not made out.

205. Secondly, the appellant asserts that the Appeals Commissioner failed to properly weigh the significance of Clauses 1 and 17; 2; 3; 5; 9; 12, and 14 of the overarching agreement. The Commissioner's detailed analysis of, inter alia, Autoclenz properly engages with Clauses 1 and 17. The Determination is replete with comprehensive analysis of Clauses 12 and 14. As regards remuneration and Clause 3 it is fully addressed, including for example at para. 16 of the determination. As is demonstrated at paras. 12-24 inclusive above, the Overarching Agreement and its material terms were fully engaged with by the Commissioner and this ground of appeal is not made out.

Conclusion

206. I am satisfied that as a matter of law the High Court judge was entitled to find that the Commissioner was correct in her interpretation and application of the mutuality of obligation principle along with the other constituent indicia of the contract of service including but not limited to integration and control. In light of the evidence and her findings, she was entitled to elect not to proceed to reach any conclusion on other issues including mutuality of obligation under the overarching contract. This did not preclude the judge from separately considering the issue of such mutuality of obligation within the overarching agreement.

207. On a true construction of the facts in light of the evidence before the Appeals Commissioner as to how the arrangement between the parties operated in practice, the trial judge was entitled find as regards the individual contracts that the Commissioner had been correct to conclude there was indeed an "irreducible minimum" of continuing mutual obligation which, when combined with the other relevant factors such as control and integration, the operation of substitution and so forth was sufficient to establish that the relationship between the parties constituted a contract of service and the drivers were employees to the extent found by the Appeals Commissioner. This conclusion was arrived at wholly independently of whether the overarching contract in and of itself gave rise to a contract of employment.

208. The Appeals Commissioner correctly analysed the inter-relationship arising in practice between the written overarching contract and the individual contracts between the parties. To work as a driver it was necessary to firstly sign the overarching contract. This offered the only gateway to an individual contract. The evidence was that all drivers signed the overarching agreement. The corollary is that the company relied on the panel of drivers who had executed the overarching agreement as the sole source of supply of drivers for its pizza delivery business.

209. Ultimately, it is necessary to have regard to the jurisprudence in this jurisdiction including the Supreme Court decision in Denny & Sons (Ireland) Limited v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 and Barry, as the High Court judge did. In light of those decisions, he was correct to find that there was evidence before the Appeals Commissioner which entitled her to reach her conclusions.

210. Insofar as the element of control was concerned though in and of itself it was not determinative of status, it was a factor to be taken into consideration in analysing aspects of the contract such as the limitations on the right to substitute. The degree of control exercised by the company over the work done and the manner by which it was to be discharged by the drivers was significant and was indicative of integration of the drivers into the business enterprise in a manner consistent with the existence of a contract of service. Clause 11 is especially relevant in that regard.

211. The analysis of the Appeals Commissioner of the integration test was heavily criticised by the appellant. True enough, the concept of "worker" within s. 230(3)(b) of the UK Employment Rights Act 1996 is not mirrored in any legislation in this jurisdiction. The Appeals Commissioner did not suggest that it was. She clearly indicates that the Act of 1996 under reference was "UK" legislation. As the High Court judge correctly found, the "worker"/"employee" dichotomy was not central to the focus of Commissioner's consideration of jurisprudence from England and Wales. He was correct in concluding that she did not err in her treatment of the said authorities. The use of the word "worker" by the Appeals Commissioner is unfairly characterised as reference to the English statute. The context demonstrates that this was not so.

212. It follows that I very respectfully disagree with the analysis and conclusions in the majority judgments for the reasons stated above. I would have dismissed the appeal on all grounds.

BETWEEN

KARSHAN (MIDLANDS LIMITED) TRADING AS DOMINO'S PIZZA

APPELLANT

- AND -

THE REVENUE COMMISSIONERS

RESPONDENT

JUDGMENT of Ms. Justice Costello delivered on the 31 day of May, 2022

1. This is an appeal of the order of the High Court of 21 January 2020 in respect of a case stated by way of appeal for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to s. 949AQ of the Taxes Consolidation Act 1997 ("the TCA"), and of a judgment delivered on 20 December 2019, [2019] IEHC 894. The case stated arose following an oral hearing in July 2016 by a Tax Appeal Commissioner ("the Commissioner"). The central issue in the appeal is whether delivery drivers who deliver pizzas for the appellant are employees of the appellant. The Commissioner made a determination on 8 October 2018 that pizza delivery drivers engaged by the appellant:

(1) worked during the relevant tax years of assessment (2010 and 2011) under contracts of services and are taxable under Schedule E of the Taxes Consolidation Act 1997 ("the TCA"); and

(2) did not work under contracts for services, thereby being self-employed, and taxable pursuant to Schedule D of the TCA, as the appellant had contended.

2. The appellant appealed the determination to the High Court by way of case stated. The High Court (O'Connor J.) dismissed the appeal and the appellant has appealed to this court. This is my judgment in respect of the appeal.

Background

3. The appellant trades as Domino's Pizza. It manufactures and delivers pizzas and ancillary food items to customers who place orders by telephone, internet and by attending at their stores. The appellant engages drivers to deliver the pizzas to its customers. Each driver entered into a written agreement with the appellant. It recites that:-

> "... the company wishes to subcontract the delivery of pizzas, the promotion of its brand logo and the contractor [each driver] is willing to provide these services to the company on the terms hereinafter appearing."

4. The agreement states that the contractor shall be retained by the company as an "independent contractor" within the meaning of and for all purposes of that expression (Clause 1). At Clause 17, the contractor confirms that he or she is aware that any delivery work undertaken for the company "is strictly as an independent contractor". The driver acknowledges that the company "has no responsibility or liability whatsoever for deducting and/or paying PRSI or tax on any monies [they] may receive under this agreement".

5. Each driver is required to provide his or her own delivery vehicle in a roadworthy and safe condition. Clause 4 states that a driver could rent a delivery vehicle from the company on certain terms. Clause 5 requires the contractor to insure the vehicle with a reputable insurance company within the State for business use. If the driver does not have the appropriate business insurance, the company "is prepared to offer same (third party only) at a pre-determined rate."

6. At Clause 3, the company agrees to pay the contractor according to the number of deliveries successfully undertaken, "[i]n addition the company shall pay for brand promotion through the wearing of fully branded company supplied clothing and/or the application of company logos affixed temporarily to the contractor's vehicle." Clause 9 states "... the company does not warrant a minimum number of deliveries." The driver is entitled to engage in a similar contract delivery service for other companies at the same time as the contract is in force, but this right "does not extend to delivering similar type products into the same market area from a rival company at the same time, where a conflict of interest would be possible" (Clause 11). Clauses 12 and 14 were the focus of the debate between the parties and I set them out in full:-

> "12. The Company accepts the Contractor's right to engage a substitute delivery person should the Contractor be unavailable at short notice. Such person must be capable of performing the Contractor's contractual obligations in all respects.
> 14. The Company does not warrant or represent that it will utilise the Contractor's services at all; and if it does, the Contractor may invoice the Company at agreed rates. The Company, furthermore, recognises the Contractor's right to make himself available on only certain days and certain times of his own choosing. The Contractor, in turn, agrees to notify the company in advance of his unavailability to undertake a previously agreed delivery service."

The agreement may be terminated without notice (Clause 15).

7. In addition, the drivers were required to sign a document entitled "Social Welfare and Tax Considerations" which the Commissioner held provided:-

"This is to confirm that I am aware that any delivery work I undertake for Karshan Limited is strictly as an independent contractor. I understand that, as such, Karshan Limited has no responsibility or liability whatsoever for deducting and/or paying PRSI or tax on any monies I may receive from this or any of my other work related activities."

8. The drivers were also required to sign a document entitled "Promotional Clothing Agreement" which provided for a deposit to be paid in respect of a branded crew shirt, baseball cap, name tag and driver jacket.

9. In her written determination, the Commissioner set out the oral evidence and the terms of the written contract between the appellant and the driver. At para. 38 of her determination, the Commissioner set out her findings of fact based on the evidence from the witnesses, together with the documentary evidence. Her findings were:

(a) that the practice was that drivers would fill out an "availability sheet" approximately one week prior to a roster being drawn up indicating their availability for work, and that the roster would be drawn up by a store manager based on the availability sheets;

(b) that the substitution clause permitted drivers to substitute another of the appellant's drivers when they were unavailable and that the substituted driver would be paid by the appellant in respect of this shift of work. The substitute could also be arranged by the appellant, if required;

(c) that drivers were required to wear a fully branded uniform of a cap, shirt, jacket and name tag; that they were also required to wear black trousers and black shoes and to be presentable in their appearance generally; that this was subject to checks by managers and that a deposit was requested by the appellant in respect thereof. In addition, drivers were provided with branded magnetic signs to affix to their cars as brand promotion for the appellant;

(d) the drivers were required to provide their own vehicles for delivery and there were no company cars available for rent by drivers;

(e) drivers were required to use their own phones in contacting customers, where necessary;

(f) drivers were required to provide certification of business use insurance, and where a driver did not possess such insurance, the appellant would provide insurance for a charge on the appellant's policy. The appellant required drivers to ensure that their NCT certificates were up to date;

(g) the appellant limited the number of pizzas[1] that drivers could deliver to two per time and managers would intervene to preclude a driver taking two deliveries if other drivers were waiting to take a delivery;

(h) some drivers folded boxes while waiting for deliveries and some drivers were requested to do so by their managers;

(i) in the case of many drivers, the appellant would prepare invoices that the drivers would sign;

(j) the drivers clocked-in and clocked-out on the computerised system in use in the appellant's business using their driver numbers and this and other relevant information was collated and maintained by the appellant;

(k) on commencement of a shift, drivers would be provided with a cash float by the appellant which the driver would return at the end of his shift;

[1] This is an error as she clearly means deliveries.

(l) the drop rate was €1.20 per drop with an additional 20c payable for insurance, and the drop rate was stipulated by the appellant and was not negotiable. The brand promotion/advertising rate was €5.65 per hour.

10. In addition to these express findings of fact, the Commissioner recorded the evidence that the drivers were entitled to substitute another of the appellant's drivers in the event that they were unable to attend for a rostered work shift. Mr. Paliulis, store manager, gave evidence that there would be "follow up" if an "employee" did not attend for work, having been rostered. He stated that if a driver failed to turn up, it was the manager's obligation to find a replacement and that the replacement would be paid for the work. The Commissioner records that two drivers gave evidence that they employed an accountant to look after their records and others gave evidence that the appellant would pre-prepare invoices that the drivers would sign. The appellant stated that the clocking-in/clocking-out system was not for time recording purposes but was to allow the appellant to maintain a record in relation to which drivers attended and on which days and to correlate this information with invoices.

11. The Revenue Commissioners submitted to the Commissioner that the written agreement did not accurately reflect the true agreement between the parties as evidence indicated that certain matters did not take place in accordance with the terms of the written contract. The Commissioner held that in its day-to-day operations there were three departures from the terms of the written agreement:-

(1) there were no company vehicles available for rent although the contract stipulated that company vehicles may be rented by drivers for the purposes of carrying out their duties (Clause 4);

(2) not all drivers prepared invoices for submission to the appellant as required by the contract. There was evidence from several drivers that the appellant prepared invoices which the drivers signed;

(3) some drivers were asked to perform work which was not stipulated in the contract, i.e. the assembly of boxes in store while waiting for a delivery.

12. The Commissioner determined that the drivers worked under multiple contracts of services and were therefore taxable in relation to the emoluments arising from their service in accordance with s. 112 and Schedule E of the TCA. Her determination will be considered in detail later in this judgment. The appellant asked the Commissioner to state a case for the opinion of the High Court which she did, raising a number of questions as follows:-

"I. Whether, upon the facts proved or admitted, I was correct in law in my interpretation and application of the concept of mutuality of obligation set out at pages 20-28 (paragraphs 53-87) of my determination.

II. Whether, upon the facts proved or admitted, I was correct in law to determine that it was not necessary to consider whether the umbrella contract contained mutuality of obligation, for the reasons set out at pages 49-51 (paragraphs 156-166) of my determination.

