Ms Olivia Farrell who was employed by the respondent as a Customer Relations Representative at the material time gave evidence before the Court. She said that in November 2000 she became aware that the complainant had been dismissed for making a personal phone call. She and other colleagues were outraged at what had occurred. Ms Farrell told the Court that a number of staff had stopped work in protest at the complainant's dismissal and demanded to speak with the manager responsible, Ms Olesen. Initially Ms Olesen refused to meet with them but after they held a work stoppage a meeting was convened in the conference room.

Ms Farrell went on to tell the Court that a number of employees, herself included, had told Ms Olesen that they were all guilty of making personal phone calls and that it was unfair to single out the complainant for having done so. The Witness had also heard Mr Pepin tell Ms Olesen that he had given the complainant permission to use his phone and that if the complainant was to be disciplined so also should he. According to Ms Farrell, Ms Olesen told the meeting that she had "turned a blind eye" to people using the phone for personal reasons but would not do so again. Those present pleaded with her to give the complainant a second chance but she refused to do so. Ms Farrell told the Court that at that time they were seriously overworked and understaffed. There were three managers at the meeting, namely, Ms Olesen, Ms Fitzhenry and a Mr de Decker. It was Ms Farrell's evidence that none of them gave any reason for the complainant being dismissed other than that he had made a personal phone call.

In cross-examination the witness said that she had been supplied with a copy of the Company handbook (which states that staff are not allowed to make personal phone calls) but had not read it. She was adamant that Ms Olesen had used the words "turned a blind eye" to employees making personal phone calls. The witness told the Court that she had prepared a statement on this matter on the 13th February 2001 when events were still fresh in her mind. She pointed out that in her statement she had put the expression "turned a blind eye" in quotation marks and that she would not have done so if she were unsure that these were the precise words used.

The Respondents Case:

Ms Kathy Olesen gave evidence. At the time material to this case Ms Olesen was manager of the customer services division of the respondent, which included responsibility for the complainant. She outlined the history of her employment by the respondent, which commenced in 1984 in the United States. She held a series of managerial posts which included postings in Belgium, Germany and the UK as well as in the United States. She was posted to Dublin between the years 1998 and 2001. She told the Court that during her career she had dealt with employees and clients of diverse nationalities including Belgians, Germans, French, Pakistanis and Nigerians.

The customer call centre of the respondent, at which the complainant was employed, handled customer complaints from Belgium, France and the Netherlands. There was a wide range of nationalities working together in this section of the business. The complainant was employed as a temporary agency worker to fill a junior clerical position in the Diners Club Business. According to Ms Olesen the complainant was employed on a week-to-week contract. At the material time the sale of the business in which the complainant worked was in contemplation and there would have been no question of the complainant being retained on a permanent basis.

Ms Olesen had little personal contact with the complainant although his desk was situated not far from her office and she would have greeted him in passing. The complainant's job did not involve any interaction with customers either in writing or by telephone. She told the Court that the phone system in Dublin was set up in such a way that each person who needed to use the phones had a personal identification code. This code then gave access to open the phone lines for outside dialling as well as for incoming calls in some cases. The complainant was not provided with such a code and did not have a phone situated on his desk, as this was not part of his job requirement.

It was Ms Olesen's evidence that all personnel working for the respondent were fully aware that abuse of business systems is an extremely serious issue and would result in disciplinary action being taken. She said that all staff are given orientation when they join the respondent and this orientation specifically includes instruction as to the prohibition on making personal phone calls on the business system. She said that she was certain that all staff knew that they could not make such calls except in the case of an emergency. Whilst she could not say with certainty that all staff observed this rule she was firmly of the view that if it came to the attention of management that any staff member was breaking this rule they would be disciplined for so doing. The witness did not know if the complainant had received orientation. She said, however, that after the initial orientation staff are regularly reminded through daily and weekly staff meetings that no personal calls were to be made. According to Ms Olesen the complainant would have been included at such meetings.

Turning to the events of the 24th November 2000 the witness recalled that while working late she had left her office to take a short break. She noticed that the complainant was not sitting at his own desk but at that of another employee Mr Gregory Pepin. He was using the phone and was speaking in French. She used an option of silent monitoring to listen in on the call. The witness does not speak French but judging by the tone of the conversation she concluded that it was a personal call. She approached the complainant and asked him if he was making a personal call to which he replied in the affirmative. She asked him to disconnect the call and to leave for the evening.

Later the witness asked Mr Pepin if he had given the complainant access to his code for the phone or if he had forgotten to log off before leaving. Mr Pepin said that he could not remember. The witness claimed that it was she who logged out of Mr Pepin's system that evening after the complainant had left. The witness was not aware that two other employees were in the process of making personal calls at the time she came upon the complainant. She said that she was unaware of any other staff in the vicinity at that time but that both the named employees had access to the phone and could have been dealing with customer queries at the time. She told the Court that she had not been sufficiently satisfied that Mr Pepin was involved in this incident so as to justify disciplinary action against him.

Ms Olesen told the Court that on Monday 27th November 2000 she discussed the incident of the previous Friday with Ms Fitzhenry who was the complainant's immediate manager. They agreed that he should be dismissed. She understood that Ms Fitzhenry spoke with him and told him that his employment was terminated. The witness took the view that the complainant was a temporary agency worker employed on a week-to-week basis and as such she was entitled to dismiss him without invoking the normal disciplinary procedure. She did so solely because he was found to be abusing a business system. She told the Court that she would have treated any other temporary employee in exactly the same manner. If it had been a permanent worker she would have initiated the disciplinary process and a warning would have been issued.

The witness recalled the reaction of staff when they became aware of the complainant's dismissal. She said that they had become emotional and wanted the complainant reinstated. She explained what had happened and indicated that they all knew that they were not allowed use their phone systems to make personal calls. According to Ms Olesen they agreed that that was the policy but some of those present indicated that they had made calls in contravention of that policy. The witness explained to the meeting that the respondent's policy was that employees were subject to disciplinary action if they were caught making personal calls.

After this meeting Ms Olesen was again approached by staff requesting another meeting, which was held, and at which she was again asked to reconsider her decision. No member of staff mentioned discrimination at that meeting. The witness also said that she did not consider taking action against those who admitted to using the system for private calls because their transgressions were in the past. The witness specifically denied using the expression "turned a blind eye" to people using the phone for personal reasons. She said she was American and that she would not use such a phrase, which she understood to be an Irish phrase.

Ms Olesen told the Court that she had worked for the respondent for almost twenty years and had worked in a multicultural environment, which she always found to be free from discrimination of any sort. Further, she told the Court there had never been any complaint against her in her entire career and that she had never made decisions which were influenced by the race of those whom she managed. She strongly rejected the allegation that the decision to terminate the complainant's employment was influenced by racial discrimination. Ms Olesen said that her decision was based solely on the complainant's blatant abuse of business systems in the Company.

In cross examination the witness accepted that when the call centre was located at Burlington Road in Dublin a special telephone had been installed in the coffee deck area for personal use by employees. She said this had been done to avoid abuse of their business system during working hours. She accepted that this initiative had been taken due to high instances of personal call use on the respondent's system. No such facility had been provided when the call centre moved to its present location. The witness said that she described the complainant's breach of policy as "blatant" because his demeanour was what she described as "in your face" when she observed him making the call.

The witness accepted that the complainant's response when challenged in relation to making the call was consistent with his stated belief that he had not done anything wrong. She also accepted that she did not make any enquires as to whether the complainant was aware that the making of such calls was prohibited nor did she seek to interview the complainant or give him any opportunity to speak in his own defence before deciding to terminate his employment. She said that she was not obliged to do so as he was a temporary agency worker. The witness was clear that the making of personal calls was a disciplinary matter and that other employees had been disciplined for breaching that policy.

Ms Olesen accepted that her statement recalling the event material to the case was prepared some three months ago.

Evidence was given by Mr Frazier Mushibwe. Mr Mushibwe had no direct involvement in the events giving rise to this claim but gave evidence as to the practice and policies of the respondent regarding the use of their business systems. He told the Court that he was first employed in 1998 as a Diner Services Establishment Analyst. In 1998 he became a team leader in Diner Customer Services with direct responsibility for thirteen Customer Services Representatives. In May 2000 he was promoted to assistant manager of the customer services division with Diners. In May 2001 he moved to Citibank International Plc as a trust officer. He worked in the trust area up to October 2003 when he was transferred to Citigroup London with direct responsibility for six members of staff. Mr Mushibwe is of black African ethnic origin.

The witness told the Court that in August 2000 he was the customers team leader for Diner Club in Dublin. He was therefore working in the same division as the complainant at the time of his dismissal. He had become aware that the complainant was dismissed for abuse of business systems. He told the Court that it was part of the business culture of the respondent as a whole, that business systems should be used for business purposes only and that there were pop-up warnings on the system to that effect. The witness accepted that as in all business some staff would abuse the system and he was sure that employees of the respondent had done so. However all staff knew of the consequences of so doing.

The witness told the Court that he was never the subject of any racial discrimination and he believed that no one within the respondent considered colour or race to be of relevance. The witness said that he had never known Ms Olesen to make decisions based on considerations of race and that it would be out of character for her to do so.

When asked if he could recall any incident in which an employee had been disciplined for abusing a business system the witness replied that he was aware of an employee having being disciplined for downloading pornographic material from a computer. The witness had no direct knowledge of disciplinary action having been taken against any employees for making a personal phone call.

Ms Moira Lynam also gave evidence. This witness is Country Human Resource Officer for Ireland and has held that position since October 2001. She was first employed by the respondent as a human resource generalist supporting the British operations in Dublin. Prior to this she worked for eleven years as a HR Manager in the financial services sector.

The witness told the Court that she was aware that the respondent had strived to create a business culture whereby all staff were aware that business systems were to be used for business purposes only. She was personally aware that staff members had been disciplined for breaching this policy. Ms Lynam said that since 1997, eighteen members of staff had been disciplined for abuse of business systems. This ranged from the abuse of phone systems to computer e-mail and internet systems. Of this number, seven were dismissed. The witness had prepared a schedule of the individuals who were disciplined and an abridged version of this (which did not contain the names of individuals) was provided to the Court. This schedule also listed the nationalities of the individuals concerned.

In cross-examination Ms Lynam gave details of the misconduct for which the individuals listed had been disciplined. In dealing with phone abuse the witness told the Court that two individuals had received a final written warning for having returned to the office after office hours and leaving an inappropriate message on a colleagues answering machine. The witness accepted that the majority of the incidents recorded related to the inappropriate use of e-mails and the internet. The witness confirmed that apart from the complainant no other individual had ever been disciplined for making a personal call simplicitor. The witness further accepted that in the case of the complainant there had been what she described as "an excess of management". However she was satisfied that this was because of the complainant's status as a temporary agency worker and not because of his race.

Findings of Fact

The Court has carefully considered all of the evidence adduced in this case and has reached the following conclusions of fact.

The Court found the complainant an honest and reliable witness who gave his evidence clearly and frankly. The Court accepts that he was never given an orientation session when he joined the respondent nor was he ever told that the use of the phone system for private purposes was prohibited. The Court is further satisfied that in relation to the incident giving rise to his dismissal, the complainant was told by Mr Pepin that he could use the telephone provided he did so after working hours. The Court also accepts the complainant's evidence that two colleagues were engaged in making personal calls at the time he was approached by Ms Olesen. However, it is not clear if Ms Olesen was aware of this.

The Court also found Ms Farrell's evidence helpful and reliable. She had prepared and written up a statement concerning the events on which she gave evidence within three months of their occurrence. The Court accepts Ms Farrell's evidence that a number of employees used the telephone system for their own private use and that during the currency of her employment, staff had not been expressly told that this was prohibited. While it is clear that the staff handbook does refer to such a prohibition the Court is satisfied that this was not systematically enforced through the disciplinary procedure.

The Court is further satisfied that at meetings following the complainant's dismissal Ms Farrell informed Ms Olesen that other staff had used the phones for private use and that she herself had engaged in this practice. The Court prefers Ms Farrell's recollection of the ensuing discussion and in particular accepts that Ms Olesen had told those at the meeting that she had turned a blind eye to this practice in the past but would not do so again. The Court also accepts Ms Farrell's evidence that Mr Pepin stated at this meeting that he had given the complainant permission to use his phone.

Ms Farrell's evidence with regard to the respondent's attitude towards the use of the business telephone system for private calls is largely supported by the evidence of Ms Lynam. She accepted that where disciplinary action had been taken for a breach of this kind, it amounted to more than simply making an unauthorised phone call. She also accepted that the disciplinary procedures, which gives examples of serious misconduct likely to lead to dismissal, does not contain any reference to the unauthorised use of telephones. She did, however, point out that this list is expressly not exhaustive. Moreover, on the facts of this case as they were put to Ms Lynam she accepted that the response of Ms Olesen was excessive.

Having considered the evidence of Ms Olesen the Court is satisfied that she was mistaken in a number of material respects. The thrust of her evidence was that where employees are found to be making unauthorised telephone calls, disciplinary action inevitably follows. That is clearly not the case. Ms Olesen also described the complainant's demeanour while making the call as "blatant and in your face". The Court interprets this as to mean that the complainant had acted in a defiant manner and had shown total disregard for the Company rules. Such a construction is wholly unreasonable. It is clear from the evidence that the complainant did not believe that he was doing anything wrong and that his demeanour when making the call was relaxed and casual. He did not react to Ms Olesen's presence when she approached him, because he had no reason to believe that he was doing anything wrong.

The respondent does have a policy against abuse of its business systems which is enforced through its disciplinary procedure. This, however, mainly relates to inappropriate use of the internet and its e-mail system. Having considered the evidence as a whole the Court is satisfied on the balance of probabilities that while it was the stated policy of the respondent to prohibit staff from using its telephone system for private purposes, this policy was not routinely or regularly enforced at the material time. This is further confirmed by the reaction of the respondent's staff to the complainant's dismissal in effectively going on strike in protest and in demanding his reinstatement. The Court does not believe that they would have reacted in this way if, as the respondent contends, it was well known and understood that the making of a private telephone call constituted serious misconduct.

The Court is further satisfied that the complainant was dismissed without being given the slightest opportunity to defend himself although he had a perfectly innocent explanation for what occurred. It is also noteworthy that the complainant was dismissed for the mere fact of having made a private call rather that because of the destination to which it was made or its duration.

The Court accepts from the evidence that the respondent is a reasonable employer committed to the attainment of good practice in its employment policies. For some reason Ms Olesen departed from those standards in her treatment of the complainant which, by any objective standard, was wholly unfair. The question, which the Court must answer, is why.

The Law Applicable.

The complainant is an agency worker within the meaning of section 2(1) of the Act and the respondent is a provider of agency work, in relation to the complainant, within the meaning of section 2(5) of the Act. The respondent accepts that it is an appropriate party to these proceedings.

Section 8(1) of the Act provides that an employer shall not discriminate against an employee or prospective employee and a provider of agency work shall not discriminate against an agency worker on any of the discriminatory grounds, inter alia, in relation to access to employment or conditions of employment. Section 8(2) of the Act provides that in relation to an agency worker discrimination can only occur where that agency worker is treated less favourably (on one of the discriminatory grounds) than another agency worker is, has been or would be treated.

The complainant must, therefore, make out his case of discrimination by reference to the treatment of a comparator of a different racial origin in circumstances similar to his own and that comparator must be another agency worker. There is no actual comparator in this case but the complainant can rely on a hypothetical agency worker ("or would be treated") of a different racial origin. In establishing how such a hypothetical agency worker would be treated by the respondent, the treatment which it afforded it's permanent employees of a different racial origin to the complainant, in materially similar circumstances to those of the complainant, is of evidential value. (see the speech of Scott L.J. inShamoon v Chief Constable of the RUC [2003] IRLR 285 at paragraph 109).

The respondent submitted that the sanction of dismissal, rather than a warning, was applied in this case because the complainant was a temporary agency worker. However, the Court has no reason to believe that it would be the practice of the respondent to dismiss an agency worker for a transgression which would be overlooked if committed by a permanent employee.

The respondent does not contend that the prohibition on the use of the telephone system is confined to agency workers. It is their case that the company policy in that regard is applicable to all staff regardless of their status. It follows that if infringement of this policy was not generally regarded as serious misconduct by the respondent and that the complainant was singled out for special treatment, it is reasonable to believe that he was treated less favourably than another agency worker of a different racial origin would be treated.

Burden of Proof.

Mr Power BL, for the complainant, submitted that in the circumstances of this case the onus is on the respondent to prove that the dismissal was not on grounds of race. He relied on the determination of this CourtFlexo Computer Stationary Ltd and Kevin Colton (Determination EED0313)in which the Court stated that in all cases of alleged unlawful discrimination a procedural rule similar to that prescribed by Directive 97/80/EC (the Burden of Proof Directive) should be applied. Counsel also referred to Directive 2000/43 (the Race Directive) and contends that this is further authority for his submission that the respondent must bear the burden of proving that the complainant was not dismissed because he is a black African.

Mr Connaughton SC submitted that the there is no basis in law by which the respondent can be fixed with the onus of proving the absence of discrimination. He argued that the Burden of Proof Directive can have no application beyond cases of alleged discrimination on the gender ground and that the Race Directive cannot avail the complainant since it has not been transposed in law and cannot have horizontal direct effect.

Counsel submitted that as a matter of law it is insufficient for the complainant to establish that his dismissal was unfair and that he must prove that it was on grounds of his race. Counsel further submitted that in so far as the decision of this Court in the Flexo Computer Stationary case purported to hold otherwise, it was wrongly decided. In support of this submission the Court was referred to the decision of the House of Lords inGlasgow City Council v Zafar [1998] 2 All ER 953.

Flexo Computer Stationary and Coltonis but one in a line of decisions of this Court which held that where a complainant establishes facts from which discrimination may be inferred it is for the respondent to prove that there has been no infringement of the principle of equal treatment. The Court normally requires the complainant to establish the primary facts upon which the assertion of discrimination is grounded. If those facts are regarded by the Court as being of sufficient significance to raise an inference of discrimination, the respondent must prove the absence of unlawful discrimination. (seeMitchell v Southern Health Board [2001] ELR 201)

This approach is based on the empiricism that a person who discriminates unlawfully will rarely do so overtly and will not leave evidence of the discrimination within the complainant's power of procurement. Hence, the normal rules of evidence must be adapted in such cases so as to avoid the protection of anti-discrimination laws being rendered nugatory by obliging complainants to prove something which is beyond their reach and which may only be in the respondents capacity of proof.

Support for this approach can be found in the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson inGlasgow City Council v Zafar,at p. 958, in which he quoted with approval the guidance given to Employment Tribunals by Neill LJ inKing v Great Britain China Centre [1992] I.C.R. 516, as follows:

- 'From these several authorities it is possible, I think, to extract the following principles and guidance. 1. It is for the applicant who complains of racial discrimination to make out his or her case. Thus if the applicant does not prove the case on the balance of probabilities he or she will fail.2. It is important to bear in mind that it is unusual to find direct evidence of racial discrimination. Few employers will be prepared to admit such discrimination even to themselves. In some cases the discrimination will not be ill-intentioned but merely based on an assumption that "he or she would not have fitted in."3. The outcome of the case will therefore usually depend on what inferences it is proper to draw from the primary facts found by the tribunal. These inferences can include, in appropriate cases, any inferences that it is just and equitable to draw in accordance with section 65(2)(b) of the Act of 1976 from an evasive or equivocal reply to a questionnaire.4. Though there will be some cases where, for example, the non-selection of the applicant for a post or for promotion is clearly not on racial grounds, a finding of discrimination and a finding of a difference in race will often point to the possibility of racial discrimination. In such circumstances the tribunal will look to the employer for an explanation. If no explanation is then put forward or if the tribunal considers the explanation to be inadequate or unsatisfactory it will be legitimate for the tribunal to infer that the discrimination was on racial grounds. This is not a matter of law but, as May L.J. put it in North West Thames Regional Health Authority v. Noone ([1988] ICR 813 at 822), "almost common sense."5. It is unnecessary and unhelpful to introduce the concept of a shifting evidential burden of proof. At the conclusion of all the evidence the tribunal should make findings as to the primary facts and draw such inferences as they consider proper from those facts. They should then reach a conclusion on the balance of probabilities, bearing in mind the difficulties which face a person who complains of unlawful discrimination and the fact that it is for the complainant to prove his or her case.'

This passage was adopted in this jurisdiction inDavis v Dublin Institute of Technology High Court, Unreported Quirke J 23 June 2000.It should, however, be noted thatKing(which was a race case) was decided before the Burden of Proof Directive was adopted and that this Directive and the transposing domestic legislation appears not to have been opened to the Court inDavis.

The Judgment inKingwas more recently relied upon by the UK Court of Appeal inAnya v University of Oxford [2001] IRLR 377. This was a case in which the appellant claimed to have been discriminated against on race grounds in the filling of a post. An Industrial Tribunal had found that his claim was not made out. In the course of a Judgement by Sedley LJ setting that decision aside, the following passage appears at paragraphs 13 and 14which the court considers apt in the instant case:

The industrial tribunal's decision

Here the industrial tribunal were satisfied, on balance, that despite inconsistencies which emerged under cross-examination Dr Roberts was essentially a truthful witness. Dr Roberts had explained his reasons, which had to do entirely with Dr Anya's qualities as a scientist, for not choosing him for the new post. It followed, in the industrial tribunal's judgment, that the inevitably less favourable treatment of Dr Anya had nothing to do with his race.

Such a conclusion was without doubt open to them, but only provided it was arrived at after proper consideration of the indicators which Dr Anya relied on as pointing to an opposite conclusion. His case was that the evidence showed two critical things. One was a preconceived hostility to him: this depended on matters of fact which it was for the industrial tribunal to ascertain or refute on the evidence placed before them. The other was a racial bias against him evinced by such hostility: this was a matter of inference for the industrial tribunal if and in so far as it found the hostility established. Experience shows that the relationship between the two may be subtle. For example, a tribunal of fact may be readier to infer a racial motive for hostility which has been denied but which it finds established than for hostility which has been admitted but acceptably explained. The industrial tribunal in paragraph 5 of its reasons directed itself correctly in law about this, with one arguable exception: it concluded the paragraph with this remark:

'If an employer behaves unreasonably towards a black employee, it is not to be inferred, without more, that the reason for this is attributable to the employee's colour; the employer might very well behave in a similarly unreasonable fashion to a white employee.'

As Neill LJ pointed out in King [1991] IRLR 513, such hostility may justify an inference of racial bias if there is nothing else to explain it: whether there is such an explanation as the industrial tribunal posit here will depend not on a theoretical possibility that the employer behaves equally badly to employees of all races, but on evidence that he does.

In the Courts view the guidance contained at paragraph (4) inKingdoes not differ materially from the approach formulated inMitchell v Southern Health Boardas it would apply to the instant case. The complainant has established as a fact that he was treated differently than other employees of the respondent who made personal telephone calls and who are of a different racial origin. Since the same rules in this respect apply to permanent employees and agency workers the treatment of permanent workers provides a sufficient evidential basis for concluding that the complainant was treated differently than another agency worker of a different racial origin would be treated. Moreover, the Judgement inAnyamakes it clear that in comparing the claimant's treatment to that of a hypothetical comparator reliance cannot be placed on the theoretical possibility that Ms Olesen would behave equally badly towards an agency worker of a different racial origin, but on evidence that she does. No such convincing evidence was adduced. The complainant's treatment in this regard is a fact from which discrimination may be inferred.

Moreover,Glasgow City Council v Zafaris authority for the proposition that a finding of discrimination and a finding of a difference in race can be sufficient to constitute prima facie evidence of racial discrimination. The complainant cannot prove the motivation for his dismissal. That is peculiarly within the knowledge of the respondent or, more particularly, within the knowledge of Ms Olesen. In these circumstances it is just and equitable to call upon the decision maker for an explanation and to require her to prove the veracity of the explanation offered. This, as stated inNorth West Thames Regional Health Authority v. Noone,is not a matter of law but almost common sense.

The correctness of this approach in cases such as this has now been confirmed by Article 8 of the Race Directive [and Article 10 of Directive 2000/78 (the Framework Directive)] which provides as follows:

- "Member States shall take such measures as are necessary, in accordance with their national judicial systems, to ensure that, when persons who consider themselves wronged because the principle of equal treatment has not been applied to them, establish before a Court or other competent authority, facts from which it may be presumed that there has been direct or indirect discrimination, it shall be for the respondent to prove that there has been no breach of the principle of equal treatment."

The provision is clearly addressed to the Member states and their institutions including arbitral tribunals whose jurisdiction may be invoked where unlawful discrimination is alleged. Its purpose is to require the common application in all discrimination cases of the rule of evidence hitherto prescribed by the Burden of Proof Directive.

The effective date for the implementation of the Race Directive was 19th July 2003. However it has not yet been transposed in this jurisdiction. On that account Counsel for the respondent contends that it can have no application in this case. The Court cannot accept that submission.

InMarleasing SA v La Comercial International De Alimentacion SA [1990] ECR 4135the ECJ developed further its earlier decision inVon Colson and Kamann v Land Nordrhein- Westfalen [1984] ECR 1819, in confirming that a non-implemented Directive could be relied upon to inform the interpretation of national law in cases involving individuals. However, the Court went further than it did inVon Colsonin holding that this interpretive obligation equally applies in cases where the national law in question pre-dates the Directive. Paragraph 8 of the Judgment contains the following statement of the law:

- "In order to reply to that question, it should be observed that, as the Court pointed out inVon Colson and Kamann v Land Nordrhein- Westfalen [1984] ECR 1819, paragraph 26, the Member States' obligation arising from a directive to achieve the result envisaged by the directive and their duty under Article 5 of the Treaty to take all appropriate measures, whether general or particular, to ensure the fulfilment of that obligation, is binding on all the authorities of Member States including, for matters within their jurisdiction, the courts. It follows that, in applying national law, whether the provisions in question were adopted before or after the directive, the national court called upon to interpret it is required to do so, as far as possible, in light of the wording and the purpose of the directive in order to achieve the result pursued by the latter and thereby comply with the third paragraph of Article 189 of the Treaty."

Whilst it will be noted that the Court referred to the obligation of national courts to interpret national law, as far as possible so as to achieve the result envisaged by the directive, it went on, at paragraph 9, to rule that the Spanish Court was precluded from interpreting its national law in a way which did not comply with the Directive concerned.

This interpretative obligation was approved in this jurisdiction by the Supreme Court inNathan v Bailey Gibson Ltd, Irish print Union and Minister for Labour [1998] IR 2 IR 162. Here, Hamilton CJ adopted the following statement of Murphy J made in the course of his Judgment in the High Court:

- "Reference was made to the judgement of the European Court given on the 13th November 1990 in Marleasing SA v La Comercial International De Alimentacion SA. That is a far-reaching decision in so far as it determines that national courts are bound to interpret their national laws in the light of the wording and purpose of a relevant EEC Directive even where the national law in question was adopted before the directive was given. That was, as I say, a far-reaching application of the general rule on interpretation which itself is not open to challenge".

The Court is satisfied that it is obliged to interpret and apply the relevant provisions of the Act and the rules of evidence in line with the wording and purpose of Article 8 of the Race Directive. Accordingly, the Court is satisfied that it, in this case, should apply a procedural rule similar to that formulated inMitchell v Southern Health Board [2001] ELR 201.

Conclusion.

The Court is satisfied that the complainant has proved as a matter of probability that he was singled out for special unfavourable treatment by his manager, that another agency employee of a different racial origin would not be so treated and that his dismissal arose as a direct consequence of the special treatment to which he was subjected. Having regard to all of the surrounding circumstances this is a fact of sufficient significance to raise a presumption of discrimination. The Court has considered the respondent's explanation of what occurred and in light of the evidence as a whole, finds it unconvincing. Accordingly the respondent has failed to satisfy the Court that it's decision to dismiss the complainant was not racially motivated and the complainant is entitled to succeed.

Determination.

The complainant was discriminated against on grounds of his race contrary to Section 8 of the Act. The Court is satisfied that the appropriate redress is an award of compensation. The Court notes that the complainant was employed in a temporary capacity at approximately €270 per week. The Court estimates that the economic loss suffered by the complainant is unlikely to have exceeded €2,000. However, it is now well settled that an award of compensation for the effects of discrimination must be proportionate, effective and dissuasive. Apart from economic loss the complainant was humiliated, deprived of his fundamental right to equal treatment and freedom from racial prejudice. In all the circumstances the Court determines that an award which is fair and equitable should be measured at €15,000,

€2,000 of which should be regarded as compensation for loss of earnings. The respondent herein is ordered to pay compensation to the complainant in that amount.

Signed on behalf of the Labour Court

SUBJECT:

1. An appeal against a Rights Commissioner's Decision r-129895-wt-13/JT.

BACKGROUND:

2. The Employer appealed the Decision of the Rights Commissioner to the Labour Court on the 14 October 2013 in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 15 January 2014. The following is the Decision of the Court.

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal under the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 ("the Act") by Swords Risk Services Limited ("the Respondent") against Rights Commissioner Decision No r-129895-wt-13/JT dated 23 September 2013. The appeal was received by the Court on 14 October 2013 within the six week time limit set out in the Act. Mr Damien Sheahan ("the Complainant") had complained to the Rights Commissioner that the Respondent in this case, his employer, had during his employment infringed sections 12, 15, 19 and 23 of the Act in the relevant statutory reference period. The Respondent did not attend at the hearing. The Rights Commissioner accepted the evidence of the Complainant, decided that the complaints were well founded and awarded him compensation in the sum of €20,000. The Respondent appealed against that decision to this Court. The case came on for hearing on 15 January 2014.

Background

The Respondent is a security company that provided static guard services on a contract basis to a range of retail stores. The Complainant was employed as a static security guard from 27 March 2009 until he resigned his employment on 17 October 2012. For the greater part of his employment he was assigned to work in the Aldi store on Parnell Street Dublin. He submits that during his employment he,

- •contrary to section 12 of the Act, did not receive the statutory rest and intervals at work set out in the Act
  •contrary to section 15 of the Act worked in excess of an average of 48 hours per week.

  •contrary to sections 19 and 23 of the Act did not receive annual leave in the amount set out in the act and was not paid cesser pay for the amount outstanding on the termination of his employment.

The Respondent disputes the complaints and argues that it was at all times compliant with the Act. It further submits that the level of compensation awarded by the Rights Commissioner was disproportionate in all the circumstances of the case.

Section 12 of the Act states:

- (1) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 4 hours and 30 minutes without allowing him or her a break of at least 15 minutes.
  (2) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 6 hours without allowing him or her a break of at least 30 minutes; such a break may include the break referred to in subsection (1)

Statutory Instrument No 21 of 1998 (Organisation of working time (General Exemptions) Regulations1998):

- 4. If an employee is not entitled, by reason of the exemption, to the rest period and break referred to in sections 11, 12 and 13 of the Act, the employer shall ensure that the employee has available to himself or herself a rest period and break that, in all the circumstances, can reasonably be regarded as equivalent to the first-mentioned rest period and break.

Position of the Complainant

The Complainant in evidence stated that he worked a normal roster of twelve hours per day Tuesday through Saturday. He stated that he took no breaks during that time. He stated that he is a smoker and that while employed he smoked in the region of 10 – 15 cigarettes during the working day. He stated that each cigarette lasted roughly two minutes and that he normally smoked outside the back of the shop. He stated that the shop is located in a high pressure area. He said that as a result he could not take breaks. He said that he normally drank coffee at his post or in the back of the shop. He said that he normally had no more than a chocolate snack at such times. He stated that at all times he was at work and did not receive any time to rest during the working day. He stated that on three days of the week there was a second security guard in the shop. In answer to Counsel for the Respondent he agreed that the other officer took his breaks. He said that he submitted his time sheets, signed off by the store manager, on a daily basis that recorded that he worked 12 hours each day without a break. He stated that he was paid for all hours returned. He stated that the time sheets he returned recorded no breaks as he worked each day without a break.

Position of the Respondent

The Respondent argued that the Complainant was responsible for organising his own breaks in consultation with the Store Manager. It argued that the Complainant smoked 10 – 15 cigarettes per day and that this amounted to a break of between 20 and 30 minutes per day. It argued that the Complainant took other breaks and that amounted to at least one hour per day. It stated that it had carried out a calculation that disclosed that the Complainant was working an average of 45 hours per week in the relevant period.

Ms Fiona Cowhey, General Manager, gave evidence to the Court. She stated that the Complainant worked in Aldi Parnell Street in accordance with a roster that was notified to him by sms message each week. The rosters were standard and the sms message was normally brief and advised the Complainant that he was working the same roster each week. That roster was for five 12 hours shifts Tuesday through Saturday. She stated that the agreement with Aldi provided that security staff would take their statutory breaks in consultation with the store manager. She stated that the Company expected their employees to do so. She stated that all staff were so advised when they received their induction training on commencing assignment is Aldi. She stated that she had no personal knowledge of the induction training given to the Complainant. She said that she did not personally supervise the breaks. She acknowledged that the Company had paid the Complainant on the basis of 12 hours work per 12 hour rostered shift. She acknowledged that it made no deduction for breaks from the hours in respect of which he submitted store approved time sheets. She stated that another security guard employed in the store took his breaks, returned time sheets reflecting the hours worked and the breaks taken during each shift and was paid accordingly. She stated that Aldi did not pay the Respondent for breaks taken by staff. She stated that the Complainant should not have been paid for the 12 hours he was rostered but rather for 11 hours with a one hour unpaid break.

Section 25 of the Act in relevant part states

- (1) An employer shall keep, at the premises or place where his or her employee works or, if the employee works at two or more premises or places, the premises or place from which the activities that the employee is employed to carry on are principally directed or controlled, such records, in such form, if any, as may be prescribed, as will show whether the provisions of this Act [and, where applicable, the Activities of Doctors in Training Regulations] are being complied with in relation to the employee and those records shall be retained by the employer for at least 3 years from the date of their making.
  (4) Without prejudice to subsection (3) , where an employer fails to keep records under subsection (1) in respect of his or her compliance with a particular provision of this Act [or the Activities of Doctors in Training Regulations] in relation to an employee, the onus of proving, in proceedings before a rights commissioner or the Labour Court, that the said provision was complied with in relation to the employee shall lie on the employer.

Facts

The Court finds that the Complainant was rostered to work 12 hour shifts. The Court also finds that the Respondent intended that provisions for the taking of statutory breaks was provided for in the roster. It further finds that responsibility for the taking of breaks was delegated to the store manager and the security guard in each store.

In this case it is clear from the evidence presented and the records put in evidence by both parties that the Complainant was assigned to carry out a 12 hour duty each day five days per week. It was intended that he would be paid for 11 hours and take one hour as an unpaid break. In fact the records show that he worked 12 hours per day and was paid for each of those hours. Time sheets signed off by the store manager to this effect were submitted to the Company each day and the Complainant was paid on the basis of those sheets. The Court finds therefore that the Respondent had knowledge of the circumstances that applied in the store. It was aware that the Complainant was not afforded a break from work in line with Section 12 of the Act. No evidence was presented to the Court that compensatory rest was provided to the Complainant in respect of his entitlement to a daily rest period of 11 hours or of his entitlement breaks at work.

The Court finds therefore that the Respondent was aware that the Complainant was not in receipt of the statutory entitlement to breaks on each occasion on which he submitted a time sheet recording his working hours. The Court further finds that the Respondent Company took no action to ensure that he was afforded breaks in accordance with the statute.

Accordingly the Court determines that the complaint is well founded.

Determination

The Court determines that the Complaint is well founded. The Court orders the Respondent to pay the Complainant compensation in the sum of €4,750.

Section 15 of the Act states

- (1) An employer must not permit an employee to work, in each period of 7 days, more than an average of 48 hours, that is to say an average of 48 hours calculated over a period (hereafter in this section referred to as a "reference period") that does not exceed—
  - (a) 4 months, or
    (b) 6 months—
    - (i) in the case of an employee employed in an activity referred to in paragraph 2 , point 2.1. of Article 17 of the Council Directive , or
      (ii) where due to any matter referred to in section 5 , it would not be practicable (if a reference period not exceeding 4 months were to apply in relation to the employee) for the employer to comply with this subsection, or

    (c) such length of time as, in the case of an employee employed in an activity mentioned in subsection (5) , is specified in a collective agreement referred to in that subsection.

(2) Subsection (1) shall have effect subject to the Fifth Schedule (which contains transitional provisions in respect of the period of 24 months beginning on the commencement of that Schedule).

(3) The days or months comprising a reference period shall, subject to subsection (4) , be consecutive days or months.

(4) A reference period shall not include—

- (a) any period of annual leave granted to the employee concerned in accordance with this Act (save so much of it as exceeds the minimum period of annual leave required by this Act to be granted to the employee),
  - [(aa) any period during which the employee was absent from work while on parentalleave, force majeureleave or carer's leave within the meaning of the Carer's Leave Act 2001 ,]

  (b) any absences from work by the employee concerned authorised under the Maternity Protection [Acts 1994 and 2004] , or the Adoptive Leave [Acts 1995 and 2005] , or
  (c) any sick leave taken by the employee concerned.

(5) Where an employee is employed in an activity (including an activity referred to in subsection (1)(b)(i))—

- (a) the weekly working hours of which vary on a seasonal basis, or
  (b) as respects which it would not be practicable for the employer concerned to comply with subsection (1) (if a reference period not exceeding 4 or 6 months, as the case may be, were to apply in relation to the employee) because of considerations of a technical nature or related to the conditions under which the work concerned is organised or otherwise of an objective nature, then a collective agreement that for the time being has effect in relation to the employee and which stands approved of by the Labour Court under section 24 may specify, for the purposes of subsection (1)(c) , a length of time in relation to the employee of more than 4 or 6 months, as the case may be (but not more than 12 months).

The Complainant in evidence stated that he was rostered to work 12 hour shifts five days per week during which he received no breaks. He told the Court that he was notified of his rosters by sms message each week. He stated that his working week did not vary. He stated that he normally worked 60 hours per week and was paid accordingly. He stated that his average working week exceeded 48 hours per week.

Counsel for the Complainant argued that the evidence before the Court disclosed that the he was rostered to work five successive 12 hour shifts each week each of which included a break of one hour over the course of the day. The Complainant's time sheets disclosed that he in fact worked 12 hour shifts five days per week during which he did not receive a break from work. He argued that the Respondent was aware that the Complainant was scheduled to work 60 hours per week. He argued that it paid the Complainant on the basis that he was working 60 hours per week. He argued that it took no steps to ensure that the Complainant received breaks during the working day. He further argued that the Respondent rostered and paid the Complainant to work 60 hours per week. He argued that the evidence established that the Respondent infringed section 15 of the Act.

Counsel for the Respondent argued that the company is engaged in the Security Industry and, for the purposes of calculating the average working week, the statutory reference period is six months. He argued that the Complainant left work in October 2012 and did not submit his complaint to the Rights Commissioner until February 2013. It submits that the Court cannot consider a complaint under the Act unless it relates to an infringement that occurred within six months of the date on which the complaint is made to the Court. As the Company is entitled to calculate the average length of the working week over a six months period the infringement complained of could not have occurred within the two months reference period over which the Court has jurisdiction. It argues that the complaint therefore cannot be made out and cannot therefore be well founded.

Ms Fiona Cowhey, General Manager stated that the Complainant was rostered to work 11 hours per day over a 12 hour shift. It was intended that the roster would include a one hour break. She stated that the Complainant worked 12 hours per day and was paid accordingly.

Findings of the Court

The Court finds that the complaint is properly before it. The Act does not prohibit the Court from calculating the average working week over a period of six months provided the effect of that calculation crystalises into an infringement of section 15 of the Act within six months of the date on which the complaint was made by the Complainant to the Rights Commissioner. In this case the Complaint was made in February 2013. The Complainant left work in October 2012. The Complainant and the Respondent are entitled to calculate the average working week in the six months up to and including the date on which he ceased working for the Company. The effect of that averaging, on the information before the Court, discloses that the Complainant was required to work in excess of 48 hours per week in that period.

The Court also finds that the evidence of both the Complainant and Ms Cowhey confirms that the Respondent was at all times aware of the hours the Complainant was rostered to work and was actually working and paid him his weekly salary on that basis.

Determination

The Court determines that the complaint is well founded. The Court orders the Respondent to pay the Complainant compensation in the sum of €4,750.

Section 19 and 23

Section 19 of the Act states:

- (1) Subject to the First Schedule (which contains transitional provisions in respect of the leave years 1996 to 1998), an employee shall be entitled to paid annual leave (in this Act referred to as "annual leave") equal to—
  - (a) 4 working weeks in a leave year in which he or she works at least 1,365 hours (unless it is a leave year in which he or she changes employment),
    (b) one-third of a working week for each month in the leave year in which he or she works at least 117 hours, or

    (c) 8 per cent of the hours he or she works in a leave year (but subject to a maximum of 4 working weeks):

  Provided that if more than one of the preceding paragraphs is applicable in the case concerned and the period of annual leave of the employee, determined in accordance with each of those paragraphs, is not identical, the annual leave to which the employee shall be entitled shall be equal to whichever of those periods is the greater.

Section 23 of the Act states:

- (1) Where—
  - (a) an employee ceases to be employed, and
    (b) the whole or any portion of the annual leave in respect of the current leave year or, in case the cesser of employment occurs during the first half of that year, in respect of that year, the previous leave year or both those years, remains to be granted to the employee, the employee shall, as compensation for the loss of that annual leave, be paid by his or her employer an amount equal to the pay, calculated at the normal weekly rate or, as the case may be, at a rate proportionate to the normal weekly rate, that he or she would have received had he or she been granted that annual leave.

Position of the Complainant

The Complainant submits that he had accrued an entitlement to 15.5 days annual leave when he terminated his employment. At that time he had taken two days leave. He submits that he is owed 13.5 days annual leave.

Position of the Respondent

The Respondent submits that the Complainant took two days holidays on the 13th and 14th July 2012 and was paid cesser pay of €933.15 in respect of his outstanding leave entitlements. It submitted copy weekly time sheets and pay slip in support of its submission.

Findings

Section 19(1) of the Act states:

- (a) 4 working weeks in a leave year in which he or she works at least 1,365 hours (unless it is a leave year in which he or she changes employment),

The statutory leave year commences in April each year. The Complainant resigned on 17 October 2012. In total that amounts to 25 weeks working time. The Complainant contends that he had accrued an entitlement to 15.5 days leave at that time. The Respondent submitted documents that disclose that the Complainant took two days leave in the course of the year and was paid cesser pay in respect of the balance of his entitlement. However an analysis of the Complainants hours discloses that he had accrued an entitlement to 3 days leave for which he was not compensated by way of cesser pay when his employment terminated.

Determination

The Respondent infringed Sections 19 and 23 of the Act. The Court orders the Respondent to pay the Complainant in respect of the 8 days due to him and €300 compensation for the breaches involved.

The Court so determines.

SUBJECT:

1. An appeal of an Adjudication Officer's Decision No(s)ADJ-00015350 CA-00019947

BACKGROUND:

2. The Employer appealed the Decision of the Adjudication Officer to the Labour Court. A Labour Court hearing took place on 08 January 2020. The following is the Court's Determination:-

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by PJ Personnel Ltd (the Respondent) against the Decision of an Adjudication Officer under the Protection of Employees (Temporary Agency Work) Act 2012 (the Act). The claim was referred to the Workplace Relations Commission on 22nd June 2018 by Clint Maguire (the Complainant). The Complainant's employment terminated with the Respondent on the 7th January 2018. The Adjudication Officer upheld the complaint and awarded compensation.

Background

The Complainant commenced employment with the Respondent in July 2016 and was placed with the Hirer on the 31st May 2017. The Complainant's last day on site was the 22nd December 2017 and his last day in work was 7th January 2018. The Complainant states that unlike his comparator he did not receive a "greasing allowance". A Preliminary issue relating to time limits arises in this case.

Preliminary Issue – Time Limit

Position of the parties

It is the Complainant's submission that although the complaint was submitted outside of the time limits there was "reasonable cause" for doing so. It was the Complainant's submission that he had mandated his Union to advance the matter on his behalf. The Union had engaged with the Hirer in relation to same as it was the Union's belief that based on the practises in the construction industry this was the appropriate person to engage with. The Union does not dispute that it was aware of who the Employer was, but the Hirer was the person who was around the site. The Union official believed that it was reasonable for them to exhaust the local process first. The Complainant noted the case law relating to "reasonable cause" and argued that the case law supported the fact that it was accepted that each case was considered on its own merits.

The Respondent submitted that reasonable cause had not been established. The test for reasonable cause had been set out a number of times by the Court and the failure of the Complainant's representative to make a complaint within the relevant time period did not meet the test of "reasonable cause". The Respondent submitted that the fact that the Complainant's representative chose to exhaust local procedures albeit with the wrong Respondent did not prevent him from lodging a claim in a timely manner. The Respondent citied case law in support of theirsubmissions.

The Workplace Relations Act 2015 at section 6 states:

(6) Subject to subsection (8), an adjudication officer shall not entertain a complaint referred to him or her under this section if it has been presented to the Director General after the expiration of the period of 6 months beginning on the date of the contravention to which the complaint relates.

(8) An adjudication officer may entertain a complaint or dispute to which this section applies presented or referred to the Director General after the expiration of the period referred to in subsection (6) or (7) (but not later than 6 months after such expiration), as the case may be, if he or she is satisfied that the failure to present the complaint or refer the dispute within that period was due to reasonable cause.

Conclusions of the Court on the Preliminary Matters

The Legal Principles

The issue arising in this appeal is whether reasonable cause has been shown for an extension of time.

The established test for deciding if an extension should be granted for reasonable cause shown is that formulated by this Court in Labour Court Determination DWT0338CementationSkanska (Formerly Kvaerner Cementation) v Carroll. Here the test was set out in the following terms: -

- It is the Court's view that in considering if reasonable cause exists, it is for the claimant to show that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford an excuse for the delay. The explanation must be reasonable, that is to say it must make sense, be agreeable to reason and not be irrational or absurd. In the context in which the expression reasonable cause appears in the statute it suggests an objective standard, but it must be applied to the facts and circumstances known to the claimant at the material time. The claimant's failure to present the claim within the six-month time limit must have been due to the reasonable cause relied upon. Hence there must be a causal link between the circumstances cited and the delay and the claimant should satisfy the Court, as a matter of probability, that had those circumstances not been present he would have initiated the claim in time.

In that case, and in subsequent cases in which this question arose, the Court adopted an approach analogous to that taken by the Superior Courts in considering whether time should enlarged for 'good reason' in judicial review proceedings pursuant to Order 84, Rule 21 of the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986. That approach was held to be correct by the High Court inMinister for Finance v CPSU & Ors[2007] 18 ELR 36.

The test formulated inCementationSkanska (Formerly Kvaerner Cementation) v Carrolldraws heavily on the decision of the High Court inDonal O'Donnell and Catherine O'Donnell v Dun Laoghaire Corporation[1991] ILRM 30. Here Costello Costello J. (as he then was) stated as follows:

- -The phrase 'good reasons' is one of wide import which it would be futile to attempt to define precisely. However, in considering whether or not there are good reasons for extending the time I think it is clear that the test must be an objective one and the court should not extend the time merely because an aggrieved plaintiff believed that he or she was justified in delaying the institution of proceedings. What the plaintiff has to show (and I think the onus under O. 84 r. 21 is on the plaintiff) is that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford a justifiable excuse for the delay.

It clear from the authorities that the test places the onus on the applicant for an extension of time to identify the reason for the delay and to establish that the reason relied upon provides a justifiable excuse for the actual delay. Secondly, the onus is on the applicant to establish a causal connection between the reason proffered for the delay and his or her failure to present the complaint in time. Thirdly, the Court must be satisfied, as a matter of probability, that the complaint would have been presented the complaint in time were it not for the intervention of the factors relied upon as constituting reasonable cause. It is the actual delay that must be explained and justified. Hence, if the factors relied upon to explain the delay ceased to operate before the complaint was presented, that may undermine a claim that those factors were the actual cause of the delay. Finally, while the established test imposes a relatively low threshold of reasonableness on an applicant, there is some limitation on the range of issues which can be taken into account. In particular, as was pointed out by Costello J in the passage quoted above, a Court should not extend a statutory time limit merely because the applicant subjectively believed that he or she was justified in delaying the institution of proceedings.

The Court is satisfied that the Complainant's complaint was presented to the WRC outside of the statutory time limit. The Complainant's last date on site was 22nd December 2017. The Court is satisfied that, if there was a contravention of the Act, that date is the last date when such a contravention took place. As the Complainant's claim was not presented to the Workplace Relations Commission until 22nd June 2018, it was outside of the statutory time limit. The Court finds that the reason proffered by the Complainant while it might explain the delay, does not afford an excuse for the delay.

Determination

For all the reasons set out above, the Court finds that the complaint under the Act is outside the statutory time limits and therefore must fail. In these circumstances, the Court cannot proceed to hear the substantive matter.

Accordingly, the Respondent's appeal is allowed, and the Decision of the Adjudication Officer is set aside.

The Court so Determines.

PUBLIC APPOINTMENTS SERVICE (REPRESENTED BY CHIEF STATE SOLICITORS OFFICE) - AND - KEVIN RODDY

DIVISION : Chairman: Ms Jenkinson Employer Member: Ms Doyle Worker Member: Ms Ni Mhurchu

SUBJECT: 1. Appeal under Section 83 of The Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2008.BACKGROUND: 2. The Complainant appealed a decision of an Equality Officer No. DEC-E2010/024 to the Labour Court on the 13th April 2010 in accordance with Section 83 of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2008. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 6th October, 2010. The following is the Determination of the Court:-DETERMINATION:This is an appeal by Mr. Kevin Roddy ("the Complainant") against the decision of an Equality Officer in a claim alleging he was subjected to victimisation by the Public Appointments Service ("the Respondent") contrary to Section 74 (2) of the Employment Equality Act 1998 and 2008 (The Acts).At the outset of the Equality Officer's hearing an issue arose over whether the Complainant has submitted his complaint within the time limit provided for under Section 77(5) of the Acts and proceeded to hold a preliminary hearing on that matter. However, in the course of his investigation the Equality Officer held that the Complainant had failed to establish a*prima facie*case of victimisation and consequently held that the issue of timeliness became moot. It was against that decision that the Complainant appealed to the Court.*Background*The Complainant applied for a position as Senior Executive Planner with Donegal County Council in July 2006. The Public Appointments Service undertook the recruitment and selection process. On 8th September 2006 he was informed that he was not among those candidates short-listed to attend for interview. As the Complainant was dissatisfied with the outcome, he sought to challenge the Respondent's decision. On 13th September 2006 he submitted a series of question under the Freedom of Information (FOI) Acts, 1997 and 2003 to the Respondent, one of which specifically sought information on the composition of the Selection Board. By letter dated 13th October 2006, the Respondent supplied details of the names and positions held by all four persons on the Selection Board. One of the names gave the Complainant serious cause of concern (hereinafter referred to as "Ms. A") and he sought further information on details of any contacts made between Donegal County Council (in particular Ms. A) and the Respondent concerning the criteria for selection.After he received full details of such contacts, he wrote to the Respondent to inform them that the presence of Ms. A on the Selection Board may have given rise to a conflict of interest which he submitted may not have been made known to the Respondent. In his letter he said:

- "I have had issues in the past with both [Ms. A] and Donegal County Council."

In his letter he proceeded to recount details of a case he took in Northern Ireland where he had previously worked with Ms. A and*"matters of equality and fair treatment resulted in a case to the Equality Commission"*,which he subsequently withdrew for financial reasons.Matters with Donegal County Council seemed to have related to "*staffing levels and treatment of staff arising from over working".Summary of The Complainant's case:*The Complainant submitted that he had been victimised by the Respondent in that included in the composition of the Selection Board was a person whom he had made a previous complaint against to the Equality Commission in Northern Ireland. He submitted that the manner in which Donegal County Council nominated Ms. A onto the Selection Board suggested a strategy to favour candidates already in employment or at least to influence the outcome and given the history between himself and Ms. A and separately with Donegal County Council, the fact that none of this was declared meant that his application was at an unfair advantage which amounted to victimisation by the Respondent.He submitted that had he not been subjected to prejudice against him he would have been successfully short-listed for interview due to the level of his qualifications, experience and skills. This contention he submits is further strengthened by the lack of evidence on the methodology used to assess candidates for the short-list.*Summary of The Respondent's Case*Ms. Kathy Smith B.L on behalf of the Respondent submitted that the Equality Officer was correct in holding that the Complainant had failed to make out a*prima facie*claim of victimisation.The Respondent held that in accordance with normal practice, it set up a selection panel comprising of individuals external to the client body - Donegal County Council, and of a member nominated by the client itself. It stated that it is normal practice when notifying panel members of a date for short-listing candidates, to bring to their attention the following element of caution:

- "It is always possible that having agreed to assist, you may subsequently become aware of an issue which could be seen to cause a conflict of interest for you in your role in this competition. The Public Appointments Service fully accepts that such occurrences are inevitable from time to time. To ensure that the selection process remains independent, objective and fair you should advise this Office of any such matters at an early stage, so that alternative arrangements can be put in place should that prove necessary. Your co-operation in this matter is greatly appreciated."

In this case, no possible conflicts were drawn to the Respondent's attention by any members of the Board.The Respondent disputed the claim of victimisation, holding that in order for there to be such a claim there must be adverse treatment of an employee by his or her employer. It argued that there was no relationship of employer/employee between the Respondent and the Complainant and in such circumstances the allegation of victimisation made cannot be sustained. Secondly, it held that it cannot be held accountable if it was not even aware of the facts grounding such a claim and therefore could not be held to be "a reaction"by the Respondent. It held that it took all reasonable steps to advise members of the possibility of any conflicts of interest and the course of action they should take in the event of such a conflict.The Law Applicable

- Victimisation is defined by Section 74(2) of the Acts, as follows:

  (2) For the purposes of this Part victimisation occurs where dismissal or other adverse treatment of an employee by his or her employer occurs as a reaction to—

  - (a) a complaint of discrimination made by the employee to the employer,(b) any proceedings by a complainant,

    (c) an employee having represented or otherwise supported a complainant,

    (d) the work of an employee having been compared with that of another employee for any of the purposes of this Act or any enactment repealed by this Act ,

    (e) an employee having been a witness in any proceedings under this Act or the Equal Status Act 2000 or any such repealed enactment,

    (f) an employee having opposed by lawful means an act which is unlawful under this Act or the said Act of 2000 or which was unlawful or any such repealed enactment, or

    (g) an employee having given notice of an intention to take any of the actions mentioned in the preceding paragraphs.

The definition of victimisation contained in the Section contains essentially three ingredients. It requires that: -(a) The Complainant had taken action of a type referred to at Section 74(2) of the Acts (a protected act),(b) The Complainant was subjected to adverse treatment by an employer and,(c) The adverse treatment was in reaction to the protected action having been taken by the Complainant.The Law enables those who considered themselves wronged by not being afforded equal treatment to raise complaints without fear of retribution. Article 11 of Directive 2000/78/EC requires Member States to introduce into their legal systems such*"measures as are necessary to protect employees against dismissal or other adverse treatment by employers as a reaction to a complaint within the undertaking or to any legal proceedings aimed at enforcing compliance with the principle of equal treatment"The question the Court must first examine is whether the Complainant has taken an action of a type referred to at Section 74(2) of the Acts (a protected act).The Complainant informed the Court that a number of years previously he had taken a complaint of discrimination on grounds of gender against his employer at the time in Northern Ireland. Ms. A, referred to above, was named in these proceedings as she also worked for the Northern Irish employer at the time. Subsequently he withdrew the proceedings, for financial reasons. The Complainant submitted that this action - the initiations of proceedings - comes within the definition of "victimisation" as contained in Section 74(2)(b "any proceedings by a complainant;"*.To be encompassed within the ambit of section 74(2)(b)"proceedings" must come within the definition asdefined by Section 2 under Interpretations:

- "proceedings" means—
  - (a) proceedings before the person, body or court dealing with a request or reference under this Act by or on behalf of a person, and(b) any subsequent proceedings, including proceedings on appeal, arising from the request or reference, but does not include proceedings for an offence under this Act ;"

Under the Act the Complainant must prove that the catalyst alleged for the adverse treatment complained of came within the ambit of one of the protected acts referred to at Section 74(2) of the Acts. The Court is being asked to accept that the initiation of proceedings of a complaint of discrimination against a distinctly separate employer in another jurisdiction could constitute a "protected act" and be combined with his alleged adverse treatment by the Respondent in this case. There clearly is no causal connection between the taking of proceedings against another employer and his non-selection in a job competition conducted by the Respondent in this case. Therefore, in the Court's view the facts as presented do not come within the ambit of a protected act and consequently do not come within the intendment of Section 74(2) of the Acts.*Conflict of Interest*Based on the undisputed facts of this case the Court accepts the Complainant's contention that the presence of Ms. A on the Selection Board clearly constituted a conflict of interest, however this of itself does not amount to victimisation within the statutory meaning of the Acts.Determination.

For all of the reasons referred to above the Court is satisfied that the within complaint of victimisation is unsustainable in law. The decision of the Equality Tribunal is varied and substituted with a determination that the Complainant was not subjected to victimisation within the meaning of the Acts.However, while the Court accepts that the Respondent had procedures in place designed to safeguard against a conflict of interest arising they clearly were not effective in this case, therefore the Court is of the view that the procedures should be reviewed to ensure that a similar situation to one described above does not happen in the future.The Complainant's appeal fails.The Court so Determines.Signed on behalf of the Labour CourtCaroline Jenkinson15th October, 2010_____MG.Deputy ChairmanNOTE Enquiries concerning this Determination should be addressed to Madelon Geoghegan, Court Secretary.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal under Section 83 of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011.

BACKGROUND:

2. The Worker and the Employer appealed the decision of the Equality Officer to the Labour Court on 10th and 12th December, 2014 in accordance with Section 83 of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011. Labour Court hearings took place in April and in June, 2015 with further information submitted to the Court by the parties at later stages. The following is the Determination of the Court:

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Richard Lett and a cross appeal by Earagail Eisc Teoranta against a decision of the Equality Tribunal. The case arises from the termination of the Mr Lett's employment on reaching his 66th birthday. He claims that the circumstances of what he characterised as his dismissal constituted discrimination against him on grounds of his age. Mr Lett was also reduced to a three day week in February 2011, at which time he was also informed that he would be compulsorily retired on 7th September 2011, the date of his 66th birthday.

Mr Lett brought a claim before the Equality Tribunal pursuant to the Employment Equality Acts 1998 -2011 (the Act) contending that he was discriminated against on grounds of his age. The Equality Tribunal found for Mr Lett on both points and awarded him compensation in the amount of €24,000.

In this Determination the parties are referred hereafter as they were at first instance. Hence, Mr Lett is referred to as the Complainant and Earagail Eisc Teoranta is referred to as the Respondent.

The Complainant now appeals against the quantum of the award of compensation made by the Equality Officer. The Respondent cross appeals against the totality of the Equality Officer's decision.

The parties made helpful written and oral submissions on the issues arising in the case and the Court heard oral evidence tendered by both parties. Following the hearing the parties made final written submissions. All of the submissions and the evidence adduced have been carefully evaluated by the Court in reaching its determination.

Background

While there are significant issues of material fact in dispute between the parties the background factual matrix against which the dispute arose is not in dispute and can be summarised as follows: -

The Complainant was born on 8th September 1945. He was formally a director and shareholder of Lett and Company Limited and Lett Group Limited. These companies operated a family business engaged in fish processing and distribution. The Complainant's co-directors were his two brothers. In or about 1988 or 1989 Lett Group Limited acquired the shareholding in the Respondent. It appears that the Complainant became a director of the Respondent and continued in that capacity until 1998, at which time he resigned so as to facilitate a restructuring of the business.

In or about April 2007 the Respondent was acquired by an entity known as the Navid Group. The consideration for the acquisition was that the Navid Group took on the liabilities of the Respondent and procured the release of the Complainant and members of his family from personal guarantees against the bank borrowings of the Respondent.

As a condition of the acquisition the Respondent undertook to employ the Complainant as a fish buyer and engineering consultant. On foot of that agreement the Complainant was employed by the Respondent in 2007 on a contract of service for a period of two years. On the expiry of that fixed term contract the Complainant continued in the employment of the Respondent although his fixed-term contract was not formally renewed at that time.

On or about 1st March 2010, the Respondent furnished the Complainant with a draft of a further fixed-term contract which was expressed to commence on 30th March 2009 and to run for a period of 18 months from that date. The Complainant refused to sign this contract. He nonetheless continued in the Respondent's employment

Neither the contract entered into in 2007 nor the draft contract proffered to the Complainant in 2010 contained an express term stipulating a retirement age. However, the Respondent had produced a staff handbook in which normal retirement age for all staff was expressly stated to be 65.

The Respondent operated a pension scheme the rules of which stipulated that a pension can be paid to a member at any time between the ages of 60 and 75. The Complainant was a trustee of this scheme.

By letter dated 21st February 2011 the Managing Director of the Respondent wrote to the Complainant informing him that in the course of restructuring the business his position had been identified as superfluous to its continuing requirements. He was informed that a decision would shortly be made as to the viability of his position. In this letter the Managing Director of the Respondent also referred to the Complainant's retirement date as being 7th September 2011. By the same letter the Complainant was advised that with effect from 28th February 2011 he would be reduced to a three day week and that this would continue until his retirement date. The Complainant's employment was terminated with effect from 28th February 2011.

At the time his employment terminated the Complainant was 66 years of age.

The Complainant

The Complainant contends that he was not contractually required to retire at any particular age. He denies that the Respondent ever introduced a compulsory retirement age or that any compulsory retirement age applied to his employment. The Complainant further contends that other named employees worked beyond the age at which his employment was terminated.

The Complainant further relies on Directive 2000/78/EC Establishing a General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Education (hereafter the Directive) in contending that the use of age as a criterion for less favourable treatment in employment constitutes unlawful discrimination. He submitted that national law, and in particular the Act, must be interpreted and applied in harmony with the Directive.

The Respondent

The Respondent contends that the Complainant knew, or ought to have known, that his retirement age was fixed at 65. His retirement was delayed until the end of the year in which he turned 65 because of a view taken by the Respondent as to what was meant by the stipulation in the company handbook.

The Respondent contends that the stipulation as to retirement contained in the handbook was part of the Complainant's conditions of employment and was, in any event, saved by s.34(4) of the Act, which provides: -

- "Without prejudice to subsection (3), it shall not constitute discrimination on the age ground to fix different ages for the retirement (whether voluntarily or compulsorily) of employees or any class or description of employees."

The Respondent submitted, in reliance on authority, that s.34 (4) of the Act is consistent with the requirements of the Directive.

The Respondent further contends that a retirement age of 65, or 66, has been applied consistently to other employees. In support of that contention, details were provided to the Court showing the dates of birth and retirement dates for all employees whose employment, according to the Respondent, came to an end by retirement since 2006, as follows: -

Employee	Date of Birth	Termination Date	Age
A	20/08/47	19/01/10	62yrs, 151 days
B	13/08/47	09/03/12	64yrs, 360 days
C	27/06/46	22/06/12	65yrs, 360 days
D	28/02/50	29/06/12	62yrs, 120 days
E	18/08/48	30/11/13	65yrs. 103 days
F	07/08/48	06/02/14	65yrs, 188 days
G	26/02/49	20/02/15	65yrs, 361 days

Note: The employees referred to are named in information furnished by the Respondent and have been anonymised by the Court

Without prejudice to its contention that the Complainant had actual or constructive knowledge of the requirement that he retire between the ages of 65 and 66, Counsel for the Respondent submitted that the validity of a retirement age is not dependent upon the employee to which it applies having knowledge thereof.

Evidence

Oral sworn evidence was given by the Complainant, Mr Michael Jacob, who was Chairman of Lett Group Limited and the Respondent between 1990 and 2014, and Mr Jim Lett, who was Chief Executive of the Respondent up to 2007. Mr Aodh O'Domhnaill, who is Chief Executive of the Respondent, gave evidence on behalf of the Respondent.

The salient points of the evidence adduced are as follows: -

The Complainant told the Court in evidence that he had never known of the existence of a retirement age in the company. He had been a director of the Respondent up to 1998 but thereafter, while not formally a member of the Board of the Respondent, he attended Board meetings and received copies of all Board papers.

He was employed by the Respondent as a fish buyer and consultant in engineering in 2007 following the restructuring of the company. Prior to that date, he was employed in a similar capacity by Lett and Company limited. The Complainant's initial employment with the Respondent was on a fixed-term contract for two years. On the expiry of this contract it was 'rolled over' and he continued in the employment of the Respondent.

It was the Complainant's evidence that in 2007 he was asked to remain on by Mr Aodh O'Domhnaill although it was provided for in the Heads of Agreement leading to the restructuring that he would be employed by the Respondent.

In March 2010 the Complainant was proffered a draft contract of employment which was expressed to run from 30thMarch 2009 (the date on which his prior contract expired) for a period of 18 months. He refused to sign that document as there were a number of terms with which he disagreed. In particular, he did not accept the proposed duration of the contract which he accepted coincided approximately with his 65thbirthday. He said that in so far as this implied a retirement date, it was the first time that he had heard of a retirement date.

Turning to the company handbook, the Complainant told the Court that the first time that he had sight of this document was in 2011, in the course of the proceedings before the Equality Tribunal.

The Complainant named two former colleagues who, he claimed, worked beyond age 66. One of these persons worked to age 70 while the other worked to age 67. In cross examination the Complainant accepted that this latter person in fact ceased to be employed at age 66. These named employees ceased to be employed in 2005 and 2000 respectively.

According to the Complainant other members of the Lett family whose services were not retained following the restructuring of the business received a financial compensatory package. He expected that he would have received a similar package if his services were not being retained.

Mr Jacob told the Court that he was Chairman of the Respondent between 1990 and 2014. He said that he was personally unaware of any particular retirement age for employees. He accepted that the day-to-day management of the company and the responsibility for the development of employment related policies was the function of management rather than of the Board. He said that he would have expected the management to have a retirement age in place but he had no knowledge of whether there was such a policy or of what it was. He was unaware of any issue relating to age having arisen within the Respondent prior to the 2007 restructuring.

Turning to the handbook, Mr Jacob told the Court that he was certain that he had never seen the document relied upon by the Respondent. He said that if he had seen this document he would have been unhappy with its content and would have said so. It was Mr Jacob's evidence that this document was never seen nor approved by the Board although it would not have required Board approval. He would have expected management to produce an employee handbook.

Mr Jacob described the management of the Respondent as careful reporters.

Mr Jim Lett gave evidence. He was Chief Executive of Lett Group Limited up to 2007. The Lett Group controlled the Respondent up to that time. According to Mr Lett, the first time that he saw the handbook relied upon by Respondent was in the course of the proceedings before the Equality Tribunal. He also considered this handbook inadequate and would not have agreed with its content had he seen it. Mr Lett told the Court that the question of retirement, or matters relating to the age of employees, was never discussed with him while he was in charge of the holding company.

Mr Lett accepted that a named consultant had been engaged by the Respondent in or about 2006 but the focus of his work was directed at reducing costs. He met with the consultant on three or four occasions to discuss his work. He said that he would have expected that employees would be informed of the changes that were being proposed. The consultant recommended the introduction of an annualised hour's arrangement for employees and he was aware that this change had been implemented in 2008.

Mr Aodh O'Domhnaill gave evidence. This witness is currently Chief Executive of the Respondent and has held that position since 2007. He had been General Manager of the Respondent from 1992. Prior to the restructuring the Respondent was owned and controlled by Lett Group Limited. The directors of the company were all members of the Lett family.

According to Mr O'Domhnaill, it became obvious by 2006 that every aspect of the Respondent's business would have to be examined. On foot of recommendations made by the consultant referred to in the evidence of other witnesses, it was decided to introduce a staff handbook and to introduce annualised hours. The handbook was produced in 2006, when the company was controlled by the Lett family. It was originally produced on A4 sheets and was formally printed in 2007and some 300 copies produced.

The staff were not represented by a trade union and a works council was established for the purpose of providing a forum for consultation with staff. It was Mr O'Domhnaill's evidence that the handbook was discussed individually with all staff members. Copies of the handbook were left in the staff canteen in Donegal. Mr O'Domhnaill accepted that the Complainant was based in Wexford and a copy of the handbook may not been sent to that location. Mr O'Domhnaill accepted that it was conceivable that the Complainant has not seen this document. However, the Complainant had a standing invitation to attend Board meetings and did so regularly. He said that the Complainant should have become aware of the existence of the handbook through his involvement with the Board. Mr O' O'Domhnaill did not take issue with Mr Jacob's evidence that the handbook had not been placed before the Board.

Mr O'Domhnaill's told the Court that the handbook's provision relating to retirement reflected the previous practice in the Respondent. No retirement age was specified in the first contract issued to the Complainant in 2007 because it was for a fixed-term of two years. The second contract, while not specifying a retirement age, was to run for eighteen months to the 29thSeptember 2010, at which time the Complainant would have attained the age of 65. It was known that the Complainant did not wish to retire and, having obtained legal advice, it was concluded that he would remain aged 65 until his 66thbirthday and should be allowed to remain in employment up to that date.

The witness told the Court that an advertisement had been placed for a replacement of the Complainant as a fish buyer but the position was never in fact filled.

Discussion

Section 34(4) of the Act,prima facie,allowed the Respondent to fix a retirement age without contravening the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age. The jurisprudence of the CJEU on the circumstances in which compulsory retirement is saved by Article 6 of the Directive is relevant only if the Court finds that a retirement age was in fact fixed by the Respondent and that the retirement age applied to the Complainant.

As a matter of general principle, a termination of employment by way of retirement should be distinguished from a dismissal on grounds of age. A retirement occurs where the employment comes to an end pursuant to a condition of employment which limits an employee's tenure to the point at which they attain a specified age. In that regard, it appears to the Court that the authority conferred on an employer by s.34(4) of the Act is to apply a condition of employment to that effect. Such a term can be provided in an employee's conditions of employment either expressly or by implication, or it can be provided by incorporation where some other document or instrument, of which the employee had notice, can be read in conjunction with the formal contract of employment. The Court further accepts that an employer's employment policy in relation to retirement can take effect as a contractual condition of employment which is,prima facie,protected by s.34(4) of the Act. However, in the Court's view that could only arise where the policy is promulgated in such a manner that the employees to whom it applies either knew, or ought to have known, of its existence.

On that point the judgment handed down by Hedigan J inMcCarthy v HSE[2010] 21 ELR 165 is instructive. In that case a public servant sought to challenge a decision of the HSE requiring her to retire at age 65. The HSE, in common with all public sector employments, maintained an employment policy requiring employees to retire at age 65, in line with certain statutory provisions. Ms McCarthy claimed that the policy did not apply to her because she had never been informed that she would be required to retire at that age and no such term was included in her contract of employment.

It is noteworthy that rather than relying on the existence of the policy,per se,the approach taken by the Court was to consider if the employer's policy on retirement took effect as an implied term in the applicant's contract of employment. Having reviewed the evidence and the submissions made by the parties Hedigan J said: -

- "In addressing the substantive issues raised, the crux of the application lies in whether the retirement age of 65 could be viewed as having been implied into the contract as submitted by the respondent. Two alternative approaches were suggested utilising the "officious bystander test" on the one hand and implication by custom on the other. It is my opinion that in the circumstances of the case, the former provides a more suitable formula to determine whether such a term has been implied, although there is necessarily a large degree of overlap. The court is of the opinion that such a term should indeed be implied into the applicant's conditions of employment. The applicant is a highly intelligent woman who is legally qualified. It is difficult to accept that she had no knowledge of the retirement age applicable in that part of the public service in which she worked. Furthermore, irrespective of any actual knowledge of this fact, I would consider the dicta of Maguire P. in O'Reilly that anyone concerned "should have known of it or could easily have become aware of it" to be particularly apt in this case. Moreover in addition to the broad awareness of the retirement age among most working adults, the applicant may be deemed as "on notice" that there was an applicable retirement age by virtue of the superannuation scheme. The superannuation scheme, of which she was a member, made reference to the existence of a retirement age, and more specifically, a cut-off for contributions at age 65. I therefore find that such a term can be implied into the terms and conditions of employment."

The existence of a contractual term stipulating a retirement age was also a central consideration in the earlier case ofCalor Teoranta v McCarthy, [2009] IEHC 139. That case involved an appeal to the High Court from a decision of this Court in which the age at which Mr McCarthy was required to retire was in issue. The Respondent employer had an established and, it claimed, an agreed policy of requiring employees to retire at age 60. Pursuant to that policy, Mr McCarthy was required to retire on reaching that age. Mr McCarthy claimed that pursuant to an agreement that he entered into with the Respondent his retirement age was fixed at 65.

In giving judgement Mr Justice Clarke focused on Mr McCarthy's'agreed'or'contractual'retirement age rather than on the policy in pursuance of which his employer required him to retire.

At paragraph 5.2 of the judgment Clarke J. observed: -

- "I did not understand counsel for Calor to disagree that, at the level of principle, it would amount to discrimination on the grounds of age to terminate someone's employment because the person concerned had reached an age which was short of that person's agreed retirement age."

The Judge then continued, at paragraph 5.4 of the judgment: -

- ".....the Labour Court considered that there were serious questions concerning the proper interpretation of s.34(4) of the Act having regard to the jurisprudence of the ECJ. It is clear that the Labour Court would have given very serious consideration to making a reference to the ECJ if it had come to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that Mr McCarthy's retirement age was 60 rather than 65. In that eventuality there would have been no doubt but that Mr McCarthy had been required to retire at his contractual retirement age. The question which then would have arisen is as to whether s.34(4), properly interpreted in the light of the Directive which it seeks to implement in Irish law, provides, in all cases, an immunity in respect of a discrimination claim where someone retires at a contractual retirement age. However, because the Labour Court came to the view that, as a matter of fact, Mr McCarthy's retirement age was 65, the Labour Court did not consider it necessary to deal with s.34(4) on the basis that Mr McCarthy had not, in its view, therefore, been required to retire at his contractual retirement age".

The decision in that case and that inMcCarthy v HSEindicate that in cases such as this the Court should look to the employee's contract or conditions of employment in order to ascertain his or her agreed or contractual retirement age.

It is accepted that the Complainant's contract of employment did not contain any express term as to retirement. That was in part explained by the fact that his employment was intended to be for a fixed-term and so the stipulation of a retirement age was unnecessary. However, the Respondent relies on the staff handbook as containing the stipulation as to retirement.

The terms of a staff handbook can attain contractual status in a number of ways. The individual contract of employment may refer to the handbook thus incorporating its terms into the contract. A term as to retirement may also be implied in the contract by application of the so called officious bystander test enunciated inShirlaw v Southern Foundaries Ltd[1939] 2 K.B. 206. Here the test was set out in the following terms: -

- "Prima facie that which in any contract is left to be implied and need not be expressed is something so obvious that it goes without saying that if, while the parties were making the bargain, an officious bystander were to suggest some express provision for it in the agreement they would testily suppress him with a comment 'Oh of course'."

A term can also be implied in the alternative, and somewhat overlapping, 'custom and practice' test adopted in this jurisdiction by Maguire P in

O'Reilly v Irish Press[1937] 71 I.L.T.R 194. Here it was held that the practice must be: -

- "...so notorious, well-known and acquiesced in that in the absence of agreement in writing it is to be taken as one of the terms of the contract between the parties...it is necessary in order to establish a custom of the kind claimed that it be shown that it was so generally known that anyone concerned should have known of it or easily become aware of it."

It seems to the Court that this custom and practice test can appropriately be applied in considering if the policy of an employer took effect as a contractual term or a condition of employment.

The terms of a pension scheme may also be relied upon as either implying a term as to retirement or by incorporating the terms of the scheme into the contract.

A crucial consideration in addressing the question of incorporation or implication is whether the employee knew, or ought to have known, of the term contended for.

Findings on the evidence

The Court was told that the applicable pension scheme in this case provided that an employee may retire at any age between the age of 60 and 75. That did not preclude the employer from fixing a retirement age within that range. It is the Respondent's case that it did fix a retirement age of 65 when the handbook was produced.

The contract of employment that the Complainant entered into in 2007 did not refer to the handbook. Likewise, the draft contract proffered to the Complainant in 2010 contained no such reference. In these circumstances the terms of the handbook were not formally incorporated as a condition of his employment. That, however, does not dispose of the question of whether a retirement age of 65 (or 66) should properly be implied as a condition of the employment by reason of the Complainant's actual or constructive knowledge of the term.

The Complainant told the Court in his evidence that he was unaware of any purported retirement age until he received notice that his employment was to end. He further gave evidence that he never had sight of the handbook until it was shown to him in the course of the proceedings before the Equality Tribunal. Mr O'Domhnaill was unable to say if or when the Complainant was provided with a copy of the handbook. His evidence was that copies of the handbook had been left in the staff canteen in Donegal but that a copy may not have been sent to the Wexford offices in which the Complainant was based. Mr O'Domhnaill felt that the Complainant should have been aware of the existence of the handbook and the retirement age that it specified through his attendance at Board meetings. But this contention is undermined by the evidence of Mr Jacob.

Mr Jacob served as chairman of the Respondent from 1990 to 2014 and he was quite clear in his evidence that neither the handbook nor the fixing of a retirement age was discussed by the board or referred to in papers or reports given to the Board.

In these circumstances the Court accepts the Complainant's evidence that he neither has sight of, nor knew of the handbook until it was produced at the hearing before the Equality Tribunal.

The Court has also considered the submissions to the effect that the draft contract proffered to the Complainant in 2010 impliedly stipulated a retirement age by limiting the proposed tenure of the Complainant to a period of 18 months commencing on 30thMarch 2009. This draft contract would have brought the Complainant's employment to an end on 29thSeptember 2010. He attained the age of 65 on 8thSeptember 2010. This proposed term could not be interpreted as implying that the Complainant's tenure was fixed to age 65. Moreover, that document appears to the Court to have been carefully drafted and the absence of any reference to the company handbook, or to any policy on a retirement age, seems remarkable if it was intended that either would have contractual effect.