III. Whether, upon the facts proved or admitted, I was correct in law in the interpretation and application of the concept of 'integration' contained at pages 36-39 (paragraphs 114-125) of the determination.

IV. Whether, upon the facts proved or admitted, I was correct in law in the interpretation and application of the concept of 'substitution' contained at pages 30-34 (paragraphs 90-105) of the determination.

V. Whether I erred in law and acted in breach of natural and constitutional justice in having regard to authorities which were decided after the appeal hearing was completed in July 2016, and in failing to invite the parties to address me in relation to those authorities which were handed down after the appeal hearing completed in July 2016.

VI. Whether I erred in law having regard to United Kingdom/English authorities which are based on a different statutory regime, namely, section 230 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 and, in particular, the reference therein to an intermediate category of 'worker' as defined per that legislation.

VII. Whether I erred in law in determining that I was not bound by a previous decision of the Social Welfare Appeal's Office dated 19 August 2008 and when finding that the Social Welfare Appeals Office and the Tax Appeals Commission are different adjudication bodies subject to different statutory schemes, whether I erred in law in failing to give any or adequate weight to the said previous decision as set out at pages 5-8 (paragraphs 11-20) of my determination.

VIII. Whether upon the facts proved or admitted, I erred in law by failing to give proper weight to the actual terms and conditions of the express agreement as between the appellant and the drivers.

IX. Whether upon the facts proved or admitted, I erred in law in my findings in respect of; the manner in which rosters were set, requests to drivers to fold boxes, the nature of the ordering system, the nature of substitution, sanction for unreliability, payment of an hourly rate, clocking-in, nature of prohibition of work for others and opportunity to make profit."

The decision of the High Court

13. The High Court identified four core issues arising from the case stated:

(i) Mutuality of obligations;

(ii) Substitution;

(iii) Integration; and

(iv) Terms of the contract, specifically that the Commissioner failed to give proper weight to the actual terms of the contract.

14. The trial judge first identified the jurisdiction of the High Court on an appeal by way of case stated. He quoted the well-known passage of Kenny J. in Mara v. Hummingbird Limited [1982] ILRM 421, at p. 426:-

> "A case stated consists in part of findings on questions of primary fact, e.g. with what intention did the taxpayers purchase the Baggot Street premises. These findings on primary facts should not be set aside by the courts unless there was no evidence whatever to support them. The Commissioner then goes on in the case stated to give his conclusions or inferences from these primary facts. These are mixed questions of fact and law and the court should approach these in a different way. If they are based on the interpretation of documents, the court should reverse them if they are incorrect for it is in as good a position to determine the meaning of documents as is the Commissioner. If the conclusions from the primary facts are ones which no reasonable Commissioner could draw, the court should set aside his findings on the ground that he must be assumed to have misdirected himself as to the law or made a mistake in reasoning. Finally, if his conclusions show that he has adopted a wrong view of the law, they should be set aside*. If however they are not based on a mistaken view of the law or a wrong interpretation of documents, they should not be* set aside unless the inferences which he made from the primary facts were ones that no reasonable Commissioner could draw." (emphasis added)

15. He then referred to the Supreme Court decision in Ó Culachain (Inspector of Taxes) v. McMullan Brothers Ltd. [1995] 2 I.R. 217. Blayney J., speaking for the court, held that the following principles apply when a court has before it a case stated seeking its opinion as to whether a particular decision was correct in law:-

> "(1) Findings of primary fact by the judge should not be disturbed unless there is no evidence to support them.
> (2) Inferences from primary facts are mixed questions of fact and law.
>
> (3) If the judge's conclusions show that he has adopted a wrong view of the law, they should be set aside.
>
> (4) If his conclusions are not based on a mistaken view of the law, they should not be set aside unless the inferences which he drew were ones which no reasonable judge could draw.
> (5) Some evidence will point to one conclusion, other evidence to the opposite: these are essentially matters of degree and the judge's conclusions should not be disturbed (even if the court does not agree with them, for we are not retrying the case) unless they are such that a reasonable judge could not have arrived at them or they are based on a mistaken view of the law."

16. The trial judge stated, on the question of mutuality of obligation, that he understood the determination of the Commissioner to be that "the initiation of the relevant contract for each roster depended on a driver making himself available". He held that, in so concluding, the Commissioner did not err in her characterisation of the umbrella and hybrid agreements (para. 49).

17. At paras. 50-51 he held:-

"50. The Court is not persuaded that mutuality of obligations always requires an obligation to provide work and to complete that work on an ongoing basis in the manner contended for by the appellant. "Ongoing" does not necessarily connote immediate continuation or a defined period of ongoing. There is no binding precedent to suggest that the ongoing basis between the appellant and the drivers does not meet the criteria required. The appellant bears the burden of establishing that the application of "ongoing" as found by the Commissioner was an error of law. This case is concerned with whether the Commissioner misstated or misunderstood the law about the mutuality of obligations. The Commissioner, in relying upon [Weight Watchers (UK) v. Revenue & Customs Commissioners [2011] UKUT 433 (TCC), [2011] All ER (D) 229 (Nov)] did not go against Irish law but rather recognised the necessity to adapt to modern means of engaging workers. The appellant agreed to provide work when the appellant needed the driver, who notified the appellant about his or her availability. The Commissioner considered the facts and applied her understanding of the law which the appellant has not established to have been incorrect. The appellant has not discharged its burden to establish that the Commissioner misunderstood or misapplied the law in Ireland concerning the concept of mutuality.

51. The reference in [Minister for Agriculture v. Barry [2008] IEHC 216, [2009] I.R. 215] to the need for an ongoing series of mutual obligations should be understood having regard to the claims in Barry which related to redundancy entitlements that depended on length of service. Revenue correctly submits that hybrid contracts of employment are relevant in tax or PRSI cases such as that now before the Court. Undoubtedly, umbrella and hybrid contracts require more ongoing commitments in unfair dismissal, redundancy and other labour rights cases due to the statutory triggers based on defined periods of employment. The Commissioner took the facts into account when applying the law which is admittedly difficult to summarise for all circumstances. Mutuality of obligations can occur under an umbrella contract which is modified by the operation of ongoing relationships that carry obligations for both sides of the contract of employment."

18. At para. 53, he held that the written "umbrella" contract required a driver to initiate an agreement with the appellant. He accepted the Commissioner's finding that once rostered by the appellant there was a contract which "retained mutual obligations". The right to cancel a shift at short notice "imposed obligations to engage a substitute and to work out the remainder of the shifts in the series". He held that the drivers had "ongoing obligations". He therefore concluded that the Commissioner did not err in her determination under the heading of mutuality of obligation.

19. The appellant argued that the drivers had a right of substitution pursuant to Clause 12 of the written agreement but that there was no requirement on a driver to arrange for the work to be done by another person. It submitted that the right of substitution was inconsistent with a contract of employment. The trial judge held that the Commissioner did not err in holding that the drivers did not hire assistants and that rather one driver was replaced by another driver from the appellant's pool of drivers:-

"The substitute was paid by the appellant. A substitute was not a sub-contractor of the driver. Moreover, the driver and the substitute left it to the appellant to prepare invoices for them respectively."

20. He held that the Commissioner did not err in determining that:-

"[t]he absence of an ability to genuinely subcontract is a factor which indicates that the drivers worked under contracts of service as opposed to contracts for services."

21. In Re Sunday Tribune Ltd [1984] I.R. 505, the High Court applied the "integration" test to determine whether or not a person works under a contract for services, i.e. whether a person is employed as part of the business and his or her work is done as an integral part of the business. The appellant argued that the Commissioner erred in her application of this test when she focussed on whether the kind of work done by the drivers (i.e. pizza deliveries) is integral to the business of the appellant rather than whether the drivers formed part of the appellant's organisation. The trial judge held that the Commissioner had regard to the integration of the drivers into the business of the appellant and that her reasoning was not flawed. In particular, she looked at the requirement for the drivers to:

(i) Wear uniforms and place logos on their cars;

(ii) Reassure customers that they were dealing with personnel of the appellant;

(iii) Maintain a coherent operation under the care of the appellant;

(iv) Take telephone orders from the appellant and not customers of the appellant.

22. The High Court dismissed the appellant's arguments that the Commissioner failed to have adequate regard to the terms of the written agreement in the following terms:-

> "66. Written terms in an umbrella agreement, which can be used piecemeal or in ways which will suit the practicalities of those who engage and those who work, were interpreted by the Commissioner at first instance with an eye on the reality of the relationships between drivers and the appellant. The words of Keane J. in Henry Denny (p. 53) about the written terms having "marginal" value echo in this regard. Moreover, Geoghegan J. in Castleisland at p. 150 referred to the necessity to "...look at how the contract is worked out in practice as mere wording cannot determine its nature". In short, this Court sees no real merit in the submissions made on behalf of the appellant under this heading. The Commissioner found the facts, summarised her understanding of the law and applied same without an error which has been established to the satisfaction of this Court."

23. Accordingly, the High Court dismissed the appeal and replied to the nine questions in the case stated that the Commissioner:

1. Correctly interpreted and applied the concept of mutuality of obligation.
2. Was correct in determining that it was not necessary to consider whether the "umbrella" contract contained mutuality of obligation.
3. Correctly interpreted and applied the concept of "integration ".
4. Correctly interpreted and applied the concept of "substitution ".
5. Did not err in having regard to authorities which were decided after the appeal hearing was completed in July 2016, or in failing to invite the parties to address her on those authorities.
6. Did not err in law in having regard to the United Kingdom/English authorities which are based on s. 230 of the UK Employment Rights Act 1996 and on an intermediate category of "worker" as defined by that legislation.
7. Did not err in law in determining that she was not bound by a previous decision of the Social Welfare Appeals Office, or that she did not err in law in failing to give any or adequate weight to the said previous decision.
8. Did not err in law by failing to give proper weight to the actual terms and conditions of the express agreement as between the appellant and the drivers.
9. Did not err in law in diverse findings regarding: the manner in which rosters were set, drivers folding boxes, the nature of the ordering system, the nature of substitution, sanction for unreliability, payment of an hourly rate, clocking-in, the nature of prohibition of work for others and opportunity to make a profit.

The determination of the Commissioner

24. The trial judge correctly identified the principles to be applied by the High Court and this court on appeal in relation to a case stated. The court must determine, inter alia, whether the decider erred in law. For this reason, I turn to the detail of the determination of the Commissioner after considering the judgment of the High Court. I have already set out the findings of fact of the Commissioner. The primary findings of fact are not challenged. It is her inferences from the primary facts and her application of the law to the primary facts, the written agreement and the inferences drawn from both which are challenged by the appellant. It is necessary therefore to consider the determination of the Commissioner in greater detail in light of the principles in Mara v. Hummingbird and Ó Culachain.

25. The Commissioner took as her starting point the decision in Minister for Agriculture v. Barry [2008] IEHC 216[2], [2009] 1 I.R. 215. The Commissioner noted that the High Court held that the analysis must start with a consideration of whether the relationship was subject to one or more contracts. She quoted para. 43 where Edwards J. stated:-

> "43. In each instance it was incumbent on the tribunal to ask three questions. The first question was whether the relationship between each respondent and the appellant was subject to just one contract, or to more than one contract. The second question involved the scope of each contract. The third question involved the nature of each contract."

26. She then quoted the following para. 44:-

> "As I have stated, there were various possibilities. It was, of course, possible that each of the respondents, respectively, was employed under a single contract which, upon a thorough examination of the circumstances, might fall to be classified as either a contract of service or a contract for services. However, another possibility was that on each occasion that the temporary veterinary inspectors worked they entered a new contract, and these contracts, depending on the circumstances, might fall to be classified as contracts of service or contracts for services. A third possibility is that on each occasion that the temporary veterinary inspectors worked they entered a separate contract governing that particular engagement, which might be either a contract of service or a contract for service, but by virtue of a course of dealing over a lengthy period of time that course of dealing became hardened or refined into an enforceable contract, a kind of overarching master or umbrella contract, if you like, to offer and accept employment, which master or umbrella contract might conceivably be either a contract of service or a contract for services or perhaps a different type of contract altogether."

[2] The Commissioner gives the incorrect citation.

27. She concluded that this was authority for the proposition that individuals carrying out work may work under multiple individual contracts as opposed to one single contract. She noted the respondent's argument that, in this instance, there was an over-arching umbrella contract "of the type referred to by Edwards J." and that the umbrella contract, represented by the written agreement, was supplemented by multiple individual contracts in respect of each assignment of work, with each assignment involving one or more shifts of work depending on the particular agreement. The respondent relied upon the decision in Weight Watchers (UK) Limited & Ors. v. Revenue & Customs Commissioners [2011] UKUT 433 (TCC), [2011] All ER (D) 229 (Nov). The Commissioner quoted where Briggs J. stated:-

"Contractual arrangements for discontinuous work may, at least in theory, fall into at least three categories. The first consists of a single over-arching or umbrella contract containing all the necessary provisions, with no separate contracts for each period (or piece) of work. The second consists of a series of discrete contracts, one for each period of work, but no over-arching or umbrella contract. The third, hybrid, class consists of an over-arching contract in relation to certain matters, supplemented by discrete contracts for each period of work. In this hybrid class, it may be (and is, in the present case) sufficient if either the over-arching contract or the discrete contracts are contracts of employment, provided that any contract or contracts of employment thus identified sufficiently resolve the question in dispute. Where, as here, the question is whether the PAYE regime and the applicable national insurance regime apply to the work done by the Leaders, it is clearly sufficient if there is identified either a single over-arching contract of employment or a series of discrete contracts of employment which, together, cover all the periods during which the Leader's work is carried out."

28. She quoted para. 79 of the judgment of Briggs J.:-

"... the FTT [First Tier Tribunal] concluded that, in relation to any specific meeting or series of meetings, Leaders conducted them pursuant to specific contracts for the taking of those meetings, rather than pursuant to any general umbrella agreement. Further, I am equally satisfied that the FTT concluded that, in addition to meeting-specific contracts, there was indeed an overarching or umbrella contract between WWUK [Weight Watchers (UK)] and each Leader, dealing in particular with obligations of Leaders affecting them otherwise than when taking meetings."

29. The Commissioner then answered the first question Edwards J. said should be addressed by holding that the contractual arrangements in this case fall within the hybrid category described by Briggs J. at para. 30 of the judgment in Weight Watchers. At para. 45 of her determination she said:-

"... I find that the structure of the contractual arrangements in this appeal comprises one overarching umbrella contract supplemented by multiple individual contracts in respect of assignments of work."

30. She held that the legal basis for holding that there were individual contracts arising under umbrella contracts in these types of hybrid contractual arrangements was to be found in para. 81 of the judgment in Weight Watchers where Briggs J. held that the First Tier Tribunal (FTT) was:-

"... correct to conclude that there were meeting-specific contracts between WWUK and its Leaders. I consider that the key to that conclusion lies in Condition 6, which requires the Leader to obtain WWUK's specific approval ... in relation to the fixing of the time, date and place of any meetings or series of meetings. Furthermore, the first sentence of Condition 6 refers expressly to that process being one which requires the Leader to agree to take any such meetings. It follows in my judgment that in relation to any particular meetings or series of meetings, the umbrella agreement constituted by the Conditions, the MOA and the Policy Booklets is no more than an agreement to agree, requiring a further and distinct contract-making process for the conduct of any particular meeting or (more usually) series of meetings. Condition 6 plainly places the initiative for concluding such meeting-specific contracts upon the Leader, who must propose the relevant timing, dating and venue of any meeting or series of meetings for WWUK's agreement."

31. On the basis of these authorities, she concluded at para. 49 of her determination:-

"Thus in the within appeal, the umbrella contract required a driver, in accordance with Clause 14 thereof, to initiate an agreement with the Appellant in relation to his availability for work by 'mak[ing] himself available on only certain days and certain times of his own choosing'. Once the Appellant rostered a driver for one or more shifts of work, there was a contract in place, in respect of which the parties retained mutual obligations."

32. She said that there was no impediment to separate engagements of work constituting contracts of service, citing Quashie v. Stringfellows [2013] I.R.L.R. 99.

33. She then considered whether mutuality of obligation was present. She quoted para. 47 of Edwards J.'s judgment in Barry:-

"The requirement of mutuality of obligation is the requirement that there must be mutual obligations on the employer to provide work for the employee and on the employee to perform work for the employer. If such mutuality is not present, then there is no contract at all or whatever contract there is must be a contract for services or something else, but not a contract of service. … Accordingly, the mutuality of obligation test provides an important filter. While one party to a work relationship contends that the relationship amounts to a contract of service, it is appropriate that the court or tribunal seized with that issue should in the first instance examine the relation in question to determine if mutuality of obligation is a feature of it. If there is no mutuality of obligation, it is not necessary to go further; whatever the relationship is, it cannot amount to a contract of service."

34. She noted that the mutuality of obligation is "an irreducible minimum of a contract of service", quoting Brightwater Selection (Ireland) Limited v. Minister for Social and Family Affairs [2011] IEHC 510. She said that the parties agreed that while an individual is working there is a contract in existence in which the mutuality of obligation is present. She said that the mutuality of obligation requirement must be satisfied in respect of the entirety of each contract i.e. it "must be present for the period of the existence of the contract alleged to amount to a contract of employment and not just in respect of the period of time when the work is being carried out by the drivers." Relying on para. 31 of Weight Watchers to the effect that this irreducible minimum must subsist "throughout each relevant discrete contract, not merely during the potentially shorter period when the contracted work is actually being done" she held that individual contracts resulted from the driver notifying the appellant of his availability for work and the appellant placing his name on the roster in respect of a specific shift or series of shifts (para. 64). She accepted the submission of the respondent that the fact that a driver could exercise a choice in respect of the shifts for which he was available did not alter the fact that the relationship between the driver and the appellant was, and is, governed by these contracts and they contained mutual obligations to perform personal service. She accepted that mutuality "was present for the entire duration of such contracts", notwithstanding the provisions of Clause 12 and Clause 14 of the written agreement.

35. She held:-

> "75. The import of the above clauses is that they do not set out expressly the circumstances in which a driver is at liberty not to turn up for a shift for which he is rostered. In accordance with the dicta of Briggs J. [in Weight Watchers]… the contract assumes that there are or may be such circumstances so that, without breach of contract, the driver may propose not to take a particular shift.
>
> 76. The appellant contended that the drivers had no obligations whatsoever as they could choose not to turn up for any shift, safe in the knowledge that no sanction would be imposed. However, the contract envisages cancellation 'should the contractor be unavailable at short notice' together with a requirement of advance notification in accordance with Clause 14. Thus the contract aims to some extent, to regulate the circumstances of cancellation by a driver."

36. She referred to Condition 10 in the contract in Weight Watchers as similarly providing for advanced notification in relation to cancellation. She considered Weight

Watchers and two other English cases, Pimlico Plumbers Limited v. Smith [2018] UKSC 29, [2018] 4 All ER 641 and Autoclenz Ltd v. Belcher & Ors. [2011] UKSC 41, [2011] 4 All ER 745 and then she concluded in paras. 81-84 as follows:-

> "81. While there are differences in Pimlico and in Autoclenz (i.e. the contract in Pimlico specified a minimum number of hours to be worked while the contract in Autoclenz did not actually reflect what was agreed between the parties) the reasoning in these cases is of assistance insofar as it does not support the proposition that if there is such a clause (i.e. a clause which provides that the provider of work has no obligation to offer work and the putative recipient no obligation to accept work) that mutuality of obligation is absent.
>
> 82. In this appeal, the right of a driver to cancel a shift was qualified by the requirement to engage a substitute, to provide advance notification to the Appellant and to work out the remainder of the shifts in the series which had been agreed.
>
> 83. I agree with the reasoning of Briggs J. in Weight Watchers (UK) Ltd. and I conclude that a contract which provides drivers with the right to cancel shifts at short notice does not relieve a driver of work related obligations in the manner contended for by the Appellant.
>
> 84. Thus I determine that the requirement of mutuality of obligation was satisfied in the individual contracts entered into between the Appellant and the drivers, each contract representing an assignment of work (comprising one or more shifts), and that these obligations were not invalidated by clauses 12 and/or 14 of the written agreement, and were not invalidated on any other basis."

37. On this basis, she was satisfied that mutuality of obligation was present for the duration of the individual contracts.

38. She held at para. 164 of her determination:-

"164. The multiple individual contracts, comprising contracts of service, are taxable in accordance with section 112 TCA 1997. It is not necessary to embark upon an analysis of the nature of the umbrella contract and whether it is a contract of or for. It is not necessary to consider whether the umbrella contract contained mutuality of obligations." (emphasis as in original)

39. She did not analyse the over-arching written contract to ascertain whether mutuality of obligation was present. Having found that mutuality of obligation was present in the discrete individual contracts, she then proceeded to analyse whether they were contracts of service or contracts for services.

40. She started by quoting from the judgment of Keane J. in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Limited v. Minister for Social Welfare [1999] 1 I.R. 34. While it is a lengthy quote it is appropriate to reproduce it in this judgment:-

"... The criteria which should be adopted in considering whether a particular employment, in the context of legislation such as the Act of 1981, is to be regarded as a contract "for service" or a contract "of services" have been the subject of a number of decisions in Ireland and England. In some of the cases, different terminology is used and the distinction is stated as being between a "servant" and "independent contractor". However, there is a consensus to be found in the authorities that each case must be considered in the light of its particular facts and of the general principles which the courts have developed*: see the observations of Barr J., in McAuliffe v. Minister for Social Welfare[1995] 2 I.R. 238.*

At one stage, the extent and degree of the control which was exercised by one party over the other in the performance of the work was regarded as decisive. However, as later authorities demonstrate, that test does not always provide satisfactory guidance. In Cassidy v. Ministry of Health [1951] 2 K.B. 343, it was pointed out that, although the master of a ship is clearly employed under a contract of service, the owners are not entitled to tell him how he should navigate the vessel. Conversely, the fact that one party reserves the right to exercise full control over the method of doing the work may be consistent with the other party being an independent contractor: see Queensland Stations Property Ltd v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation [1945] 70 C.L.R. 539.

In the English decision of Market Investigations v. Min of Soc Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, Cooke J., at p. 184 having referred to these authorities said:-

> "The observations of Lord Wright, of Denning L.J. and of the judges of the Supreme Court suggest that the fundamental test to be applied is this: 'Is the person who has engaged himself to perform these services performing them as a person in business on his own account?'. If the answer to that question is 'yes', then the contract is a contract for services. If the answer is 'no', then the contract is a contract of service. No exhaustive list has been compiled and perhaps no exhaustive list can be compiled of considerations which are relevant in determining that question, nor can strict rules be laid down as to the relative weight which the various considerations should carry in particular cases*. The most that can be said is that control will no doubt always have to be considered, although it can no longer be regarded as the sole determining factor; and that factors which may be of importance are such matters as whether the man performing the services provides his own equipment, whether he hires his own helpers, what degree of financial risk he takes, what degree of responsibility for investment and management he has, and whether and how far he has an opportunity of profiting from sound management in the performance of his task."*

It should also be noted that the Supreme Court of the Irish Free State in Graham v. Minister for Industry and Commerce [1933] I.R. 156, had also made it clear that the essential test was whether the person alleged to be a "servant" was in fact working for himself or for another person.

It is, accordingly, clear that, while each case must be determined in the light of its particular facts and circumstances*, in general a person will be regarded as providing his or her services under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor where he or she is performing those services for another person and not for himself or herself. The degree of control exercised over how the work is to be performed, although a factor to be taken into account, is not decisive.* The inference that the person is engaged in business on his or her own account can be more readily drawn where he or she provides the necessary premises or equipment or some other form of investment, where he or she employs others to assist in the business and where the profit which he or she derives from the business is dependent on the efficiency with which it is conducted by him or her." (emphasis added)

41. The Commissioner referred to the fact that a number of tests had been developed by the courts to establish whether an individual is working under a contract of service or a contract for services. She then applied these various tests to the appeal before her. She considered the question of substitution and personal service, control, integration, the enterprise test, the opportunity to profit, bargaining power and the categorisation of employment status by the parties. In relation to substitution, she noted that if a driver was rostered for a shift but was "unable to turn up" he had an entitlement under Clause 12 of the written agreement to arrange for the work to be done by another of the appellant's drivers. In such a situation, the driver who performed the work who was not originally rostered would be paid for the work. Alternatively, the appellant could arrange for another one of its drivers to perform the work.