Finally, the Court has considered the submissions advanced on behalf of the Respondent concerning the existence and effect of a policy on retirement. On that point, no authority was opened to the Court for the proposition that the mere existence of a policy, in and of itself, could attract an immunity against liability for a unilateral termination of employment on grounds of age. All of the authorities opened to the Court relate to cases in which a retirement age was fixed, either by national law, a collective agreement or by the individual contract of employment.

As previously observed, the Court accepts, in principle, that a policy on retirement can take effect as a contractual term if it is promulgated in such a manner that those to whom it applies either knew, or ought to have known, of its existence. In so far as the policy was promulgated through the handbook, for reasons already stated, the Court does not accept that the terms of the handbook were incorporated in the Complainant's contract of employment or that they became an implied term in his contract.

Nevertheless, the decision inMcCarthy v HSEindicates that an employer's retirement policy could be implied into a contract of employment by application of either the 'custom and practice test' or the 'officious bystander test', referred to earlier. The Court is satisfied on the evidence that the existence of such a policy was not so well known and acquiesced in as to attract a contractual status by application of either test.

In reaching that conclusion the Court has considered the submissions made on behalf of the Respondent to the effect that a retirement age of 65 or 66 has consistently applied since the adoption of the retirement policy in 2006. The information upon which those submissions are based has been tabulated earlier in this Determination. Two points of significance arise from an examination of this information. Firstly, all but one of the employees referred to ceased to be employed after the Complainant's employment came to an end and after the within proceedings were initiated on 7th October 2011. That person, it should be noted, ceased to be employed not at age 65 or 66 but at age 62. Secondly, none of the employees referred to ceased to be employed on either their 65th or 66th birthday, as would usually be the case where the tenure of employed is fixed by reference to a retirement age.

The Complainant did not know of any retirement policy pursued by the Respondent. Nor did Mr Jim Lett, who was Chief Executive of the Respondent until 2007, after the putative adoption of the policy in 2006, know of its existence. Significantly, Mr Jacob, who was Chairman of the Respondent at all times material to this claim, was also unaware of the existence of such a policy. Moreover, no evidence was proffered from any former or current employee of the Respondent concerning the degree of knowledge amongst the workforce of either the existence or import of a retirement policy independently of what was contained in the handbook.

Outcome

Retirement

Having regard to the totality of the evidence adduced the Court cannot accept that the Complainant had actual or constructive knowledge of either the handbook or of a fixed retirement age of either 65 or 66. The Respondent had ample opportunity to inform the Complainant of a requirement that he retire at age 65 or 66 over the currency of his employment. No evidence was adduced of the Complainant having been so informed or having been provided with any document from which such a requirement could have been discerned. There was no express term in his conditions of employment requiring him to retire at either age and, in the Court's opinion, no such term can be regarded as having been implied or incorporated on any of the accepted tests.

In these circumstances the Court must hold that the Respondent had not fixed a retirement age in respect of the Complainant and that he was dismissed because of his age. In these circumstances s.34(4) of the Act cannot avail the Respondent.

Three day week

In the course of the hearing of this appeal no evidence was adduced concerning the circumstances in which the Complainant's working week was reduced to three days per week. The documentary evidence provided to the Court indicates that the reason given for that decision was the trading and financial circumstances in which the Respondent found itself at that time. Since there is nothing to indicate that this was not the real reason for the decision the Court is unable to find that this constituted discrimination on grounds of age.

Redress.

The Court has considered the adequacy of the redress awarded by the Equality Tribunal. It is clear from the evidence that the Complainant was originally employed by the Respondent on foot of the agreement leading to the restructuring of the business in 2007. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that the parties envisaged or intended that the Complainant would remain in employment for as long as he wished.

Having considered all of the surrounding circumstances the Court has come to the conclusion, as a matter of probability, that at the time the Complainant's employment terminated, the Respondent was entitled to conclude that the requirement for the position that he occupied had ceased or diminished having regard to the prevailing economic and commercial circumstances of the business. It is also accepted that he was not directly replaced. In these circumstances, had the Respondent not mistakenly believed that the Complainant could be compulsorily retired he would, as a matter of probability, have been dismissed on grounds of redundancy at or around that time. The Complainant appeared to have implicitly accepted the reality of that situation in that the thrust of his representations to the Respondent were directed at obtaining an ex grata redundancy payment. In these circumstances his potential loss arising from his dismissal must be regarded as significantly reduced.

Furthermore, the Court has differed from the decision of the Equality Tribunal in finding that the Complainant did not suffer discrimination in being placed on a three day week

The Court has concluded that an award of compensation for the effect of the discrimination found to have occurred in the amount of €24,000 is fair and equitable in the circumstances of this case. This award is not in the nature of remuneration.

Disposal

In light of its decision on the facts of the case it is unnecessary for the Court to address the legal submissions made by the parties on the compatibility of s.34(4) of the Act with the provisions of the Directive.

The Complainant's appeal is disallowed and the Respondent's cross appeal is allowed in part. The decision of the Equality Tribunal is amended in the terms of this Determination.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of Rights Commissioner's decision WT5921/01/MR

BACKGROUND:

2. The worker claims that he did not receive any holiday/public holiday pay while employed by the Company. The Company states that the claimant was paid holiday pay and public holiday pay under revised contracts of employment which applied from 1st January, 2001.

The worker referred a claim to the Rights Commissioner service on the 6th September, 2001. The worker states that the reason he did not make a claim within the 6 months as specified in Section 27 (4) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997, (the Act) was that he was waiting the results of a test case taken by a fellow employee.

The Rights Commissioner's Decision issued on the 31st December, 2002 as follows:

"In accordance with Section 27 of the Act, I hereby declare that this complaint is out of time."

The worker appealed the Rights Commissioner's Decision on the 28th January, 2003, in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. The Company's case is that the worker's claim is out of time. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 22nd April, 2003. The following is the Court's Determination:

DETERMINATION:

Facts.

In this case the respondent made no defence to the claim other than to contend that the complaint was presented out of time.

The factual background to this case, as admitted or as found by the Court, is as follows:

The claimant in this case was employed by the respondent from 1st November 1998 until 21st May 2000. In common with other employees of the respondent he was initially employed on a contract of employment which purported to incorporate an element into his basic pay to cover payment in respect of annual leave and public holidays. On or about January 2000 an employee of the respondent, Mr Martin Treacy, referred a complaint to a Rights Commissioner, pursuant to section 27 of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 (the Act), in which he sought to challenge the validity of these arrangements.

By a decision dated 14th April 2000 the Rights Commissioner held with the claimant in that case and directed that he be paid in respect of the relevant periods of annual leave and public holidays. The respondent appealed that decision to the Court. By Determination DWT017, issued on 31st January 2001, the Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the decision of the Rights Commissioner. In that Determination the Court held, inter alia, that the impugned contractual term was rendered void by the combined effect of section 37 of the Act and Article 7(2) of Directive 93/104/EC on the Organisation of Working Time.

In April 2001 the respondent issued amended contracts of employment to its employees which conformed to the requirements of the Act in respect to holiday entitlements. However, the amended terms were expressly limited in their application to the period from the 1st January 2001 onwards. The contract did provide that the leave year for the purpose of granting leave would be the period specified in section 2(1) of the Act, namely, a period commencing on 1st April in any year and terminating on 31st March in the following year. At that time the claimant had ceased to be employed by the respondent and was unaffected by this change.

The claimant's employment with the respondent had terminated on 21st May 2000. On 6th September 2001, he presented a complaint to a Rights Commissioner pursuant to section 27 of the Act claiming redress in respect of alleged infringements of his statutory rights in relation to annual leave and public holidays. The complaint was heard by the Rights Commissioner on 1st August 2002.

The Scope of the Complaint.

The complaint herein relates to alleged continuing contraventions of the Act extending over the entire duration of the claimant's employment with the respondent. It was clearly presented outside the time limit prescribed by section 27(4) of the Act and the Rights Commissioner so held in his decision issued on 31st December 2002. Further, the Rights Commissioner declined to apply the extended time limit permitted by section 27(5) and so declined to entertain the complaint. Consequently in this appeal the first issue to be decided is whether the benefit of section 27(5) can be afforded to the claimant so as to give the Court jurisdiction to adjudicate on his complaint.

Section 27(5) of the Act provides as follows: -

- "Notwithstanding subsection (4) a Rights Commissioner may entertain a complaint under this section presented to him or her after the expiration of the period referred to in subsection (4) (but not later than 12 months of such expiration) if he or she is satisfied that the failure to present the complaint within that period was due to reasonable cause".

It is noted that the standard required by this subsection is that of "reasonable cause". This may be contrasted with the much higher standard of "exceptional circumstances preventing the making of the claim" which is provided for in other employment related statutes. The Act gives no guidance as to the type of circumstances that can constitute reasonable cause and it would appear to be a matter of fact to be decided by the Rights Commissioner (and by extension the Court on appeal) in each individual case.

It is the Court's view that in considering if reasonable cause exists, it is for the claimant to show that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford an excuse for the delay. The explanation must be reasonable, that is to say it must make sense, be agreeable to reason and not be irrational or absurd. In the context in which the expression reasonable cause appears in the statute it suggests an objective standard, but it must be applied to the facts and circumstances known to the claimant at the material time. The claimant's failure to present the claimwithin the six-month time limit must have been due to the reasonable cause relied upon.Hence there must be a causal link between the circumstances cited and the delay and the claimant should satisfy the Court, as a matter of probability, that had those circumstances not been present he or she would have initiated the claim in time.

The length of the delay should be taken into account. A short delay may require only a slight explanation whereas a long delay may require more cogent reasons. Where reasonable cause is shown the Court must still consider if it is appropriate in the circumstances to exercise its discretion in favour of granting an extension of time. Here the Court should consider if the respondent has suffered prejudice by the delay and should also consider if the claimant has a good arguable case.

Has the Claimant shown Reasonable Cause?

The claimant told the Court that the question of holiday entitlements became a live issue amongst the respondent's workforce after the decision of the Rights Commissioner in Mr Treacy's case. The claimant became aware that other employees had discussed the matter with Mr Steve Barber and Mr Mark Sanky (both of whom are managers with the respondent) and had been advised that Mr Treacy's case was a test case and that when this was finally determined the outcome would be applied to all employees.

The respondent denied that they regarded Mr Treacy's case as a test case or that the claimant had been told that his holiday entitlements would be determined by its outcome. Mr Barber did give evidence to the Court in which he said that he believed that the outcome of the Treacy case would affect other employees and that he may have so indicated to the claimant. He did emphasise that this was a personal view and that he was not authorised by the company to give any such assurances to employees nor did he purport to do so. Mr Sanky did not give evidence.

The company accepted that it was not prejudiced in its defence by the delay in the presentation of the claim.

Conclusions of the Court.

The Court is satisfied that when Mr Treacy succeeded in his claim before the Rights Commissioner, his colleagues, including the claimant, would have pursued similar claims had they not been deflected from so doing by the belief that the final outcome of that case would be of general application.

All parties viewed Mr Treacy's case as a test case in the sense that it would decide whether the respondent could fulfil its statutory obligations under the Act by incorporating an element in basic pay to cover holidays. The Court is satisfied that this view was held by some members of management and was conveyed to the workforce including the claimant.

Whilst the appeal in Mr Treacy's case was pending, it was perfectly reasonable for the claimant to suppose that the respondent would comply with the law when its import was finally decided. Thereafter, there was confusion amongst employees, including the claimant, as to whether or not it was necessary for them to make individual claims under the Act or whether a number of cases then in progress would decided the matter.

Finally, the Court notes that the claimant did not have the benefit of independent professional advice in relation to his rights or on the procedures for the making of complaints under the Act.

In all the circumstance of the case the Court is satisfied that in respect of those contraventions of the Act which occurred up to 12 months after the expiry of the time limit at section 27(4), reasonable cause has been shown for the claimants failure to present the complaint within that time limit. The Court is further satisfied that the respondent has not suffered any prejudice by reason of that delay and that the claimant has a good arguable case which ought be heard.

The Court therefore determined to entertain all complaints appertaining to contraventions of the Act alleged to have occurred on or after 7th March 2000 (hereafter the relevant period).

The Claimant's Holiday Record.

The respondent' records show that the claimant took annual leave and public holidays as follows:

Leave year 2000 – 2001.

The relevant period in this leave year is from 1st April 2000 to 21th May 2000. He was entitled to 2.8 days annual leave in this period. He received 2 days holidays in week commencing 7th March 2001 for which he was not paid. There were 2 Public Holidays in the period on which he worked and received double time.

The claimant is entitled to redress in respect of the loss of cesser pay for 0.8 days and non payment for 2 days

The leave year 1999 to 2000 ended on 31st march 2000. Hence any contravention of the Act arising from the respondents failure to provide the claimant with the requisite leave in respect of that leave year accrued within the relevant period. However, in so far as the complaint relates to the respondents failure to pay the claimant in respect of annual leave or public holidays actually taken on dates prior to the relevant period, it is statute bared and, to that extent it is not cognisable by the Court.

It appears that the claimant received a total of 3 annual holidays during this leave year They were taken in April 1999, and December 1999. The claimant was not paid for this leave but his claim in respect of it accrued outside the relevant period and cannot be taken into account. However, at the close of the leave year he was due 17 days holidays and this can be taken into account for the purpose of providing redress.

Determination

It is clear from the foregoing, that the claimant did not receive his full entitlements in respect of both annual leave and Public Holidays throughout the relevant period. His complaint is, therefore, well founded. Accordingly the decision of the Rights Commissioner is set aside and the appeal herein is allowed.

Redress

Where a claimant has not received his or her statutory period of leave a claim cannot be made nor can an award be formulated as being for payment in lieu of holidays. Article 7 of the Working Time Directive expressly prohibits the payment of an allowance in lieu of annual leave except where the employment relationship has ended. In such cases the proper award should be in the form of compensation for loss of annual leave. Such an award need not be limited to the value of the lost holidays.

The obligation to provide annual leave is imposed for health and safety reasons and the right to leave has been characterised as a fundamental social right in European Law (see comments of Advocate General Tizzano inR v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, ex parte Broadcasting, Entertainment Cinematography and Theatre Union [2001] IRLR 559which were quoted with approval by Lavin J in the Royal Liver case). InVon Colson & Kamann v Land Nordrhein – Westfalen [1984] ECR 1891the ECJ has made it clear that where such a right is infringed the judicial redress provided should not only compensate for economic loss sustained but must provide a real deterrent against future infractions.

In this case the Court is satisfied that the appropriate form of redress is an award of compensation. In considering the element of its award to cover the economic loss suffered by the claimant, the Court has had regard to the rate of pay applicable to the claimant at the material time and the average bonus calculated in accordance with Regulation 3(3)(a) of the Organisation of Working Time (Determination of Pay for Holidays) Regulations SI No. 475 of 1997.

Having regard to all relevant considerations the Court measures the quantum which is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances at €1,600 and directs the respondent to pay to the claimant compensation in that amount.

TRANSDEV LIGHT RAIL LIMITED (REPRESENTED BY BYRNEWALLACE) - AND - MICHAEL CHRZANOWSKI

(REPRESENTED BY SERVICES INDUSTRIAL PROFESSIONAL TECHNICAL UNION)

DIVISION : Chairman: Ms Jenkinson Employer Member: Mr Marie Worker Member: Mr McCarthy

SUBJECT: 1. Appeal of Adjudication Officer's Decision No: DEC-E2016-070BACKGROUND: 2. The appellant appealed the Decision of the Adjudication Officer to the Labour Court on 27 May 2016. A Labour Court hearing took place on 17 November 2016. The following is the Court's Determination:DETERMINATION:This is an appeal by Mr Michael Chrzanowski (the Complainant) against the decision of an Adjudication Officer/Equality Officer under the Employment Equality Acts 1998 – 2011. The Complainant complained that he was subjected to discriminatory treatment on the age ground in terms of Section 6(2)(f) of the Acts and contrary to Section 8 of the Acts when Transdev Dublin Light Rail Limited (the Respondent) imposed a mandatory retirement age of 65 years. Further claims referred under the Act relating to (i) discriminated in relation to getting a job and (ii) dismissal for opposing discrimination on the ground of age were not pursued. This was confirmed by the Complainant's representative at the hearing of the appeal.The Adjudication Officer/Equality Officer held that the Complainant had established a*prima facie*case of discrimination on the ground of age, however, he also found that the Respondent had rebutted that presumption. Therefore, he held that the Complainant's complaint failed.The complaint was referred to the Director of the Equality Tribunal on 22ndOctober 2014.*Background*The Complainant was employed as a tram driver from 6thMarch 2007 until the termination of his employment on 3rdOctober 2014, on his 65thbirthday. He claimed that by retiring him at age 65 he was subjected to discriminatory treatment by the Respondent. He submitted that there was no retirement age in his written contract of employment.*Summary of the Complainant's Case*Mr Paul Henry, SIPTU on behalf of the Complainant, submitted that the decision to retire the Complainant in circumstances where the decision was influenced by his age, constitutes direct discrimination on the grounds of age, as found in*DominicaPetersen v Berufungsausschuss fur Zahnarzte fur den Berzik Westfalen-Lippe*Case C-341/08 [2010] ECR 1-00047.Mr Henry further relies on Directive 2000/78/EC Establishing a General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Education (hereafter the Directive) in contending that the use of age as a criterion for less favourable treatment in employment constitutes unlawful discrimination. He submitted that national law, and in particular the Act, must be interpreted and applied in harmony with the Directive. He disputes the Respondent's contention that the Respondent has obligations under the Railway Safety Act 2005 which require it to retire a worker at age 65. The 2005 Act requires the Respondent to ensure that safety critical workers must undergo an assessment by a medical practitioner to determine their fitness to perform safety critical tasks but does not stipulate that they must retire at 65 years.Mr Henry said that the Complainant had a legitimate expectation that he would be allowed continue to work past his 65thbirthday, as there was no mention in the contract of employment that he would have to retire at 65 years and furthermore, there were precedents in the Company for workers to be retained. He referred to the fact that two persons were retained in employment by the Respondent beyond age 65 years. Therefore, he submitted that the Respondent had exercised discretion in their case and in its engagement with the Respondent sought similar treatment for the Complainant. Mr Henry submitted that in both cases the workers concerned were "safety critical workers".Mr Henry disputes the Respondent's contention that health and safety concerns prevented the Complainant from being retained. The Complainant had a very good attendance record, he requested a fixed term contract for a maximum of two years and he was willing to be medically assessed on an ongoing basis.Mr Henry also questioned the Respondent's assertion that it was appropriate and necessary to have a retirement age in order to promote good workforce planning and to allow access to employment by means of better distribution of work between generations of workers. He disputes the Respondent's reliance on information furnished to the Court which outlines that in January 2014, in planning for retirement and long term absences, the Respondent sought permission to recruit four new tram drivers commencing 24thFebruary 2014. Mr Henry questioned how the Complainant's request to be retained, could impact on the Respondent's workforce planning, where he was only one of three workers facing retirement who was making such a request.The Complainant raised the issue of the Complainant's request to be retained with management, on a number of occasions prior to his 65thbirthday, however, Mr Henry contended that the Respondent gave no serious consideration to proposals made by the Complainant in this regard.In support of its contention that the Respondent's objective grounds for having a retirement age were not genuine, the Union cited a number of authorities where it was held that there were no objective grounds to substantiate an employer having a retirement age. Mr Henry cited*Sweeney v Aer Lingus Teo*DEC-E2013-135 where an Equality Officer found that the Respondent had failed to rebut the presumption of age discrimination. Mr Henry submitted that this case was of particular relevance as in that case the Respondent had failed to include details of a retirement age in the complainant's contract of employment and moreover, it held that entitlement to a pension does not of itself necessitate retirement.Mr Henry relied upon the CIE companies, Iarnrod Eireann and Dublin Bus, as comparators. He said that a direct comparison can be drawn with a train driver in Iarnrod Eireann who is allowed to work to age 66 years. This increase from 65 to 66 years was provided for in*C*ras Iompair Éireann Pension Scheme for Regular Wages Staff (Amendment) Scheme (Confirmation) Order*2016, S.I. No. 63 of 2016.*Summary of the Respondent's Position*Mr Loughlin Deegan, Solicitor, Byrne Wallace Solicitors, on behalf of the Respondent stated that 65 is the established retirement age for all employees in the Company. This practice has been consistently applied and is an implied term in the Complainant's contract of employment, as reflected in the Respondent's pension scheme, of which he is a member. It has been expressly contained in all tram drivers' contract of employment since 2007. The Complainant has been a member of the Veolia Transport Limited Retirement Solution Plan since 25thApril 2012. This specifically states *"your normal retirement age (NRA) is 65 years".*Mr Deegan relied upon Section 34(4) of the Act, which*prima facie,*allows a Respondent to fix a retirement age without contravening the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age.The Directive imposes an obligation to provide that, where an employer fixes a retirement age in respect of any particular class of employee, any employer who fixes such a retirement age must be able to objectively justify that retirement age.He submitted that the validity of Section 34(4) of the Acts had been upheld in numerous national domestic and European cases, he cited the CJEU case*Palacios de la Villa v Cortefiel Servicios SA,*Case C-411/05.In assessing the question of whether the retirement age that was examined in*Palacios de la Villa*constituted an appropriate and necessary means of achieving the legitimate objective being pursued, the CJEU said the following:-

- 'It does not appear unreasonable for the authorities of a Member State to take the view that a measure such as that atissue in the main proceedings may be appropriate and necessary in order toachievealegitimate aim in the context of national employment policy, consisting in the promotion of full employment by facilitating access to the labour market.Furthermore,the measure cannot be regarded as unduly prejudicing the legitimate claims of workers subjecttocompulsory retirement because they have reached the age-limit provided for; the relevant legislation is not based only on a specific age, but also takes account of the fact that the persons concerned are entitled to financial compensation by way of a retirement pension at the end of their working life,such as that provided for by the national legislation atissue in the main proceedings,the level of which cannot be regarded as unreasonable.'

Mr Deegan cited the case *Wolfv Stadt Frankfurt am Main (Case-229/2008),*wherethe CJEU determined that a maximum recruitment age for fire services personnel was not precluded by the Directive. The CJEU determined that *"the fire-fighting and rescue duties which are part of the intermediate career in the fire service can only be performed by younger officials'*and therefore comparative youth was a genuine occupationalrequirement. The maximum recruitment age could therefore be justified by reference to Article (4). Mr Deegan said that the CJEU did not address Article 2(5), notwithstanding that a justification on health and safety grounds might also have been available.In*Saundersv CHC Ireland Ltd DEC-E2011-142*the Equality Officerreferred to the *Wolf*decisionin reaching a decision that a retirement age of 55 that applied to a category of emergency services personnel (helicopter winchmen) was justified by reference to Article 4(1) of the Directive.Mr Deegan contended that the retirement age in question is objectively justified by legitimate aims within the meaning of Article 6(1) of the Directive. He cited a number of authorities in support of his contention. He said that the agefacilitates good workforce planning and equitable distribution of employment opportunities between generations. Furthermore, he submitted that as provided for underArticle 2(5) there is a 'a genuine and determining occupational requirement' for a tram driver to be young enough to carry out his or her role safely and therefore the retirement ageis permitted by reference to Article 4(1).Mr Deegan outlined for the Court details of available medical evidence which evidence indicates that the age of 65 is an appropriate age to have set as a retirement age for tram drivers and is also the age at which benefits are available under the occupational pension established by the Respondent. He said that the evidence suggests thatadvancing age of tram drivers can give rise to health and safety concerns and suggests that there is a concern that the ability to safely operate a tram may diminish with advancing age. This medical opinion is reflected in the frequency of health surveillance examinations which tram drivers undergo. These are medical examinations that include the completion of a medical questionnaire by the employee; a full physical examination by, vision/hearing exam, urine test for drugs and alcohol, a cardiac screen (resting and/or exercise ECG) and a lung function (spirometry) examination.

- Tram drivers who are under the age of 50 are required to undergo this examination not less than every five years.
- Tram drivers who are aged 50 and over but who are not yet 60 are required to undergo this examination not less than every three years.
- Tram drivers who are under the age of 65 are required to undergo this examination not less than every two years.

Part of the way in which the Respondent protects the health and safety of its employees, passengers and other members of the public is by ensuring that safety critical workers (including tram drivers) are fully capable of carrying out their functions. This is achieved by a range of measures, including (but not limited to):

- (a) appropriate pre-employment medical screening;(b) periodic medical examination of safety critical workers;(c) compliance with the*Safety Health and Welfare at Work Act 2005;*(d) compliance with the*Railway Safety Act 2005;*(e) performing regular checks, such as unannounced drug and alcohol screening.

The average number of days lost to illness (including injury) by tram drivers over the age of 60 is 5.5 times higher than the average number of days lost to illness by tram drivers under the age of 50.Mr Deegan stated that the Respondent does not have a custom and practice which permits tram drivers to remain as employees after age 65. He told the Court that on one occasion a tram driver, Mr B, was permitted to remain in employment after reaching the age of 65. In that case, Mr B was retained on a one year fixed term contract after his due date of retirement. However, within a few months he suffered a heart attack and retired. A second person employed as a Revenue Protection Officer, was allowed to remain in employment after age 65 however, he was not a tram driver. Mr Deegan informed the Court that Revenue Protection Officers had been categorised as a "safety related role" within the Respondent's Safety Management System (SMS) which was audited and certified by the Railway Safety Commission.Mr Deegan stated that the High Court in*Donnellan v Minister for Justice Equality and Law Reform and others [2008] IEHC*467 set out guidance for determining how an objective justification advanced in respect of a retirement age is to be assessed. The Court summarised the applicable law by saying that the aim pursued by the person setting the retirement age must be rational and legitimate and the measure used in pursuit of that aim (i.e. the retirement age and the manner in which it is applied) must be a proportionate (i.e. appropriate and necessary) means of pursuing that aim.The Respondent submitted that it is able to objectively justify the retirement age that it has fixed in respect of tram drivers on grounds identified at Article 2(5) and 4(1) of the Directive.The aims pursued by the Respondent for the retirement age of 65 years are as follows:-

- i.Tram drivers are 'safety critical workers' within the meaning of the*Railway Safety Act 2005*.Because of the nature of their work, it is very important that they are in a position to perform their roles safely, to ensure the protection of the health and safety of tram drivers, passengers and members of the public.ii.It promotes better access to employment by means of better distribution of work between the generations; it allows for efficient workforce planning; new drivers were recruited in anticipation of the retirement of the Complainant and others.iii.Medical opinion suggests that advancing age gives rise to health and safety concerns; it suggests that the ability to safely operate a tram may diminish with advancing age.

  Mr Deegan disputed the point raised by the Union that CIE was an "associated employer" of CIE and accordingly could be cited as a comparator for the purposes of the Act. Section 2(2) of the Act provides as follows:-

  - "(2) For the purposes of this Act, two employers shall be taken to be associated if one is a body corporate of which the other (whether directly or indirectly) has control or if both are bodies corporate of which a third person (whether directly or indirectly) has control."

  Mr Deegan confirmed that :-

  - (a) The Respondent does not control CIE.(b) CIE does not control the Respondent.(c) The Respondent and CIE are not (directly or indirectly) controlled by any third person.

*The Law Applicable.*Section 6(1) of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 and 2004 (the Act) provides, in relevant part, as follows: -

- "(1) For the purposes of this Act and without prejudice to its provisions relating to discrimination occurring in particular circumstances discrimination shall be taken to occur where—
  - (a) a person is treated less favourably than another person is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation on any of the grounds specified in subsection (2) (in this Act referred to as the 'discriminatory grounds')which—(i) exists,(ii) existed but no longer exists,(iii) may exist in the future, or(iv) is imputed to the person concerned,

Section 34(4) of the Act provides for certain savings and exceptions relating to the family, age and disability grounds. Subsection (4) of that Section provides: -

- (4) Without prejudice to subsection (3), it shall not constitute discrimination on the age ground to fix different ages for the retirement (whether voluntarily or compulsorily) of employees or any class or description of employees.

Subsection (3) deals with occupational benefit schemes and is of no relevance to the issues arising in this case.The Act gave effect in domestic law to Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (the Directive). Recital 14, 25 and Articles 2 (5), 4(1) and 6 (1) of the Directive are of particular relevance to the instant case.Recital 14 provides: -

- "This Directive shall be without prejudice to national provisions laying down retirement ages."

Recital 25 provides: -

- The prohibition of age discrimination is an essential part of meeting the aims set out in the Employment Guidelines and encouraging diversity in the workforce. However, differences in treatment in connection with age may be justified under certain circumstances and therefore require specific provisions which may vary in accordance with the situation in Member States. It is therefore essential to distinguish between differences in treatment which are justified, in particular by legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and discrimination which must be prohibited.

Article 4(1) of the Directive provides as follows

- 'Notwithstanding Article 2(1)and 2(2),Member States may provide that a difference in treatment which is based on a characteristic referred to in Article 1 shall not constitute discrimination where, by nature of the particular occupational activities concerned or of the context in which they are carried out, such acharacteristic constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement, provided that the objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate.'

Article 6 (1) of the Directive provides: -

- Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that differences of treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination, if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary.

Issues for Consideration by the Court

- Existence of a contractual retirement age

Section 34(4) of the Act,*prima facie,*allowed the Respondent to fix a retirement age without contravening the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age. The jurisprudence of the CJEU on the circumstances in which compulsory retirement is saved by Article 6 of the Directive is relevant only if the Court finds that a retirement age was in fact fixed by the Respondent and that the retirement age applied to the Complainant.

It is accepted that the Complainant's contract of employment did not contain any express term as to retirement. The Respondent told the Court that at the commencement of its operations in 2003, contracts of employment issued to workers did not contain details of a retirement age, although it did operate a pension scheme which specified such an age. The terms of which scheme had been collectively agreed with the recognised trade union for employees of the Respondent. Furthermore, the Respondent said that from 2007 all contracts of employment contained such details.In*Earagail Eisc Teoranta v Richard Lett*EDA1513 the Court held that as a matter of general principle, a termination of employment by way of retirement should be distinguished from a dismissal on grounds of age. A retirement occurs where the employment comes to an end pursuant to a condition of employment which limits an employee's tenure to the point at which they attain a specified age. It held that a term of employment regarding a retirement age, within the provision of Section 34 (4) of the Act, can be provided in an employee's conditions of employment either expressly or by implication.In the instant case, while the Complainant's contract of employment did not specify a retirement age, he was provided with and signed a copy of the collective agreement between the Respondent and the Union. This document provided details of the Group Pension, Life Assurance and Disability Scheme. The Complainant opted not to join the latter scheme until 2012, when he was provided with details which explicitly stated that the retirement age was 65.It is clear to the Court that from at least the date he joined the scheme, he was aware of the existence of the retirement age; he was furnished statements of his pension contributions on an annual basis which clearly specified the retirement age. Furthermore, the Complainant accepted that contributions into the pension scheme would cease on his 65thbirthday.In support of its contentions, the Union cited a number of authorities. Mr Henry cited*Sweeney v Aer Lingus Teo*DEC-E2013-135 where an Equality Officer found that the Respondent had failed to rebut the presumption of age discrimination. Mr Henry submitted that this case was of particular relevance as in that case the Respondent had failed to include details of a retirement age in the complainant's contract of employment. However, in that case the Equality Officer held:-

- "although her contract of service does not contain an express provision stating a retirement age, I find that 65 was the implied retirement age for all of the respondent's non-flying staff and that an appropriate provision can be inferred into the complainant's contract."

It seems to the Court that through custom and practice the policy of retirement age at 65 was established by the Respondent and that this was accepted by the Complainant. All workers who retired from the employment did so at age 65. Furthermore, the Respondent confirmed that all of the tram drivers who had retired at 65 (approx. 10) did so during the tenure of the Complainant's employment having previously worked in the same job category/grade as the Complainant. On a discretionary basis two workers were taken back on fixed term contracts. The first person to reach retirement age in the Company in 2010 sought to be retained in employment beyond his retirement age, he was a tram driver and on that occasion discretion was used by the Managing Director leading to a fixed term contract. Unfortunately that person suffered a heart attack within a few months. One other person, a retired Revenue Protection Officer, was also permitted to work beyond his retirement age, in this case the Respondent stated that an exception was made as he was not regarded by the Respondent as a safety critical employee protected by the Railway Safety Act. As that person was not employed as a tram driver and was not engaged in tram driving duties, the Court does not consider that person as comparable.Some months prior to his retirement, with the assistance of his Union, the Complainant sought to extend his employment post 65 years on a fixed term basis, as provided for by Section 6 (3) (c) of the Act. In this case the Respondent gave serious consideration to this request. It engaged in discussions with the Union regarding the possibility of a collective agreement to extend the normal retirement age for all employees, (including the Complainant and all other tram drivers). This exercise took into account the changes to the State Retirement Pension Benefit. The Respondent sought medical opinion on the implication of extending the age and explored the feasibility of extending its insurance-related benefits to employees older than 65 with its insurance brokers. They responded to say that some of the products currently provided to tram drivers would not be available to tram drivers who were over 65. Both the expert medical opinion and empirical evidence demonstrated that the ability to safely operate trams diminishes with advancing age. Based on the findings, the Respondent decided that the appropriate course of action was to maintain its retirement age of 65 and the Union's request was denied.In all the circumstances the Court is satisfied that the Respondent had a contractual retirement age in respect of the Complainant and that the Complainant knew or ought to have known of its existence. The Court sees no merit in the Complainant's argument that he had a legitimate expectation of working beyond age 65. Therefore, the Court finds that the Respondent can avail of Section 34(4) of the Act.

- Comparators

The Union cited CIE employees as relevant comparators for the purposes of this claim. Mr Henry cited *C[illegible]ras Iompair Éireann Pension Scheme for Regular Wages Staff (Amendment) Scheme (Confirmation) Order*2016, S.I. No. 63 of 2016 which amended the pre-existing 1957 pension scheme, inter alia, to provide an extension of the normal retirement age from 65 to 66, with effect from 1st April 2016.In the first instance the Court notes that this amendment took effect from 1st April 2016, whereas the claim before the Court relates to an alleged discriminatory act which took take on 3rd October 2014, therefore cannot be taken into consideration by the Court and secondly the Court is satisfied that CIE companies are not "associated employers" as defined by Section 2(2) of the Act and accordingly are not appropriate comparators for the purposes of the Act Therefore, the Court cannot accept the proposition that CIE is an appropriate comparator

Not therefore, the Court cannot accept this proposition that SIL is an appropriate comparator.

- Objective Justification

Section 34(4) purports to remove the imposition of a retirement age from the ambit of the Act. However, it is clear and settled law in light of theprinciples set out in the*Palacios de la Villa*case that the Court must apply the provisions of Article 6 of the Directive, and the Court accepts Mr Henry's submission in that regard. Consequently, according to the Union, a retirement age can only be saved from the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age where it is objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary. It was submitted that there was no evidence of such objective justification in this case.

In*Palacios de la Villa*the Court of Justice held that the retirement age in issue in the main proceedings was lawful where, in accordance with Article 6 of the Directive: -

- -[T]he measure, although based on age, is objectively and reasonably justified in the context of national law by a legitimate aim relating to employment policy and the labour market, and the means put in place to achieve that aim of public interest do not appear to be inappropriate and unnecessary for the purpose.

The Court notes that the terms of the pension scheme were arrived at through collective agreement with the Union and with two exceptions the retirement age has been consistently applied since the inception of the Company in 2003.

- - Health & Safety Concerns

Article 4(1) of the Directive permits difference of treatment where it is a genuine occupational requirement. The Court must examine whether the imposition of a retirement age on the Complainant who was a tram driver was justifiable as a genuine and determining occupational requirement under Article 4(1) of the Directive.The Respondent stated that the Complainant as a tram driver was a safety critical employee, governed by the Railway Safety Act 2005 and its retirement age policy has been set to take into account the safety related nature of its operations. To that effect it has sought medical opinion on two occasions, in 2010 and again in 2014, as to whether its retirement age of 65 was appropriate and based on the medical opinion and on its workforce planning requirements, it decided against extending the retirement age.The Respondent furnished the Court with aletter dated 2nd February 2015 from Dr John J McDermott, specialist in occupational medicines and medical advisor to the Respondent for more than 10 year. This letter suggests thatadvancing age of tram drivers can give rise to health and safety concerns. Dr McDermott suggests that there is a concern that the ability to safely operate a tram may diminish with advancing age. He says that these observations are supported both by medical opinion and by empirical evidence.Among otherthings,Dr McDermottadvised the Respondent of the following:-

- 'I believethe current age of 65 is appropriate in the context of this extremelyresponsible safety critical role where medical standards are quite exacting forobviousreasons.""It iscleartomethat our drivers are (understandably) accumulating medicalissuesastheyadvance in years and are longerin service and it becomes more challenging for them tomeet the required medical standards." age associated changes and visual perception are associated withconditionsthatincrease the risk of driving for older workers.There is atendency the vision field contract so that stimuli in the preferable[peripheral] vision may not be noticed (even though standard formal eye test may notrevealadefect)."somedrivers with long periods of service will have accumulated multiplemedicalissues (i.e.it is possible they would have failed their pre-employment medicalhadthese conditions existed at that time).Ithas proved challengingto managethesemedical conditions satisfactorily to allow them to continue in their roleswhile not compromising public safety.'

The Railway Safety Act 2005 provides a definition at Section 93 of a "safety critical task": -"Safety critical task means a task specified in paragraph (i), (ii), or (iii) when performed in the course of the operation of a railway undertaking.(a) in the course of a person's employment with the undertaking,(b) under a contract of services with the undertaking,

(c) in the course of a person's employment with a person who has a contract of services with the undertaking, or

(c) in the course of a person's employment with a person who has a contract of services with the undertaking, or

(d) voluntarily or otherwise, namely— (i) driving a train, or in any other way controlling or affecting the movement of a train, (ii) controlling, affecting or managing, the movement of persons on a train, on a platform, across a level crossing, or, the boarding of, or alighting from, a train of persons, or

(iii) working in a maintenance capacity (as defined in subsection (2)) or as a supervisor of, or look-out for, persons working in such capacity;"

And "safety critical worker" is defined as *"means a person who performs a safety critical task"For the purposes of this Part and*Part 9*, a person works in the course of the operation of a railway undertaking in a maintenance capacity, if his or her work in the operation involves installation, maintenance, repair, alteration or inspection of, railway infrastructure or trains, or involves coupling or uncoupling trains or performing a pre-departure examination of trains."*In *Wolf*the CJEU determined that to impose an upper age limit for recruitment to the fireservice was a genuine and determining occupational requirement under Article 4 (1) of the Directive. In the instant case, the Court notes that the medical opinion furnished, which was not disputed by the Union, associatesage related changes and visual perception withconditionsthatincrease the risk of driving for older workers. In such circumstances, the Court accepts that to impose an upper age limit on the retention of tram drivers in order to protect the health and safety of drivers, passengers and the general public is reasonable in the circumstances and can constitute genuine and determining occupational treatment and is legitimate and proportionate. The Court finds that the Respondent has set out reasonable grounds that objectively justify a retirement age of 65 for tram drivers (including the Complainant) who are classified as safety critical employees, in the interest of the safety of drivers, passengers and the public.

- -Promotion of Workforce Planning and Access to Employment for a new Generation of Workers

The Court accepts that it is not unreasonable for employers to have a legitimate interest in workforce planning.

In*Rosenbladtv Oellerking Geb*udereinigungsge GmbH (Case C-45/09) [2011] I.R.L.R. 51*the CJEU examined the justification of a retirement age contained in a collective agreement, it held:-

- 'By guaranteeing workers a certain stability of employment and, in the long term, the promise of foreseeable retirement, while offering employers a certain flexibility in the management of their staff, the clause on automatic termination of employment contracts is thus the reflection of a balance between diverging but legitimate interests, against a complex background of employment relationships closely linked to political choices in the area of retirement and employment. ... It does not appear unreasonable for the social partnerstotake the view that ameasure such [the provision containing the retirement age] may be appropriate for achieving the aims set out above'.

The Respondent relied upon*Palacios de la Villa*which held that in assessing the question of whether the retirement age constituted an appropriate and necessary means of achieving the legitimate objective being pursued, the CJEU said the following:-

- 'It does not appear unreasonable for the authorities of a Member State to take the view that a measure such as thatatissue in the main proceedings may be appropriate and necessary in ordertoachievealegitimate aim in the context of national employment policy, consisting in the promotion of full employment by facilitating accesstothe labour market.Furthermore, the measure cannot be regarded as unduly prejudicing the legitimate claims of workers subjecttocompulsory retirement because they have reached the age-limit provided for; the relevant legislation is not based only on a specific age, but also takes account of the fact that the persons concerned are entitled to financial compensation by way of a retirement pensionatthe end of their working life, such as that provided for by the national legislationatissue in the main proceedings, the level of which cannot be regarded as unreasonable.'

The CJEU decision of Fuchs and Köhler v Land Hessen C-159/10 and C-160/10 [2011] I.R.L.R. 1043 concerned the compulsory retirement of civil servants where the aims were to achieve a balance between the generations, plus the efficient planning of the departure and recruitment of staff, encouraging the recruitment or promotion of young people, and avoiding disputes about older employee's fitness to work beyond a certain age.In the instant case, the Respondent demonstrated for the Court how the Respondent conducts its workforce planning in the case of tram drivers. In January 2014, over eight months before the Complainant's retirement, to ensure the Respondent met its manning levels - levels which were agreed with the Union which required it to employ 173 tram drivers at any time, it sought approval for the recruitment of extra drivers. Due to the impending retirement of the Complainant (and others), it sought to recruit additional tram drivers commencing from 24thFebruary 2014. This action was required in order to ensure that the new drivers were properly trained prior to the Complainant's (and others) retirement.Taking account of the medical opinions advanced coupled with the workforce planning requirements and the collectively agreed pension scheme, the Court is satisfied that a compulsory retirement age of 65 for tram drivers was reasonable and appropriate in the circumstances. Furthermore, it accepts that it constituted a legitimate aim of employment and labour market policy in order to prevent possible disputes concerning tram driver's fitness to work beyond a certain age.Determination

The Court accordingly determines that the Respondent acted in compliance with Section 34(4) of the Act, the compulsory retirement age of 65 applied to the Complainant was necessary reasonable and proportionate and accordingly amounted to objective justification for that maximum retirement age. Accordingly the Court affirms the Decision of the Adjudication/ Equality Officer and rejects the appeal.

The Court determines that the complaint is not well founded and affirms the decision of the Adjudication/ Equality Officer.

The Court so Determines.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS ACTS, 1946 TO 1990SECTION 83 (1), EMPLOYMENT EQUALITY ACTS, 1998 TO 2011

PARTIES :

DUBLIN BUS (REPRESENTED BY CIE GROUP OF COMPANIES SOLICITOR) - AND - WILLIAM MCCAMLEY

(REPRESENTED BY SERVICES INDUSTRIAL PROFESSIONAL TECHNICAL UNION)

DIVISION : Chairman: Mr Duffy Employer Member: Mr Marie Worker Member: Ms Tanham

SUBJECT: 1. Appeal of Equality Officer (now known as Adjudication Officer Decision No: DEC-E2015-100)

BACKGROUND: 2. This is an appeal of Equality Officer (now known as Adjudication Officer Decision No: DEC-E2015-100). A Labour Court hearing took place on 12th February 2015. The following is the Court's Determination:DETERMINATION:This is an appeal by William McCamley against the decision of the Equality Tribunal in his claims of harassment and victimisation on grounds of race and religion against Dublin Bus. In this Determination the parties are referred to as they were at first instance. Hence, Mr McCamley is referred to as the Complainant and Dublin Bus is referred to as the Respondent.

The case was referred to the Equality Tribunal on 12th June 2012 under the Employment Equality Acts 1998-2011 (hereafter the Acts). It was heard by an Equality Officer on 30th July 2014. The decision under appeal was issued on 30th September 2015. The Equality Officer found against the Complainant.

Material FactsThe material facts of the case are not seriously in dispute and can be briefly stated.

The Complainant is an employee of the Respondent. He is also an activist in SIPTU. In that capacity he represented SIPTU in dealing with industrial relations issues arising within the employment. The NBRU also represents Drivers employed by the Respondent. It is common case that there has been a history of inter-union rivalry between these Unions within the Respondent Company which, at times, has manifested itself in a level of antipathy between some of their respective members.

Following a conciliation conference at the then LRC in a dispute involving the Respondent and both trade unions, a member of the NBRU, who was also an employee of the Respondent, posted abusive comments concerning the Complainant on Facebook. These comments referred to the Complainant in particularly disparaging and offensive terms which related to a religion and a nationality imputed to him (which are not his actual religion or his actual nationality). The offending comments were posted on or about 1st March 2012. This incident will be referred to in this Determination as 'the Facebook incident'

The Complainant referred a complaint concerning this posting to his Manager in reliance on the Respondent's Dignity at Work policy. She responded that as the matter complained of occurred outside the workplace the company could not take any action under the policy in pursuance of which the complaint was referred.

The Complainant appealed against the refusal of the local Manager to address his grievance. The matter eventually came before the Head of Human Resources of the Respondent. He took a different view to that taken by the local Manager. The dealt with the complaint in reliance on Rule 18 of the Company Rule Book which provides:

- "Employees shall not conduct themselves in any manner prejudicial to the reputation and welfare of fellow employees"

The Head of Human Resources directed that a disciplinary process be initiated against the author of the offending comments. This resulted in a disciplinary sanction being imposed on the employee concerned. There was a significant delay between the reporting of the offending comments and the initiation of the disciplinary process. By letter dated 3rdSeptember 2012, the Head of Human Resources wrote to the Complainant informing him that the author of the comments had admitted posting them on Facebook and had been 'charged' under Rule 18 with conduct prejudicial to another employee. The Head of Human Resources explained the delay by referring to the absence of the employee concerned on sick leave in consequence of which he was unavailable for interview.

The Complainant relies on earlier incidents of harassment which he claims are part of a pattern of discriminatory treatment against him by fellow employees. In particular he relies on an incident that occurred in 2008 in which he was the subject of an assault. That incident occurred on an occasion when he was attending a function hosted by the Respondent. The Complainant told the Court that he believed that the assault was motivated by an imputation to him of a certain religious affiliation because of words addressed to him by the assailant before the assault occurred. He claims that this incident and the incidents referred to above form part of a continuum of harassment. This occurrence will be referred to as 'the 2008 incident'

The Complainant further relies on an incident surrounding the placing of graffiti of a personalised and highly offensive nature about him in a staff toilet. This incident appears to have occurred on or about 20thJune 2012. The Complainant contends that it took the Respondent three weeks to have this graffiti removed. It appears from the Complainant's submission that he is relying on this occurrence and a further incident of harassment as an act of victimisation. This will be referred to as 'the graffiti incident'

Finally, the Complainant refers to an incident in which offensive material was posted on Facebook by an employee of the Respondent which was directed at two Managers. In that case the employees concerned were disciplined immediately. He relies on the different approach of the Respondent in his case as an act of discrimination.

Position of the PartiesThe Complainant contends that the offending publications and conduct constitute harassment as that term is defined by the statute. He further contends that he suffered the harassment in the course of his employment in consequence of which the Respondent is fixed with liability under the Acts. It is also the Complainant's case that the Respondent had failed to take effective measures to prevent the harassment and cannot, therefore, avail of the defence provided by the Acts.

The Respondent accepts that the offending comments were published in relation to the Complainant and that the author of the comments was an employee of the Respondent. However, the Respondent denied that the Complainant was harassed in the course of his employment. It was the Respondent's position that the offending conduct occurred in circumstances unrelated to the Complainant's employment. In these circumstances the Respondent submitted that the Court has no jurisdiction to entertain these complaints.

In relation tothe 2008 incident the Respondent contends that they are outside the statutory time limit and are likewise outside the scope of the Court's jurisdiction.

In relation to the complaints concerning graffiti, the Respondent submitted that following the complaint received from the Complainant the defilements were removed as soon as possible and that its response in this case was no different to that which it adopted in all other similar cases.

Legal PrinciplesThe first issue arising in the case is whether the Facebook incident constituted discrimination within the meaning of s.14A of the Act. That section provides: -

- (1) For the purposes of this Act, where—
  - (a) an employee (in this section referred to as "the victim") is harassed or sexually harassed either at a place where the employee is employed (in this section referred to as "the workplace") or otherwise in the course of his or her employment by a person who is—(i) employed at that place or by the same employer, (ii) the victim's employer, or

- (iii) a client, customer or other business contact of the victim's employer and the circumstances of the harassment are such that the employer ought reasonably to have taken steps to prevent it, or

(b) without prejudice to the generality of paragraph (a)—

- (i) such harassment has occurred, and

(ii) either—

- (I) the victim is treated differently in the workplace or otherwise in the course of his or her employment by reason of rejecting or accepting the harassment, or(II) it could reasonably be anticipated that he or she would be so treated the harassment or sexual harassment constitutes discrimination by the victim's employer in relation to the victim's conditions of employment.

(2) If harassment or sexual harassment of the victim by a person other than his or her employer would, but for this subsection, be regarded as discrimination by the employer under subsection (1), it is a defence for the employer to prove that the employer took such steps as are reasonably practicable—

- (a) in a case where subsection (1)(a) applies (whether or not subsection (1)(b) also applies), to prevent the person from harassing or sexually harassing the victim or any class of persons which includes the victim, and

  (b) in a case where subsection (1)(b) applies, to prevent the victim from being treated differently in the workplace or otherwise in the course of the victim's employment and, if and so far as any such treatment has occurred, to reverse its effects.

(3) A person's rejection of, or submission to, harassment or sexual harassment may not be used by an employer as a basis for a decision affecting that person.

(4) The reference in subsection (1)(a)(iii) to a client, customer or other business contact of the victim's employer includes a reference to any other person with whom the employer might reasonably expect the victim to come into contact in the workplace or otherwise in the course of his or her employment.

(5) In this section "employee" includes an individual who is—

(a) seeking or using any service provided by an employment agency, and

- (b) participating in any course or facility referred to in paragraphs (a) to (c) of section 12(1), and accordingly any reference to the individual's employer includes a reference to the employment agency providing the service or, as the case may be, the person offering or providing the course or facility.

(6) Where subsection (5) applies in relation to a victim, subsection (1) shall have effect as if for "in relation to the victim's conditions of employment" there were substituted "contrary to section 11", or, as the case may be, section 12.

(7) (a) In this section—

  - (i) references to harassment are to any form of unwanted conduct related to any of the discriminatory grounds, and

    (ii) references to sexual harassment are to any form of unwanted verbal, non-verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature, being conduct which in either case has the purpose or effect of violating a person's dignity and creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment for the person.

  (b) Without prejudice to the generality of paragraph (a), such unwanted conduct may consist of acts, requests, spoken words, gestures or the production, display or circulation of written words, pictures or other material.

What is complained of in this case comes within the ambit of subsection (1)(a) of this section. There was no evidence that the Complainant was treated less favourably in the course of his employment for having accepted or rejected the harassment. Consequently subsection 1(b) is not applicable. This is a point of some relevance when considering whether the Respondent can avail of the defence provided by subsection (2) of s.14A. Where subsection 1(b) applies, subsection (2)(b) provides, in effect, that in order to make out a defence the employer must show that, in addition to having preventative measures in place, it took measures to reverse the effects of any adverse treatment suffered by the Complainant in consequence of having accepted or rejected the harassment.

In this case the defence available to the Respondent is that provided for at s.14A(2)(a). Accordingly, in order to avail of that defence the Respondent must show that it took such steps as were reasonably practicable to prevent the harasser from harassing the victim or any class of persons which includes the victim. The applicability of that defence on the facts of the instant case will be considered later in this Determination.

The liability that subsection (1) of this section imposes on employers is not akin to vicarious liability in common law. Rather, this provision applies a form of constructive direct liability on an employer where an employee is harassed by another employee, or a person in a category referred to at subsection 1(a) (ii) or (iii) of section 14A. That is clear from the use of the words "the harassment or sexual harassment constitutes discrimination by the victim's employer in relation to the victim's conditions of employment" in the final sentence of subsection (1) of that section.

In the Course of Employment – Facebook IncidentUnlike vicarious liability, in the case of harassment committed by an employee on another employee there is no requirement to show that the wrongdoer was acting in the course, or within the scope, of his or her employment. Hence, it matters not that the harasser was off duty or at home when he posted the offending material. It is, however, essential that the victim suffered the harassment in the course of his or her employment. It follows that in the instant case the focus of the Court's enquiry must be on whether the Complainant suffered the harmful effects of the conduct complained of while in the course of his employment.

The meaning to be ascribed to the expression 'in the course of employment' was judicially considered by the Court of Appeal for England and Wales in Jones v Tower Boot Co. Ltd. [1997] I.C.R. 254 in which the Court was required to construe a similarly worded provision at s 32 of the UK Race Relations Act 1976. Here, having reviewed a line of relevant authorities Waite LJ said the following: -

- The tribunals are free, and are indeed bound, to interpret the ordinary, and readily understandable, words "in the course of his employment" in the sense in which every layman would understand them. This is not to say that when it comes to applying them to the infinite variety of circumstances which is liable to occur in particular instances — within or without the workplace, in or out of uniform, in or out of rest-breaks — all laymen would necessarily agree as to the result. That is what makes their application so well suited to decision by an industrial jury. The application of the phrase will be a question of fact for each industrial tribunal to resolve, in the light of the circumstances presented to it, with a mind unclouded by any parallels sought to be drawn from the law of vicarious liability in tort.

As can be seen from that passage, Waite LJ recognised that there are a variety of situations in which it can be held that a person is engaged in the course of his or her employment that go beyond the time spent actually in the workplace or performing the duties and tasks associated with the person's occupation. Hence, it has been held that an employer can be liable for harassment that occurred in situations such as where the victim is attending a social function organised or sponsored by the employer or is attending meetings or conferences . That is acknowledged by the Respondent and it is also made clear in the Employment Equality Act 1998 (Code of Practice) (Harassment) Order 2012 (S.I.208/2012), which provides: - conferences and training that occur outside the workplace. It may also extend to work-related social events.

- The scope of the sexual harassment and harassment provisions extend beyond the workplace, for example to

There must, however, be some discernible connection between the harassment and the victim's employment in the sense that the victim suffered the harmful effects of the harassment while he or she was engaged in activity authorised by the employer.Discussion

In the instant case it appears clear that the offending comments posted in the Facebook incident were directed at the Complainant in his capacity as a representative of a group or body of workers employed by the Respondent. He was clearly authorised by the Respondent to act in that capacity. There can be no doubt that the purpose and effect of the publications was to disparage and ridicule the Complainant in the eyes of his colleagues. In these circumstances it follows that, in the words of s14A(7)(a) of the Act, it was conduct having "the purpose or effect of violating a person's dignity and creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment for the person".Moreover, it appears clear from the context and content of the offending comments that their harmful effects were intended to impact on the Complainant while exercising his role as a worker representative; a role that he performed in the course of his employment.

It follows that the posting of the offending comments constituted harassment of the Complainant within the meaning of s.14A(7) of the Act. Consequently the employer is rendered liable for that harassment unless it can avail of the defence provided by s.14A(2) of the Act.

2008 Incident – Time Limit

The Complainant gave evidence in relation to the 2008 incident. That incident occurred when the Complainant was attending an event organised by the Respondent and he was doing so in his capacity as an employee of the Respondent. He was physically assaulted by another employee. As a prelude to the attack this employee addressed the Complainant using a crude and vulgar expression having a religious connotation (details of which were given in evidence). The incident was witnessed by a member of the Respondent's management. No action was taken against the perpetrator of the assault. For reasons that were explained to the Court the Complainant did not make a formal complaint to the Respondent in relation to this incident.

This incident occurred some four years before the within complaint was referred to the Equality Tribunal.Prima facie,it was at that stage statute barred. However, the Complainant contends that it should be considered a part of a continuum of discriminatory treatment to which he was subjected and that the time limit started to run on the date of the last act of harassment, namely the Facebook incident, 1st March 2012.

Both s.77(5) and s.77(6A) of the Act provide for circumstances in which acts of discrimination that occurred outside the normal time limit can nonetheless be relied upon where they form part of what is conveniently referred to as continuing discrimination.

Section 77(5)(a) of the Acts provides: -

- (a) Subject to paragraph (b) , a claim for redress in respect of discrimination or victimisation may not be referred under this section after the end of the period of 6 months from the date of occurrence of the discrimination or victimisation to which the case relates or, as the case may be, the date of its most recent occurrence.

Section 77(6A) provides: -

- For the purposes of this section—(a) discrimination or victimisation occurs—
    - (i) if the act constituting it extends over a period, at the end of the period,

    (ii) [not relevant]
    - (iii)[not relevant]

The application of these provisions was extensively considered by this Court in Determination EDA1124 Ann Hurley v Co Cork VEC. It is appropriate to set out the relevant passage in that Determination in full: -

- *Subsection (5) and subsection (6A) of s.77 deal with different forms of continuing discrimination or victimisation. Under subsection (6A), an act will be regarded as extending over a period, and so treated as done at the end of that period, if an employer maintains and keeps in force a discriminatory regime, rule, practice or principle which has had a clear and adverse effect on the complainant (Barclays Bank plc v Kapur [1989] ILRM 387). This subsection would apply where, for example, an employer maintains a discriminatory requirement for access to employment or promotion. In the case of victimisation, it would apply, for example, where an employer pursues a policy or practice of not affording certain benefits to employees who brought equality claims. In such a case the time limit will only run from the time that the policy or practice is discontinued. Hence an aggrieved party could maintain a claim in respect of acts or omissions which occurred in pursuance of the policy or practice regardless of when the act or omission occurred. There is, however, authority for the proposition that an act occurring after the presentation of the Complainant's complaint may not be taken into account when determining whether there was a continuing act (see the decision of the Court of Appeal for England and Wales in Robertson v Bexley Community Centre [2003] IRLR 434, at para 21).*
  Subsection (5) of s.77 deals with a situation in which there are a series of separate acts or omissions which, while not forming part of regime, rule, practice or principle, are sufficiently connected so as to constitute a continuum. The circumstances in which a corresponding provision of UK law can come into play was considered by the Court of Appeal in Arthur v London Eastern Railway Ltd [2007] IRLR 58. Here the Court was concerned with a claim of victimisation in the form of a series of acts directed against the complainant, some inside the three-month time limit provided at s.48 of the UK Employment Rights Act 1996, and some outside that limit. In considering if the time-limit in respect of all of the acts relied upon stated to run from the last such act Mummery LJ said: -
  - The provision in s.48(3) regarding a complaint of an act which is part of a series of similar acts is also aimed at allowing employees to complain about acts (or failures) occurring outside the three-month period. There must be an act (or failure) within the three-month period, but the complaint is not confined to that act (or failure.) The last act (or failure) within the three-month period may be treated as part of a series of similar acts (or failures) occurring outside the period. If it is, a complaint about the whole series of similar acts (or failures) will be treated as in time.
    The provision can therefore cover a case where, as here, the complainant alleges a number of acts of detriment, some inside the three-month period and some outside it. The acts occurring in the three-month period may not be isolated one-off acts, but connected to earlier acts or failures outside the period. It may not be possible to characterise it as a case of an act extending over a period within s.48(4) by reference, for example, to a connecting rule, practice, scheme or policy but there may be some link between them which makes it just and reasonable for them to be treated as in time and for the complainant to be able to rely on them.

The Complainant relied on s.77(6A) of the Act in advancing his claim that the 2008 incident and the Facebook incident in 2012 should properly be regarded as separate manifestations of continuing discrimination in the nature of harassment and so treated as within the time limit when he made his complaint on 12th June 2012. As is clear from the decision in Ann Hurley v Count Cork VEC, s.77(6A) applies where the Respondent has maintained and kept in force a discriminatory regime, rule, practice or principle which extends over a period. It is not contended, nor is there any evidence to suggest, that the Respondent maintained such a rule, practice or principle directed at or facilitating the harassing the Complainant. Consequently, s.77(6A) has no application in this case.

For the sake of completeness the Court has considered if, on the fact of this case, both the 2008 incident and the Facebook incident can be considered as in time by application of s.77(5) of the Act. That requires a consideration of whether both incidents were sufficiently connected and can properly be regarded as separate manifestations of continuing harassment, so that the time limit started to run from the date of the least such incident (the Facebook incident).

The 2008 incident involved an assault on the Complainant by a named individual. The Facebook incident occurred some four years later. That posting was made by a different person than the assailant in the 2008 incident. There was no evidence proffered of any other incidents of harassment of the Complainant in the intervening period. The 2008 incident was also different in its nature and character than the Facebook incident. In these circumstances, and having regard to the length of time between both incidents, the Court can see no basis upon which it could be held that they were sufficiently connected so as to be characterised as separate manifestations of the same harassment. Consequently the Court is satisfied that they do not constitute a continuum of the harassment for the purpose of s.77(5) of the Act. Accordingly the Court must hold that the 2008 incident was a stand-alone occurrence and that the complaint in relation to that incident was presented outside the statutory time limit and is statute barred.

Graffiti Incident

This incident relates to the placing of graffiti in a toilet on the Respondent's premises which was disparaging of the Complainant. On becoming aware of the presence of this graffiti the Complainant reported it to his Manager and asked that it be removed. According to the Complainant, it was some six days after he made the complaint that the graffiti was removed. The Complainant became aware of the graffiti on or about 20th June 2012. The Complainant was unaware of when the offending graffiti was placed in the toilet.

It the course of the appeal it became clear that this incident occurred after the within complaint was referred to the Equality Tribunal. Consequently, it could not have been comprehended by that complaint. It appears that this incident was first raised in the written submissions filed on behalf of the Complainant with the Equality Tribunal. Those submissions were received by the Equality Tribunal in 2014. In so far as the filing of the submissions constituted the referral of this aspect of the complaint, it was then out of time and statute barred. It follows that this aspect of the Complainant's complaint was not properly before Equality Tribunal and it cannot be properly before the Court in this appeal.

Different Treatment in the Case of two Manager

In presenting his case to the Court the Complainant referred to an incident in which an employee posted offending comments on social media concerning two Managers of the Respondent. In that case immediate action was taken by the Respondent to address the incident through its disciplinary procedures. He contrasts the treatment of his complaint with that of the Respondent in the case of the Managers in question.

There was no evidence proffered, nor was it otherwise suggested, that if there was a difference in treatment in relation how these complaints and those of the Complainant were processed (and the Court makes no such finding) that it was on grounds of either religion or nationality. Accordingly, this matter could not come within the scope of the within complaint.

Defence

Section 14A(2) provides an employer, who would otherwise be liable for harassment by application of subsection (1) of that section, with a full defence in defined circumstances. In order to avail of the defence, the employer must demonstrate that preventative measures were taken before the occurrence of the offending conduct, occurred. The taking of post-hoc action in response to a complaint does not make out the defence.

The Respondent had a policy against harassment and sexual harassment at work. But it did not contain a provision specifically directed at preventing harassment through the use of social media at the material time, although it put such a policy in place later. Moreover, the initial response of the Complainant's Manager was to deny any responsibility for what occurred on the basis that the Respondent's dignity at work policy did not cover this type of conduct. The Complainant appealed to the Respondent's Head of Human Resources against the refusal of the local Manager to address his complaints. The Head of Human Resources recognised that the type of conduct giving rise to the Facebook incident was in fact prohibited under Rule 18 of the company rules as conduct "prejudicial to the reputation and welfare of fellow employees". That Rule was invoked against the harasser and a disciplinary sanction was imposed against him. There was a delay of some months between the raising of the matter with the Head of Human Resources and the completion of the disciplinary process. However, that was attributable to the absence of the employee concerned on sick leave in the intervening period. While Rule 18 predates and is not part of the Respondent's dignity at work policy, the Court was told in evidence by the Head of Human Resources that it is ascribed a wide ambit and is frequently invoked to deal with any form of offensive conduct perpetrated by one employee on another. Both the Head of Human Resources and the Complainant told the Court that the Rule Book is provided to all employees on commencing employment and that its content is well known by all employees.

This Rule may not be an adequate substitute for a well-defined policy against the use of social media as an instrument of harassment (which the Respondent now has in place). But it is, nonetheless, a comprehensive provision directed at protecting employees from any form of prejudicial or harmful treatment by fellow employees. As this case demonstrates, that can include harassment or discriminatory treatment on any of the grounds prohibited by the Acts by whatever mode it is perpetrated.

OutcomeThe Court accepts that in the Facebook incident the Complainant was subjected to wholly unacceptable personalised abuse in the course of his employment that no worker should be expected to tolerate. However, the net question that arises for consideration by the Court is whether the Respondent can be held liable in law for what occurred. Having regard to all of the evidence before it, the Court has concluded that the Respondent can avail of the defence that the Act provides at s.14A(2). Accordingly the Respondent cannot be fixed with liability.

In these circumstances the Court must affirm the decision of the Equality Tribunal and disallow the appeal.

EMPLOYMENT APPEALS TRIBUNAL

CASE NO. UD474/1981

Appeal of

Margot Conway, 6 High Street, Sligo.

against the recommendation of the Rights Commissioner in the case of:-

Ulster Bank Limited, Personnel Division, Waring Street, Belfast.

Under the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977

Mrs. Conway was represented on the 1st day by Mr. Oliver Fry, Solicitor and on the 2nd day by Richard Nesbitt, B.L., instructed by William Fry and Sons, Solicitors.

Mr. Andrew Bradley, B.L. instructed by McKeever and Sons, Solicitors, represented the respondent.

I certify that the Tribunal

(Division of Tribunal)

Chairman: Mr. Donal Hamilton,
Mr. P. D. McCann,
Mr. Colm O'Donnell,

heard this appeal at Sligo on Wednesday 13th January, 1982 and Friday 5th March, 1982.

The decision of the Tribunal was as follows:-

This matter came before the Tribunal by way of appeal by the former employee, Margot Conway (hereinafter called "the appellant") from a Recommendation of a Rights Commissioner which was, in effect, a finding that she had not been unfairly dismissed from her employment with the respondent.

This appeal was dealt with on the basis of a de novo hearing as are all appeals from Rights Commissioner Recommendations.

Determination:

The Tribunal, by majority, Mr. O'Donnell dissenting, determine that the appellant was not dismissed from her employment with the respondent. Her claim that she was unfairly dismissed is, therefore, dismissed.

From the evidence the following facts were established.

Employment history

The appellant commenced employment with the respondent as a Bank Official on 1/8/1972 and she signed an agreement as to /Service

Service on that date which contained a Declaration of Secrecy as to the business affairs of the Bank and its customers. Prior to entering employment with the respondent, the appellant had signed an application form in which she stated her willingness to take up an appointment, if successful, at any of the respondent's branches. During her employment the appellant served in the Tuam, Granard and Ballymote Branches. Then after training as a machinist, she was transferred to Limerick and from there to Sligo in October, 1977.

In March, 1980 the appellant became engaged to a Mr. Conway who was an account holder at the Sligo Branch. Prior to and following her engagement she was advised by Mr. Corcoran, Assistant Manager, of the possibility of her being transferred to another Branch because of her impending marriage to an account holder.

Mr. Corcoran discussed the matter with Mr. Glynn, the Branch Manager and advised him that he thought the appellant should be transferred. Mr. Glynn brought the matter to the attention of Mr. Rowland, Regional Personnel Controller and recommended transfer.

In July, 1980, Mr. Rowland decided that the transfer should take place. The appellant was advised in writing on 14/7/1980 that she was being transferred to the respondent's branch in Ballina with effect from 28/7/1980. By letter dated 21/7/1980 the appellant offered her resignation with notice which was accepted by letter dated 11/8/1980. The appellant married Mr. Conway on 5th September, 1980. It was agreed between the parties that the Contract of Employment came to an end in October, 1981.

Prior to 1973, it was a condition of employment that a lady bank official in the respondent's employment would resign automatically on marriage.

In 1973 it was agreed that this regulation would be abolished. Condition (c) of No. 111 of the Personnel Document establishes the future relationship between the respondent and its married female officials and it provides that:-

> "(c) They will be subject to the same conditions as other Bank Officials including work location and transfer. The Bank can make no special provision for married lady officials in this regard."

It appears from the evidence of Mr. Platt, Personnel Controller and Mr. Rowland, that there is no policy regarding the transfer of female staff on marriage to an account holder. Their evidence stressed equality between male and female and they stated that each case is dealt with individually and on its own merits.

It was common case that the appellant was transferred to Ballina solely because of her impending marriage to an account holder in the Branch in which she was employed viz. Sligo.

The rationale behind the decision to transfer the appellant on marriage was stated by Mr. William Glynn, the claimant's manager in Sligo (who recommended this transfer) as follows:-

474/87

"I saw it (her engagement) as possibly presenting a difficulty due to Mr. Conway's involvement with circa eight accounts and I felt other customers would be concerned."

Mr. Brian Corcoran, Assistant Manager in Sligo Branch of respondent, said he "considered it to be undesirable and restrictive for her to remain taking all factors into consideration."

Both Mr. Glynn and Mr. Corcoran felt that in a similar situation a male employee would be dealt with differently. It was stressed to the Tribunal that the integrity of the appellant was not and never was in question and she carried out her duties to the satisfaction of the respondent at all times.

It was submitted that the right to transfer must be reasonably exercised and that it was not so exercised in this case and that the appellant was justified in resigning and claiming that she was constructively dismissed. Mr.Glynn gave evidence of employees in his Branch who had near relatives with accounts in the same Branch. These included Mr. Corcoran, the Assistant Manager. It appears that those employees were not related to account holders who were in business competition with other or potential account holders. Notwithstanding the evidence of Mr. Platt and Mr. Rowland, that there is no policy of transfer on marriage but that each case is considered on its merits, the Tribunal is of the view that Mr. Corcoran believed that such a policy existed.

In evidence, Mr. Rowland said that Mr. Glynn was concerned that retention of the appellant at the Branch after her marriage might cause problems "because of her fiancé's involvement in the community and the possible reaction of the business community". He also stated that his decision to transfer the appellant was based on Mr. Glynn's recommendation and because he felt from his own judgement and experience that there could be difficulties. On challenge as to his experience, Mr. Rowland said that he was never a Branch Manager and he placed a lot of regard on the advice of the Branch Manager. He said that "our disquiet was what might be in others minds". Mr. Platt, Personnel Controller said he felt that Mr. Rowland should consider, as he did, the Branch Manager's assessment. Mr. Platt also said that Mr. Rowland would be entitled to rely on the Branch Manager's assessment.

Grievance Procedure

The respondent's grievance procedure is set out at p.p. 111 and 111A of the Bank's Personnel Document and states:-

"When any matter arises in a branch or department which may give cause for a feeling of hardship or of unfair treatment on the part of any official it is of vital importance that this should be settled without delay."

The procedure then states that the grievance should be raised in the first instance with the Manager. If not satisfied with the Manager's decision, the official can raise the grievance with the Regional Personnel Controller and if still not satisfied can refer it to the Chief Executive or his Deputy. If an Official having fully availed himself of the above procedures, is still dissatisfied he may request an independent person agreed between banks and the I.B.O.A. to consider the matter.

The final paragraph of the grievance procedure deals specifically with lady officials and states:-

> "We wish to assure our lady officials that their business and personal problems will also have a sympathetic hearing from Miss A. M. Nash, Personnel Controller's Assistant at Head Office, who is always prepared to make a special visit to any branch if this would be helpful."

Following receipt of the transfer notice, the appellant contacted Miss Healy (successor to Miss Nash, referred to above) by telephone to complain about the transfer and she (Miss Healy) asked her to state the problem in writing.

It is the Tribunal's view that perhaps Miss Healy might have handled the appellant's complaint more adroitly given that the appellant was overwrought and upset when she spoke to her.

However, having asked the appellant to detail her complaint in writing it is conceivable that Ms. Healy would have processed it in accordance with the agreed grievance procedure but the letter written by the appellant was a letter of resignation.

In writing the letter of resignation, the appellant did not take the steps outlined in the grievance procedure. The Tribunal has long considered that such agreements, usually described as Union Management Agreements, are binding on the parties because they choose to be bound by them. Whether or not they are legally binding is not the point. The parties clearly wish such agreements to regulate at least an aspect of their relationship and the Tribunal respects such agreements where same are not in conflict with the law of the land.

TRANSFERABILITY per se is not in issue in this case. It is not disputed that transfer as an expression of mobility was a term of the employment contract. It is common case that the appellant was not consulted regarding her transfer though we accept that following conversations with the Branch Management she was aware of the possibliity of transfer on marriage to the account holder, Mr. Conway. Mr. Rowland said that he does not usually talk to officials when transferring, that they have to accept transfers as part of their agreement and employees know that.

Mr. Rowland said that "given that the transfer was necessary, we tried to accommodate her". Mr. Platt stated that in the circumstances of this case transfer is not automatic and each case is looked at individually and on its own merits. Mr. Platt also stated:-

> "We do have regard to the need of employees; we put that onto the scales as we do the objects of the policy; We temper the exercise of power with concern".

/The

The Tribunal consider that from the evidence, "the policy" referred to is not identified. It is, in our view, difficult for the respondent to be satisfied that regard is being had to the needs of the employee, when in spite of obvious opportunity, the situation is not discussed with her and her needs ascertained.

We consider that this situation was not a normal transfer situation. It was seen by Management as a problem situation and transfer came into the picture as the suggested solution. We view the statements of Mr. Platt and Mr. Rowland that it would not be normal to call officials into the office to discuss each transfer to apply to the normal transfer situations in the course of business. In the circumstances herein we consider that good industrial relations practice and the desire to comply with the respondent's own standards, referred to by Mr. Platt, (quoted above) necessitated that the situation be discussed with the appellant prior to a solution being decided on. No solution other than transfer was considered. Mr. Rowland considered that "transfer being necessary they should try to accommodate the appellant". He stated that "if she had to go then maybe Ballina was the only reasonable alternative". In so deciding, account was had to the appellant's training as a machinist. The nearest branch with machines was Ballina. Mr. Rowland appreciated that Ballina was circa thirty eight miles from Sligo where Mr. Conway lived and the appellant would also continue to live. He felt that Ballina was within commuting distance of Sligo.

The appellant told the Tribunal that she resigned because she felt the journey to and from Ballina each day would be too long, too time consuming and too expensive. She said she had relatives banking with the Ballina Branch and whilst in Limerick her application for a transfer to Ballina had been refused on the grounds that Ballina was too near her family home.

Whilst transfer was a term of the contract that is not to say that transfer exists as a right of the employer to be exercised by him without regard to competing personal rights or contractually to be exercised by him outside the reasonable limits for the exercise of that power expressly or impliedly imposed by the contract. We appreciate the general headings stated by Mr. Mullen as being the areas where transfer is used. These are:-

(i) at the employee's request;

(ii) to enable the employee to pursue training;

(iii) to enable the employee to gain experience;

(iv) to satisfy the needs of the Bank;

(v) as a result of promotion;

(vi) as a result of disciplinary decision.

The foregoing may not be exhaustive but clearly indicate that transfer exists as part of the contract in relation to understood and accepted situations. It does not exist under the contract as a solution to all problems affecting the employee. It may be that after full and fair consideration of a problem, transfer will, in fact, be the reasonable solution.

In our view, the right to transfer given in the contract of Service, gives no absolute power to transfer. Any concept of absolute power is an illusion and such power as exists cannot be exercised outside the law of this land which compels the recognition of personal fundamental rights.

Problems might arise in individual cases and after due consideration transfer might result. There was no precedent to be followed. The Manager, Mr. Glynn and his Assistant Manager, Mr. Corcoran thought that a male employee would be dealt with differently.

Mr. Bradley, for the respondent, emphasised, quite rightly, the necessity for institutions such as the respondent to protect themselves against suspicion that they practiced anything less than the highest standards of integrity and confidentiality. We accept this but reject any notion that it entitles them to take any course they wish to the detriment of the employee. It does not entitle them to apply as a general rule different standards or yardsticks to their employees based on their sex.

The recommendation of Mr. Glynn existed and we can understand the tendency to "support" the Branch Management and we do not disagree with Mr.Platt's statement that Mr. Rowland should consider Mr. Glynn's assessment. We do, however, question Mr. Platt's statement that Mr. Rowland was entitled to rely on the Manager's assessment. The decision was to be made by Mr. Rowland, judging each case, in his own words, "on its merits". The recommendation of the Manager would be only one matter to be put onto the scales, Mr. Platt indicating that the needs of the employee would be another.

There was no individual assessment of this matter by Mr. Rowland which met his own standard of judging each case on its merits. He abdicated the transfer decision to the Branch Manager, Mr. Glynn.

We conclude,therefore,that it was reasonable for the appellant to complain to Ms. Healy that her transfer was unfair.

WAS THE APPELLANT CONSTRUCTIVELY DISMISSED?

We have considered the evidence and the opening and closing submissions of Mr. Oliver Fry, Mr. Richard Nesbitt and Mr. Andrew Bradley.

The appellant resigned with notice and her resignation was accepted.

The appellant was not dismissed in any direct way. She resigned and claims that she was dismissed by construction under SI, "dismissal", (b) of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, which states:-

> "dismissal", in relation to an employee, means -
> (b) the termination by the employee of his contract of employment with his employer, whether prior notice of the termination was or was not given to the employer, in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment without giving prior notice of the termination to the employer."

It is accepted that the appellant resigned because her transfer to Ballina raised difficulties as her residence would continue to be in Sligo. Even if the transfer be considered fair and reasonable, nothing would have been different, the appellant would have resigned. We do not hold the view that the transfer of the appellant was, of itself, a repudiation of the contract of employment and that the resignation was merely an acknowledgement of an acceptance of this. The transfer may have been misused in this case but its use did not demonstrate that the respondent no longer intended to be bound by the contract of employment, nor did the fact of transfer so alter the employment as to make it a thing radically different from what it was before the transfer. Transferability was part of the Contract and could properly and fairly be used to the same effect in different circumstances. The termination of the employment would, we feel, fail on a contractual test to be a constructive dismissal.

The Tribunal notes that the appellant acted without undue delay and gave notice that she was not accepting the transfer and was resigning.

She viewed this unilaterally imposed transfer, about which she had not been consulted, made for reasons which she could not accept as reasonable or necessary, as effectively making it impossible or unacceptably difficult, as to time, travelling and expense for her to continue working for the respondent.

WAS IT REASONABLE FOR HER TO RESIGN AND SO CLAIM THAT SHE WAS CONSTRUCTIVELY DISMISSED?

By majority, Mr. O'Donnell dissenting, the Tribunal considers that the appellant did not act reasonably in resigning without first having substantially utilized the grievance procedure to attempt to remedy her complaints. An elaborate grievance procedure existed but the appellant did not use it. It is not for the Tribunal to say whether using this procedure would have produced a decision more favourable to her but it is possible. She did contact Miss Healy, Deputy Regional Personnel Controller to enquire why she was being transferred. She was told the reason and she felt aggrieved. Miss Healy asked her to state a case in writing but she did not do so. She resigned by letter which resignation was accepted.

The Tribunal, by majority, determines, Mr. O'Donnell dissenting, that the appellant was not contructively dismissed from her employment and, accordingly, we dismiss her appeal and her claim.

CASE NO. UD843/1984

UD 843/1984

Appeal of

Looney & Company Limited, Carey's Road, Limerick.
(appellant)

against the recommendation of the Rights Commissioner in the case of:-

Donal Looney, 95 St. Joseph's Park, Nenagh, Co. Tipperary.
(respondent)

under the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977.

I certify that the Tribunal

(Division of Tribunal)

Chairman: Mr. Donal Hamilton,

Members: Mr. Tom Kearney,
Mr. Vincent Moran,

heard this appeal at Nenagh, Co. Tipperary on Wednesday 27th March, 1985.

Representation:

Appellant: Mr. O'Halloran, F.U.E.

Respondent: Mr. Michael McGrath, B.L., instructed by James O'Brien and Company, Solicitors, 24 Castle Street, Nenagh, Co. Tipperary.

The decision of the Tribunal was as follows:-

Mr. Tim Mulcaire gave evidence under oath and stated that he was the former manager of the appellant and was manager at the material time. Mr. Mulcaire stated that he dismissed the respondent because he had reason to believe that the respondent was pilfering the appellant's goods in spite of having been warned and because dismissal in the circumstances was the appropriate remedy for such an offence.

The evidence given by Mr. Mulcaire, Mr. Looney and Mr. Foley, led the Tribunal to find the facts as follows:-

The appellant carries on a wholesale supermarket business in which the respondent and Mr. Foley were employed as packers.

From 1983 Mr. Mulcaire believed that pilferage of the appellant's goods was taking place by employees as a result of which he carried out certain investigations. The investigations led him to suspect that Mr. Looney (hereinafter called claimant) was involved in pilferage but the investigations did not indicate any involvement by Mr. Foley. Mr. Mulcaire reacted to the outcome of his investigations by warning both the claimant and Mr. Foley that pilfering should cease.

/On

On the 12th April, 1984 it came to Mr. Mulcaire's notice that a box of Mars Bars was in a cupboard in the canteen. He went to the canteen and ascertained that there was a box of Mars Bars there and that the box contained thirty bars (a full box would contain thirty-eight bars). Mr. Mulcaire took no action that day but on the morning of the 13th April, 1984 he went to the canteen and cut the wrapper on each bar as a means of identifying same.

At about 10.30a.m. Mr Mulcaire asked Mr. Looney to "put the kettle on". Mr. Looney went to the canteen to do so and Mr. Mulcaire entered with him. The claimant put the kettle on and left with Mr. Mulcaire leaving at the same time. Both Mr. Mulcaire and Mr. Looney accepted that there was no Mars Bars on the counter in the canteen when they left.

After leaving the canteen the claimant went about his work and Mr. Mulcaire gave evidence that he stationed himself in a discreet position from which he could fully observe the entrance to the canteen. The claimant stated that after six to seven minutes (Mr. Mulcaire said ten minutes) he, the claimant, returned to the canteen to make the coffee. After he was there about two minutes Mr. Mulcaire joined him. At this time the claimant was at the counter in the canteen eating a bar of chocolate with another bar nearby. Mr. Mulcaire asked him where he got the chocolate and the claimant stated that Mr. Foley, his workmate, must have bought them in the shops and left them for him in accordance with a continuing arrangement with Mr. Foley whereby either Mr. Foley or the claimant would go to the shop for sweets or chocolate for tea-break and one would buy for the other and be reimbursed later. Mr. Mulcaire pointed out to the claimant the slits or cuts in the wrapping paper on the two bars which were on the counter and went to the place where the box of Mars Bars was stored and pointed same out to the claimant. At Mr. Mulcaire's request the claimant counted the number of bars in the box and these numbered twenty-eight. Mr. Mulcaire indicated that two were missing from that morning and also pointed out to the claimant the identifying cuts or slits on the Mars Bars in the box.

When asked the only explanation offered by the claimant as to how the two Mars Bars had been transferred from the box to the counter into his control was that Mr. Foley must have done it. At this state Mr. Mulcaire suggested that the claimant see him in his office and within a short time the claimant and Mr. Mulcaire met there.

In Mr. Mulcaire's office the claimant was again asked how the Mars Bars came to be in his possession and he repeated that Mr. Foley must have put them on the counter for him. It is clear that Mr. Mulcaire did not accept this as an explanation as he did not believe that Mr. Foley had entered the canteen between the first and second visit by the claimant and Mr. Mulcaire and accordingly that Mr. Foley was not the person who had taken the Mars Bars from the box. Mr. Mulcaire formed the view that the claimant had taken the Mars Bars from the box and appropriated same to his own use and that he was not telling the truth in his account of what had occurred.

Mr. Mulcaire gave evidence that former practice of giving the employees goods such as chocolates or biscuits which came from damaged packets had discontinued and the practice was that employees would purchase their own refreshments or coffee breaks and such like. Mr. Mulcaire was of the view that the box of Mars Bars were the property of the appellant company and represented pilfered goods.

Acting on his own judgement as to the appropriate penalty and bearing in mind the practice in the appellant's Limerick depot that dismissal would follow where pilferage was established, Mr. Mulcaire decided that the claimant be dismissed and he advised the claimant accordingly.

The Tribunal heard evidence that some time later Mr. Mulcaire asked Mr. Foley if he had put the Mars Bars onto the counter and Mr. Foley said that he had not.

The claimant in sworn evidence denied that he had pilfered any goods of the appellant company and he said that when he entered the canteen on the second occasion that the Mars Bars were on the counter and he assumed in accordance with a previous experience that these had been left by Mr. Foley whom he believed to have been to the shops earlier.

The claimant stated that he had not been given previous warnings with regard to pilferage but did know that pilferage would be wrong and that if it was established that serious disciplinary action could be expected such as suspension or even dismissal.

Mr. McGrath, on behalf of the claimant, submitted that there was a conflict of facts in this case in that Mr. Mulcaire's action and decision was precipitate and did not afford the claimant an opportunity to discuss the facts with Mr. Foley. Mr. McGrath submitted that the claimant was effectively denied an opportunity to investigate the charge against him and to defend himself in relation to same and that the investigation carried out by Mr. Mulcaire was not full, fair and reasonable and accordingly that his conclusion as to the claimant's culpability was not reasonably held. Without prejudice to his other points Mr. McGrath submitted that even if any standards applied in unfair dismissal cases, Mr. Mulcaire's investigation and conclusion were held to be reasonable then taking into account the claimant's record and the nature of the "offence" that the penalty of dismissal was too severe and accordingly was unfair.

Mr. O'Halloran on behalf of the appellant submitted that the facts spoke for themselves and that the investigation and conclusion were reasonable and that there was no denial to the claimant of any fundamental right under natural justice as the claimant was advised of the charge against him and the evidence and was given an opportunity to defend himself. Mr. O'Halloran submitted that it was not unreasonable for Mr. Mulcaire to decide that there was no need to check the claimant's story with Mr. Foley as Mr. Foley did not and could not have entered the canteen as suggested by the claimant and that there was only one logical explanation and that is that the claimant had taken the Mars Bars himself and placed them on the counter for consumption. Mr. O'Halloran submitted that the belief in the claimant's culpability was reasonably held and that the appellant's decision to dismiss the claimant was not unreasonable, having regard to Mr. Mulcaire's evidence that discovery of the pilferage and the claimant's involvement caused him to lose confidence and trust in the claimant which went to the root of their relationship and rendered its continuance impossible.

In considering this matter the Tribunal is very conscious of the issue to be decided in this type of dishonesty case. It is not for the Tribunal to seek to establish the guilt or innocence of the claimant nor is it for the Tribunal to indicate or consider whether we in the employer's position would have acted as Mr. Mulcaire did in his investigation or concluded as he did or decided as he did, as to do 00206418 so would be to substitute our own mind and decision for that of the employer. Our responsibility is to consider against the facts what a reasonable employer in Mr. Mulcaire's position and circumstances at that time would have done and decided and to set this up as a standard against which Mr. Mulcaire's actions and decision be judged.

The Tribunal determines by majority, Mr. Vincent Moran dissenting, as follows:-

(1) that the investigation carried out by Mr. Mulcaire on behalf of the appellant was a full and fair one which established the factual situation and that within the investigation the claimant was not denied the right to know what he was charged with or to defend himself;

(2) that Mr. Mulcaire's conclusion from the facts elicited by his investigation, that the claimant had acted improperly and was knowingly consuming, in the canteen, pilfered goods, was one which a reasonable employer considering the "evidence" could have reached;

(3) that the decision made by Mr. Mulcaire to dismiss the claimant on the basis of his reasonable held belief in the claimant's culpability, was a decision which a reasonable employer, in the circumstances, could have reached.

The Tribunal determines, by majority, that the claimant was not unfairly dismissed from his employment and we uphold the appellant's appeal against the recommendation of the Rights Commissioner.

UNFAIR DISMISSALS ACTS, 1977 TO 2007

I certify that the Tribunal

heard this claim at Athlone on 7th July 2009

Representation:

Claimant(s): Mr. John Carty, Mandate Trade Union, Mary Street, Galway

Respondent(s): Mr. Duncan Inverarity, BCM Hanby Wallace, Solicitors, 88 Harcourt Street, Dublin 2

The determination of the Tribunal was as follows:-

Claimant's Case:

The claimant gave direct sworn evidence that she started working for the respondent company on the 12 May 1975. She worked for a total 32 years for the respondent company. She was initially employed working on the shop floor but later on in her employment she moved to the cash office area. She was employed on a full time contract and worked 39 hours per week. She worked from 9 am until 6pm Monday to Thursday and from 9am until 5pm on Fridays. In the Summer of 2003 she was granted carers leave by her employer as she was caring for her mother and children. Whilst on carers leave she worked 20 hours per week for the respondent and when her carers leave concluded she returned to work on a full time basis resuming her 39 hours per week job.

In June 2006 she applied to her regional manager hereafter known as JG for a part time contract seeking a shorter working week as her domestic circumstances had changed. Her regional manager told her that he could not guarantee her a part time position but he would revert back to her at a later stage. He did not revert back to her. In September 2007 she wrote to a director of the company seeking a part time contract. She received a reply in October 2007 stating that her request would be passed on to the regional manager for him to discuss the request with her. The claimant was absent from work at this time due to a stress related illness. She returned to work in November 2007 and met with JG, her regional manager to discuss her request. He offered her a flexi contract which meant that she would be obliged to work a minimum of 15 hours and a maximum of 39 hours per week. This was over a 7 day week and could also include Sunday work. This contract did not suit her requirements.

On the 14 February 2008 she again wrote to the director regarding their refusal to offer her a part time contract despite having given 32 years service to the company. She was on sick leave when she wrote this letter. She returned to work on the 19 February 2008 and gave the company one weeks notice of her intention to resign. She finished working for the company on 25 February 2008 as she was left with no other option. The company refused her a reduction in her working week. Since her employment terminated she worked part time for another company but that employment ceased on 6 June 2008. Since then she has done a FAS course and is not currently in employment.

Under cross-examination the claimant confirmed that she is aware of the existence of the company's policy on grievance procedures. She did approach store management before writing to head office on three occasions. She spoke with the textile manager and two other store managers before writing to head office. She felt that she was not getting anywhere when she approached local management. She confirmed that local management had accommodated her when she had requested a change to her starting and finishing times on two occasions in January 2007 and September 2007. She did not wish to accept the offer of a flexi contract as she would have no control over how she would be rostered, and she may still have to work 39 hours some weeks. She was not prepared to accept a flexi contract.

She confirmed that she was actively seeking alternative employment before finishing working for the respondent. She handed in her notice on the 18 February 2008 to the store manager as she felt she had no option but to resign. Her local manager knew that she was suffering from ill health.

In reply to questions from the Tribunal the claimant confirmed that a part time contract where she could work from 10am until 2pm or 11am until 3pm would have suited her needs. These type of contracts were available from the respondent company previously, but were not available at the time she sought one. She confirmed that she had also requested that the company make her redundant. Between 2007 and 2008 nobody in the company had suggested that she should use the company's complaints procedures. She worked 20 hours per week for the company whilst on carers leave and the HR manager told her that such a working arrangement had worked out very well. She was in charge of the cash office when she finished employment.

Respondent's Case:

The first witness for the respondent (JG) was the regional manager. He met with the claimant in August 2006 when she requested a reduction in her working hours. He reverted back to her at a later stage informing her that the only options available were a full time contract or a flexi contract. The flexi contract allows an employee to work between 15 hours and 39 hours per week. The claimant was unwilling to engage with him over the details of the flexi contract. She enquired from him at a later stage about the possibility of being made redundant but a redundancy package was not up for discussion by the company at that time.

Under cross examination he confirmed that he was not aware whether or not the claimant was given a new contract of employment when she moved from a sales position to the cash office. He confirmed that the flexi contract that was on offer to the claimant may have required her to work some Sundays. He has over one thousand employees and he was not prepared to set a precedent by offering a part time contract. He confirmed that the company did offer a temporary arrangement to another employee previously when she was offered an alteration to her contract. This arrangement was based on medical grounds and was a temporary arrangement.

In reply to questions from the Tribunal he confirmed that the flexi contracts were introduced by the company sometime after 2000 as set contracts which had existed previously were discontinued in 2000.

The second witness for the respondent gave evidence that she is a textile manager and has worked for the company since 1997. She became aware in September 2007 that the claimant wanted to work reduced hours. She discussed the request with the store manager and an offer of a flexi contract was made. It was her belief that the flexi contract would have helped the claimant regarding her need to work reduced hours. She confirmed that another employee had been granted reduced hours previously on a temporary basis due to medical grounds. The claimant had never told her that she would have no option but to resign if her request for reduced hours was refused.

The third witness for the respondent gave evidence that he is the store manager. The claimant approached him in September 2007 requesting a reduced hours contract. He told her later that same week that the only contract he could offer her was a flexi contract. When he made this offer the claimant walked away from him. She came into his office on 19 February 2008 and handed her resignation notice to him. He was shocked. He met with the claimant on 21 February 2008 as he wanted to ascertain if he could anything about the stress that she claimed to be suffering from. That was the last occasion he spoke with her.

Under cross-examination he denied that the flexi contract would have made the claimant's working week more unpredictable. The company would not have put her in a position where her hours would not have been flexible. A flexi contract is flexible for both parties. The claimant was previously granted carers leave as it is the company's policy to grant employees carers leave when such a request is made.

In reply to questions from the Tribunal he confirmed that the company wanted to enter into discussions with the claimant about her possible flexi hours before the contract was signed, but the claimant refused to discuss the contract. The contract did not have to be signed before discussions about her possible working hours took place.

Determination

Dismissal in relation to an employee is defined in Section 1(b) of the Unfair Dismissals Act as the termination by the employee of his contract of employment with his employer, whether prior notice of the termination was or was not given to his employer, in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been entitled, or it was or would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment without giving prior notice of the termination to the employer.

In advancing a claim for constructive dismissal an employee is required to show that he or she had no option in the circumstances of her employment other than to terminate his or her employment.

In effect the relevant section reverses the burden of proof for an employer set out in Section 6(1) of the Act.

The notion places a high burden of proof on an employee to demonstrate that he or she acted reasonably and had exhausted all internal procedures formal or otherwise in an attempt to resolve her grievance with his/her employers. The employee would need to demonstrate that the employer's conduct was so unreasonable as to make the continuation of employment with the particular employer intolerable. The Tribunal is of the view by majority decision with Mr. Clarke dissenting, based on the evidence that the claimant did not meet the requisite threshold.

Although the claimant had approached local management on a number of occasions to express her grievances and to attempt to get working conditions and times suitable to her domestic circumstances, the action of the claimant in resigning in February 2008 after the respondent had offered her a flexi contract with options for minimum and maximum hours cannot in our view be regarded as reasonable nor could it be said that the conditions and terms, even though not then specified, which would flow from such a contract, would be intolerable for the claimant.

While expressing sympathy with the claimant and recognising her long and hitherto unblemished service with the respondent the Tribunal are of the view by majority decision with Mr. Clarke dissenting, that the claimant has not met the required burden of proof and consequently her claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2007 fails.

28 different houses, and would be unable to complete those contracts. Quite apart from its loss of profits on the contracts, which would probably be quantifiable, the plaintiff might well also be liable in damages to the 28 purchasers, and its reputation as a developer could be seriously affected. On the other hand, if an injunction is granted and the defendants should ultimately succeed, I think the damage to them would be minimal. While the defendants contend that they are entitled to picket in furtherance of their trade dispute with the employer, they have not demonstrated in any convincing manner just how that trade dispute could be affected by picketing the plaintiff. Certainly, any loss or disadvantage which might be incurred by the defendants would be far outweighed by the enormous damage which would be caused to the plaintiff should an injunction be wrongly refused, and I have no doubt that the balance of convenience strongly lies in favour of the plaintiff. That being so, on terms that the plaintiff give an undertaking as to damages, I will grant the injunction sought.

Liz Allen (claimant) v. Independent Newspapers (Ireland) Ltd (respondent): Employment Appeals Tribunal UD 641/2000 (2 August 2001)

Unfair dismissal – Constructive dismissal – Whether reasonable for claimant to resign – Harassment and bullying – Isolation – Whether claimant exhausted internal procedures

Remedy – Compensation – Claimant unavailable for work due to illness – Whether illness attributable to conduct of respondent – Whether financial loss attributable to dismissal – Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (No. 10), section 7

Facts The claimant had been employed as a crime correspondent with the respondent from August 12, 1996 until September 20, 2000 when she resigned her position. The claimant alleged that she had been constructively dismissed in that the conduct of her employer and the treatment of her and attitude towards her left her no choice but to terminate her employment. She contended that she had been subjected to harassment and bullying, that she had been isolated at work and that the conduct of the respondent undermined her confidence and her health to such an extent that she was forced to resign. The respondent denied that the claimant had been constructively dismissed and maintained that she had resigned without just cause. It was also alleged that the claimant had failed to attempt to resolve matters internally before her resignation. The claimant had not worked since her resignation due to illness.

Determined

(1) The proper test in this case is whether it was reasonable for the claimant to terminate her contract of employment.

(2) Having regard to the evidence of harassment, bullying and intimidation it was reasonable in all the circumstances for the claimant to terminate her contract of employment. The claimant's conclusion that she could have no confidence in the respondent to either properly or effectively address her grievances was a reasonable conclusion.

(3) The claimant was constructively dismissed and as no evidence was offered to rebut the presumption of unfair dismissal, the claimant was unfairly dismissed for the purposes of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 to 1993.

(4) The proper remedy in the circumstances was compensation.

(5) The jurisdiction of the tribunal to award compensation is extremely wide, and there is no reason why the personal circumstances of the employee, including the effect of dismissal on her health, should not be taken into account in ascertaining the appropriate amount of compensation.

(6) The claimant's illness was caused by the factors which led to her constructive dismissal. Given that this illness led to her financial loss, the financial loss is therefore attributable to the conduct of the respondent. Thus the claimant is entitled to be compensated for that loss.

(7) The compensation of £70,500 or 78 weeks renumeration is the appropriate level of compensation.

The full text of the determination of the Tribunal was as follows:

Dismissal was in dispute in this case.

The claimant was employed as a crime correspondent with the respondent from August 12, 1996 to September 20, 2000. On the latter date she resigned her employment with the respondent. It is the claimant's case as set out in the T1A that she was constructively dismissed in that the conduct of her employer and their treatment and attitude towards the claimant left her no choice but to terminate her employment. It is the claimant's contention that she was subjected to continuous harassment and bullying and that she was effectively isolated at work which conduct undermined her confidence and health to such a degree that she could not tolerate her working environment and was left with no other option but to resign. The respondent for its part denies that the claimant was constructively dismissed and maintains that she resigned her position without just cause. The respondent denies any conduct, treatment or attitude towards the claimant such as would justify her resignation. Moreover, the respondent denies the claimant's contention that she made numerous attempts to resolve matters internally before being left with no option but to resign. It is contended on behalf of the respondent that it was open to the claimant to seek to redress any grievance or difficulties she had through recognised NUJ grievance procedures but that the claimant had not availed of this option. Furthermore it is contended by the respondent that the claimant declined to avail of an internal resolution mechanism being made available to the claimant before her resignation.

During the course of the hearing the claimant gave evidence of what she perceived to be hostile treatment of her during the tenure of her employment. The claimant gave specific evidence regarding her working relationship with a colleague, Jody Corcoran who the claimant alleges, behaved in a hostile manner towards her from the commencement of her employment. This hostility consisted of the claimant being ignored by Mr Corcoran and by the latter refusing to communicate with the claimant in any shape or form. Moreover, it is contended by the claimant that Mr Corcoran made unflattering remarks about her to other colleagues and on one particular occasion referred to the claimant as being 'stuck-up'. It is the claimant's evidence that she felt threatened by this, behaviour which situation was not helped by the claimant's perception that her immediate boss, Mr Willie Kealy, news editor, was also behaving in an antagonistic and impatient manner towards her. The Tribunal was told that the claimant made no complaint to anybody about her perception of her working environment until late 1998. The claimant told the Tribunal that up to this time although perplexed at this treatment by a work colleague she made a decision to try and get on with her work. Her evidence was that the hostility intensified in late 1997 and in to 1998.

The Tribunal was told that in August 1998 while on a staff cruise around Dublin Bay, the claimant took the opportunity to speak to Mr Corcoran directly about the atmosphere in the office. It was the claimant's evidence that she took this decision as she felt her work would suffer if matters continued as they did. It was her evidence that, when approached, Mr Corcoran professed not to know what the claimant was talking about. In evidence to the Tribunal Mr Corcoran denied the allegations being made by the claimant but conceded that in August 1998 the claimant had approached him and he agreed that the subject-matter of her discussion was what she perceived to be the bad atmosphere in the office.

Mr Corcoran denies however, being aggressive towards the claimant in his response to her on that date and moreover, it is Mr Corcoran's contention that he had at all times been reasonable and friendly with the claimant in the work environment.

The Tribunal was told by the claimant that following this approach, the situation in the work environment continued as before but the claimant did not raise the issue with senior management between August 1998 and September 1999. In September 1999 the claimant initiated a meeting with her immediate superior, Mr Willie Kealy. The events, which triggered this meeting were as follows.

In August the claimant had been invited to a meeting with Angus Fanning, editor of the Sunday Independent and Ann Harris, features editor and deputy editor. In the course of this meeting the claimant was told by Ms Harris that the respondent had come up with the idea that the claimant might replace Terry Keane who had resigned her position as columnist with the Sunday Independent. The claimant understood this to mean she would no longer be crime correspondent but rather the replacement for the 'Keane Edge'. The claimant's initial response to the respondent's suggestion was one of astonishment and bafflement and she had immediately declined the offer. However, a day later the claimant advised Mr Fanning that she would do the 'Keane Edge' column on a trial basis provided she could continue to do crime stories in the same week. The claimant told the Tribunal that the factor which led her to agree to the 'Keane Edge' column on a trial basis was the fact that she had been approached by two of the most senior people in the newspaper. Having written the 'Keane Edge' column for a week the claimant informed Mr Fanning of her decision not to continue with this column. It is the claimant's evidence that Mr Fanning reacted with anger at her decision. It is around this time that the claimant alleges Mr Corcoran hurled a cigarette at her feet, an action strenuously denied by Mr Corcoran in his evidence to this Tribunal. The Tribunal makes no specific finding in relation to this alleged incident

The Tribunal was told by Ms Allen that within a week of her rejecting the 'Keane Edge' offer she received a memo from Mr Kealy requesting her attendance in the office on a daily basis from 10 a.m. This memo was addressed to the claimant and four other colleagues. The claimant had concerns about the contents of the memo which she saw as an interference with the flexible working conditions agreed between herself and Mr Fanning at the commencement of her employment and which, if she were to accept the memo and still work as an effective crime correspondent, would effectively mean she would be constantly working. Prior to meeting Mr Kealy, the claimant had approached Kevin Moore, Father of the NUJ chapel, to complain about the memo. Mr Moore had told the claimant it was his belief that the memo was designed to get at her. In this regard the Tribunal notes Mr Moore's own evidence regarding the memo, in particular his evidence of having himself (as a recipient of the memo) approached Mr Kealy about same and having being assured by Mr Kealy that the object of the memo was to get the claimant into the office at a specified time. Mr Moore confirmed to the Tribunal his belief that the memo was designed for Ms Allen.

In addition to her concerns regarding the memo in question the claimant in her evidence outlined the other factors which led her to seek a meeting with Mr Kealy in September 1999. The Tribunal was told by the claimant that at this time she continued to be ignored both by Mr Corcoran and Mr Kealy, which treatment was affecting the claimant both at home and at work. She made this complaint of being ignored by both men to Mr Kealy and told him that she did not want negativity to prevail in the workplace. Moreover, the claimant had heard rumours to the effect that other crime journalists were being recruited by the respondent and that Mr Corcoran had offered the claimant's job to a third party. At the meeting in September the claimant advised Mr Kealy of these grievances and told him of the effect it was having on her morale and the possible it might have on her productivity. The claimant had advised Mr Kealy that if the negativity and hostility in the workplace was not dealt with she felt she would have a nervous breakdown. The claimant had been in tears for most of this meeting.

The Tribunal note Mr Kealy's evidence of the meeting with Ms Allen in September 1999. In his residence Mr Kealy acknowledged that for the greater part of this meeting the claimant was in an extremely upset state. Mr Kealy in his evidence did not dispute that the claimant had made complaint about her working relationship with Mr Corcoran or that she had raised the issue of having heard both from colleagues and on the street that a named third party was being recruited as crime correspondent. The Tribunal was told that Mr Kealy had advised the claimant of the circumstances in which recruiting the third party came about and he had advised the claimant that her job as a crime correspondent was not in jeopardy. Mr Kealy disputed Ms Allen's account of their discussion regarding her work hours. It was Mr Kealy's evidence that at this meeting in September the claimant had requested from him that she work from home, a request Mr Kealy refused on the basis that the claimant would have had no chance of improving her integration into the team and on the basis that it would be detrimental to the running of the office.

Both the claimant and Mr Kealy agreed in evidence that the September 1999 meeting ended with Mr Kealy agreeing to raise with Mr Corcoran the issues outlined by the claimant at the meeting.

In the course of her evidence Ms Allen told the Tribunal that at no stage after this meeting did Mr Kealy revert to her about the issues and concerns she had regarding Mr Corcoran. In his evidence Mr Kealy agreed that he did not revert to the claimant after his meeting with Mr Corcoran. He told the Tribunal that while he was the claimant's manager he had not received any training in management skills nor had he contacted the human resources manager or any other person for advice as to how to deal with the claimant's grievance.

It was the claimant's evidence to the Tribunal that, rather than matters improving in the aftermath of the September 1999 meeting, they deteriorated to a point where the claimant felt 'ambushed' by the next event that occurred. The Tribunal was told that in October the claimant had been called to a meeting in Mr Fanning's office, which meeting Mr Kealy and Ms Harris attended. She was informed at that meeting that changes were being made in the newsroom in which Mr Kealy would be assuming a more administrative role and that the claimant's new boss would be Mr Corcoran. The claimant was queried as to her feelings about this. At that meeting the claimant advised the respondent that she did not have a problem working with Mr Corcoran. She told the Tribunal that she gave this response at the meeting because she believed that if she had not agreed she would end up being told to get out or to move somewhere else.

Mr Kealy's evidence was that at the meeting with Mr Fanning the claimant did not present in any way as being under threat by the information that was being imparted.

Following this meeting Ms Allen continued to do her work as a crime correspondent, which work continued to be assigned to her by Mr Kealy. Her evidence was that her work environment did not improve and she continued to remain largely unacknowledged by Mr Corcoran and Mr Kealy. The Tribunal was told that at this point the work situation was affecting the claimant's morale in that she found it difficult even to pick up the phone to her contacts.

On the evidence adduced, the Tribunal is satisfied that in September 1999, when the claimant spoke to her immediate manager Mr Kealy, her perception that she was being subjected over a period of time to a hostile working environment was not unreasonable. The Tribunal also concludes that the claimant's belief by September 1999 that her position as crime correspondent was being undermined was not an unreasonable one. The Tribunal concludes that it was reasonable for the claimant to pursue these matters with the respondent.

We have come to our conclusion on the hostility issue for the following reasons. While specific incidents of hostility and or isolation were denied by Mr Kealy and Mr Corcoran it is common case that the claimant approached Mr Corcoran in August 1998 and Mr Kealy in September 1999 with such complaint. The Tribunal accepts that the claimant could hardly have initiated an approach to these persons without some factual basis for such a step. Moreover, the Tribunal also takes into consideration the unchallenged evidence of Andrew Hanlon, the claimant's husband, who stated that in or about November 1998 he took it upon himself to speak to Mr Kealy about his concern that the claimant had been coming home from work in a state of distress on a number of occasions. We are satisfied therefore that by September 1999 Mr Kealy was or ought to have been on alert, whether it would eventually be established as a matter of fact or otherwise, that the claimant's perception of her working relationship with Mr Corcoran and with himself was an extremely negative one.

We have already stated that the claimant's perception toward the end of 1999 that her job as crime correspondent was being undermined was not an unreasonable one and we so find because of the proximity in time between the claimant being offered and undertaking on a trial basis the job as 'Keane Edge' columnist and the claimant hearing about other journalists being recruited for jobs with the respondent newspaper. Furthermore, the Tribunal cannot disregard the proximity in time between the claimant ultimately declining the position as 'Keane Edge' columnist and the claimant's receipt of a memo requesting her attendance at office meetings. In relation to this issue the Tribunal has paid particular regard to the evidence of the Mr Kevin Moore as to the intent behind the memo. We further accept her evidence that the respondent reacted negatively to her decision not to proceed with the 'Keane Edge' column.

It would appear that for the remainder of the year 1999 no further action was taken by Ms Allen regarding her grievances and it is the case that no one had reverted to her regarding the grievances outlined by her in September.

In evidence the claimant told the Tribunal that in January 2000 she spoke to Mr Kealy with a view to advising him that she intended to take in the spring of 2000 some 16 days leave due to her for the purposes of working on a book. Both Mr Kealy and the claimant agree that she was told to put her request in writing which she duly did in March 2000. On April 6 the claimant received a response in writing from Mr Kealy in which he took issue with the claimant's 'unprecedented accumulation' of days off and moreover, wherein he advised the claimant that such accumulation must not happen again. In that letter Mr Kealy set out the work practices which the claimant was expected to adhere to and advised her that the working day was from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Tuesday to Friday and that she was required to be at her desk in the office by 10 a.m. on those days unless by prior arrangement with Mr Kealy. The claimant was further advised as follows: 'failure to comply with this constitutes absence from work and will be recorded as such on the official attendance record'.

In her evidence to the Tribunal the claimant described her reaction to the letter. She viewed Mr Kealy's reaction to the days off requested as completely at variance with what had been verbally agreed by the parties in January and she viewed Mr Kealy's injunction regarding attendance at the office and the consequences if she defaulted as being completely confrontational and, moreover at variance with what had been agreed between the claimant and Mr Fanning, editor, at the commencement of her employment as to how she could carry out her work as crime correspondent. It was the claimant's evidence that she had been given wide latitude by Mr Fanning as to how she could work as crime correspondent, a latitude which was extended to all correspondents in the newspaper.

The claimant's response to Mr Kealy was a letter written by her on April 7, 2000. Prior to sending this letter the claimant met off-site with Mr Moore, to discuss the contents of Mr Kealy's letter. In her evidence to the Tribunal the claimant was unsure as to whether or not Mr Moore had sight of the letter the claimant had intended to send Mr Kealy. The Tribunal notes however that in his evidence Mr Moore confirmed that at this time the claimant made a complaint to him about being harassed by Mr Kealy and Mr Corcoran. The gist of Mr Moore's evidence was that he took Ms Allen's complaint seriously and was willing to process same. Mr Moore's offer to process her complaint at this time is disputed by the claimant. The Tribunal notes Mr Moore's evidence that while he himself did not observe hostility towards the claimant he did not consider her complaints to be frivolous at that time.

Following her meeting with Mr Moore the claimant sent her letter of April 7 to Mr Kealy. The contents of that letter has been read into the record of the Tribunal and it is not intended to set out same here. From the contents of that letter it is clear to the tribunal that on April 7, 2000 not only did the claimant take issue with what she saw as Mr Kealy's about-turn on the holiday issue and what she saw as Mr Kealy's attempt to change the terms and conditions of her job as a crime correspondent, but more importantly for the first time since her employment began, the claimant put in writing to her employer her complaints about the isolation and marginalisation she felt in the work environment. Furthermore the claimant advised Mr Kealy that she regarded the tone of his letter as evidence of the hostile attitude of which she was now complaining and in respect of which she had made a verbal complaint in 1999.

It is common case that shortly after sending this letter, the claimant had a meeting with Mr Kealy and both Ms Allen and Mr Kealy agreed in evidence that Mr Kealy apologised for his letter and told the claimant that he was in a 'grumpy' mood when he sent it. At this meeting Mr Kealy had requested the claimant to tear up the letter he had sent her and he had puported to throw the claimant's letter of response into the litter bin. Mr Kealy was advised by the claimant that she wanted a written response to her letter from him. It is not disputed but that the claimant retrieved her letter from the bin and placed it back on Mr Kealy's desk. Nor is it disputed that at this meeting the claimant refused to tear up or otherwise disregard Mr Kealy's letter to her which letter had already being carbon copied to another work colleague by Mr Kealy. It was the claimant's evidence that she requested a written response from Mr Kealy to her letter of complaint of April 7, 2000. We accept that she made such request of Mr Kealy and in this regard we note the contents of a memo written by Ms Allen to Mr Kealy in May 2000 reminding him that he had promised to respond to the issues the claimant had raised in her earlier correspondence. It is common case that no written reply was sent to Ms Allen and in his evidence Mr Kealy's explanation for this was twofold; he felt that he had already clarified the claimant's position and moreover he was not willing to give the claimant 'a charter' (regarding her work hours) which would suggest the claimant was a free agent.

Having given careful consideration to the evidence of the parties, it is the view of the Tribunal that the unilateral decision taken by Mr Kealy after his meeting with the claimant in April 2000 to treat the issues raised by the claimant in her letter of April 7 as having being clarified was somewhat disingenuous. While it was certainly open to Mr Kealy to rescind the strictures he had put on the claimant's work practices in his letter of April 6 it was not, in the view of the Tribunal, open to him, as the claimant's immediate manager, to disregard the complaints regarding isolation and marginalisation at work reiterated by her in the letter of April 7, 2000. The Tribunal is satisfied on the evidence that from September 1999 the claimant continued to have cause for complaint in this regard.

The Tribunal notes the evidence of Declan Carlyle, human resources manager with the respondent who told the Tribunal that in April 2000 he had come in possession of the claimant's letter to Mr Kealy of April 7. The claimant had sent a copy of this letter to the human resources division. Both Ms Allen and Mr Carlyle agree that the latter had approached Ms Allen about the memo and had stated he wished to speak to her. The claimant's evidence is that she made a number of calls to Mr Carlyle seeking such a meeting but that he had not responded to her calls. Mr Carlyle's evidence is that he had gone to Mr Kealy who told him that the matter had been resolved and to forget it. It is accepted by Mr Carlyle that at no point did he revert to Ms Allen after meeting Mr Kealy. In his evidence to the Tribunal, Mr Carlyle stated that as human resources manger his 'antennae would have been up' if he had heard mention of any bullying or harassment of the claimant in view of the fact that by mid-2000 he had participated in the formulation of an anti-bullying policy for the respondent. While Mr Carlyle agreed in cross-examination that references by the claimant to hostility, isolation and marginalisation in her letter of April 9 had nothing to do with leave, his evidence to the Tribunal was that he saw the claimant's letter as just being about leave.

Having regard to the contents of the claimant's letter of April 7, 2000 and having regard to the state of Mr Carlyle's knowledge as to what or what not might constitute bullying or harassment its the work place, the Tribunal cannot accept as reasonable Mr Carlyle's failure to revert to the claimant.

In the course of the hearing the claimant gave evidence of two meetings she initiated with Mr Fanning, editor, on May 10 and 17, 2000 respectively. It is Ms Allen's evidence that she went to Mr Fanning because of the contents of Mr Kealy's letter of April 6, 2000 and because of remarks made by Mr Kealy to her regarding the level of her salary. The Tribunal has also heard the evidence of Mr Fanning regarding what transpired at these meetings. Mr Fanning does not dispute that at the May 10 meeting the claimant was making a complaint, which complaint he interpreted as the claimant querying her value to the paper. Mr Fanning agreed that he had been shown Mr Kealy's letter of April 6 by Ms Allen. However, Mr Fanning disputes the claimant's evidence that she showed him a copy of her reply of April 7. He further disputes that he had described the contents of Mr Kealy's letter to the claimant as disgraceful. Mr Fanning gave evidence that at the May 17 meeting with Ms Allen, at which Ms Harris also attended she had made reference to Mr Corcoran whose negativity she maintained was contributing to her low morale. Mr Fanning's evidence was that at this meeting he reassured the claimant about her value to the paper and the good stories she had worked on. Mr Fanning told the Tribunal that although at this time he felt that her performance rate had declined he did not communicate this to the claimant so as not to affect her morale. Mr Fanning had received complaints about the claimant's performance rate from Mr Kealy but had not at any stage communicated those complaints to Ms Allen. Mr Fanning told the Tribunal that he had gone back to Mr Kealy with Ms Allen's complaint and he had been told by Mr Kealy that the letter of April 6 had been withdrawn by him. He agreed under cross-examination that in all probability he did not revert to the claimant after speaking to Mr Kealy. He had felt matters had been resolved at this stage.

As already stated, in the course of this hearing a dispute arose between the parties as to whether or not by mid-May 2000, Mr Fanning had sight of the claimant's letter of complaint of the 7 April to Mr Kealy. Mr Fanning is adamant that at no stage did he have this letter, seeing it only for the first time in the course of this hearing. The claimant however has stated that this letter was given to Mr Fanning when she gave him a copy of Mr Kealy's letter. Mr Fanning has suggested that the reason the claimant would not have given him the letter was because of the reference in it to the agreement she says she had with Mr Fanning regarding work hours and work practices. In her letter the claimant had referred to Mr Fanning as agreeing with her on commencement that she could be 'a free agent' and that she could work from home and could operate independently as long as she completed her stories. It is Mr Fanning's contention that the claimant would not have shown him a copy of this letter since the agreement referred to therein between himself and Ms Allen was not the one which had been agreed between them at the commencement of her employment.

On balance, the Tribunal is of the view that the claimant did produce a copy of her letter of April 7 at the May meetings. We so find for a number of reasons. Firstly, because the reason she went to Mr Fanning in the first place was to complain, inter alia, about the strictures being put on her work practices.

Secondly, by May 2000 the claimant had already given a copy of the letter to the human resources department and therefore who might see this letter thereafter was to some extent out of the control of the claimant herself. At this time it was entirely feasible that the letter could have gone to Mr Fanning via Mr Carlyle or Mr Kealy. That neither did so is not the relevant consideration. What the Tribunal considers relevant is that Ms Allen would have known that either Mr Kealy or Mr Carlyle could have shown the letter to Mr Fanning. Thirdly, the agreement on work practiced referred to in the claimant's letter does not, in the Tribunal's view, differ in any great respect from the account given by Mr Fanning himself of what was agreed between the parties at the outset of the claimant's employment about how she could operate as crime correspondent. Mr Fanning's evidence was that the claimant would be given 'wide latitude' and 'a free hand' to pursue her stories provide she delivered those stories. The tribunal also notes Mr Fanning's evidence in reply to a question in cross-examination that the request from Mr Kealy for the claimant to be at her desk by 10 a.m. Tuesday to Friday was a significant change to what was agreed between Mr Fanning and Ms Allen when she took up employment with the respondent. Having regard to all these factors the Tribunal accepts that Ms Allen had been given considerable latitude by Mr Fanning regarding how she could operate as crime correspondent.

It was, in the Tribunal's view, incumbent on Mr Fanning by May 2000 to make such an enquiry as was necessary about Ms Allen's complaints given his state of knowledge at that time. This is particularly so in light of Mr Fanning's then knowledge that the time when Mr Corcoran would become the claimant's direct boss was imminent. His failure to pursue the matter and revert to her was something, in the view of the Tribunal, that could reasonably be taken into consideration by her at a later stage.

It is also clear from the evidence that notwithstanding the airing by the claimant of her grievances with Mr Kealy, Mr Fanning, Ms Harris and Mr Carlyle over the months of April and May 2000, the claimant had reason to re-state some of those grievances to Michael Roche, Group Managing Editor of the respondent paper, at a meeting she had with him in June 2000. It would appear that opportunity was taken by the claimant to do so following a request by Mr Roche that she meet with him to discuss aspects of her remuneration, in particular her expenses. In his evidence to the Tribunal Mr Roche agreed that the claimant when approached had indicated to him that she wished to discuss with him problems she was having with the respondent. It is clear that Mr Roche agreed to meet the claimant regarding these issues and ultimately a meeting was set up between the claimant, Mr Kealy and Mr Roche for June 29, 2000.

Between June 1 and 26, 2000 a number of other meetings took place between the claimant and Mr Roche where the parties renegotiated certain aspects of the financial terms of the claimant's contract of employment. Mr Roche agreed in evidence that some 12-months prior to this meeting the respondent had made changes to the claimant's expenses agreement, to the detriment of the claimant and about which she was not happy and the series of meetings in June regarding expenses was to sort this matter out. It is submitted on behalf of the claimant in this case that as part of her case for constructive dismissal the claimant is entitled to rely on the changes that were made to her expenses agreement, in particular the removal of notional expenses and the capping of vouched expenses. It is also submitted that benefits such as foreign travel and free car insurance were unilaterally removed from the claimant's contract of employment. The Tribunal has considered this aspect of the case and overall the Tribunal concludes that notwithstanding that the claimant had cause for complaint to Mr Roche in June 2000 as to the manner in which some of these issues were handled by the respondent, the Tribunal is satisfied that agreement on this aspect of the claimant's employment was reached between the parties in June 2000 and therefore the Tribunal does not accept that this issue can form part of the claimant's case for constructive dismissal.

The Tribunal has considered the evidence of the parties regarding what transpired at the meeting of June 29, 2000. The Tribunal is satisfied that the claimant made a complaint to Mr Roche about the atmosphere in the office, the hostility she was being subjected to and the fact that Mr Kealy had made reference to her salary within earshot of fellow workers. We are satisfied that no specific mention was made by Ms Allen of Mr Corcoran at this meeting. We are further satisfied that there was discussion among the parties about the claimant's working hours and the attempts by the respondent, as the claimant saw it, to change the agreement she had with Mr Fanning. It is agreed by all relevant parties that that meeting ended with Ms Allen and Mr Kealy shaking hands and it is Ms Allen's evidence that she was happy with the outcome of that meeting. While, at this hearing, there was disagreement between Ms Allen and Mr Roche as to what was being required of her regarding her attendance in the office, the Tribunal is satisfied to accept Ms Allen's evidence that at the end of that meeting there was recognition by all concerned that she had to be allowed flexibility in her job as crime correspondent.

The Tribunal notes that in his direct evidence Mr Roche stated that at the meeting of June 29, no mention was made by Ms Allen of any deal she had with Mr Fanning regarding how she operated as crime correspondent. However, it is the view of the Tribunal that evidence of what Ms Allen was saying was her agreement was or ought to have been know, to Mr Roche on June 29 as copies of both Mr Kealy's letter of April 6 and the claimant's response of April 7, 2000 were given to him by Ms Allen in the course of the meeting. This he accepted in evidence while disputing Ms Allen's counsel's suggestion that he had received a copy of Ms Allen's memo prior to this from Mr Carlyle.

While the Tribunal notes Mr Roche's very frank reply in cross-examination that he had not read Ms Allen's memo in detail and had only glanced at it, it is the view of the Tribunal that, given that he had received this memo in the course of a meeting initiated by Ms Allen to discuss problems she was having in her workplace it was incumbent on Mr Roche to read same in view of the nature of the complaints being made.

In her evidence to the Tribunal, the claimant describes the next significant event in her working relationship with the respondent as occurring in August 2000. At this time a reporter, Mr Reilly was recruited by the respondent. In her evidence the claimant states that she had no difficulty with Mr Reilly being retained as a staff reporter but that she did begin to have cause for concern when he was assigned crime stories. In her evidence the claimant acknowledged that assigning crime stories to reporters other than crime correspondents was a feature of newspaper life but her concern was that stories were being taken away from her. The claimant gave evidence of Mr Kealy, in early September 2000, having assigned a particular story to Mr Reilly when he had specifically instructed the claimant to return from Donegal where she was working on another story to take up this assignment. The claimant's evidence to the Tribunal is that she returned forthwith to be met with the fact that the story had by then been given to Mr Reilly. The claimant's evidence is that when queried as to why this had happened, Mr Kealy's response was that he 'felt like it'. In his evidence to the Tribunal, Mr Kealy does not dispute that he telephoned Ms Allen regarding the particular story or that she returned the following day to work on same. However, Mr Kealy's evidence to the Tribunal was that he gave the story to Mr Reilly on the basis that he could not be sure when Ms Allen would arrive back.

The Tribunal has considered the evidence of Mr Kealy and that of the claimant regarding this incident, an incident in respect of which the claimant in her evidence has set great store. Having regard to all the factors in this case it is the view of the Tribunal that the claimant was not unreasonable in viewing the reassignment of the story as a cause of concern to her and we do not view as unreasonable the claimant's perception at this time that her job as crime correspondent was being undermined.

The Tribunal was told that on September 9, 2000, the claimant was advised by Mr Kealy to attend an office meeting scheduled for the September 12, the purpose of which was to officially welcome Mr Reilly to the news team as a reporter and to publicise the appointment of Mr Corcoran as assistant editor news. The claimant, Mr Kealy, Mr Corcoran and Mr Liam Collins gave evidence as to what transpired at that meeting. By and large there was no dispute as to what occurred and essentially at this meeting Mr Kealy officially welcomed Mr Reilly, made reference also to Mr Collins and latterly officially welcomed Mr Corcoran as assistant editor news. Conduct of the meeting was then passed to Mr Corcoran. It is common case that Mr Corcoran scheduled a meeting of the news team for 10 a.m., the next morning.

In her evidence to the Tribunal the claimant outlined her reaction to the manner in which the meeting was conducted which meeting for all intents and purposes appears to be the trigger which led the claimant to seek a meeting with Mr Roche, which took place the following day. In the course of her evidence to the Tribunal, the claimant described herself as the 'invisible person' at this meeting with her work colleagues and her now new boss Mr Corcoran. The Tribunal accepts as credible Ms Allen's evidence as to how she perceived that meeting.

The respondent witnesses have stated in evidence that since nothing had changed regarding the claimant's status on September 12 there was no need to specifically address the claimant or acknowledge her presence.

The claimant perceived what went on as an example of the isolation and hostility about which she previously complained. Was the claimant's perception a reasonable one in the circumstances? We find that it was. We do so for the following reasons. While we accept that Ms Allen's status had not changed it is the case that from the September 12 her working relationship with Mr Corcoran was now different. She would now be reporting to him as deputy news editor. Had not Ms Allen complained previously about her perception of a hostile working environment, the manner in which the meeting of September 12 was conducted might not in itself have been significant but, taking place as it did against a background of complaints made by the claimant about isolation and marginalisation her perception of that meeting was not an unreasonable one in all the circumstances.

The Tribunal also finds that in the circumstances it was not an unreasonable belief on her part that once again strictures were being put on how she did her work. Whether this was the intention or not is not the issue. The claimant was not unreasonable in viewing it as such in light of the earlier events of September 1999 and April 2000 and in light of the fact (as supported by Mr Kealy's own evidence), that the request to the claimant to attend 10 a.m. meetings had been abandoned for a number of months prior to September 2000.

The respondent witnesses have given evidence that they perceived no sign of distress at this meeting. Whatever the demeanour of the claimant at that meeting it is clear from the evidence of her doctor whom she attended on September 9 and indeed from the evidence of Mr Roche who met her on September 13 that the claimant was in considerable distress in September 2000. Prior to the meeting of September 12 the claimant had consulted with her general practitioner, Dr Malone, and the symptoms with which the claimant had presented on that date namely sleeplessness, palpitation, nervousness, headaches, poor appetite are not disputed. Dr Malone was advised by the claimant that her difficulties related to her work situation and in evidence his medical opinion was that it was her work situation that had caused her health difficulties. We are satisfied, on the claimant's evidence, that her work environment was causing over a period of time the concentration difficulties and loss of confidence she complained of.

On the evidence adduced in this case, the Tribunal is satisfied that the situation that pertained in the claimant's work environment necessitated medical intervention and prompted her to again seek a meeting with Mr Roche, group managing editor of the respondent.

The Tribunal has heard evidence of the meeting of September 13 which took place between Ms Allen and Mr Roche and which the claimant's husband attended. By and large, no great dispute arises about what Ms Allen complained of at that meeting. We are satisfied that she outlined to Mr Roche the problems she said continued to exist in the workplace culminating in the isolation she said she experienced on September 12. We are satisfied that she informed Mr Roche of her belief that crime stories had been taken away from her, and of her concern that the clarification she believed she had after the June 2000 meeting regarding her work hours was again being undermined by the reintroduction by Mr Corcoran of 10.30 a.m. meetings. She complained also of what she perceived to be dismissive remarks made by Mr Corcoran in public regarding the job of crime reporting. She outlined her concern at another reference by Mr Kealy in September 2000, to her being one of the highest paid members of staff which reference according to the claimant was made in front of work colleagues. While Mr Kealy in evidence has set out the context in which he says reference to her salary came about the Tribunal is inclined to favour the claimant's evidence in this regard. The Tribunal accepts that the respondent witnesses at this Tribunal disputed the matters in respect of which the claimant made complaint to Mr Roche but on balance the Tribunal accepts that the claimant had cause for complaint at this time. We note that while Mr Roche himself sought to address some of the claimant's issues in the course of the meeting of September 13, it is not in any way disputed by him that the claimant was extremely distraught throughout the meeting and that she cried for a period of one hour and 50 minutes of that two-hour period. Mr Roche's view of the issues being raised by the claimant were that they were serious allegations which merited investigation indeed, Mr Roche agreed with the claimant's evidence that at the meeting, after hearing what she had to say, he advised her on a number of options open to her namely that she should consider moving, resigning, or going to the union and making an official complaint. Mr Roche also agreed that he told Ms Allen that she could consider taking a case for constructive dismissal though he disputes her evidence that he said to her she would probably win such a case.

Mr Roche has also stated that he told the claimant he would hold a series of meeting with the union and human resources and he would do it quickly. This was, in his words, to show Ms Allen that the respondent was prepared to act on her complaints.

It is common case that initially the claimant stated at the meeting that she was reluctant to go to any such meetings but she had been persuaded both by her husband and Mr Roche that she would have to attend at such investigation. It was the claimant's evidence that when her meeting with Mr Roche concluded her understanding was that she would be contacted by him to attend a meeting with all concerned. We accept her evidence in this regard.

Ms Allen gave evidence to the Tribunal of a telephone conversation she had with Mr Roche some three hours after meeting him when he informed her that he had spoken to all parties concerned but was not going to tell her what they said save that Mr Fanning and Ms Harris had been "flabbergasted" to hear of the claimant's complaints.

Ms Allen told the Tribunal that her reaction to this information was one of disbelief in view of the fact that both Mr Fanning and Mr Harris had previously been made aware by her of the difficulties she was encountering in the workplace. It was Ms Allen's evidence that Mr Roche advised her to talk to Mr Fanning and Ms Harris and that she would feel better for this. The claimant's evidence was that she told Mr Roche that she would call him back once she had discussed the matter with her husband. The Tribunal was told that before doing so the claimant received a telephone message from Mr Fanning to the effect that he had talked to Mr Roche and that he was sorry she was having a hard time. Mr Fanning had offered her a trip abroad and had stated that he wished to meet her with Ms Harris the following morning at a café in Blackrock.

The Tribunal was told that following receipt of this message the claimant telephoned Mr Roche and advised him she was extremely unhappy with any suggestion that she go back to people (Mr Fanning and Ms Harris) who the claimant believed had already neglected to deal with her grievances.

In his evidence Mr Roche stated that he saw the meeting with Mr Fanning and Ms Harris as a preliminary one and that he planned to be in attendance at such meeting and planned further investigation thereafter which would include, as already stated, the NUJ and the head of human resources. He disputed Ms Allen's evidence that she had told him of her objection to meeting Mr Fanning and Ms Harris. On balance, we accept that Ms Allen did relay her objection to Mr Roche.

In relation to the proposed Blackrock cafè meeting, the Tribunal has had the benefit of hearing from Mr Fanning and Ms Harris as to what was proposed. Mr Fanning's evidence was that, after being told by Mr Roche of the claimant's complaints and of her distraught state, he took 'a solo initiative' to meet Ms Allen and communicated that request to her by telephone. He agreed he offered her a trip abroad. Ms Harris in her evidence agreed with Mr Fanning that the meeting he was offering was to be a meeting 'independent' of the investigative process.

The Tribunal has considered the evidence of all relevant witnesses regarding the events of September 13 and the Tribunal finds that there is conflict in the evidence of the respondent witnesses as to what was the purpose of and who was to attend the Blackrock café meeting. The Tribunal notes that no mention of Mr Roche's intended presence at that meeting was made by either Mr Fanning or Ms Harris in the course of their evidence. Mr Roche in his evidence stated that he had such intentions. It is the claimant's evidence that her understanding of the message received on Friday, September 13 was that what was being offered was purely a meeting with Mr Fanning and Ms Harris.

The acceptance or otherwise of Ms Allen's understanding of this matter by the Tribunal is important having regard to the fact that her understanding was ultimately one of the factors which led her to resign her employment on September 20, 2000.

Having given careful consideration to the evidence of the relevant witnesses the Tribunal accepts as reasonable the claimant's belief that the meeting proposed for the following day was only to be with Mr Fanning and Ms Harris.

It is the claimant's contention that this meeting with Mr Fanning, about whose ability to deal with her problems she had severe reservations, in light of his failure to deal with her previous complaints, was to be the extent of the respondent's investigation into her grievances. The question for the Tribunal is whether this was a reasonably held belief on her part. Having carefully deliberated on all of the evidence in this case, it is the finding of the Tribunal that this was not an unreasonable assumption on her part.

In arriving at this finding the Tribunal has taken into consideration the very fact that telephone calls were made to Ms Allen at all on the evening of September 13. It is the view of the Tribunal that a reasonable response from the respondent, after Ms Allen's meeting with Mr Roche, would have been written communication to her advising her that an investigation would commence and advising her of the dates of any proposed meetings. The Tribunal also considers it significant, notwithstanding the claimant's refusal to meet Mr Fanning, communicated to Mr Roche on September 13, 2000, that from that date to September 20, no written communication was made with the claimant even acknowledging that she had made complaints of such nature that, in Mr Roche's evidence, merited investigation by him. In all the circumstances of this case the Tribunal accepts as not unreasonable the claimant's belief that she could have no confidence in the respondent to address the complaints she had made.

The Tribunal also considers it surprising that Ms Allen was being offered on September 13 a trip abroad at a time when the respondent knew of the claimant's distraught state and at a time when part of the advice being given to her by Mr Roche was that she take sick leave.

By letter dated September 20, the claimant advised Mr Fanning that she was resigning her employment and claiming constructive dismissal.

The issue for the Tribunal is whether Ms Allen was dismissed by construction under the definition of dismissal under section 1(b) of the Unfair Dismissal Act 1977, which provides as follows:

> … the termination by the employee of his contract of employment with his employer, whether prior notice of termination was or was not given to the employer, in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been entitled, or it would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment without giving prior notice of termination to the employer.

Having regard to the aforementioned definition and to the evidence and submissions the Tribunal deems the proper test in this case is whether it was reasonable for Ms Allen to terminate her contract of employment.

Having given careful consideration to the evidence adduced and the submissions made on behalf of the parties and having regard to the various findings and conclusions arrived at by this Tribunal, as already outlined in this determination, it is the unanimous view of the Tribunal that it was reasonable in all the circumstances for the claimant to terminate her contract of employment.

Mr Connaughton BL, on behalf of the respondent, has submitted, inter alia, that it was incumbent on the claimant before resigning to utilise the NUJ grievance procedures. The objective of utilising the NUJ grievance procedure would have been to bring the claimant's grievances to the attention of the respondent. The Tribunal is however satisfied that at various stages throughout her employment and more particularly in September 2000 Ms Allen brought her complaints to senior management level within the respondent newspaper. We also note Mr Moore's evidence in cross-examination that an employee's grievance could be processed by either going to the union or directly to management.

Mr Connaughton also submits that the claimant cannot rely on any matter prior to June 29, 2000 as grounds for resigning her employment on the basis that the claimant, in her own evidence, expressed herself happy with the outcome of June 29, 2000 meeting at which she had outlined her grievances.

The Tribunal rejects this argument and does so having regard to the various findings and conclusions arrived at by the Tribunal as set out in this determination. The Tribunal considers it reasonable for the claimant to have taken into consideration the manner in which her various complaints were dealt with from 1999 through to 2000 in arriving at her conclusion that she had essentially lost faith in what was being offered by way of investigation by the respondent in September 2000. She was entitled to do so because we accept that she had cause for complaint after June 2000. The Tribunal therefore finds the claimant's conclusion that she could have no confidence in the respondent to either properly or effectively address her grievances was a reasonable conclusion in all the circumstances. Moreover, the claimant did not act unreasonably in taking into consideration the likely effect on her health and well-being were she to remain in the work environment. In assessing the reasonableness of her decision in this regard the Tribunal accepts that the effect on her health and well-being was a concern she had prior to her resignation, a concern that had been communicated to the respondent in September 1999.

Accordingly, the Tribunal unanimously finds the claimant to have been constructively dismissed and as no evidence has been offered to rebut the presumption of unfairness the Tribunal determines the claimant was unfairly dismissed for the purposes of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 to 1993. We do not find that the claimant contributed in any way to her dismissal.

Having found the claimant to have been unfairly dismissed the Tribunal must now address the issue of remedy. In his closing submission to the Tribunal, Mr Mallon BL on behalf of the claimant has argued that re-employment in any form is not a feasible option in this case having regard to the circumstances which led the claimant to terminate her contract of employment. Having regard to the matters in issue in this case the Tribunal accepts that neither re-instatement nor re-engagement is a suitable remedy in all the circumstances.

The preferred redress of the claimant is compensation. Both parties agree that since dismissal the claimant has been unfit for work by reason of illness. It is submitted on behalf of the claimant that the reason that she has been and remains unfit for work is due to the conduct of the respondent which conduct, it is submitted, has not only led to the, claimant's constructive dismissal but also directly to the claimant's illness.

It is submitted, on behalf of the respondent in its written submissions that the Tribunal, in the event of it finding that the claimant was unfairly dismissed, should reject the arguments being advanced on behalf of the claimant and hold that no financial loss has been suffered by her.

In this regard a number of matters arise for the Tribunal to determine. Firstly, we must determine, either as a matter of fact or probability, whether the matters of which the claimant complains led to her resignation led also to her illness. While as between the medical experts called on behalf of the claimant and the respondent there is dispute as to the nature of the claimant's illness both experts agree that conduct such as that complained of by the claimant can lead to illness. Dr Brophy is of the opinion that the claimant is suffering from a depressive illness occurring in the context of work-related difficulties. The Tribunal also notes the evidence of Professor Casey who gave evidence on behalf of the respondent. She disputes Dr Brophy's diagnosis of depressive illness and states that the claimant is suffering from an adjustment reaction or stress reaction. However, Professor Casey has stated in direct evidence to the Tribunal that bullying, harassment and intimidation in the work place can lead to the symptoms with which the claimant is presenting. Dr Malone who saw the claimant on September 9 and 5, 2000, stated in evidence that he attributed the symptoms with which the claimant was presenting to work-related difficulties and he had not ascertained any other cause for the claimant's medical condition other than her work environment.

Nowhere in the course of this hearing has the respondent put forward an alternative explanation for the claimant's illness.

On the basis of the findings already made as to what led the claimant to resign her employment with the respondent and on the basis of the medical evidence before the Tribunal, we are satisfied that the claimant's illness was caused by the factors which led to her constructive dismissal.

It is submitted on behalf of the claimant that in these circumstances she is entitled to be compensated for the financial loss suffered by her to date and for financial loss into the future having regard to the evidence of her medical expert.

The jurisdiction of the Tribunal to make an award of compensation is set out in section 7(1)(c)(i) of the Act which provides as follows:

> if the employee incurred any financial loss attributable to the dismissal, payment to him by the employer of such compensation in respect of the loss (not exceeding in amount 104 weeks remuneration in respect of the employment from which he was dismissed calculated in accordance with regulations under section 17 of this Act) as is just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances.

Section 7(2) of the Act goes on to provide a number of factors that must be taken into consideration in determining the amount of compensation payable. One of the factors that shall be taken into account is the extent to which any financial loss incurred was 'attributable to an act, omission or conduct by or on behalf of the employer'.

Financial loss is defined in section 7(3) as:

> . . . any actual loss and any estimated prospective loss of income attributable to the dismissal and the value of any loss or diminution, attributable to the dismissal, of the rights of the employee under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 1991 or in relation to superannuation;
> 'remuneration' includes allowances in the nature of pay and benefits in lieu of or in addition to pay.

It is submitted on behalf of the claimant that in the circumstances of this case, section 7(1)(c)(i) of the Act must be read in conjunction with section 7(2)(a). It is argued on behalf of the claimant that the import of these two provisions is that the Tribunal can compensate the claimant for the financial loss she has suffered to date and for financial loss into the future.

Counsel for both parties say they can find no Irish authority dealing specifically with the jurisdiction of the Tribunal to make an award of compensation in circumstances where an employee is unavailable for work due to illness attributable to the conduct or actions of the employer.

However, counsel for the claimant has referred the Tribunal to a number of court decisions in particular the decision of the Supreme Court in Martina Carney v. Balkan Tours Ltd [1997] 1 IR 153 and two decisions of the English Employment Appeals Tribunal namely Devine v. Designer Flowers Wholesale Florist Sundries Ltd [1993] IRLR 517 and Hilton International Hotels (UK) Ltd v. Faraji [1994] IRLR 265.

While it is agreed by the claimant's representative that the English decisions can only be of persuasive authority, reliance is placed on these decisions because of the similarity of section 74(1) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 to the provisions of section 7 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 to 1993.

The headnote from Devine illustrates the approach taken by the English EAT:

> The EAT held … an employee who has become unfit for work wholly or partly as a result of an unfair dismissal is entitled to compensation for loss of earnings for at least a reasonable period following the dismissal, until she might reasonably have been expected to find other employment. The Industrial Tribunal must have regard to the loss sustained by the employee, consider how far it is attributable to action taken by the employer, and arrive at a sum, which it considers just and equitable. There is no reason why the personal circumstances of the employee, including the effect of dismissal on her health should not be taken into account in ascertaining the appropriate amount of compensation. However the employee will not necessarily be entitled to loss of earnings for the whole period of unfitness for work. The fact that unfitness followed upon and was attributable to the dismissal does not perforce imply the whole period of unfitness thereupon must be attributable to the actions of the employer. There may be questions, for example, as to whether the unfitness might have manifested itself in any event.

In the case of Hilton International Hotels the English EAT has held that the Industrial Tribunal had not erred in finding that the unfairly dismissed employee was entitled to a compensatory award for loss of earnings notwithstanding that he was in receipt of invalidity benefit during the relevant period. The EAT held that the Industrial Tribunal was entitled to look behind the payment of the benefit, enquire what is the nature of the disability and decide whether same was attributable to the activity of the employer in unfairly dismissing the employee.

Much reliance is also placed by counsel for the claimant on the dicta of the Supreme Court in Carney. In that case the Supreme Court had to decide whether this Tribunal was entitled to have regard to the appellant employee's contribution to her dismissal as one of the relevant circumstances in determining the amount of compensation to be paid to the unfairly dismissed employee. In like manner to section 7(2) (a) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, section 7(2)(b) thereof provides that in determining the amount of compensation payable under section 7, regard shall be had to 'the extent (if any) to which the said financial loss was attributable to an action, omission or conduct by or on behalf of the employee'.

The Supreme Court confirmed the entitlement of this Tribunal to take into consideration the conduct of the employee prior to dismissal in assessing the level of compensation to be paid.

In support of the arguments regarding financial loss being made on behalf of the claimant in this case, counsel had referred the Tribunal to the judgment of Murphy J and in particular to the following passage from that judgment.

> It does seem to me that the discretion conferred upon the Tribunal (or adjudicating body) by s. 7 of the Act of 1977, in relation to the computation of a payment by way of compensation is very wide. Moreover, whilst the specific directives given to the adjudicating body by paras (a) and (b) and more particularly, (c) (dealing with mitigation) may be interpreted as referring to events subsequent to the dismissal the provisions of para. (d) of subs. 2 unquestionably refer to the machinery, which was or should have been resorted to in relation to the dismissal rather than event subsequent thereto. That provision coupled with the discretion conferred upon the adjudicating Tribunal in the widest terms would seem to me compelling reason for inferring the legislature intended that the body determining the nature or extent of the redress to which the employee was entitled should look at all of the circumstances of the case including the conduct of the parties prior to the dismissal. I am fortified in this view by the judgment of Ellis J in McCabe v. Lisney and Son [1981] ILRM 289 and the jurisprudence which has evolved based thereon. The fact that the legislature in 1993, made express provision in that regard must in the circumstances be interpreted as a provision made ex abundante cautela and to avoid the doubts which might well and, indeed, have arisen in the circumstances.

Having regard to the Supreme Court's interpretation of what was intended by the legislature in section 7(1)(c)(i) and section 7(2) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, the Tribunal is satisfied that, in the circumstances of the present case, it must consider the extent to which the claimant's financial loss is attributable to any act or omission or conduct by or on behalf of the respondent prior to dismissal.

While in no way binding on this Tribunal we are also satisfied to accept as persuasive the English EAT decision in Devine.

We have already set out our findings regarding the cause of the claimant's illness in this case. We are satisfied that her illness is attributable wholly to the factors which led her to resign her employment and claim constructive dismissal. Her illness had led to her financial loss. Having regard to the series of findings made by this Tribunal it follows that the Tribunal must hold that the claimant's financial loss is attributable to the conduct of the respondent. To hold otherwise, in light of the findings made, would in the view of this Tribunal, have the effect of leaving an unfairly dismissed employee (where reinstatement or re-engagement have been ruled out as unsuitable remedies) without any effective remedy for the financial loss suffered as a result of the dismissal. Such a result would in our view be contrary to the intention and spirit of section 7 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977.

The Tribunal must now assess the extent of the financial loss suffered by the claimant. It is clear that she is unable to work since her dismissal and at the time of this hearing she remains unfit for work. We are satisfied that she has sustained financial loss to date. There is dispute between the parties' medical experts not just in relation to the nature of the claimant's illness, but also the likely duration of same. We have considered the evidence of the medical witnesses and overall the Tribunal accepts on balance the evidence of Dr Brophy as to diagnosis and the prognosis for recovery. In his evidence given on February 6, 2001 he envisaged from that time a period of recovery of some 18 months. The Tribunal estimates therefore, that because of her illness, the claimant will suffer financial loss for a period of almost two years from the date of dismissal. The Tribunal also accepts as not unreasonable the submission made on behalf of the claimant that, following recovery (even allowing for some earlier element of recovery) a period of time will elapse before she will achieve a salary commensurate with that of her pre-dismissal earnings. The Tribunal assesses as reasonable, following recovery, that it will take a period of at least a year for the claimant to achieve similar earnings. We accept therefore that she will incur financial loss in this period.

No specific figure was given in respect of the claimant's net weekly loss as a result of her dismissal. A figure of £903.85 per week has been given in the T1A in respect of her weekly gross earnings which figure is indicative of the agreed yearly salary of £47,000 she was on at the time of dismissal. The Tribunal therefore estimates in all probability her average weekly net loss to be in the region of £500 per week. We accept she will have ongoing loss for the period she remains unfit for work and until she achieves similar employment.

In all the circumstances therefore, having regard to her loss to date and the time-frame accepted by the Tribunal for future loss we deem as just and equitable that the claimant be awarded compensation in the sum of £70,500.30 being the equivalent of 78 weeks remuneration (78 x £903.85) for unfair dismissal.

Employment – Parallel complaints of dismissal and discrimination – Jurisdiction – Promotion – Interview – Direct discrimination – Gender – Marital status – Whether prima facie case – Employment Equality Act 1998 (No. 21), sections 6, 8, 77, 84 and 101(4) – Council Directive 75/117 – Council Directive 76/207

Facts In January 1999, the claimant and four male colleagues were interviewed for the vacant position of marketing manager at the Educational Building Society ('EBS'). The claimant was unsuccessful and alleged that she was discriminated against in the selection process on the grounds of gender and marital status. In particular, she alleged that she had a greater level of experience than the appointee. She further alleged that her third level qualifications were more suitable to the post that those of the appointee. She finally alleged that the selection process was not conducted in a transparent manner. She subsequently resigned from the EBS and referred a complaint under section 77(1) of the Employment Equality Act 1998 to the Director of Equality Investigations. Thereafter, the claimant further referred a claim of constructive dismissal to the Labour Court in accordance with section 77(2) of the Employment Equality Act 1998. The respondent contended that the claimant was seeking to rely on the same circumstances to support both claims and submitted that the Employment Equality Act 1998 prevented such a course of action. In addition, it rejected the claimant's allegations of discrimination.

(1) The referral of a complaint of constructive dismissal under section 77(2) of the Employment Equality Act 1998 does not create any obstacle to an Equality Officer investigating a complaint of discriminatory treatment referred to the Office of the Director of Equality Investigations under section 77(1) of the

Respondent(s) : Mr. Eamonn McCoy, IBEC, Confederation House, 84/86 Lower Baggot Street, Dublin 2

This case came before the Tribunal by way of an appeal by an employee against the recommendation of the Rights Commissioners in the case of John Travers –v- MBNA Ireland Limited (r-035800-ma-05-DI).

On the first day of the hearing the appeal under the Payment of Wages Acts, 1991 was withdrawn.

Claimant's Case:

The claimant gave evidence. He stated that he a qualified electrician and had worked in a number of different organisations in England.

In 2003 he decided to move to Ireland and attended the respondent's head office in Chester after submitting his curriculum vitae. At his interview he was informed by the Personnel Officer in Chester that there was a problem in the Facilities department in the respondent's premises in Carrick-on-Shannon. He explained that he had been told that an employee was absent on long-term sick leave. He was informed that he would be recruited into the Telemarketing department but would be seconded into the Facilities department. When asked, he said that the contract of employment given to him was in relation to Telemarketing. He stated, when asked, that he would be seconded into the Facilities department as a way of getting him "in the back door". The claimant stated that he felt it was a "ruse".

He commenced employment in Carrick-on-Shannon and was met by the Facilities Line Manager and was brought directly to the Facilities department. On March 25th 2004 he was sent a letter from the Personnel Manager to confirm his secondment to the Facilities department for an initial period of 3 months with a salary of € 28,160. The claimant told the Tribunal that he had never anything to do with the Telemarketing department.

When asked if he had questioned whether his position was to be regularised he replied that he had on a number of occasions to Facilities Line Manager. He said that the answer was always the same, there were no vacancies. When asked, he said that the Facilities Line Manager had mentioned the claimant returning to the Telemarketing department on a number of occasions but he never questioned it.

He received a letter, dated March 10th 2005, from the Personnel Manager informing him that his secondment would cease with effect from March 18th 2005 and that he would take up his original contracted role as Telemarketing Customer Specialist. The claimant told the Tribunal that he was "gobsmacked". He spoke to the Facilities Line Manager and was informed that he, the claimant, was included in the "headcount" of the Telemarketing department and the section was short staffed. The employee he had replaced was still on long-term sick leave at the time. The Facilities Line Manager told him that it was "out of his hands". He then approached the Personnel Manager who informed him to put his grievance in writing and it would be investigated.

He submitted a letter of grievance to the Personnel Manager on March 15th 2005. He received a reply dated March 18th 2005 informing him that his grievance was not upheld but informed him that he could raise the issue with the Head of European Telemarketing. The claimant told the Tribunal that he did not see the point in appealing the decision and was very disheartened. He attended his doctor, was diagnosed with severe depression and signed off work.

On March 22nd 2005 he wrote to the Personnel Manager in response to his March 18th letter. Three of the nine points set out in the letter where read out to the Tribunal. He stated that

1. "It had been made clear to me from the outset that there was an imminent vacancy in Facilities but that it was at the time blocked by the incumbent taking long term sick leave. That he was thought not likely to return, and that if he did he faced serious disciplinary action.
2. That my initial appointment was by way of a back door ruse is not of my doing. I feel that (and have felt for some time) that the fact that I was initially appointed in Chester & that the incumbents had no say in selection has quietly worked against me and has led to the present situation, which I deplore.
3. To sum up, I fell humiliated & degraded by the Company & in such a state of mind that I have to seek medical assistance which will probably lead to a short period of certified leave."

While on certified sick leave he was informed of a position available in the Facilities department and submitted an application to the People Relations Manager. This position was the job the claimant had been performing before commencing sick leave. An interview was set for May 4th 2005. On May 2nd 2005 he emailed the People Relations Manager informing him that, on reflection, he was not taking up the interview, was resigning from his position and was reserving the right to seek remedy by way of constructive dismissal. He received a reply on May 5th 2005.

The claimant gave evidence of loss.

When asked he said that he had signed his contract of employment in February 2004. This contract stated that he was employed as an Outbound Customer Specialist. The claimant stated that he signed it as he was going along with the "ruse" and what he had been told in Chester in order to facilitate the respondent. When asked, he said that he had received the company handbook. When asked, he said that the Facilities Line Manager had referred him to the Personnel Manager and not the People Relations Manager. The claimant stated that the company had not followed their own company procedures.

On cross-examination he replied, when asked, that it was common knowledge that the employee from the Facilities that was on long-term sick leave was to be dismissed. When asked, he replied that he had not met anyone from the Telemarketing department on his first day of his employment with the respondent. When asked, he stated that he had not asked anyone formally to deal with the situation of his secondment. He thought the post had been allocated to him.

When asked, he said that he only remembered one call and one meeting with the People Relations Manager before he resigned. When asked if he had lodged a formal complaint against anyone he replied no.

On re-direction he stated that he did not appeal the Personnel's Manager to move him to the Telemarketing department as he felt "abused" by the respondent.

When asked by the Tribunal he stated that the initial interview he had attended was a technical interview, a telecommunications role had not been mentioned.

Respondent's Case:

On the second day of the hearing the Personnel Manager gave evidence. He explained that he was not the direct line Manager to the claimant.

He explained that he had met the claimant in Chester and had wrote to him on February 19th 2004 enclosing his contract and informing him that he would contact him later to discuss the temporary position in the Facilities department. He explained that it was unusual to send a covering letter with a contract but he wanted to inform the claimant about the temporary position.

On March 25th 2004 he again wrote to the claimant to inform him of the details of his secondment for a 3-month period. The claimant was also informed that he would be given two weeks notice of any change in this arrangement and on completion of the secondment he would return to European Telemarketing department.

On March 10th 2005 he wrote to the claimant informing him that his secondment would cease on March 18th 2005, he would take up his original role as Telemarketing Customer Specialist and his responsibility allowance of € 8,655 would also cease. The claimant was not happy and told the witness over the telephone. The claimant was asked to put his grievance in writing, which he did on March 15th 2005. The witness replied on March 18th 2005 stating the claimant's grievance was not upheld but he was given the opportunity to appeal. The witness told the Tribunal that, in his view, the respondent had been very clear on the claimant's original employment and temporary position in the Facilities department. When asked, the witness stated that the person the claimant could have appealed the decision to was the head of European Telemarketing department who was the claimant's Manager.

He stated that the claimant had resigned and he had no involvement in it, the Facilities Line Manager had informed him. He explained that the claimant had only been seconded in the Facilities department on a temporary basis. The Facilities Line Manager asked the witness to explain it to the claimant.

When asked about the posting of positions, the witness explained that positions in the respondent company were posted internally first then externally. The Facilities Line Manager informed the claimant of the availability of a position he could apply for once he returned to work from certified sick leave. When asked, he stated that there had not been any permanent positions available in the Facilities department in March 2005. He told the Tribunal that he knew the claimant had completed the application form for the position but had subsequently withdrawn it.