42. She considered a number of authorities where the significance of a right of substitution was considered. In Pimlico Plumbers, the individual plumber was permitted to substitute another Pimlico operative and the court held that the contract was one for personal services. In Ready Mixed Concrete v. Minister for Pensions [1968] 2 QB 497, a delivery driver was entitled to appoint a substitute who worked for the driver as opposed to the driver's employer and in those circumstances the court held that the driver was an independent contractor. In McAuliffe v. Minister for Social Welfare [1995] ILRM 189, the substitution clause permitted the individuals to substitute a relief driver to be paid by the driver. The court concluded that the individuals involved were independent contractors and not employees. In Henry Denny, if the shop demonstrator was unable to do the work herself "she was required" to arrange for the work to be performed by someone else approved by the company, and she was found to be working under a contract of service. In Tierney v. An Post [2000] 1 I.R. 536, a sub-post office master was required to obtain the permission of An Post for the employment of any person in the post office, and the court concluded that it was a contract for services. In Weight Watchers, the substitution clause required team leaders to find a "suitably qualified replacement" in the event that they were unavailable. The Commissioner said that Briggs J. held that the substitution clause in Weight Watchers (which permitted either a leader or Weight Watchers (UK) Limited to find a suitably qualified replacement to do the work) did not make the replacement leader the original leader's delegate, but gave rise to an entirely new contract in relation to that particular meeting between Weight Watchers (UK) Limited and the replacement leader.

43. In relation to this appeal, the Commissioner held that the driver may find a substitute to contract directly with the employer to do the work in circumstances where the substitute received payment for the work, as opposed to the original driver. At para. 97 she said:-

"In other words, the driver is relying upon a qualified right not to do or provide the work in stated circumstances, one of the qualifications being that he find a substitute to contract directly with the employer to do the work instead."

44. At para. 100 she concluded that the substitution clause in this case was similar to that in Weight Watchers:-

"... and the same legal consequences arise. The substitution of one of the appellant's other drivers, by the original rostered driver or by the appellant, gives rise to an entirely new contract between the appellant and that other driver in relation to that particular work assignment."

45. She concluded on the issue of substitution as follows:-

"101. The appellant in the within appeal submitted that the substitution clause was wide enough to permit, without breach of contract, the drivers never to turn up for work at all and the substitution clause was therefore consistent with drivers being independent contractors. This is plainly incorrect. Any drivers substituted in the context of the within appeal would have been remunerated directly by the appellant for carrying out contractual obligations for the appellant. They were not sub-contractors for the original driver.

102. Where an original driver was replaced by a substitute, the agreement between the substitute and the appellant constituted a new contract and it replaced any contract between the original driver and the appellant in respect of that particular shift. This arrangement was akin to the swapping of shifts between drivers. It does not suggest that the drivers' contract with the appellant was a contract for services unless, inter alia, the original rostered driver was being remunerated by the appellant for the work being done by the substitute driver, but this was not the case.

105. In this appeal, if a driver was rostered for a shift but was unable to attend, he was required to arrange for the work to be done by another person approved by the appellant, i.e. another of the appellant's drivers. Once the original rostered driver confirmed his unavailability, the substitute entered into a contract with the appellant and was paid directly by the appellant for performing the work. The absence of an ability to genuinely sub-contract is a factor which indicates that the drivers worked under contracts of service as opposed to contracts for services."

46. The Commissioner considered the issue of the employment status of the drivers from the perspective of integration. She referred to the decision in Re Sunday Tribune Limited [1984] I.R. 505, at p. 507, where Carroll J. held that:-

"The test which emerges from the authorities seems to me, as Denning L.J. said, whether on the one hand the employee is employed as part of the business and his work is an integral part of the business, or whether his work is not integrated into the business but is only accessory to it...".

47. The Commissioner said that in order to ascertain how integrated an individual is in respect of a business, one must identify and consider the core aspects of the business. She said the component of delivery to the business was extremely important. The appellant's business comprised two core aspects, namely; the production of pizzas and the delivery of pizzas. She rejected the idea that it was possible in the circumstances for a business to outsource to contractors the very service it was established to provide: "it is not simply a pizza business, it is a pizza delivery business." On that basis, she held that the work of the drivers was integral to the business and not merely accessory to it. She was of the view that if the contractors were truly independent of the appellant, they would not be wearing Domino's branded clothing, would not be driving Domino's branded vehicles and would not be using Domino's imprinted bags for the pizzas. She was of the view that the Domino's logo would be predominantly, perhaps fully, absent in the process of delivering the pizza.

48. As regards the categorization of employment status by the parties, the Commissioner noted that it was well-established that minimal weight would be attributed to the categorisation given by the parties to their working relationship. She referred to the decision of Murphy J. in Henry Denny and the decision of Geoghegan J. in Castleisland Cattle Breeding Society Limited v. Minister for Social and Family Affairs [2004] 4 I.R. 150 and Barry. At para. 152, she concluded that the law was clear in relation to the matter of categorisation. She said:-

> "... Legal analysis must take into account the terms of the written contract but must focus also on the operation of the contract, the correct legal interpretation of its terms and the indications which arise on foot of the relevant legal tests and their application."

49. At para. 155 she determined:-

> "... that the framework in the within appeal is one of an overarching umbrella contract supplemented by individual contracts in respect of assignments of work. As regards the individual contracts, I have conducted an analysis based on the components of: substitution and personal service, control, integration, the enterprise test, opportunity to profit and bargaining power. The application of these tests leads to the conclusion that these contracts are contracts of service. The law is unambiguous as regards the minimal weight to be attached to the description of the drivers in the written contract as 'independent contractors'. I determine that the individual contracts entered into between the appellant and its drivers in respect of assignments at work involving one or more shifts, comprise contracts of service."

50. Accordingly, she concluded that the drivers worked under multiple contracts of service and were taxable in relation to the emoluments arising therefrom, in accordance with s. 112 of the TCA.

The appeal

51. As I have stated, the company appealed by way of case stated to the High Court and the Commissioner stated a case raising nine questions for the determination of the High Court. The High Court determined that there were, in effect, four core issues for determination; mutuality of obligations, substitution, integration and whether the Commissioner failed to give proper weight to the actual terms of the contract. The High Court upheld the decision of the Commissioner in full. The appellant appealed the decision of the High Court to this court in respect of each of the nine issues set out in the case stated, though the appeal focussed on the four core issues identified by the trial judge.

Case law

52. In Henry Denny, Keane J. (as he then was) said that each case must be determined in light of its particular facts and circumstances (p. 50). In Castleisland Cattle Breeding Society Limited v. The Minister for Social & Family Affairs [2004] 4 I.R. 150, at para. 23, Geoghegan J. held:-

"... There is nothing unlawful or necessarily ineffective about a company deciding to engage people on an independent contractor basis rather than on a "servant" basis but, as this court has pointed out in Henry Denny Ireland Limited v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 and other cases, in determining whether the new contract is one of service or for services the decider must look at how the contract is worked out in practice as mere wording cannot determine its nature.

> Nevertheless, the wording of a written contract still remains of great importance. It can, however, emerge in evidence that in practice the working arrangements between the parties are consistent only with a different kind of contract or at least are inconsistent with the expressed categorisation of the contract. In this case, apart from matters of minor detail, the written contract seems to have been the contract that actually worked." (emphasis added)

53. It is thus important both to consider the terms of the written agreement between the appellant and the drivers, and whether in practice the working arrangements between the parties are consistent only with a different kind of contract or at least are inconsistent with the express categorisation of the contract. Terms and conditions describing the relationship between the parties are, in the words of Murphy J. in Henry Denny, of marginal value as "they are not contractual terms in the sense of imposing obligations on one party in favour of the other. They purport to express a conclusion of law as to the consequences of the contract between the parties." This observation does not apply to the substantive terms of the written agreement. It is therefore of considerable significance that the Commissioner determined that in three specific respects – and no more – the operation of the agreement "day to day" differed from the written terms. It follows that, save in these three specific instances, the written agreement was the contract actually operated by the parties to it.

54. Before considering how the written terms of the agreement and the working arrangements of the parties should be characterised, one must first determine whether the Commissioner erred in law in concluding that the threshold test of mutuality of obligation was satisfied in this case by the multiple individual contracts and that it was not necessary to consider whether it was met in the over-arching agreement.

55. The parties agreed that "mutuality of obligation" is a sine qua non of an employment relationship. The concept was first discussed in Barry by Edwards J. In that case, the respondents were veterinary surgeons who worked for the Minister as temporary veterinary inspectors at meat plants in County Cork. Following closure of the plants, the respondents claimed to be entitled to redundancy payments. These were contingent on them having been employees who were employed at all material times by the Minister under a contract of service. Edwards J. noted that the work relationship between each of the respondents and the Minister was a very unusual one, and he did not regard it as a straight choice between a single contract of service and a single contract for services: there were wider possibilities and it was unjustifiable to limit the possibilities to just two. He then set out paras. 43 and 44, which are quoted at paras. 25 and 26 above. It is important to note that he contemplated three possible scenarios. The third possibility envisaged by Edwards J. was that on each occasion that the temporary veterinary inspectors worked, they entered a separate contract governing that particular engagement, which might be either a contract of service or a contract for services, but by virtue of a course of dealing over a lengthy period of time that course of dealing became hardened or refined into an enforceable contract, a kind of over-arching or master umbrella contract to offer and accept employment. This master or umbrella contract could be either a contract of service or a contract for services, or perhaps a different type of contract altogether. In that case, there was in fact no over-arching master contract comparable to the written agreement in this case and Edwards J. made no finding that an over-arching contract had come into existence in Barry. The only contracts under discussion in Barry were the individual short contracts with each temporary vet, which could have been either contracts of service or contracts for service.

56. Edwards J. proceeded to consider the issue of mutuality of obligation and it is worth quoting what he said in full:-

"47. The requirement of mutuality of obligation is the requirement that there must be mutual obligations on the employer to provide work for the employee and on the employee to perform work for the employer. If such mutuality is not present, then either there is no contract at all or whatever contract there is must be a contract for services or something else, but not a contract of service. It was characterised in Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 at p. 632 as the "one sine qua non which can firmly be identified as an essential of the existence of a contract of service." Moreover, in Carmichael v. National Power plc. [1999] I.C.R. 1226 at p.1230 it was referred to as "that irreducible minimum of mutual obligation necessary to create a contract of service". Accordingly the mutuality of obligation test provides an important filter. Where one party to a work relationship contends that that relationship amounts to a contract of service, it is appropriate that the court or tribunal seized of that issue should in the first instance examine the relationship in question to determine if mutuality of obligation is a feature of it. If there is no mutuality of obligation it is not necessary to go further: whatever the relationship is, it cannot amount to a contract of service. However, if mutuality of obligation is found to exist, the mere fact of its existence is not, of itself, determinative of the nature of the relationship and it is necessary to examine the relationship further."

57. In Mansoor v. Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform [2011] 1 I.R. 562, the High Court (Lavan J.) dismissed the claim of the plaintiff that he was an employee of the defendant on the grounds of the absence of mutuality of obligation. The plaintiff was a doctor who provided medical services at a garda station in respect of the taking of blood or urine samples from persons suspected of committing drink/driving offences. Lavan J. quoted Barry, that if there is no mutuality of obligation it is not necessary to go further in the analysis as, whatever the relationship is, it cannot amount to a contract of service. The focus of the case was on whether the Minister was under an obligation to provide work for Dr. Mansoor, though it also addressed the issue of whether Dr. Mansoor was required to work if called on to attend at a garda station. At para. 22 of the judgment, he held that the test was not satisfied in the case before him:-

> "22. … It is clear that the defendants were not obliged to give the plaintiff work. Nor could the defendants possibly predict the number of drink driving offences that may occur on any given night. In addition, it was open to the defendants to call a number of general practitioners to assist them and although the plaintiff, along with a number of other general practitioners may have been on a contact or duty list, were the plaintiff to declare that he were unavailable for work, he could face no sanction or rebuke from the defendants. He simply would not be paid. The plaintiff performed a set task for a fixed sum. Likewise, if the defendants elected to engage a different general practitioner on any given occasion, the plaintiff would have had no reasonable grounds for objecting to this."