On cross-examination he explained that he had been a Human Relations Manager for six years. In relation to the covering letter attached to the contract of employment, the witness explained that he had been asked to include it by head office in Chester. When asked, he stated that he had met the claimant on the first day of his employment and had brought him to the Facilities department. He stated that he had no further contact with the claimant until his secondment had come to an end. The respondent company had decided to terminate all secondments at that time and staff were to return to their original positions.

When asked, he stated that he did not have notes of various conversations he had had with various people in the respondent's headquarters in Chester. When asked, he stated that he had spoken to the Facilities Line Manager about the claimant's grievance and the fact that the claimant had brought up the subject of a permanent position in the Facilities department. When asked, he stated that the People Relations Manager had reported to him but he felt that he, the witness, should deal with the claimant's grievance. When asked, the witness replied that the respondent did have a long-term sick leave policy. When asked about the position that was available in April 2005 in Facilities, he stated that he had not had prior knowledge of it's availability as all positions had to be approved.

On re-direction he explained that there had been a freeze on staff except those in customer facing areas.

The Facilities Line Manager gave evidence. He explained that he had been the claimant's line Manager in the Facilities department. He was not involved with the claimant's recruitment.

The witness explained that the premises in Carrick-on-Shannon had a staff of 1,000 with only 2 electricians, 1 out on sick leave. The witness explained that there was a freeze on hiring staff at the time but he had still requested a replacement. He explained that he had received a telephone call from headquarters in Chester informing him that the claimant was to be seconded to his department while an employee was on long-term sick leave. This employee was absent from November 2003 and finally leaving his employment in May 2004.

As the freeze on the hiring of staff was still ongoing in 2005, a directive from Management was issued to return all seconded staff to their original positions. The Personnel Manager asked the witness had he promised the claimant the position he had in the Facilities department but he said that all staff knew that all positions had to be posted.

When asked, the witness stated that the claimant's wages were paid from of the European Telemarketing department. When he had compiled the claimant's appraisal he had stated his location was the European Telemarketing department. When asked, he stated that the claimant had spoken to him about the employee absent on sick leave. The witness said that he told the claimant that if the position was approved it would be posted for application.

The witness explained when the employee on long-term sick leave resigned he completed a form for a replacement to be considered by the Resource Allocation Committee. He explained that if a member of a department left the Manager would apply for a new employee. The matter would be decided at Management level and posted for application. When asked, he stated that he had notified the claimant that his temporary position was to cease. When asked, he stated that the claimant had been paid a responsibility allowance.

On cross-examination he explained that at the time of the claimant's employment he had 14 staff including 2 electricians. The department ran 24 hours a day. When asked, he said that he had not been privy to the claimant's interview in Chester. When asked, the witness said that he been informed by head office in Chester that the claimant would be on secondment from European Telemarketing department to his department. When asked, he stated that he did not have any record of the telephone conversation. When asked, he said that he never had any problems with the claimant and had no recollection of the claimant complaining of work practices.

When asked, he stated that there could be 2 or 3 call outs per week with a set payment per callout. When put to him that the other electrician was called out more than the claimant, he replied that the security department would get a text concerning the fault and they would put in the call for an electrician. He said that he had not noticed a variance in the number of callouts between the claimant and the other electrician.

When asked, he stated that he had carried out appraisals on the claimant but could not recall specifically what he had written and did not have copies of them to submit to the Tribunal. He stated that the appraisals stated that the claimant was working in the European Telemarketing department. When asked when the claimant approached him about a full-time position he replied that it was in the first 6 months of his employment but was not sure how many times the claimant had asked him about the position. When asked, he said that he might have told the claimant there was a freeze on applications. When asked if he had a problem with the employee on long-term sick leave he replied that Personnel had been dealing with him but he had little expectation that he would have returned to work.

When asked, he stated that he applied for the position to be filled in May 2004. In 2005 he again wrote to the Committee to tell them how critical it was to fill the position. When asked, he stated that it was very clear from the Personnel Manager's letter of March 2004 that the position in Facilities was only a secondment for an initial period of 3 months. When asked what he had done to assist the claimant when he left on sick leave he replied that the Occupational Health department dealt with it.

Determination:

The contract was formed in Chester and the Tribunal entirely accepted the evidence of the claimant as to what occurred in Chester. It is significant that the evidence of the claimant was uncountered by any company witnesses and therefore is uncontested.

We accept that he was an electrician and had always worked as one. We accept that the basis of his move to Carrick-on-Shannon was that he would be employed as an electrician working in Facilities but was described in his contract as a Telesales employee who was seconded to Facilities. We accept therefore that any change of this agreement by the respondent whereby he "reverted" to a Telesales person was not in keeping with the contract of employment.

We however find that that the claimant did not exhaust the grievance procedure made available to him by the respondent and this proves fatal to the claimant's case. There was no reason put forth as to why an appeal to the European Head of Telemarketing would have been unfair or biased and we accept that his failure to avail of this right by resigning on May 2nd 2005 is fatal to his claim.

In constructive dismissal cases it is incumbent for a claimant to utilise all internal remedies made available to him unless good cause can be shown that the remedy or appeal process is unfair. Accordingly, the Tribunal uphold the recommendation of the Rights Commissioner and finds that the claimant was not constructively dismissed.

Claimant : Brian J. Chesser & Co., Solicitors, 19 Catherine Street, Waterford

Respondent(s) : Mr. Niall Beirne,BL., instructed byGerard Doyle, Crowley Millar, Solicitors, 15 Lr Mount Street, Dublin 2

The determination of the Tribunal was as follows:-

Respondent's Case:

The Respondent company is engaged in the provision of services to resort and property developers in Continental Europe. The company records buyers of time-shares and maintains a computerised database. The Tribunal heard from Mr. Michael Murphy on behalf of the respondent.

Mr. Murphy told the Tribunal that the claimant commenced employment with them on May 1st, 1995 as an accountant. His duties included, inter alia, management information, financial performance and day-to-day office management. He was the third employee to be recruited by the company and he was so engaged on an agreed salary scale which rose from circa £19,000 in the first year to £38,000 in the fourth year. His remuneration package also included a bonus scheme and a ten per cent pension fund.

Mr. Murphy told the Tribunal that during the initial years the claimant was a satisfactory employee and diligent worker. In or about April, 1998 he had received a substantial pay increase with which he was discontent. Instead he stated that he wanted at least £42,000 per annum or else he would leave the company. In this regard, he stated that his performance merited £45,000 per annum, but that he would be willing to accept £42,000 per annum. At that stage the claimant had no written contract of employment. The company felt vulnerable in the event that the claimant left with no notice, even though he said he would give one months notice if it arose. Consequently, the company offered him a draft contract in or about June, 1998 but the claimant declined to accept or sign it as he disputed the notice period. Following subsequent discussions in October, 1998 it was agreeed that the claimant would be paid an additional £3,000 the following Christmas. The claimant accepted this compromise offer, but was not entirely happy with the deal as he wanted to become a director of the company.

It is the respondent's case that the claimant's performance deteriorated after October, 1998. In particular the production of important financial information which was vital to the company was not as forthcoming as it had previously been. The slower stream of financial data it was suggested, was caused by the claimant being intent on doing things at his own pace which was not necessarily consistant with the needs of the company directors.

Mr Murphy also told the Tribunal that in or about the same time staff morale was becoming a problem and that there was a general atmosphere of unhappiness about the workplace. In January, 1999, at Mr Murphy's suggestion, the claimant submitted his grievances in writing to the Board of Directors. The Directors met in mid-February to discuss the possibility of making the claimant a director. Arising out of the meeting the claimant was informed that the Board did not envisage making him a director. The claimant was unhappy with the Board's decision. Mr. Murphy formed the impression that he would be leaving, more or less at any time, with one month's notice.

Prior to this, in or about December 1997, the claimant had expressed an interest in obtaining a share-holding interest in the company. Mr. Murphy told the Tribunal that he at all times made it clear to the claimant that any such matters would have to go to the Board of Directors. The matter was proposed at a Directors meeting in December, 1997 at which the Board accepted that he (the claimant) should be given a share option which he subsequently took up. By the respondent's evidence, an ongoing dispute regarding certain conditions of the share option offer were ultimately resolved. By early 1999 the company became the subject of a possible take-over. This highlighted the importance of the share options in that the claimant's shares were potentially worth in the region of £100,000. In the interim relations between the claimant and Mr. Murphy continued to be very poor and were having an increasing negative impact on other staff members. The claimant disputed his responsibility for the ongoing difficulties and was reluctant to leave voluntarily without a generous severance package. Despite a number of attempts the parties could not reach a compromise and a decision was taken to dismiss the claimant .

The claimant has since been replaced and by the respondent's evidence there has been a definite improvement in the provision of timely financial information. Staff morale and turnover has also improved.

During cross-examination, it was not denied that the claimant made a significant beneficial contribution to the company which was reflected in his remuneration package. Regarding the claimant's performance, Mr. Murphy stated that while he had no specific recollection of approaching him about it, he was satisfied that the claimant was well aware of his responsibilities in providing timely and regular financial information. He did however raise the issue with him of staff morale and supervision. Mr. Murphy also confirmed to the Tribunal that the company did not have any written personnel procedures.

Claimant's Case:

Mr Tadhg Sheehan told the Tribunal that the first time he became aware that Mr Murphy had a complaint about his work performance was at the Tribunal hearing .The claimant would be in Mr Murphy's office four to five times a week initially but from February 1999 onwards he only had contact about once a week- communication broke down the claimant said, the reason being that he did not sign a contract and Mr Murphy was not getting his own way.

Mr. Sheehan told the Tribunal that his ability to perform his tasks was restricted because of the lack of communication. He cited an incident where on delegating duties to staff some approached him and told him that Mr. Murphy handled the matter differently, the incident he referred to concerned a customer due discount, a new scheme had been introduced and the claimant had not been made aware of it.

Mr. Sheehan would present performance reports every month to Mr. Murphy as part of the accounts package. He would forward them by electronic mail. He presented the figures for March in mid April as usual, he received a phone call from Mr.

Murphy to say that he had not received them. Mr. Sheehan advised him to check the file and edit date, Mr. Murphy said "look I didn't get them", when he did not hear from Mr. Murphy within two days he assumed that he had got the figures.

In October 1998 there was a discussion regarding pay and shares. In February he was told if he signed a new contract he would get his shares which he had purchased in December 1997. The claimant couldn't signed it immediately but took the contract home to look at it. At the end of March he got a complete new contract for shares and terms of employment, he felt they were two separate entities and should not be put together in one contract, he was told to sign and have it returned by 31st March 1998. He had been given one contract in February and asked to sign immediately and a second one for 1998/1999 at the end of March. He was not happy with the link between his terms of employment and his shares options.

He contacted his solicitor because he felt that the contract was too wide ranging for him to sign it on his own. He wanted a legal opinion to clarify if he was signing a contract to get his shares. As the end of the financial year was approaching he had two days only to consider and felt it was a "rushed affair". He was advised not to sign same and told that his solicitor would contact the companys' solicitors.

From 31st March 1998 the claimants' representative told him that they were dealing solely with the share issue, the contract of employment was left aside.

Mr. Sheehan told the Tribunal that, after he requested and was granted two days annual leave for personal reasons at the end of April, his solicitor contacted him and asked him to take a few days extra (not out of his annual leave entitlement), the company needed a few days to consider the issues and a meeting was to take place at the end of the week. On 10th May the claimant met with his solicitor in the Tower Hotel, his employers refused to attend, he said.

Mr. Sheehan stated that he had done his work and met deadlines, he was never given a letter or a lecture regarding his work performance, he had never been warned or told that if he did not improve his work performance he would be sacked.

Determination:

The evidence as presented to the Tribunal has been sufficiently set out above. The Tribunal is satisfied that the respondent Company did not observe fair procedures. It is glaringly obvious that this is indeed the case and the Tribunal does not consider that it is necessary to set out precisely the gravaman of the departure from fair procedures as same is discernable from the facts of the case. Therefore the Tribunal on a full consideration of all the evidence that the Respondent has failed to justify the Claimant's dismissal and has failed to follow the accepted standards to be adopted in dismissing (if indeed dismissal was appropriate or otherwise) the Claimant on just cause, accordingly the Claimant's dismissal constitutes an unfair dismissal as understood by the Unfair Dismissal Acts.

Thus, it is necessary for the Tribunal to consider the appropriate remedy and to assess the extent of the loss presented to the Claimant. In the instant case the Tribunal considers that compensation is the appropriate remedy. In the instant case neither reinstatement nor re-engagement would be an appropriate remedy. Both these remedies cannot be considered, if, firstly, there exists a very definite possibility that it would result in compelling a reluctant employer to continue a relationship of employer/employee, a relationship which is founded on mutual trust and understanding and secondly, the performance of the returning employee may require consistent supervision to ensure adequate performance of duties. If the Tribunal attaches sufficient importance to the workplace on one hand and the actual position of the employee on the other hand and is conscious of the sensitivities that exists, it will be deterred to award relief which has a potential of creating future friction, disharmony and possibly an acrimonious relationship which could spill over into other areas and cause a disruptive work environment resulting in a decrease in productivity or performance. The more senior the position in the company the greater the care necessiated by the Tribunal in assessing the appropriate remedy.

It is clear from the evidence that the Claimant and Respondent are unlikely to have a good working relationship should the Tribunal deem either reinstatement or re-engagement the appropriate remedy. Given the position of the Claimant, Financial and Administrative Officer, it is essential that a good working relationship should exist and that there should exist a good working atmosphere which in the instant case is unlikely, thus, the remedy the Tribunal considers is one of compensation.

In considering the amount of losses and the sum to award all circumstances must be taken into account. Obvious though it may be, that the Claimant was dissatisfied with certain matters at work, namely, his position, his salary and the Share Scheme (or operation of same) and that his performane may have been affected by same, it was not reasonable to have effectively dismissed him in the fashion adopted by the Respondent company. It is clear from the evidence that the Claimant was unhappy with his salary in or around April of 1998. His base line renumeration in 1995 was £19,000 and this increased to £23,000, £28,000 and £38,000 for the years 1996, 1997 and 1998 respectively. Over a three-year period the Claimant's salary had effectively doubled. The Tribunal heard that the claimant at one stage told the Respondent that the company should pay him £42,000 a year or he would leave.

The Claimant expressed his dissatisfaction to the Respondent Company and relied upon the fact that there existed no written contract which entitled him to leave if he so wished. The Claimant told the Respondent that he could leave any time he wanted to. The Respondent offered a draft Contract of Employment, however, no agreement had been reached upon same and consequently there has never been a formal written contract between the Claimant and the Respondent.
The Claimant admits that he wanted a Directorship or such like position in the company and it appears that anything short of this was considered inadequate as the Claimant was of the opinion that he deserved such a position. The Respondent Company has stated that since the time the Claimant discovered that he would not be offered a position as a Director his performance deteriorated. The Respondent states that there was a significant deterioration post 1998.
In relation to the provision of Financial/Management Information , which is essential to the business sensitivities of the company, the Respondent Company states that it was not satisfied with the reports furnished by the Claimant. The Respondent submits that the information was untimely. The under-lying friction between the Claimant and the director of the Respondent Company, Mr Murphy, may have affected the quality of the work performance of the Claimant. The evidence is such as not to allow an actual quantification or precise assessment of same, and notwithstanding this handicap the Tribunal has regard to section 7(2) of the 1997 Act, which provides that the amount of compensation payable may be reduced , inter alia, to :

> "...the extent (if any) to which the said financial loss was attributable to an action,omission or conduct by or on behalf of the employee...."

Not being in a position to ascribe an actual precise per centage figure, the Tribunal is mindful of the situation, without applying an actual contribution.
Section 7(2)(c) of the 1977 Act obliges the tribunal to look at what steps the Claimant has taken to minimise his actual losses. The Claimant is obligated to seek and secure such measures that will minimise the losses potentially sustainable. In other words the Claimant must reasonably avoid the consequences of the Respondent's wrongful act of dismissal. Thus, the Tribunal by virtue of section 7 (2) (c) is required to have regard to :

> ".. the measures (if any) adopted by the employee or, as the case may be, his failure to adopt measures, to mitigate the costs aforesaid..."

In considering the element of mitigation under section 7 (2) (c) it is necessary to establish:

1. What steps (if any) the Claimant took to lessen the losses sustained;
2. Were the steps so taken, reasonable, adequate and sufficient; and
3. Ought the Claimant to have taken other steps, not necessarily obvious steps, which a reasonably careful and reasonably prudent employee, would have taken ?

In assessing the loss the Tribunal is conscious of the fact that the Claimant cannot recover for losses that could have been reduced or off-set by a course of action which the Claimant ought reasonably to have undertaken. Furthermore, the Claimant who has taken all reeasonable steps to mitigate hos loss and as a result of so doing sustains expense, may be entitled to be compensated if it can be shown that such expenses is directly attributable or directly related to the dismissal. What's sauce for the 'statutory goose' is sauce for the 'victimised gander.' Thus , any benefit deriving from steps or acts taken by the Claimant in mitigating his losses accrues to the Respondent and lessens the amount recoverable.
There exists ample authority in relation to the element of mitigation. Lord Wrenbury, in Jamal V Moolla Dawood [1916] 1 A.C. 175, P.C., at page 179 articulated that :

> " It is undoubted law that a Plaintiff who sues for damages owes the duty of taking all reasonable steps to mitigate the loss consequent upon a breach and cannot claim as damages any sum that is due to his own neglect... If the Plaintiff could do something or did something which mitigated the damage, the Defendant is entitled to the benefit of it .." ".. in so far as the amount of salary/wage payable by the Respondent is not exceeded by the benefit ..." (Tribinal's addition)

This is technically incorrect, in that a proper interpretation would mean that the Claimant who successfully eliminates all losses and , indeed, succeeds in gaining a greater amount which would not have been possible from the Respondent's company would mean that this amount would be the property of the Respondent.
The common law principles in relation to mitigating damage equally applies to compensation for unfair damage : Fay V The Order of Hospitalers of St. John of God (1980) U.D 92-1980. The onus of proof on the issue of mitigation rests upon the Respondent: see Fyfe v Scientific Furnishings [1989] I.R L.R 331; also see Bessenden Properties Ltd v Corness [1974] I.R.L.R 338, CA. The Respondent must show that the Claimant did not act reasonably in all the circumstances. The inquest of mitigation of damage is a question of fact and in this vein, Sir John Donaldson in The Solholt [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605 , CA , said that

> ".. Whether a loss is avoidable by reasonable action on the part of the Plaintiff is a question of fact and not a law..."

In adducing proof, the Respondent to a claim of unfair dismissal , may inquire as to the actual steps (if any) taken by the ex-employee to seek alternative work: Monk v Redwing Aircraft Co Ltd [1942] 1 k.b. 182. The respondent may put to the Claimant other steps that the Claimant failed to take and inquire as to why such steps were not taken. For example, if the ex-emplyee is a professional it may be reasonable to expect that person to consult specialised magazines, newspapers, institutions, etc., with a view to securing a position commensurate with his qualifications and experience.
If the Claimant has endeavoured to commence or start-up his own private business and has exacerbated his losses, these losses may be underwritten by the Respondent in the Tribunal's aware of compensation.

Moreover, if the Claimant finds work immediately and suffers no loss he is not entitled to an award of compensation but he is entitled to a declaration that he was unfairly dismissed Isleworth v Richard [1988] I.r.L.R. 137

Whilst the Claimant is at liberty from the Respondent's workplace, he is obliged to constructively employ his time in seeking to minimise his losses. Even if the Claimant is hopeful of returning to his former employer. Blain J in Yetton v Eastwoods Froy Ltd. [1967] 1 W.L.R 104, at 115, states that:

> " The basic principle of damages is restitutio in integrum (restored to the original position): the Plaintiff should have what he has lost through the Defendants's fault. But, of course, if a Plaintiff in fact, in the case of a contract of service, earns something elsewhere through being at liberty so to do, then he has lost that much less as the consequences of the default . And if he can minimise his loss by a reasonable course of conduct, he should do so, though the onus is on the defaulting defendant to show that it could be or could have been done and is not being and has not been done .
> Thus, the opportunity to reduce damages by finding reasonable (I repeat reasonable) alternative employment should be taken and , indeed , sought.."

The issue is not a question of what the Claimant could have done , but rather what he could reasonably have been expected to do, as held in the English decision Jerome v Supervents Ltd., unreported, 12 November 1980, per Lawton J.
In the Instant case the Claimant has told the Tribunal that he has registered with the following Employment Agencies:

- Martin Ward Anderson;
- Premier Recruitment
- The Marlborough Group;
- Rigney Dolphin;
- P.P.G Accountancy;
- Skills Group
- Executive Network;
- Eden Recruitment;
- Collins McNicholas;
- Premier Recruitment;
- South East Business & Innovation Centre
- Richmond Recruitment;
- MBI;
- WBS; and
- GRC.

Also, the Claimant stated to the Tribunal that he had made direct applications to the following :

- Waterford Crystal;
- Allied signal;
- Norton;
- AOL;
- Sea Land ;
- Datapac;
- Gropharm
- Kodak;
- Stafford Millar;
- Storling;
- Guidant ; and
- Gram irl.

Furthermore, the Claimant informed the Tribunal that he had attended Recruitment Fairs at Waterford and Dublin. In these days of rapid Word-processed Curriculum Vitae, it is not reasonable to merely swamp every conceivable source of employment with applications. Moreover, it is not reasonable to merely place yourself upon a list with various recruitment agencies. A more pro-active approach must be adopted nowadays. In the nineteen -sixties it may have been resonable to adopt these steps which the Claimant did in the instant matter. In fact Blain J in the Yetton Case would have accepted that the Claimant acted resonable, namely , had he:

> ".. made some 57 applications for employment in answer to advertisements within a 12-month period...He made also a number of applications (I think eight altogether) or himself inserted Press Advertisements, those being listed seperatley because that were not in answer to advertisements. And, thirdly, he wrote to some 24 people with whom he was in personal contact... In terms of remuneration he first started as an applicant in the £8,000 to £10,000 - a year class.. he came down to £5,000 and a little later to £4,000..." at page 119

The Respondent questioned the Claimant as to why he did not consult the magazine entitled Accountancy, a magazine which had page after page of position seeking persons with the Claimant's education, skill and experience. The Claimant did not offer an explanation. The Claimant was unsure as to whether he had followed up on ads in various newspapers. Also, an explanation as to why the Claimant did not pro-actively and regularly follow-up with the agencies was not offered.
A claimant who finds himself out of work should employ a reasonable amount of time each weekday in seeking work. It is not enough to inform agencies that you are available for work nor merely to post an application to various companies seeking work.

The Tribunal considers that the first thing that should be done during the weekdays is to purchase a copy of the morning papers and this should be performed early in the morning so that any prospective positions may be followed up in the morning which would send the right mesage to the various companies in which a position is sought. Moreover, a plan of action , particularly for a professional, should be put in place. The time that a Claimant finds on his hands is not his own, unless he chooses it to be, but rather time to be profitably employed in seeking to mitigate his loss. In the words of Sir John Donaldson in AG Bracey Ltd v Iles [1973] I.R.L.R 210, the ex-employee > "...must , or course , use the time well and seek a better job which will reduce this overall loss and the amount of compensation which the previous employer ultimately has to pay..."

All in all, the Tribunal is not statisfied that the Claimant took reasonable steps to mitigate his loss. The Tribunal is of the opinion that the claimant failed to follow-up with the recruitment agencies on at least a weekly basis. Also, the Claimant failed to adequately employ a sufficient amount of time during each weekday to explore options, namely, reading the 'Situations Vacant' in the daily papers, cold-calling of prospective places of employment, following-up on applications, etc. Essentially the Claimant unreasonably failed to seek suitable work at suitable times in suitable circumstances. Accordingly , rather than seek to make an award and decrease it by a per centage figure to reflect an element of non-mitigation, the Tribunal will measure the award having regard to all the circumstances of the case. The Tribunal measures the award of compensation at £27,000 under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to 1993
However , the Claimant has received approximately £7,000 net, from working for certain entities. This figure must be deducted from the £27,000 giving a figure of £20,000.
Furthermore, the Solicitor for the Claimant acknowledged that he had £10,000 from the Respondent which means that the Respondent is obliged to pay £10,000 to the Claimant. To simplify matters, the Claimant Solicitor may return the amount of £10,000 to the Respondent Company and the Respondent company may furnish the Claimant with a cheque for £20,000.

The claim under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts, 1973 to 1991, has been allowed and compensation of £1252.56 has been awarded. The said amount is included in the award of £20,000.00 as aforesaid.

CASE NO. UD 192/1978

Appeal of

Mrs. Teresa Hennessy, Avivin, Turners Cross, Cork.

(Appellant)

against the decision of

Read & Write Shop Ltd., Bishopstown Shopping Centre, Cork.

(Respondent)

under the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977.

Mr. O'Carroll B.L. instructed by Coakley Moloney & Flynn, Solicitors represented the claimant, who also attended.

Mr. Olann Kelleher, Solicitor, Ronan Daly Hayes & Co., Miss Irene Comerford, Director, and Mr. Patrick Jones, Director, represented the respondent Company.

I certify that the Tribunal

(Division of Tribunal)

Chairman : Mr. Donal Hamilton

Members : Mr. James Ryan
Mr. Cornelius Donovan

heard this appeal at County Council Chambers, County Hall, Cork, on Friday, 1st December, 1978.

The decision of the Tribunal was as follows:-

The claimant who is claiming redress for unfair dismissal was employed as a shop assistant by the respondents from August 1976 to 21st December, 1977 when she was dismissed without notice.

The respondents submitted that the claimant was not unfairly dismissed and relied on section 6(4)(b) of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977 to show that the conduct of the claimant was such as to merit dismissal. The claimant is a widow whose husband had died a short time prior to the incident resulting in her dismissal. Her daughter Cara also worked for the respondents

The evidence showed that the claimants daughter Cara had, on 16th December, 1977, asked Miss Comerford for a discount on a doll which she wished to purchase. Miss Comerford agreed to allow a discount but did not at that time mention a percentage. On the following day, Saturday, 17th December, Miss Comerford, on being approached again by Miss Hennessy, agreed to a discount of 10%. The price of the doll was £8.49 and with 10% discount the price quoted was £7.64. It appeared from Miss Comerfords evidence that Miss Hennessy was not happy with the discount given and remarked to Miss Comerford

Miss Comerford said that the shop closed at about 6.30 p.m. that evening and when she was leaving the premises she heard Mrs. Hennessy ask her daughter if she (Cara) had paid for the doll. Cara replied "yes". We heard that Cara had previously been dismissed but had been re-engaged on condition that she would not use the till. Miss Comerford said that she was bothered on the evening of the 17th about the 14p and Mrs. Hennessy's remark about the payment for the doll. On Sunday, 18th December she went into the shop and checked the till rolls but could not find an entry of £7.50 or an approximate figure. Enquiries were carried out by Miss Comerford and Mr. Jones and as a result of these Cara Hennessy was dismissed from her employment on the following Tuesday and the claimant was dismissed the following Wednesday.

The Employment Appeals Tribunal is not a criminal court. It does not apply itself to establishing the guilt or innocence in the criminal sense of an employee dismissed fundamentally because of the employers belief that at the time of dismissal a monetary transaction had been improperly handled by the employee resulting in a loss to the employer in financial terms and particularly in loss of confidence in the capacity of the employee to maintain a position of trust.

In deciding whether or not the dismissal of the claimant was unfair we apply a test of reasonableness to :

(1) the nature and extent of the enquiry carried out by the respondent prior to the decision to dismiss the claimant and

(2) the conclusion arrived at by the respondent that on the basis of the information resulting from such enquiry that the appellant should be dismissed.

The following is a summary of the enquiry carried out by Mr. Jones and Miss Comerford in relation to the investigation in respect of the doll transaction and a summary of the information obtained by the respondents representatives.

We are satisfied that on the evening of 17th December 1977, Miss Comerford overheard Mrs. Hennessy make a remark to her daughter as to whether Cara had paid for the doll and that this remark coupled with the reference to the 14p in Cara Hennessy's conversation with Miss Comerford, caused concern to Miss Comerford. This, due to the fact that Cara was not allowed to use the till resulted in her carrying out an investigation into the doll transaction on Sunday, 18th December.

On 18th December, Miss Comerford inspected the till rolls in the company of Mr. Barriscale, another employee of the Company. As a result of this investigation, it was found that (i) there was no £7.50 entry on the till rolls or any entry for an approximate figure.(ii) Mr. Barriscale informed Miss Comerford that he had seen Cara Hennessy give money to her mother the previous evening when Mrs. Hennessy was inside the counter near till No. 2. Mr. Barriscale checked both till rolls with Miss Comerford.

/On Monday 19th December

On Monday, 19th December, Miss Comerford and Mr. Jones discussed the matter and decided to report same to the Gardai and on Tuesday they reported the matter to the claimants trade union and advised the union that they were going to question Mrs. Hennessy and her daughter regarding the purchase of the doll and the payment and recording of such payment.

On Tuesday, 20th December at approximately 1.30 p.m. Mr. Jones asked Mrs. Hennessy if she had handled a transaction with her daughter Cara regarding the purchase of a doll and Mrs. Hennessy denied handling this transaction. Mr. Jones did not mention to Mrs. Hennessy that Mr. Barriscale had seen a monetary transaction between Cara and her mother and he advised the Tribunal that he accepted Mrs. Hennessys reply without question.

At about the same time Miss Comerford spoke with Cara Hennessy in the company of Margot Murray. Cara Hennessy confirmed that the discount was 10% on the doll and explained that the 14p due to her arose because a card which she bought was over priced. Margot Murray confirmed that this was correct. Miss Hennessy told Miss Comerford that she had paid £7.50 for the doll but could not say whether she had paid the money to her mother or to Alice Meaney (another employee of the Company) who was on her day off on Tuesday 20th December.

At this interview Miss Comerford told Miss Hennessy that she had two till rolls but neither of them showed a figure of £7.50 as being registered. At this stage the gardai arrived followed shortly afterwards by Mr. Jones who advised Miss Comerford that Mrs. Hennessy had told him that she had not handled the transaction.

Shortly after the aforementioned meeting Miss Comerford went into the shop area of the premises. On enquiring as to the whereabouts of Cara Hennessy, she was advised by Miss Murray that Cara had gone out to make a telephone call. Approximately half an hour later Mrs. Hennessy telephoned Miss Comerford and said that she remembered handling the transaction and recalled her daughter Cara paying her for the doll.

On Wednesday morning 21st December, on reporting for work Mrs. Hennessy apologised to Mr. Jones and Miss Comerford for her lapse of memory the previous day when she had advised Mr. Jones that she had not handled her daughters transaction. It was explained to her that there was no £7.50 entry on the rolls and when asked why this was so she replied that she could not understand why there was no such entry on the till rolls. Miss Comerford offered to take Mrs. Hennessy to the garda station where she could see the till rolls for herself. Mrs. Hennessy accompanied Miss Comerford to the garda station and was shown the rolls. On their return from the garda station Mr. Jones spoke with Mrs. Hennessy. He told her he was sorry that she was changing her story and asked her why the entry was not on the roll. She replied that she could not understand why it was not on the roll. Mr. Jones said to her that if she agreed that there was not an entry of £7.50 on the roll and that if she confirmed that she had handled the transaction then he would have no alternative but to draw the conclusion that there was "collusion" and that he would be forced to dismiss her. Mrs. Hennessy replied that she could not change what she had said and at that point Mr. Jones dismissed the claimant from her employment.

In deciding whether or not the dismissal of the claimant was unfair, we applied the test of reasonableness to the nature and extent of the enquiry made by the respondents prior to the decision to dismiss the claimant. We applied the same test to the conclusion arrived at by the respondents that, on the basis of the information resulting from such enquiry, the claimant should be dismissed.

We are satisfied that the claimant was given every reasonable opportunity to defend her position in relation to this transaction. We note the conversation with Mr. Jones at 1.30pm on Monday 19th December, 1977; that she was confronted with the evidence of the rolls when shown same in the garda station and was given a further opportunity to explain the transaction during the conversation with Mr. Jones which resulted in her dismissal.

After a very full enquiry into this case in which both the claimant and the respondent were legally represented, we are satisfied that the respondents had, at the conclusion of the investigation, substantially the same information as is available to the Tribunal and accordingly, we are unanimous in our opinion that the enquiry carried out by the respondent prior to the decision to dismiss the claimant was fair and reasonable and that the principles of natural justice, particularly the affording to the claimant the opportunity to defend herself and be confronted with the allegations made against her and any material "evidence" were fully preserved in this case.

We are satisfied that the claimant was an employee in a position of trust in the Company and noting her unblemished record with the respondents and her former employers (a financial institution) we are unanimous in our opinion that, on the basis of the information resulting from the enquiry, the conclusion arrived at by the respondents that the claimant should be dismissed was fair and reasonable in all the circumstances.

We accordingly dismiss the claim under the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977.

CASE NO.

M102 UD56/94

CLAIMS OF

Barry St. Ledger, 36 Brookdale Drive, Rathingle, Swords, Co. Dublin

Frontline Distribution Ireland Limited, 44 Airways Industrial Estate, Cloghran, Dublin 17

Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts, 1973 to 1991 and Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to 1993

I certify that the Tribunal
(Division of Tribunal)

Chairman: Mr. D. MacCarthy S.C.

Members: Ms. M. O'Leary
Mr. N. O'Neill

heard these claims at Dublin on the 25th May, 1994 and the 14th July, 1994

Representation:

Claimant: Mr. Justin MacCarthy, Solicitor, Kenny Stephenson Chapman, 10 Upper Mount Street, Dublin 2

Respondent: Mr. Simon McCormick, Solicitor, Eugene F. Collins, 61 Fitzwilliam Square, Dublin 2

During the course of the hearing the Tribunal withdrew to consider a ruling. When the hearing resumed we were informed that the case was settled. Nonetheless the Solicitors for the parties requested us to announce our ruling and, for future guidance, to circulate it in due course.

The claimant was a warehouse supervisor who was dismissed and replaced by a Mr. Kennedy who the respondent company claimed was better trained to do the work.

On behalf of the respondent it was argued that the dismissal was justified because it arose from redundancy. Definition (e) in the Redundancy Payments Acts was relied upon, and to a lesser extent definition (d). These definitions are:

> "(d) the fact that the employer has decided that the work for which the employee had been employed (or had been doing before his dismissal) should henceforward be done in a different manner for which the employee is not sufficiently qualified or trained,

(e) the fact that his employer has decided that the work for which the employee had been employed (or had been doing before his dismissal) should henceforward be done by a person who is also capable of doing other work for which the employee is not sufficiently qualified or trained."

On the first day of the hearing we were told that Mr. Kennedy had a diploma which made him better qualified than the claimant. It transpired that he did not have a diploma but had only passed an examination which, with further study, might later lead to a diploma.

The hearing was adjourned to allow the parties set out on paper the training, qualifications and general careers of both the claimant and Mr. Kennedy, as well as job specifications covering work done by the claimant before dismissal and by Mr. Kennedy afterwards. The claimant furnished full details of his career and a job specification of the work carried out by him when in the respondent's employ. No details were supplied in respect of Mr. Kennedy's training but two job specifications, before and after the dismissal, were handed in by the company.

On examination of the job specifications it is clear that Mr. Kennedy does the same work as the claimant did, with the exception that he reports to a different person. One other difference is that Mr. Kennedy is able to do the work without the assistance of a part-time helper, but the respondent was not relying on a reduction in numbers as part of its case.

We were also given a comparison of the relative abilities of the claimant and Mr. Kennedy to carry out the work. In the absence of a specific diploma, we were concerned with training rather than qualifications. In fact the respondent did not show that Mr. Kennedy had any special training, and the respondent's solicitor, in argument, tried to equate training with ability.

The solicitor for the respondent argued that these factors made out a case for redundancy within the meaning of definition (e). He said that, though the nature of the work remained the same, the volume had increased and Mr. Kennedy was better able to handle the increase. And he argued that the words "other work" in definition (e) include an increase in the volume of the work. We cannot accept this argument.

Redundancy has two characteristics which are of importance in this case. It is impersonal and it involves change.

Impersonality runs throughout the five definitions in the Act. Redundancy impacts on the job and only as a consequence of the redundancy does the person involved lose his job. It is worthy of note that the E.C. Directive on Collective Redundancies uses a shorter and simpler definition: "one or more reasons not related to the individual workers concerned".

Change also runs through all five definitions. This means change in the workplace. The most dramatic change of all is a complete close down. Change may also mean a reduction in needs for employees, or a reduction in number. Definition (d) and (e) involve change in the way the work is done or some other form of change in the nature of the job. Under these two definitions change in the job must mean qualitative change. Definition (e) must involve, partly at least, work of a different kind, and that is the only meaning we can put on the words "other work". More work or less work of the same kind does not mean "other work" and is only quantitative change. In any event the quantitative change in this case is in the wrong direction. A downward change in the volume of work might imply redundancy under another definition, (b) but an upward change would not.

For redundancy to arise in the present case the respondent would have to satisfy us that the nature of the job changed, and that in connection with the change, and only in connection with the change, Mr. Kennedy had certain training that the claimant had not.

We are satisfied that the nature of the work did not change, nor did the manner in which it was done. Therefore there is no redundancy within the meaning of either definition (d) or (e).

There is another reason why redundancy does not arise in this case. We were given no evidence that Mr. Kennedy had any special training, either in the formal sense or related to work experience. The respondent said that Mr. Kennedy had more ability. Ability is not the same as training. It is irrelevant whether Mr. Kennedy is better able to do the work previously done by the claimant. To hold otherwise would be to deny the essential impersonality of redundancy.

CASE NO: 1160/1978

Appeals of

Mr. Oliver Lennon, Muckinish, Ennis, Co. Clare.

(Appellant)

against the decision of

Mr. Val Bredin, Barrack St., Ennis, Co. Clare.

(Respondents)

under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act, 1973.

The appellant appeared in person.

The respondent appeared in person.

I certify that the Tribunal

(Division of Tribunal)

Chairman: Mr. John Gleeson

Members: Mr. Frank O'Connor
Mr. James A. Robertson

heard this appeal at the Courthouse, Ennis on Tuesday, 28th March, 1978.

The decision of the Tribunal was as follows:-

The appellant is claiming compensation for loss sustained by him by reason of the failure of the respondent to give him the minimum period of notice required by Section 4 of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act, 1973.

His claim is contested on the ground that the respondent was within his right, under Section 8 of the Act, to terminate his contract of employment without notice.

The appellant and two fellow employees were dismissed, without notice, on the 3rd February, 1978. They were dismissed because they were 35 minutes late coming back after lunch after visiting a licenced premises. The appellant's two fellow employees had been warned previously for similar occurances, that they would be dismissed "on the spot" if it happened again. Respondent contended that the appellant was "aware of the consequences of going to the pub during working hours". Appellant denied that he was so aware.

An incident occurred some two to three months before Christmas, 1977 and respondent admitted that he was looking for an opportunity to dismiss the appellant from that time forward.

The other employees were paid a £100 bonus at Christmas, 1977 but respondent did not pay it to the appellant because, he admitted, he hoped that by not paying it to him the appellant would leave his employment.

Respondent told the Respondent told the Tribunal that the two fellow employees apologised to him later and he put surplus work that he was unable to undertake himself in their way. He said that he re-employed them on the day of the hearing.

We are not satisfied that the respondent warned the appellant, as he had admittedly warned the other two, that drinking during lunch hour would be punished by dismissal.

On the day of dismissal, the evidence establishes no more than that the three men had a drink in the nearby public house and were 35 minutes late returning to work.

Section 8 of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act, 1973 saves an employer from liability for minimum notice where the dismissal is for misconduct. We have always held that this exemption applies only to cases of very bad behaviour of such a kind that no reasonable employer could be expected to tolerate the continuance of the relationship for a minute longer; we believe the legislature had in mind such things as violent assault or larceny or behaviour in the same sort of serious category. If the legislature intended to exempt an employer from giving notice in such cases where the behaviour fell short of being able, fairly, to be called by the dirty word misconduct, we have always felt that they would have said no, by adding some such words, (after the word misconduct), as negligence, slovenly workmanship, bad timekeeping etc. They did not do so.

Whilst the breach of a prohibition against drinking during lunch hour might fairly be classified as misconduct in the case of a pilot, or driver, we are of opinion that it would be going too far to classify it as misconduct in the present case.

Consequently, although the employer was in our view, perfectly within his right's in dismissing the appellant, we are of opinion that he should have given notice and that his failure to do so carries a liability to compensate for the loss suffered by the appellant by not getting notice. As he was out of work for the week in question, we fix that liability at £67.52p. and award him compensation in that amount.

CASE NO. UD88/1983

Claim of Noritake (Ireland) Limited, South Quay, Arklow, Co. Wicklow.

against the recommendation of the Rights Commissioner in the case of:

William Kenna, 12 Ballygarrett, Gorey, Co. Wexford.

under the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977.

I certify that the Tribunal

(Division of Tribunal)

Chairman: Mr. Donal Hamilton,

Members: Mr. George Lamon,
Mr. Arthur Rice, heard this claim at Arklow on Thursday 21st July and on adjournment on Monday 12th September, 1983.

Representation:

Company: Mr. G. Byrne, Solicitor, F.U.E., Lower Baggot Street, Dublin 2.

Respondent: Mr. T. Duffy, I.T.&.G.W.U., Bradshaw Lane, Arklow, Co. Wicklow.

The decision of the Tribunal was as follows:

The respondent was employed as a team-leader in the decorating office and was with the Company from 3rd January, 1977 to 5th July, 1982. In this case the Rights Commissioner recommended that the respondent be reinstated.

Before the Tribunal the evidence was that the respondent was a good worker who had a good record and was promoted to team leader. His only fault was that some of his fellow employees complained that he pressed them a bit too hard at times. Up to March, 1983 the company had no cause for complaint.

On 12th March, 1982 the company laid-off the workforce for a period of six weeks with the exception of a small number of employees, including the respondent, who were retained on overtime the following day to complete an order. An incident involving the respondent was brought to the attention of management when another team-leader who also worked on the Saturday furnished a written statement to th departmental manager. The statement alleged that the respondent had misconducted himself that day, i.e. 13th March. An investigation was carried out by the departmental manager who, when he could not verify the allegations, filed away the complaint.

This statement lay filed away until Saturday 3rd July, 1982. That day some employees complained that the respondent was oversupervising them and the respondent in turn complained that some workers were spending too long in the toilets. One employee, who felt aggrieved, reacted by informing management that the team leader's statement in March was substantially true. As far as the company was concerned this resurrected the incident and lead to a further enquiry on 5th July, 1983. The respondent denied the allegations as he had done in March. The company felt that the allegations were established; that the complainants were to be believed and that the respondent's mere denial was not good enough. The respondent was then dismissed.

In considering the evidence, the Tribunal has asked the following questions:-

1. did the company believe that the respondent misconducted himself as alleged? if so

2. did the company have reasonable grounds to sustain that belief? if so

3. was the penalty of dismissal proportionate to the alleged misconduct?

The Tribunal has considered that the reply to question No. 1 was yes. We divided on the reply to question No. 2 and by a majority answered yes. Regarding question No. 3, the Tribunal was unanimously of the view that dismissal was too severe a penalty for this incident, having regard to all the circumstances. Accordingly the dismissal is deemed to be unfair.

With regard to the options open to us under the Act and the wishes of both parties, the Tribunal is of the view that compensation is the most appropriate form of redress. The respondent told the Tribunal on the first day that since his dismissal, he was unfit for work and the liklihood was that he would be unfit for a year. He has claimed disability benefit from the Department of Social Welfare since the termination of employment. Therefore the Tribunal makes no award in this case except to compensate the respondent for the loss of accrued rights under the Unfair Dismissals Act and the Redundancy Payments Acts as a result of the dismissal. This is set out as follows:-

Loss of accrued rights under the Unfair Dismissals Act	£10.00
Loss of accrued rights under the Redundancy Payments Acts	£114.00

Thus the Tribunal makes a total award of £124.00

UNFAIR DISMISSALS ACTS 1977 TO 2007

I certify that the Tribunal
(Division of Tribunal)

Chairman: Mr. T. Ryan
Members: Mr. E. Handley
Mr. N. Dowling

heard this claim at Dublin on 7th October 2015 and 4th December 2015 and 29th January 2016

Representation:
Claimant: Mr. Mark O'Connell B.L. instructed by Mr. Frank Nyhan, Frank Nyhan & Associates, Market Square, Mallow, Co. Cork

Respondent: Mr. Ger Connolly, Mason Hayes & Curran, Solicitors, South Bank House, Barrow Street, Dublin 4

Preliminary issue:

Summary of evidence

Both parties made extensive written (filed) and oral (noted) submissions to the hearing.

A preliminary issue arose as to whether the claimant was employed on a contract of service or a contract for services. The claimant gave evidence and told the Tribunal that she was employed by the respondent, a banking enterprise, through her IT consulting company, as a Project Lead. She commenced her working relationship on 31st July, 2006 and remained working with them until 28th February, 2014. Initially she was employed on a series of short contracts through a recruitment agency. From 1st December, 2007, the claimant was asked by the respondent to work directly for the bank. From December, 2007 onwards, the claimant's company was employed by the bank.

According to the claimant, her work took on the nature of a permanent contract of service. The claimant was paid through her IT consultancy company. She was not paid for annual leave, although she had to seek approval in advance, nor did the respondent deduct the claimant's tax and PRSI. Sick pay was also not an entitlement.

The claimant maintains that she was a fully integrated member of staff regarding the business and social functions of the bank. She worked exclusively for the respondent during the eight years of her employment. The claimant attended key meetings, including crucial meetings with the Financial Regulator. She also used the respondent's premises and equipment. The claimant indicated that she could not work for another organisation.

At no stage after 1st December, 2007 was the claimant ever asked to sign a contract of employment and worked for up to 50/60 hours per week for the respondent company.

The claimant explained that she wanted certainty regarding her employment. The numerous efforts that she made to speak to the bank were completely stonewalled and her e-mails were not replied to. She asked verbally to meet and discuss her position and she was told "No". She explained that the bank was trying to downsize and it suited the bank not to regularise her employment. She explained that it was cheaper for the bank not to have her as a permanent employee, for example pension costs.

She was told at one time that she would not be provided with permanent employment and she would have to go elsewhere if she wished permanent employment.

Regarding her integration in the company the claimant maintains that she was integrated from day one. She sat with the whole work team. She was provided with a bank computer and had access to the banks e-mail. She was invited to all team events and was included in all team meetings. She had access to sensitive information. The claimant explained that the senior management trusted her and the support staff worked parallel with her.

She organised Christmas parties and a race meeting. She gave speeches at events and was involved in social events. She was also involved in a group involved in women's affairs for development etc.

Regarding her being asked to stay on with the bank and her second contract she explained that CK the head of treasury at the time asked her to stay on. CK contacted the agency (VR) to arrange the paperwork. The same happened again regarding her third contract. Also previous to this in late November 2007 CK and DC asked her if she would like to remain on for a year.

The claimant was asked about control and mutuality of obligation. She explained that everything that she did she needed to provide updates and had to obtain approval. The bank had total control over her work. The bank determined her rate of pay. She looked after her own pension. She did not have professional insurance and was not asked by the bank to provide professional insurance.

The bank did ask her about a contract between her and a third party (G) and also to provide insurance but she did not obtain insurance and she was not perturbed by not having insurance. Regarding sick pay she worked long hours circa 50/60 hours per week so when she was sick for a few days she was paid for those days. She had not asked for sick pay but the bank told her that because she had worked long hours she would be paid for those days.

Regarding substitution, she explained that she always completed her work and that there was no way that she could have appointed a substitute for herself. She did not have other people working for her.

Regarding her work equipment, it was provided for her by the bank. She did not work for anyone other than the bank; she worked solely for the bank. She was paid a daily rate and was not on a fixed term contract for specific tasks.

Regarding holidays, she had worked 35 extra days during a three month period so the bank agreed she could take 17 days leave and be paid. She was not paid holiday pay but was paid holidays in lieu of time worked. When projects were finished she took time off but was not paid holiday pay. The claimant in clarifying to the Tribunal agreed that she was not paid holiday pay.

Regarding reporting, she reported to the treasurer of the bank.

In cross-examination, the claimant agreed that she was paid through her IT consulting company. She was an employee of her own company. She agreed that the earlier contracts covering the period from 31st July 2006 up to 30th November 2007 were contracts for services via a recruitment agency. There were seven contracts over this 16 month period. There were other contractors in the treasury department during her period there. The claimant was never told she could not work for another bank but it was 'not the done thing' and 'would not be acceptable'. She was paid a daily rate of pay and was never paid a bonus. The claimant indicated that she received 17/18 days time in lieu of excess hours worked by her and also received sick pay on this same basis. She had bank staff reporting to her at times. The Group Treasurer told her what work to do.

RH, who was the Treasurer at the time gave evidence on behalf of the respondent. He commenced his employment with the bank in June 2012. RH told the Tribunal that the claimant was a contractor from the bank's point of view. The reason the claimant was on contract for eight years was because she was working on multiple projects. The claimant raised the issue of her employment towards the latter end of her time with the bank. When RH consulted with the HR department in relation to the claimant's employment, he was told that she was a contractor. RH accepted the situation as regards the claimant's status. It was not a cost decision. RH disagreed that it was less expensive to hire the claimant as a contractor as opposed to an employee. Time in lieu was not a normal arrangement with contractors. RH only realised the claimant had no contract during her last months with the bank.

Determination

At the commencement of the hearing the Respondent's Representative submitted that the Tribunal did not have jurisdiction to hear the claim because the claimant was not an employee as defined in the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 but that she was an independent contractor. The Tribunal could not rule on this application without hearing all the evidence relating thereto. This is clear from a number of High Court decisions referred to hereafter, and the Supreme Court Case of John Barry, Conor O'Brien, Mary O'Connor, Michael Spratt, Ciara Dolan and The Minister for Agriculture and Food [Appeal No. 86/2011], (hereinafter "the Barry Supreme Court Case"). The Judgement of MacMenamin J. in this case clearly puts to rest once and for all that it:

"was for the Employment Appeals Tribunal itself to determine, on the facts, whether or not an employment relationship existed between the parties". MacMenanin J also suggested that (i) the parties should agree a case management where the parties prepare "an issue paper" identifying the questions to be identified by the Tribunal; (ii) that the parties prepare written submissions;[and that] (iii) The Tribunal apportion such time as may appear appropriate for oral submissions. The Tribunal also decided to hear relevant evidence from the parties. In the Barry Supreme Court Case the court also ruled that: "the case whether the vets were employed by the Respondent, or were instead self- employed persons doing shifts at the Mitchelstown meat plant is a matter of fact for the Employment Appeals Tribunal on the rehearing of the matter".

The parties agreed the following issues, as being relevant to the Tribunal's decision: [was the claimant] in business on her own account and/or integration; relevant contracts; mutuality of obligation; the intention of the parties; control; actions of claimant; taxation. The Tribunal did not consider itself confined to the issues agreed between the parties and also indicated that it would have regard to the following: pension entitlements; sick pay; substitution; whether the profit which she derived was dependent on how she carried out her work; was she paid for holidays; did she have support staff; how and where she did the work; could she engage someone else to do the work instead of her. The Tribunal did not close its mind to other factors which might arise during the hearing of the case. All these matters will be dealt with below after the Tribunal has considered the relevant case law.

Relevant Case Law:

The High Court decision in the case of The Minister for Agriculture and Food V Barry and Others 1998 ELR 36 (7th July 2008) (hereinafter referred to as "the Barry Case") contains a detailed analysis of the jurisprudence on the tests which should be considered in deciding whether a person is working under a Contract for Service [Independent Contractor] or a Contract of Service [Employee]. It is appropriate that we examine 'the Barry case' in detail as it is relevant to the case brought by the claimant. In 'the Barry case', the Court allowed the appeal by the Department of Agriculture and Food against the decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal (EAT) which had found that five Temporary Veterinary Inspectors (hereafter "the TVI's) were employees and accordingly entitled to payments under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967-2003 and Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973-2001 following the closure of the Galtee Meats Plant at Mitchelstown, Co. Cork (hereafter "Galtee").Mr. Justice John Edwards found that the TVIs were engaged as independent contractors, in other words, under contracts for service rather than as employees under contracts of service. The Department had argued that the TVIs were private veterinary practitioners who were also in business on their own account, and that they could and did continue in private practice along with undertaking temporary work for the Department. Further, the TVI's remuneration was paid on an hourly fee basis at rates fixed between the Department and their union, Veterinary Ireland. The TVI's paid PAYE and PRSI and each was issued with a P60 annually. The TVI's were not obliged to maintain their own professional indemnity insurance. The TVI's did not charge VAT, and were not paid VAT even though VAT was chargeable on TB testing.

This case has had an eventful legal journey with two hearings before the Employment Appeals Tribunal ("EAT"), two hearings before the High Court and following last year's Supreme Court decision now goes back to the EAT for a third time. EAT (1) On the preliminary point of whether the TVIs were employees or contractors, the EAT found that the TVIs were employees.

It based its decision on the traditional tests set down in the Henry Denny case (a previous Supreme Court case on employment status and which we will look at hereafter) and other decisions of the Courts which identify a number of tests to be applied in determining whether workers are contractors or employees. On appeal to the High Court (High Court 1) by the Minister on a point of law, Edwards J ruled that the EAT had "erred in law" by failing to have regard to all the possibilities in determining the nature of the working relationship between the parties. He also decided that the finding of the EAT that there was "mutuality of obligation" between the Minister and the TVIs (i.e. that the Minister was obliged to provide work to the TVIs and that the TVIs were obliged to carry it out), was made on a "flawed and untenable basis". Furthermore, he found that the EAT had misinterpreted the decision in the Henry Denny case and should have used the full range of legal tests in coming to the conclusions that they did. The matter was sent back to the EAT (EAT 2) for re-hearing on the basis of the facts of the case and the judgment of Edwards J in the first of the High Court decisions. On that basis, the EAT felt compelled to hold that the vets were independent contractors. The TVIs appealed the second decision of the EAT to the High Court (High Court 2) on a point of law on the basis that it had "erred in law" on a number of grounds, including in finding that it was bound to reverse its decision based on the earlier decision of the High Court. The High Court found that there was nothing in the additional evidence produced by the TVIs which was of such importance that no reasonable Tribunal, having heard it, would be entitled to conclude that the TVIs were engaged other than under a contract for service i.e. contractors rather than employees. The Judge did not deal with the matter as to whether the EAT was bound by the decision of the High Court in arriving at its determination. This decision was appealed to the Supreme Court which overturned the High Court decision and held that the EAT was in error in its second determination. The matter was sent back to the EAT for re-hearing on the basis of the facts of the case and the judgment of Edwards J in the first of the High Court decisions.
The fact that this case is going on for eleven years is testament to the complexity of deciding whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor. It is extremely difficult to decide which is which. Some court/body has to decide it and the Supreme Court has clearly ruled that it is the Employment Appeals Tribunal which must decide it.

Edwards J in High Court 1, considered the following relevant matters, which the Tribunal found useful, in reaching his decision:

Mutuality of Obligation

This exists where the employer is obliged to provide work for the employee and the employee is obliged to perform that work as in a normal employer/employee relationship. Whilst the Court found that it was appropriate to apply the mutuality test, this does not mean that an implied contract of mutual obligation existed. Rather, the High Court agreed with the Department's view that they had no control over the level of work available to the inspectors, as this was within the control of Galtee.

"The so called Enterprise Test"

Edwards J analysed the relevant jurisprudence in relation to "the so called Enterprise test". This test examines whether or not a person is in business on his/her own account. This test originated in a UK decision of Market Investigations –v- Minister for Social Welfare and was adopted by the Supreme Court in this Jurisdiction in the case of Henry Denny and Sons Ireland Limited V The Minister for Social Welfare ('the Denny case') and the application of the ratio decidendi in that case and in the subsequent decisions Tierney –v- An Post (2000); Castleisland Cattle Breeding Society Ltd –v- The Minister for Social and Family Affairs (2004) and the Electricity Supply Board –v- The Minister for Social Community and Family Affairs & Others (2006). Mr Justice Edwards noted that a very important "particular fact" common to these cases was the existence of a contractual document stating that the relationship between the parties was a contract for services. The fact that the parties agreed that the description of their relationship should be considered a contract for services should not be considered decisive or conclusive. Mr Justice Edwards considered the judgements in 'the Denny case' and referred to the statement of Keane J that when determining whether a particular employment relationship is to be considered a contract "for service" or "of service" [that] "each case must be considered in the light of its particular facts and of the general principles which the courts have developed" Edwards J quoted the following paragraph from Keane J in the Denny case:

"It is, accordingly, clear that, while each case must be determined in the light of its particular facts and circumstances, in general, a person will be regarded as providing his or her services under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor where he or she is performing those services for another person and not for himself or herself. The degree of control exercised over how the work is to be performed, although a factor to be taken into account, is not decisive. The inference that the person is engaged in business on his or her own account can be more readily drawn where he or she provides the necessary premises, or equipment or some other form of investment, where he or she employs others to assist in the business and where the profit which he or she derives from the business is dependent on the efficiency with which it is conducted by him or her"

Mr. Justice Edwards criticised the misinterpretation of this passage which arose from "misguided attempts to divine in the judgement the formulation of a 'one size fits all'" approach to this difficult question. He went on to say that it was unhelpful to speak of a "control test", an "enterprise test" a "fundamental test" an "essential test", a "single composite test" as none of these "tests" can be relied on to deliver a definitive result. None of these tests were conclusive or exhaustive. Accordingly, this Tribunal should not reduce its consideration to a few tests. It is clear from 'the Barry case' and from Denny that all possibilities must be investigated before coming to a conclusion. This is what the Tribunal must now do.

Moreover, the Barry case further stipulated that in deciding whether a person is working under a Contract of Service or a Contract for Services a Court or Tribunal should have regard to the following:

(a) all possibilities should be investigated in determining the nature of the work relationship between the parties;

(b) the "so called enterprise test" is not determinative of the issue and that it is incorrect to assert that questions of control and integration are to be regarded merely as elements to be taken into account in applying the enterprise test;

(c) compare the question of enterprise to questions of control and integration as such a comparison will assist a court or tribunal with valuable assistance in drawing the appropriate inferences from the primary facts and no one factor is subsumed by another;

(d) there is no exhaustive list and there might be other factors which might also assist.

The binding element of the Judgement of Keane J in the Denny case is that "each case must be considered in the light of its particular facts and of the general principles which the courts have developed". Therefore, the test regarding whether "a person is in business on their own account" is reduced from being the fundamental test to one of the many factors that have to be taken into consideration in light of the particular facts of the case. Perhaps the main point to take from the case is that the various tests in this area should be considered as useful, rather than fundamental or single composite tests. Furthermore, each case should be examined on its own facts, giving particular attention as to whether or not a written contract containing a statement of the purported nature of the contract exists, or where no clear written contracts exists, whether in fact one, or more contracts or an umbrella type of contract exists. The Tribunal must consider all the facts in the case before it and must not have a narrow focus.

The Tribunal found the Denny case, in most part, particularly useful in considering its decision. It is worth setting out the facts of this case: A demonstrator had been engaged by the Appellants to demonstrate its food products in various supermarkets. She was employed under a series of temporary contracts which were renewed every year. Her contract clearly specified that she was not an employee rather she was an independent contractor. Some of these statements were:-

"You are deemed to be an independent contractor",

"It shall be your duty to pay and discharge such taxes and charges as may be payable out of such fees to the Revenue Commissioners or otherwise",

"It is agreed that the provisions of the Unfair Dismissals Act1977 shall not apply etc",

"You will not be an employee of this company",

"You will be responsible for your own tax affairs"

However, her duties were to be carried out in a very specific way; she would be given a minimum period of notice before each job; if she could not do the job another person approved by the employer could do it for her; she had to wear a uniform provided; she was paid by the days she worked, payment being made on receipt of an invoice which was only valid if signed by the store manager. She submitted an invoice and payment was made each fortnight without deduction of tax or PRSI.The demonstrator was deemed to be an employee notwithstanding statements to the contrary in her contract.

The Judge in the Denny case felt that statements, such as "you are deemed to be an Independent Contractor" etc, in the contract should be disregarded, on the basis that they represent the opinion of the contracting parties but were of minimal value in deciding the work status of the person engaged. This is a somewhat unhelpful part of the Denny judgement, in that there is a view that all things being equal then one must look at the intention of the parties. However, in Denny the intention of the parties was that the relationship between them was one of independent contractor. This is somewhat confusing.

In 'the Denny case'

the Supreme Court held that in order to decide whether a contract is one for service or of service each case should be considered on its own particular facts and in the light of the general principles which the courts have developed McAuliffe V Minister for Social Welfare 1995 ILRM 421 approved;

Whilst the degree of control exercised by a person may provide guidance in deciding whether a contract is one "for service" or "of service" it may not always be a satisfactory test to apply Cassidy V Minister for Social Welfare 1951 2 KB 343 and Queensland Stations Property Limited V Federal Commissioner of Taxation 1945 70 CLR 539 considered. The degree of control is not decisive. Market Investigations Limited V Minister for Social Security 1968 3 AER 732.

The inference that a person is engaged in business on their own account is more readily drawn when they provide their own premises or equipment, where they employ others to assist them in their business and where the profit is dependent on the efficiency with which they conduct their business.

Whilst a written agreement was drafted with a view of ensuring that the demonstrator was regarded in law as an independent contractor, this was only one of the factors to be taken into account. The facts or realities of the situation on the ground must also be considered.

The Tribunal then considered the facts of the case before it with commentary of previous case law and taking into account the facts and realities on the ground. In doing so the Tribunal found some factors more helpful than others. The Tribunal notes the observations of Edwards J in Dillon L.J in Nethermere (St Neots) that:

"the same question as an aid to appreciating the facts will not necessarily be crucial or fundamental in every case. It is for a court or Tribunal seized of the issue to identify those aids of greatest potential assistance to them in the circumstances of the particular case and to use those aids appropriately".

While in most cases it is obvious whether a person is an employee or self-employed, it can sometimes be difficult to assess whether an individual providing services to another person or business can properly be described as self-employed. The terms "employed" and "self-employed" are not clearly defined in law, but some guidance has been provided by the courts. It is necessary to look at what the worker actually does, the way the worker does it and the terms and conditions under which the worker is engaged. This will be in the mind of the Tribunal when it considers all the facts surrounding the working relationship between the claimant and the Respondent. The Tribunal considered existing case law in this contentious area, cognisant of the fact that it would be difficult to find a set of circumstances in a previously decided case that exactly mirrors "the particular circumstances" of the case in issue. Recourse is therefore made to cobbling ratio decidendi from a number of relevant cases to fit the circumstances of the case before the Tribunal.

The Tribunal then considered the evidence adduced taking into consideration all the factors relating to the working relationship between the Claimant and the Respondent. These factors which are now set out in summary hereunder, some supportive of the contention that the claimant was engaged as an Independent Contractor and others supportive of the claimant having employee status.

In Business on her own Account and/or Integration

In the Barry High Court case Mr Justice Edwards considered that the appropriate test as to whether a person is engaged in business on his or her own account should consider, among other matters [see below], the following factors:

> Whether the person provides the necessary premises, or equipment or some other form of investment.
>
> In the case before the Tribunal the claimant did not provide premises, equipment or any investment. Furthermore, the claimant had no involvement with the ownership or rental of the building.
>
> Whether the person employs others to assist in the business.
>
> The claimant did not employ others to assist in the business, and
>
> whether the profit which he or she derives from the business is dependent on the efficiency with which it is conducted by him or her.
> The claimant could not have earned extra money by working harder or conducting the business differently. The pay she received was the same, which was paid on submission by her of an invoice.

These tests are useful in assessing how integrated the claimant was in the working relationship between the parties and notes that she was integrated in the respondent's business, working in the same office as other employees, with nothing obviously distinguishing her from these other employees except, that she was paid on submission of an invoice. She sat with the whole work team. She was provided with a bank computer and had access to the bank's e-mail. She was invited to all team events and was included in all team meetings. She had access to sensitive information. The claimant explained that the senior management trusted her and the support staff worked parallel with her.

That it is not confined to these three tests is clear from Mr Justice Edwards reference to "among other matters". The "other matters" which the Tribunal considered were:

Relevant Contracts/Intention of the Parties:
The claimant commenced working for the Respondent in July 2006 through her IT Consulting company.
It appears to the Tribunal that there were three distinct phases of the relationship between the claimant, her company (Clyda IT Ltd) and the respondent, as detailed below:

a) During the period from 31st July 2006 to 30th November 2007, there were seven short term contracts between a company called Vantage Recruitment Services Limited and Clyda IT Services, (the claimant's consulting company) and the claimant worked to these contracts. The seven contracts show clearly, that the intention of the parties to these contracts (Vantage Recruitment Agency and Clyda IT Services Ltd.) was that of a contract for services. Ulster Bank was not a party to these contracts. It follows that there could not have been a contract either of, or, for service between the claimant and Ulster Bank during this period.

b) During the period from 1st December 2007 to 31st December 2009, the Tribunal was provided with copies of two contracts between the respondent and the claimant's company, which were contracts for service. These contracts were unsigned by either party. However, it is clear that, despite the unsigned nature of the contracts, both parties operated the contents of these contracts to the letter.
c) During the period from January 2010 until the date of termination on the 28th February 2014, there was no written contract in existence between the parties. The claimant, through her company (Clyda IT services), continued to present invoices for payment which the respondent honoured.

Mutuality of obligation

From the evidence before it the Tribunal is satisfied that the employer (respondent) was obliged to provide work for the employee (claimant) and the employee was obliged to perform that work.

Intention of the Parties:
The Tribunal is satisfied that the initial working relationship was one of Contract for Service but this changed over time, which will be dealt with below.

Control:

Whilst the degree of control exercised by a person may provide guidance in deciding whether a contract is one "for service" or "of service" it may not always be a satisfactory test to apply. This is clear from the cases referred to above and Cassidy V Minister for Social Welfare 1951 2 KB 343 et al. The Tribunal considered the question of "control" and found that the respondent exercised certain control over the claimant's work. She was allocated the work which she then did.

Actions of the claimant
The Tribunal is satisfied that the claimant worked to a Contract for Service initially through her company up to 2010 or thereabouts. The change, which occurred in 2010, will be dealt with below.

Taxation

The claimant was paid on submission of an invoice and she looked after her own taxation, VAT and PRSI. While this may indicate independent contractor status it is not decisive and the Tribunal notes that in the Denny case the demonstrator paid her own tax and PRSI and submitted an invoice yet the Supreme Court held she was an employee. However, the demonstrator in the Denny case did not appear to have presented VAT invoices. If she did not then, perhaps, the Supreme Court's decision can be distinguished from the claimant's case in that the claimant's company invariably did present VAT invoices.

The Tribunal notes that even Revenue do not accept the fact that because an individual has registered for self-assessment or VAT automatically makes that person self-employed. In the same way Revenue do not automatically accept that because a person is taxed under the PAYE system that the person is automatically an employee. This is clear from the 2010 document – Code of Practice for Determining Employment or Self-Employment Status of Individuals;

Pension Entitlements:

There was no contribution of pension by the respondent.

Sick Pay/Time off in lieu:
Evidence was given that on one occasion when the claimant missed work because of illness, the company acknowledged that she had worked excessive hours and offered to pay the three day's pay. The claimant estimated that, during an exceptionally busy period, she worked the equivalent, in additional hours, of 35 days approx. She made representations to the respondent regarding these additional hours and was allowed to claim 17/18 days' time in lieu in relation to excessive hours. An independent contractor is not allowed time in lieu by the person engaging him/her.

Substitution: the claimant could not use another person to substitute for her – she had to perform the work allocated to her. Neither was there any provision for the claimant to sub-contract her work.

Whether the profit she derived was dependent on how she carried on her work?
The Tribunal does not believe that if the claimant worked harder, or differently, that she could have earned more money. There was no bonus entitlement. She was paid a standard amount, which did not change.

In business on her own account:

No credible evidence was presented to the Tribunal that the claimant was in business on her own account. In O'Coindealbhain (Inspector of Taxes V Mooney) [1990] IR 422 the critical question was considered to be whether the person was performing the relevant services as a person in business in his/her own account.

Holidays:

She was not paid annual leave, but when projects were finished she took unpaid time off in lieu.

Support Staff: At times directly employed bank staff reported to the claimant in relation to project work. This is somewhat supportive of the claimant having employee status.

Conclusion:

Whether a worker is an employee or self-employed depends on a large number of factors. The Tribunal wishes to stress that the issue is not determined by adding up the number of factors pointing towards employment and comparing that result with the number pointing towards self-employment. It is the matter of the overall effect which is not necessarily the same as the sum total of all individual details. Not all details are of equal weight or importance in any given situation. The details may also vary in importance from one situation to another. When the detailed facts have been established the right approach is to stand back and look at the picture as a whole, to see if the overall effect is that of a person working in a self-employed capacity or a person working as an employee in somebody else's business. If the evidence is evenly balanced, the intention of the parties may then decide the issue. The intention of the parties originally was that the working relationship was one of Contract for Service. The Tribunal is satisfied that this changed over time. The Tribunal is further satisfied that in 2010 on her own evidence, the claimant tried to regularise her status and spoke to HW, CW and later on, RH. The matter was not dealt with properly or at all. The Tribunal notes that the claimant was told she would not be provided with permanent employment but this did not address the issue of her employment status. The Tribunal notes from Edwards J judgement in the Barry High Court case that "there is no universal test whereby it may be said that if a particular indication is met or not met that a person is employed or not" Charleton J in the Barry Supreme Court Case [Paragraph 9] case elaborated on this as follows: "it may need to be factored into any such analysis that it can be that a course of dealings over years may turn from what was initially the engagement of self-employed contractor, to do work on a particular basis into an employment relationship". The Tribunal determines that, having regard to all the evidence, this is what happened in the case before it.

In summary there is no single test. Each case must be considered in the light of its own particular facts.

Standing back and looking at the working relationship as a whole, and mindful of the legal principles set out in the cases referred to above, the Tribunal determines that the working relationship between the Claimant and the Respondent drifted into a Contract of Service and that the claimant was working as an employee for the respondent.

The Tribunal therefore does have jurisdiction to hear the claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to 2007.

Respondent(s) : Ms Paula O'Hanlon, IBEC, Mid-West Regional Office, Gardner House, Bank Place, Charlotte Quay, Limerick

The claims under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2007 and the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997 were withdrawn by the claimant's representative at the commencement of the hearing.

Claimant's Case

The claimant gave direct evidence that she is a qualified secondary school teacher and is qualified to teach English and religious education. She gave further evidence to the Tribunal in relation to further qualifications which she holds. She commenced employment with the respondent in September 2006 as a teacher on call. She covered classes in many classrooms and in the 2006/2007 academic year worked every day with the exception of three days. In the 2007/2008 academic year she was employed in the same capacity working on a full time-table of 22 hours per week. In the summer of 2008 she successfully applied for the position of English teacher with resource/Teaching English as a Foreign Language (TEFL). This was a fixed term contract from 1 September 2008 until 18 March 2009. She gave evidence that she worked 22 hours per week, every week in that position. She generally spent 11 hours teaching English and spent the remainder teaching religious education, history, resource, CSPE and SPHE. This pattern of work continued into the 2009/2010 academic year and she told the Tribunal that her contract of employment did not specify an exact number of hours that she was expected to work.

She gave evidence of an incident involving herself and a student in September 2009. She reported the matter to the school principal and she subsequently received an apology from the student approximately three weeks later. The student was allowed to return to her class following the apology and she was not aware of any other sanction imposed on the student. She gave evidence that she continued to enjoy a good working relationship with the vice principal and principal following the resolution of this matter.

She gave evidence of a further incident involving herself, a student and the vice principal in March 2010. The incident involved the student's folder of work for the applied leaving certificate. She had a disagreement with the vice principal regarding signing off on this student's folder of work and gave detailed evidence to the Tribunal concerning this issue. She eventually signed off on the student's project of work and believed that the student received a fair result for his folder of work. She told the Tribunal that the relationship between herself and the vice principal felt cool after this incident.

She gave further evidence that some students reported to her that they had consumed alcohol on a school trip in April 2010. The school trip involved male and female students and was under the supervision of two male teachers. She discussed this matter with a school colleague who reported the matter to school management. She was subsequently asked to attend for a meeting with the vice principal and principal and asked to report on what the students had told her. She was called to a subsequent meeting and told that there was no concern for student welfare and the matter had been put to bed. Following this the working relationship between herself, the vice principal and the principal became non-existent. She gave evidence that there was no formal or informal contact between them in relation to her work and she was excluded from a graduation ceremony that she had organised in previous years.

At the end of the 2009/2010 academic year the principal called her to his office and said he was sorry to inform her that there were no hours available to her in the college for the forthcoming year. She did not accept this as she was aware that school numbers were increasing and the school was building extra classrooms. She outlined to the Tribunal numerous requests that she made throughout the summer of 2010 to the school principal to secure employment for the following year without success. She gave evidence that the school advertised for four positions during this period but the combination of subjects advertised were such that she was not in a position to apply for the positions as she did not have the necessary qualifications. She believed that the school was trying to get rid of her.

In August 2010 she received a phone call from the principal offering her 10 hours work per week. She accepted this offer for now but expected to be offered a full (22 hour time-table) upon her return. She returned to the school in September 2010 and her work was confined to TEFL work which is considered a support subject. Her name no longer appeared on the staff list which she found humiliating. She gave evidence that she had a non-existent relationship with the principal and vice principal. She was allocated a classroom in a portacabin in the school car park and she felt increasingly isolated. She felt she had been labelled as a trouble maker or whistle-blower and did not feel that she could speak with anybody.

She remained in her position until November 2010 when she visited her doctor. She was certified as being unfit for work and did not return to work. She resigned from her position in March 2011 and her letter of resignation was opened to the Tribunal. She attended the company's occupational health physician in February 2011 and was certified as being unfit for work. She told this physician that she did not believe that her workplace was a safe environment in which to work. She gave evidence that during the tenure of her employment she was never provided with any grievance procedures. Following her resignation in March 2011 she received a letter dated 12 May 2011 from her employer asking that she reconsider her decision to resign and requesting a meeting. She did not attend for a meeting as she did not feel strong enough to do so after the terrible year she had encountered. She told the Tribunal that her employer had not afforded her any discussions previously and she felt this was a lame attempt to restore normality.

Since the termination of her employment she has not been successful in securing alternative employment. She has carried out some private tuition and details of her earnings from that work were provided to the Tribunal. She has commenced a masters degree in counselling and psychotherapy and is currently in receipt of job seekers benefit.

Under cross examination the claimant told the Tribunal she was not advised of the background of the student who caused the incident in her class in Sept 2009. There had been a staff meeting about the student but she was not in attendance. Regarding the incident of students on the school trip she said that she was escorted to the principal's office, she was told it would be investigated and later that day was told the issue had been "put to bed". She felt that the relationship deteriorated and there was little or no interaction after this. Asked about the hours allocated the claimant said that the principal told her at a meeting that unfortunately there would be no hours for her in September but then said that at a follow up meeting with her union representative she asked why her hours were being cut. Asked about this discrepancy in her evidence the claimant told the Tribunal that the principal telephoned her in August and offered her 10 hours, she felt in gave in. The claimant was unaware that her union representative also worked in the portacabin and conceded it was fit for purpose but said she was only timetabled for that classroom and it was outside the main building which made her feel isolated.

Respondent's case:

The former school principal gave evidence that he was charged with teacher and staff needs.
He would identify areas that needed further staffing and in the summer of 2006 was made aware that the claimant would be available for casual substitution. She was not "teaching" per se but assigned work would be left by teachers that she would supervise and make sure it was done. At no time did the claimant teach any subject that was outside her area of expertise. He said that the claimant was very competent and their relationship friendly. The first port of call for the claimant would be to cover any additional hours. In the 2009/2010 the claimant was on a 10 hour contract for resource teaching, the balance of the 22 hours was made up by substitution/ teaching English as a foreign language. The claimant never had an entitlement to 22 hours.

The respondent had 17 feeder schools and it was a mammoth task to try and establish requirements for the coming academic year. It could not be established how many children may have learning needs and how much funding would be available so at a meeting in May hours could not be confirmed for the claimant. The claimant was never advised that there were no hours for her and while the principal understood that she was unhappy he told her he would do his best for her. The following August he was able to offer just short of 11 hours but this would be augmented by other hours e.g. covering sick leave, annual leave etc. It was the same arrangement as other years.

The principal told the Tribunal that the portacabins were modular buildings 20/30 meters from the back door, that were used by resource teaches, it was much more suitable to have an allocated position rather than have an unestablished status. He was not aware that the claimant was unhappy there. The principal stated that he was baffled then and now by the claimants resignation.

Regarding the school trip he said that "it was put to bed" were not words that he would ever use. The incident was fully investigated and it was the following week before the findings were made know, certainly not the same day.

The then vice principal, VG, gave evidence of her role when the claimant was employed. Part of her role was to do a supervision rota. The school allocated resource hours based on needs. Hours were also allocated in teachers were sick, on days away with students etc. In 2006 the claimant contacted her to say she was available for casual substation work. As a casual/sub teacher there is no entitlement to full time hours.

VG was involved with the incident with the student where the claimant was pushed by him. She advised the claimant to go to the doctor and was told by the claimant that she had soft tissue damage. The matter was investigated and the claimant received an apology. VG did not recall any incident about signing or not signing off on a piece of work for any student. Her office was used by students all of the time who wanted access to a computer to finish a piece of work.

Under cross examination VG told the Tribunal that there was always contact between both of them but while the claimant was on sick leave VG did not think it appropriate to contact her during that period. She did not know the claimants name was removed from the staff book and didn't know anything about stress until she seen the medical certificates. She was not aware of any cooling off of the relationship between them.

Both teachers from the school trip gave evidence of being spoken on the Monday following the trip and the issue was resolved.

The H.R. manager EM gave evidence that after 12 weeks of sick leave the claimant was automatically referred for assessment. At the end of January 2011 he made contact, advising her of exhausting her entitlement to paid sick leave. She advised him that she only wanted contact by e-mail or letter. On 8th February a medical certificate was received which referred to stress.

This automatically is referred to the internal medical examiner. It was considered that she was not fit to return to work and was to be reviewed in a further 8 weeks. The claimant wrote to the respondent requesting her terms and conditions of work, the hours being assigned and an explanation for the reduction. This letter was dated 20th January 2011 but only received by the respondent on 16th February 2011. EM advised by follow up letter on 22nd February that as she was not currently medically fit to work, they would engage when she was well enough to do so.

He received her letter of resignation dated 11th March 2011 and immediately contacted the medical examiner who advised not to engage directly with the claimant until she was deemed fit. EM wrote to the claimant on 16th March and suggested that the letter of resignation be set aside until the claimant was medically fit to engage. He arranged a review for her in April/May but she declined to attend.

Determination:

The Tribunal has carefully considered the evidence adduced over this three day hearing. There has been no suggestion that the claimant could be considered in any way other than as an able and capable teacher.

The burden of proof rests with the claimant to demonstrate that her decision to resign her position with the respondent was reasonable in all the circumstances. In particular, the claimant must show that the respondent acted in such a way that no ordinary person could or would continue in the workplace. It is the view of the Tribunal that the respondents conduct in this case was not so unfair or so damaging to the claimants rights and entitlements that she had no option but to resign her position.

The claimant, in this case, did not avail of grievance procedures despite having signed for receipt of same during her employment. The claimant was treated by the respondent in accordance with standard procedures for dealing with allegations of stress related illness. The Tribunal are not satisfied that there was sufficient evidence of the workplace was unsafe or unhealthy.

Despite the exhaustive treatment of the issue the Tribunal find no grounds adduced that could substantiate a claim for Unfair Dismissal

The claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2007 must fail.

The claim under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 to 2005 is dismissed as this was a constructive dismissal claim.

Respondent: Ms Rosemary Mallon B.L instructed by Mr. Michael Doyle, Arthur Cox, Solicitors, Earlsfort Centre, Earlsfort Terrace, Dublin 2

Claimant's Case:

The claimant's case is one of constructive dismissal. The respondent is an information technology company which supplies hardware and software to a variety of businesses. The claimant commenced employment with the respondent in April 2004 in Oracle Direct. His initial role in Oracle Direct was primarily telephone based and offered various supports for the Field Sales division, a separate department where employees had face to face interaction with customers. Field Sales roles were more advanced and probably more advantageous than Oracle Direct roles in that they were customer oriented as opposed to a support role and generally sold higher value products than Oracle Direct.

From 2006 onwards the claimant took on what was known as a "Prime role". The claimant considered this a face to face sales role but he still sat within the Oracle Direct structure. The claimant believed himself to be in a unique position in that his role was a combination of a Field Sales role and an Oracle Direct role. In 2010 the claimant was promoted to an "IC4" level and retained his "Prime" title. He continued in this role up until April 2014 when he was informed that his Prime role was to be eliminated. The claimant's main customers were Independent Software Vendors (ISVs) and he had achieved a high level of sales in this role.

One of the reasons was because he had no limits on the type of products he could sell to customers. He could sell the full range of Oracle products to customers which increased the value of certain deals as opposed to individual components which other roles were restricted to. The claimant explained that a 'sales cycle' took anything up to 18 months and during that time, in his Prime role, he was able to essentially develop relationships, have the customer understand the need for full service business solutions and ultimately sell more product. Needless to say this was reflected in the claimant's commission and bonus structure. The claimant's base salary was €56,500, the ATV was €69,000 (100% sales) and he had no car allowance. A rate of 7.5% commission was applied where he achieved 100-125% of his sales target and a rate of 10% applied for where he achieved 125% and above of his sales target. This latter target was where the claimant wanted to be and he considered that he had a track record of delivering these types of results.

In August 2012 the claimant drew up what he called his 'three year plan'. He states that he showed it to and discussed it with senior management JP, LD and GSG. The plan was, inter alia, to target certain customers and increase his sales (and commission) incrementally over this period which would be of benefit to him and obviously increase Oracle's sales at the same time. The claimant stated that he had made future decisions based on this plan and it was his opinion that the respondent knew of and approved this plan for him.

The claimant gave evidence that during the course of his employment he received various awards for his sales achievements. One particular thing he was proud of was that he was selected to attend what was known as the "Top Notch Talent Sales Programme" in the UK in April 2013. This course was pitched at employees at IC4 level and above (i.e. IC5) and was designed for the top sales people to create a network among themselves. The claimant was very happy with this as his ultimate goal was to move to a "key account role", one of the highest sales levels in the organisation. The claimant felt that at this stage he was on track for an IC5 role and was gearing towards that (although the respondent maintains that there was no such thing as an IC5 role in Oracle Direct, only in Field Sales).

On the 29 April 2014 the claimant was informed by the Regional Director (JP) that there was no longer a requirement for his Prime role and that two new roles would be created to cover the claimant's customers and sales district (this combination was referred to as a "territory"). This came as a surprise to the claimant and he was of the opinion that as of 1 June 2014 his prime role would no longer exist.

On the 7 May 2014 the two new roles were advertised internally and externally. The claimant was required to interview for the roles although both were at the IC3 level. On the 30 May 2014, having completed the interview process, he met with JP and was offered an IC3 level Field Sales role. The claimant had a number of difficulties with this. Firstly it was at an IC3 level which he considered a demotion from his IC4 role. While the base salary was higher he was limited in the range of products he could sell (previously he could sell all products) and the sales targets were higher. This would invariably reduce his commission payments which the claimant was not happy about. The claimant stated that he had developed his three year plan, which he shared with senior management, and had certain expectations for the future which he was now being denied. Following some discussions the claimant was offered two further roles both of which he rejected. One of these roles was what was called an overlay role at IC4 level in the Oracle Direct structure. The claimant feels that taking this role would put him back ten years in his career. It would have been a telephone based role which he feels would have looked absurd to his customers. Furthermore, he would have been limited in the types of products he could sell thereby affecting his commission. The other role was an IC4 prime role in a UK territory which again, the claimant felt was a demotion. He would have to take charge of dormant accounts, develop a whole new customer base and would have to spend a large amount of time in the UK which was not feasible for him.

On the 18 June 2014 the claimant filed a grievance with the company which was opened to the Tribunal. The claimant at this stage considered that his Prime role was redundant and wanted appropriate compensation in this regard. In the alternative he wanted an IC4 role in the Field Sales organisation with a base salary of €91,000, an ATV of €91,000, a car allowance and the ability to earn in excess of €182,000 by way of commission.

The claimant attended a grievance meeting on the 9 July 2014 and the minutes of that meeting were opened to the Tribunal. A letter dated the 17 July 2014 rejecting the claimant's grievance was also opened to the Tribunal. One of the issues raised by the respondent was that JP did not feel the claimant had adequate experience in Field Sales to warrant an IC4 grade. The grievance was not upheld and claimant appealed that decision. The appeal was conducted by POR and the decision of LD was upheld.

On the 26 August 2014 the claimant tendered his resignation. In that letter he noted that his Prime role was eliminated and that any of the offers subsequently made to him were detrimental to his salary and his status within the organisation. He states that his three year plan was agreed with management at the time and he relied upon those discussions in implementing same but now found himself unable to capitalise, both financially and in career terms, on the investments he made in his role. He does not accept that the respondent is entitled to rely on contractual terms that allow it to change territories to his detriment without applying those charges in a fair and reasonable manner (and he believes the respondent has not been either fair or reasonable). In the circumstances he states that he has no choice, because of the respondent's unilateral actions, but to resign his employment. . The claimant gave evidence and of his efforts to mitigate his losses and provided extensive copies of job applications made and correspondence sent and received by him.

In cross-examination the claimant agreed the respondent worked on a year by year target (1 June to 31 May) and at the end of each year he agreed the respondent could contractually change his and other employees targets, sales products or territories. He also agreed that no-one in Oracle had asked him to devise his three year plan.

When put to him that his Prime role was not a face to face Field Sales role but rather it was a 'happy accident' because of his location and clients that he was able to have face to face meetings, he disagreed. He believes he used his initiative to get the best out of his role which ultimately amounted to a Field Sales type role, if not in name then by his actions. He agreed he was not in receipt of a travel allowance but stated he had raised the issue on a number of occasions with management. The claimant told the Tribunal that he contributed to the Field Sales figures but agreed he was paid and managed by Oracle Direct.

The claimant disagreed that the IC4 grade in Oracle Direct was not equivalent to IC4 grade in Field Sales. When asked where he arrived at the salary and bonus he proposed as an alternative to the positions offered to him he explained he compiled it having compared the salary of a colleague who had previously moved from Oracle Direct to Field Sales at an IC4 grade. This colleague had a received a 44.4% increase in salary and commission.

The claimant told the Tribunal that JP had informed him his Prime role was to be eliminated and the offers of alternative employment made to him by the respondent were unreasonable due to, inter alia, grade level, availability of product range he could sell, increased targets and travel that would be required to the UK. Furthermore, he wanted the opportunity to achieve his three year plan and net the commission he had envisaged. In all of the circumstances the claimant felt that he had no alternative but to resign.

Respondent's Case:

The Vice President (LD) for Tech Sales for Ireland and the UK in Oracle Direct gave evidence. LD explained the line of reporting, i.e. the claimant reported to his Line Manager who reported to a Director who in turn reported to her. LD told the Tribunal that the claimant was employed at an IC4 grade in a Prime role based in Dublin. The claimant, as a Prime representative operated on his own and did not work alongside the Field Sales team. In the organisation a Prime role is seen as a developmental role with mostly phone based contact with clients and some face to face interaction. She accepted that the claimant had a significant amount of face to face contact with clients but she believes that was because he was a Dublin based representative and the clients were easy to visit without him requiring approval to travel or a travel allowance. She distinguished the type of deals the claimant would normally do, being less complex deals with smaller clients to that of Field Sales representatives who were involved in more complex deals with larger clients. In addition Field Sales representatives had assistance from overlay representatives in order to manage the volume of work.

LD told the Tribunal that the claimant wanted to move forward in his career and become a Prime IC5 but there was no such grade in Oracle Direct. However, there was such a grade in Field Sales and a move to this section in general would be considered a career progression for the claimant. LD further explained that an IC4 grade in the Prime role was not equivalent to an IC4 grade in a Field Sales role.

On the 9 July 2014 LD held a grievance meeting with the claimant to deal with the issues he had raised. The claimant's main issues were that the respondent was changing his territory and as a result he would not be able to complete his three year plan. LD told the claimant that the respondent worked to a year to year basis therefore the notion of a three year plan did not exist in the company. Furthermore, no one in management had asked him to devise or work to this three year plan. The claimant informed her he did not want either of the two alternative positions offered to him. He viewed the overlay role as a demotion which would not be good for his status in the organisation. In relation to the Field Sales role he wanted to move as an IC4 grade and not the IC3 offered. The claimant also turned down a third offer of employment, an Oracle Direct Prime Role at IC4 level as he stated he did not want to travel to the UK (for the reasons outlined in his direct evidence). This offer was made to the claimant as he did not want the two previous roles offered and the company wanted to accommodate him as best they could. LD told the Tribunal that she found this unreasonable as the most a representative would have to travel to the UK in one year would be eight times with maybe one overnight stay. LD explained that the appointee that took up this role only travelled to the UK on three occasions. The claimant submitted his letter of resignation on the 26 August 2014. LD wrote to him on the 28 August 2014 and asked him to reconsider his position as he was a good employee but he refused.

In cross examination LD was queried as to whether "in reality" the claimant was part of the Field Sales team in that he appeared on an organisation chart under this title, he was meeting clients face to face, he was providing complex end to end solutions to clients and he had high volume sales. LD stated that the claimant did not have the experience of working in the Field Sales with larger organisations and it was only due to his location and the location of his clients that he was able to meet them face to face. She did not agree that the claimant was selling both complex solutions to complex customers in his current role in the same way a representative in Field Sales would. Furthermore, the IC4 grade in Field Sales also had targets nearly twice as those in a Prime role. LD explained that the natural progression for the claimant's career would have been to move into Field Sales and gain more experience which could, and probably would, have led to promotion. She disagreed that a move to an IC3 Field Sales role was career regression for the claimant.

JP gave evidence. He explained that at the material time he managed the Field Sales team for Ireland and the UK. He gave a detailed explanation of the differences between a Prime role and a Field Sales role. He also explained that an IC4 grade in Prime (Oracle Direct) was not equivalent to an IC4 grade in a Field Sales role. Colleagues of the claimant who had made this transition from an Oracle Direct role to a Field Sales role had done so at an IC3 level and were subsequently promoted within Field Sales. In relation to the awards the claimant had received during his employment, he explained that these awards were bought in a "job lot" and presented quarterly by his team to the staff generally who contributed to the respondent's revenue.

An email dated the 2 September 2013 including an organisation chart was opened to the Tribunal. JP explained that this email was sent to all staff, including the claimant, who supported his team. He did not agree that this organisational chart depicted the team structure but rather it showed the territories for those mentioned in the chart. The claimant was listed under the heading of Oracle Direct as a Prime representative and anyone in the organisation would understand that this was an Oracle Direct role and not a Field Sales role..

JP explained to the Tribunal that on a yearly basis the respondent designated budgets to each division. Decisions were then made how these budgets would be dispersed. Territories and budgets were liable to change in order to secure revenue for the company. JP said it was normal practice to move staff and territories but it was not a decision the respondent made on a whim. In April 2014 a decision was made to move the Prime territory into Field Sales on the basis that the relevant customers had moved from the developmental stage to being potentially more profitable. It was accepted that the particular customers in that territory were developed by the claimant in his Prime role.

JP gave evidence as to the various roles offered to the claimant. He explained that the offer of the position of IC3 grade in Field was made to the claimant after he had "benchmarked" his performance in interview and due to his own knowledge of him as an employee. There were no particular criteria he adhered to when coming to this conclusion. JP stated that he only had two IC4 grades on his team; one had ten years IC3 experience in Field Sales in Oracle and was promoted in 2013, the other had twenty five years total Field Sales, nine of which were in Oracle. The claimant just did not have the level of experience with complex customers and complex solutions that he believed necessary for IC4 grade at that point in time. While JP believed that the claimant was very good in his Prime role he effectively operated as a sole trader. He was not as good in a team environment and this was the feedback JP had received over a number of years. The claimant was very good at organisation and planning but it appeared to be a challenge for him to work outside of the plans he developed for himself. .

On cross examination JP said that no-one in his team received the salary and commission the claimant had proposed as an alternative to the positions he had been offered. JP agreed that the claimant had secured good deals for the respondent and there was no question that some were high value but they were uncomplicated deals with smaller companies than those made in the Field. JP told the Tribunal that the claimant's performance was not an issue and that he had wanted him to join his team. He felt the claimant's career projection was only upwards. When put to him that, in substance, the claimant was performing a Field Sales role JP disagreed and proceeded to repeat what he believed to be the differences between an Oracle Direct role and a Field Sales role. When asked about the interview process and his "benchmarking" he accepted that there was no particular format he followed. He made a judgement call as a senior manager in the organisation and with that in mind he made two job offers to the claimant as he wanted him on his team. In terms of moving territories JP acknowledged that the customers in the Prime territory were developed by the claimant and were at a stage where sales could be forecast (the jargon used to refer to this scenario was a "pipeline"). It was put to him that the claimant developed his "pipeline" over time which superseded expectations and by moving territories JP effectively dismantled the claimants "pipeline" and halted his career progression. The alternatives offered to the claimant involved him starting a new "pipeline" thereby restricting his earning potential and career progression. JP stated that a "pipeline" was not guaranteed to any employee. When a territory is changed another sales person may get the benefit of the claimants "pipeline" but this happens in the organisation all the time.

The Vice President of Business Intelligence & Analytics: "Country Leader" (Ireland) - PO'R gave evidence of the appeal hearing he held in relation to the claimant's grievances raised in the letter dated the 21 July 2014. The claimant had three issues – job title, his three year plan and IC level. (This letter and the notes of the appeal hearing were also opened to the Tribunal.)

At this meeting the claimant wanted to focus on his three year plan. PO'R told the Tribunal the claimant's three year plan was an admirable thing to do but it was not something that fit into the respondents way of doing business given it worked on year to year budgets. In the circumstances it was not something the claimant could rely upon. On the 12 August 2014 PO'R wrote to the claimant detailing his conclusions of the appeal of the grievance which said appeal was not upheld. PO'R said he was surprised and disappointed the claimant had resigned as the team had hoped the claimant would have taken up one of the offers and progressed in his career with the respondent.

In cross examination PO'R stated he felt the respondent had acted fairly and reasonably in dealing with the claimant and his issues and tried to accommodate him with an alternative position as they had not wanted to lose him.

Determination:

The Tribunal carefully considered the evidence given in this claim. Constructive dismissal is defined in Section 1 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 as:

(b) the termination by the employee of his contract of employment with his employer, whether prior notice of the termination was or was not given to the employer, in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been entitled, or it was or would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment without giving prior notice of the termination to the employer".

The burden of proof rests on the claimant to show that he had no choice but to leave his position with the respondent. He must show the Tribunal that his resignation was not voluntary and that the conduct of his employer was so unreasonable that he had no choice but to resign. In this case it was also argued that the respondent was in breach of contract by not exercising discretion in the implementation of the claimant's terms and conditions when changing territory and incorporating the claimant's Prime role into the Field Sales area. It is incumbent on any employee to utilise and exhaust all internal remedies made available to him or her unless he can show that the said remedies are unfair. Unfortunately, the Tribunal feels that the claimant did not discharge the burden of proof in this case.

The claimant was in a somewhat unique position in that he fell between two stools in the organisation. He had a Prime Oracle Direct role that strayed into the Field Sales area. He was good at his job and developed the role in this way when the economy was at a low point. Initially the claimant appeared to be in a somewhat autonomous position in that from about 2008 onwards he was left to his own devices and performed exceptionally well in his sales role which resulted in high commission earnings. Maybe it was for this reason the respondent reviewed his position but one way or another in early 2014 the claimant's commission structure was going to change. At this juncture the respondent chose to change the claimant's territory in order to capitalise on potential revenue and incorporate the relevant customers wholly into the Field Sales domain. The Tribunal accept the evidence of JP that the changes in territory happen regularly and are done to meet the needs of the business. The Tribunal believe that this change was done in accordance with the terms of the claimant's contract and was carried out in a fair and reasonable manner.

In August 2012 the claimant had, of his own volition, developed a three year plan to create increased sales (and increased commission) that would benefit both him and his employer and the evidence of the claimant suggests that the change in territory stymied this plan. The new roles proposed to him would not offer him the opportunity to implement this notional plan therefore for this and the reasons outlined in his evidence, he refused all offers put to him. He decided that his Prime role was made redundant however the Tribunal do not accept this. We accept that there was change in territory rather than a redundancy situation. Even if there was a redundancy situation we believe that suitable alternative employment was offered to the claimant. When no redundancy payment was forthcoming the claimant proposed a salary package that seems far in excess of what he was previously on. It is not simply that he wanted an IC4 role, he wanted it on the terms he proposed and not otherwise. When this was not forthcoming he resigned. The Tribunal does not believe that this amounts to a constrictive dismissal. In all of the circumstances the claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to 2007, fails.

Chairman: Ms. K. T. O'Mahony B.L.

Members: Mr. M. Forde
Mr. K. O'Connor

heard these claims at Tralee on 4 March, 16&17June, 13-15 September 2005 and 17-19 January 2006

Representation:

Claimant: Mr. Donal Tobin, SIPTU, Park Road,
Killarney, Co. Kerry

Respondent: Mr. Henry Downing B.L. instructed by Mr. Seamus Given, Arthur Cox, Earlsfort Centre, Earlsfort Terrace, Dublin 2

The determination of the Tribunal was as follows:

The respondent employed the claimant from 1997 as a night porter; the employment was uneventful until the incidents, involving three different people, in 2003 that led to his suspension and ultimate dismissal. The first incident occurred late at night or in the early hours of the morning on 20 May 2003 and involved a guest (GP) who was also a performer in the respondent's hotel. GP became frustrated at the difficulty he had in obtaining service in the resident's bar. The respondent's position was that when GP was served he felt that he was subjected to excessive scrutiny as to his being a guest in the hotel. Later on that morning when another individual in his group commenced a singsong with a guitar in the lobby, the claimant aggressively ordered them to stop, as residents were asleep overhead, and picked on GP accusing him of being a "troublemaker", an "upstart" and having "hassled his colleagues in the bar". GP felt aggrieved because he was not the person who was playing the music. Whilst there was a heated exchange and he left to stay in another hotel that night GP decided against making a complaint to the general manager (GM) of the respondent. However, the claimant and his colleague in the bar (NPS) made a written complaint to GM about the conduct of GP. At a subsequent event in the hotel in early September 2003 when GP met and spoke to the claimant in a friendly manner, he was subjected to an unprovoked barrage of abuse and foul language from the claimant. As a result GP reported both this and the May incident to GM and at GM's request he submitted a written complaint on 1 October 2003.

The claimant's position in regard to the May 2003 incident was that it was a busy night in the bar where NPS was on duty. GP was annoyed at the length of time it took to get served. GP's room had been block-booked in a company name and NPS was trying to confirm that he was a resident. GP became abusive in the bar and later that night he went to the writing room in the lobby with a group of his friends, one of whom proceeded to play a guitar. The claimant asked the group in a polite manner to stop as guests were sleeping overhead. GP remonstrated with him and the group left the hotel. The claimant had received directions from management regarding the noise level at night and no music was allowed in the lobby. NPS and the claimant made a written complaint to GM about GP's behaviour. Whilst the Industrial Relations manager (IR) told NPS and the claimant that an apology would be forthcoming from the company GP had been working for on the night in question; however, no such apology materialised.

The claimant's position in regard to the September 2003 incident was that he went to the conference centre where a performance involving GP was finishing. When GP saw the claimant he made a derogatory comment. The claimant replied that, "I'm not going through what I went through last time" and walked away. The confrontation lasted about one or two minutes. The claimant did not lodge a complaint to anyone and denied that he was abusive on the night.

The second incident concerned a letter of complaint the respondent received from a doctor (DR) about the attitude of two night porters on the morning of 2 October 2003, one of whom was the claimant. She complained about her secretary receiving a belligerent call from the claimant demanding an explanation why a guest at the hotel was not receiving a house call and why the patient had to attend the clinic. She explained that the decision was a clinical one, confidential to the patient, who had been perfectly pleasant and did not complain.

The claimant's position to this event was that on the morning of 2 October 2003, he telephoned DR because an elderly guest was ill and the doctor would not come to the hotel. He spoke to the DR's secretary and told her that it was ridiculous that DR would not make a house call. The guest's wife was annoyed at the service and the elderly guest was still in the lobby when the claimant finished duty over an hour later. His colleague on duty that night (NPM) wrote a report of the incident in the night porter's logbook. Nobody from management approached the couple or the claimant after that night. His main concern was to get the guest to the surgery. He denied being belligerent in his call to DR's secretary. He telephoned DR to enquire why the doctor was not coming. There was no reason at all for DR to send a letter of complaint. The claimant had no recollection of why his entry for that morning in the night porter's logbook was whited out. He assumed it was because NPM had already made an entry.

The third incident occurred on the night of 16 July 2003, before the DR incident, but did not become known to senior management of the respondent until a conversation between the claimant, Garda T and NPS in the hotel lobby at around 2.30am on 1 October 2003. The respondent's position is that the claimant told NPS and Garda T about how he had asked a guest with a Mercedes (MG), who had parked at the steps of the hotel, to move his car. MG threw the keys to the claimant and told him to move it himself. When the claimant relayed this incident to his colleague (NPM) who was on duty in the residents' bar, NPM said, "I'll take care of him"/"I'll fix him". The claimant told them that NPM trebled MG's drinks on three occasions. The claimant then phoned the gardai and MG was subsequently arrested for drink driving. NPO had not mentioned drugs in the conversation in the lobby.

NPS reported this conversation to management and ultimately it was brought to the attention of GM who decided to investigate it. GM established from the CCTV that a conversation between the three individuals did take place in the lobby on the morning in question. On 3 October 2003, GM and the Divisional Accountant (DA) met with the station sergeant and relayed the information to him. He identified Garda T from the CCTV as the garda who was present on the occasion in question. The sergeant got a frank and detailed account of the conversation from Garda T and subsequently got his account in writing. From garda records the sergeant established that Garda M was the arresting officer and established the particulars of the arrest from him. On the Garda Superintendent's instructions, a full garda investigation file was prepared and it, along with a covering report, were submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP). A decision was made not to prosecute MG. The only entry in the Night Porter's Book for 16/17 July is a short reference to security and a statement saying, "Nothing else to report". There was no reference in it to any incident. Nor was there a vague reference to it, as is the practice, in the Duty Pass-Over Book.

Garda T confirmed the contents of the conversation in the lobby in his evidence to the Tribunal. Garda F (the station orderly on duty on the night of 16 July 2003) received the first phone call from the claimant regarding MG who was drinking and intending to drive. She radioed the patrol car with this information. She emphasised to the Tribunal that there was no mention of drugs in that phone call, as if there had been, she would have involved plain-clothes officers and she would not have used the radio.

Garda M confirmed receiving the call from Garda F at around 2.30am that MG was drunk and was about to drive from the hotel. As it was race night and busy, the patrol car was unable to respond immediately. When Garda M was at the station at 4.00am, he received a phone call from the claimant again informing him that MG was drunk and about to leave and this time the claimant furnished the registration number of MG's car. In this call, the claimant also informed him that MG was passing "e-tabs" in the bar. Garda M subsequently arrested MG outside the hotel for drink driving. MG was courteous and co-operative. In the course of a routine search of MG in the garda station, Garda M found no controlled substances in his possession.

The sergeant reverted to GM and informed him that Garda T's account confirmed the details of the conversation as reported to him by NPS. GM was very upset about the events and extremely worried about the potential implications for the hotel's license and reputation. NPS, who was reluctant to get involved in the respondent's investigation, confirmed the details of the conversation in the lobby to GM and DA.

He would not provide them with a written statement but would give evidence at a hearing. Unknown to management the rumour that NPO and the claimant had got a fellow from Limerick "bagged" had been circulating around the hotel since July. NPO himself had also told this to NPS in July.

Although concerned about how MG would respond to the alleged events that occurred in July, GM and DA met him on 6 November 2003. MG's recounting of the events of 16/17 July 2003 confirmed the details already known to them (with slight variation on the times and the manner in which he gave his keys to NPO). He further told them he had a few drinks in the bar and paid for them by cash. Knowing that he was unfit to drive MG asked the claimant for a room but NPO had told him that there were no rooms available either in the respondent's hotel or in the two other hotels he had telephoned at MG's request. A friend offered him a spare bed in his room but as he was walking towards it NPO insisted that he move his car from the front of the hotel. When he moved his car he was arrested. MG submitted a written statement to GM for the investigation. MG confirmed these facts to the Tribunal and according to his evidence he was served twice and another guest (AG) had also bought him a drink. For one of the rounds MG handed the claimant a €50.00 note and told him keep the change. The respondent's evidence to the Tribunal was that after normal closing hours cash is not accepted in the resident's bar and drinks are charged to guests' rooms. No cash was returned to the respondent for that night/morning and there were fourteen rooms vacant in the hotel that night.

The Conference and Banqueting Manager was in the bar between approximately 1.45am and 3.30/3.45am on 17 July 2003, roughly the same time that MG was there. She spoke to both the claimant and NPM at the desk on her way in. In the bar she sat at the counter with her friends and the duty manager joined them for some of the time. The claimant served her a round of drinks and charged them to the manager's account. She did not notice MG nor was he brought to her attention. GM asked her about the night but he did not ask her to write a report about it. AG, whose evidence played no part in the dismissal, was a guest in the hotel and in the bar at the relevant time. MG, who was a stranger to him and had been going from group to group in the bar, joined his table and they tolerated him. He insisted on buying them a round of drinks and AG, most likely also included him in a round. Whilst AG saw him order the drinks at the bar; he did not see how he paid for them. Some time later MG became a pest. He produced a Viagra tablet, which caused offence to the females in the group, and the group asked him to leave. AG informed NPM about the Viagra incident and NPM escorted MG from the bar. Whilst AG was the spokesman for the group, all at the table complained to the claimant when he came over to them. They did not mention e-tablets to the claimant. Nor did they say to him that MG "was passing drugs". No female left their table to complain.

The claimant's position was that MG parked his Mercedes at approximately 1.20am on 17 July 2003 at the front of the hotel in the bus bay. The claimant asked MG to move his car and MG replied that he was not a guest but he was just going in to pick up friends. MG said he would only be five minutes "and if you don't believe me, here are my keys". MG went into the bar and a few minutes later NPM, who was on duty in the resident's bar, phoned the claimant at the front desk berating him for allowing a non-resident into the bar where he had tried to get a drink but had been refused by NPM. The claimant told NPM that MG had said he would only be there for a short time. About ten minutes later the claimant went into the bar and asked MG to leave. MG was in company so the claimant "left him be". Sometime later he got a call from NPM to say that he was sending out a woman who was complaining that MG was offering drugs/tablets to her husband in the bar. She was upset when telling the claimant and he telephoned the gardai who said they would attend as soon as possible. It was a busy night. The claimant had used his own mobile phone, as there were problems with the handsets and walkie-talkies provided by the hotel.

The claimant felt that it would be inappropriate to escort/remove MG from the hotel as it might be deemed assault; it was a job for the gardai. The claimant telephoned Garda M again around 3.00am and explained about MG offering drugs/tablets in the bar. Garda M said, "Leave it with us, we'll be up". He had mentioned the drugs in the first phone call as well. It was his reason for calling the gardai.

MG came out to the claimant and asked for a room. The claimant thought he was intoxicated and told him he had no rooms available. MG asked the claimant to phone other hotels but the claimant didn't do so, even though he gave MG the impression that he had. He told the Tribunal he did not want to "inflict" MG on anyone. MG asked the claimant for his car keys back. The claimant told him to take a seat on the couch where he could keep an eye on him and if he fell asleep there would be "no bother", but MG refused, asked for his keys again and threatened him so the claimant gave him his keys. MG walked towards the bar and the claimant saw the squad car outside at this stage.

The claimant went out to speak to the driver (Sergeant F) and told him that he had telephoned twice about MG who had tablets/drugs in the bar. Sergeant F said, "Leave it with us". MG passed him on the steps as he went back into the hotel. MG got into his car and drove off. He never spoke to the gardai after that. He denied assisting in getting MG arrested. About forty or fifty minutes after this, he met with NPM. He didn't think that they discussed MG's drinks but he might have told NPM about the garda call and MG being arrested. His big fear at all times was about the drugs. He had telephoned the gardai on previous occasions when problems had occurred.

The claimant was called to a meeting with GM and DA on 21 October 2003. At this meeting the claimant and his shop steward were informed about the complaints from DR and GP and were given copies of both letters of complaint. The claimant was suspended with full pay, in accordance with the agreed disciplinary procedure, pending further investigation of the complaints. Despite the fact that rumours of MG'sarrest for drink driving had been circulating around the hotel since July 2003 and while NPS had told management about the rumour of the claimant's and NPM's involvement in it, he was unwilling to put it in writing. Furthermore, Garda T's statement was in the garda file, which they were awaiting. GM therefore felt unable toraise the allegation of the drink driving arrest with the claimant at the meeting on 21October 2003.

The claimant and his union official (TU) attended a disciplinary meeting on 28 October 2003. He was provided with an opportunity to answer the complaints given to him at the previous meeting. A further complaint about the arrest of MG in July was raised at this meeting. The claimant was asked if he knew anything about this incident and if he had anything to do with it. The claimant admitted to telephoning the gardai from his own mobile phone, as a colleague NPM had informed him that a lady in the bar had made a complaint about something being passed. GM informed him that a garda investigation was ongoing and that the gardai may want to speak to him at a future date about making a false report, wasting garda time and the perversion of the course of justice and that the matter may have serious implications for the hotel. The claimant's shop steward understood this to be by way of advice but felt that it had some effect on the claimant. A further meeting was arranged for a week later.

At a meeting on 5 November 2003 the specific allegations in Garda T's report were disclosed to the claimant. He denied making the comments. TU sought the name of the garda and the NPS to whom the allegations in relation to the drink-driving incident had been made. He was informed of the time and date when the conversation with the garda had taken place, and told if he wanted this name, he needed to contact the garda station directly. The sergeant had advised GM not to release the name of the garda until the file was returned from the DPP but had agreed to disclose this name to TU. The identity and statement of the Garda would be available once the file was back from DPP. Further discussions were then held regarding the other incidents. The transcript from DR was to be available at a later date. The claimant was told that GP was willing to attend a meeting with the claimant to confirm the details in his letter of complaint, which was given to the claimant on 21 October 2003.

Thereafter there followed a course of correspondence between the parties in which GM arranged a further meeting for 14 November 2003. In these GM offered to have DR, GP, MG, a representative of the Garda Síochána and NPS present at the meeting and forwarded a list of the hotel guests who charged drinks to their room on the morning of 17 July 2003, the one transcript available of the conversations with DR/her secretary (for technical reasons the others were not available), the specific details of the conversation in the lobby (as per Garda T's report), as well as MG's statement and he put the claimant on notice that he would be raising questions, arising from MG's statement: MG's paying cash for drinks and his being told that rooms were not available in the hotel on the night. All of those mentioned had agreed to attend the meeting. Although TU on behalf of the claimant had sought the names of some of these, in his letter, which crossed with one of GM's, he did not avail of the offer to have them at the meeting and accordingly GM, with notice to TU, stood the witnesses down. In his latter letter to the claimant GM commented:

> "As I have spoken to each of the persons listed, conveyed to (the claimant) their comments and furnished all available documentation, I do not believe that it is necessary to call any of them now that (the claimant) has decided not to exercise his right".

On 14 November 2003, in what turned out to be the final disciplinary meeting, the CCTV stills, names of the Garda T and NPS were furnished to the claimant and TU. TU denied the allegations on behalf of the claimant. GM noted that the claimant had declined to meet with any of the persons who made complaints against him. TU, on behalf of the claimant, denied the statement made to Garda T and denied that the claimant was guilty of the charges alleged against him. The claimant when asked if he had anything to say, replied, "No comment".

GM did not believe the claimant's denials and felt that he had acted inappropriately in relation to DR, that he had used grossly offensive language to GP and that he had wrongfully colluded with another member of staff in procuring the arrest of a guest as described to Garda T and NPS on 1 October 2003. GM regarded the claimant's behaviour as a serious breach of trust and confidence and it sundered the relationship between employer and employee, in particular considering the senior position of trust the claimant held in the hotel. He felt that this amounted to gross misconduct and as a result the claimant was dismissed.

The claimant's response to the allegations put to him during the disciplinary process was that he did have a conversation on 1 October 2003 in the hotel lobby with NPS and Garda T. They were discussing sport and other general things and the subject of an arrest for drink driving came up in the conversation. He couldn't remember who initiated the subject, but all he said was that the customer "must have been drinking doubles or trebles in the bar because he was fairly drunk when he came out". It was an off-the-cuff remark and just a joke.

The claimant felt that he was suspended on 21 October 2003 without being afforded the opportunity to explain. He was not told under which disciplinary procedure the issue was being dealt with. During the meeting on 28 October 2003, GM had made a reference to Section 12 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1976, where allegations of making a "false report", "wasting police time" and "perverting the course of justice" were thrown at him. He felt shook, very afraid and said he was, "only a mere layman". After this meeting he took legal advice and was advised not to say anything that could implicate himself under this Act but to attend meetings and co-operate as far as he could. He was advised to say nothing that may implicate him in a criminal justice matter.

The claimant was under the impression that Garda T was the complainant and formed that opinion during the meetings, but he could not remember why. He denied the three allegations in relation to making a "false report", "wasting police time" and "perverting the course of justice". No Garda had ever called to his door. He felt he was entitled to know who made accusations against him under the Act. It was a very serious offence he was being accused of. He never made a false report.

Determination:

The Tribunal wishes to state that the claimant accepted, during the hearing before it, that the allegation that MG was involved in the passing of drugs whilst on the respondent's premises was wholly unfounded. The gardai confirmed this.

The fact that there were two parallel investigations arising from the same allegation, a criminal investigation by the gardai into the safety of a prosecution and an investigation by the respondent for the purposes of the disciplinary process, created some difficulties for the respondent.

The claimant and NPM were both dismissed for their alleged involvement in procuring the arrest of MG for drunken driving. On application to the Tribunal by their union representative (TU), both cases were heard separately.

In cases of gross misconduct the function of the Tribunal is not to determine the innocence or guilt of the person accused of wrongdoing. The test for the Tribunal in such cases is whether the respondent had a genuine belief based on reasonable grounds arising from a fair investigation that the employee was guilty of the alleged wrongdoing.

The allegation that the claimant had colluded with NPM to procure the arrest of MG arose from a statement made by the claimant himself during the course of a conversation with NPS and Garda T in the respondent's hotel lobby on the morning of 1 October 2003. NPS's and Garda T's account of the conversation were almost verbatim. This was confirmed to the respondent by the station sergeant. In the course of the investigation the claimant denied having made such a statement and contended that he had phoned the gardai on the night as NPM said a lady had complained about tablets or drugs being passed by MG.

The Tribunal finds, by majority, that it was reasonable for the employer to believe the contents of the conversation as related by the claimant to Garda T and NPS in the lobby on the morning of 1 October 2003. This finding is supported by the following facts. Neither night porter recorded in the Night Porter's Log an event, so serious that it merited calling the Gardai on two occasions. Neither of them reported it to either the Duty Manager or to the Conference and Banqueting Manager although both were in the bar at the relevant time and instead they decided to telephone the gardai. The evidence shows that the claimant must have known that the Conference & Banqueting Manager was in the bar. Nor did they contact GM whose home and mobile phone numbers were available to them. NPO's refusal to give MG a room or to seek one for him, as requested by him, as well as the claimant's denial that he served MG drinks in the face of evidence to the contrary from MG also go to the reasonableness of the respondent's conclusion.

Furthermore, the testimony of both Garda F and Garda M, given before the Tribunal, is strong corroborative evidence for the version of the incident as relayed by NPO in the lobby on 1 October 2003. It seems to the majority that the respondent was not aware of their evidence as to why the gardai had been called, at the time of the decision to dismiss. Similarly, the evidence of AG strongly corroborates that version as well as the fact that there was no problem about drugs in the bar on 1 October 2003. AG's evidence also corroborates MG's evidence that he bought drink in the bar on the morning of 17 July 2003.

At the meeting of 21 October 2003 the claimant was suspended on pay on the basis of the two complaints involving GP and DR. He was not informed of the MG complaint at that stage as NPS was unwilling to give a written statement and the respondent did not have the Garda statement. This was in the file, which was being submitted to DPP. While it would be best practice to have informed the claimant at this stage that he was being suspended for gross misconduct, this suspension was provided for in the agreed disciplinary procedure. The claimant was represented by his shop steward and according to the disciplinary procedure, suspension with pay only occurs in cases of gross misconduct.

The majority is satisfied that the respondent carried out a fair investigation into the allegations. Whilst the identity of both NPS and Garda T was only disclosed to the claimant at the final disciplinary meeting the full contents of the conversation/allegation as related by the claimant on 1 October 2003 were disclosed and put to the claimant as early as 5 November 2003. Furthermore the date and time of that conversation were also revealed to him as well as affording his representative the opportunity to meet the sergeant. The claimant declined the respondent's offer to have the various witnesses attend at the meeting on 14 November 2003. The majority is satisfied that the claimant was afforded a fair opportunity to deal with the allegations. The majority does not accept that the mention by GM, at the meeting of 28 October 2003, of possible Garda questioning into making a false report, wasting Garda time and the perversion of the course of justice adversely affected the claimant's participation in the process or rendered the process unfair. This point was never raised throughout the disciplinary process and was first introduced at the Tribunal hearing.

In determining the reasonableness of the respondent's decision to dismiss the claimant the Tribunal has not taken into account the DR incident as DR did not give evidence to the Tribunal. The Tribunal was given conflicting versions of both encounters between the claimant and GP. Following the first encounter there was a complaint to GM from both the claimant and NPS, GP decided against making any complaint as he felt that there was fault on both sides. However, following the second encounter, which occurred in a public place immediately following his performance, GP was so outraged at the unprovoked barrage of obscenities that he sought out GM to make a complaint. Having considered these facts and the whole of the evidence of the incident the majority, on the balance of probability, prefers the evidence of GP in this regard.

For these reasons and having considered all the evidence the Tribunal, by majority, is satisfied that it was reasonable for the respondent to believe that the claimant's behaviour constituted gross misconduct, sundering the relationship of trust and confidence between the employer and the employee. In the circumstances the dismissal was fair and reasonable. It follows that the claim under Unfair DismissalsActs, 1977 to 2001 fails. This being a dismissal for gross misconduct the claim underthe Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts, 1973 to 2001 also fails.

Richard J Bunyan v United Dominions Trust (Ireland) Ltd: Employment Appeals Tribunal (Mr Donal Hamilton, Chairman, Mr George Keenan and Mr Arthur Rice) 1980 No. UD 66.

Unfair dismissal - Gradual deterioration of working relationship - Termination of employment - Whether compliance with requirements of natural justice - Relevance of fair procedures - Assessment of compensation - Contribution by claimant - Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977 (No. 10) s. 7.

Facts The claimant commenced employment as marketing manager with the respondent in 1973 and reported directly to the managing director. After re-organisation in 1976 other managers reported to the claimant. In September 1978 the managing director held an appraisal interview with the claimant and the claimant took issue with him for, inter alia, giving him a 'standard performance' rating and for instructing him to dismiss other managers. From this time on the working relationship between the claimant and the managing director and other managers deteriorated. In June 1979, the claimant received a warning notice which notice threatened dismissal on the grounds that the claimant was undermining the authority of the managing director. After some negotiation it was agreed between the claimant's union and the respondents to refer this 'warning' dispute to a Rights Commissioner. On 6 November 1979, the managing director was told of a conversation which the claimant had with a junior staff employee which conversation, if true, may have undermined the authority of the general manager. The managing director requested reports from other managers and called a board meeting for 10 November 1979, at which meeting the claimant was dismissed. The claimant was not notified of this meeting nor was he notified of the said conversation or reports. The claimant alleges that this dismissal was unfair.

Held The dismissal of the claimant being made on foot of new information conflicted with the requirements of natural justice which requirements require that the person should know the nature of the accusation against him, that he should be given an opportunity to state his case, and that the domestic tribunal (the board of directors) should act in good faith. On the evidence, if these requirements had been complied with the decision to dismiss the claimant may not have been taken. Accordingly, the denial of natural justice was fundamental and renders the dismissal unfair. Compensation is the appropriate remedy.

Glover v BLN Ltd [1973] IR 388
NC Watling & Co Ltd v Richardson [1978] ICR 1049

The determination of the Tribunal (Mr Rice dissenting) was as follows: The claimant commenced employment as marketing manager with the respondent in 1973. He reported directly to Mr Bernon, general manager as did other managers including Mr McGovern and Mr Callan. (In this determination Mr Bernon is referred to variously as the chief executive and as managing director.)

In 1976, following reorganisation of the reporting structure, the claimant continued to report to Mr Bernon. However, Mr McGovern, Mr Callan and Mr Mooney reported to the claimant. The claimant became the general manager, marketing, and in this area or division he was the executive responsible.

There were other areas or divisions in the respondent company, Mr Church being in charge of banking; Mr Hickey was the chief accountant.

The respondent's affairs prospered and in April, 1978, the claimant wrote to Mr Bernon indicating a view that he should be appointed to the board of the respondent. (This suggestion was made simultaneuosly by Messrs Church and Hickey and the claimant). The tribunal is satisfied that at this time the claimant's work and contribution to the respondent was valued and that the personal relationships between him and the other executives were normal in a business context, i.e. they had no difficulties in working as a unit.

This satisfactory working relationship did not continue and appeared to deteriorate as between the claimant and Mr Bernon from September, 1978 and later as between the claimant and Messrs McGovern and Callan. Evidence was heard from many witnesses over several days and circa 144 documents or groups of documents were exhibited in evidence. We do not, therefore, intend or attempt to set out in whole or summary, the cases presented on behalf of the respondent or of the claimant. It is necessary, however, to refer to some aspects of the evidence, or the tribunal's conclusions in the light of evidence, in order to understand the determination herein.

On 8 September 1978, the claimant had an appraisal interview with Mr Bernon, his superior — an annual requirement. The tribunal heard evidence from Mr Bernon and the claimant concerning this interview. The claimant wrote a detailed memorandum on this interview on 9 September 1978 and same was furnished to the tribunal.

During the meeting of 8 September 1978, the claimant according to the evidence and as appeared from his memorandum of 9 September 1978, took issue with and blamed Mr Bernon for:

(i) Giving or intending to give the claimant a 'standard performance' rating;
(ii) not supporting the claimant, Mr Church and Mr Hickey in their application to be made directors of the respondent;
(iii) wishing to dismiss Messrs McGovern, Callan and Mooney and instructing the claimant to 'sack' them;
(iv) treating field personnel as second class citizens.

From the evidence it is not clear to the tribunal that the claimant was instructed to dismiss the executives, though we feel that there was mention by Mr Bernon of moving some executives. As an alternative to board membership the aspirants were appointed to a newly created management board. From this time, September, 1978, the claimant felt he had to keep notes and be extra careful and this, no doubt, affected his behaviour so that due to an increase in the volume of memoranda emanating from him and his strict procedural approach at meetings others considered him to be somewhat mechanistic and legalistic.

On 18 September 1978, the claimant wrote a memorandum to Mr Bernon with copies to Mr Sandys, chairman of the board of directors, and Mr Bacon, alleging the 'sacking' instructions and his (the claimant's) objections to same and advising that he had joined a trade union (ASTMS).

The 'sacking' allegation was leaked to the executives, Mr McGovern, Mr Callan and Mr Mooney and at a meeting attended by Mr Sandys, Mr Bernon and the claimant they were assured that there was no intention to dismiss them and no instructions had been given to anybody to dismiss them. The claimant did not contradict this assurance. We can conclude, from the evidence, that the claimant told Mr McGovern of the 'sacking instruction' and ought not to have done so before exhausting all reasonable efforts to have the instruction, if given, withdrawn, or any misunderstanding clarified. The claimant acted imprudently in undermining the confidence of his subordinates in Mr Bernon before all avenues of clarification were exhausted. The trust and confidence of subordinates is a valuable asset but an extremely vulnerable one. It would not be in conflict with principle or integrity to verify or otherwise confirm such an important and fundamental instruction before telling any concerned subordinate of it. It is concluded from the evidence that this 'incident' more than anything else upset the senior executives, Mr McGovern, Mr Callan and Mr Mooney and undermined their confidence and caused them confusion which the assurances of Mr Sandys and Mr Bernon, in the presence of the claimant, did not overcome. The situation caused them to be suspicious, firstly of Mr Bernon and then of the claimant. The isolation of the claimant within the workplace was thus increased.

On, or about, 1 June 1979, the management board was disbanded. The claimant received a written warning dated 8 June, 1979. The warning was issued because the claimant was allegedly (a) unduly legalistic and mechanistic (b) failing to fulfill Mr Bernon's instructions to hold regular meetings. The letter warned that:

> 'unless you discontinue this behaviour, which challenges and undermines the authority of your managing director, the company will have no option but to terminate your employment.'

The claimant's union decided to refer 'this matter' to a Rights Commissioner and a Rights Commissioner was requested to deal with the case.

Following representations by the claimant and his union the warning was withdrawn but following a discussion with the claimant that same day, it was restored and the union was notified. The original warning of 8/6/1979 was withdrawn because the respondent accepted the view of the claimant and his union that the claimant had not been given the opportunity of knowing the allegations and so of making a defence in respect of same.

The union referred the matter of the reinstated warning to a second Rights Commissioner and the respondent agreed to the dispute being heard by such Rights Commissioner.

The union later sought the original Rights Commissioner and the respondent objected in principle on the grounds that the claimant could not be so selective in nominating a Rights Commissioner. This matter was in the control of Mr Hayes-McCoy, the respondent's personnel manager and following a board meeting he wrote to ASTMS on 26 October 1979, setting out the history of the reference of the dispute to the Rights Commissioners and we refer to his letter and quote portion of same as follows:

> (The company) hold the view that a Rights Commissioner's hearing is the most appropriate channel for resolving this dispute and would ask your Union to allow this case to be heard by another Rights Commissioner.
> The company believes this matter should be disposed of at a very early date and, therefore, does not consider it appropriate to have it referred to the Labour Court.
>
> The company proposes to hold a further interview with Mr Bunyan with a view to attempting to reconcile the differences between it and him, once and for all.
> If a solution is not achieved by this interview, the company will have no alternative but to determine that the problems raised by Mr Bunyan's persistent attitude must be resolved in another way in pursuance of the company's interests.

On November 5 ASTMS agreed to the third Rights Commissioner dealing with the dispute. It was agreed, therefore, that the 'warning' dispute be dealt with at a Rights Commissioner's hearing before an agreed commissioner.

There is no doubt but that the members of the board were aware, generally, since September 1978 of the differences which existed between the claimant and Mr Bernon and that the situation was a cause for serious and continuing concern. The board left it to Mr Sandys to reconcile the differences between the two senior executives and though he tried to do so, he failed, probably because he did not realise the depth of the breach between the claimant and the managing director. The claimant felt that he could not trust Mr Bernon and felt threatened by him. (He felt that Mr Bernon had wrongly denied the 'sacking' instruction and he was clearly dissatisfied with the 'assessment' interview).

The matter of the dispute which had been referred to the Rights Commissioners, was raised regularly at board meetings and the relevant extract from the minutes of the board meeting of 26/10/1979 is as follows:

> It was reported that Mr R. J. Bunyan had stipulated that he was only willing to go before a specific Rights Commissioner and that in the absence of this request being granted he would withdraw his application to go before the Rights Commissioners and opt to go before the Labour Court. It was agreed that Mr Bunyan's request to go before a specific Rights Commissioner was unacceptable and it was inappropriate to have the matter referred to the Labour Court because of the inevitable delay which would occur. It was agreed that the matter should now be brought to a head in the near furure, and that the union be written to proposing that a further interview with Mr Bunyan be held.

The letter of 26/10/1979, already referred to, from Mr Hayes-McCoy to ASTMS, clearly was written in the light of the view of the board of directors.

At this time, the claimant was elected a member of the union house committee and this gave rise to concern as in a negotiation situation, the respondent's negotiator viz. the personnel manager, Mr Hayes-McCoy, would have a lesser status in the respondent company than the claimant. Mr Hayes-McCoy shared this problem with Mr Russell Thomas, personnel manager of UDT Ltd. and obtained his written advice which, in our view, was sensible and likely to remove that matter as a source af continuing friction.

At the end of October/early November, 1979, therefore:

> (i) the board had expressed its up to date view of the need to resolve the matter and suggested a course of action which the personnel manager was in the process of implementing;
> (ii) the selection of a Rights Commissioner to adjudicate on the 'warning' dispute was agreed and;
> (iii) Mr Russell Thomas had suggested a course likely to overcome expected problems of a practical nature arising out of the claimant's membership of the union house committee.

Maybe the hearing by the Rights Commissioner would have opened up the problem and allowed the claimant and Mr Bernon to think again on that conversation of 8 September 1978 and particularly the 'sacking' aspect — perhaps the claimant would have noted that from his own memorandum of 9 September 1978 it appears that it was he who raised the question of getting rid of the three executives and not Mr Bernon and maybe Mr Bernon would have conceded that he had spoken of 'moving' the executives. We will never know because on 10 November 1979 the board resolved to dismiss the claimant — that meeting was called at short notice. In considering this matter we ask ourselves:

> (i) Who dismissed the claimant?
> (ii) Why was it concluded that the claimant should be dismissed?
> (iii) What information/facts supported the conclusion that the claimant be dismissed?

(i) Who dismissed the claimant?

The board at a meeting on 10/11/1979 passed a resolution terminating the claimant's employment. Mr Bernon abstained from the vote but otherwise there was unanimity amongst those present and voting. It is clear that Mr Bernon, who had at the meeting recommended the termination of the claimant's employment agreed with the decision and that he had abstained for reasons which could not reasonably be interpreted as disagreeing with the resolution. Mr Bernon was the only person present who, being entitled to vote, abstained. There was, therefore, unanimous support for the resolution.

The claimant had been appointed by the board to his original employment in 1973. The dismissal resolution is recorded in the minutes of the meeting of the board on 10/11/1979 as:

> The chairman and the managing director to meet with Mr R. J. Bunyan on Monday 12 November 1979 at 2.30 p.m. and advise him of the board's decision to terminate his employment on the expiration of the appropriate notice and that he be paid his salary during the notice period but that he will not be required to work out his notice.

The decision was communicated to the claimant on 12 November 1979.

(ii) Why was it concluded that the claimant should be dismissed?

In considering this question, we set out the minutes of the board meeting of 10/11/1979 in full.

MINUTES OF A MEETING OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF UNITED DOMINIONS TRUST (IRELAND) LTD HELD AT THE BURLINGTON HOTEL ON STAURDAY, 10 NOVEMBER 1979, AT 11.00 A.M.

PRESENT: Mr W. Sandys - In the chair, Mr D. J. Bernon - managing director, Mr G.P.S. Hogan - director, Mr R. A. French - director, Mr K. Flynn - director, Mr A. Haslam - alternate for Mr M. D. McGuane.

IN ATTENDANCE Mr R. J. Church - company secretary.

The meeting was convened at short notice and all directors present agreed to accept short notice.

Apologies were received from Mr G. F. Bacon and Mr P. V. Doyle, directors, who, despite their absence, agreed to the holding of the meeting at short notice.

STAFF

The meeting reviewed in detail the problems created by Mr R. J. Bunyan - his several interviews with the chairman, the issuing of a reprimand to him - the matters arising from his appraisal by Mr D. J. Bernon - his appeal to the Rights Commissioner and subsequent withdrawal of such appeal due apparently to his not being permitted to nominate the particular Commissioner to hear his case - and his continuing undermining of the authority of the chief executive.

Mr Bunyan had not availed of several opportunities afforded him of reconciliation and the board decided that it no longer had confidence in his suitability and disposition to serve UDT satisfactorily and that in the interest of the bank and its responsibility to its depositors and staff, Mr Bunyan's employment be terminated in accordance with the conditions contained in his letter of employment and the following resolution was passed:

It was resolved that:

'The chairman and the managing director to meet with Mr R. J. Bunyan on Monday 12 November 1979, at 2.30 p.m. and advise him of the board's decision to terminate his employment on the expiration of the appropriate notice and that he be paid his salary during the notice period but that he will not be required to work out his notice.'

PROPOSED BY: Mr R. A. French

SECONDED BY: Mr G. P. S. Hogan

The resolution was passed unanimously by all directors present with the exception of Mr D. J. Bernon who abstained from voting.

In order to minimise the effect on Mr Bunyan's career, the board agreed that he be given an opportunity to resign forthwith at the meeting referred to herein on terms which would be agreed in due course.

A number of witnesses stated in evidence why they each supported the resolution. It is not surprising that in a case such as this, they would differ somewhat but it is clear that they supported the resolution.

(a) with the general awareness of the problems stemming from the appraisal and also from the warning and

(b) because of information given at the meeting and

(c) the fact that the managing director, Mr Bernon, recommended to them that the claimant be dismissed.

The board was told that the claimant at a chance meeting in New Ross, had used an expression to a junior staff member (a union house committee member) which they felt could only be interpreted as a further attempt to undermine the authority of the chief executive.

Although Mr Hayes-McCoy was present at the meeting, according to his own evidence, (his attendance was not recorded in the minutes), the preliminary discussion does not note that the problem regarding the choice of Rights Commissioner had been resolved — We conclude from the absence of evidence that this matter was not reviewed in depth, if at all. The evidence told of the board being aware that three executives, Messrs Church, Callan and McGovern had submitted written complaints regarding the claimants' treatment/behaviour towards them. Mr Blake, on behalf of the claimant expressed surprise and emphasised that the existence of these memoranda was not recorded in the minutes.

We are of the view that the minutes reflect the relative unimportance of all matters at that time, save the report of the claimant's continuing undermining of Mr Bernon's authority, which report, in our view, was the reason why the meeting was called at short notice. It is why the executives, Messrs Church, Callan and McGovern were asked to prepare their reports/complaints. It is the reason why Mr Bernon, by recommending the claimant's dismissal, made it clear in practical terms that he was asking the board to decide between the claimant and himself.

We conclude, from the evidence, that the claimant was dismissed primarily because in the light of the history of the dispute known to the board and the boards knowing of the complaints of the three executives and their belief that at the discussion in New Ross (on 2 November 1979), the claimant had used words to a junior staff member of the respondent designed to 'continue' his undermining of the authority of the managing director and in view of this, together with the recommendation of the managing director, the longlasting dispute had assumed proportions which could not be tolerated and which, if unresolved, would seriously undermine the effective management of the respondent company.

(iii) What information/facts supported the conclusion that the claimant be dismissed which did not exist at the last meeting of the Board on 26 October 1979?

On 6 November, 1979, Mr Bernon was in his office having a meeting with Mr Church, when Mr McGovern and Mr Callan interrupted and Mr Callan told of a report he had had from Mr Bohill, a junior staff employee in the Waterford office, of a conversation, he, Mr Bohill, had with the claimant in New Ross (later established to have taken place on 2 November, 1979).

In this conversation, the claimant is reported to have said to Mr Bohill that he was not worried about the prospect of his appraisal dispute coming up for discussion at a forthcoming union committee meeting as he had 'enough in writing to hang D. J. (Mr. Bernon).'

We have no doubt but that Mr Bernon accepted the report as being a true account of the conversation and decided that it was a choice between the claimant and himself and proceeded to call the directors to a meeting on Saturday 10 November 1979 (it being the earliest date on which the Chairman, Mr Sandys would be available). He arranged for an informal meeting with some directors for Friday 9 November and asked for the reports from the executives, Messrs Church, McGovern and Callan, which he received, each dated 9/11/1979.

Mr Bernon also gave written notice to the claimant to attend a meeting at 2.30 p.m. on Monday 12 November 1979. It is clear from this message to the claimant that the managing director felt confident that the claimant would be dismissed in the light of the recent incident in New Ross coupled with the reports of the three executives. The text of the message to the claimant of 9 November, 1979 is as follows:

> In view of the serious dispute that exists between you and the company, I require you to be present at a meeting on Monday 12 November 1979 at 2.30 p.m. to bring this important matter to an immediate conclusion.
> You may, if you wish, be accompanied at this meeting by a representative of your union.

Neither the claimant nor his union was notified of the intended meeting of 10 November 1979, its purpose or the report of the 'Bohill' conversation or of the existence of the reports of Messrs Church, Callan and McGovern.

Having heard the evidence of Mr Bohill and of the claimant, concerning the conversation at New Ross on 2 November 1979, we are of the opinion that the reporting to the board of what Mr Callan told Mr Bernon, that Mr Bohill had told him (Mr Callan), that the claimant had said to him was correct but that the account by Mr Bohill of the offending portion of the conversion was not, or at least could not be relied upon to be accurate and so reasonably sustain the view that the claimant had by that conversation undermined the authority of the chief executive. If this allegation had been reasonably investigated and the claimant been given an opportunity to comment on it and challenge it, then it is possible that the board would not have considered it to be an event which would represent a 'last straw' interpretation or an event which would justify the abortion of the plan decided on at the board meeting of October 26 1979 and which was being implemented by the personnel manager, Mr Hayes-McCoy, but particularly would not justify a conclusion that the claimant, by this conversation had shown that he was 'undermining' the authority of the Chief Executive, Mr Bernon.

The 'Bohill' conversation assumed major importance and clearly became the basis of the conclusion that the claimant was continuing to undermine the authority of 'the chief executive'.

The reports/complaints of the senior executives, Messrs McGovern, Church and Callan were not apparently considered in any detail but were taken by the board to show that the claimant had ceased to have a normal working relationship with Mr Church and with the claimant's subordinates Messrs McGovern and Callan.

The tribunal, by majority, (Mr Rice dissenting), is of the opinion that had the board or its representatives had the benefit of hearing the claimant on those matters, i.e. the 'Bohill' conversation and the complaints of the three executives it might not have felt:

> (a) that the Bohill conversation as reported could be relied upon to sustain the conclusion reached viz. that it demonstrated that the claimant was deliberately undermining the authority of Mr Bernon, or,

(b) that the reports/complaints could lead to the view that senior staff members were in danger of being disaffected due to the unreasonable actions of the claimant. Analysis might have shown that in many respects the matters complained of, were the results of the claimant carrying out his duties.

The tribunal, by majority, hold the view that the dismissal of the claimant being made on foot of 'new information' conflicted with the requirements of natural justice, viz. that the person should know the nature of the accusation against him; that he should be given an opportinity to state his case; and that the domestic tribunal (the board of directors) should act in good faith.

The tribunal, by majority, having heard the evidence, which an enquiry might have heard, cannot say that had the aforementioned requirements of natural justice been complied with, the decision would have been the same, or would probably have been the same and so we are unable to say that the denial of natural justice made no difference. We are not aware, from the evidence, of any matter which dictated that the decision had to be made in such haste, that the board could not have, if it desired, deferred the decision until the allegations were investigated with notice of same to the claimant.

We have no doubt that individually the members of the board acted in good faith but we feel that collectively the board:

(1) ignored or failed to give full account to the heresay nature of Bohill's report of the claimant's remarks in New Ross;
(2) did not consider in any depth the contents of the reports/complaints of the three executives but accepted generally that they should be considered as disadvantageous to the claimant;
(3) the board was not protective of its duty and privilege to decide on action in the light of the 'new evidence,' and appears substantially to have delegated that decision to Mr Bernon by giving undue weight to the recommendation that the claimant be dismissed as against the value of the 'new evidence' grounding it. Mr Sarsfield Hogan, director, asked in a memo prior to the meeting of 10/11/1979: 'In other respects how has the situation changed since board meeting of 26 October?' He told the tribunal that in addition to the 'Bohill" conversation the situation had changed because 'Mr Bernon recommended dismissal.'
(4) The board failed to adopt the course which a reasonable employer in that situation, in that line of business would have adopted viz. to withhold a decision until the claimant had been told of the allegations and been afforded a reasonable opportunity to reply to same. Such a reasonable employer would in evaluating the recommendation of Mr Bernon, give due recognition to the fact that he was a substantive party to the dispute which had been referred to the Rights Commissioner.

Counsel for the respondent submitted, inter alia:

If there are substantial grounds for a dismissal then it is not an unfair dismissal. In the present case the applicant could have been in no doubt as to the action which the company was going to take and was in no doubt but that the company would dismiss him. It is submitted that the procedures taken by the company in leading to the dismissal were fair and reasonable. It is further submitted that in any event it is not the procedures leading to a dismissal which govern whether or not the dismissal is an unfair dismissal but the grounds upon which this dismissal is determined. The procedures leading to a dismissal are relevant only insofar as they may show that they were not, in fact, substantial grounds for the dismissal either because there was no real belief in the facts or because there was a realisation on the part of the employer that the facts did not warrant dismissal. Neither of these circumstances exists in the present case.

The tribunal recognises that it may be argued that fair procedures are necessary or of value only to demonstrate that the employer acted fairly in investigating and gathering the information upon which he made his decision. It is clear that if belief in the culpability of the employee is necessary to justify the dismissal then it is equally necessary that such belief be reasonably held. Fair procedures therefore help to lead an employer to as full possession of information as is reasonably possible and he will then proceed to a decision. If an employer after neglecting fair procedures forms a belief then the mere fact that he holds the belief and has made a decision to dismiss which, if such belief was reasonably held, would have justified dismissal, will not prevent a finding of unfairness where the tribunal considers that an employer who had observed the rules of natural justice in gathering the information would or could have come to a different conclusion and so might not have held such belief at all.

The alleged culpability of the claimant is related in the minutes of the board meeting of 10/11/1979, which referred to the claimant's '(his) continuing undermining of the authority of the chief executive.'

It may also be argued that in relation to its functions under the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, the tribunal should consider that a substantive matter should override a procedural breach of natural justice. This view has been applied by the tribunal in cases where it was satisfied that failure to comply with the rules of natural justice made no differences to the decision to dismiss. In such cases the tribunal was satisfied that no injustice was caused by such failure.

In this case, the tribunal holds the view that absence of an opportunity to the claimant to defend himself could have made a difference to the decision reached.

The procedural aspects of Natural Justice as applied by the Supreme Court in Glover v BLN Ltd [1973] IR 418 et seq. are clearly of major importance.

The tribunal endorses and applies the following view quoted from NC Watling & Co Ltd v Richardson [1978] IRLR 225 EAT (ICR 1049) ... 'the fairness or unfairness of dismissal is to be judged by the objective standard of the way in which a reasonable employer in those circumstances in that line of business, would have behaved.' The tribunal therefore does not decide the question whether or not, on the evidence before it, the employee should be dismissed. The decision to dismiss has been taken, and our function is to test such decision against what we consider the reasonable employer would have done and/or concluded.

As stated we feel that compliance with the requirements of natural justice could have resulted in the decision to dismiss the claimant not being taken. Accordingly, we find that the denial of natural justice was fundamental and renders this dismissal unfair in the spirit and context of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, and we so determine.

The tribunal considers that having regard to all the circumstances of the case that the most appropriate remedy lies in compensation.

ANNUAL REMUNERATION

Having received representations from the parties, we measure the claimant's gross annual remuneration as follows:

1.	Salary	£15,826.00
2.	Annual Bonus	£500.00
3.	Respondents annual contribution to Pension Scheme in relation to the claimant	£3,000.00
4.	Annual value to claimant of private use of car provided by respondent	£2,000.00
5.	Value of lunches and subscription measured at	£200.00
6.	Employees PRSI and state pension contribution — 8.25% of upper limit of £8,500.00	£701.00
	TOTAL ANNUAL REMUNERATION	£22,227.00

We disallowed, wholly, the claimant's claim that he was entitled to have considered as part of his remuneration:
(a) House Mortgage subsidy and
(b) personal Loans subsidy.

The claimant enjoyed a rate of interest on borrowings less than that which was generally available, this being the normal practice in the respondent company and, we understand, in banking institutions generally. He undoubtedly received preferred rates and so gained a benefit because he had borrowings. If he had no borrowings he would have had no such benefit. It is a discretionery matter for the respondent as to whether any loan would be made to the claimant. It is therefore the exercise of the discretion in his favour which combines with normal practice to give him the benefit of the reduced interest rate, not the mere fact of his employment. The benefit is not a reward for his services but is a consequence of the exercise of a discretion in his favour.

The claimant is an employee since June 1981 of a limited company, of which he is a shareholder, at an annual salary of £10,000. We measure a loss differential per annum of £8,000 and assume that such differential will be maintained into the immediate future.

We consider, on the evidence, that the claimant took all reasonable steps to mitigate his loss, save that he failed to apply for unemployment benefit for two months. We consider, having regard to the evidence, that the claimant's decision to start his own business and to devote his time to the advancement of this aim, should not be considered as a failure to mitigate his loss even though this course did not occupy all his time. Neither do we consider that the salary, which he enjoys from his new employer, is so low as to constitute failure to mitigate loss.

In measuring loss, the tribunal is conscious of the fact that the claimant enjoyed the use of the respondent's car for a considerable period after his dismissal.

LOSS — PENSION

The claimant enjoyed the benefit of a non-contributory pension scheme with the respondent. The claimant does not have a similar benefit in his present employment. Having regard to the claimant's age and the evidence and submissions in relation to his pension loss, generally, and doing the best we can, we assess the claimant's loss in relation to his pension at £44,800.00. This figure has been measured after applying a reducing factor to provide for the likelihood of the claimant leaving the employment pension scheme in non-benefit circumstances and also as a discount for immediate payment.

TOTAL ACTUAL LOSS			£104,518.00

CONTRIBUTION BY CLAIMANT TO HIS LOSS UNDER S. 7 (2)(b)

The tribunal sees substantial contribution by the claimant to the loss sustained by him which by majority we measure at 45%.

This percentage takes into account the neglect of the claimant to verify, or otherwise clarify, the references made by Mr Bernon in September, 1978 to 'moving' or 'sacking'. It takes into account his disclosure of his understanding that the executives were to be sacked which disclosure Mr Sandys considered to be a serious breach of confidence and which, when denied, contributed to the strained atmosphere amongst the top executives. We do not feel it necessary to detail, further, the matters which influenced our assessment. (Mr Rice holds the view that the claimant's contribution is greater than that measured by the majority).

We apply the contribution factor as follows:

Total Actual Loss	£104,518,00
Less 45%	£47,033.00
Nett Loss	£57,485.00
Statutory Maximum (2 x £22,227.00)		£44,454.00
TOTAL COMPENSATORY AWARD	£44,454.00

We determine that the claimant was unfairly dismissed and we award him compensation for loss sustained which sum, adjusted to the maximum permitted by s. 7 (1)(c) of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, we measure at £44,454.00 and we are satisfied that such award conforms with and reflects the spirit and concept of justice and equity.

Mr Rice (dissenting)

The tribunal has spent many hours in considering this very difficult case. It has perused in detail the 100 plus documents submitted to it and has reviewed the full evidence provided over the days of the hearing.

I find myself unable to subscribe to the majority opinion of my colleagues for the following reasons:

It is evident that things were not as they should have been in this company for a long time and particularly since September, 1978 up to the date of dismissal.

Events which led to difficulties included:

(1) The non nomination of the applicant to the board of directors.
(2) The proposal to move/change the duties of various executives.
(3) The dissatisfaction caused as a result of the appraisal interviews.
(4) The general attitude of the applicant originally in his attitude to the chief executive and latterly towards his subordinates.
(5) The general atmosphere of unease and the rumours which appeared to be generally circulating about disagreements amongst senior executives in the company.
(6) The loss of trust between the applicant and his chief executive and his immediate senior staff, and the applicant's admitted loss of trust.
(7) The difficulties about the management board, the delay in its being implemented and subsequent difficulties over the minutes.
(8) The efforts of the board, through its chairman, to reconcile the differences.
(9) The disagreements over what procedure to use to try and resolve the problems.
(10) The disclosure of an interview in New Ross, together with the production of letters written to the chief executive by three senior managers.

I am of the opinion that the board were perfectly entitled to exercise their discretion in not promoting the executives to the board, even though they appear to have contributed greatly to the prosperity of the company. I am equally satisfied that the chief executive was not happy with the performance of some of his staff, and was certainly anxious (as was his prerogative) to make changes.

There is no supportive evidence given to the tribunal that the chief executive ever actually requested the dismissal of any of the people concerned.
The appraisal interview is designed to help those being appraised to improve their performance. This can only be done by pointing out weaknesses. The chief executive was within his rights in so doing, but the applicant did not take kindly to any criticism and resented the implications.

A culmination of the above gradually led to the applicant becoming 'out of step' with most of his colleagues.

I am convinced that at all relevant times the board through the good offices of the chairman were anxious to resolve the problems which were causing so much dissension.

In my opinion, the board, in the interests of the well being of the company had very little alternative but to take the action it did, but at the same time I agree with my colleagues that the manner in which they did it, left much to be desired in that there is no corroboration of the 'Bohill disclosures', nor was there any opportunity given to the applicant to offer a defense about this disclosure which was obviously 'the straw that broke the camel's back!'

This failure in my opinion does not convert an otherwise fair dismissal into an unfair dismissal.

I find that the applicant was no longer a suitable person to carry out the duties which he was employed to. I have come to the conclusion on the applicant's own evidence that his conduct was substantially to blame for his dismissal. He raised and clashed on matters which became unnecessarily blown up and acrimonious by his lack of finesse in dealing with them. He also differed seriously from the senior management on major and serious matters of policy.

I got the clear impression from the evidence that the board of directors found the applicant's conduct so aggravating and unacceptable that they felt that they had had enough and wished to see the end of the applicant in the firm.

At this level it is essential that a top manager's activities influence the behaviour of his staff, as individuals and groups to achieve the desired goals.

The development of a healthy team spirit depends to a great extent on the attitude and approach of the manager. The top manager at this level has a vital role to play in ensuring the well being and success of the operation. It is important that all top management should work together in harmony under the chief executive. It is Mr Bunyan's failure to be a member of that team that influences me in the belief that he was not as leader of the orchestra able to accept the conductor's baton and therefore the performance of the orchestra was being seriously affected.

I am also of the opinion that the respondent has made a good case that the dismissal and any resultant financial loss to the applicant was substantially attributable to his own conduct and therefore that such financial loss should be reduced by a percentage of 90%.

Respondent(s):
Ms. Rosemary Mallon BL instructed by Ms Ciara Fulton, Tughans, Solicitors,
Marlborough House,
30 Victoria Street, Belfast BT1

The claimant, a linesman for overhead lines for electrical supply, alleged unfair dismissal after employment from August 2003 to January 2010. It was alleged that he had been dismissed without justification and without the respondent taking his disciplinary record into account. It was conceded, by the claimant's representative, that the claimant had been in breach of the alcohol and drugs procedure with the company and that the Company followed proper procedures in dealing with this matter. However the claimant's representative submitted that the penalty of dismissal as a consequence had been unwarranted.

The respondent submitted that the claimant had been fairly dismissed (on grounds of conduct) for breach of the respondent's alcohol and drugs procedure in that the penalty of dismissal had been warranted. On 8 December 2009 the claimant was tested under the respondent's random drug and alcohol testing policy and tested positive for the presence of an illegal drug in his system. The claimant admitted taking illegal drugs. The respondent submitted that the claimant had completed an acknowledgement of its random drug and alcohol testing policy which made it clear that contravention of the respondent's rules could result in dismissal.

The respondent considered it necessary to have strict rules on drug and alcohol use in order to comply with its obligations under the safety, health and welfare at work legislation to ensure, so far as was reasonably practicable, the health, safety and welfare at work of all its employees. Consequently, random alcohol and drug testing was carried out for all employees who worked in safety-critical environments. The claimant was employed as a linesman and his duties involved carrying out maintenance work (at height) on electrical cables. Accordingly, his role was considered to be safety-critical.

It was submitted by the respondent that the claimant had been afforded a full and fair investigation and disciplinary process involving an investigation meeting, a disciplinary hearing and an appeal process and that the claimant had had the benefit of legal representation at appeal stage.

Accordingly, the respondent submitted that the claimant was dismissed for a fair reason following the carrying-out of fair procedures. Furthermore, the respondent submitted that it had acted reasonably in treating as sufficient to dismiss the claimant's breach of its drug and alcohol testing policy given the claimant's safety-critical role, the fact that he was fully aware of the respondent's policy and the fact that he admitted that he had breached this policy.

Giving sworn testimony, ST (a manager with the respondent) said that the respondent worked in crews on overhead lines for the electrical industry. The respondent took health and safety very seriously. The claimant did the above work. There was also access to a vehicle as part of the job.

The claimant was an overhead linesman with many years of experience. On 8 June 2009 he signed to confirm receipt of a briefing document and revised policy on alcohol/drug use and agreed to the company carrying out random alcohol/drug screening as outlined in related documentation as part of his contract of employment.

However, an alcohol/drug test was carried out on 8 December 2009. The claimant was subsequently found to have tested positive for cannabis and was dismissed. Mindful of the nature of its work (e.g. the climbing of poles), the respondent had a policy of zero tolerance in respect of drugs. It took the view that drugs had the ability to impair judgment and that drug use could affect the health and safety of the claimant and of members of his team. It was said that the claimant had not known that cannabis could stay in his system for a protracted period. The claimant had not brought his drug use to the attention of ST (with a view to getting some assistance towards rehabilitation) prior to his failed drug test.

Under cross-examination, ST said that if the claimant had told him that he had a problem the respondent could have dealt with it. ST accepted that the respondent had had no major problem with the claimant in the past and that he had never previously been subject to disciplinary procedure such that the claimant's employment contract had been renewed without question and he had an excellent work record in general.

Asked if he had had other options apart from dismissing the claimant, ST replied that he felt he had no other option but to treat the claimant's case as gross misconduct.

It was put to ST that an associated U.K. company employee (CW) had consumed alcohol while on duty. ST accepted this but said that CW had gone through a rehabilitation process and had admitted that he was an alcoholic whereas the claimant had not given ST the chance to help him. ST said that, if the claimant had approached him, the respondent could have looked at rehabilitation.

It was put to ST that the respondent's 2009 policy referred to conduct that could (rather than would) result in dismissal. ST admitted that he had not done a study into the effects of cannabis although the claimant's representative contended that the respondent was obliged to carry out further research. The claimant's representative asked if ST had considered everything including that the effect of cannabis could decrease as time went on (such that psychotic effects would be gone in a few hours). The respondent's representative objected at this point whereupon the Tribunal clarified that it had to decide whether or not there had been gross misconduct and if the respondent had acted reasonably in opting for dismissal as a sanction.

Regarding whether CW (the abovementioned other worker) had been guilty of gross misconduct, the respondent's representative objected that CW was a different case and involved a different company. ST stated that he would have needed to have been there and to have had all the facts.

The claimant's representative contended that the dismissal had had serious consequences for the claimant (a South African national) and that the respondent should have taken this into account. ST replied that he had known that the claimant needed a work permit but that he had not known the claimant's financial position.

Giving sworn testimony, the claimant said that he had worked in the industry since 2003 and had not had any previous disciplinary issues or adverse comment about his work. He admitted use of cannabis around the time of a pop concert. He accepted recreational use of cannabis surrounding weekend parties although he said that he had since discontinued it. He was surprised that he failed a drug test but had gone of his own accord and at his own expense to a help centre in Mallow from which he had received a letter saying that he had done their course.