58. He therefore found that the plaintiff was at all material times an independent contractor.

59. In Brightwater Selection (Ireland) Limited v. Minister for Social and Family Affairs [2011] IEHC 510, Gilligan J. considered whether an employment agency was the employer of the workers whom it placed with third parties. Ms. Keenan registered with an employment agency, Brightwater. Brightwater arranged for an interview for Ms. Keenan for a position in the administration department of UCD and she was subsequently offered a temporary position as a financial accountant. Her only interaction with Brightwater consisted of filing weekly timesheets and the corresponding payment by Brightwater of Ms. Keenan's salary into a designated bank account. Brightwater deducted and paid the tax and the employee and employer's element of social insurance contributions. There was no obligation on Brightwater to provide work for Ms. Keenan, nor any corresponding obligation on Ms. Keenan to work on behalf of Brightwater. Brightwater claimed that it was due a refund of the employer's element of the social insurance contributions it had paid in respect of agency workers, and the case of Ms. Keenan was selected as a test case for determining the insurability of agency workers and the associated entitlement to a refund. Gilligan J. cited the decision of Lord Irvine L.C. in Carmichael and Leese v. National Power Plant [1999] 1 W.L.R. 2042 in relation to part time guides:-

> "… that the documents did no more than provide a framework for a series of successive ad hoc contracts of service or for services which the parties might subsequently make; and that when they were not working as guides they were not in any contractual relationship with the C.E.G.B. The parties incurred no obligations to provide or accept work, but at best assumed moral obligations of loyalty in a context where both recognised that the best interests of each lay in being accommodating to the other. ... The words imposed no obligation on Mrs. Leese and Mrs. Carmichael, but intimated that casual employment on the pay terms stated could ensue as and when the C.E.G.B.'s requirements for the services of the guides arose.
> If this appeal turned exclusively – and in my judgment it does not – on the true meaning and effect of the documentation of March 1989, then I would hold as a matter of construction that no obligation on the C.E.G.B. to provide casual work, nor on Mrs. Leese and Mrs. Carmichael to undertake it, was imposed. There would therefore be an absence of the irreducible minimum of mutual obligation necessary to create a contract of service …".

60. Gilligan J. then cited, with approval, the decision of Edwards J. in Barry and, in particular, his description of the requirement of mutuality of obligation. At paras. 48 and 49, Gilligan J. said:-

> "48. Mutuality of obligation exists where there is an obligation on a body to provide work to an individual, and a corresponding obligation on the individual to perform the work. ...
> 49. The mutuality consideration is by no means a determinative test, but is an irreducible minimum of a contract of service. Although the existence of mutuality of obligation is not determinative, without mutuality no contract of service can exist."

61. In McKayed v. Forbidden City Limited t/a Translations.ie [2016] IEHC 722, Ní Raifeartaigh J., in the High Court, again considered the mutuality of obligation test. The plaintiff in that case was a translator. He received work over a period of approximately two and a half years. The company provided training for him and he was paid an hourly rate which reduced over time. He was told by the company where to attend and where to work. He was not registered for VAT, and the name and logo of the company were displayed on his identification badge when he was working. He was to provide the company details and phone number when working and not his own. He submitted invoices at the request of the company. Sick pay, holiday pay and pension contributions were not covered by the company. He could be called at any time, 24-hours, seven days a week. The defendant argued that there was an absence of the mutuality of obligation necessary for an employment contract and therefore Mr. McKayed was not an employee of the company. The plaintiff argued that the evidence supported the existence of mutuality of obligation and that the requirement subsisted in an implied agreement for future work on an ongoing basis between the parties as well as in the terms of the written document. He argued that over the course of dealings between the parties, a mutual obligation had built up whereby the applicant was paid for the work done and was obliged to provide his own work and skill in the performance of a service for the employer, and the employer had an obligation into the future to provide him with work. The High Court considered the prior authorities and the appropriateness of departing from Barry in the context of In the matter of Worldport Ireland Limited (in liquidation) [2005] IEHC 189 and Kadri v. Governor of Wheatfield Prison [2012] IESC 27. At para. 31 of her judgment she held:-

> "... The issue of how to determine whether a contract of employment exists has been before many courts on many occasions, and while there have been many differences of opinion at different times and in different places, the position today in this jurisdiction is that the approach identified in Barry, and applied in [Mansoor] and Brightwater, is appropriate. While the Supreme Court in the Denny case did not refer to the 'mutuality of obligations' test, presumably because of the facts of the case, there is nothing in that case which indicates that the test may not usefully be used as a filtering mechanism to identify clear cases of a relationship other than an employment relationship."

62. She then applied the mutuality of obligation test to the facts before her. She held, at para. 34, that the defendant agreed "merely to try to give the plaintiff work but that there was no guarantee of work, in circumstances where the defendant itself had no control over the amount of work that might come to it from the Garda Síochána or other State entities". She noted that the appellant was entitled to work for others as well as the defendant. She rejected the argument that an obligation to provide work to the plaintiff arose from the fact that work had, in fact, been given to him on a regular basis for a particular period by the defendant. At para. 39 she said:-

> "... If this approach were determinative of the issue, none of the previous authorities in which this issue had arisen could have reached any conclusion other than that the individuals in question were employees, be they veterinary inspectors, shop demonstrators, casual hotel workers, or home-workers for a clothes company, as they had all carried out work on a regular basis for a period of time; but that is not how those cases were approached by the various courts which examined them. In other words, the fact that work was given regularly for a period of time is not determinative of whether one party had a legal obligation to provide the other party with work." (emphasis added)

63. She concluded that the defendant, the putative employer, was not under a contractual obligation to furnish the plaintiff with any, or any particular, volume of work into the future and that the requisite mutuality of obligation for an employment contract was therefore absent.

64. The Commissioner did not address these authorities, other than Barry, in any detail. Her determination instead placed great emphasis on the decision of the Upper Tribunal in Weight Watchers. It is to this authority I now turn.

Does Weight Watchers apply?

65. In view of the reliance by the Commissioner, the High Court and the respondent on the judgment of The Upper Tribunal in Weight Watchers (UK) Limited & Ors., it is necessary to consider the judgment in detail and to determine whether the Commissioner erred in law in her application of the case to the facts in these proceedings. At para. 30, Briggs J. set out the three theoretical categories into which contractual arrangements for discontinuous work may fall, which I have quoted at para. 27 above. In relation to the hybrid class, Briggs J. held that it may be sufficient if either the over-arching contract or the discrete contracts are contracts of employment, provided that any contract or contracts of employment thus identified, sufficiently resolve the question in dispute. In that case, the question in dispute was whether the PAYE regime, and the applicable national insurance regime, applied to the work done by the Leaders. Briggs J. held, in para. 31, that in cases of discrete contracts for periods of work it is necessary to show that "the requisite irreducible minimum of mutual work-related obligation subsists throughout each relevant discrete contract, not merely during the potentially shorter period when the contracted work is actually being done." Where the discrete contract is for a series of separate events the "relevant period" during which mutuality of obligation must subsist is the whole of the period of the discrete contract.

66. Applying this analysis to the facts in this case (assuming for the purposes of the argument that there are a series of discrete contracts and not simply one written agreement), the irreducible minimum of mutual work-related obligations must subsist for each rostered period (of one or more shifts) and mutuality of obligation must subsist throughout the whole of the rostered period, typically a week.

67. Briggs J. rejected the argument in Weight Watchers that there was only a single over-arching or umbrella contract with no separate process of contracting for each meeting or series of meetings in para. 81 of his judgment (which is set out at para. 30 above). In so doing, he relied on Condition 6 of the written contract which provided:-

> "The Leader shall, in his/her discretion fix the time, date and place of any Weight Watchers meetings as he/she agrees to take. All arrangements for the hire of halls or other meeting places require specific approval from the Area Service Manager. Such arrangements will be in the name of Weight Watchers who will be responsible for paying all hiring charges."

68. Briggs J. emphasised the fact that the condition required the Leader to agree to take any such meetings and required the Leader to obtain WWUK's specific approval in relation to the fixing of the time, date and place of any meetings or series of meetings. This led Briggs J. to conclude that, in relation to any particular meeting or series of meetings, the umbrella agreement constituted no more than an agreement to agree, requiring a further and distinct contract making process for the conduct of any particular meeting or series of meetings.

69. WWUK argued that even if there were specific contracts for each series of meetings, nonetheless the contracts did not satisfy the test of mutuality of obligation. It argued that even after agreeing a series of meetings, the Leader could simply decide not to conduct one or more or all of them. Thus, there was no contractual obligation on the Leader to work, even after making an agreement relating to a series of meetings. Briggs J. rejected this argument based upon an express term of the contract:-

> "88. … The language of Condition 10 does not set out expressly the circumstances in which a Leader is at liberty not to take a particular meeting. Rather, it assumes that there are or may be such circumstances so that, without breach of contract*, the Leader may propose not to take a particular meeting. Since those circumstances are not confined to cases of inability to take the meeting, it may reasonably be inferred that a Leader may propose not to take a particular meeting due to circumstances falling short of inability, such as a family wedding or funeral, in which the Leader is for good reason unwilling to take that particular meeting*. But such a proposal by no means leaves the Leader free of any work-related obligation to WWUK, either in relation to that meeting or the series of meetings which she has agreed to take.
> 89. First, in relation to the particular meeting, the Leader is by implication obliged first to try and find a suitably qualified replacement and secondly, if that fails, to request Weight Watchers' assistance by giving her ASM as much prior notice as possible. It is only when the replacement Leader has been found (by the original Leader or Weight Watchers) or in default, the particular meeting cancelled, that the original Leader's work-related obligations in relation to that meeting entirely cease.

90. Secondly, it is plain from the language of Condition 10 that where, as usual, a series of meetings has been agreed, a proposal by a Leader not to take a particular meeting leaves her obligation to take the remainder of the series intact. It is in my judgment absurd to suppose that a Leader could, because of Condition 10, first agree to conduct a series of meetings and then, without notice to Weight Watchers, simply fail to attend any of them, without a breach of contract." (emphasis added)

70. A number of points arise from these passages. Briggs J.'s starting point was whether a Leader was "at liberty" not to take a particular meeting once the Leader had agreed to that meeting or series of meetings. Secondly, he implies a requirement that the Leader must have "good reason" for failing to take a meeting. Accordingly, once a Leader has agreed to take a particular meeting or series of meetings, the Leader is obliged, by implication, first to try to find a suitably qualified replacement and secondly, to request "the assistance" of the company by giving her contact as much prior notice as possible. If neither the Leader nor Weight Watchers have organised a replacement, then the particular meeting will be cancelled. It is at that point that the original Leader's "work-related obligations in relation to that meeting entirely cease", but not before. Finally, Briggs J. held that the substitution clause (condition 10) could not be construed to entitle the Leader to agree to conduct a series of meetings and then simply fail to attend to take any of them, without a breach of contract. He rejected the argument that the Leader's right not to take a particular meeting was unfettered. At para. 92 he held:-

"92. … It was fettered as a matter of implication by the need to show some good reason for proposing not to take a meeting, albeit a reason which might fall short of inability. It was further fettered by the continuing obligations to seek to find a suitably qualified replacement, to notify the ASM if unable to do so, so as to seek Weight Watchers' assistance, and to conduct all subsequent meetings in the series which had been agreed." (emphasis added)

71. He held that there was mutuality of obligation and the substitution clause did not alter this conclusion.

72. In my judgment, the contract(s) in this case differ(s) critically from the contract(s) in Weight Watchers. It is always important to bear in mind the observations of Keane J. in Henry Denny that each case must be determined in light of its particular facts and circumstances, and so these differences can be decisive in any given case. The critical differences in my view are as follows:

(1) Briggs J.'s analysis places great weight on obligations on the Leaders under the terms of the contracts, both the umbrella contract and the meeting-specific agreements. He held that Condition 6 expressly required the Leader to agree to take meetings and this led to his conclusion that the condition "plainly places the initiative" for concluding the meeting-specific contracts upon the Leader. In addition, Condition 6 requires the Leader to obtain WWUK's specific approval in relation to the fixing of the time, date and place of any meetings or series of meetings. There are no such equivalent terms in the contractual arrangement under consideration here and the Commissioner made no findings of fact that there were such terms. Rather, at para. 49 of the determination she interpreted the written agreement between the parties and held that Clause 14 "required" a driver to initiate an agreement with the appellant in relation to his availability for work. This is a matter of the construction of the contract rather than a finding of fact, and I shall return to the construction of the contract in due course. It is sufficient for present purposes merely to note the significant differences between Condition 6 and Clause 14.