The claimant said that he had never been involved in an accident to himself or to anyone else. He described the chance of injury from a fall as "probably zero".

Under cross-examination, the claimant accepted that he had signed documentation from the respondent which referred to zero tolerance of, among other things, drug use saying that he had not read it all but had read the first page. He was asked to comment on the fact that zero tolerance was mentioned on the first page but he did not do so.

In a closing submission, the respondent's representative said that the nature of the respondent's work (involving overhead power lines admittedly not meant to be live) had to be considered in the context of whether dismissal was reasonable.

The claimant's representative contended that gross misconduct did not always have to lead to dismissal and that both the gravity of the complaint and the effect of dismissal on the employee had to be considered. It was submitted that the respondent had not taken into account that this had been the claimant's first transgression, that the other worker

(CW) had been treated differently, that the respondent had not looked into the effects of cannabis or the effect that dismissal would have on the claimant and that, therefore, the sanction of dismissal had been unreasonable.

Determination:

The respondent submitted that the claimant had been fairly dismissed (on grounds of gross misconduct) for breach of the respondent's alcohol and drugs procedure and that the penalty of dismissal had been warranted. On 8th December 2009 the claimant was tested under the respondent's random drug and alcohol testing policy and tested positive for the presence of an illegal drug in his system. The claimant admitted taking illegal drugs. The respondent submitted that the claimant had completed an acknowledgement of its random drug and alcohol testing policy which made it clear that contravention of the respondent's rules could result in dismissal.

From the outset the claimant's representative made it clear that the claimant was making no objection to any procedural matters and what the Tribunal had to consider was the proportionality of the sanction.

Section 6 (3) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 as amended by Section 5 (b) (a) of the 1993 Act states that:

"in determining if a dismissal is an unfair dismissal, regard may be had, if the Rights Commissioner, the Tribunal, or the Circuit Court, as the case may considers it appropriate to do so to the reasonableness or otherwise of the conduct (whether by act or omission) of the employer in relation to the dismissal"

The Tribunal had to consider if the respondent acted fairly and if dismissal was proportionate to the alleged misconduct. Does the punishment fit the crime? In considering this question the fact that the Tribunal itself would have taken a different view in a particular case is not relevant. The task of the Tribunal is not to consider what sanctions the Tribunal might impose but rather whether the reaction of the Respondent and the sanction imposed lay within the range of reasonable responses. The proportionality of the response is key and that even where proper procedures are followed in effecting a dismissal, if the sanction is disproportionate, the dismissal will be rendered unfair.

The Tribunal notes that the claimant was fully aware that there was zero tolerance of drug use and had signed a document where this was clearly set out. The Tribunal also notes that the claimant's duties involved working on overhead power lines. This meant working at significant heights which was safety critical, even if the lines were not live.

The precise terms of the test to be applied as to whether the sanction was reasonable was set out in Noritake (Ireland) Limited V Kenna UD88/1983 where the Tribunal considered the matter in the light of three questions:

1. Did the company believe that the employee mis-conducted himself as alleged? If so,

2 Did the company have reasonable grounds to sustain that belief? If so,

3. Was the penalty of dismissal proportionate to the alleged misconduct?

After hearing the totality of the evidence the Tribunal determines that the answer to these three questions is in the affirmative and unanimously finds that the sanction of dismissal for gross misconduct was entirely proportionate having regard to all the circumstances. The claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to 2007, fails.

heard this claim at Waterford on 16th April 2015

Representation:

Claimant: Ms. Helen Whately B.L. instructed by Mr Sean Ormonde, Sean Ormonde & Co., Solicitors, Suite 9, The Atrium, Canada Street, Waterford

Respondent: Peninsula Business Services (Ireland) Limited, Unit 3

Ground Floor, Block S, East Point Business Park, Dublin 3

Background:

The claimant commenced work with the respondent on 22nd August 2011 as a machine operator. The claimant's employment was terminated by reason of redundancy on 28th June 2013. The claimant's gross weekly salary at the time of dismissal was €380.00. It is accepted that there was a need for redundancy but the claimant alleges he was unfairly selected. The respondent disputes the allegation and said that selection was carried out on a need to retain skills basis.

The Respondent's Case:

NB, Electronics Manager for the respondent told the Tribunal that the respondent company populated printed circuit boards for customers. She gave evidence that due to a loss of a major customer there was a downturn in their business. She said that the loss of this customer affected the surface mount machine area where the claimant worked rather than the soldering area and that in order for an employee to work in the soldering area FÁS certification was needed. This certification involved a ten week training course and was only available to people who had been unemployed for a certain period. She said the claimant did not have this FÁS certification and that he did not do soldering work and worked on the less skilled end of the machine line rather than the end which required setting up the programme. The respondent could not afford the cost of training current employees, such as the claimant, in order to get FÁS soldering certification as the cost was prohibitive and in the order of €60,000.

She said that staff were informed at meetings on 11th and 13th June 2013 of the difficulties. On Friday, 14th June 2013 she wrote to the claimant informing him that due to the downturn in business staff in the surface mount machine area, where the claimant was based, would be reduced. This would be done following assessment by matrix and staff retained would be on a need to retain skills basis. The claimant was informed in this letter that the final selection would not be made until close of business Monday 17th June 2013 and staff selected would be informed on 18th June 2013. The claimant was informed on 19th June 2013 that he was being made redundant as and from 28th June 2013 but the claimant finished work on 21st June 2013 as he was told that he would not be required to work his week's notice.

NB's evidence was that she considered other options such as short time but that this would not work due to skill requirements. Out of the six employees on the machine line two were made redundant. In cross-examination it was put to NB that two employees who had commenced with the respondent on 8th April 2013 were retained over the claimant. NB said that this was because these two employees had FÁS certification for soldering. It was put to her that the claimant could and did do soldering but NB said if he did it was minimal. It was put to her that the claimant could and did work at both ends of the machine line but she said that once the line was set up even if the other person on the more skilled end of the line took a break the line could continue without any input from the claimant.

It was also put to NB that soldering was not in the matrix.

Evidence was also given by JC, Managing Director and founder of the respondent company. She reiterated what NB said and stressed the difficult situation the respondent company found itself in and their strive for the survival of the company.

The Claimant's Case:

The claimant told the Tribunal he was a qualified electrician and had been self-employed running his own business venture prior to commencing work with the respondent. He said he could and did work on both ends of the machine line such as when an operator was on a break or was off for some reason. He said he could solder and did do some soldering in the respondent company.

He disputed that the respondent had considered all options in that some of the people on the machine line could do soldering and could have been moved to the soldering area instead of taking in the two new people on 8th April 2013 and letting two employees go.

The claimant said he wasn't allowed to see the matrix assessment for other employees and that there was no mention of an appeal regarding the decision to make him redundant.

In cross-examination he accepted that the two employees taken on in April had different qualifications and could carry out soldering but he said he could do it too.

It was put to the claimant that he did discuss the decision to make him redundant with JC, the M.D., and that he asked her to let him remain on until he had the two years' service in order to claim redundancy and that this would enable him to get onto the State's back to education allowance scheme. The claimant said he decided to go back to education only because his job was finishing and that he would take a job if one was available.

The claimant gave evidence of his losses and his efforts to mitigate his losses. He said he was back in education since 4th September 2014 studying electrical engineering.

Determination:

Having considered the evidence adduced at the hearing and the submissions the Tribunal finds, and it was accepted by the parties, that the respondent had a need to effect a redundancy due to a downturn in its business. Regarding the selection process the Tribunal finds that because last in first out was not applied the claimant was selected and two employees who had only in or about two months' service as opposed to the almost two years' service of the claimant were retained over the claimant on a need to retain skills basis by virtue of the fact that these two employees had completed a ten week soldering course with FÁS and had received the necessary certification.

The Tribunal finds that the respondent did not adequately or at all consider alternatives to redundancy and further finds that had the respondent moved one or two of the machine line operators with soldering skills to the soldering area instead of retaining the two FÁS trained employees then there would have been no need to make the claimant redundant.

The Tribunal further finds that the procedures used in effecting the redundancies were somewhat rushed. The Tribunal does not believe that the respondent acted in bad faith but rather acted in the immediacy of the situation it found itself in order to try and ensure the survival of the business.

In the circumstances, the Tribunal finds that the claimant was unfairly selected for redundancy and was not afforded adequate procedures. Accordingly, the claimant was unfairly dismissed and the claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977-2007 succeeds and the Tribunal awards the claimant compensation in the amount of €4,400.

In calculating the level of compensation the Tribunal took into consideration the efforts of the claimant to mitigate his losses and finds that these efforts do not meet the standard set out by the Tribunal in Sheehan v Continental Administration Co Ltd (UD 858/1999) that a "claimant who finds himself out of work should employ a reasonable amount of time each weekday in seeking work. It is not enough to inform agencies that you are available for work nor merely to post an application to various companies seeking work ... The time that a claimant finds on his hands is not his own, unless he chooses it to be, but rather to be profitably employed in seeking to mitigate his loss."

Redundancy Payments Acts, 1967 to 1991
Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 and 1991

I certify that the Tribunal
(Division of Tribunal)

Chairman: Mr. D. Hamilton

Members: Mr. P.D. McCann
Mr. G. Lamon

heard these claims at Dublin on 6th January 1993, 24th February 1993, 11th March 1993, 28th May, 1993 and 31st May, 1993

Representation:

Claimants: Ms. P. King, S.I.P.T.U., 29 Parnell Square, Dublin 1 and Mr. E. Stewart S.C. instructed by Bowler Geraghty & Co., Solicitors, 2 Lower Ormond Quay, Dublin 1 for Dermot Boucher, Desmond O'Neill and Bernard Kelly and Mr. M. Connaughton B.L. instructed by William Fry, Solicitors, Fitzwilton House, Wilton Place, Dublin 2 for John A. Harrington.

Respondent: Mr. T. Mallon B.L. instructed by Arthur Cox, Solicitors, 41-45 St. Stephens Green, Dublin 2

The determination of the Tribunal was as follows:-

The claimants were employed by the respondent until their employment ended by reason for redundancy. The claimants case is that their selection for redundancy was unfair.

Respondents Case:

Mr. Eamonn Cahill, Chief Executive, told the Tribunal that the respondent company provided a consultant service to a range of companies and organisations. He said that the respondent was controlled at Board level by nominees of Irish Business & Employers Confederation and the Irish Congress of Trade Unions. He said that the centre was originally 100% state funded but this changed over the years and, as a result of the cessation of Government funding now earns about 75% of its costs through the market place.

Mr. Cahill said that in early 1991 it was recognised that the centre was not able to generate the sort of funds needed to keep the company viable and it was not possible to pay special pay awards. He said that the employees also accepted salary cuts on a deferral basis.

Mr. Cahill said that a long term plan for the centre was needed and in December, 1991 a plan, which included the redundancy of 16 people, was put to the Board. He said that this plan was accepted by the board but a problem existed as they did not have the money to implement that sort of package. He said that they devised a package to be based on deferred payment of severance pay and this was put to the staff but was rejected. He added that in early 1992 the salaries were restored to their previous level.

Mr. Cahill said on 31st March, 1992, on his advise and that of the auditors, the Board took the view that the centre should be wound up. He said that this was based on the losses of the centre and the possibility that it would be insolvent by the end of April. He said the Board deferred taking a final decision but did issue protective notice to all employees, including himself, to take effect from 30th April, 1992. He added that the only basis for the deferral was to allow the acceptance and implementation of the plan of December, 1991. He said that this was communicated to staff and there were discussions the following day. He said that it was communicated to him that in essence the plan was acceptable but there was no agreement on the method of selection for redundancy. He said that the union sought selection on a last in first out basis but he disagreed and felt that it should be done on a voluntary basis. He also said that there had been no compulsory redundancies in the centre in the past.

Mr. Cahill said that at a meeting on 8th April 1992 the union indicated its acceptance of the plan and at a meeting on 9th April, 1993 the board deferred calling a statutory meeting and set 15th April, 1992 as a deadline for the implementation of the plan. He said that on 10th April, 1992 he informed all staff of details of the severance on offer and volunteers were sought with 13th April 1992 being set as the deadline. He said that it was pointed out to him that all staff were not aware of the terms and he extended the deadline to 14th April, 1992.

Mr. Cahill said that ten redundancies were required from among the professional staff. He said that four professional staff volunteered for redundancy and, as the accounts functions had been contracted out, the position of another person become redundant. He said that he was now in a situation where he had to select five advisory staff for redundancy.

Mr. Cahill explained to the Tribunal that he adopted the selection process of choosing the group of people, (to the limit of the number of persons who could be retained), he felt were most appropriate and suitable for the job on hand and he then ended up with the 5 people to be made redundant. He said that he was therefore selecting the people most suitable to stay rather than selecting people to go. He said that the areas of work requirement were the areas of small business, the area of employee involvement, the area of large company work, the area of European dimension and the worker co-operative area. He said that he had to maintain a balance of skills in these areas and to select consultants with specialised skill as well as people who could conduct a wide range of work. He also said that he considered peoples ability to sell work and to generate new business and the question of the performance of people in their financial considered. He said that at the time he looked up the figures on each employees financial contribution to the company as he kept a record of information from time sheets. He added that he would have foreseen the use of the services of some of the people who would be made redundant on a contract basis in the future.

Mr. Cahill said that, having selected the people most suitable to stay, based on the criteria he used, he was left with the five people to be made redundant and these included the four claimants. He said that in his view he had selected the best people for the future of the company and if he had to adopt the selection procedure of last in first out it would not allow him to implement the plan as he would have lost a number of the skills he needed to retain.

Mr. Cahill said that on 15th April, 1992 he notified the staff who were not to be retained. He said that the Board met at 1.00p.m. on that day and they were unhappy that the matter had not progressed to the stage where the union had accepted the final decision and they put a deadline of 3.00p.m. the following day for acceptance by the union. Mr. Cahill said that on the 16th April, 1993 he was informed that the union group had noted and accepted the position. He said that he informed the chairman of the acceptance and the Boards decision to close the centre was revoked.

When cross-examined Mr. Cahill said that he did not consult anybody during the selection process and that he did not have interviews with staff members to allow them to show there ability as he knew the staff concerned and was aware of their ability. He also said that he did not make the staff aware of the criteria for selection used by him. He said that he did not discuss with the claimants the decision for their selection as he was faced with tight deadlines at the time.

Mr. Cahill said that, he did not recall saying to Mr. Desmond O'Neill that certain people in the organisation either through political necessity or ignorance offended people outside the organisation and that they would now have to go and it was the price they had to pay. He added that he did not believe that he would make a statement like that. He also disagreed that he used the disguise of redundancy to get rid of people that he did not like.

Mr. Cahill agreed that Mr. Bernard Kelly had been involved in co-operative work, and that a complaint was received from one of their clients concerning an article which appeared in a paper quoting Mr. Kelly as criticizing the client. He said that Mr. Kelly did not work for this client again as they were dissatisfied with him. He said that at the time of the redundancies this incident was in the past and it had no conscious effect on Mr. Kelly's selection.

Mr. Cahill was recalled to give further evidence after the claimants had completed their evidence. He said that people who voluntarily participated in trade union activities were not in difficulty with the respondent organisation. He said he did not recall the conversation with Mr. O'Neill which was stated to have occurred in the last week of March 1992. In relation to the conversation with Mr. Boucher, Mr. Cahill said that out of exasperation he may have said the words attributed to him. He said that his reply to Mr. Boucher was in the context of whether the proposal put forward by Mr. Boucher would realise a financial saving to the respondent organisation.

Mr. Cahill denied the evidence put forward by Mr. Kelly, namely that redundancy was a device to get rid of the claimants. Mr. Cahill was not the Chief Executive Officer for the length of time that Mr. Kelly had been in the organisation. He did confirm that the co-operative work was taken off Mr. Kelly, and that Mr. Kelly had been unacceptable to FAS.

Mr. Cahill confirmed that the decision on who was selected for redundancy was his decision and he added that he was not subjected to any outside influence. He said the criteria he used was (i) Revenue generating ability and (ii) Product development - relevant mixture of skills looking at the overall organisation structure.

When cross-examined by counsel for Mr. Kelly, Mr. Cahill said that FAS was the only client to find Mr. Kelly unacceptable. He accepted that Mr. Kelly could generate £40,000 to £45,000 revenue in a year.

Mr. Cahill said it was possible the claimants could do some of the £400,000 sub-contract work that was available. He confirmed that since their dismissal they had not been given sub-contract work.

Claimants Case:

Mr. John Harrington gave evidence that he commenced employment with the respondent during January 1980. He said his initial work areas were related to productivity and market surveys. He added that from 1986 onward he was involved in the areas of job evaluation and grading, and limited market surveys.

Mr. Harrington stated that he was dismissed from his employment during April 1992. Prior to that he said he was not specifically told that his job was in jeopardy. He said that he personally had no fear of being made redundant as a result of the organisational changes because of his track record, which he submitted matched the performance of anybody else. He said that in common with all employees (except one) he received protective notice on the 1st April 1992 and subsequently on the 14th April 1992 Mr. Cahill informed him that he had been selected for redundancy. He continued that the discussion with Mr. Cahill was brief and he was not given any reasons why he was selected for redundancy. He said he was not told that the criteria for retaining individuals was based on their previous financial performance and their range of skills.

Mr. Harrington added that he didn't know why he was dismissed, and that in view of Mr. Cahill's evidence given to the Tribunal he believed that he was "good enough" to be retained in the organisation. He said that his financial performance would have placed him in the upper half of the revenue generation table in comparison the other employees. He said that he was capable of doing any range of duties assigned having regard to his previous work experience.

When cross-examined Mr. Harrington said that he was a member of S.I.P.T.U., when employed by the respondent organisation. He said that he was aware that the organisation was in financial difficulty throughout the period of his employment. He said that during 1991, salaries in the organisation were cut by 20% as a cost saving measure and he agreed that a high proportion of the organisation's costs related to staff but he added staff also generated revenue. He agreed that the respondent organisation had to take some action to rectify its difficulties but he said various options should have been considered.

Mr. Harrington estimated that during 1991 he generated business for the organisation to the value of £54,000. In the period May 1991 to April 1992, Mr. Harrington said that leaving aside existing contracts he generated £800 worth of completely new business. He added that his primary function was not to generate new contracts but to service existing contracts. He accepted that of the £54,000 of business generated during 1991, one contract had been subsequently revalued downwards by £5,000.

Mr. Harrington repeated that his redundancy was not justified and added that he believed that no redundancy in the organisation was necessary.

Mr. Dermot Boucher, gave evidence that he qualified as a chartered accountant in 1965 and that he joined the respondent organisation in 1969. He said that during his career he acted as an accessor for the Labour Court and subsequently was involved in training with AnCO and its successor FAS. He stated that in the late 1980's he was involved in overseas work for the EC and the World bank. He then went on a career break from 1987 to 1990.

Mr. Boucher stated that he was a founder member of the F.W.U.I branch in the Irish Productivity Centre in the early 1970's and acted as a voluntary official on a consistent basis throughout the following 20 years. He said that he acted as shop steward on several occasions. He said that Mr. O'Neill and Mr. Kelly were also active in the union and that Mr. Harrington had acted as chairman of the section for one year. He added that that fifth person who was made compulsorily redundant was also involved in the union.

Mr. Boucher said that the redundancies and his own redundancy were not necessary. He said in the month of March 1992, he had obtained leave of absence to go abroad and work for the Asian Development Bank. Therefore he would be off the payroll for six months and was agreeable in April 1992 to extend that period to two years leave of absence but the Chief Executive Officer rejected the proposal. He said he was informed that two other individuals had not been considered for redundancy because they had been on leave of absence. He said he was due to go on leave of absence on the day he had been made redundant.

In 1992, Mr. Boucher described himself as a generalist in the respondent organisation. He said that being a "jack of all trades" meant that he was capable of doing the work for which the other employees had been retained to do in the organisation or any of the work that was to be given on a sub-contract basis. He said the Chief Executive Officer, Mr. Cahill intended to sub-contract work to the value of £400,000, which it was submitted could have provided permanent work for Mr. Boucher and the other claimants or at least on a sub-contract basis. Mr. Boucher continued that when the claims for unfair dismissal were lodged with the Tribunal, the C.E.O., had said that he would not give sub-contract work to any of the claimants, however, following union pressure that decision was reversed.

Mr. Boucher said that he could only speculate on the motivation behind his dismissal. He believed that it occurred because elements in management or the council of the organisation disapproved of his trade union activity or that there was a political dimension to the dismissal. He said that he had once been a candidate for Dail Eireann, which had been frowned upon. He stated that he had never been told of any complaints about his professional conduct.

Mr. Boucher stated that a week before he was notified of his dismissal on grounds of redundancy, he had been speaking with the C.E.O. and was not informed that his redundancy was being contemplated. He said that he had academic qualifications allied to his 23 years of experience and was worthy to have been retained in the organisation. He said he was never informed of the reason for his dismissal at the time of his dismissal.

When cross-examined Mr. Boucher confirmed that he was suggesting that his dismissal was because of his trade union activity. He said that Mr. Cahill made it difficult for employees to engage in voluntary trade union activity. When pressed to provide substantiation for his allegation he said that the C.E.O informed him that finance was not the reason for his selection for redundancy and that he therefore had to speculate on the motivation behind his dismissal.

Mr. Boucher said that he was aware of the precarious financial situation of the respondent organisation and that drastic action was warranted but would not accept that redundancies were justified. He accepted that reducing staff would reduce costs but it would also affect revenue potential. He suggested a possible option to redundancy was a further pay cut of 10% for 1992.

Mr. Boucher said that during April 1992 the concept of compulsory redundancies was accepted subject to the normal union position. He said that that union position was not contained in a written agreement with the respondent organisation and the respondent organisation did not ultimately reach an agreement with the union. He said therefore Mr. Cahill's proposal was implemented. He added that this was the first occasion that full-time employees were made redundant from the respondent organisation.

Mr. Brian Kelly gave evidence that he joined the respondent organisation on the 1st May 1979. He outlined his academic qualifications which included a Bachelor of Commerce degree and a Masters in Organisational Psychology. He also outlined his career within the organisation which included work in the business advisory service and then in labour management services. He stated that in the mid 1980's he moved to more commercial work, which by 1989 he had earned £100,000 for the organisation from the development of his co-operative programme. In the period 1989 to 1992, he said that he worked on a team building module, which again had been a success. In summary, Mr. Kelly said that he had worked in various areas within the respondent organisation.

Mr. Kelly said that when he joined the respondent organisation he also joined the union. He said that he was on the section and branch committee for three or four years. He said that Mr. O'Neill, Mr. Boucher and himself had all served on the branch committee of the union. He added that Mr. Harrington had been Chairman of the section committee. He therefore submitted that all four claimant's had a higher profile in terms of trade union activity than other employees who were also in the union.

Mr. Kelly said that in 1980 he had been involved in the development of worker participation. He stated that the C.E.O., complained to him that employers didn't like the fact that joint employer/employee seminars were being held around the country. He was then advised by the C.E.O. to discontinue the seminars he had been arranging and so Mr. Kelly desisted.

Mr. Kelly stated that during 1981 he wrote a book about preventing absenteeism in the work place. The emphasis in his book was that the onus was on both management and employees to prevent absenteeism. Subsequently he said that the respondent organisation secured a contract in the area of absenteeism and despite his role in securing the contract, the work was assigned to another officer within the organisation. Mr. Kelly said that he complained about the situation and was informed that employers didn't like the preventative approach that he had adopted.

In relation to his work on the co-operative programme, Mr. Kelly said that Mr. O'Neill informed him (the claimant) that the C.E.O., had told him that the co-operative programme was a project that he did not want to be closely associated with. According to Mr. Kelly, co-operatives make a political statement and a short time later in 1990 he was suddenly moved from his work on co-operatives. He went on to say that his transfer from his work on co-operatives followed an article in the Irish language paper 'Anois'. He stated that he was never given any revenue credit for his work on co-operatives.

During 1991, Mr. Kelly said he identified a potential revenue earning project in the area of stress management. He said he approached Mr. Cahill, in his role as Chief Executive Officer to promote the product. While Mr. Cahill had given a favourable response to the project, the project never went ahead. Mr. Kelly said that this was the "last straw" for him, and he believed that there was another agenda to starve him of work because of his political philosophy as displayed in his work on worker co-operatives and worker participation.

Mr. Kelly said that at the time of his redundancy he was engaged on a revenue earning project with Mr. O'Neill. He said that Mr. O'Neill was informed to hand the work over to another employee who already had another project to work on. He submitted that there is sufficient work available within the respondent organisation to justify his continued employment.

Mr. Kelly stated that when Mr. Cahill informed him of his redundancy Mr. Cahill specified the reasons for the redundancy as being (a) not earning revenue, (b) couldn't organise a range of projects and (c) unacceptable to clients. Mr. Kelly was adamant that he was capable of earning revenue for the respondent organisation.

During cross-examination Mr. Kelly said that from his recollection the union did not accept the need for compulsory redundancies. He said that he was aware the respondent organisation was in financial difficulty. He said he believed that other options such as wage cuts should have been considered in preference to redundancies.

Mr. Kelly said that his redundancy from the organisation was a device to get rid of him.

In response to questions from the Tribunal, Mr. Kelly said that it was clear from Mr. Attley's evidence given to the Tribunal, that he (Mr. Kelly) had not got "offside" with FAS.

Mr. Des O'Neill gave evidence that he concurred with the evidence of his colleagues. He added that towards the end of March 1992, Mr. Cahill told him that certain persons in the organisation through political ignorance or naivety had offended people outside the organisation and would have to pay the price of redundancy. 1950

In common with his colleagues Mr. O'Neill said that he believed he was unfairly dismissed.

Determination

The Tribunal determines from the evidence that the dismissal of each of the claimants was made in the context of a genuine redundancy situation applying within the company which resulted in the reduction of the workforce by five persons including the four claimants.

The Tribunal determines from the evidence that section 6(3)(b) did not apply to these dismissals by reason of the fact that there was no history of compulsory redundancy in this employment and therefore no custom or practice governing a redundancy situation and similarly that there were no union/management agreement or contractual provisions involving any agreed method of selection for redundancy.

The Tribunal accepts that in this case the Employer/Respondent had to select for redundancy five persons from amongst a group of individuals which had different backgrounds, skills and contributions to the company and that the Respondent wished to ensure that after the redundancies there would remain a core of skills sufficient to the maintenance of service and the survival of the Company.

In these circumstances and in the absence of any guidelines or precedent the employer is obliged to act fairly in relation to the criteria applicable in selecting who is to go and who is to stay and to apply such criteria fairly to each individual in order to bring about a fair assessment and decision. The assessment is to apply to all in the group and not just to some.

It has been submitted that in the absence of section 6(3)(b) applying that when the reason for dismissal is found to be wholly or mainly by reason of redundancy that Section 6(4)(c) of the Unfair Dismissals Acts applies to act as an absolute defence to a claim of Unfair Dismissal and that the Employment Appeals Tribunal cannot enquire further into the their basis for the selection of those to be made redundant.

The Tribunal was referred to the cases of Susan Roche and others - v - Sealink Stena Line Ltd, (UD187/92, UD212/92, UD239/92, UD555/92 & UD274/92) and Loftus and Healy - v - An Bord Telecom (D5648 & D5649).

At the time of writing this determination it is understood that the Tribunal determination in the case of Susan Roche & others -V- Sealink Stena Line Ltd has been appealed to the Circuit Court and the issues have been compromised by the parties without order of the court. However in the context of the Determination it may be noted that the unfair dismissal case arose out of the alleged redundancy of Susan Roche and Four other claimants and the Tribunal have found that no agreement or custom or practice existed relating to selection for redundancy. The Tribunal determined -
"With regard to the use of assessments in the selection process, the Tribunal finds that Section 6(3)(b) of the Act is the only Section which deals with the question of selection and there is no provision in this Section which allows the Tribunal to consider the fairness of the assessments used". The Tribunal in this case determined that the dismissal of the claimants was by reason of redundancy and that there was no

Section (6)(1) states that:

> "Subject to the provisions of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an unfair dismissal unless, having regard to all the circumstances, there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal".

The Tribunal considers that the onus of proof is on the employer to establish that he acted fairly in relation to the dismissal of each of the claimants. It is not sufficient to establish an overall umbrella context such as "Redundancy", within which the decision was made. It is necessary for him to establish that he acted fairly in the selection of each individual employee for redundancy and that where assessments are clearly involved and used as a means for selection that reasonable criteria are applied to all the employees concerned and that any selection for Redundancy of the individual employee in the context of such criteria are fairly made. This legislation establishes the right of each individual employee to be fairly-treated and particularly so on matters greatly affecting his welfare such as the loss of his employment would be.

Section 6(3)(b) provides that a dismissal in breach of that subsection is unfair.

In this case Section 6(3)(b) did not apply, therefore consideration of the fairness or otherwise of the dismissal in the case must have regard to Section 6(1) and Section 6(6) which places the onus on the employer to establish that there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal.

In Section 6(6) where, because of a redundancy situation, all employees are being dismissed then the redundancy is clearly the reason for the dismissal and establishes a defence under Section 6(4)(c) to a claim of Unfair Dismissal. Where selection is involved and Section 6(3)(b) does not apply then the dismissal results from the selection for redundancy and such selection may be reviewed under Section 6(1).

The Tribunal determines

(A) the onus is on the employer to justify the selection of the claimants and each of them for redundancy and

(B) that in the absence of Section 6(3)(b) applying that the dismissals must be considered under Section 6(1) and

(C) that the general redundancy situation in the absence of Section 6(3)(b) applying does not deny the individual employee the right to be fairly assessed for selection. If it was otherwise then an employer could use the umbrella of redundancy to apply unfair criteria in the selection process or to act unfairly or even select for reasons other than the declared criteria and use the redundancy umbrella to cloak his unfairness.

The dismissals in this case had their roots in a redundancy situation. The selection of the individuals for redundancy purported to result from a fair selection procedure.

The Tribunal therefore determines that it is empowered to review the dismissals under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 and 1991.

This case has given the Tribunal much concern in that it is clear that Mr. Cahill, Manager of the respondent company was under considerable pressure to achieve redundancies within a short time.

He sought to do so by canvassing for voluntary redundancies and achieved some success in this regard, but there remained the need to dismiss a further five employees by reason of redundancy. After the volunteers were identified there were twenty employees remaining of which five would have to be made redundant.

As previously stated there was no procedure agreed or existing by custom and practice to guide Mr. Cahill in his task of selecting the five who were to go. In addition he had comparatively little time in which to make his decision as he was required to report to his Council on the day following the establishment of the redundancy "volunteers."

The Tribunal has determined in this case that in this situation there remains on the employer the obligation to act fairly and reasonably towards his employee and each of them when selecting for dismissal by reason of redundancy.

The Tribunal considers that the persons continuing employment or not is of fundamental importance to that person, hence the statutory obligation on the employer to strive to achieve fairness in considering whether such employee should be dismissed for any reason and in this context by reason of redundancy.

The Tribunal is also conscious of the many different circumstances in which employers find themselves.

The Tribunal therefore in this case, as in all other cases applies a standard of fairness against which the employer's decisions are judged but such standards are not to be so stringent as of themselves to be unfair and unreasonable.

This Tribunal as in previous cases has applied a standard of fairness documented in the determinations of Bunyon -v- United Dominions Trust (Ireland) Ltd. (UD66/1980) and N.C. Watling & Co. Ltd. -v- Richardson [1978] ICR 1049.

This standard to be imposed on the employer is well expressed in the Decision in N C Watling & Co. Ltd. -v- Richardson [1978] ICR 1049 as follows:-

> "the fairness or unfairness of dismissal is to be judged by the objective standard of the way in which a reasonable employer in those circumstances in that line of business (and at that time*) would have behaved."
> * inserted by this Tribunal

It is against this standard of fairness that the procedural and substantive aspect of the respondent's decision has been judged by this Tribunal. The onus is on the employer to justify the dismissal to establish that there were substantial grounds for same.

The respondent sought to justify the dismissal of each of the five claimants by reference to figures which purported to indicate that 1953 aim of Mr. Cahill as Manager in this difficult situation was to retain a hard core of employees whose contribution was valued and whose flexibility and experience would continue to be of the greatest advantage to the company as it might continue or redevelop.

The aim as expressed was not criticised and the claim arises in the context of the application of the respondent in the selecting of five employees whose employment was to end.

Mr. Cahill made it clear in his examination and particularly in his cross examination by Ms. King that he was aware of the merits and value of each employee because of his experience and familiarity with all the employees over a number of years and that his method of selection was on the basis of who should be retained. He stated in his evidence that he did not consider or assess the five employees who were to be dismissed (including the five claimants) but that he arrived at them by a process of elimination, having decided on the employees whom he wished to retain and whom he felt would be of long term benefit to the company.

The respondent placed much emphasis on the pressure imposed on Mr. Cahill to achieve the redundancies and have them implemented on or before the 14th or 15th of April 1992. It is accepted that the list of volunteers had to be completed by Tuesday the 14th of April, 1992. The Tribunal was told that on the morning of the 15th that the staff not being retained were notified and that there was a Council meeting scheduled for 1 p.m. on the 15th. In evidence Mr. Cahill was uncertain if this notification to the staff not being retained was notified on the 14th or the 15th and stated that it could be the 14th.

In any event on the 15th of April the Council met to consider the redundancies and the implementation of same but were unhappy, it appears, that the final position was not accepted at that time by the Union and the meeting was adjourned until the next day (the 16th) to achieve such acceptance which was duly notified at 3.10 p.m. on April the 16th. In the light of such acceptance the Council decision to cease the operations of the company was revoked.

It is indicative of the seriousness of the situation that without the redundancies being affected and accepted by the Union concerned that the Council had decided to close down the operations of the respondent. It is also clear that whilst a very short deadline was imposed on Mr. Cahill to achieve the redundancies by voluntary or compulsory means that when it was in the Council's interest a further day was available to be allowed to achieve acceptance of the final situation by the Union. The Tribunal does not consider that acceptance by the Union of the final situation in any way establishes the fairness of the respondent's method of selection for which it remains accountable to each employee concerned.

The evidence offered by the respondent to justify the selection of the five employees was not conclusive and was opposed in material respects by each of the claimants in evidence.

In a situation where selection, which involves such variables such as income earned, credit for research time, versatility and so forth it would appear to the Tribunal that when such selection is being made then at least those threatened with dismissal, or in the group likely to be dismissed, should be made aware that, what for some could be a final assessment was being made and their views and contributions, in support of their case for remaining, canvassed, valued and considered in a full and bona fide way.

The Tribunal considers that this procedure could have been followed by Mr. Cahill even within the short time allowed to him and certainly it could have been undertaken in the extended time available to the Council as evidenced by their deferral of decision for twenty-four hours in the context of Union acceptance of the final position.

Mr. Cahill stated that he identified the various areas covered by the activities of the respondent and stated that he wanted people to remain to service those areas even on a reduced capacity so as to be able to build on that service as the need increased in time. Each of the claimants stated in their evidence that they had contributed in substantial ways in revenue earned and research and in contacts and in service to the respondent and that they were also able to be flexible and had undertaken tasks in areas outside their speciality.

The claimants were not given an opportunity to deal with concerns which Mr. Cahill might have as to their usefulness in this difficult context and their only opportunity to do so was at the hearing of their claims by this Tribunal.

Without giving a definitive record of the proceedings of the Tribunal the matters raised by the claimants in objection to the assessment being made against them were as follows:-

(i) their capability to earn revenue for the organisation,

(ii) their capability to do work done by employees who were retained,

(iii) their track record matched the performance of other employees,

(iv) their capability of performing a wide range of functions within the organisation, and

(v) the length of their service.

In view of the foregoing it is clear that the claimants had a constructive contribution to make to the respondent in the context of their possible selection for redundancy. Any fair assessment of them would have the characteristics of any inquiry with the right to the threatened person to make a contribution in defence of any allegation against him or in this case any unfair or unbalanced view being held by the respondent.

No such opportunity was given to the claimants or any of them to make an input into this inquiry/assessment which concerned a matter of vital interest to them namely their continued employment or otherwise. It is not for this Tribunal to judge whether or not such input would have made any difference, but its denial is a denial of the natural and constitutional right to defend yourself which is not at the gift of the employer or of this Tribunal but is vested in each and every citizen no less in any inquiry affecting their continued employment, than when the inquiry might affect their liberty.

The Tribunal is satisfied that there was an opportunity for Mr. Cahill to conduct his assessment in a manner which had regard to the rights of the employees to contribute to that assessment and that the denial of such right constituted a breach of natural justice which renders their and each of their dismissals unfair.

The Tribunal has also considered the question as to whether the respondent has discharged the onus to justify the dismissal of each individual claimant herein.

The Tribunal has considered the evidence given on behalf of the respondent in respect of each of the claimants and has considered the evidence of each of the claimants in response to same. The Tribunal considers that in the light of the totality of the evidence that the respondent has not established that there were fair and reasonable grounds for selecting the claimants or any of them for redundancy.

In arriving at this decision we have regard to the evidence of each of the claimants in defence of their own position and opposing the statements and conclusions of Mr. Cahill as to their contribution to the company, including their versatility.

The Tribunal notes from the evidence that at the time of the selection of the claimants for redundancy Mr. Cahill did not make the criteria for selection used by him known to the claimants and subsequently did not state the criteria for selection at a Rights Commissioner's hearing. The first occasion that the claimants became aware of the criteria was at the Tribunal hearing of 6th January, 1993.

We determine therefore that the onus on the employer to establish substantial grounds that the claimants were fairly dismissed by virtue of their fair selection for redundancy has not been discharged and that the claimants and each of them were accordingly unfairly dismissed.

The Tribunal notes that each of the claimants claimed that he was a trade union activist and that this contributed to his selection for redundancy, however, the Tribunal wishes to emphasise that it is not satisfied from the evidence that this was in whole or part the reason for the dismissals and merely records the claimants' claim in recognition of the weight of the argument which was offered to the Tribunal at the hearing.

We determine that the claimants and each of them was unfairly dismissed both on the procedural and substantive grounds as stated. Accordingly the claims under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 and 1991 are allowed.

In considering the remedies available under Section 7 of the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 and 1991 the Tribunal considered the re-instatement of each of the claimants individually but considered compensation to be the most appropriate form of redress in the circumstances as re-instatement would put the claimants at a disadvantage for future selection for redundancy, should it arise, due to the fact that they were absent from the work environment for a period approaching two years. The Tribunal therefore awards the claimants the following sums under Section 7(1)(c) of the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 and 1991.

In projecting the future loss of the claimants the Tribunal awards 1.5 years future loss to Mr. B. Kelly and Mr. J. Harrington as they were least successful in mitigating their loss. The Tribunal projects 1 year's future loss in the case of Mr. D. Boucher and D. O'Neill.

In assessing the loss of the claimants' pension rights the Tribunal based it's decision on the evidence of Mr. Boucher being the only evidence available to it and assessed the respondent's weekly contribution at £60.00. The Tribunal's findings are also based on the assumption that the claimants' accrued pension rights, up to the time of their dismissal, are still available to them and are transferrable to new employment.

Payments made to the claimants on the termination of their employment (except minimum notice) have not been deducted by the Tribunal in calculating the overall awards to the claimants as these payments were based on the claimants' statutory and contractual rights. Even though the Tribunal is aware of and is concerned about the respondent's ability to pay the awards made we feel it our duty to base our findings on the loss suffered by the claimants and we have made our best efforts to establish the loss sustained by the claimants resulting from the dismissals.

The claims under the Redundancy Payments Acts, 1967 to 1991 do not apply in this case. Accordingly the claims fail.

Sullivan (claimant) v Department of Education (respondent): Employment Appeals PW 2/97 (Cork, 31 July 1997)

Payment of Wages – Secondary schoolteacher – Whether Department of Education employer – Classification of single honours degree at pass level for purposes of qualification allowance – Whether classification resulted in unlawful deduction – Payment of Wages Act 1991 (No. 25), sections 5(5) and 7

Payment of wages – Definition of 'deduction' – Whether non-payment of proper entitlements from commencement of employment constituted a deduction – Payment of Wages Act 1991 (No. 25), sections 5(5) and 7

Facts The applicant graduated from University College Cork in 1989 with a BA single honours degree in French and English. The following year she obtained her Higher Diploma in Education and commenced work as a teacher. Her salary was made up of a basic rate and two qualification allowances. One such qualification allowance was a degree allowance. The rate of payment of this allowance varied depending on whether the recipient held an honours or a pass degree. The claimant was paid at the lower level equivalent to the pass degree qualification allowance. She claimed that the status of her degree was equivalent to an honours degree and that therefore she was entitled to the higher level of allowance and that the denial to her of the higher level allowance amounted to an unlawful deduction within the meaning of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. The respondent contended that since part of the applicant's degree was taken at pass level, it did not meet the criteria set out by the department for payment at the higher level. It also submitted that the matter had already been voted on by the teachers' unions in the context of the revised proposals for the programme for competitiveness and work. Finally, it claimed that the department was not the employer of the applicant, merely the paying agent. The matter came before a Rights Commissioner (pursuant to section 7 of the 1991 Act) who decided in favour of the respondent. The claimant then appealed to the Employment Appeals Tribunal.

Determined

(1) There are sufficiently close ties and controls exercised by the Department of Education in relation to individual teachers and that therefore the department is the employer for the purposes of the Payment of Wages Act 1991.

(2) Whilst there is no specific definition of 'deduction' in the Payment of Wages Act, guidance can be taken from the definition of 'wages' which includes all sums to which an employee is properly entitled. If an employee does not receive what is properly payable to him or her from the outset, then this can amount to a deduction within the meaning of the 1991 Act.

(3) The primary degree (first or second honours) allowance was properly allowable to the claimant and the single honours programme was in all respects an honours degree programme.

(4) The non-payment of the qualification allowance appropriate to primary degree (first or second honours) for a single honours degree was an unlawful deduction within the meaning of the Payment of Wages Act 1991.

Full text of the Tribunal's determination

Background

This claim comes before this division of the Employment Appeals Tribunal by way of appeal from a decision of a Rights Commissioner pursuant to section 7 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991.

The claimant's claim is that she has been paid an incorrect rate of degree allowance in respect of her pay as a secondary school teacher since she commenced work as a secondary school teacher and that due recognition has not been given to the status of her degree and by reason of the alleged incorrect rate of degree allowance granted by the Department of Education ('the Department') that this amounts to an unlawful deduction within the meaning of the Payment of Wages Act 1991.

Ms Sullivan graduated from University College Cork (UCC) in 1989 having achieved a BA single honours degree and her BA degree subjects were French and English. She got her Higher Diploma in Education in 1990. She commenced employment in September 1991 at St. Mary's Secondary School, Buttevant, Co. Cork for 15 hours per week and for the following two academic years i.e. 1992 to 1994 she worked at Mount St. Michael Secondary School, Roscarbery, Co. Cork in a temporary whole-time position for 22 hours per week and since 1994 has been employed at Sacred Heart College, Carrignavar, Co. Cork where she is paid an incremental salary by the Department. Her salary consists of a basic salary, derived from the basic scale and, in addition, two qualification allowances. One of these is a degree allowance. Ms Sullivan's degree allowance is paid at the pass degree level the current rate for which is £812 per annum and she argues that the appropriate rate in her case should be that in respect of primary degree (1st and 2nd honours) which amounts to £2,167 per annum. She therefore claims the differential between these rates since she commenced work in 1991. Two points are to be noted in this regard. Firstly, in respect of her 1991 post from 1 September 1991 until 31 August 1992 her position was officially that of eligible part-time teacher with less than a minimum 18 hours per week and therefore any allowance she qualified for was to be paid on a pro-rata basis which in her case in respect of that particular year would be calculated with reference to 15/22 parts of the full allowance payable.

Secondly in respect of the full claim since 1991 the Department argues that agreement has been reached in the context of the 'Revised Teachers' PCW Proposals' which have recently been concluded in the context of the Programme for Competitiveness and Work (PCW) and part of which proposals consists of the agreement that a teacher with the same qualifications as Ms Sullivan will be paid from now on at the primary degree (1st and 2nd class honours) allowance level and back-dated to 1 July 1994 and the Department argues that this, together with the rest of the proposals is the subject matter of a ballot by all of the teachers' union including the Association of Secondary Teachers Ireland (ASTI) and has been accepted by that union. Ms Sullivan says she voted against this proposal and in any event, seeing that the Department is prepared to pay full rate back to 1 July 1994 this disposes of that particular period but that she continues to pursue her claim in respect of the period from which she commenced work and became eligible for a qualification allowance to 1 July 1994.

In essence, therefore, Ms Sullivan insists that an unlawful deduction continues in respect of the period from which she commenced work until, at least, 1994 and the Department contests that. That is the period we are concerned with and we have to consider the matter in that light.

Evidence/submissions from both sides

Mr Tadgh O'Ruairc, assistant principal officer with the Department of Education, outlined the background to the setting up of the system of qualification allowances for teachers in 1969 and the history of the matter since then. He also outlined the policy decision taken at Department level in relation to the course which was taken by Ms Sullivan in UCC namely the BA (single honours) course and he outlined how the Department, when considering the appropriate level of qualification allowance to apply in that particular case, had regard to the fact as far as it was concerned there was a pass element involved and that the course was one whereby part of the course was taken at honours level and part was taken at pass level and in that respect did not meet the criteria operated by the Department on foot of the policy decision (for qualifications for the higher qualification allowance) namely all subjects be taken to honours level in the final examinations. Mr O'Ruairc conceded that reliance was placed on the college calendar of 1980/1981 which contained a description of the course and conceded that up to 1990 at least, no other contact had been made directly with the college and since 1990 he says there was correspondence with the UCC authority regarding the status of the course. He stressed that the Department of Education was not disputing the academic value of the qualification which had been achieved by Ms Sullivan but that it had made a decision as to the circumstances within which a primary degree (1st or 2nd honours) allowance would be granted and Ms Sullivan did not come within those circumstances.

Mr O'Ruairc relied on the agreed scheme of conciliation open to arbitration for teachers and in particular clauses 8, 18(a), 18(b) and 20(4) all of which he said indicate that matters such as those raised by Ms Sullivan in these proceedings were intended to be dealt with by way of the arbitration/conciliation provided for in the conciliation agreement as a scheme of conciliation and arbitration agreed upon by the Minister for Finance, the Minister for Education, the Irish National Teachers' Organisation, the ASTI, and managerial authorities of secondary schools amongst others. He placed further reliance on the agreed December 1996 revised teachers' PCW proposals in relation to the pay and conditions of teachers where provision was made for, amongst other things, agreement on disputed qualification allowances. Mr O'Ruairc dealt at length with the question as to whether the Department of Education could be considered to be the employer and he contended that it could not and argued that effectively the Department is simply the paying agent and the Board of Management should properly be considered to be the employer in the case of a teacher in that it is the Board of Management and not the Department which exercises real control in most areas of a teacher's work and it was due to the unique set-up of the system of education in Ireland that the Department (as agent of the State) has a role in terms of providing the remuneration of teachers and he explained how the system operated in terms of grants payable when making teachers' incremental salary allowances etc.

He further contended that the alleged differential between the primary degree (pass) allowance which is what Ms Sullivan was allowed and the higher allowance could not be considered to be a deduction within the meaning of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. Since the commencement of her work as a teacher she was always been paid the appropriate rate of incremental salary and always the same allowance from the outset and there has been no change in that. In those circumstances one is not dealing with a-deduction in the sense that she is now receiving less than she did at a previous point in time in her relationship with the Department.

The Tribunal heard detailed submissions from Marie Mulcahy of the ASTI on behalf of Ms Sullivan. She contends that there was ample scope for considering the Department to be the employer in the particular case and referred to various ways in which she contended the Department exercised such controls over pay scales, a role in the pension scheme, setting the entry requirements relating to acceptable qualifications for teachers and the Department's power in relation to maintaining appropriate pupil/teacher ratio and in the context of the redeployment of teachers.

She placed reliance on section 5(1) of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. In reply to Mr O'Ruairc's contention that there was no deduction within the meaning of the 1991 Act, Ms Mulcahy argued that there was a deduction from the outset. She said the conciliation process could not be construed as disentitling Ms Sullivan to make her claim privately under the Payment of Wages Act 1991. She said the Act does not exclude matters which can also be the subject matter of conciliation. Ms Sullivan herself made a submission to the Tribunal and took the Tribunal through the history of her dealings with the Department which she conceded that like it or not the situation is now going to be corrected as far as the period from 1 July 1994 to date is concerned but she wants further backdating. The Tribunal heard from Aine Hyland, Professor of Education at UCC who explained the set up of the BA (Honours) Degree Programme and the two recognised routes to that degree namely the joint honours and single honours. She explained how the Department of Education and the college authority and the National University of Ireland (NUI) would consider that there is no reason for making a distinction between an honours degree obtained by either route, how the single honours involved specialisation in one subject with less weight being given to the second subject, the minor subject, whereas the joint honours programme involves two subjects both of which are given equal weight.

Correspondence between the Department and UCC going back over the previous few years was relied upon in this respect, and Ms Hyland's view is that effectively the Department got it wrong and made a mistake when drawing a distinction between joint honours and single honours for the purpose of awarding qualification allowances to teachers. In the view of the college authority what Ms Sullivan had done in gaining her single honours degree was taking English, her major subject, to honours level and her minor subject, French was also taken at honours level and was taken indeed in common with the other honour students in French. In those circumstances there was no logical reason why the Department should award the qualification allowance appropriate to a primary degree (pass) qualification. Ms Sullivan herself felt that if the Department had made appropriate enquiries as to the status of the course it would have been satisfied that it was in essence an honours degree programme and in all respects she felt she was not treated fairly by the Department. Ms Sullivan cited the example of a foreign person who teaches in this jurisdiction and in respect of whom the Department comes to consider the question of qualification allowances: that enquiry is made in the case of such person as to the precise status of overseas qualifications whereas this is not so in the case of persons in Ms Sullivan's position.

Ms Sullivan felt that when she achieved her BA (single honours) degree and thereafter achieved employment as a secondary school teacher in a state school that she had a legitimate expectation to expect that she would be paid the qualification allowance appropriate to primary degree (1st or 2nd honours).

Ms Sullivan in her final year achieved 2nd class honours in her major subject. Ms Hyland confirmed that in her view there was no doubt that this was an honours degree. Ms Sullivan's qualifications, in the view of Ms Hyland, therefore are those of BA degree with 2nd class honours, grade 2.

Determination

The Tribunal has carefully considered all the submissions made and all the evidence and all the documents submitted to it.

The Tribunal unanimously allows the appeal of Ms Sullivan. 1966

The Tribunal does not accept that the Department is not the employer. The board of management or other managing authority of a school may well have a role in the day to day running of the school and indeed in engaging teachers, interviewing etc. The reality is that such boards of management or other managing authority in relation to state schools have little or no role when it comes to the question of remuneration of teachers which is a most important element and aspect of the relationship between teachers and their employers. The Tribunal considers that the role of the Department of Education goes beyond that of 'paying agent'. The Department is empowered to negotiate teachers' salaries and qualification allowances and makes policy decisions in relation to the type of degree which Ms Sullivan and other teachers have studied for in relation to the status of such degree as regards qualification allowances. The Department has a role in the whole area of maintaining appropriate pupil/teacher ratio indirectly and regulates the number of teachers in any particular school as in the scheme of redeployment. If ultimately redeployment in the case of any particular teacher cannot be settled by agreement, the Minister is empowered to withhold the grant of the sum of money which would go towards paying that particular teacher's salary and effectively has the power to deprive a particular teacher of his or her salary.

In all of those circumstances the Tribunal does not accept that the Department is simply a 'paying agent' which simply pays out the money at the request of the state school concerned. In relation to the question of the hours worked for which a teacher qualifies for his or her monthly salary, the school principal has a role in terms of certifying the hours worked. However in respect of all teachers, when it comes to the question of qualification allowances, these aspects of a teacher's salary involve no role for the school and are something which go to the teacher's particular qualification and are a constant. In fact the school principal describes him or herself as 'employer' on the monthly certification form but the form is not conclusive.

Furthermore because of the minimal role which the board of management or other managerial authority exercises in relation to the whole question of teachers' remuneration especially in the case of a full-time teacher it follows that where a teacher has a complaint/query in relation to his or her salary or takes issue with it the teacher in question is likely to end up dealing with the Department and not the school. When it comes to the question of remuneration, for the Department to say that it is not the employer would effectively mean that as far as the question of remuneration would go the teacher would have no employer which is inconceivable. If a deduction is made from a teacher's salary the school is likely to say that it, having no role in the question of payment of remuneration, cannot be considered to have made such deduction and the Department may say that it is not the employer for the purposes of any aspect of the teacher's employment. It is inconceivable that all of the teachers in the country should not have the benefit of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. It is difficult to see how the board of management could, short of ordering the Department to make a deduction, actually make a deduction from any particular teacher's remuneration.

In all the circumstances we are satisfied there are sufficiently close ties and controls exercised by the Department in relation to individual teachers. We are satisfied that the Department is the employer for the purposes of the Payment of Wages Act 1991.

The Tribunal considers that the non-payment of the qualification allowance appropriate to primary degree (1st or 2nd honours) was an unlawful deduction within the meaning of the 1991 Act.

There is no specific definition of a deduction in the Act; guidance can be taken from the definition of 'wages' in section 1 of the Act:

> Any sums payable to the employee by the employer in connection with his employment, including: . . . .

We consider the word 'payable' to be significant. Whereas Mr O'Ruairc contended that there is no deduction where an employee continues to receive the same amount(and the same composition)of wages from the outset, the Tribunal considers that if an employee does not receive what is properly payable to him or her from the outset then this can amount to a deduction within the meaning of the 1991 Act. We take 'payable' to mean properly payable. The definition of 'wages' goes on to give examples of types of payments which can amount to 'wages' and states that the payments can amount to wages 'whether payable under [his] contract of employment or otherwise. . . .' Although in our view it is not simply a matter of what may have been agreed or arranged or indeed paid from the outset but, in the view of the Tribunal, all sums to which an employee is properly entitled.

An employee may not be aware of his or her full entitlements and an employer may have a greater awareness of the employees entitlements in terms of pay etc. and it would be highly unjust for an employee to lose a claim under the Payment of Wages Act 1991 for an unlawful deduction simply because an employer, being aware of the employee's proper entitlement, chose, unknown to the employee, to pay less than that from the outset.

As to whether the primary degree (1st or 2nd honours) allowance was properly payable to Ms Sullivan we find that in all the circumstances it was. We are satisfied that the BA (single honours) programme was in all respects an honours degree programme and could not in any respect be considered to be a pass degree programme. We are satisfied that this is what was envisaged for that degree programme, that such was set up by the college authorities and indeed the Senate of the NUI through the normal evaluation process for university courses.

We are satisfied there was no justification for the Department to have applied, from 1991 in Ms Sullivan's case, the qualification allowance appropriate to the primary degree (pass). If indeed a policy decision was taken whereby Ms Sullivan's degree was considered to be more appropriate to primary degree (pass) qualification allowance then the decision was wholly unreasonable and illogical. In respect of the rate from 1 July 1994 to date and for the future the Department has agreed through the PCW negotiations with the ASTI to pay the higher qualification allowance in respect of degrees such as Ms Sullivan obtained and in respect of the period prior to that since Ms Sullivan commenced employment. We find that Ms Sullivan is entitled to compensation calculated by reference to the differential amounts between primary degree (pass) qualification allowance amount and primary degree (1st and 2nd honours) amount for the relevant period with the appropriate adjustment being made to take account of the fact that in respect of the academic year, August 1991 to July 1992, Ms Sullivan worked 15 hours per week.

The case for the claimant :
Ms Elizabeth Tierney the claimant, commenced employment with the respondent, a German tour operator company DER Ireland Ltd. in November 1997 on a part time basis -four days per week .Her duties as an accounts executive included organising package tours, dealing with world-wide accounts and paying hotel invoices by computer. She worked on an hourly basis and initially did not have a contract of employment. She was treated well by management and in June 1998, because she wanted to remain in the company, she signed a contract.

In April 1999 "everything changed for her" she said. She was approached by both her supervisors and asked to work on Wednesdays, her free day. Ms Lenihan told her that because there was a lot to be done it would be appreciated if she would work, the claimant said that it was awkward but that she could work " the odd day". Ms. Tierney stated that she was engaged in a private counselling practice on Wednesdays.

On her return from two weeks holiday Ms Tierney said she noticed some abusive and bullying behaviour towards her. Ms Lenihan, she said, would be friendly and speak to her and then for a week or two she would not even say good morning to her. Ms Tierney also gave evidence of further altercations between herself and Aisling her other supervisor, regarding annual leave and criticisms of the standard of her work. The claimant asked to speak to Ms Lenihan and Aisling in an effort " to clear the air". At the meeting, Ms. Lenihan laughed and Aisling was aggressive towards her.She felt there was no positive outcome to the meeting.

Things deteriorated from then, the claimant felt that she was being watched each time she took a break, remarks were made about her work, she was cold-shouldered. She did not feel comfortable, she was being intimidated by them. Ms Tierney spoke to Mr. Keogh about her concerns and they met for an hour on 10 June 1999 to discuss matters. He told her that some of the comments which she was making for example with regard to her supervisors competence, he had heard before. He seemed to listen, he wanted facts and proof of what she was telling him. Mr. Keogh asked her to write down her complaints and told her that he would speak to Ms Lenihan and Aisling and asked her to report back to him in two weeks to see if there was any improvement in their behaviour towards her. The claimant felt , however, that things got worse after the meeting, there was no improvement in the atmosphere she said.

The company moved offices shortly after and Ms Tierney applied for and was granted four days leave at the time. She returned to the new building and neither Ms Lenihan nor Aisling greeted her. She had to ask where the computer was, was told she wouldn't be getting a swipe card. She needed a swipe card to gain access to the building and to clock in. She was told to write down her start/finishing times and break times. She was told by Ms Linehan that she did not officially exist, that " Germany" did not want her there.

Ms Lenihan enquired a week later while checking invoices, if she(the claimant) was finding the drive too long to the new building. The claimant said no, that it took an extra ten minutes only. Ms Linehan again mentioned that the claimant was not wanted in the office and the only reason she was there was because "Kevin wanted her not Franco in Germany".

Lorraine, another fellow employee , was doing similar work to the claimant. The claimant had no problems with her initially but noticed that certainly she had become "a little disrespectful" as time progressed. Ms Tierney felt that Ms Linehan "was bringing Lorraine into it more often". An altercation occurred between the claimant and Lorraine on 15 July while the claimant would " take to heart " . The Tribunal was told that Ms Mary Lenihan, the supervisor felt her relationship with the claimant was based on trust and respect and a lot of the staff looked to Liz for advice on personal matters as well as work related issues. Ms Lenihan felt that the claimant had over reacted to the remark and that one incident like that could not result in Reactive Anxiety Disorder.

Mr. Kevin Keogh, General Manager, said in evidence that he valued the claimants contribution to the company and told her when she rang that he did not want to lose her and that " She could not throw away her livelihood over one sentence " The Tribunal was told that the claimant felt she could not return to work and Mr. Keogh asked her to take the next day off and come in on Monday when she had relaxed and thought things through. As the claimant could not be persuaded he asked her to send in a written statement describing the whole incident and her resignation if that was what she was intent in doing.
The supervisor and the General Manager were both surprised to receive a sick note on the following Wednesday.

Determination:
The Tribunal is unanimous in its finding that the claimant has not succeeded in discharging the onus placed upon her under the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 1993 to prove her claim that she was constructively dismissed.

This is a difficult burden to discharge, and the claimant must show that it was reasonable for her to consider herself dismissed, owing to the conduct of her employer. Central to this is that she shows that she has pursued to a reasonable extent all internal avenues of appeal without a satisfactory or reasonable outcome having been achieved.

The Tribunal finds that in this case the claimant has not succeeded in establishing this. The Tribunal finds that the respondent company acted, overall, in a fair and reasonable manner.

While the Tribunal acknowledges that the incident involving Ms. Tierneys co-worker Lorraine amounted to unacceptable behaviour in the workplace, we find that the company equally acknowledges this to be the case.

The claimant was urged by the company to withdraw her resignation and give the matter some further thought. We find that she did not take advantage of this opportunity. We find that her subsequent submission of a sick certificate to the company, several days after the deadline allowed to her for reconsideration had lapsed, without prior or simultaneous added communication to the company that she did not consider her employment with them terminated, was not reasonable on her part. When the claimant did not return to the workplace on the Monday, her employer was entitled to consider that her resignation was confirmed. We have noted the case of Keane -v- Western Health Board UD940/1988 cited by Counsel for the claimant. We find this to be not persuasive in the present case as in Keane the resignation was sought to be withdrawn before it became effective, and the request was most specific and unambiguous and made in written form.

sorting out invoices. Lorraine used abusive language to the claimant, all workers laughed and one or two were surprised and told Lorraine to apologise. She apologised to them and eventually to the claimant. The claimant was totally humiliated by the laughter. Aisling came and asked what had happened and the language was repeated. The claimant finished what she was doing and returned to her desk. She was shaking and could not continue working, she felt quite ill. She could not concentrate on her work and decided to go home. She asked a colleague to inform Aisling and Ms Lenihan that she had gone home.

She phoned Mr. Keogh in Germany and told him what had occurred, how events had escalated and deteriorated since their meeting. He told her he would ring her on the following morning 16 July 1999 between 8:30.a.m and 9:30.a.m. to discuss the matter. He contacted her at 5:15 p.m. . The claimant was upset, told him how intimidated she felt because of her supervisors attitude and behaviour. Mr. Keogh, while he did not suggest anything,said that maybe they would find a way through the difficulties. The claimant told Mr. Keogh that she felt at that stage that all she could do was to resign, She could not work there anymore. He asked her to submit her resignation and furnish the information which he had requested on 10 June 1999 by the time that he returned to Galway.(Ms Tierney had not given a written account of events to Mr. Keogh as she had been asked to do at the meeting of 10 June1999).

She went to her doctor on Monday 19 July 1999 because she could not sleep or eat for a number of weeks beforehand. He gave her a medical certificate. She submitted the medical certificate to Mr Keogh.
Correspondence between the claimant and Mr. Keogh ensued resulting in differences in their interpretations of what the claimant meant when she told Mr. Keogh on the phone that she would resign and the subsequent submission of the medical certificate.

During cross examination the claimant acknowledged that the company had facilitated her by allowing her to work a four day week and that from "Germanys'" point of view she was a somewhat " unofficial" person in the scheme.

Ms. Tierney told the Tribunal that she did not recall Mr. Keogh telling her she was a good worker and asking her to stay on when she rang him on 15 July 1999. All he had said was that "maybe we'll find a way through this ". He did not ask her "to sleep on it" she said.

She could not revert to Mr. Keogh within two weeks from 10 June 1999 because the company were moving office. She did not think that he would be interested while the move was taking place, she said.

The case for the Respondent:
Ms Laura Curley and Ms. Marie Fahy, co-workers of the claimant who were in the vicinity when the remark was made said, in evidence, that Lorraine apologised immediately albeit in a general way and they did not feel the remark was something

We note the claimant's evidence that the company made no specific proposals as to changes in the workplace prior to her return; however we do not find that we are in a position to assume that some mutually acceptable changes would not have been forthcoming had she returned.

The claimants claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts is disallowed.

Claimant(s):

Respondent(s):

The determination of the Tribunal was as follows:-

An unfair dismissal claim was lodged in respect of an employment which commenced in April 2005 and ended in late June 2010.

Grounds of Claim

In the grounds of claim it was stated that the claimant had commenced in the role of Environmental Compliance Officer but that the role had evolved through promotion to include, at various times, management of Civic Amenity Sites, Contract and Site Management, Facility Manager for Ballymount, transport co-ordination, environmental management on all Dublin sites and the Midlands Region and commercial tendering. The claimant's job title/role at the date of the termination of employment was Regional Environmental Manager.

On 28 April 2010 the claimant was informed by her line manager that he had been informed by the General Manager of the Respondent company that the Compliance department had been targeted for redundancies, that both he and she were in danger of being made redundant and that the General Manager and the Human Resource Manager would be requesting a meeting with her later that day.

On 29 April 2010, during the course of a meeting with the General Manager and the Human Resource Manager the claimant was informed that the Compliance structure was being flattened and that her role would cease to exist.

On 26 May 2010 the claimant was furnished with a formal notice of redundancy and a form RP50.

GK [former managing director] gave evidence that the company decided at the meeting in a hotel in county Louth on the 23rd April 2010 that the decision was taken to dismiss the claimant and another employee by reason of redundancy. GK said he was sure of this and that "the decision was made at the [named hotel]. Their names were on the board"

Further or in the alternative, the claimant believed that she had been unfairly selected for redundancy and that fair procedures had not been applied.

In those circumstances the claimant believed that the termination of her employment constituted an unfair dismissal and she sought reinstatement.

Grounds of Defence

It was contended that on 26 June 2010 the claimant had been made redundant by the respondent from her employment as part of a company restructuring which justified the termination of her contract such that she had no claim against the respondent under unfair dismissal legislation.

It was accepted that the claimant had commenced employment with the respondent in the position of Regional Environment Manager. Following an extensive review of the business, the decision was made, at a meeting in a hotel in County Louth on the 23rd April 2010, to restructure the Compliance Department due to a decline in turnover and ongoing losses coupled with a reduction in waste tonnage processed due to the loss of contracts. As a result, the company proposed to implement a new structure which would affect the Compliance function in that a number of roles including the role of Regional Environmental Manager would cease to exist.

The claimant was the only person who worked in the role of Regional Environment Manager and, following her departure, the role ceased to exist.

The claimant was formally notified of the potential redundancy on 29 April 2010 and, following a lengthy consultation process which involved several meetings, she was advised on 26 May (2010) that her position was being made redundant and she was given notice that this would come into effect on 26 June 2010. The respondent gave evidence that the claimant did not appeal the decision.

Determination:

Having considered the totality of the evidence the Tribunal is not satisfied that the respondent acted fairly and reasonably when addressing the need to reduce the number of employees. When an employer is making an employee redundant, while retaining other employees, the selection criteria being used should be objectively applied in a fair manner. While there are no hard and fast rules as to what constitutes the criteria to be adopted nevertheless the criteria adopted will come under close scrutiny if an employee claims that he/she was unfairly selected for redundancy. The employer must follow the agreed procedure when making the selection. Where there is no agreed procedure in relation to selection for redundancy, as in this case, then the employer must act fairly and reasonably.

The Tribunal noted that the respondent kept taking away parts of the claimant's job and that interviewing had taken place on 12 May 2010 for an alternative position within the company for which a job specification was not formulated until 14 May 2010. The Tribunal finds this most surprising. The Tribunal also takes the view that the claimant could have done a health-and-safety manager job which ultimately took on a construction-related title given that she had no construction-related qualification. The respondent had tried to row back and disadvantage the claimant.

The Tribunal does not accept that the Respondent acted fairly and reasonably in this case for the following reasons:

1. the decision to make the claimant redundant was taken at a meeting in a hotel in County Louth on the 23rd April 2010. The chairman of the company (SD) attended this meeting;
2. there was no serious or worthwhile consultation with the claimant prior to making her redundant. The consultation should be real and substantial. The decision to make the claimant's position redundant was taken before the consultation process commenced;
3. no suitable or substantial consideration was given to alternatives to dismissing the claimant by reason of redundancy;
4. there was no worthwhile discussion in relation to the criteria used for selecting the claimant. The selection criteria should apply to all employees working in the same area as the claimant but should also consider other positions which the claimant is capable of doing.

The Tribunal finds that the claimant was unfairly selected for redundancy and is satisfied that the respondent has contravened Section 6 (3) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 which states:

'Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, if an employee was dismissed due to redundancy but the circumstances constituting the redundancy applied equally to one or more other employees in similar employment with the same employer who have not been dismissed, and either—

(a) the selection of that employee for dismissal resulted wholly or mainly from one or more of the matters specified in subsection (2) of this section or another matter that would not be a ground justifying dismissal, or

(b) he was selected for dismissal in contravention of a procedure (being a procedure that has been agreed upon by or on behalf of the employer and by the employee or a trade union, or an excepted body under the Trade Union Acts, 1941 and 1971, representing him or has been established by the custom and practice of the employment concerned) relating to redundancy and there were no special reasons justifying a departure from that procedure, then the dismissal shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an unfair dismissal.'

Employers must act reasonably in taking a decision to dismiss an employee on the grounds of redundancy. Indeed, Section 5 of the Unfair Dismissals (Amendment) Act, 1993, provides that the reasonableness of the employer's conduct is now an essential factor to be considered in the context of all dismissals. Section 5, inter alia, stipulates that:

".....in determining if a dismissal is an unfair dismissal, regard may be had……to the reasonableness or otherwise of the conduct (whether by act or omission) of the employer in relation to the dismissal"

The fact that the claimant did not appeal the dismissal was considered by the Tribunal but the Tribunal notes that the appeal would have to be made to SD, the chairman of the Company. The Tribunal further notes that SD was at the meeting which took the decision to dismiss the claimant. Therefore, it would be entirely inappropriate, and contrary to fair procedures, that he should hear the appeal.

The Tribunal is unanimous in finding, under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to 2007, that the claimant was unfairly dismissed because she was unfairly selected for redundancy. The Tribunal deems compensation to be the most appropriate remedy and awards the claimant fifty thousand euro (€50,000.00) under the said legislation. For the avoidance of doubt this award is in addition to all payments already received by her in connection with the termination of her employment including a redundancy payment of €10,014.00 paid to the claimant under the Redundancy Payments Acts, 1967 to 2007.

Background

Counsel for the claimant in an opening statement told the Tribunal that there was a culture of bullying and harassment in the respondent company in circumstances in which it related to the claimant's ability to carry out his job. He outlined to the Tribunal that eight witnesses would give evidence on behalf of the claimant: a senior social worker, a care worker, a general practitioner, a step brother of a former patient in the respondent, a former relative who was also a social worker with the respondent and a character witness. The claimant had a good working relationship with the respondent until around the year 2001. The claimant communicated with the Minister for Health regarding a draft report, which was prepared around 2003. He highlighted what he thought were the deficiencies in relation to the content of the report.

Claimant's Case

The claimant told the Tribunal that he graduated with a BA Honours in Psychology from UCD in 1983. He had a Masters in Clinical Psychology from UCD in 1984, a Masters from Southern Illinois University, USA in 1987. He obtained a PhD in June 1990 from the California School of Professional Psychology Los Angeles. He commenced employment with the respondent on 5th March 1991. During his tenure with the respondent he co-wrote a staff-training programme on challenging behaviour and how to deal with difficult behaviour of individuals with learning disabilities. Prior to that he had been involved in a research project, which was assessing the nature of challenging behaviour, on which he had written numerous articles.

One of the most enjoyable aspects of his job was supervising a one-week holiday camp in Brittas Bay, which was a very different aspect to his work but he thoroughly enjoyed it and it grounded him in the kind of work that he was involved in. For many years he was the nominated disc jockey at the holiday camp. That was a highly enjoyable experience for him and completely different from the more formal or academic background that he had. He endeavoured to strike a balance between looking at the broader picture and the human side of the service that the respondent was supposed to provide.

The claimant stated that he experienced difficulties around 2001. He wrote to the Chairperson of the Board, as he was horrified at the circumstances of the death of a client of the respondent Mr. P McK. He wrote a letter to the board in which he expressed concern about the culture of bullying within the organisation. There had been some instances and one in particular where a long-standing staff member of twenty-three years he believed was treated in a very unfair fashion, which ended up with him leaving the organisation. The claimant personally expressed his concern about this to the CEO of the organisation on a number of occasions. A patient Mr. PMcK was sent to a nursing home against his family's wishes. There had been a catalogue of complaints about the nursing home prior to the client being sent there. The family of Mr. PMcK was brought to the High Court compelling them to send him to the nursing home. The High Court was informed by a number of senior people from the respondent that there had never been any complaint about the nursing home. He was not aware of the full circumstances of the death of the client at the time. He wrote an article in a national newspaper in which he used the words, "we dump them into nursing homes". Following that the family of Mr. McK contacted him and it was at this point that the claimant said he was no longer prepared to work in an organisation that treated a family in this fashion and that he was going to do anything that he possibly could to address or redress this situation as a professional. The claimant highlighted his concerns; he had done this on a number of occasions about the use of nursing homes as being very inappropriate places for people with learning disabilities. The CEO Mr. PL asked him to give him an alternative and the claimant told Mr. PL that using a gym in the local school with twenty beds would be better than sending them to a nursing home because they would at least have the respondent's staff.

The claimant was unhappy that a man, in relation to a long-standing staff member, for twenty-three years a very dedicated member of staff, was embroiled in what the claimant subsequently realised was a fairly standard procedure. The claimant raised this matter with the CEO on the administrative level. His immediate manager was Mr. MM and the claimant spoke to him. Mr.M M was sympathetic to his concerns but he did not seem to be in a position to do anything substantial about it. The claimant wrote to the board on 3rd September 2001 outlining his concerns. The chairperson of the Board Ms. S replied to him and informed him that he needed in the first instance to engage in the internal grievance procedures within the respondent. Three individuals were nominated to the internal grievance procedure. The claimant maintained that two of these gentlemen had been involved in the bullying of the staff member who had left, the one that he was particularly concerned about. The claimant replied that while he maintained that he would still be willing to engage with the process he would not engage in the process with those two individuals. The people that were investigating his legitimate complaint would need to be independent. That form of internal grievance was not proceeded with. It became clear to the claimant at that point that perhaps it was not appropriate to engage in an internal grievance procedure because he did not have a personal grievance. He wrote to the Board initially about the culture of bullying. He commented in his original letter to the Board that he had spoken up and he realised he was now likely to become a target of this bullying.

During that time he was threatened with disciplinary action if he did not co-operate with the internal grievance procedure. He received a letter from the CEO. Mr. PL and the claimant's recollection of the letter was that if he did not co-operate with the legitimate internal grievance procedure of the respondent and if he took his grievance outside of the respondent's remit without engaging in that first then he would be subjected to disciplinary action. Even though his request was not a standard grievance procedure, he highlighted issues not to do with him but issues to do with the direction that the respondent was taking and he highlighted the fact that this process did not seem to be appropriate to address those concerns that he had sent to the board.

He then received a letter from the respondent solicitors in which they outlined that they were now going to formulate an investigative sub committee of the Board. The claimant's response to this was that he felt that the presence of Mr. R on that committee would not render it objective. His reason for stating that was that Mr. R had business ties with the respondent. Mr. R's company supplied various domestic supplies to the respondent and the claimant was aware that Mr. R was a friend of the CEO Mr. L. Again the claimant highlighted the fact that these issues were too serious to be treated in a manner where he would not get an objective investigation.

He was not sure if the Board wrote to him in December 2002 or January 2003 informing him that because he had not co-operated with either of the procedures within the respondent the case was now concluded. The claimant responded that the case was not concluded and that he would now have to deal with the matter outside the respondent. He wrote to the Board and told them that the matter was definitely not concluded and that he would take it outside of the respondent and that prompted him in June 2003 to write to the Minister for Health highlighting his concerns and he enclosed his original letter to the Board. The claimant received a reply stating the matter was being passed over to the ERHA for them to set up an investigation. He was subsequently informed that Mr. MH was investigating his complaints and Mr. MH wrote to the claimant. The claimant met with Mr. MH on 24th September in an off site location for an initial meeting. At this meeting he highlighted his concerns to Mr. MH. The claimant and Mr. MH arranged to meet so that the claimant could give Mr. MH a formal response on 10th October. The claimant asked him before the meeting commenced if he had met the family of Mr. PMcK who had died and he responded no. The claimant asked him if he would be meeting with the family of Mr. PMcK and Mr. MH responded no. The claimant told Mr. MH that he would have nothing more to say to him because it was not an objective investigation. Mr. MH subsequently prepared a document, which was furnished to the claimant in October 2003. Mr. MH told the claimant that he had not co-operated with the procedure. The claimant wrote to either the Minister or the CEO Mr. L, who sent him the report of the ERHA, at the time highlighting the deficiencies in Mr. MH's report, primarily the fact that he did not interview the family of Mr. PMcK. Mr. MH did not report his contacts with the staff member who the claimant had highlighted in his original letter to the Board; he did not interview key clinicians who had difficulties with the treatment of Mr. PMcK at the time he was sent to the nursing home.

The claimant received a letter from the respondent on 17th July 2003 approximately one month after he had written to the Minister for Health, informing him that there were a number of concerns in relation to his performance and conduct. Eight allegations were levelled against the claimant. One was that the claimant was a member of St. Joseph's Parents and Friends Association of St. Ita's. St. It's had no connection with the respondent. The claimant participated in that committee in his own time because he was extremely concerned about the incarceration of vulnerable people in the most appalling circumstances and he highlighted this on numerous occasions. He was on the Parents and Friends Committee of St. Joseph's, which was the learning disability section of St. Ita's. The allegations that the respondent made was that he was the parent representative to the committee, which he was not. The claimant read out the entire letter dated the 17th July 2003 as follows:

"As you have been advised by Lucy Walsh, Acting Head of the Psychology Department, I wish to meet with yourself and Lucy on Friday morning in my office to discuss with you a number of serious concerns in relation to your conduct and performance. These concerns relate to the following incidents: Your election campaign in early 2002: your withdrawal from the St. Michael's House Challenging Behaviour Programme and your subsequent memo dated November 5th 2002; the implications of your expert witness role in relation to Cregg House, June 2002; the implications of your role as a parent nominee on the visiting Committee to St. Ita's.

Issues arising from your meeting with a client's sister with Dr. McDonald on March 19th. Glenamoy, referring to your memo of April 7th 2003 to Mr. John Birthistle.

Your memo May 5th 2003 to Mr. Birthistle issues arising in relation to another client's sister and Raheny respite on April 4th 2003. At the meeting on Friday I intend to outline the issues of concern in relation to each of these matters in detail. I invite you to bring along your representative to this meeting."

The claimant's understanding after he sent a letter to the Minister for Health was that a campaign was going to be waged to damage his reputation to put stress on him that ultimately he may or may not be able to endure. Of the eight matters listed in that letter there were no indication that there was likely to be complaints arising in relation to these issues prior to 17th July.

The claimant was appointed as a committee member of the visiting committee of St. Ita's probably around 2002. He acted as an advocate and as somebody who was seriously concerned and as a psychologist who had a certain prominence within the learning disability field he felt a certain obligation to advocate on behalf of people being ill-treated, the most vulnerable people in society who have nobody to advocate for them. He could not describe the stress of being presented with this as an offence or a serious concern, the fact that he would spend his free time working on a voluntary basis with a group of elderly parents who were trying to make conditions better for their children.

The claimant stood as an independent candidate in the general election in 2002 in Dublin North East at the request of a parents' group in Limerick. They were setting up an alliance of eight candidates and they asked the claimant if he would consider standing in the election. His election manager was a parent of a child with a learning disability. The claimant asked permission to use the picture of the man who was on the election poster, and his parents were delighted to grant permission. The person on the poster was delighted and he subsequently had the poster in his bedroom. This was construed that the claimant violated the respondent's policy on media, that he did not get permission from the Chairman of the respondent to use this man's picture on his election material. It was also described as unprofessional, a breach of his profession to do that. The night before the election the CEO Mr. PL telephoned him at home to wish him well and he has numerous witnesses to that.

The Challenging Behaviour programme was a four-day training programme for staff that had to deal with people with learning disability. It taught them strategies to prevent difficult behaviour and how to subsequently manage them should they happen. It was a very preventative model.

The claimant contacted the training department at 4 o'clock on 4th November to establish if the material was ready for the course. At that time he was informed that there were going to be six members of St. Ita's staff in attendance at the course. He had not been consulted about this and this was the first time he heard about this. This was in 2002 and eight months prior to these serious concerns, it was discussed at the Psychology Department about the inappropriateness of including these individuals at a training programme, the disruptive effect that they had on the training programme and the necessity to plan for these individuals, if they were coming on board to the respondent.

The claimant in a letter addressed to the head of training Ms. B dated 5th November 2003 outlined his dissatisfaction. as follows:

"At a minimum this demonstrates a lack of courtesy on your part. The reality is that it is extremely shoddy practice and one in which I refuse to participate in. For the record no consultation has taken place with the Psychology Department regarding the inclusion of participants from outside the organisation on challenging behaviour. No consultation has taken place with the Psychology Department regarding the appropriateness of combining staff of an institutional setting with St. Michael's House staff on the course. Had such consultation happened you would have learned about how disruptive such a mix can be and has been in the past. No information was made available to the trainers of today's course regarding the altered make up of the group attending the course. With 76 of St. Michael's House staff on a waiting list to attend the Challenging Behaviour course it is incomprehensible and regrettable that external participants are given priority for attendance on this course."

The next concern that the claimant had was the implications of his expert witness role in relation to Cregg House in June 2002. A family from the North West contacted him to establish if he would do an assessment on the plight of their son, a 19-year-old man with autism, because they were dissatisfied with the circumstances in which he was being held at Cregg House. Cregg House did not have any connection with the respondent that he was aware of. Cregg House was a service for people with learning disabilities in the Sligo region. As far as he was aware it did not have any connection with the respondent. This case was scheduled for the High Court or one of the courts. He did an assessment on the circumstances of where the man was living and a Court case was then scheduled. The case was settled before it commenced.

The next issue arose as a result of the claimant meeting with a client's sister and a professional colleague on March 19th 2003. This was a situation in which both Dr. McD and the claimant were involved in treating a client. The claimant had never once received a set of minutes from Dr. McD in the way they were presented to him. He had never seen these minutes and what was cited to him by Ms. PD. Ms. PD outlined that it was unacceptable and unprofessional for conflicting messages to be given to a family at a meeting with two professionals; this was disturbing for the family and potentially undermined their confidence in the service. The nub of the issue was that the claimant had requested two family members to hold off on a sale of a family home to allow a client from the respondent an appropriate period of time to get over the death of a relative. Dr. McD did not express an opinion in relation to this matter to the claimant. The outcome was the family were sorry that the house had gone. The respondent told him that it would not be very satisfactory where the client was going to be accommodated but it was up to the respondent to work with him in the matter. The claimant stated that Ms. PD used the term "righteous advocate" in a disparaging way and she described the claimant as a righteous advocate in how he operated in these situations. Ms. PD indicated that a consistent pattern of the claimant adopting his righteous advocate role, which she believed, impacted on the claimant's contractual obligation with the respondent. It was referred to further in her notes that it was in conflict with the claimant's contractual obligation to be a righteous advocate. The claimant was proud of the term righteous advocate if it was genuinely meant but he believed that in the context the term righteous advocate was used to undermine him.

The claimant's understanding of concern number six related to the placement of a twenty one year old man with Down's Syndrome who had a mild learning disability, he was verbal, he was ambulant and he was placed in a residential home where there were five individuals with profound challenging behaviours, all of them non verbal: some autistic behaviour, some with behavioural problems such as banging their heads off walls, walking around the house naked and self induced fits. They had the catalogue of challenging behaviours. He felt that it was entirely inappropriate to place a verbal, mildly disabled young man, who had some challenging behaviours into such a setting. Glenamoy was a complex of houses on the respondent campus, where generally they are campus based, and most of the individuals there have some level of serious challenging behaviour combined with more moderate or severe learning disabilities. He had been involved in four of these houses (the Glens) because challenging behaviour was his specialty and he enjoyed his work there. He enjoyed working with individuals with challenging behaviour. The claimant was the actual psychologist to this house and he found out it that was this man was being moved to the house when he told him in the canteen. The claimant did not say that this was an aspect of the bullying that was going on in the respondent but it was totally inappropriate. A consultation did not take place in relation to this matter with Ms. PD. The claimant was invited to one meeting, which was a general meeting. The claimant expressed his clear dissatisfaction before this man was placed in this house.

Item number seven in the letter related to a named client. The issue was that the claimant had attended a staff meeting where a number of staff were crying. It was one of the residential houses in the Glens complex. The meeting was about the care and lack of resources for a six foot five adult, a fully ambulant, physically strong autistic adult. The staff cried over the lack of resources, their inability to manage and the fact that they felt endangered in the situation. He highlighted the issues around May 5th 2003. He was extremely concerned that staff were getting hurt. One of the difficulties when staff were not being sufficiently supported in the situation was there was a high rate of staff turnover. The last thing that people who had a propensity for challenging behaviour need was change because they do not deal with change very well. In the course of six months the staff in this house had virtually changed 100%. The claimant dealt with inexperienced staff who were crying. As a clinician the claimant worked with what facilities are there and he advocated for resources to be provided, particularly in situations where he had an extremely difficult resident.

The concern that was listed as number eight in the letter was an issue, which arose in relation to a named client's sister and Raheny Respite in April 4th 2003. Ms. PD circulated a copy of a note from Mr. DD a middle manager to Mr. ND who was a senior manager with the respondent on 14 April 2003. Ms. PD advised that it was completely unacceptable for the claimant to actively encourage this divisiveness between family and the staff at a local level. It was an inappropriate forum in which to deal with these issues and it was an unprofessional intervention. Ms. PD said that she believed that the issues questioned the claimant's full understanding and acceptance of the limitations under which the respondent operated. The claimant read the letter dated the 4th April 2003, which is as follows:

"On the afternoon of 4th April a service user from Kilmore Road local centre was admitted to Raheny Respite unit, he had sustained a fracture and was in a splint so there was some concern about the managing of his care. Kim Flood, Head of the Unit, Raheny Respite, advised me the client's sister came to the Unit that afternoon and spoke to Kim. She said that she wished Brian to remain in Raheny until such time as a residential place was found for him. Kim advised that she could not make that decision. Una stated that she had been advised by Mark Harrold that 'he who shouts the loudest will get a service' and as Brian was on the waiting list so long he should get a place. Una seemed well versed in 'how to work the system. Kim referred back to the claimant in relation to the longer term plight of this man."

The claimant stated that he never said, "he who shouts the loudest will get a service". A meeting took place on 24th September. Present at the meeting were Ms. PD, Ms. LW, Ms. SB and Mr. RY from Impact. At that meeting the claimant responded to the eight serious concerns as described in their minutes and he very clearly outlined how each of those issues were completely spurious. He rejected every single one of them and he presented the arguments that he had presented to the Tribunal in the morning. He felt it was a calculated attempt to undermine his integrity, to place an unreasonable amount of stress on him and ultimately he supposed to leave the respondent. Ms. PD felt that the claimant was over elaborating in his dissatisfaction and he was seriously dissatisfied with the tactics that were being adopted to undermine him. Ms. PD left the room at one point and she came back and the claimant softened his statement. The claimant's concerns about this process did not alter at all and he was most dissatisfied by it. He felt that each of these issues was manufactured and designed to undermine him. His concern was about the culture of bullying in the respondent dated back to the CEO and his manner of doing business, it was similar to the previous case that he talked about, the trumped up allegations and then waiting it out until the persona finally broke.

Portion of a letter written by the claimant on 6th November stated as follows:

"I would suggest that in order to limit any further damage to the Organisation the following actions be taken by you. An unconditional withdrawal in writing of the eight allegations levelled at me, as outlined by you at the meeting of 22nd July. A written assurance that there will be no repeat of this type of harassment of me at any time in the future. A commitment by you to investigate Mr. Birthistle's actions in relation to the Glenamoy incident with a view to ensuring that there is no repeat of this type of dismissive treatment of me or any other psychologist in the Organisation. An assurance in writing that I will be accorded the courtesy of being informed on a timely basis by the Training Department of any changes in circumstances regarding the course I am giving, such as the inclusion of people from outside of St. Michael's House. You will note that I am not seeking an apology for any of this debacle, as that would be of limited value, however I will be reserving judgment on your bullying practice for a considerable time to come. The wider issues of concern in this organisation are being addressed in a different forum, I have kept the subject matter of this letter to the issues you raised in such a regrettable manner on 22nd July 2003. Should you choose to ignore this letter or to proceed with your allegations on what you describe as a disciplinary footing I will welcome the opportunity to highlight your actions and those of your cohorts in a much more public forum."

The claimant did not receive a reply to that letter. The claimant did not receive any communication from anyone in management as to the status or outcome of these concerns. The claimant stated that there was some other issue about a locked door in one of the residential units that emerged in the course of another investigation, and this was one of the houses to which he was attached, and a process was commenced along these lines which was investigating why the door was locked for this client. It appeared by the time he had left that they were trying to narrow this down to being his responsibility. He viewed it as a further attempt to put undue pressure on him, which it did. This was around January, February, March 2004 and the person responsible for conducting that enquiry was Ms. PD.

The reason that he submitted his resignation was that there was nothing happening on his concerns. The claimant was supposed to continue working as a clinician in circumstances where he felt no matter what he did somebody somewhere would try and construct a case against him. The claimant at this stage had exhausted all of his sources or avenues of communication because it was clear the CEO did not have the capacity to take a broader view and a responsible view of the issues that he had raised initially. He did not see that there was anywhere else he could go with this issue. The claimant resigned in March 2004 and left in April. The claimant is currently employed. He works for the Health Service Executive in the North East region and is based in Dundalk and Drogheda. He is working as a half time senior clinical psychologist. He commenced employment on 26th April 2004. He earns a salary of between €35,000 and €40,000.

The claimant gave further direct evidence to the Tribunal on 16th January 2006. The claimant said he was satisfied in relation to the family of Mr. PMcK and that he had investigated thoroughly the circumstances of his death. It was the catalyst for him saying that he was not going to see further families being hurt in this way so that is why it was a very significant case and relevant to his case. He regretted that Mr. MH did not do a similarly thorough investigation of the culture of bullying that was such a feature of the respondent and continues to be. When he wrote to the Department of Health in June 2003 it was a month later when they levelled these eight other allegations, which were not specific to Mr. FS. Because he had been trying to get some independent investigation or something done about both a valued colleague and also a family who were availing of the services of the respondent. The lead up to his constructive dismissal was from 2001 when he had written to the board. The campaign against him started in July 22 when Ms. PD invited him to a meeting. In 2003 the respondent claimed that it had 129 clinicians and the number of clinicians that left was three. He could name five people on the investigations that he had completed and they were very limited investigations. He stated that a figure of 129 clinicians was preposterous. There were at most 45 clinicians within the organisation. There was a significant change in the attitude of Mr. MH from his report as presented in October 2003 to that which was presented in 2005. Mr. MH met with the family and that was the material difference. Mr. MH obtained further information as to what had happened. Up to that Mr. MH had only been acting on the information he had received from the respondent, which was why he would have viewed it as a pointless exercise to contribute to his investigation in the absence of meeting with the family of Mr. PMcK.

In cross-examination when asked by counsel for the respondent when did he make the decision to resign he responded that his personal circumstances had changed. His wife had just had their first child and he was not prepared to put his wife through the stress involved. He decided early in 2004 that he had enough He tendered his resignation in March 2004 and he probably made the decision in March. The claimant had attended for interview in March 2003 and he was offered the job in January 2004. He accepted his current job shortly before he resigned from the respondent. The reason that the decided to change from full time to half time was that he wanted to spend time with his son. He did some writing and had just launched a book. He was in the process of completing a book on parent training.

The claimant wrote to the Minister for Health in June The matter was referred to the Eastern Regional Health Authority who then appointed Mr. MH to conduct an enquiry into his complaints.

A letter addressed to regional chief executive (Mr. H) of the Eastern Regional Health Authority stated as follows: -

"Dear Mr. Hynes,

I refer to your request of 25th August to carry out an independent assessment of the above matter. I have carried out a detailed assessment of the issues involved in accordance with the terms of reference outlined by you. I attach my report and the outcome of my enquiries. I can confirm that I have received full co-operation from St. Michael's House and relevant staff in the ERHA. I regret the delay in submitting the final report, some of the people that I needed to speak to were on leave at various times and this led to the delay in completing the report. I have examined the original complaints and spoken to the person who made them. The person who made the complaints did not give me any details to support his case despite being given ample time and opportunity to do so. I have examined in some detail his complaints in respect of the client and the staff member and I am satisfied that while both are sad cases the complaints made in respect of St. Michael's House are unfounded. If the person who made the complaint had some unique insight not apparent to others in St. Michael's House or to myself he ought to have shared that with the management or the Board of St. Michael's House. I am satisfied that the process of enquiries undertaken by St. Michael's House were undertaken in a fair and appropriate manner. Please feel free to contact me if you require clarification." Then he wrote that he would forward a note on his fee under a separate covering.

The claimant accepted that Mr. MH referred to his report as a final report. The claimant stated that all of the relevant parties were not interviewed. It was not accurate to state that part of the reason that he resigned was the manner in which the respondent dealt with the transfer of the late Mr. McK who had died. It was the manner in which they went after the claimant when he tried to do something about the circumstances that he was removed to that place. When asked if he accepted that in dealings with organisations like the respondent have with the vulnerable in society that they have to take advice from psychologists, psychiatrists, medical doctors he responded the he was one himself. The claimant accepted that occasionally clinicians and other experts would disagree. Mr. MH did not interview the immediate clinicians who dealt with Mr. PMcK. When asked if he had the consent of the staff member to incorporate his name in the original letter of complaint before he delivered the letter he responded that he did not recall seeking formal consent. At this time the claimant stated that he was not claiming that he was bullied at that time at all. The claimant did not believe that his concern about the culture of bullying in the respondent was a typical grievance because it was not even about him. The claimant had no difficulty with a member of the board personally who was a businessman and tendered competitively for business with the respondent. But if this man was investigating serious concerns that the claimant as a senior clinical professional had highlighted his relationship with the CEO and his business interests rendered him not an objective member of an investigating committee.

When asked that three out of the four years the turnover in clinical staff was about half the turnover in general staff he responded that he did not know how these statistics were derived and the claimant certainly debated them with Mr. MH. The claimant did not have any statistics to indicate otherwise. When asked that the key element of the reorganisation was relocation of the regional offices of a number of clinical staff and that psychologists alone among the clinical departments did not accept the reporting lines the clinic manager proposed in the restructuring plan of the clinic he responded the social work department objected also. When asked that on 13th March the arbitrator stated that he was satisfied that the reporting relationship to the clinic manager was appropriate and should be accepted by psychologists in the respondent the claimant stated that he recalled that decision and he recalled being very unhappy about it. When asked that he continued to complain about it years later he responded that you had to accept it. The claimant disagreed that there was a diminution of the clinical role and there was an undermining of the reputation of those who established the reputation. The claimant had expressed concern that the organisation needed outside people. All of the appointments were internal, and he did not think that was healthy for an Organisation. He disagreed that his complaint was dealt with in a fair and appropriate manner. The claimant acted out of professional concern. He did not gain anything out of writing to the Board. The only thing he knew that he would probably gain was where he has ended up. The claimant accepted that there was no reference to the report dated 23rd October 2003 being in draft.

When asked to summarise briefly how his employer bullied and harassed him in relation to Mr. P McK the claimant responded that he was not claiming any bullying or harassment in relation to Mr. PMcK. He would never have made the claims until these eight allegations were introduced a month after he wrote to the Minister for Health. His bullying and harassment claims centred on the eight allegations.

In cross-examination on 16th January 2006 the claimant stated that he was still employed in a part time job with the health board. It was his own decision to continue to work part time. His wife has had a baby. He assessed his situation and his commitment ultimately to his wife and family and that is why he continued to work part time. The claimant agreed that he had never sat down with anybody, be it in the internal three person committee, the subcommittee of the board or Mr. M.H and set out in detail his submissions justifying his allegations of bullying.

All social workers were classified as clinicians. He accepted that not all of them left the respondent because of the culture of bullying. When asked what he meant by the word "haemorrhage" he responded he was concerned about the turnover of staff. He was aware that there was continual disillusionment and the psychological department had an investigation, with the union where they complained about the undermining of the clinical role. He could not remember exactly the time of that. The psychological department lost that investigation but his observation remained valid. As part of a regionalisation structure administrative managers were going to have more input in how psychologists or clinicians actually worked. It was called a matrix system and an arbitrator was appointed. The arbitration took place in March 2003 and was concerned with the reporting relationships of psychologists within the new regionalised structure of the respondent. It was fully part of the collective negotiations between the trade union who represented the claimant and his colleagues. There was disquiet among the Psychology Department because they would not have gone that far if there had not been. There was significant disquiet about the undermining of the clinical role at the time The claimant agreed that the arbitrator held that there was no undermining.

Mr. PL (CEO) wrote the claimant on 1st October advising him that he proposed to appoint three senior managers, Mr. K, Mr. M and Mr. R. The claimant objected to the appointment of Mr. K and Mr. R. The claimant did not have a personal grievance at that time. He had a serious concern about the treatment of a longstanding staff member and also the treatment of a family who had been sent to LC Nursing home. He did not think it was a standard grievance procedure. The one Board member that Mr. PL appointed to represent the respondent to investigate his complaints had a major business contract with the respondent. He supplied all of the respondent's medical supplies and all of their domestic supplies. The claimant received a letter from the person that he objected to in which he outlined to the claimant that he had an involvement in the respondent for the past twenty-six years. He was currently acting as Chairman of the Policy and Planning Committee and recently completed the five-year plan for the respondent for 2002-2007. He also outlined to the claimant that he had never received benefit of any kind. His only business interest was that a company which provided a service to the respondent employed him. It was the claimant's understanding that it was his own company.

The claimant did not have any personal complaint in October 2002. The claimant stated that the first time bullying started was the day that Ms. PD called him to a meeting to outline the eight allegations against him. When asked if any of these resulted in any imposition of any sanction on him he responded that he was only learning about them for the very first time at the meeting. The claimant stated that there was no procedure. The claimant attended a meeting in July and in attendance were his union representative, Ms PD (the deputy CEO) Ms. B from HR and Ms. LW who was the acting head of psychology at the time. The claimant agreed that his union representative accepted that the claimant was at the meeting to listen. Conclusions were made about the claimant's lack of professionalism and poor conduct. Before any discussion had taken place Ms. PD had made up her mind about how the claimant was supposed to be conducting himself.

It was agreed that the next meeting would take place on 25th September and the purpose of that meeting was for the claimant to respond to the eight issues. The claimant set out his responses to each of the eight issues. The claimant stated he could not comment on the use of a client's photograph on a political poster. The poster that the claimant used was to highlight the issue. The poster was a picture of a man with Down's Syndrome an elderly person and a hospital bed. Due to the fact that it was different and the claimant was standing as an independent candidate to try and raise the profile of rights for disabled people. He was not aware of a letter dated 23rd October which Ms. B wrote on behalf of the respondent to the claimant's union representative. It was the first time that he had seen it The claimant wrote to Ms. PD in November about the eight issues as he had not heard anything The claimant had not seen the letter dated 5th December from Ms. PD to the claimant's union representative. He may have looked at it at some point but he certainly did not get to see it before he left. He did not speak to the union representative or have any contact. The only contact he had with him was subsequent to September 25 was approximately December 17 when he called him to tell him that the psychology department wanted to write a letter of support because of his circumstances and he felt that it was not a good idea. He took another call in the middle of that and he did not hear from him subsequently. He did not accept that these were important letters because he understood that at that time his union representative had a close bereavement and he assumed that he was not responding. The claimant was awaiting a response from Ms. PD that he never received.

When asked that in 2001 108 full time clinicians or the equivalent were employed he responded that counsel for the respondent seemed to be harping on an observation that he had made and were getting into a technicality regarding the definition of a clinician. When asked what he defined as a clinician he responded people who operated from the clinic, which included a psychiatrist, physiologist, social worker, physiotherapist and speech, language and occupational therapist.

In answer to questions from the Tribunal when asked when did he go to his union for help, he responded when the eight allegations were listed. When asked why he dispensed with his union and chose the solicitors he responded that he did not dispense with his union, he engaged the solicitor formally when the board of the respondent contacted him through its solicitor. He had not engaged a solicitor at that point. That was probably during 2002. He did not have his union representative there until June or July 2003.

On re-examination by his counsel he stated that he had a vague familiarity with counselling at pre disciplinary stage a verbal warning and stage two written warning When asked if he was ever approached by anyone in the respondent in relation to this counselling he responded that no unless he wanted to interpret Mr. PL's meeting earlier on. He did not receive a verbal warning. He was employed for thirteen years with the respondent and was 100% fully committed to the organisation. There was nothing brought to his attention in those years. His immediate supervisor was Mr. MM. He had regular supervision with Mr. MM and they discussed his work but he never approached the claimant about complaints regarding his conduct. In regard to the election poster he said he was not exploiting anyone he was trying to forward a cause. He did not accept that he acted in breach of guidelines. No one complained to him about his visits to Cregg House. The claimant caused none of the delays and he did not know what was happening and that is what prompted the claimant to write to Ms. PD.

An issue arose in relation to evidence that a witness Mr. M on behalf of the claimant was going to give. The Tribunal adjourned to discussed the matter. On reconvening the Chairman of the Tribunal Division stated that the Tribunal had to decide the issue of the admissibility of the evidence of Mr. M and the Tribunal has considered the submissions made by Counsel for the claimant and the respondent. The Employment Appeals Tribunal dealt with labour disputes and the Tribunal has to focus on this labour dispute. The claimant feels very strongly about these issues and he was given, the Tribunal considers, a full opportunity to ventilate his feelings and to give his evidence. However the Tribunal have to apply in this Tribunal the test of relevance and have decided that the evidence of Mr. M was not relevant to the hearing of a labour dispute for two reasons: the first reasons was what Mr. M's evidence would corroborate was alleged bullying of family but the case was about the claimant's relationship with his employer and the alleged bullying of him. The Tribunal considered that Mr. M's evidence was not relevant and the claimant would have an opportunity to prove his allegations.

The first witness on behalf of the claimant Ms. DK told the Tribunal that her role in the respondent would have been assistant house parent employed for twenty-two years from 1980 to 2002. She worked in Gleneally, which was one of the houses in Ballymun, the claimant was the senior psychologist and she would have worked extensively with clients through the claimant. She would have held the claimant's opinion in very high esteem. They worked as part of a team and the nature of the clients they worked with in particular would be of varying levels of ability and challenging behaviour. Her experience of bullying in the respondent went back to May 2000. She would have attended staff meetings on a regular basis and would have brought up what she thought was a very reasonable question about taking annual leave on a bank holiday. At the meeting there would have been her head of unit and two other members of staff. She was openly accused of undermining her head of unit's role as manager. She actually could not understand why she was made to feel so intimidated. When asked who made this accusation against her she responded Ms. AG. Her shifts were constantly changing. She had a difficulty in that if she wanted to take a day off on Monday who did she ask. She wanted the simple clarity as to who provided the cover on Monday. It ensued with four meetings with management and the resident manager Mr. PC asked her to retract her comments about Ms. AG displaying elements of bullying. She could not understand why a local issue had to be brought over to headquarters to be addressed. She was asked to retract her comments and she felt that the Head of Unit Ms. AG had displayed elements of bullying. She became aware that Mr. PC had attended a meeting with Ms. O'D a psychologist and they discussed this issue. The second incident of bullying was she felt referred to Mr. PMcK. Both Mr. PMcK and another client lived in the house that she worked in for seven years. Mr. McK had moved and then subsequently moved to a nursing home. Mr. McK died in October and soon after the senior psychologist Ms. B approached them and offered debriefing sessions to the staff and clients. They were pleased to have this input from Ms. B. At the second debriefing session she felt that she picked up a certain amount of disharmony and disquiet. The debriefing came about due to the sad loss of two clients within a week of each other. It was a house of five clients and a team of six staff and a head of unit. Ms. K felt that a lot of questions were unanswered and these were all in connection with the death of Mr. McK. She felt that, as there was a sense of anger that it would be advisable for staff to put their questions on paper and that management would address these issues. They would meet in an open format as a group setting. She had no problem doing this and within a short period of time the claimant and her colleague Mr Mc who is still employed by the respondent compiled up to twenty-three questions and presented them to management. She and her colleague were informed that there would not be a third debriefing session as initially promised and that they would meet individually with management. Two members of management Mr. JB residential manager and Mr. PC who was over their particular house would meet with them. They sought advice on this from their union who informed them that not to meet individually under any circumstances. They then met with Mr. JB and they were advised not to take notes.

The questions that she wrote down were as follows:

"What were the criteria for selecting nursing homes for people with learning disability and Alzheimer's?

Why was Leas Cross-selected? Was Leas Cross Nursing Home registered with the Eastern Health Board? Had St. Michael's house management ever visited the premises prior, to and after Mr. P McK was admitted. Did a client from the respondent ever die in Leas Cross nursing home or was admitted from the nursing home to hospital in a critical condition before. If so was the respondent satisfied that Leas Cross management had acted professionally and in a caring manner on both occasions. If a client had been admitted to hospital from Leas Cross before was the respondent management aware as to whether the client travelled alone, by ambulance or was accompanied in the ambulance by nursing home staff."

She did not receive answers to those questions directly. No one question was picked out, they were more or less set down and Mr. B spoke in a roundabout way. They were led to believe that Leas Cross was a reputable place and they were happy with what they had heard about the conditions. The second incident occurred in February 2001. The third incident was in May 2001 again by chance she mentioned Mr. PMcD because he had appeared in all these three incidents. He was part of it, which was quite extraordinary. Mr. PMcD was in the staff room and came across a manual. There was nothing private or confidential written on this folder. He just went through it and he found a chart that was a competency chart that apparently the respondent was using as part of a training programme. On that chart there were various skills, which listed workability, teamwork, managerial, work on competency with clients. Different sections were labelled and underneath there was a scoring square and if the square was completely darkened you were considered fully competent. When PMcD found this chart the other four members of staff had mostly blackened squares, which meant they were highly competent. Both PMcD and Ms DK had 13 and 12 respectively. The chart did not have a date on it but the folder was dated May 2001. It was not signed but the writing was very evident. It was the head of their unit Ms. A. G. When they discovered this chart they approached their unions. Ms. K mentioned to Mr. PC that she was very unhappy with this and asked what was the format or why was this set up. They raised the matter with Human Resources and through their unions. She raised the matter with Ms SB in HR and she did not know whether she is still in HR or not. They received a letter from Ms. AG apologising. She apologised more that they found the chart. She received a letter it was not signed by Ms. AG and it was PP Ms. S B. The letter dated 22nd August 2002 stated as follows:

"With reference to the complaint made regarding my assistant house parent competency chart, I understand that while reading my coaching and mentoring skills file you became aware of the assessment of competency of staff members in Warren House Road, as recorded by me as part of a training exercise.

It has been brought to my attention that you have taken offence at my assessment of your individual competency relating to aspects of your job. Firstly, I must apologise for any insult, which may have resulted from my assessment. I assure you that it was never my intention for to offend you in any way. I had not intended for this document to be seen by staff and apologise to you both that you became aware of it in this manner.

You correctly pointed out that I had not discussed these areas with yourselves. Regrettably, as we have no formal appraisal system agreed with the unions, it was not possible for me to do so. Instead my intention had been to informally coach each individual on the job. Please be assured that no malice was intended, and I apologise for any hurt that this may have caused.

Yours sincerely

PP Sarah Bars".

Mr. J B met with the staff and as two of the respondent's clients had died. The beds were used as respite but the house was closed and the staff would now go elsewhere. They had a choice as to where they could work. They documented their requests on paper and when she indicated her choices to Mr. B he told her that she had no choice whatsoever. At this stage she just felt her position in the respondent was untenable and that really there was little left for her. She had very little option but to leave. She felt that her choices were not being addressed. She went and viewed the house in Raheny and she did not feel that she was being listened to. She was excluded from staff meetings.

She was excluded from one particular client meeting; she was a key worker to a client for the last seven years and worked extensively with her. She felt that she had built up a good rapport and suddenly this meeting took place. She was employed in this house and she was left sitting there. The house closed in March 2002 and it was near the autumn of 2001 that the incident happened about not being asked to attend the meeting.

In cross-examination Ms. DK accepted that she did not agree with Ms. AG's managerial practices. Debriefing sessions were counselling sessions provided to support the staff. She did not attend the meeting that the employer had suggested. She believed that a document was used for the purposes of internal training of staff. She did not accept that it was not set up for any other purpose. She believed it was left out purposely for staff to find, she believed it was left out to undermine her credibility and she believed that it was a defamation of character. Ms. DK stated that she was offered a position in Raheny. She declined that position. She obtained alternative employment in Bray.

The second witness on behalf of the claimant Ms. UO' R told the Tribunal that her brother who was 47 was a client of the respondent for forty years. He had lived at home with his parents all of that time and in that time probably had about five respites. His name was on the waiting list for residential care. Her brother would be considered severely handicapped by the respondent's standards. Her brother developed pneumonia and for the eight weeks he was at home with her mother and the respondent did not contact them with an offer of help. Things went downhill after her mother was admitted to hospital at the beginning of 2003. Ms. UO' R had a four-month-old baby at the time and was unable to mind her brother and he was taken in as an emergency case. Because he had lived at home with his parents for so long he was used to a routine. Within the eight weeks he was moved between 22 and 24 times. Every week he was moved two to three times. She was basically handling her brother's care at the time because her mother was in hospital and unable to help at all. She wrote five letters to the respondent and did not receive a reply to any of them.

She met the claimant, as he was the psychologist for her brother in the day centre. Within three weeks of her brother being taken into full time care he had started to soil himself and he developed an ulcer. During that time he also broke his kneecap. He was still being constantly moved so the claimant would have been talking to him and trying to give advice. She met the claimant on a few occasions in the respondent's day centre and explained to him the situation and he was aware of her brother's situation. Ms. UO'R denied that the claimant said that he who shouts the loudest gets a service.

When her brother was discharged from hospital Ms. UO' R spoke to the house manager, Ms. KF., in Raheny at the time. She explained the situation to Ms. KF and she brought her brother out to Raheny. She told K F that she had been waiting ten years for her brother to get a place and Ms.KF told her that she would have to wait. At this time she had met the claimant on three occasions. She spoke to the claimant about her brother and her mother. The claimant visited her mother and he was the only person from the respondent who took the time to appraise the situation. The only dealings that she had with the claimant were in relation to her brother's situation.

In cross-examination when asked where her brother was now she responded that he was in a rented house in Swords, which was part of the respondent company. The care that he received on a day-to-day basis was very good.

The third witness on behalf of the claimant Dr. PH told the Tribunal that he qualified as a doctor in 1983. He did five years training as a GP and he has been working in that area since then. About ten years ago he became interested in the connection between health and work and he gained further qualifications in family therapy or systems therapy, which was trying to use language to look at solutions to try and understand problems within the context of families. He gained further qualifications in executive and business coaching on how to help individuals and businesses to look at a positive outcome. It was a two-year postgraduate family therapy degree in Australia.

The claimant went to him at the end of 2004 and he met the claimant on two occasions. He did not go through a formal medical examination with the claimant but it was obvious that the claimant was upset. This was having an effect on the claimant's psychological, personal and his family life. The claimant felt that there was still work to be done on behalf of his patients in terms of getting a sense of fair play or getting a voice for what happened.

He contacted the respondent and he spoke to Mr. PL the CEO. Dr. PH told him he had some concerns about bullying in the organisation. He outlined some of his experience to the CEO and that he might be of some help. He was interested in working with the respondent in order to facilitate some sort of solution. He felt if it came from the top that there was a sense that they might be able to work together. The effect of the response was that he did not contact the respondent again. He really felt that after the telephone call that he was not dealing with someone who was going to engage with him in the claimant's case.

In cross-examination when asked when he spoke to the CEO that he was offering his services to the respondent he responded that he was. He spoke to the CEO three months after he met with the claimant in early 2005.

In answer to questions from the Tribunal when asked if he carried out a diagnosis of the claimant he responded that he had two roles, one as a doctor and one as a life coach working on bullying. He did not have a sense that the claimant needed his medical help.

The fourth witness on behalf of the claimant Mr. CR told the Tribunal that he had a certificate and diploma in social work. He was a qualified psychiatric nurse, a qualified nurse for the mentally handicapped and he had a diploma in public administration from UCD and a certificate in health economics from UCD as well. He commenced employment with the respondent in June 1997. He was employed on a three-year contract. His contract terminated on 2nd June 2000. He was working half time. He was working on the south side of Dublin, which was a much smaller team than the one in the North side. He was part of an Early Services team, which was linked, with new referrals of children who had learning disabilities. He met with parents in the early stages and as part of the team developed supports for them. He was also providing support to a number of units of children who had quite severe levels of handicap who were in day services and he was supporting both the unit and the parents whose children were attending the unit. He never felt that he was bulled on a personal level. On 16th May when he was informed that his contract was terminated he felt that something was awry. He was quite shocked when his contract was terminated because it had never occurred to him at any point that his contract had been terminated. The week before that a colleague who was doing some intensive difficult work with him made a comment to him that he was working so many hours and that he should apply to the respondent for an increase in his wages and he laughed at her and he told her that organisations did not work like that. He was informed that his contract was terminated with no warning and no discussion He had never raised the issue of his contact being renewed either because it had never occurred to him that anything but a continuation of it would be happening.

The fifth witness on behalf of the claimant Mr. FF told the Tribunal that he had contact with the claimant in or about 1992 and the claimant was the most committed professional he has every worked with in this field. Mr. FF stated that there were many fine people who worked in this field of intellectual disability. It was a difficult field to work in with a lot of very challenging behaviours, challenging work and nobody had given more of himself than the claimant had. The claimant had a twenty-four hour day seven days a week commitment to people with intellectual disability at the very highest level. He did not know of anyone in the country who was more committed than the claimant was. The claimant had never been involved in the care of his daughter so he had no direct experience on that on a one to one basis. The claimant was someone who had advised organisations, helped them to learn, to confront behaviours and to determine what the priorities were in terms of the services that were needed and the claimant has been completely invaluable. Mr. FF had never known anybody to second guess his judgment on any of these matters and he had never known him to withhold a judgment or to withhold time and effort. The claimant in his view had striven to ensure that the highest standards were met by the various organisations that Mr. FF was involved in.

Mr. FF talked with Ms. DK and Mr. PMcD. In the course of that lengthy meeting they both confirmed to him their belief and experience of a very difficult and oppressive culture within the respondent. He could not put his hand on his heart and say that they used the phrase "culture of bullying" but everything they described would be certainly tantamount to a culture of bullying in his view. His interest in talking to them was twofold. One was related to the facts of Mr. P McK and the way in which the respondent had reacted to them in respect of the concerns that they had raised about Mr. PMcK.

The sixth witness on behalf of the claimant Ms. AO'N told the Tribunal that she had a primary degree in social science and a Masters in social work. She received her primary degree from 1983 to 1986 in UCD. She completed her Masters from 1993 to 1995. The bulk of her work during those years between the time she finished her degree to the time she did her Masters was primarily in the area of care work It was two settings, one was a long term hospital unit for elderly people in St. James's hospital and the other was the national MS care centre in Rathgar. She felt she had experience of two settings with very different standards of care provided in each. She was very lucky to be involved in the setting up and opening of the MS care centre, which was recognised as a centre of excellence and was set up as direct response to the lack of appropriate respite places for people with physical or neurological disabilities. Following her Masters she worked for two years in child protection in the Health Board and she had the opportunity then to travel for a number of months and she lived in Mayo and she took up a locum position in Cerebral Palsy Ireland, which is now Enable Ireland in the Child Development and Assessment Centre in Galway. She started work with the respondent in May 1988 initially on a six-month contract. The initial vacancy arose because one of the social workers had been released to undertake another piece of work within the organisation. That took longer than the six months that was allowed, so she was there on a temporary basis for approximately eighteen months. She was interviewed for a permanent post in December 1990 and she was successful at the interview. The head of her department told her that she believed that she had issues with management and that those issues would need to be resolved during her probation period. When she commenced work with the respondent she became aware that there was a huge level of discontent within the department and she described it as a sort of climate of fear. She was referring to staff with fifteen or twenty years experience feeling such a level of intimidation that they could not express their opinions even at a social work meeting She was taken aback by that. She felt that she was in a luckier position in that she did not have historical experience in the organisation and she felt she was able to voice her opinions more freely than other people. There was definitely a type of atmosphere that people were afraid to speak.

She voiced her concerns about the delivery of services in terms of specific issues but she would have tried to have discussions about how people felt they were being managed as a department. People made an effort, which ultimately led to a facilitation process. Staff would have initially started to try and raise those issues themselves. Her issues with management had to be addressed during her probation. She stated that between February to April 2000 supervision session took place. The supervision session would take place between a basic grade social worker and their senior social worker. There were different elements to it; one was to show that you were completing your work satisfactorily; to be able to discuss issues of difficulty and cases that you were struggling with. There was also a large element that was supposed to be a support system including professional development. That was the context and without any sort of advanced warning in her supervision session it was raised by her manager that over the following months of her probation that she needed to basically work on her attitude. If she was not engaged in that process of working on her attitude that she would not be able to pass her probation. They discussed her attitude to management. She asked if there was any difficulty with her work and with her practice. There was no issue around her work and her practice but she needed to look at her attitude. It got to a point where she felt that she was up against a brick wall. They kept harping on about her attitude and it resulted in her breaking down and bursting into tears, which was not something that she was prone to doing. She was devastated after it and she felt that the whole thing was being personalised. She was aware of the fact that her head of the department and her manager had discussed this with the HR manager Mr. NR so she requested a meeting with him. She was then summoned to a meeting with her head of department and her manager. She did not know what to make of this. She was given no information about the content of the meeting.

There was a bit of a time lapse and they came back and she was told there was no difficulty. It was a very brief meeting and she did not need to bring anyone with her. She went along to the meeting having been advised by the union that if anything was raised that she could withdraw from the meeting. She went to the meeting and she was informed that she was permanent and everything was dropped.

She felt it was inappropriate to use a nursing home in terms of staffing levels, training of staff, policies, guidelines and she was not sure that they were all appropriately in place. The training in the respondent was of a very high standard to ensure that. She felt that there was no adequate way of monitoring the standard of care in places external to the organisation. She just felt that the level of care could not be guaranteed. In May 2000 the difficulties within the department were addressed through a facilitation day, which in itself she thought was a very traumatic experience for a lot of people. She personally felt very demoralised. She had never experienced in her previous places of employment the number of people that left the respondent in unhappy circumstances. She found that the number of situations that involved an element of somebody being very dissatisfied alarming. Staff were dissatisfied with they way they were managed. She left the organisation in July 2005. The main reason she left was she felt she did not want to work within the environment of a similar sort of management experience as she had previously experienced. She was a senior practitioner with the respondent and she went to a basic grade post. Part of her reason for taking up the new post was that she had some inside knowledge that there was a certain style of management. Her new post also had a lesser salary.

In cross examination when asked that the respondent informed her that she was good at her job she responded that she would not say that the respondent let her know she was good at her job. When asked that she was promoted she responded that she was. She obtained the senior practitioner post in 2002. When she took up her new job she was near to her home. She felt that there were issues around the management to her department who were Ms. ME, Ms. VB and Ms. JK. She found it difficult to work with the regional director and the clinic manager. Prior to her leaving the respondent she stated that she applied for a senior post with the respondent but it was not within social work, it was in relation to integration of children attending mainstream schools. It was an area that she had a particular interest in. She thought that another candidate was successful. When asked if she were successful at the interview that she would still be employed with the respondent she said that she would. It was an area that she was very committed to in terms of integration and inclusion for people with learning disabilities in mainstream services.

When asked why her union had never made a complaint on her behalf regarding alleged bullying she responded that it was dropped. She had never written a complaint indicating that she was bullied but if it had continued she would have had to do it. When asked if she used the word bullying she responded that she did not know if she did. She could have used the term bullying behaviour.

The seventh witness on behalf of the claimant Ms. EL told the Tribunal that she has an arts degree in English and Sociology, which she received in Maynooth in 1991. She then did a diploma in social policy in UCD. Following on from that she worked in 1991/1992 with homeless families. She went to Chicago to work in a residential facility for people with learning disabilities for a year. She returned to Ireland in 1994 and she completed a Masters in Social Work in UCD. She worked for three years on the soup run with the Simon Community from 1990 to 1993. She worked from 1992 to 1993 with Focus Point. From 1996 to 1997 she was involved in child protection cases with the community care area in the Eastern Health Board. She applied for a job in the respondent and took up employment in May 1997 and she worked there until May 2004. She moved to the Doorstsep Charity on the Navan Road where she was a principal social worker. She was recently appointed senior social work practitioner in the respondent shortly before she chose to leave. When the principal post came up in another organisation she applied for it and is now a principal social worker. When she started working with the respondent she was employed as a basic grade social worker and she had more or less the same caseload for the seven years that she was there. She worked with children with a moderate to severe level of learning disability from the age of 3 up to the age of 18. She also worked in a special national school for children with moderate learning disability and in the last couple of years she worked in the Cara Unit, which was the respondent's facility for people with learning disability and dementia. When she joined in 1997 she would have been aware of an atmosphere historically within the social work department and that people said be careful what you say, be careful in social work meetings.

She observed for a short period before participating fully in social work meetings that strong opinions that were contrary to the decisions made by management would not have been received very well. Staff were not asked for comments and it was an unfortunate period in the social work department, particularly the years 1998, 1999 and 2000 where comments would have been made about consultation being only a matter of courtesy. She felt that there was a certain management style within the organisation, which was to deliver decisions without having any discussion. It was unfortunate that statements would have been made by Monica like, "I don't want to be threatening about this, but she said she would come on the heavy if you cannot reach a resolution". The witness found these statements very out of line with the organisation, which she had signed up to work with.

She raised issues in the early stages of bullying in her supervisory meetings. The meetings took place about once a month. She recalled that in 2000 she telephoned HR to enquire if there was any anti-bullying training available. The person that she sought advice from told her that a proposal had been put to Mr. N R. HR manager from some of the members in human resource and he had adamantly responded no. When asked if the respondent did not direct her to the booklet on anti bullying policies and procedures she responded that she had obtained her own information from the union. She was not aware that an anti bullying training or a workshop was in place in the respondent. She felt that it would be in everyone's interest to have very clear and transparent policies and procedures, an employee manual and a manager's manual. She stated within the department, staff felt bullied and they tried to address it. When they felt they were not getting anywhere they went to Mr. DK. She could not remember what Mr. DK's role was at the time and she thought it was clinic manager. She would have felt that it was the correct avenue to pursue. She had gone to Mr. DK firstly about Ms. AO'N, a colleague of hers who had gone for permanency and was informed that the probation period would be a time when issues around her style of management would need to be looked at. She would have gone to Mr. NR who had recently joined the company and told him that she was unhappy with what had been said to AO'N about her permanency. Mr. NK made a remark what is going on in this organisation. She would have been party to a lot of the department meetings with Mr. NK. She was shocked when Mr. CR's contract was not continued.

The first document she saw concerning restructuring and reorganisation would have been in 1999. She knew the organisation would have concerns about the regionalisation process and some meetings would have taken place were staff were initially asked for input around 1997/1998 when the organisation was starting to restructure. Staff would have had huge concerns about the process. They would have liked the union to be involved as a social partner in that process.

Across the department there was collective concern about the use of nursing homes to varying degrees. There were a large number of users who felt it was wrong and that facilities were inappropriate. She could not say how supervision procedures could be put in place.

She had mixed reasons for leaving the organisation. She had worked in the respondent for seven years and she was very committed to her work. She had the opportunity for career advancement and she applied for a post. She had returned from a period of maternity leave in 2003. After having had a baby she did not want to return to the atmosphere in the respondent, which she had found very difficult up to the period she had left for a number of reasons. She was part of discussions from 1999 to 2003 that were quite difficult negotiations, including the facilitation process and the regionalisation process and she felt very tired after the process because she felt that in becoming part of those negotiations she had to fight to have her voice heard.

In cross examination she stated that she submitted a letter of resignation on 14th April 2004 in which she informed Ms. EL that she had been offered the post of principal social worker. In this letter she thanked Ms. EL for all her kindness, support and flexibility over the last seven years.

The eighth witness on behalf of the claimant Ms. JK told the Tribunal that she originally came from the teaching profession but she moved into third level education in the late 80's early 90's. She returned to education and completed two Postgraduate Diplomas in Management and Leadership in Trinity College and subsequently Master of studies in Workplace Bullying. She completed her masters in 1998 but was awarded her Masters Degree in 1999 at Trinity College. She lectures part time in Trinity College on contemporary issues in Management and a great part of that was on the subject of workplace bullying, awareness and prevention. She worked with companies both in the public and private sector around creating awareness on the whole area of the importance of a healthy psychological work environment and the prevention of bullying in the workplace. She would look at companies' current policies and advise on what best practice would be from around the world in terms of improving or changing them. She kept herself informed of all the literature and research on the subject both nationally and internationally. She advised universities, Institutes of Technology and schools. She also advised Health Boards, Hospitals and Government Departments. In the private areas clients ranged from banks to pharmaceutical companies and computer companies. She was asked quite frequently to address seminars and conferences on the subject of workplace bullying and the area of positive work environment and appropriate management.

Ms. JK stated that a written document was one small element in the whole anti-bullying programme. The main thing would be to look at the culture and the climate of the organisation to establish whether it was bullying promoting or bullying preventing. The anti-bullying policy would be part of that programme but it would have to incorporate certain elements for to be effective. Certain organisations would put in place a policy but it would merely be a paper exercise, it would not reflect what was going on in the organisation. Even the expression of intolerance would not reflect a genuine tolerance but that was not in all organisations. If the genuine desire was not there but simply the paper it was absolutely ineffective and as well as being ineffective it was deeply frustrating for the people who work in the organisation because they see it as being window dressing or a smokescreen. To ensure that employees received a copy of the Anti-bullying policy was good practice in terms of formulating an Anti- bullying policy. It should be done in consultation with all the interested parties. Then it should be communicated to every staff member through whatever means possible. It could not be ensured that everyone received it but it would be the intention that everyone would receive a copy. It was recognised that there was a need to provide the widest range of options for resolution. It would not just be about the formal, the investigative, it would be the widest range of options to incorporate informal opportunities for resolution. That took account of the fact that the research would show that for in excess of 90% of people who made claims of bullying, their main aim was to have it resolved. There would be put in place in organisations specialist people in specialist roles that would act to support and outline these options. The informed choice that the majority of people made in the context of the range of options would be to opt for the informal route. One of the most important elements of the prevention of the bullying would be the adequate training of everybody who was put into a position of supervising or managing. That would be considered a very important part of the anti-bullying programme. The literature would suggest that the most prevalent type of bullying would be the systematic undermining of a person's capacity to contribute to the organisation. It would be a discrediting of their previously good reputation, of their relationships, of their record of work. It would be a systematic discrediting so that they would be excluded and isolated within the organisation. It would be frequently conducted with a view to actually reducing them to such a state of self-doubt and lack of confidence that they might leave of their own accord. There was a very recognised method and it was very prevalent in bullying situations and bullying cases described as the "the trawl" or "the hunt". It occurred where someone was perceived as a threat, or someone whose competence undermined or highlighted the lack of competence of someone else, someone who resisted becoming a yes person, and someone who was intolerant of hypocrisy or bad practice and voiced that intolerance. In order to discredit that person a trawl would be done through their work, their relationships and their record in order to find incidents that could be accumulated to reflect badly on them.

The ninth witness on behalf of the claimant Ms. MP told the Tribunal that the first job that she had was in Scotland as a Court assistant. She then spent the next four years in East Africa. She worked there for the diocese of Eldret, which is an area the size of Munster. She was responsible for administrating the entire area and she spent four years there. She returned to Ireland to train as a nurse. While she was in Africa she discovered that there was a dearth of opportunities for people with disability so she thought if she came back and trained she could return with that particular skill. She met her husband during her training and she did not return. She had worked then for the John of God's services for a number of years and then she applied for a post in the respondent in 1980. She was head of respite. As far as her memory served her it was the first respite house in Ireland that was community based. She was responsible for that unit for the following five years until the birth of her daughter. After the birth of her daughter she took two years leave of absence and then she decided that she did not want to return full time. She enjoyed being at home and she did various part time jobs for a number of years within the Respondent. Then her son was born and she eventually took up a part time position in Aylesbury Respite in 1990. She has continued to work in that position since 1990. She was never subject to a complaint and she was in the fortunate position in that her work environment was challenging. She was asked to get involved in training. She had a particular interest in training and in working with groups of people. She helped people to manage diabetes in the community and was involved in first aid training. She stated that things changed dramatically in 2005.

She submitted a complaint in April 2005. It was the first time she had ever written anything of that nature because up to then she would have tried to deal with issues locally. Before she did that she had given it a great deal of thought. What happened subsequent to that has been a nightmare. She was deputy manager in the house when she made the complaint. She was suspended on 22nd December 2005 on full pay and in mid January 2006 she was suspended without pay. She was told she had failed to cooperate with the respondent investigations, and she admitted that she had failed to co-operate. She was told that an investigation team would be established. She had put in her complaint under bullying and harassment. In the initial correspondence this was never referred to, it was always referred to as grievances. She had an issue with the composition of the committee who were going to undertake an investigation because she felt it was not independent. She wanted her complaint to be dealt with in accordance with the protocols relating to bullying and harassment. She felt that they were breached at every level. The respondent breached it in terms of the time that it kept the complaint before it was dealt with, in terms of the composition of the investigation team, and it was not independent. She objected as she felt that the investigating team should be agreed by both parties where possible. The chairperson of the team was an administrative manager in Goatstown and would have managed the person that she complained about for a short period. The second member was a colleague of the person she complained about at one time and the third person was new to the organisation and was in the HR department.

With the protocols that were in place the complaint would be addressed by Mr. D, the regional manager and then he would allocate a team. She wrote to Mr. D and outlined to him her frustration at how the process had been handled. In the letter she indicated that her role was being deconstructed. There was an exchange of letters between Mr. D and the witness in December. Mr. D undertook an investigation regardless of her concerns and he had the report and that was all he needed. She was going to be disciplined for not cooperating with the investigating team. She told her colleagues at this stage and she mentioned to them that she was sure she would be without a job by Christmas. She received a letter at 11.30 on Thursday morning asking her to confirm with management by 10.00 that morning if she could attend a meeting at 4p.m. that afternoon. She responded immediately and she felt it was a form of pressure. She indicated that she would report for duty on Friday. She was informed not to report for duty on Friday, as it was unwarranted and illegal. She did not know what she was going to face. She got a couriered letter delivered to her home saying that it was rescinding the suspension but she was due to go to a meeting on the Monday to be censured. She went in to work on the Friday and she was ill by Sunday. She had a blood pressure problem from the previous August. She telephoned a colleague to see if she could replace her. Then the following Wednesday she received a letter suspending her on the Thursday before Christmas.

Respondent's Case

The deputy chief executive Ms. PD told the Tribunal that she joined the respondent twenty-nine years ago. She started as a social worker when she finished college. She was responsible for the administrative aspects of the organisation, the finance, human resources, training, research, property, maintenance, transport, and information technology. Mr. K dealt with the services. When she joined in 1977 it was a relatively small organisation. It was beginning to have difficulties in relation to residential care provision. It was started as a day service and it was not until the late 1970's that the organisation actually had to face the issue of whether or not it would develop residential services. The residential services that it provided was small houses in the community. It attempted to develop homes for people with disabilities. A huge expansion occurred in 2000, 2001 and 2002. It developed seventy individual home places for people. They were individual places where the individual need of each client was taken into account. The homes were located in the community. The respondent was a very flexible organisation and the goal was to ensure that the individual needs of people with disability were met. The organisation had grown in line with the identified needs of people with disability. It had respite services, home teaching services and schools. It had developed centres for children who were more profoundly handicapped and had greater needs. It had vocational training centres. It had independent work options where people were supported to go out and work in ordinary jobs. It had integrated education services where children were supported to belong in ordinary schools and in the community. It had recreational services and it had services to support independent living. It had part-time residential services and it had the complete range of options that would be needed by an individual at any stage in their lives.

The respondent was in serious difficulty in the early 90's in relation to residential care provision because it had a limited residential provision and the needs of parents were growing. At that point parents were getting older and some had died. This caused difficulties for the respondent. The catchment area of the respondent had the greatest level of need in all of Ireland. A database was developed for the whole country to show the needs for services and the term that was used in the Health Board to define the respondent catchment areas was the black hole. It had a priority listing of the greatest need. At any time it had the top ten priorities. In the top ten priority of the list of 300 was that both parents had to be dead which was a dreadful situation to be in. The respondent currently had a staff of approximately 1,500.

Between 2000 and 2003 the respondent developed 180 residential places, which was phenomenal growth and development by anyone's standards. It was an amazing step forward for the organisation and it did actually have a significant impact on the waiting list. At that time they were opening a new house every seven weeks. In order to achieve that level of development you need to have maximum co-operation from all areas in your organisation. There was absolutely not a climate or atmosphere of bullying in the respondent. The organisation was restructured between 2001 and 2003 in order to cope with the very significant expansion it was undergoing and also the fact that it knew it had to expand further. The union became involved and represented staff over ten months. The co-operation agreement was finalised in January 2003. As part of that process, which was minuted by the union, the minutes were all agreed by the staff, union and the respondent. Meetings were held every month between April 2002 and January 2003 and the unions at the start of the process asked all of the staff to put forward every single issue of concern they had. Everything was to be put on the table and there was a list compiled at the start of the process.

Halfway through the process the union said that it would do a second analysis and any other issues that needed to be addressed could be compiled.

Ms. PD stated that never in that ten month period was the issue of a culture of bullying and intimidation in the respondent raised by the staff representative or the unions. The organisation needed to scale down and it was divided into three regions. In each region it reorganised the service delivery model. Prior to restructuring it delivered its services in divisions. It had a residential division and an employment and training division. When it regionalised the organisation regrouped the model into service clusters and each service cluster grouped together 150 people with learning disabilities with the same needs less than one team. The process that had been adopted with the unions allowed ultimately for arbitration on the issue, which it did and it was resolved.

At the hearing on 18th January 2006 Ms. PD told the Tribunal that she wrote to the claimant on 17th July. The meeting that she invited him to was not a disciplinary meeting; it was an informal meeting to raise issues of concern with the claimant. The Board concluded its business with the claimant in December 2002. They were now getting back to the normal work of the organisation. The senior management team was precluded from raising any issues of concern with the claimant. In January they had discussions as a number of issues had arisen. At that point the claimant's direct boss Mr. MM his professional superior was absent on sick leave in January It took a number of months to replace Mr. MM and a new acting head of the department was not formally agreed until 29th May. As soon as the agreement was in place on 29th May Ms. LW took up the role as acting head of department and as soon as the negotiations regarding pay and conditions were concluded with her she notified Ms. LW that there were issues that she needed to discuss with her in relation to the claimant. She relayed all of the issues to Ms. LW and she told her that she wanted her to discuss the issues with the claimant. Ms. LW came back to Ms. PD and informed her that she did not feel that she should do it. Ms. LW told Ms. PD that it would be very difficult for her to undertake this work with the claimant because she was the claimant's work colleague. She was only in a temporary appointment and it was not clear when Mr. MM was going to return to work. The second reason she gave Ms. PD was that she felt the issues were such that the claimant needed to be heard at a more senior level than her. Those were the two points that she remembered Ms. L.W making to her. Ms. PD was clearly engaged in the process before receiving the claimant's letter. The HR function reported to her and she was very clear when she engaged in an informal process. The informal process was whereby she stated her position and her understanding of events was that she allowed the other person to state their position.

Ms. PD stated that the respondent explained to employees what constituted gross misconduct. One of the breaches that it regarded as gross misconduct was leaving the job without authorisation. At the first meeting the claimant and his union representative listened to what Ms. PD had to say. It was agreed that there would be a further meeting. The majority of the response was delivered by the claimant. At the end of the meeting there was a two-way discussion between the claimant and Ms. PD. It was an informal process and it was the first time that they had engaged in dialogue. The claimant's union representative suggested that the meeting be adjourned and reconvene at a future date. It was clear to Ms. PD that she had obtained additional information around the actual issues. She needed to reflect on those and reverted to the claimant. It was only the start of the process. She had laid out all the information she had to the claimant. The claimant had come back and he had responded on every issue that she had raised and they were at a point where they began to dialogue together so that they could deal constructively with the matters. At no time at the end of the second meeting or at any time during either of the meetings did she determine that the claimant should be subjected to some disciplinary sanctions. She did not have enough information. The next thing that occurred in relation to the matter was on 23rd October when Ms. B wrote to the claimant's union representative. The letter was signed by Ms. B and was sent on the instructions of Ms. PD. Ms. PD then received a seven-page letter on 6th November from the claimant in which he reiterated much of what he had said at the meetings. Ms. PD replied directly to the claimant's union representative on 5th December. During this time Ms. PD met with Ms. LW and she advised Ms. PD that the claimant was getting impatient with the time lapse and that he was going to write to her. Ms. PD asked Ms. LW to ask the claimant not to write to her. Ms. PD asked Ms. LW to tell the claimant to contact his union official and ask him to get the matter back into the process. The letter arrived and she thought that it was best to write to the claimant's union representative and ask him to deal with the matter. Ms. PD again wrote to the claimant's union representative on 23rd January in which she restated that the respondent's intention in the process, which was to resolve all of the issues as amicably and as fairly as possible and to move into a more constructive working relationship with the claimant.

Ms. PD was not informed at any time between September and the end of January by either the claimant or his union representative that the union representative was no longer acting or advising the claimant. No one advised Ms. PD that it was inappropriate that the correspondence should be going to the claimant's union. At this time the claimant had not at any time in this period invited her to communicate with the solicitors or with anyone else in relation to this. Three collective agreements were in place with three trade unions, Impact, SIPTU and INO. It was the normal practice to engage in relation to individual employees through the trade union. No further meetings ever took place and the process never concluded.

The second witness on behalf of the respondent Dr. JL told the Tribunal that she qualified from the Royal College of Surgeons in 1981. She has an honours medical degree and a licentiate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons. She obtained her membership of the Royal College of Physicians in 1985. She was awarded her fellowship from the Royal College of Physicians in 1998. She also obtained her Diploma in Child Health in 1984. She was awarded and completed a higher diploma in medicine dermatology in 1998. She completed her general medical training and she undertook two years of research. She then went into the medicine of learning disability for adults with learning disabilities. Prior to that it would have been paediatricians who would look after the medical problems of people with learning disabilities but as they were living longer it was apparent that these people had more medical problems. There are currently more people now specialising in medicine for adults with learning disabilities.

She joined the respondent in 1987 and she left in 2004. She is currently employed by another service provider in a similar area. When she started working with the respondent she was a senior physician. The witness and another paediatrician undertook work and she built up a medical department, which provided a comprehensive specialised medical service for the adults and the children. This was a specialised service. She was not a GP or a hospital consultant; it was an intermediary between the two. They built up a large medical department and when she left there were three full time physicians and a half time adult post. There was also a paediatrician post that was job shared and there was a visiting consultant paediatrician, visiting eye specialist and it had consultant sessions from Beaumont in Ear, Nose and Throat.

In 2000 she was appointed the senior physician specialist in learning disability. This post was equivalent to a specialist in public health. She was involved in senior management as a representative of the medical department. The respondent did not want to send clients to nursing homes. She had worked in two learning disability services. She stated that no money could buy the commitment, care, love and attention that you will get in a learning disability service. The respondent had no option but to send people to nursing homes. Dr. JL was frustrated about this and there were occasions that she wished that she could obtain about five ambulances and wheel those people into the Minister for Health or the Health Board to see what was happening in people's homes trying to look after someone in their 40's, 50's or 60's She was there for seventeen years and it was not like being in a hospital. She had built up a relationship with families. Some of her colleagues in the social work department as well as the claimant voiced objections regarding the use of nursing homes. The preferred option would be to remain with the respondent. There were people that the respondent could not provide services for.

Dr. JL was involved in the decision to transfer Mr. PMcK. The claimant had no involvement in that decision. The claimant was not Mr. PMcK's psychologist. Mr. PMcK was in a situation that the respondent could not look after him. He was in a temporary bed in a residential house in the Beeches. The bed was in a sitting room that was used by other clients in the Beeches and a number of these clients had fairly specific challenging behaviour. The only Alzheimer service that Dr. JL was aware of was the Highfield Hospital. That was a private facility but it did not take the respondent's patients. Nursing homes were being used by hospitals to transfer people with dementia. People go to nursing homes to either recover from surgery or they go to be nursed until they die.

Dr. JL loved her work, it was dynamic and people worked hard. People were there because they genuinely loved it.

The third witness on behalf of the respondent Mr. DK told the Tribunal that he was Human Resources Manager in the respondent between 1995 and the end of 1999. He was now the HR Manager with Failte Ireland. When he joined in February 1995 staff levels were approximately 400 to 420. When he left in 1999 the staffing levels would have been approximately 900. He had a role in updating the personnel manual. An extensive consultation process was put in place. An advisory group was established to advise the HR department on the implementation of the HR policy and procedures throughout the respondent. It consulted with the trade union representatives at the time and with the heads of department. He lived in Stillorgan and Head Office relocated to Ballymun. He was employed for five years with the respondent and he felt it was time for a new challenge. During his time with the respondent he was not aware of any complaints of bullying.

In cross examination by counsel for the claimant Mr. DK stated that at the outset he had pointed out that the respondent had engaged in a process over two years where it had formulated policies and drafted policies. It met with the advisory committee and the trade unions so there was a process in place. Prior to November 1999 there was no policy in place in the company.

The fourth witness on behalf of the respondent Dr. D told the Tribunal that he was a consultant psychiatrist. The respondent currently employed him. He completed his higher training in general psychiatry and also in psychiatry of learning disability. As part of that training he completed two years in the psychiatry of learning disability and between 2002 and 2003 he was employed as a Senior Registrar in the respondent half time and a Senior Registrar half time in the Daughters of Charity service. He completed a further year in general psychiatry and on 1st July 2005 he started as a locum consultant in the respondent and on 19th December 2005 he was appointed a permanent consultant psychiatrist. During the period 2002 to 2003 he did not observe any atmosphere of bullying or any atmosphere of harassment or abuse of staff. He did not observe any unacceptable atmosphere in the workplace.

The fifth witness on behalf of the respondent Ms. GB told the Tribunal that she qualified as a social worker in 1985 from Trinity College, Dublin with a degree and professional certificate. In 2002 she completed a Masters in Management specialising in Training and Education Management at Dublin City University. The respondent provided extensive training in relation to bullying in the work place. She did a review of the training since 2000 both on positive HR practice, dignity at work and anti-bullying practices. The respondent had spent a total of €16,700 on seminars and education events. She had been employed with the respondent for eighteen years as training and development manager. She held two leadership positions within the respondent. One was at service manager level, which was middle management. She joined the respondent on an eleven-month contract. She was employed as a special project worker developing a new innovative service. The respondent provided two challenging behaviour programmes. The first was the foundation level programme, which was a four-day programme that was run by the psychology team. All psychologists in the team run the programme. The second programme was a course entitled "Managing Assaultive Behaviour". The respondent contracted the services of a UK company that specialised in a particular approach, which had a positive effect on behaviour that may be threatening or assaultive.

The respondent had a four-day in-house programme, which was copyright to the respondent's training department. The programme was developed by two psychologists and it was one of the first jobs that Ms. GB was commissioned to do when she started as training manager. The two psychologists were Mr. MM. who was senior psychologist and the claimant. They both brought their expertise to develop a four-day programme and were freed up for an eight-week period to develop the programme. They then rolled out the programme to all front line staff, care assistants, social care workers and nursing staff and other clinical staff also availed of that programme.

In 2001 the CEO announced that the respondent was to receive a total of €154,000 to provide training places for two services in the North Dublin area, which was the main catchment area. These two services were St. Ita's and Prosper Fingal. Prosper Fingal was a similar organisation to the respondent in that it had a community ethos. In 2001 the CEO was facing considerable cutbacks in that year and the respondent was grateful to receive additional funding of €154,000. The respondent was asked to provide a limited number of places for both Prosper Fingal and St. Ita's. The €154,000 meant that an above average number of unqualified staff could attend the Open Training College and commence their professional training to degree or diploma level. She was grateful for that funding as unqualified staff could complete their professional training. Thirteen staff from St. Ita's attended three programmes within the respondent. The first was in April 2002, the second in November 2002 and the final three St. Ita's staff attended a programme run in February 2003.

Prior to this staff attended challenging behaviour training, and attended a total of thirteen courses run by clinical colleagues from the physio department, the occupational therapy department, speech and language therapists some of her own staff and a health and safety trainer. There was only one complaint about the St. Ita's staff involvement, which came from the claimant. The claimant did not deliver all of the courses. Three staff were present at the course in April 2002 and there were no complaints arising from their attendance.

Ms. GB first became aware of the claimant's complaint about the presence of St. Ita's staff the evening prior to the four-day programme at 4.50p.m. The claimant informed Ms. GB's. administrator that his objections were so grave that he could not proceed with being the lead trainer the next morning. The claimant was due to be assisted by a trainee psychologist Ms. NH Nineteen staff were due to attend. The crisis created by the claimant's action was entirely unnecessary in her view. This situation had never occurred prior to or after this.

Ms. GB was satisfied that consultation had taken place and there was no evidence to suggest that combining staff from St. Ita's with staff from the respondent produced a disruptive effect. It was unfair to the three St. Ita's staff who attended in April 2002 to describe them as disruptive when the claimant did not run that course or was not in attendance at it. There was only one occasion in the past when St. Ita's staff were present and that was in April of the same year. At the November meeting of the steering group it was minuted that Ms. CD and Mr. MM assessed that mixing staff from St. Ita's and staff from the respondent had a very positive effect. The respondent's staff learned about the way services were provided in a different type of setting and St. Ita's staff who worked in a large institution learned about managing challenging behaviour in a community setting. The psychologist's review of that, at the meeting, that she was involved in, was very positive.

She worked with the respondent for eighteen years. She had three managers in that period who were currently members of the executive team. She had never experienced bullying and she stated that she would not remain in the employment of an organisation that had that culture. She was involved in regionalisation. The training department regionalised and she undertook that in consultation with the training team. The training team consisted of a team of five and a half posts and also in consultation with Ms. PD. The regionalisation structure that ultimately was implemented was not imposed on her. It arose from the consultation process.

Determination

The Tribunal has considered the evidence adduced by the claimant and the respondent. The Tribunal has also considered the submissions made on behalf of the claimant and the respondent.

In the course of the hearing there were many references to the sad events at Leas Cross Nursing Home. This Tribunal has the utmost sympathy for the family of the late Mr. PMcK. It must be clearly stated however that the events at Leas Cross Nursing Home were never matters for this Tribunal to adjudicate on. The High Court and the reports of Mr. MH made the decisions and investigations in these matters as it was rightly within their respective competencies to do so.

This Tribunal's proper function was to adjudicate and determine a matter pertaining to the relationship between an employer and employee and in particular whether the claimant was constructively dismissed by the respondent. A key aspect of the constructive dismissal claim is that it was caused by "persistent and sustained bullying and harassment".

The legal context is not in dispute namely (a) the onus is on the claimant to prove his case; (b) the definition in law of bullying contained in S.I. 17/2002 which states as follows: "Workplace Bullying is repeated inappropriate behaviour, direct or indirect whether verbal, physical or otherwise conducted by one or more persons against another or others, at the place of work and/or in the course of employment, which could reasonably be regarded as undermining the individuals right to dignity at work. An isolated incident of the behaviour described in this definition may be an affront to dignity at work, but as a once off, the incident is not considered to be bullying" and (c) the test for the claimant is whether it was reasonable for him to terminate his contract as applied in Liz Allen (claimant) .v. Independent Newspapers (Ireland) Ltd (respondent) UD641/2000.

The task therefore for the Tribunal is to evaluate the evidence heard by it to ascertain whether the claimant had established a factual situation sufficient to bring him within the aforesaid legal parameters. Furthermore the necessary source of evidence in this matter is that produced by the claimant and his fellow employees supplemented where relevant to this employer/employee dispute by other relevant witnesses outside the employment nexus.

Ms. DK a former employee of the respondent, itemised in her evidence five instances of alleged bullying by the respondent, an intimidatory response to her questions about holidays, a similar attitude by the respondent to her questions about its use of nursing homes, the inappropriate use by the respondent of an employee assessment folder, her exclusion from a key client of the respondent in the Autumn of 2001 and the closing of a residential home. Ms. DK left the employment of the respondent in April 2002.

The Tribunal is satisfied that the matters recited by Ms. K are such as arise in the normal functioning of a work organisation, particularly one like the respondent, which was growing rapidly at this time. This evidence as to these items does not individually or collectively amount to evidence of bullying.

Dr. H is a general practitioner. He had two consultations with the claimant after he had terminated his employment with the respondent. Dr. H did not make any formal diagnosis as to the claimant's condition. This witness did not produce any adequate evidence of bullying by the respondent.

Mr. C.R. another former employee of the respondent was upset that his fixed term contract with the respondent was not renewed. He said in his evidence that he was not bullied.

Mr. F.F gave hearsay evidence to the Tribunal about complaints made to him by employees of the respondent about bullying. These complaints were made by Ms. K and a Mr. PMcD. The Tribunal has already evaluated the evidence of Ms. DK. Mr. FF did not provide any specific detail of the alleged bullying of Mr. McD.

Ms. AO'N another former employee of the respondent, gave evidence about what she considered was an atmosphere of intimidation within the respondent's organisation during her employment there. She was particularly aggrieved that after eighteen months employment with the respondent she was expected to work a probation term with the respondent to secure further employment with the respondent.

Ms. AO'N gave evidence that a couple of months before she left the respondent's employment she applied for a senior position within the organisation. The Tribunal considers it a reasonable inference on its part that this job application by Ms. O'N indicated that for her the working environment was satisfactory and was not one where bullying occurred.

Ms. E.L another former employee of the respondent gave evidence of what she considered an intimidatory style of management in the organisation. When giving details of this she cited the case of A'O'N and Mr. CR. This evidence has already been evaluated by the Tribunal.

Ms. MP gave evidence of making a complaint about bullying by a work colleague. This event occurred in September 2004 which post dated the claimant's resignation from the organisation. Ms MP did not participate in the enquiry mechanism into her complaint as she deemed it unsatisfactory. She was suspended from work on 22nd of December 2005 on full pay and in the middle of January 2006 she was suspended without pay. She admitted in her evidence that the reason for her suspension was her failure to cooperate with the enquiry mechanism. The Tribunal considers that this witness's evidence did not establish the existence of bullying within the respondent.

Ms. JK was called by the claimant as an expert in bullying. Ms. K in her evidence did not refer to S.I. 17/2002. The Tribunal considers it appropriate to focus on this statutory instrument, which was of course endorsed in the legal submissions to the Tribunal.

The Tribunal therefore considers that the totality of the foregoing evidence does not establish the existence of bullying within the respondent's organisation. It should also be borne in mind that at this period the respondent employed in the region of one thousand persons.

It finally falls to the Tribunal to consider the claimant's evidence. This can conveniently be divided into two time periods, 3rd September 2001 to 16th July 2003 and 17th July 2003 to 6th April 2004.

In the first time period the claimant wrote to the respondent's board expressing grievances about the policy of the respondent and about the alleged bullying of another employee. In response to this the respondent offered an enquiry composed of three managers within the organisation, as specified in the respondent's grievance procedures. The claimant would have a right of appeal to a Rights Commissioner or the Labour Relations Commission. The claimant objected to the composition of this enquiry panel.

Subsequently, the respondent offered a three person sub committee of the Board to consider the claimant's grievances. The claimant refused to participate in this enquiry because he stated one member of the sub committee had a significant business relationship with the respondent.

The Tribunal considers that the claimant did not act reasonably in refusing to engage with the two processes made available to him by the respondent. It was open to him, if he considered the outcome of the internal managerial enquiry unsatisfactory to appeal to independent agencies outside the respondent's organisation. Again, with reference to the Board's sub-committee the claimant never suggested that the Board member to whom he objected had failed to make any declaration of interest required by him by law. This Board member had a close relative who was a client of the respondent. The Tribunal considers it a reasonable inference on its part that this Board member had a similar concern as the claimant in the welfare of the respondent organisation.

The Tribunal also considers it significant that the claimant produced no evidence to the Tribunal as to the alleged bullying of an employee of the organisation, which was contained in his letter to the Board of the respondent dated 3rd September 2001.

The second time period relating to the claimant's evidence begins when he received a letter from Ms. PD dated 17th July 2003. In his evidence the claimant stated that it was only from this time that he felt personally bullied inasmuch as the issues raised by Ms. PD in her letter were being used to intimidate him. Subsequent to this letter a meeting was convened which was attended by among others, Ms. PD and the claimant with his union representative. The meeting was reconvened on 25th September 2003 when the claimant in the presence of his union representative responded to the issues Ms. PD had raised in her letter dated 17th July 2003.

After this meeting Ms. PD wrote on a number of occasions to the claimant's union representative and also to the claimant's solicitor in order to progress the matter. The Tribunal considers this was a reasonable course for Ms. PD to take given her evidence to the Tribunal as to why she took this course.

There was certain vagueness in the claimant's evidence as to why the claimant's union representative did not engage with the respondent after the meeting of 23rd September 2003. The Tribunal considers it a reasonable inference on its part that sometime after 23rd September 2003 the claimant had decided to pursue his issues with the respondent outside any forum provided by the respondent and by way of the statutory legal process open to him.

The Tribunal notes that it was suggested that Ms. PD had departed from her course of dealing with the claimant's union representative when she wrote a letter to the claimant on 14th January 2004. The Tribunal accepts the evidence of the respondent that this letter related to the investigation relating to client care and not to any employer/employee dispute. Ms. PD's evidence that twenty-two other people were interviewed about this matter was uncontested at the tribunal.

The Tribunal finds that the claimant's behaviour subsequent to 23rd September 2003 again exhibits a lack of engagement by him with the processes available to him within the respondent's organisation to deal with his complaints

In her book "Dismissal Law in Ireland " (2002) Ms. Redmond states at paragraph 19.18 "there is something of a mirror image between ordinary dismissal and constructive dismissal. Just as an employer for reasons of fairness and natural justice must go through disciplinary procedures before dismissing, so too an employee should invoke the employer's grievance procedures in an effort to resolve his grievance. The duty is an imperative in employee resignations".

The Tribunal finds that there has been a consistent pattern of lack of engagement by the claimant with the respondent's grievance procedures. The Tribunal consequently finds that the claimant acted unreasonably in terminating his employment contract with the respondent. The claim for constructive dismissal by the claimant under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to 2001 therefore fails.

Respondent(s): Mr. John Maguire, Irish Concrete Federation,

8 Newlands Business Park, Naas Road, Clondalkin, Dublin 22

This case came before the Tribunal by way of the employees appealing the decision of the Rights Commissioner (Ref – R-097647-TE-10/EOS) under the Terms of Employment (Information) Acts, 1994 to 2001 and (Ref – R-097651-PW-10/EOS) under the Payment of Wages Act 1991.

Determination:

The Tribunal has carefully considered this matter. The issue the Tribunal has to decide on is whether or not the appellants are entitled to be paid during the period of lay - off. The respondent company is in the business of providing concrete and other by-products to the construction, building and maintenance industries. Whilst it is not a construction company, its business is inextricably linked to the construction industry.

The appellants were members of SIPTU. Evidence was given, that SIPTU, on behalf of its members entered into a very lengthy and comprehensive consultation process with the respondent. That process began in 2003 and continued for several years. The appellants were given a contract of employment together with the company handbook both of which were produced following agreements reached during the consultation process. The contract of employment and the company handbook where produced in English and in Polish. The contract is signed and dated. The company handbook at 2.3.2 states:

"The company reserves the right to lay you off from work or reduce your working hours where due to circumstances, beyond it's control, it is unable to keep you in full time employment. You shall receive as much notice of such lay-off or short time as is reasonably possible to give"

Whilst neither the contract nor the company handbook specifically state that employees will not be paid during the period of lay – off, it is clear that it was agreed between the parties. Evidence in the form of a letter was produced stating that it had been agreed between SIPTU and the respondent that in an attempt to save the company and jobs that employees would not be paid during the period of lay-off. The members of SIPTU, of which the appellants were, had a ballot on the issue. The claimant stated, through his Solicitor that he voted against the ballot. However, it is noted that once the ballot was passed he did not raise a grievance nor did he surrender his membership of SIPTU. He remained silent on the issue until the hearing of these proceedings.