(2) Briggs J. rejected the argument that there was an absence of mutuality of obligation in the meeting-specific agreements. He did so on the basis that the substitution clause in the agreement (Condition 10) between each Leader and WWUK did not warrant such a conclusion, rather than on an express clause stating that the company was not obliged to offer any work and the Leader was not required to perform any work offered, such as Clause 14. It was accepted by the respondent that Clause 14 did not oblige the appellant to provide work to the drivers, nor the drivers to work for the appellant. This express clause precluded the conclusion reached by Briggs J. in relation to a contract which contained no such equivalent clause.

(3) Briggs J. held that a Leader did not have an unfettered right not to take a particular meeting and this meant that there was an obligation on a Leader to work within the meaning of the mutuality of obligation test. He said the Leader's right to refuse to work was fettered as a matter of implication by the need to show some "good reason" for proposing not to take a meeting. In this case, there is no requirement on a driver to show good reason for not undertaking a delivery service. Clause 12 expressly confers a right to engage a substitute delivery person should the driver be unavailable at short notice. It was not argued, and the Commissioner did not hold, that, as a matter of implication, the driver could only do so on the basis of some "good reason". Thus, the first fetter identified by Briggs J. does not apply in this case.

(4) Briggs J. held that there was a continuing obligation on a Leader to seek to find a suitably qualified replacement. On the other hand, Clause 12 in the contract in these proceedings confers a right to engage a substitute driver but does not confer an obligation so to do. The driver agrees in Clause 14 to notify the company in advance of his unavailability to undertake a previously agreed delivery service. Taking this term at its height, this could be construed as an obligation to notify the company in advance of his unavailability. But I do not accept that an obligation to give notice of a driver's unavailability to undertake a previously agreed delivery service thereby becomes an obligation to perform work within the meaning of the jurisprudence on mutuality of obligation. It is, by definition, an obligation of notice, not of performance of work.

(5) The final fetter identified by Briggs J. was the obligation to conduct all subsequent meetings in the series which had been agreed. Briggs J. held that the Leader's right to substitute was not an unfettered right and the right of substitution in relation to a particular meeting did not absolve the Leader of the obligation to take the remainder of the series of meetings. There is no such obligation on a driver to work the remaining shifts for which he may have been rostered by the appellant. First, the contention that a driver may fail to attend without breaching any contract is not based on a right of substitution (as in Weight Watchers), but rather is based primarily on Clause 14. Counsel for the respondent accepted that there is a want of mutuality of obligation in the written agreement. He argued that mutuality of obligation arises in the specific roster contracts. However, he did not assert that if a driver failed to attend for any time allotted to him on the roster, he was in breach of contract. He accepted that even after a roster had been drawn up, and an individual discrete contract arose between the appellant and each rostered driver, the driver was not obliged to work at the time for which he was rostered. This absence of obligation is supported by the fact that there was no sanction if a driver failed to attend or indeed if he failed to notify the appellant of his unavailability. The evidence found by the Commissioner was simply that a manager would "follow up". It was accepted that this could simply be to ensure that there had not been a failure of communications. There was thus no finding that if a driver failed to attend at a time he or she was rostered by the appellant, that this constituted a breach of contract by the driver.

73. In my judgment, the Commissioner erred in her analysis and application of Weight Watchers to the contractual arrangements as found by her in this case and the High Court erred in failing to identify this error.

The true terms of the Contract

74. Before proceeding to analyse mutuality of obligation in the circumstances of this case, it is important to record that the Commissioner held that the written agreement between the appellant and the drivers "reflect[ed] the true agreement of the parties" save in three respects. The first, relating to the non-availability of company cars for hire, is not relevant to the issue of mutuality of obligation. The second and third matters were that the appellant prepared the invoices for some drivers which were signed by those drivers, and that in some instances the drivers were asked to, and performed, work which was not stipulated in the contract, i.e. they assembled boxes while waiting for deliveries. As these were deviations which applied to some drivers and not all, the Commissioner correctly did not hold that the practice of the parties was inconsistent with the written agreement, or that it was modified by these changes. The reliance placed by the respondent on these findings is misplaced. They do not establish how the contract was worked out in practice, in the words of Geoghegan J. in Castleisland Cattle Breeders, merely that the terms were not always followed to the letter. As Geoghegan J. held in that case, the wording of a written contract remains of great importance, though if there is evidence that in practice the working arrangements between the parties are consistent only with a different kind of contract or are inconsistent with the expressed categorisation of the contract, this will override that written categorisation. However, in this case there was no evidence of any practice which was inconsistent with the terms of the written agreement. This is very significant in light of the Commissioner's finding that the written agreement reflected the true agreement between the parties save for these three issues, none of which is relevant to the question of mutuality of obligation.

Did the Commissioner err in holding that the threshold test of mutuality of obligation was satisfied?

75. In my judgment, the Commissioner erred in her construction of the contract between the appellant and the drivers and thereby fell into error in concluding that the mutuality of obligation test was satisfied in this case. She did so predominantly because she misapplied Weight Watchers to the case without fully appreciating or giving due weight to the differences between the facts in the two cases, but also because she misinterpreted the written agreement.

76. The written agreement did not oblige the drivers to work and therefore they were not required to initiate an agreement with the appellant, contrary to her determination at para. 49. This conclusion is contrary to the express terms of Clause 14, and there was no basis to conclude that this clause did not reflect the agreement of the parties. Indeed, counsel for the respondent accepted that the drivers were not obliged to work under the terms of the written agreement. His argument was that the only means of giving effect to that agreement was for the driver to initiate engagement by indicating when he would be prepared to work. It then fell to the appellant to decide whether or not to roster the individual at all, or at any of the times he or she nominated. He contended that this was how the determination ought to be read. While this may be so as a matter of language, it is not in fact how the Commissioner proceeded and does not reflect the fact that in so doing she was applying the decision in Weight Watchers where there was an express contractual obligation on the Leaders to initiate the individual contracts as found by Briggs J.

77. More fundamentally, while she records the requirement that mutuality of obligation must subsist for the entirety of the period of the discrete contract, and the fact that the parties agreed that it was not sufficient to show mutuality of obligation while the work was being undertaken, she did not analyse the arrangements in this case from this perspective. She simply accepted that mutuality was present for the entire duration of the contracts she found arose from the submission of an availability sheet by a driver, and the creation of a weekly roster by the appellant. She made no findings as to the terms of the contracts which she held arose as a result of the rostering arrangements, and she did not find as a fact that the terms of the written agreement did not apply to these individual contracts. She accepted by implication that the individual contracts were governed by the terms of the written contract and she made no findings which would entitle her, or a court, to hold that the written agreement did not apply.

78. She then concluded that neither Clause 12 nor Clause 14 altered her conclusion; but, she did so by misconstruing the clauses and she thereby erred in law. She approached the clauses by saying that they did not set out expressly the circumstances in which a driver is not at liberty to turn up for a shift, without actually considering whether he was in fact obliged "to turn up for a shift" at all. If there was no such obligation, then the clause would not address the circumstances in which a driver could fail to turn up for work, so to say it did not address this point does not answer the question. The central question remained whether the driver was obliged to perform work. Clause 14, as was acknowledged by counsel for the respondent, does not impose an obligation on the driver to work. In Clause 14, a driver agrees to notify the appellant, in advance, of his unavailability to undertake a previously agreed delivery service. This does not imply that he may only be unavailable for some (good) reason, as in Weight Watchers. It follows that there is no implied term that if he is simply unavailable for whatever reason and fails to turn up, that he will breach his contract. The Commissioner did not find that there was in fact such an implied term in the individual discrete contract. The clause only requires the driver to notify the appellant if he will be unavailable to undertake a previously agreed delivery, it does not require him to undertake the delivery absent a good reason for not doing so. The appellant recognises the right of the driver to make himself available on only certain days and certain times of his own choosing. The notification requirement does not, in my view, fetter this freedom of the driver not to work if he so chooses.

79. The Commissioner rejected the argument of the appellant on the basis that the contract envisaged "cancellation 'should the contractor be unavailable at short notice' together with a requirement of advance notification" and that this regulated the circumstances of cancellation by the driver. This conclusion is based upon a misconstruction of the two clauses. Clause 12 confers a right on a driver to engage a substitute driver should he become unavailable at short notice. It does not impose an obligation to do so, despite the fact that, on occasion, the Commissioner wrongly refers to this is an obligation or requirement. It does not restrict in any way his freedom not to make himself available for work (whether at short notice or otherwise). Accordingly, it is not relevant to the assessment of whether there is an obligation on a driver to perform work offered to him by the appellant. As the agreement in Clause 14 to notify the appellant if a driver is unavailable is likewise unfettered, it follows, in my judgment, that the Commissioner erred in her construction of the agreement. She did so due to a failure to give full effect to the differences between the facts in this case and those in Weight Watchers, and to have due regard to the actual agreement of the parties.

80. At para. 81 of the determination, she said that the reasoning in Pimlico Plumbers and Autoclenz, to the effect that a clause which provides that the provider of work has no obligation to offer work and the putative recipient no obligation to accept work does not mean that mutuality of obligation is absent, were of assistance to her analysis. However, this conclusion is contrary to the Irish authorities Barry, Mansoor, McKayed and Brightwater, all of which state clearly that for mutuality of obligation to be present there must be an obligation to provide work on one party, and an obligation to perform the work on another party. She does not consider these authorities in her analysis at this point and her failure to do so, and her misstatement of the law in Ireland as a result, is an error of law by the Commissioner.

81. The Commissioner erred in paras. 82 and 83 of the determination. As I have said, the driver's "right to cancel a shift" (even if it may be so described) was not qualified by any requirement to engage a substitute or by a requirement to provide advance notice to the appellant. He or she was not under an obligation "to work out the remainder of the shifts in the series which had been agreed" because a driver remained free at all times not to work, regardless of the rostering arrangements. Counsel for the respondent accepted that, notwithstanding the fact than an individual may be rostered to attend for a particular shift, the driver was under no obligation to "turn up". As this was based upon Clause 14, it logically applies to every period of time for which a driver was rostered on any occasion.

82. Further, if a driver was not obliged to work a rostered shift, the requirement that mutuality of obligation subsists for the duration of the individual discrete contracts cannot be satisfied. The implications of the absence of an obligation on a driver to work a particular rostered shift were not correctly identified by the Commissioner.

83. There was no sanction for any failure to attend for any shift; at most, there would be "follow up" in such circumstances. It was accepted by counsel for the respondent that this did not necessarily entail any sanction. Thus, there was no basis in fact for concluding that a driver could be sanctioned for failure to undertake a previously agreed delivery service. The Commissioner failed to give any weight to the absence of a sanction for a failure to attend for work, and the implications of this for the contention that a failure to attend would amount to a breach of contract by a driver. There was, in fact, no basis for the Commissioner to conclude that there was an obligation to work out the remainder of the shifts, contrary to her conclusion in para. 82.

84. In Barry, Edwards J. identified the relevant obligations as the obligation of the employer to provide work for the employee and the corresponding obligation on the employee to perform work for the employer. These are the obligations which are at issue in assessing mutuality of obligation. They are not to be confused with the obligation to perform the work once undertaken and to pay for the work so undertaken. Counsel for the appellant submitted that the test must be applied before the workers actually "do the work". One must ascertain whether the employer has an obligation to provide work to the employee prior to actually reaching agreement to provide and to perform that work. Counsel submitted that the Commissioner and the High Court erred in merely looking at the obligations between the parties as they arose at the moment when "the [driver] turns up in the depot [of the appellant] and is assigned a particular delivery job". At that point, there was an obligation on the driver to deliver the pizza and on the appellant to pay the agreed fee. Counsel submitted that these obligations were not the obligations that are necessary to satisfy the mutuality of obligation test in this context. If that were so, then every contract for services would be converted into, and treated as, an employment contract because even in a contract for services, both parties assume obligations to each other. I agree. Furthermore, this analysis is consistent with the requirement that the obligations exist for the relevant period of the individual contracts and not merely for the potentially shorted period while the work is actually being performed. It further underscores the error in the approach of the Commissioner in this case, in my view.

85. The Commissioner did not address the question whether the appellant was obliged to provide work for the drivers under the individual contracts, nor make any findings in relation to this aspect of the working arrangements of the parties. This is an important omission as there must be an obligation on the putative employer to provide work, not merely an obligation on the worker to perform the work (Mansoor; McKayed). There was no obligation on the appellant to utilise the services of a driver even if the driver offered to make himself available for work by completing the availability sheet for any particular week. The appellant was free to roster any driver it chose and to decline the offer of any individual driver to attend at any given time. The mutuality of obligation on the part of the appellant therefore depended upon the terms of the individual contracts created by the rostering of drivers for one or more shifts. It must apply for the duration of the individual contract and it was not sufficient if the obligations only applied during the shorter periods when the work offered was actually being performed. Examples of an availability sheet and a roster were not included in the case stated and there was no suggestion that they included any written terms of agreement. This meant that the Commissioner was required to infer, from the practice of the parties, the terms of these individual contracts insofar as they supplemented or differed from the written agreement. She made no particular findings as to the terms of the individual contracts as such. While the rostering was no doubt prepared on the basis of informed expectation of a particular number of orders occurring during a given shift, the appellant could not predict the number of deliveries which would be required on any given shift (as in Mansoor). If it turned out that there was in fact no need for the services of a driver on any particular shift, the driver had no cause for complaint that he was not afforded an opportunity to work. It is important to acknowledge that even if he did not make any deliveries, he would nonetheless be paid the promotional sum due for wearing the uniform of the appellant. These facts ought to have been assessed by the Commissioner and she ought to have set out why she concluded that mutuality of obligation applied to the appellant in these circumstances. She did not address the judgment in McKayed . In that case, the defendant had agreed merely to try to give the plaintiff work but that there was no guarantee of work as the putative employer had no control over the amount of translation work that might be required by An Garda Síochána or other state entities, the plaintiff was entitled to work for others and, while work had regularly been provided, the High Court held that this did not amount to a legal obligation to provide the other party with work. Each of these factors was present in this case also. If she was to reach a conclusion which differed to that of the High Court on similar facts she was required to explain why she distinguished the facts in the appeal before her from the facts in McKayed. Despite these criticisms, I conclude, on the basis of Ó Culachain, that there is evidence pointing towards one conclusion, and evidence pointing to the opposite; her implicit conclusion, that there was an obligation on the appellant to provide work under the individual contracts, is not one which no reasonable Commissioner could have arrived at and it is not possible to say that this point was based on a mistaken view of the law, and therefore her decision on this point ought not to be overturned.

86. Notwithstanding this conclusion, in relation to the obligation of the appellant to provide work to the drivers listed on the rosters, for the reasons given above, I conclude that the Commissioner erred in law in her assessment of and her conclusion that mutuality of obligation existed in the multiple individual contracts in this case, and that the trial judge erred in law when he failed to identify this error. In my judgment, there was no mutuality of obligation for the relevant period of the multiple individual contracts and therefore the irreducible minimum for a contract of service to exist was in fact absent in this case. While the Commissioner did not determine whether mutuality of obligation was met in the umbrella agreement, counsel for the respondent accepted that it was not, and, in my judgment, he was correct to concede the point. That being so, there was no mutuality of obligation in the over-arching agreement either. It follows that, as a matter of law, the agreements cannot have been contracts of service and the drivers were therefore not employees and their emoluments were not taxable pursuant to Schedule E for the relevant years of assessment.

87. A number of English authorities were opened to the court by the parties in relation to this issue, but I do not consider it necessary to discuss them in this judgment. The task of this court in this case stated is to determine whether the Commissioner erred in law in her interpretation of the working arrangements of the parties. I have done so by reference to her reasoning and the relevant Irish authorities, and those English authorities upon which she relied. I have not analysed the issue by reference to the English cases as it was not necessary to the task in hand. Having said that, it is important to observe that these authorities must be used with caution in the Irish context. There has been significant statutory intervention in England and many of the authorities turn on the statutory definition of a "worker", an intermediate category between an employee and an independent contractor, which does not exist in Irish law.

88. I have also not addressed the appellant's argument that the Commissioner erred in holding that there were individual discrete contracts entered into by the appellant and the individual drivers who were rostered for work on any given week. The issue for this court is to answer the questions in the case stated and it must do so by reference to the determination and the case stated. As I have concluded that the Commissioner erred in her finding that mutuality of obligation existed in the discrete individual contracts, and there was no argument that the over-arching agreement met the test, it was simply unnecessary so to do. I have proceeded on the assumption that this was the correct analysis without finding that it, in fact, was correct.

Substitution

89. The appellant argued that the fact drivers are permitted to arrange for a substitute to carry out their work is a factor that weighs in favour of them being independent contractors as opposed to employees. The substitution clause in this instance is Clause 12 where the appellant accepts the driver's "right to engage a substitute delivery person should the [driver] be unavailable at short notice". The Commissioner was inconsistent in her interpretation of this clause. At para. 38(b) of the determination, she found that the substitution clause "permitted" drivers to substitute another, and at para. 90 she held that a driver has "an entitlement" to arrange a substitute. On the other hand, at para. 82 she found that there was a "requirement" to engage a substitute and, at para. 105, that a driver was "required to arrange" a substitute. As I have said, the latter findings were incorrect. The right to engage a substitute applied "should the [driver] be unavailable at short notice". The driver could be unavailable for any reason and on any occasion. He was not obliged to engage a substitute but if he chose to exercise his right to do so, the substitute "must be capable of performing [driver's] contractual obligations in all respects". This was a limitation on the choice of substitute available to a driver, but there was no such fetter on the right to engage a substitute once it had arisen, i.e. when the driver became unavailable at short notice. If a substitute was arranged, the substitute was paid by the appellant and the original driver was not paid. The appellant's case was simple: an unfettered right to substitute another one was inconsistent with an obligation of personal performance and thus, inconsistent with a contract of service.

90. The Commissioner identified two lines of authority from the Irish and English case law she cited. If a worker was required to arrange a substitute and the substitute was paid directly by the company, that was more consistent with a contract of service (Henry Denny). On the other hand, if the worker was permitted to engage a substitute and the substitute was paid by the original worker, this was more consistent with a contract for services (Ready Mixed Concrete; McAuliffe). She considered the analysis by Briggs J. at paras. 32-34 in Weight Watchers as discussed in para. 42. She correctly said that the driver "may find a substitute to contract directly with the employer to do the work in circumstances where the substitute receives payment for the work as opposed to the original driver." The difficulty is that the second sentence in this paragraph is incorrect. She states "[i]n other words, the driver is relying upon a qualified right not to do or provide the work in stated circumstances, one of the qualifications being that he finds a substitute to contract directly with the employer to do the work instead." The driver is not obliged to find a substitute and the driver is not reliant upon a "qualified right" not to do or provide the work. There are no "stated circumstances" which limit the driver's right not to do or provide the work. Accordingly, she failed to recognise that the substitute clause in this case falls between the two categories identified in the earlier authorities. In this case, the driver is permitted to engage a substitute, but the substitute is not a sub-contractor of the driver; the substitute would perform a replacement contract directly with the appellant. As a result of her failure properly to construe Clause 12, her conclusion that the "type of substitution clause is consistent with a contract of service" is flawed.

91. The Commissioner recorded at para. 101 of her determination that the appellant argued that the substitution clause was wide enough to permit, without breach of contract, the drivers never to turn up for work at all, and that the substitution clause was therefore consistent with the drivers being independent contractors. She rejected the submission as being "plainly incorrect" on the grounds that any drivers substituted would have been remunerated directly by the appellant for carrying out contractual obligations for the appellant. They were not sub-contractors of the original driver. There was an entirely new contract between the appellant and the other driver in relation to that particular work assignment. She interpreted the authorities to mean that the driver's contract with the appellant was not a contract for services "unless, inter alia, the original rostered driver was being remunerated by the appellant for the work being done by the substituted driver" and as this was not the case, it was a factor which indicated that the drivers worked under contracts of service as opposed to contracts for services.

92. The appellant argued that the Commissioner erred at para. 102 in asserting a legal necessity for the originally rostered driver to pay the substitute in order for that contract to be a contract for services. It argued that the real issue was: does the right of substitution negate a contract of service?

93. The appellant relied on the very recent decision of the Court of Appeal in England and Wales in The Independent Workers Union of Great Britain v. The Central Arbitration Committee and Roofoods Limited trading as Deliveroo ("Deliveroo") [2021] EWCA Civ 952. The issue in the case was whether the Deliveroo "worker" was a worker within the statutory definition of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992. Underhill L.J. stated that an essential part of the definition was that a putative worker "should agree to perform work or services "personally" for the other party … [p]rima facie if the express terms of the contract permit the putative worker to provide the work or services in question through someone else, i.e. a substitute, that requirement is not satisfied." Underhill L.J. noted that this requirement was subject to two qualifications:-

> "7. First, it is established in the case-law that the requirement of personal performance may be satisfied notwithstanding that the worker has a right to engage a substitute in some, limited, circumstances. The position is summarised at para. 84 of the judgment of Sir Terence Etherton MR in Pimlico Plumbers Ltd v Smith [2017] EWCA Civ 51, [2017] ICR 657, as follows:

> "Firstly, an unfettered right to substitute another person to do the work or perform the services is inconsistent with an undertaking to do so personally. Secondly, a conditional right to substitute another person may or may not be inconsistent with personal performance depending upon the conditionality. It will depend on the precise contractual arrangements and, in particular, the nature and degree of any fetter on a right of substitution or, using different language, the extent to which the right of substitution is limited or occasional. Thirdly, by way of example, a right of substitution only when the contractor is unable to carry out the work will, subject to any exceptional facts, be consistent with personal performance. Fourthly, again by way of example, a right of substitution limited only by the need to show that the substitute is as qualified as the contractor to do the work, whether or not that entails a particular procedure, will, subject to any exceptional facts, be inconsistent with personal performance. Fifthly, again by way of example, a right to substitute only with the consent of another person who has an absolute and unqualified discretion to withhold consent will be consistent with personal performance."

8. Second, in Autoclenz Ltd v Belcher [2011] UKSC 41, [2011] ICR 1157, the Supreme Court held that the employer was not entitled to rely on a substitution clause in order to deny a claim for worker status if it did not reflect the true agreement between the parties and was in that sense a sham. The principles underlying the decision in Autoclenz have recently been elucidated in Uber v Aslam , to which I will have to return below."

94. Underhill L.J. held that the CAC was entitled to conclude that the riders in question were not in an employment relationship with Deliveroo:-

> "The particular feature on which it relied was its finding that riders are, genuinely, not under an obligation to provide their services personally and have a virtually unlimited right of substitution."

95. He held that an obligation of personal service (subject to the limited qualifications acknowledged in Pimlico Plumbers) is "an indispensable feature of the relationship of employer and worker".

96. The appellant argued that the drivers are not under an obligation to provide their services personally, and they have a virtually unlimited right of substitution under Clause 12, and this negates the existence of a contract of service.

97. The Commissioner, and this court on appeal, is required to consider all the facts and circumstances of the particular working arrangements. While the Commissioner erred in concluding that the drivers were obliged to engage a substitute if they found themselves unavailable to work at short notice, I do not believe that this error is fatal to her overall conclusions in relation to substitution. The drivers were permitted to substitute another of the appellant's drivers if they were unavailable and the substitute could also be arranged by the appellant if required. The substitute driver would be paid by the appellant in respect of the shift actually worked and the original driver would not be paid. In these circumstances, it was open to the Commissioner to conclude that this was more akin to the swapping of shifts between drivers. The Commissioner was required to consider how the contract worked out in practice (Castleisland Cattle Breeding) and her conclusion, that the arrangement was akin to the swapping of shifts rather than through substitution by way of subcontracting, was a conclusion which, on the facts, it was open for her to arrive at. I do not accept that the right to engage a substitute simpliciter automatically negates a contract of service. It is necessary to consider how the clause could work in practice and whether it was a genuine right of substitution. In this case, the drivers had an unfettered right of substitution but no particular interest in ever exercising this right: the substitute would be paid for the work, not the originally rostered driver. The driver was not obliged to turn up for work and was subject to no sanction if he did not attend when rostered to work. He simply lost the opportunity to be paid for deliveries carried out and brand promotion. There was evidence pointing towards an unfettered right of substitution and evidence that it was not a genuine right of substitution. Applying the fifth point in Ó Culachain, it was open to the Commissioner to conclude as she did, and this court on appeal from a case stated ought not to interfere with her conclusions. For this reason, I would reject the arguments of the appellant on this point and I conclude that the Commissioner did not err in law in relation to the actual right of substitution in these proceedings, notwithstanding her error in the interpretation of Clause 12.

Integration

98. The degree to which a putative employee is integrated into the business of a putative employer is a matter which is relevant in assessing whether the working arrangements amount to a contract of service or for services. Carroll J. described the integration test in Re Sunday Tribune Limited, cited at para. 46 above. This was cited by the Commissioner at para. 115 of her determination. The appellant submitted that the relevant enquiry under the "integration" test is not solely whether the kind of work done is integral to the business but asks rather whether the particular individual concerned is himself or herself so personally integrated into the business of the putative employer as to lead to the conclusion that the contract amounts to a contract of service. The appellant argued that the Commissioner erred by focussing on the extent to which the function of pizza delivery was integral to the appellant's business, rather than on the extent to which the individual drivers were themselves integrated into the business of the appellant.

99. The Commissioner found that the appellant's business comprised two core aspects; the production of pizzas and the delivery of pizzas, and therefore delivery was a core function of the business. Applying the test in Sunday Tribune, the Commissioner said "I do not consider that the delivery service can be considered accessory to the production of the pizzas because, Domino's is not simply a pizza business, it is a pizza delivery business". She therefore concluded that:-

> "... where it can be established that a driver carries out a service which the business was established to provide, the work of the drivers is integral to the business and is not merely accessory to it. The integral nature of the work of the drivers to this business raises the implication that in ordinary course they would be employees. Domino's has purported to outsource their delivery function but at the same time in requiring drivers to wear branded uniforms, to brand their vehicles and to carry bags imprinted with the company logo, they seek to reassure customers that they are dealing with Domino's personnel. The branding also serves as a form of promotion of the business of the appellant."

100. She concluded that if they were truly independent contractors that this would not occur. She concluded that:-

> "Domino's pizza delivery service is integral and fundamental to their business. It follows that the work of the drivers in delivering the pizzas is an integral part of the business and is not merely accessory to it."

101. The appellant argued that in so concluding she failed properly to apply the integration test as determined by Carroll J. in Sunday Tribune. In that case, the liquidator of the company applied to court to determine if three reporters were employees of the company. If the integration test applied by the Commissioner had been adopted, and it was only necessary to consider whether the work they performed was integral or accessory to the business of the newspaper, all three reporters would clearly have been employees, since writing newspaper articles is the essence of a newspaper. However, that was not the outcome in Sunday Tribune. One journalist was required to attend and participate in the company's editorial conferences. Carroll J. stated that "her employment was an integral part of the business of the newspaper" and concluded, on this basis, that she was an employee. On the other hand, the third journalist had provided regular articles for the newspaper, but each article was commissioned separately by the company. Carroll J. found that she was not an employee because she did not satisfy the control test, nor was she an integral part of the business of the newspaper. At p. 510 she said:-

> "I am of opinion that her employment was not an integral part of the business of the newspaper. In my opinion, she was a freelance contributor who secured commissions in advance. She was under no obligation to contribute on a regular basis. Presumably, if she did not negotiate a commissioned article, the company's editor would get articles from some other source. Therefore, I am satisfied that she was not employed under a contract of service but was an independent contractor in respect of the articles she did provide."

102. The appellant argues that the drivers were in a very similar situation to the third claimant in Sunday Tribune. They too are under no obligation to work on a regular basis and if they do not work, the appellant will engage the services of another driver. The third journalist was a freelance contributor who secured commissions in advance. If she was commissioned to write a piece of a certain length, she did so, and she was paid on the basis of the house agreement between the company and the National Union of Journalists.

103. The appellant relied on the decision in Deliveroo as authority for the proposition that it is possible to outsource the delivery of food, even though Deliveroo's business involved the delivery of prepared food and drink from restaurants and other food outlets to customers' homes or other premises. The collection and delivery of items is carried out almost entirely by cyclists referred to as "riders". After initial assessment and training, riders enter into a written supplier agreement with Deliveroo and download an app which enables them to indicate when they are available to be offered work in a zone for which they are registered. There is no obligation on a rider to be available at any particular times or for any particular duration. If they are available, the app will offer jobs on the basis of which rider is closest to the point of collection. The rider has three minutes in which to decide whether to accept: again, there is no obligation to do so. If they do accept, they then collect and deliver the food and are paid on a fee per delivery basis. There were strict uniform requirements, a Deliveroo-branded equipment pack and high vis jackets. The essential physical tools of the job, the phone and the bike, were provided by the rider.

104. The appellant argues that Deliveroo is authority for the proposition that the reliance by the Commissioner on the fact that drivers were expected to wear uniforms and to place a temporary logo on their vehicles when making deliveries, did not mean that the drivers were employees of the appellant or that they could not be independent contractors.

105. In fact, in para. 82 Underhill L.J. held:-

> "... Even if I were wrong to treat the absence of a right of personal service as decisive, it may be that the CAC's decision could be supported on the alternative basis that it was decisive when taken together with these features. However, I am reluctant to decide the case on that basis, even by way of alternative, in circumstances where there was no such overall assessment by the CAC."

106. It seems to me therefore that Deliveroo cannot be an authority for the proposition which was put forward as an alternative basis for finding the deliverers to be contractors, but on which Underhill L.J. declined to decide the case.

107. In my judgment, it was open to the Commissioner to have regard to the fact that the drivers did not simply deliver the pizzas on the equivalent of a commission basis. They were provided with uniforms they were expected to wear, and they were expected to place a temporary logo on their vehicles when making deliveries. In effect, they had two roles: delivery of pizzas and brand promotion. They entered into a separate agreement in relation to brand promotion and were paid separately for this service. In my judgment, it was open to the Commissioner therefore to conclude that the drivers were integrated into the business of the appellant, notwithstanding the fact that it is possible to outsource a delivery business, as argued by the appellant, or the fact that it is possible to have genuinely independent contractors who wear branded uniforms. I therefore conclude that there was no error on the part of the Commissioner in her conclusion on this issue.

Consideration of the terms of the written agreement

108. I do not propose to address this heading separately as I have considered the terms of the written agreement already in the context of the discussion of mutuality of obligation and substitution.

The appeal from the decision of the High Court

109. The High Court concluded that the Commissioner did not err in her determination in relation to the nine issues raised in the case stated. In my judgment, she erred in relation to the assessment of mutuality of obligation. The High Court also erred, in my opinion, in its approach to the mutuality of obligation test. At para. 50, the trial judge said that he:-

> "... is not persuaded that mutuality of obligations always requires an obligation to provide work and to complete that work on an ongoing basis in the manner contended for by the appellant. "Ongoing" does not necessarily connote immediate continuation or a defined period of ongoing. There is no binding precedent to suggest that the ongoing basis between the appellant and the drivers does not meet the criteria required. The appellant bears the burden of establishing that the application of "ongoing" as found by the Commissioner was an error of law." (emphasis as in original)

110. Contrary to this dicta, Irish authorities on mutuality of obligation are unambiguous in requiring an ongoing reciprocal commitment to provide and perform work on the part of the employer and the employee respectively.

111. The decision of the Commissioner is not based on any finding that there is an "ongoing" requirement, and indeed this seems to be based on a misreading of Barry. The conclusion of the High Court, that Barry can be distinguished because the claims therein were for redundancy payment, is not borne out by any reading of the judgment, nor the subsequent decisions in Mansoor, Brightwater and McKayed, which have applied the dicta in Barry uniformly in a variety of contexts. There is no suggestion in any of the authorities that the dicta on the nature of mutuality in Barry was limited to the context of statutory redundancy payments or other statutory employment rights protection. On the contrary, the language of mutuality was universal: mutuality is a sine qua non for all contracts of service. It is not dependant on the context in which the issue of mutuality of obligation is raised for determination in the absence of any different statutory test.

112. Further in para. 50, the trial judge said that:-

"The Commissioner, in relying upon Weight Watchers did not go against Irish law but rather recognised the necessity to adapt to modern means of engaging workers."

113. To adapt the law is to modify or change it. The Commissioner did not purport to do so. It was not open to her to adapt the law to modern means of employment at all. She certainly was not entitled to do so by opting to follow English law rather than established Irish precedent to the contrary. It was not open to the High Court to introduce such a significant change (or indeed this court) either. Such a change is for the Oireachtas and must be prospective.

114. For the reasons I have already explained, I believe that the Commissioner erred in her reliance upon Weight Watchers. More fundamentally, it was not open to either the Commissioner or the High Court to affect a policy change. In this regard, the observations of Underhill L.J. in his dissenting judgment in Uber BV v. Aslam [2018] EWCA Civ 2748, at paras. 164 and 166, well express the point I wish to make:-

> "164. The question whether those who provide personal services through internet platforms similar to that operated by Uber should enjoy some or all of the rights and protections that come with worker status is a very live one at present. There is a widespread view that they should, because of the degree to which they are economically dependent on the platform provider. My conclusion that the claimants are not workers does not depend on any rejection of that view. It is based simply on what I believe to be the correct construction of the legislation currently in force. If on that basis the scope of protection does not go far enough the right answer is to amend the legislation. Courts are anxious as far as possible to adapt the common law to changing conditions, but the tools at their disposal are limited, particularly when dealing with statutory definitions. … [I]n cases of the present kind the problem is not that the written terms misstate the true relationship but that the relationship created by them is one that the law does not protect. Abuse of superior bargaining power by the imposition of unreasonable contractual terms is, of course, a classic area for legislative intervention, and not only in the employment field.

166. Even if it were open to the Courts to seek to fashion a common law route to affording protection to Uber drivers and others in the same position, I would be cautious about going down that road." (emphasis added)

115. I agree with these sentiments and they are, of course, reinforced by the separation of powers established under the Constitution.

116. Insofar as it may be possible to read para. 51 of the judgment of the High Court as implying that the principle in Barry is qualified or modified in some way by reason of the fact that it arose in the context of determining whether or not the individuals concerned were entitled to redundancy entitlements which depended on their length of service, I would hold that this is an error.

Conclusions

117. In my judgment, the Commissioner erred in finding that there was mutuality of obligation in the contractual arrangements between the appellant and the drivers. That being so, it was not possible that the drivers were engaged on a contract of service and this conclusion ought to have been dispositive of the issue before her.

118. The trial judge erred in upholding her determination and in failing to identify her errors in that regard, and in the other matters I have set out above.