Evidence was given by JM that as the company secretary of the Irish Concrete Federation (an organisation that he founded) that he personally was involved in the consultation process with SIPTU in relation to the issue of pay during lay –off. He stated that the custom and practise since the last recession in the 1980's was that nobody in the industry was paid during the period of lay - off. He gave evidence of five other companies in the industry that had layed off employees during this recession and stated that it was within his personal knowledge that none of those individuals had been paid during that period.

Appellant 1 and appellant 3 were laid-off in August 2010 for a period of four weeks and appellant 3 was on lay-off for a period of four months and then made redundant. They were not in receipt of any remuneration from the employer, during this period of lay-off. The appellants were in receipt of Social Welfare during the period of lay- off.

The appellants brought a claim under the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 stating that they were entitled to be fully remunerated for the periods of lay-off. The claim was initially heard before the Rights Commissioner who by determination issuing on the 21st September, 2012 found that the respondent had not contravened it's obligation under Section 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991 which said section generally prohibits employers from making deductions in wages save in circumstances specifically provided for and regulated for in Section 5. It is noted that the respondent/employer was present at the hearing before the Rights Commissioner and the employer asserted that it had been the custom and practice of the company never to pay wages during lay off periods, a view not shared by the appellants.

The Payment of Wages Act, 1991 prohibits the employer from deducting the wages of an employee unless specifically provided for by Statute (e.g. for Income Tax purposes) or where there has been prior agreement of the parties.

Lay-off is defined in Irish Law in the Redundancy Payments Act of 1967 at section 11 (1) as follows:

"Where after the commencement of this Act an employee's employment ceases by reason of his employer being unable to provide the work for which the employee was employed to do, and

1. It is reasonable in the circumstances for that employer to believe that the cessation of employment will not be permanent, and
2. The employer gives notice to that effect to the employee prior to the cessation, that cessation of employment shall be regarded for the purposes of this Act as a lay-off.

It is certain that the Employer must therefore establish two things before a lay-off as defined can have any relevance and/or application in the particular workplace. Firstly, the employer must give notice of an upcoming cessation of employment. Secondly, the employer must reasonably believe that the said cessation will not be permanent.

The Tribunal is satisfied that the employer gave notice. That notice was produced at the hearing. The letter is dated the 17th June, 2010 and states "We regret to advise you that due to the completion of a number of ongoing projects, and the unavailability of alternative work it is necessary to place you on temporary lay-off. The Temporary lay –off will start week commencing Friday 25 June, 2010. We are monitoring the situation and will update you at the earliest opportunity." The Tribunal is also satisfied that the company's genuine belief, at the material time, that the lay -off would not be permanent was in fact correct. Appellant 1 and appellant 3 returned to work following the period of lay off and to date is still working for the respondent.

No evidence was adduced by the appellants as to what their belief was at the material time. The Tribunal note that whilst it is the employer's belief that is relevant, the appellants' views on the matter, if backed up with relevant facts, can have a persuasive value.

At common law there is no general right to lay-off without pay. However, it has always been accepted that there are some limited circumstances wherein there will be such a right. This right can be implied so that for example in the UK case of Browning and Others v Crumlin Valley Collieries (1926) 1 KB 698 the Court found the there was an implied term that a mine owner could lay off miners without pay while repairs are effected through no fault of the mine owners.

In the matter at hearing the situation is much stronger than in the Browning case in that the terms during that period of lay-off where specifically agreed between the union and the respondent. Even in circumstances where the agreement between the parties was found to be void or unenforceable, it is well established at common law that lay-off without pay may be operable where an employer can demonstrate it has been the custom and practice of the trade and/or workplace and that the custom must be reasonable, certain and notorious. This concept is referred to by Mr. Justice Jelp in Devonald and Rosser (1906) 2 KB 728 wherein he affirms (a previous finding of Lord Denman in R v Stoke upon Trent):

"A custom so universal that no workman could be supposed to have entered into this service without looking to it as part of the Contract"

It is worth noting that the line of legal authority which highlights the need for a custom which allows for lay-off without pay to be a certain and notorious custom, has generally been considered in cases where the contract of employment has been silent on the issue of lay-off. The circumstances which currently present themselves are distinguishable insofar as there is a very clear provision in the contract of employment and in the company handbook for the appellants lay-off and there is an agreement in relation to the non payment of wages during that period. If there wasn't such an agreement or if that agreement, as stated earlier was held to be unenforceable then the Tribunal must therefore decide whether a contractual right to lay-off gives a further implied right to withhold pay.

In the Irish case of John Lawe -v- Irish Country Meats Limited 1998 ELR p266 wherein the issues of an employer's right to lay-off without pay and the issue of the recognised custom and practise applicable in the workplace were considered by the learned Judge White in the Circuit Court. The Judge accepted that there is no inherent right to lay-off without pay at common law though he further recognised that there are certain limited circumstances which give rise to the right to lay-off without pay. This included a situation where an employer is able to establish that the entitlement arises out of well-established custom and practise. In the Lawe case a lay-off without pay was affected and whilst there was a recognised custom and practice which allowed for lay-off in certain circumstances none of these circumstances had applied here, and the employer had in fact used the lay-off process as a preliminary step to redundancy. The lay off in Lawe further lacked the reasonable belief that the cessation in employment would not be permanent as is required under the section 11 definition.

Judge White said (at page 271):-

"If the Lay-Off was intended to be temporary and the custom and practise…applied…and notice was given that the lay-off would be temporary, the company was entitled to lay-off without pay"

The Tribunal must ask itself, therefore, if the reasonable implication of this observation of the learned Judge is that he accepted that a lay-off when correctly and honestly utilised carries an implication that there will be no pay for the duration of lay-off.

In the case of Industrial Yarns -v- Greene (1984) ILRM 15 to the Tribunal. In that case, Costello J considered the nature of the Contract of Employment once the Lay-off (as envisaged in sections 11 through 13 of the 1967 Act) has come into operation. The Honourable Judge found that where such a person is laid off on foot of a notice and where there is a reasonable belief that the cessation of work will not be permanent the contract of employment is not rescinded or at an end. The appellants makes the case that if the contract of employment subsists after the fact of lay off then the rights and obligations flowing from same must also subsist and that must include the right to be fully paid. The Tribunal cannot accept that this is a logical extension of what Costello J said. In the context of the Judgement the Judge was dealing with the employer's erroneous use of Section 11 as a vehicle for forcing employees to seek redundancy and forgo their entitlement to Minimum Notice. The Judge recognises that Lay-off under Section 11 is supposed to provide an interim measure of relief without having an overall negative effect on the Contract of Employment. The Judge recognises that a fundamental aspect of any contract of employment is being put to one side (i.e. the right to be provided with work) and that this is possible to do without necessarily terminating the contract and without impacting negatively on other reliefs, benefits and obligations so that for example – service still continues to accrue. It is noted by the Tribunal that Judge Costello was not asked to consider the issue of the right to lay-off with or without pay.

The Tribunal notes that wages are defined in the Payment of Wages Act 1991 as:-

"wages", in relation to an employee, means any sum payable to the employee by the employer in connection with his employment, including-

1. any fee, bonus or commission or any holiday, sick or maternity pay or any other emolument referable to his employment whether payable under his contract of employment or otherwise,…..

Therefore in reconciling the definitions which the Tribunal must give consideration to, it is noted that "wages" arise in "connection with employment", and "lay-off" arises for periods of "cessation of employment". It is not absurd to suggest that a lay off which gives rise to a cessation of work must by implication also give rise to a cessation of wages.

Having considered the law in the area and the able arguments presented by the appellants representation, the Tribunal cannot agree that the appellants were entitled to be fully remunerated during the course of their lay-off.

The Tribunal is satisfied that the contract of employment specifically allowed for and recognised the periodic need to operate a scheme of lay off. The Tribunal is satisfied that the appellants union agreed on behalf of its members that there would be no pay during the period of lay off. The Tribunal is satisfied, and based on the evidence of JM, that the well established custom and practice in the industry is not to pay employees during periods of lay-off. The Tribunal is satisfied that the employer reasonably believed that the lay-off would not be permanent and that an appropriate notice to that effect was delivered thereby satisfying the requirements as defined in the Redundancy Payments Act, 1967. The Tribunal accepts that whilst the contract does not specify that there will be no wages payable during lay-off, there is a letter setting out the agreement reached between SIPTU and the respondent to that effect. Even in the absence of that agreement any other interpretation would be nonsense. The Tribunal would go so far as to say that the cessation of pay during periods of lay-off is self-evident. There would be no logic to the practise of lay off otherwise. Lay-off allows an employer to buy time to generate work, secure contracts and/or get over lull (sometimes seasonal) periods. The expectation is that normality will resume and an employer wants to avoid shedding an experienced workforce on a permanent basis.

At a national level it is noted that persons who are temporarily laid off are allowed to collect social welfare for such periods of lay-off, as the appellants did. It would defy logic if such a person found to be so entitled to social welfare would also be entitled to be fully remunerated for the same period. That would be contrary to the very well established principle in relation to double

The Tribunal heard undisputed evidence on technical breaches of the Terms of Employment (Information) Act 1994 and 2001. In circumstances where the appellants did receive contracts of employment and were not prejudiced by the breach of Section 3 referred to by the appellants representative the Tribunal uphold the decision of the Rights Commissioner.

heard this claim at Dublin on 26th January 2009

Claimant: In person

Respondent: In person

The determination of the Tribunal was as follows: -

Claimant's Case

She worked on a number of sites for the respondent. In February 08 she was moved to her last position. Almost immediately she had problems with her line manager. He humiliated her and ignored everything she said. The line manager also told her that women should not be managers or directors. He never clearly explained to her what she was expected to do at work.

The claimant wrote to the respondent on 8 September 08 complaining about her line manager. The director came to see her at work on 9 September 08 and she explained her issues to him. The director promised to investigate.

On 17 September 08 the director came to see her again. He had found no proof of wrong doing by the line manager. He told her she had 2 options, move to another location and accept a pay cut or stay where she was with her line manager.

The claimant felt she had no option but to leave. Verbally she gave one weeks notice and worked her notice. Later she faxed the director asking for a written report of his investigation. She did not get it. The claimant thought that the director did not investigate properly.

Respondent's Case

The director gave evidence. On 8 September 08 a client phoned the director. The claimant had sent an email to the client raising two issues. One issue was the claimant's trouble with the line manager. The director was disappointed that the matters were raised first with the client.

The director spoke to the staff. Nobody knew about the claimant's complaint. He also spoke to the line manager, who told him he was happy with the claimant's work.

At the second meeting with the claimant the director told her he could find no evidence to substantiate her complaint. He could not believe either the line manager or her.

The director never discussed a reduction of salary with the claimant. Had she decided she wanted to work at another location he would have had to move someone to make room for her. He hoped to sit down with the claimant and the line manager and work out the issue. Then the claimant could stay on site.

The claimant was adamant she could not stay. The director was at the site three days before the 8 September 08. She spoke to the claimant that day and she did not raise any issue with him.

Determination

For a claim for constructive dismissal to succeed the claimant needs to satisfy the Tribunal that her working conditions were such that she had no choice but to resign. The Tribunal is satisfied that the claimant had difficulties with her line manager. However for a period of six months she did not attempt to resolve the issue.

When the director learned of the claimant's difficulty he made efforts to resolve the issue. The Tribunal is satisfied that the claimant did not exhaust the grievance procedure before she resigned. Accordingly the Tribunal finds that the claimant was not constructively dismissed. The claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to 2001 fails.

Respondent: Mr Stephen O'Sullivan BL instructed by Mr Enda Moran of

The determination of the Tribunal is as follows:

The fact of dismissal was not in dispute.

Background

The respondent is a transport and courier service provider. The respondent has two computer systems that are not connected to each other. The transport system is used to record work contracted for and the resulting deliveries made. The accounting system is used to record and monitor the respondent's financial transactions. A small proportion of the respondent's business is COD.

The COD procedure was outlined for the Tribunal. When a retailer wants a COD done it emails the respondent. The job is entered on the transport system and the job is dispatched. When the goods are delivered the base controller closes it on the transport system.

Later that day or the next day the driver comes to reception with the money, typically €18.50. The amount is marked paid on the transport system. The money is put into an envelope and the driver's work number, the date and the amount are written on the outside. Several days' worth of payments could be put into a single envelope. It was the claimant's responsibility to take payments from drivers and put them in an envelope. If a job remains marked unpaid on the transport system the amount is deducted from the driver's pay. When an envelope comes to the credit controller she enters the details on the accounting system and lodges the money.

At that time the transport system was not checked against the accounting system for discrepancies. A number of drivers complained that their pay had been incorrectly deducted for money that they had paid to the claimant. When the credit controller investigated she found a number of instances where jobs were marked paid on the transport system but no corresponding envelopes arrived to her, and as a result jobs were marked paid on the transport system but remained marked unpaid on the accounting system.

Determination

The claimant commenced employment with the respondent company on the 7th February 2000. Up until January/February 2014 there was no issue with her employment. She was described as an excellent trustworthy employee. In late 2013 early 2014 an issue arose in relation to the logging in of jobs on the transport system. Essentially what it amounts to is, money went missing. The Tribunal's role is not to assess the guilt or innocence of the claimant. The Tribunal's role is to assess the fairness of the dismissal.

The claimant was singled out as the person responsible for the misappropriation of monies. An investigation of sorts was embarked upon. Statements were taken however these statements could not and were not given to the claimant as they were taken after her dismissal. The MD took notes from interviews which he kept in his diary. They were not given to the claimant. The letter dated 31 March 2014 lacks specific allegations against the claimant. The meeting letter dated 9 April 2014 suggests a predetermined conclusion concerning the missing money "The time frame allowed between meetings should give you the opportunity to provide evidence as to the whereabouts of the missing CODs".

No forensic IT analysis was done to determine who manipulated/altered the data input/output. The notes of the meeting did not accurately reflect even the MD's evidence of what was said. The claimant was not given a copy of the meeting notes to agree. Until this Hearing she didn't have sight of them. She was not given the right of appeal.

It is for the reasons set out above that the Tribunal finds that the claimant was unfairly dismissed. The claim under the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2007 succeeds.

The claimant has a legal obligation to mitigate her loss. The onus on the claimant in this regard is a high one. Evidence was introduced in relation to jobs the claimant applied for. The job applications made were confined to between January 2015 and June 2015. Over a 1 year and 7 month period the Tribunal would expect to see more applications spread out over that time period.

The Tribunal awards the claimant the sum of €20,000.00.

Kelly & Griffin, Solicitors, 77 Terenure Road North, Terenure, Dublin 6w

Respondent(s) :
Mr. Ken Stafford, Management Consultancy Services,
7 Castletown Court, Celbridge, Co Kildare

Claimant's case

The claimant brought this case for unfair dismissal to the Tribunal on the basis that he had no alternative but to resign and therefore was constructively dismissed from his employment.

The claimant commenced employment with the respondent on 16th August 1993. Initially he was a skipper on board a Trawler owned by the respondent and then he became a lorry driver. In 2001 the claimant became Assistant Manager in the respondent's shellfish processing plant and in 2002 he took over as Manager when the previous Manager left. The claimant did not receive any formal training but learned on the job.

The claimant gave evidence of certain practices which he was forced to participate in during the course of his employment. Some of these were:

- Ensure that sodium hydro chlorine [a bleaching agent] was put on the tables where the samples were to be taken for testing by the Sea Fisheries Board;

- To pack any product that fell on the floor or was otherwise damaged, failing which he was told to get out the door in vulgar language;

- Product returned was to be re-packaged and distributed again once all traceability had been removed;

- Illegally dumping contaminated product at night, in different harbours. This was done because, even though the respondent had a dumping permit, it was cheaper to do it this way;

- Instructed to dip shellfish in Sodium Metabisulfite to extend its shelf life;

- The claimant's son when working there was told to forge signatures on certain documents.

The claimant was belittled in front of staff and so called management meetings were used by the respondent MD to roar, shout and generally badger staff including the claimant.

In June 2009 the claimant was told that his salary was being reduced to €40,000.00 per annum. This was a cut of €10,000.00 per annum and he was told that this was to be given to the MD's son who was going to be the General Manager. This announcement was made in front of staff in the canteen. The claimant was also demoted to Assistant Manager. The claimant did not agree to this demotion or reduction in pay and thought the pay reduction had been decided against until it actually occurred in Dec 2009. At this point the claimant approached the respondent and asked why his pay had been cut and was told that it had been discussed in June and that if he did not like it he was told in unacceptable language that 'he knew where the door was'. During the period from June to December 2009 the claimant felt that his management position was being undermined and that he had been reduced to a "General Dogs Body". He was now being instructed to carry out tasks such as repairing a gate and collecting product in the lorry from various harbours. The claimant was also told that a new Production Manager was going to be appointed and if that person did not like the claimant he would fire him. He requested a Contract of Employment but was not given one even though other staff were.
The claimant never received any verbal or written warning in relation to his work.

The Claimant went on sick leave in January 2010 due to work related stress. There was no written agreement in relation to pay while on sick leave but there had been precedence in relation to this whereby staff were paid while on sick leave. However the claimant's pay was stopped as soon as he went out sick.

While the claimant was on sick leave he heard that the respondent was advertising for someone to replace him. The claimant engaged a solicitor who corresponded with the respondent's representative on a number of occasions between 28th January 2010 and 17th June 2010. This correspondence culminated in the decision by the claimant that he had no choice but to resign from his employment with the respondent. The claimant resigned by letter dated 25th June 2010.

Copies of all written correspondence between the representatives were submitted to the Tribunal.

A former work colleague of the claimant gave evidence that during her time working with the respondent it was common to peel off labels from returned product and re-distribute it. Furthermore she often had to wash prawns in fairy liquid to 'give them a better look'.

The claimant's son gave evidence that he was asked by the respondent to forge certain documents and re-label and re-package stock.

Respondent's case

The Respondent MD confirmed the claimant's dates of employment and the fact that he was promoted to Production Manager in 2002. The claimant was Assistant Manager for a year previous to that and when he took over the role of Production Manager the respondent asked him if he was confident to do so and was told yes.

However as the plant began to increase output it became clear that the claimant was not up to the task of Production Manager. Therefore in or around June 2009 the respondent informed the claimant that he was to be demoted to Assistant Manager and that the owner's son was to take on more responsibility. Along with this demotion there was to be a €10,000.00 decrease in pay per annum. The claimant verbally agreed to this pay cut and demotion. Although the pay cut was agreed in June it was not put in place until December 2009.

The respondent denied that there was ever such a post as General Manager and that the claimant was a Production Manager before being demoted to Assistant Manager. It was also denied that the respondent advertised for a replacement for the claimant while the claimant was on sick leave or that he told the claimant they were going to hire a new Production Manager who would sack the claimant if he did not like him.

The MD disputed the evidence of the claimant in relation to dubious work practices and that he was never prosecuted and had a good relationship with the Department of the Marine. While he agreed that he did dump waste at sea he also sold waste to customers in France.

He agreed that he used bad language to the claimant but it was not personal.

In relation to the correspondence entered into after the claimant went on sick leave he gave evidence that the first letter from his solicitor was sent without his permission.

Determination

The claimant gave evidence of an employment history where, at least from early June 2009 onwards, he was subjected to bullying, harassment, subjected to foul and abusive language, belittled, criticised in front of staff, forced to engage in dubious and appalling work practices, demoted from manager to assistant manager, and having his salary cut by €10,000 per annum. The respondent MD gave evidence that he did demote the claimant, reduce his salary by €10,000 and used bad language to the claimant but disputed the remainder of the claimant's evidence. The claimant tried to engage the respondent in relation to his grievances but the respondent refused to enter discussions with him. The claimant was stressed as a result of the way he was treated and went on certified sick leave in January 2010.

He instructed his solicitorto write to the respondent to try and resolve the differences. The respondent engaged a solicitorto reply to the initial letter written by the claimant's solicitor. However at the Tribunal hearingthe MD gave evidence that the solicitor engaged by him did not have authority to write in theterms in which he did. This seems strange to the Tribunal because it is difficult to imagine asolicitor writing a letter without the instructions of his client. The Tribunal wonders how wouldthe solicitor know what to write in such circumstances? In any case the respondent engagedanother representative to respond to the letters from the claimant's solicitor. Presumably therespondent's new representative was writing having taken instructions from the respondent. TheTribunal is satisfied that the correspondence exchanged demonstrated an un-willingness on thepart of the respondent to engage in a meaningful way to resolve the claimant's legitimategrievances. Having failed to resolve his grievances the claimant resigned by letter dated the25th June 2010 and claimed constructive dismissal.

A constructive dismissal will occur when an employee terminates his Contract of Employment where, because of the employer's conduct, the employee was entitled to terminate his Contract without notice or where it was reasonable for him to do so. It has been well established that a question of constructive dismissal must be considered under two headings – entitlement and reasonableness. An employee must act reasonably in terminating his Contract of Employment. Resignation must not be the first option taken by an employee and all other reasonable options, including following the grievance procedure, must be explored. An employee must pursue his grievance through the procedures laid down before taking the drastic step of resigning. Unfortunately there was no Grievance Procedure that the claimant could invoke. Indeed the claimant did not even have a contract of employment despite having requested one. Where there is no Grievance Procedure, as in the claimant's case, the claimant must act reasonably.

The Tribunal has to decide whether the Claimant was constructively dismissed. It is clear that the Claimant resigned from his employment on the 25th June 2010. The Claimant is claiming that he was dismissed by construction as envisaged by Section 1of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (the Act).

Although the term "Constructive Dismissal" is not specifically mentioned in the Act, it is the term commonly understood to refer to that part of the Definition Section of the Act, which states: "dismissal in relation to an employee means the termination by the employee of his contract of employment with his employer whether prior notice of determination was or was not given to the employer, in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer the employee was or would have been entitled or it was or would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment without giving prior notice of the termination to the employee".

The Tribunal must consider whether because of the Employer's conduct the Claimant was entitled to terminate his contract or it was reasonable for him to do so.

An employee is entitled to terminate the contract only when the employer is guilty of conduct which amounts to a significant breach going to the root of the contract or shows that the employer no longer intends to be bound by one or more of the essential terms of the contract. In the case of Brady v Newman UD 330/1979 the Tribunal stated

> "….. An employer is entitled to expect his employee to behave in a manner which will preserve his employer's reasonable trust and confidence in him so also must the employer behave".

Having considered all the evidence carefully the Tribunal determines that the claimant was constructively dismissed and that the Employer was guilty of conduct which amounted to a significant breach of the contract and that he failed utterly to engage with the claimant to resolve the claimant's grievances. The Tribunal further determines that compensation is the most appropriate remedy under the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2001 and awards the Claimant €30,000.

The claim under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts, 1973 to 2005 fails.

No evidence was adduced in respect of the claim under the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997 and therefore that claim is dismissed.

OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF EQUALITY INVESTIGATIONS

EMPLOYMENT EQUALITY ACT, 1998

EQUALITY OFFICER'S DECISION DEC-E2002-050

PARTIES

Margetts
(Represented by Mandate)

AND

Graham Anthony & Co, Ltd
(Represented by Denis McSweeney, Solicitors)

File reference: EE/2001/046
Date of issue: 27 November 2002

1. DISPUTE

1.1 This dispute concerns a claim by Ms Mary Margetts that she was discriminated against by Graham Anthony & Co Ltd on the grounds of marital status, family status and age contrary to the provisions of the Employment Equality Act, 1998 when she was offered part-time employment instead of the full-time employment she had sought.

1.2 On behalf of the complainant, Mandate Trade Union referred a claim to the Director of Equality Investigations on 27 February 2001 under the Employment Equality Act, 1998. In accordance with her powers under section 75 of that Act, the Director then delegated the case on 8 March 2001 to Anne-Marie Lynch, an Equality Officer, for investigation, hearing and decision and for the exercise of other relevant functions of the Director under Part VII of the Act. Submissions were sought from both parties and a joint hearing was held on 3 May 2002. Subsequent correspondence with the parties concluded on 3 July 2002.

2. SUMMARY OF THE COMPLAINANT'S CASE

2.1 The complainant is separated with two teenage children. She was a qualified beauty therapist, and had operated her own beauty salon for five years between 1993 and 1998. In early September 2000, the complainant said she replied to the respondent's advertisement for counter staff for a range of skin care products being launched in a Galway department store. She was invited for interview on 8 September, which she attended in a hotel together with two other applicants.

2.2 The complainant said that she had told the interviewer that she was looking for full-time work, but agreed she would accept part-time on the basis that it may subsequently lead to full-time employment. She said the interviewer asked her if she was married and also asked if she had children. The complainant was offered a twelve-hour week, and she said the two other interviewees were offered full-time employment, one being given a thirty-hour week and the second being offered the position of counter manager and a thirty-nine hour week. Both of these interviewees were single, did not have family responsibilities as defined in the 1998 Act, and both were younger than the complainant.

2.3 The complainant started work on 16 September. She did not receive a contract, and was never advised of any probationary period. On 4 December she was dismissed by her employer, which dismissal was referred to the Labour Court under the terms of the 1998 Act.

2.4 The complainant said her claim was based on the fact that there was no justifiable reason why she should be asked questions at an interview about her marital and family status. She claimed that the offer of part-time employment constituted less favourable treatment by the employer because of her family status, marital status and age, contrary to her statutory rights under the 1998 Act.

3. SUMMARY OF THE RESPONDENT'S CASE

3.1 The Managing Director of the respondent company said that it was a wholesale distribution company for beauty products. In September 2000, it was intended to launch a new skincare range in a department store and the Managing Director was asked to recruit staff for the product. It was decided that the necessary staff complement was three persons: one to work thirty-nine hours per week and act as the counter manager, a second to work a twenty-hour week and a third to work a twelve-hour week. An advertisement was inserted in a local newspaper, which stated:

"Counter staff required for exciting skin care line launching in [department store] in September. Beauty therapist experience an advantage, excellent package on offer for suitable candidate. Please forward CV to..."

3.2 The respondent said that approximately eleven or twelve applications were received and six or seven people were invited for interview on 8 September 2000. These interviews were carried out by the Managing Director alone. He said that the key to his selection of particular interviewees was their experience. The candidate chosen for the counter manager position, Ms B, had had extensive experience in cosmetics and in managing staff. Ms C, who was offered a twenty-hour week, was currently working in another store doing similar work, and had extensive experience in make-up and consultation. The complainant's experience was mostly in beauty therapy and professional treatments. Her background was less strong in retail experience and she had been out of the workplace for some time. As the candidate with less experience, she was offered shorter hours.

3.3 The respondent said that the gap in the complainant's curriculum vitae was the reason why the issue of her marital and family status arose, and said she had volunteered the information. The Managing Director had known her professionally some years before, when she operated her own salon, and he had asked her why her business had ceased. According to him, the complainant said that she had separated and was raising her two children.

3.4 The respondent denied that it had discriminated against the complainant on any of the three grounds cited, or at all.

4. INVESTIGATION AND CONCLUSIONS OF THE EQUALITY OFFICER

4.1 In reaching my conclusions in this case I have taken into account all of the submissions, both oral and written, made to me by the parties.

4.2 The complainant alleged that the respondent discriminated against her on the grounds of marital status, family status and age contrary to the provisions of the Employment Equality Act, 1998. Section 6 of the Act provides that discrimination shall be taken to occur where one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated, on one of the discriminatory grounds, which include marital status, family status and age. Section 8 provides that

(1)In relation to-

(a) access to employment...

(b) conditions of employment...

an employer shall not discriminate against an employee or prospective employee...

(6) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1), an employer shall be taken to discriminate against an employee or prospective employee in relation to conditions of employment if, on any of the discriminatory grounds, the employer does not offer or afford to that employee or prospective employee or to a class of persons of whom he or she is one-

(a) the same terms of employment (other than remuneration or pension rights),

(b) the same working conditions, and

(c) the same treatment in relation to overtime, shift work, short time, transfers, lay-offs, redundancies, dismissals and disciplinary measures, as the employer offers or affords to another person or class of persons, where the circumstances in which both such persons or classes are or would be employed are not materially different.

4.3 It will be noted that there were certain facts which were in dispute between the parties. The complainant asserted that there were only three candidates for interview, while the respondent said that six or seven candidates were interviewed. The complainant also asserted that Ms C was offered employment of thirty hours per week, while the respondent said she was offered twenty. The parties were not asked to provide evidence of their respective claims, as I concluded that these discrepancies were not of material relevance. The complainant claimed discrimination by comparison with the two other candidates actually offered employment, and Ms C was offered longer hours than the complainant, whether the total was twenty hours or thirty hours.

Burden of proof

4.4 The traditional approach taken to complaints of discrimination on the original ground of sex in the case law of the European Court of Justice, and sex and marital status in the caselaw of the Labour Court and Equality Officers, has been that once a complainant establishes a prima facie case of discrimination, the onus then moves to the respondent to rebut the presumption of discrimination. This common law approach has become the statutory requirement in complaints of gender discrimination in employment following the transposition of Council Directive 97/80/EC into Irish law on 18 July 2001 by means of the European Communities (Burden of Proof in Gender Discrimination Cases) Regulations, 2001 (SI 337 of 2001). The Regulations provide that > [w]here in any proceedings facts are established by or on behalf of a person from which it may be presumed that there has been direct or indirect discrimination in relation to him or her, it shall be for the other party concerned to prove the contrary.

4.5 The Employment Equality Act, 1998 introduced seven new grounds of discrimination, not drawn directly from European Union Directives or European Court of Justice case law. The Council Directive and the Regulations mentioned above are not directly applicable to grounds other than gender, but this approach appears to me to be fully consistent with the development of discrimination case law. It has become the standard approach of Equality Officers in deciding cases under the 1998 Act, such as on the disability ground in Harrington v East Coast Area Health Board (DEC-E2002-001) and on the race ground in Eng v St James's Hospital (DEC-E2001-041), and I intend to apply it to this complaint on the marital status, family status and age grounds.

4.6 The first requirement, therefore, is for the complainant to establish facts from which it may be presumed that the principle of equal treatment has not been applied to him or her. In the case of Teresa Mitchell v Southern Health Board (Cork University Hospital) (AEE/99/8), the Labour Court said "...this approach means that the appellant must first prove as a fact one or more of the assertions on which her complaint of discrimination is based. A prima facie case of discrimination can only arise if the appellant succeeds in discharging this evidential burden. If she does, the respondent must prove she was not discriminated against on grounds of her gender. If she does not, her case cannot succeed."

Complaint of discrimination on the marital status and family status grounds

4.7 The complainant asserted that she was asked if she was married and whether she had children, and that there was no justifiable reason for this. The respondent, on the other hand, stated that the complainant volunteered this information when asked about the closure of her former business.

4.8 It is feasible that an employer may need to know an employee's marital or family status for pension purposes for example, but it is difficult to imagine a reason why such a question could be relevant at the interview stage. The 1998 Act prohibits discrimination on nine grounds, and to ask a question relating to one of these grounds at interview would at least suggest that the ground is a factor in the selection process. If there were a genuine link between the ground and the job requirements it would be covered by the occupational qualification exemptions provided for in the Act.

4.9 In this case, no evidence can be adduced by either party to support its version of events. However, I note that the complainant's curriculum vitae demonstrated that she had a gap of almost two years in her employment history, and I consider it reasonable for a prospective interviewer to question a candidate about such a gap. I note further that reference was made in her curriculum vitae to her two children. Therefore, on balance, I must consider it unlikely that the respondent asked her the question in the manner she suggested. As it must be a matter for the complainant to demonstrate the facts on which she bases her complaint, I cannot find that the respondent discriminated against her in relation to her marital status or her family status.

Complaint of discrimination on the age ground

4.10 The posts being filled were in for the promotion of beauty products in a department store. The advertisement said that beauty therapy experience would be an advantage, although it was not an essential requirement. The complainant had the beauty therapy experience, in the sense of providing professional treatments such as facials, but did not the retail experience, in the sense of promoting products. Neither of the other two candidates were beauty therapists, but they had extensive retail experience, as well as make up and beauty consultancy qualifications. In addition, Ms B had staff management experience. The complainant pointed out that Ms B and Ms C were in their mid-twenties, whereas she was in her forties. There was an obvious age disparity. However, I am satisfied on the evidence I obtained in the course of my investigation that she was not better qualified than the other two candidates taking into account the requirements of the job.

4.11 It is not enough just to demonstrate a difference upon which one can ground a complaint under the 1998 Act, such as the fact that there is a difference in marital status, sexual orientation or age between the successful candidates and the complainant. The law relating to the issue of a presumption of discrimination or the drawing of an inference of discrimination was considered by Quirke J in Davis v Dublin Institute of Technology (High Court, 2000, unreported). That case was an appeal to the High Court on a point of law from a Labour Court determination of a complaint of sex discrimination taken under the Employment Equality Act, 1977. The judge concluded

"In cases where discrimination on grounds of sex is alleged to have occurred contrary to the provisions of section 2 (a) of the 1977 Act the fact that there is a gender difference between the successful and unsuccessful applicants for a post or for promotion does not, by itself, require tribunals such as the Labour Court to look to an employer for an explanation...A primary finding of fact by such a tribunal of discrimination or of a significant difference between the qualifications of the candidates "together with" a gender difference may give rise to such a requirement..."

Since no evidence was provided which would lead to a finding of fact that the complainant was the best qualified candidate, I cannot find that she has established a prima facie case of discrimination.

4.12 In Dublin Institute of Technology and a Worker (DEE994), the Labour Court said "It is not the responsibility of the Equality Officer or this court to decide who is the most meritorious candidate for a position. The function of the Court is to determine whether the sex or marital status of the complainant or the appointee influenced the decision of the Board." In this case, the candidates chosen by the respondent to work the longer hours had significant and relevant experience. I cannot find that her marital status, family status or age were factors in the decision to offer her shorter hours.

5. DECISION

5.1 Based on the foregoing, I find that Graham Anthony & Co Ltd did not discriminate against Mary Margetts on the grounds of marital status, family status and/or age, contrary to the provisions of the Employment Equality Act, 1998, when she was offered part-time employment.

Date of Issue: 27 March 2015

1.1 The case concerns a claim by Mr Tom Barrett (hereinafter referred to as "the complainant") that the Department of Defence (hereinafter referred to as "the respondent") subjected him to victimisation contrary to Section 74(2) of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2008.

1.2 The complainant referred a complaint under the Employment Equality Acts (hereinafter referred to as "The Acts") to the Director of the Equality Tribunal on 28 April 2011. On 21 June 2013, in accordance with his powers under S. 75 of the Acts, the Director delegated the case to me, Peter Healy, an Equality Officer, for investigation, hearing and decision and for the exercise of other relevant functions of the Director under Part VII of the Acts. On this date my investigation commenced. As required by Section 79(1) of the Acts and as part of my investigation, a hearing was held on 2 October 2013 and final submissions received from the complainant on the 23 October 2013.

1.3 The complainant has previously submitted complaints against the respondent under the Acts (most recent being DEC-E2009 -053) and submits that he had been subject to victimisation since 8 November 2010 following a Labour Court appeal process in regards to the decision.

2. Summary of the Complainant's Submission

2.1 The complainant was employed in the position of Assistant Principal Officer (APO) in the Department of Defence based in a Galway office. The complainant submits that he was "having idleness forced upon him" by the respondent in their failure to provide him with meaningful work.

2.2 The complainant submits that his victimisation primarily relates to the fact that he was not appointed to what he submits was a suitable position (in the pay-roll area). Instead another APO was appointed to that post. The complainant submits that he knows of no reasons for victimisation in this manner other than that he had previously taken a case against the respondent.

2.3 The complainant submits that the respondent generally excluded him from normal work matters and gave the following specific examples.

- • He was not introduced to the minister on the occasion of a Ministerial visit.
- • Not included in the circulation list for a specific E-Mail sent to all other managers.

2.4 The complainant submits that the victimisation was extremely detrimental to his personal wellbeing.

3. Summary of the Respondent's Submission

3.1 The respondent rejects all aspects of the complaint.

3.2 The respondent submits that the complainant has instituted proceedings against an individual who is not his employer and therefore his claim must fail.

3.3 The respondent submits that the complainant is estopped from instituting this complaint as they relate to the same circumstances and same cause of action as already adjudicated on in the previous proceedings. In this regard the respondent relies on the doctrine of res judicata.

3.4 The respondent submits that nothing in the complainants written submissions establish that he has suffered from adverse treatment as the respondent submits that the complainants position had remained unchanged since previous proceedings.

4. Decision

4.1 The complainant originally named the Secretary General of the Department of Defence as the respondent however in his written submission it is clear that the complainant had previously named the Department of Defence as his employer. I find the Department of Defence to be the correct respondent and this was agreed by the complainant in his final submission.

4.2 The complainant states that his victimisation began following the publication of Labour Court recommendation EDA 1017 on the 30th September 2010 and specifically from on the 8th November 2010 onwards and I must therefore consider if events from that date onwards constitute victimisation under the Acts.

4.3 Section 74 (2) of the Employment Equality Acts states:

> "For the purposes of this Part victimisation occurs where dismissal or other adverse treatment of an employee by his or her employer occurs as a reaction to a complaint of discrimination made by the employee to the employer."

As stated in by the Labour Court in EDA 1312, Frances Donnelly v National Gallery of Ireland:

"This section of the Acts is based on Article 11 of Directive 2000/78/EC on Equal Treatment in Employment and Education (The Framework Directive). Both the Acts and the Directive provide that victimisation occurs where a detriment is imposed on a worker 'as a reaction to' a complaint or other protected act. The use of the expression 'as a reaction to' connotes that the making of a complaint, or other protected act, must be an influencing factor in the decision to impose the impugned detriment although it need not be the only or indeed the principal reason for the decision."

4.4 Section 85A (1) of the Employment Equality Acts, states: "Where in any proceedings facts are established by or on behalf of a complainant from which it may be presumed that there has been discrimination in relation to him or her, it is for the respondent to prove the contrary." This means that the complainant must establish primary facts upon which the claim of discrimination is grounded and then the burden of proof passes to the respondent.

4.5 It is agreed by both parties that the complainants working conditions were unchanged before and after the 8th November 2010 up to early 2012 when the complainant was assigned to a new role. I must consider if efforts to find another role for the complainant were not facilitated by the respondent due to previous complaints taken under the Acts and I have considered all evidence put forward by both parties in this regard.

4.6 The complainant has submitted that he was victimised as he was not placed in a number of available roles. At the hearing the complainant gave direct evidence that it was his practice to reject roles that he felt would not suit his abilities. I am satisfied the complainants practice in this regard is not usual and would have made accommodating his requirements difficult for the respondent. At the hearing the complainant stated that he was currently fully occupied in a role that he enjoyed and was making an active contribution to his Department. It was agreed at the hearing, that this new role had been moved to Galway from another regional office solely for the complainants benefit. I accept that this required some organisational reorganisation by the respondent and needed to be arranged over an extended period of time. I accept that the respondent acted in a strategic manner to accommodate the complainant. I find that the there is no evidence of victimisation in regards to the filling of suitable vacancies but rather evidence of more favourable treatment for the complainant in the efforts made by the respondent to provide a post which the complainant considered satisfactory.

4.7 In his short written submission and in his evidence at the hearing the complainant based the majority of his case of victimisation on the fact that he had not been appointed to and APO role in the pay-roll division in late 2010. I accept the respondent's submission that it is not normal practice for APOs in the civil service to decide what role they wish to fill and then automatically be appointed to that post. I find that the appointment of another APO to the pay-role post is not evidence of less favourable treatment.

4.8 In addition to the issue of appointment to a suitable role, I have examined all evidence put forward by the complainant of less favourable treatment and find the following in relation to the specific examples provided,

- · In regards to the complainant not being introduced to the Minister. I find that this can only be speculation on the part of the complainant as he can not give evidence that all APOs had been introduced.
- · In regards to a number of E-Mails that were not circulated to the complainant, I have examined the E-mails in question and accept the respondents submission that they were simply not relevant to the complainant.

I therefore find that the complainant's allegations in regard to his isolation by the respondent is mere assertion unsupported by any evidence that demonstrates that actions by the respondent were a reaction to any complaint under the Acts.

4.9 At the hearing the complainant submitted that he would still be idle if he had not made his previous complaints under the Acts. This submission by the complainant is entirely contrary to the case of victimisation being made. I am satisfied that the complainant believes that his position has improved due to the lodgement of previous complaints and therefore I can find no detriment to the complainant as a result of taking any complaint under the Acts.

5. DECISION OF THE EQUALITY OFFICER.

I have concluded my investigation of this complaint and hereby make the following decision in accordance with Section 79(6) of the Employment Equality Acts that:

The complainant has failed to establish a prima facie case of victimisation.

Cork City Council

1. CLAIM

1.1 The case concerns a claim by Mr. Kieran Mc Carthy that Cork City Council discriminated against him on the age ground in terms of section 6(2)(f) of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 and 2004 in contravention of section 8 of the Act in relation to appointment to the post of Heritage Officer.

2. BACKGROUND

2.1 The complainant applied for the position of Heritage Officer and he was unsuccessful in his interview. He submits that he had vast experience and extensive qualifications and that the respondent believed he was too young to hold the position. The successful candidate was older. He alleges that he was discriminated against on the age ground. The respondent denies the allegation of discrimination and submits that the appointment to the post was made on merit alone and not on any discriminatory ground whatsoever.

2.2 The complainant referred a complaint under the Employment Equality Acts 1998 and 2004 to the Director of the Equality Tribunal on 5 September 2005. On 16 March 2007, in accordance with her powers under section 75 of that Act, the Director delegated the case to Mary Rogerson, an Equality Officer, for investigation, hearing and decision and for the exercise of other relevant functions of the Director under Part VII of the Act. A submission was received from the complainant on 7 February 2007 and from the respondent on 21 March 2007. A joint hearing of the claim was held on 8 October 2007. An application to extend the time limit for referring a complaint was submitted and a Direction to extend time was issued on 21 November 2007. Final material requested from the respondent was received on 14 March 2008.

3. SUMMARY OF THE COMPLAINANT'S SUBMISSION

3.1 The complainant applied for the post of Heritage Officer in December 2004. On 26 January 2005, the Recruitment Officer (Mr. B) for the respondent wrote to the complainant informing him that his written application had been unsuccessful and that he would not be called to attend for interview. On 3 February 2005, the complainant wrote to Mr. B expressing his dissatisfaction with the decision and asking him to specify the precise grounds upon which the selection board had elected not to proceed with his application to interview stage. Mr. B replied stating that although the selection board had deemed him to be qualified, it found his postgraduate experienced "did not demonstrate relevant heritage experience of sufficient calibre at an appropriate senior level."

3.2 Mr. B subsequently advised the complainant of the availability of an internal appeal of the decision not to call him to interview. On 24 February 2005, the complainant appealed the earlier decision of the selection board. By letter dated 28 February, the Personnel Officer, Mr. O' H responded that the appeal had been successful and that the complainant should attend for interview on 4 March 2005. The complainant attended for interview and was rigorously examined on the various duties of the post as detailed in the particulars of the post furnished by the personnel department of the respondent. During the course of approximately 35 minutes interview, each of the three interview board members took notes of the complainant's responses to the various questions put to him.

3.3 On 9 March 2005, Mr. B wrote to the complainant advising him that his interview had been unsuccessful. The complainant was subsequently provided with the interview results and the interview board comment sheet. The complainant submits that the marks awarded for performance at interview bear no resemblance to what actually took place and the complainant subsequently raised the matter with the Minister for the Environment, Heritage and Local Government. He subsequently advised that he had no jurisdiction to hear an appeal against the decision of the interview board.

3.4 The complainant contends that he was unfairly discriminated against by the respondent on the grounds of age contrary to section 6(2)(f) of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 and 2004 on two occasions. The first such occasion occurred on 26 January 2005 when the decision not to call the complainant to interview was communicated to him and the second occurred on 9 March 2005 when he was advised that his interview was unsuccessful. On both these occasions, the respondent sought to justify its decision on the sole basis that the complainant did not possess sufficient heritage experience. This apparent justification is without foundation and has been offered merely in an effort to disguise the real reason behind the decision not to award the post to the complainant. The complainant submits that the respondent believes that irrespective of his vast experience and extensive qualifications, his client is too young to hold such a position.

4. SUMMARY OF THE RESPONDENT'S SUBMISSION

4.1 The respondent rejects that any of its actions in the matter of the complainant's application related to his age. Indeed, the respondent was never aware of the precise age of any candidate as such information was not sought on the application form. The complainant in his statement produces absolutely no evidence whatsoever to suggest that age was a factor in any decision of the respondent.

4.2 Whilst the complainant alleges that the respondent discriminated against him on the grounds of age on two occasions, the first such allegation refers to the original decision not to call him for interview. The complainant was originally not short listed based on the information submitted on his application form. When he queried the matter, he was advised that the reason for this was that he "did not demonstrate relevant heritage experience of sufficient calibre at an appropriate senior level." In submitting his appeal against that decision, the complainant made absolutely no reference whatsoever to his age nor did he even suggest that his age might have been a factor in the decision not to call him for interview.

4.3 The decision to allow the complainant's appeal was based on the complainant's submission and the question of his age was never referred to by him nor was it ever considered by Mr. O' H, the Personnel Officer on appeal. Mr. O' H submits that he had no reason to do so and he is still uncertain as to the complainant's precise age and he never had any reason to ascertain it.

4.4 At interview stage, the board comment sheet stated that the complainant "would benefit from relevant experience in the heritage area" and this was based on the panel's assessment of the candidate on foot of his interview and the evidence submitted to the panel in his application form. The interview panel was unaware of the complainant's age and never sought that information nor considered it as a factor. The complainant's complaint does not indicate in what way the respondent allegedly discriminated against him on the age ground and the Tribunal is requested to dismiss the claim.

5. CONCLUSIONS OF THE EQUALITY OFFICER

5.1 In this case, the complainant alleges that the respondent directly discriminated against him on the age ground in relation to appointment to the post of Heritage Officer. I will consider whether the respondent directly discriminated against the complainant on the age ground in terms of section 6(2)(f) of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 and 2004 in contravention of section 8 of the Act. In making my Decision in this case, I have taken into account all of the evidence, both written and oral, submitted to me by the parties. An issue arose at the hearing of this matter as to whether the complaint was referred in time and the complainant subsequently sought an extension of time. A Direction (DIR-E2007-014) to extend the time limit for referring the claim was granted on 21 November 2007 on the basis that reasonable cause had been shown as to why the complaint was not referred in time. The respondent did not appeal the Direction within the forty two days for appeal. Material in relation to the competition was provided by the respondent on 14 March 2008.

5.2 Section 6(1) of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 and 2004 provides that:

…… discrimination shall be taken to occur where- a person is treated less favourably than another person is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation on any of the grounds mentioned in subsection (2) (in this Act referred to as 'the discriminatory grounds'

Section 6(2) provides that as between any two persons, the discriminatory grounds are, inter alia:

(a) that they are of different ages, but subject to subsection (3) (in this Act referred to as "the age ground"),

Caselaw on establishing a prima facie case of discrimination

5.3 The Labour Court in the case of Flexo Computer Stationery Limited v. Coulter[1] stated:

"It is now established in the jurisprudence of this court that in all cases of alleged discrimination a procedural rule for the shifting of the probative burden similar to that contained in the European Communities (Burden of Proof in Gender Discrimination Cases) Regulations 2001 (S.I. No 337 of 2001) should be applied. The test for determining when the burden of proof shifts is that formulated by the Court in Mitchell v Southern Health [2001] ELR 201. This places the evidential burden on the complainant to establish the primary facts on which they rely and to satisfy the Court that those facts are of sufficient significance to raise an inference of discrimination. If those two limbs of the test are satisfied the onus shifts to the respondent to prove that the principle of equal treatment was not infringed."

The Labour Court subsequently stated in DPP v. Sheehan[2]:

"What the complainant must establish is a factual matrix from which the Court may properly draw an inference that discrimination has occurred. There is no exhaustive list of factors which can be regarded as indicative of discrimination in the filling of employment vacancies. However, an inference of discrimination can arise where, for example, a less qualified man is appointed in preference to a more qualified woman (Wallace v. South Eastern Education and Library Board [1980] IRLR 193). It can also arise from an unexplained procedural unfairness in the selection process."

Shortlisting process

5.4 The complainant submits he was 28 at the time of the competition and that the successful candidate was between 5 and 10 years older than him. The complainant claims that he was discriminated against initially in relation to the shortlisting process when he was advised that he would not be called to interview. Candidates were shortlisted by reference to three criteria which were (i) qualifications, (ii) whether they had 3 years post graduate experience and (iii) relevant experience. The shortlisting process was undertaken by Mr. S who was a member of the Heritage Council and Ms. B, Senior Planner and the person to whom the Heritage Officer reports. Mr. H subsequently sat on the interview board. According to the shortlisting summary sheet, after the shortlisting process was concluded, nine people were called for interview. The complainant was advised by letter dated 26 January 2005 that his application would not be taken to the interview stage. No reason was given in that letter for the decision not to shortlist him.

5.5 The complainant subsequently sought the precise reasons upon which the respondent elected not to proceed with his application to interview stage. He was subsequently advised by letter dated 14 February 2005 that the shortlisting process consisted of a review by a selection board of each candidate's application. He was advised that applicants were shortlisted on the basis of both qualifications and experience and that in relation to qualifications, he was deemed qualified but that in relation to post graduate experience, his application form did not demonstrate relevant heritage experience of sufficient calibre at an appropriate senior level. The shortlisting summary sheet indicates by means of ticking a box under each criterion that the complainant met the required standard in relation to qualifications and post graduate experience but that he had insufficient relevant experience. There is no further comment on the shortlisting summary sheet in relation to the reasons why candidates were shortlisted/not shortlisted as the case may be. The information in the letter dated 14 February 2005 appears to have been communicated to the complainant following discussion with the shortlisting board members and this may account for the discrepancy between what is recorded on the summary sheet and the contents of the letter dated 14 February 2005 to the complainant. In a case concerning a claim of discrimination on the gender and age grounds in a shortlisting process, the Labour Court has held that " .... in absence of unfairness in the selection process, or manifest irrationality in the result, it will not seek to undertake its own assessment of candidates or substitute its views on their relative merits for those arrived at by the designated selectors...."[3] In this case, candidates were shortlisted according to three pre-determined criteria and in the absence of unfairness or manifest irrationality in the result of the shortlisting process, I will not proceed to undertake my own assessment of candidates. On the balance of probabilities, I find that the complainant has failed to establish a prima facie case of discrimination on the age ground in relation to the shortlisting process for the post of Heritage Officer.

Interview process

5.6 The complainant was subsequently called to interview after he appealed the outcome of the shortlisting process. The interview board consisted of three persons, one of whom had previously sat on the shortlisting board. The respondent stated at the hearing that the decision to shortlist the complainant and call him for interview was based on administrative practicality in that an interview could be accommodated by the Board. This decision to progress the complainant's application to the interview stage appears to have been made without reference to the merits of the complainant's application. The person specification in relation to the post of Heritage Officer stated that candidates shall possess a relevant third level degree qualification and have a minimum of three years post graduate experience in a high level heritage related field. It gives examples of a degree in archaeology, earth/natural sciences, genealogy, planning and architecture as being relevant degrees. It also states that candidates shall possess good communication skills, good organisational and management skills, be enterprising, innovative and capable of working on his/her own initiative. It also states that knowledge of local authority structures would be an advantage.

5.7 I note that the successful candidate does not state the years that she completed her secondary education and it is therefore not possible to try to determine her age from her CV. I note also that the person who was placed number 2 on the panel completed his/her Leaving Certificate in 1994 whereas the complainant completed his Leaving Certificate in 1996. It is likely that the person who was placed second on the panel was one/two years older than the complainant. The respondent subsequently confirmed that the successful candidate was 33 years old at the relevant time. The complainant's CV indicates that at the time of the selection process in 2005, he was a candidate with considerable research experience and was well published. He was also an experienced lecturer. The successful candidate's CV indicates that at the time of the selection process in 2005, she had experience as a Zookeeper, a Technical Development Officer with a wind energy development and consultancy company and experience as an Environmental Development Executive with a community based rural development company. The complainant submitted that he is at a loss to understand how the successful candidate could be perceived as demonstrating relevant heritage experience of sufficient calibre at an appropriate senior level superior to that of his own. In this regard, I note that it is submitted on the successful candidate's CV that the company with which she was employed at the time of the competition was involved in a number of heritage projects and produced an award winning heritage brochure.

5.8 At the interview stage, candidates were marked according to seven criteria. These were qualifications, relevant technical experience, communications/interpersonal skills, organisation and management skills, initiative, knowledge of role of the heritage officer and knowledge of local government. Six of the criteria are in line with the person specification for the post. The criterion of 'Knowledge of the role of Heritage Officer' was an additional criterion added and most marks were available for this particular criterion. The respondent submitted that the marking sheet was based on the standard marking sheet used in Local Government for professional grades level. It submitted that the interview board members deliberated amongst themselves after each candidate was interviewed. The complainant received a total of 335 marks out of 700 at the interview stage. The successful candidate received a total mark of 475. The selection criteria appear objective and seem to have been honestly applied in practice.

5.9 In this case whilst the complainant was 5 years younger than the successful candidate, the Labour Court has stated that "The existence of a difference on the grounds of age, marital status or family status between the two candidates does not of itself establish a prima facie case of discrimination."[4] Whilst it may have been more prudent for the person who sat on the shortlisting board to reconsider his position on the interview board given that the complainant's application was being progressed to the interview stage following the intervention of Human Resources Division, this factor in itself does not give rise to a presumption of discrimination on the age ground. In relation to the addition of the criterion of 'Knowledge of the role of Heritage Officer', I consider that it would not be unusual to expect interviewees to have a good knowledge of the role in respect of which they are applying and I note that background information on the post and the duties of the post are detailed in the 'Particulars of the Post' document prepared by the respondent in advance of the selection process. It is also the case that such a criterion might benefit someone in the role of Heritage Officer more than other candidates but it is not the case that the successful candidate was in such a role at the time of the competition. The Labour Court has stated "……. it is for the Court to decide in every case if the factual basis disclosed on the evidence is sufficient to raise an inference of discrimination."[5] I have considered the documentation provided by the respondent in respect of the interview process including the interview notes recorded by the two of the interview board members in respect of the complainant and having done so, I am not satisfied that the complainant has established a prima facie case of discrimination on the age ground. In the circumstances and based on the foregoing, I find that the complainant has failed to establish a prima facie case of discrimination in relation to the selection process for appointment to the post of Heritage Officer. His claim cannot therefore succeed.

6. DECISION

6.1 On the basis of the foregoing, I find that the complainant has failed to establish a prima facie case of discrimination on the age ground in terms of section 6(2)(f) of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 and 2004 contrary to sections 8 of the Act in relation to appointment to the post of Heritage Officer.

1. Dispute and delegation

1.1 This dispute concerns a claim by Mr. Paul Doyle (hereafter "the complainant") that he was subjected to discriminatory treatment in relation to a compulsory retirement age in ESBI (hereafter "the respondent") on the grounds of his age. The complainant was compulsorily retired on 22 February 2008 two weeks after his sixty-fifth birthday.

1.2 The complainant referred a claim of discrimination to the Director of the Equality Tribunal on 11 June 2008 under the Employment Equality Acts. On 6 December 2011, in accordance with his powers under section 75 of the Acts, the Director then delegated the case to Tara Coogan- an Equality Officer - for investigation, hearing and decision and for the exercise of other relevant functions of the Director under Part VII of the Acts on which date my investigation commenced. As required by Section 79(1) and as part of my investigation, I proceeded to hearing on 27 January 2012. Final materials relevant to the investigation were received by me on 18 February 2012.

2. Case for the complainant

2.1. The complainant is a graphic designer. He worked with the respondent from 1995 to 2008. The complainant, having reached the age of 65, was retired from his role. Shortly before his birthday, on 23 January 2008, an email from a facilities manager was circulated to the complainant's colleagues announcing his retirement and inviting them to drinks to mark his departure.

2.2. The complainant subsequently wrote to the respondent's HR manager stating his belief that the provisions of his contract did not require for him to retire on his 65th birthday. In reply, the complainant was informed that he must retire at the age of 65. He was also informed that in order for the complainant to engage in a contract work with the respondent after reaching 65 years of age a "break of employment would be required post retirement".

2.3. It is the complainant's case that he was forced to retire and dismissed at the age of 65 in breach of both the Employment Equality Acts 1998-2008 and the provisions of Council Directive 2004/78/EC of November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation.

2.4. It is the complainant's case that he was compulsorily retired on the ground of his age. It was submitted that this constitutes direct discrimination and is contrary to the Acts. The entire reason for the retirement was the complainant's age. The complainant relied on McCarthy v Calor Teoranta in which the Labour Court stated that:"The Court of Justice appears to have held that a Member State cannot introduce a mandatory retirement age unless there is objective and reasonable justification in so doing. It would appear axiomatic that an individual employer would be similarly circumscribed in applying a contractual retirement age."

2.5. There is no contractual retirement age in the complainant's contract of employment. Ireland does not have a mandatory age for retirement in its national legislation. Therefore, the respondent is in breach of the Community law of non-discrimination on the ground of age. It was submitted that the derogation in the Directive from the right to non-discrimination is directed at Member States as opposed to individuals. It was submitted that in the absence of a written retirement policy, it was impossible for such a policy to be properly policed by the Equality Tribunal. The complainant submitted that none of the documents provided by the respondent to the investigation is evidence of a written retirement policy having been generated by the respondent. Therefore, it is impossible for the Tribunal to satisfy itself that the respondent's retirement policy pursues the aims asserted by the respondent and whether the means adopted to pursue such aims are appropriate and necessary.

2.6. In accordance with section 6(1) of the above Acts, the complainant has clearly suffered less favourable treatment than those of a younger age by being forced to retire at the age of 65.

2.7. The complainant refuted that the respondent had fixed a retirement age in accordance with section 34(4). Instead the respondent is seeking to rely upon the claimant's right to a pension at 65 under the terms of a pension scheme of which he is member. It was submitted that it is well established in both Community and Irish law that a pension entitlement does not necessitate retirement.

2.8. It was submitted that the decision in Case 144/04 Mangold v Rüdiger Helm held non-discrimination on the ground of age to be general principle of Community law. That is, non-discrimination is mandated by the Treaties. Therefore there can be no doubt as to the principle having direct horizontal effect as between private actors. At paragraph 77 of its judgment, the Court stated:"it is the responsibility of the national court, hearing a dispute involving the principle of non-discrimination in respect of age, to provide, in a case within its jurisdiction, the legal protection which individuals derive from the rules of the community law and to ensure that those rules are fully effective, setting aside any provision of national law which may conflict with that law (see, to that effect, Case 106/77 Simmenthal [1978] ECR 629, paragraph 21, and Case C-347/96 Solred [1998] ECR I-937, paragraph 30)."

2.9. It was submitted that it is therefore necessary for this Tribunal to ensure individual compliance with the principle and with the Directive.

2.10. The derogation within the Directive is directed only at national measures with legitimate aims. In Case 411/05 Felix Palacious de La Villa v Cortefiel Servicios SA, the then European Court of Justice held that a state could set a mandatory retirement age of 65 as it had the legitimate aim as part of national employment policy to promote employment for under 65s. The mandatory retirement age was used to absorb high unemployment and to promote better distribution of work between generations. The measure was found to be less favourable treatment but was objectively and reasonably justified in the context of national law by a legitimate aim relating to employee policy and the labour market. It was submitted that the less favourable treatment that the complainant has experienced cannot be justified as there is no national legislation in place to facilitate it. The justification provided for in the directive is clearly not directed at the respondent. In the recent opinion of Advocate General Mazak in Case-C388/07 Incorporated Trustees of the National Council on Ageing (Age Concern of Ireland) v. Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, Unreported 23 September 2008:"targets national measures, which reflect social and employment policy choices and not individual decisions of employers"

3. Case for the respondent

3.1. The respondent is a wholly owned subsidiary of Ireland's Electricity Supply Board (ESB), a vertically integrated utility that has a number of ring fenced divisions operating independently in the Single Electricity Market. The respondent employs over 1200 staff across four distinct businesses.

3.2. The respondent rejects the validity of the complainant's case for the following reasons: 1. It is clear that the respondent has fixed its retirement age. Such a policy has operated since its inception and that the retirement age of 65 is a clear term and condition of the contract of employment of employees and a long-standing custom and practise of the respondent. It was submitted that the complainant by his own actions has demonstrated that he knew of the retirement age of 65. The respondent wishes to rely on McCarthy v HSE that held that an employer can establish that there is a fixed retirement age by reference to custom and practice and to a company pension scheme even in circumstances where a pension age is not set out in a contract of employment. Hedigan J went on to state that Council Directive 2000/78 did not prohibit the State from maintaining a retirement age of 65. A similar conclusion was reached by the EAT in Molloy v Connacht Gold.

2. The complainant had requested the right to remain with the respondent for an additional year. The request was referred to human resources but as there were no exceptional circumstances no offer of a fixed term contract could be made. The complainant was therefore treated in the same manner as any other person seeking to stay on beyond the retirement age.

3. The respondent has never represented to the complainant that he could work past 65 or offered any inducements or warranties to that effect.

4. The respondent operates an award winning pension scheme that allows employees to retire between the ages of 50 and 65. The retirement age is included in the pension scheme of which the complainant is a member.

3.3. As the Employment Equality Acts do not provide for a definition for 'fix' the word must be given its ordinary meaning. The exception in the Acts must therefore be interpreted as applying to arrangements, agreements or decisions on retirement ages. There is no requirement that the arrangement be in writing. It can only be interpreted as meaning that the age must be clearly arranged, agreed or decided upon.

3.4. It was further submitted that while section 34(4) does not require the respondent to show that the fixing of the retirement age is objectively justified, the respondent's reason for fixing a retirement age are justifiable in national and European law. The respondent submitted that it must be able to provide for promotion opportunities and career pathways in order to retain younger employees. It was submitted that the respondent allocates extensive resources (approximately €45000) in training its employees. The respondent employees are therefore well trained and very mobile and if these employees cannot progress within the respondent employ they will go elsewhere. Staff retention is therefore a crucial consideration for the viability of the respondent business. Failure to hold to its most valuable resource would deprive the respondent of a valuable skill set and the loss of money spent on training. Such a notion of sharing employment between generations has been found to be objectively justifiable by the Court of Justice .

3.6. Furthermore it was submitted that the majority of the respondent's staff deal with electricity. It was submitted that increasing the retirement age would necessitate - for health and safety reasons- physical examinations that might cause embarrassment and humiliation to employers. The fixed retirement age has the advantage of not requiring the respondent on dismissing employees on the grounds that they are no longer capable of working.

3.7. It was submitted that this Tribunal does not have jurisdiction to set aside a provision of a statute as has been requested by the complainant. The respondent relied on Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform and Commissioner of An Garda Siochana v Director of the Equality Tribunal and Ors to this effect.

4. Conclusion of the equality officer

4.1. In evaluating the evidence before me, I must first consider whether the complainant has established a prima facie case pursuant to Section 85A of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2008. The Labour Court has held consistently that the facts from which the occurrence of discrimination may be inferred must be of 'sufficient significance' before a prima facie case is established and the burden of proof shifts to the respondent. The Labour Court elaborated on the interpretation of section 85A in Melbury v. Valpeters EDA0917 where it stated that section 85A: "places the burden of establishing the primary facts fairly and squarely on the Complainant and the language of this provision admits of no exceptions to that evidential rule".

4.2. It is clear that a decision to retire a person at a given is age is a decision that is influenced by that person's age. A number of Court of Justice decisions have identified such decisions as direct discrimination. Such discrimination however can be rebutted by objectively justifying such treatment and the Court has provided a non-exhaustive list of such justifications. It is clear that direct discrimination is also prohibited under the Acts. However, I find that section 34(4) provides for an exemption in circumstances where retirement on the ground of a person's age is 'fixed'.

4.3. Extensive submissions and arguments where put before this Tribunal as to what its jurisdiction is in relation to the interpretation of EU law and whether it is entitled to make decisions concerning European jurisprudence and applicability to Irish law. It was suggested that the case be adjourned to determine whether the Tribunal had jurisdiction to proceed with the complex facts before it. The complainant objected to such an approach on the grounds that the complaint had been with this Tribunal for over three years and that the complainant wished to proceed with this claim without further delay. The complainant was not challenging the provisions of the Employment Equality Acts.

4.4. In relation to my jurisdiction. It is clear that this Tribunal is the court of first instance in matters relating to discrimination in the workplace. I find that this Tribunal must work on a presumption that the legislation governing it has correctly and properly implemented the Council Directives that it purports to give effect to. It is clear that this Tribunal has no jurisdiction to consider whether correct implementation has occurred in the member state. Nor does it have jurisdiction to set aside a provision that is contained in a statute. That said, I am satisfied that I do have an obligation to interpret these Acts in a manner that is harmonious 'in the light of' directives in so far as such an approach does not lead to absurdity or to a interpretation that is contra legem. Approval of such an approach was confirmed by the Supreme Court in Nathan v Bailey Gibson Limited.

4.5. I find that much of the national case law cited to for the purposes of this investigation turn on their facts. I note that cases successful cases for the complainants have included circumstances where a respondent has not been able to establish a retirement age whereas I note that the ability to prove facts supporting a custom and practice have not resulted in a finding of unfair dismissal . Other cases have included an employee's legitimate expectation arising from a contractual situation . None of these cases have considered section 34(4) of the above Acts. Equally, no consideration has been given to Council Directive.

4.6. In McCarthy v Calor Teoranta, the Labour Court went on to hold that the complainant in that case was given a warranty by the respondent that if he took the option of redundancy and re-employment at lower pay he could work until the age of 65. Accordingly, when the respondent terminated the complainant's employment, it did so on the basis of his age and thus treated him differently than a person in a comparable situation who had not attained the age of 60. I find that facts of the current case are clearly distinguishable from those set out in McCarthy. The Labour Court did, however, make an observation that other facts may have supported a case that may have highlighted an incompatibility between section 34(4) of the Acts and the proper transposition of Article 6 of the Directive. While the court did not elaborate what such an incompatibility in its view may be it, it is clear that the Labour Court was speculating that a reliance on a fixed retirement age, based on contract, may not be compatible with test set out in the Council Directive.

4.7. Retirement ages have also been considered by the High Court. It is clear that McKechnie J. in the Donnellan case carefully examined the facts of that case in relation to the Council Directive only. In doing so, he adopted the objective justification test. In McCarthy v HSE , Hedigan J. in an obiter comment suggested that there is nothing in the Council Directive prohibiting the State from maintaining a retirement age of 65 and was satisfied that such a matter could be determined on implied contract term. Citing Palacios de la Villa the learned judge found that a retirement age of 65, resulting in retirement (that is a situation where a person is in receipt of a pension), could not be discriminatory. Neither case considered section 34(4) of the above Acts or the question whether the directive has been properly transposed into national law. It is clear that the learned judge in Donnellan accepted that the objective justification test was required when the plaintiff was asserting his rights under the Directive.

4.8. It is clear that I have no function to make a legally binding decision as to a party's retirement age as per contract per se. In order to address the issue of section 34(4) I must make a finding of fact in relation to the complainant's retirement age. In this case, it a common fact that the respondent has a maximum retirement age of 65 and that the complainant was on notice of this retirement age. While it was argued that the term 'fixed' in section 34(4) ought to be given it ordinary meaning, that being arranged or agreed upon, I am not satisfied that a reliance on an arranged or agreed upon retirement age based on contract terms alone is sufficient to rebut the inference of age discrimination. A harmonious interpretation of section 34(4) in conjunction with Article 6(1) implies that for a retirement age to be 'fixed' by a respondent evidence of a planned and systematic approach to retirement ages is required. Such evidence is set out in the objective justification test.

4.9. I note that it was argued by the complainant that any reliance of Article 6(1) was only available for state bodies. I find that the Employment Equality Acts clearly extends the principle of the derogation to private actors also.

4.10. I note that The Court of Justice in Case C-388/07 The Queen, on the application of: The Incorporated Trustees of the National Council on Ageing (Age Concern England) v Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform stated at paragraph 3:"Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation gives Member States the option to provide, within the context of national law, for certain kinds of differences in treatment on grounds of age if they are 'objectively and reasonably' justified by a legitimate aim, such as employment policy, or labour market or vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary". I am therefore satisfied that any exemption allowing for direct discrimination on the grounds of age must be objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim and that the means of achieving such an aim must be appropriate and necessary. In order to give section 34(4) a harmonious interpretation, it is clear that 'fixed' must be understood in a manner that supports the objective justification test set out in Article 6(1). It is clear that such a justification test cannot be directed at the circumstances of the individual complainant - the respondent was not relying on the personal characteristics or any poor performance of the complainant - but must be based on comprehensive policy grounds.

4.11. I note that the respondent does not have a written employment policy per se. I am however satisfied on the full facts of this case that the respondent has a well established practice of compulsorily retiring its employees to a pension when they reach the age of 65 (employees can also elect to retire earlier). There was no evidence to support that this practice has been varied in any circumstances. It is clear that the respondent will, in certain exceptional circumstances, re-engage over 65s on fixed term contracts for project purposes. I am satisfied that the respondent had considered the availability of such an extension for the complainant on his request. The request was turned down because there were no exceptional circumstances that would have justified such an extension. I find that the fact that the respondent has a policy that enables over 65s to remain in certain circumstances clearly tempers the existence of an absolute retirement age.

4.12. I am also satisfied that the respondent has carefully considered the reasons as to why the retirement age is capped at 65 and that there is a clear employment policy supporting such a cap. The logic for such an exemption in my view is that age is different from other protected grounds. Age is not binary in the sense that a person is a man or a woman, a Traveller or a non-Traveller, a heterosexual or a homosexual, etc. Every person has an age, which as a continuum, changes over time. A young person in the respondent organisation will eventually benefit from the protections that an older person has enjoyed and, in turn, an older person will already have benefitted from a provision that has favoured young people.

4.13. I note that the respondent's main aim is to build and maintain electricity infrastructures domestically and internationally. I accept that work involving electricity is of such nature that legitimate health and safety concerns relating to a genuine occupational requirement with older staff may arise. I also accept that the carrying out of compulsory medical examinations could cause embarrassment to some employees. While I do note that such 'genuine occupational requirement' does not apply to the complainant whose occupation was that of a graphic designer I do find that a legitimate employment policy means that a respondent is entitled to maintain a retirement age that ensures cohesion among all of its employees. Having different rules of retirement for different employees may threaten the respondent employees' cohesion and open up other areas of discrimination that may not be subject to an objective justification test. Furthermore, the size of the respondent organisation also means that carrying out individual assessments may be impractical and I find that a use of an age-proxy (65) in the circumstances of this case is a proportional tool.

4.14. Furthermore, I am satisfied that the respondent spends extensive resources and time in training its new employees. I am satisfied that in order to achieve this aim the respondent must ensure that it can offer career pathways to such employees and ensure vacancies for upward post become available. This is a necessity to ensure retention, motivation and dynamism among the respondent staff. I am satisfied that the respondent wishes to establish an age structure among its younger and older employees in order to encourage the recruitment and promotion of young people and to facilitate good personnel management. I am therefore satisfied that the respondent has an established a legitimate employment policy with a legitimate aim for the reason why, at the latest, employees with the respondent must retire at 65 years of age.

4.15. I find that in the full circumstances of this case that 65 is an appropriate and proportionate measure for the purposes of the legitimate aim of the respondent.

5. Decision

5.1. Having investigated the above complaint, I hereby make the following decision in accordance with section 79(6) of the Employment Equality Acts:

5.2. I find that the complainant has established a prima facie case of discriminatory treatment on the age ground. The respondent has successfully rebutted this inference. Therefore, the complaint fails.

1. Dispute

1.1 This case concerns a complaint by the complainant that she was discriminated against by the respondent on the grounds of gender, family status and race contrary to sections 6(2)(a), (c) and (h) of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011 in relation to her conditions of employment. The complainant also claims that she was subjected to harassment contrary to section 14A of the Acts and victimisation contrary to section 74 of the Acts.

2. Background

2.1 The complainant referred a complaint under the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011 to the Director of the Equality Tribunal on 17th December, 2014. In accordance with his powers under section 75 of the Employment Equality Acts, the Director General delegated the case on 30th October, 2015 to me, Enda Murphy, an Adjudication Officer/Equality Officer, for investigation, hearing and decision and for the exercise of other relevant functions under Part VII of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011. This is the date I commenced my investigation. A written submission was received from the complainant on 21st May, 2015 and from the respondent on 29th July, 2015. As required by section 79(1) of the Acts and as part of my investigation, I proceeded to hearing on 9th December, 2015.

2.2 This decision is issued by me following the establishment of the Workplace Relations Commission on 1 October 2015, as an Adjudication Officer who was an Equality Officer prior to 1 October 2015, in accordance with section 83(3) of the Workplace Relations Act 2015.

3. Jurisdictional Issue in relation to Time Limits

3.1 The respondent has submitted that the present complaint is out of time and does not comply with the required time limits for the referral of a complaint within the meaning of section 77 of the Employment Equality Acts. Therefore, before making a decision on the substantive issue I must be satisfied that the complaint is properly and validly before the Tribunal.

Summary of Complainant's Case on Jurisdictional Issue

3.2 The complainant accepts that the present claim was not referred within the prescribed time limits provided for in section 77(5) of the Acts. However, it is the complainant's position that the delay in referring the complaint within the prescribed time limits was due to a misrepresentation by the respondent within the meaning of section 77(6) of the Acts. The complainant initially referred a complaint to the Director of the Equality Tribunal under the Employment Equality Acts on 1st March, 2012 against Travelodge Management Limited t/a Travelodge Waterford. However, it subsequently transpired that the incorrect respondent was named in these proceedings and the complainant contends that this error arose as a result of the respondent having misrepresented its true identity.

3.3 The complainant's submissions on the jurisdictional issue can be summarised as follows:

· Over the course of the complainant's employment she has been issued with employment related documentation (including a Statement of her Terms and Conditions of Employment, payslips, P60's and Income Levy Certificates) which identified her employer as "Travelodge" or "Travel Lodge". When the initial complaint was being referred to the Equality Tribunal in 2012 all of these documents were considered and following a search of the Companies Registration Office website the complainant's representative identified a company named Travelodge Management Limited which she assumed was the correct legal identity of the respondent.

· A colleague of the complainant, in the same employment, initiated proceedings against Travelodge Management Limited t/a Travelodge Waterford under the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 and the named respondent engaged with the Rights Commissioner Service and attended a hearing in that complaint without objection. The matter was subsequently settled between the named respondent and the complainant in those proceedings.

· The complainant initiated proceedings against Travelodge Management Limited t/a Travelodge Waterford under the Maternity Protection Act 1994 and the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997. The respondent in those proceedings was professionally represented and the representative engaged with the complainant's representative, the Rights Commissioner Service and on behalf of the respondent without objection. A settlement was reached in these cases and the written settlement agreement between the parties in this matter was headed "Settlement Agreement between Travelodge Management Limited and Slywia Wach". The terms of this agreement went on to record that Travelodge Management Limited agreed to pay the complainant a sum of money in compensation for not having received a premium for Sunday working and that the complainant agreed to withdraw her claim under the 1997 Act.

· The complainant's employer has consistently held itself out as "Travelodge Management Limited", and accordingly, it is the complainant's employer that has caused the confusion surrounding the correct legal identity of the respondent by issuing legal documents that do not state the correct legal entity.

· In summary, the complainant submitted that the complainant's employer was fully aware of the aforementioned complaints against Travelodge Management Limited and misrepresented itself as that entity during proceedings before the Rights Commissioner Service and during proceedings which the complainant had initially referred to the Equality Tribunal. It was submitted that had the complainant's employer not misrepresented its correct legal identity the complainant would have been in a position to refer the initial complaint against the correct respondent.

3.4 The complainant claims that the correct legal identity of her employer only came to light on or about 25th June, 2014. The complainant submitted that the date of occurrence of the discrimination or the date of its most recent occurrence for the purposes of the present complaint is 25th June, 2014 (i.e. the date upon which the misrepresentation came to the complainant's notice) thereby bringing the present complaint within the required time limits as provided for in section 77(6) of the Acts.

Summary of Respondent's Case on Jurisdictional Issue

3.5 The respondent submitted that the complainant was employed by a company called Smorgs (Ireland) Limited during the period of time relevant to the present complaint. The business of Smorgs (Ireland) Limited was transferred to Smorgs (ROI) Management Limited in 2014 and the complainant's employment transferred to that company pursuant to the European Communities (Protection of Employees on Transfer of Undertakings) Regulations 2003. The complainant worked in the Respondent's hotel in Waterford, which operates under the trading name of "Travelodge" owned by Smorgs (ROI) Management Limited and previously designated to Smorgs (Ireland) Limited on 1st January, 2003.

3.6 The respondent's submissions on the jurisdictional issue can be summarised as follows:

· Any search of the Companies Registration Office will show Smorgs (ROI) Management Limited to be the owner of the registered business name "Travelodge". Similarly, a search of the Business Names Register will reveal "Travelodge" to be a trading name of Smorgs (ROI) Management Limited. The onus on any complainant or moving party in proceedings, and indeed on their representatives, is to take ordinary and reasonable steps to ascertain the correct description and identity of the party against whom it is intended to claim. The failure of the complainant's representative to establish the correct name of the Respondent cannot be said to be the fault of the Respondent in circumstances where an admitted search of the CRO was carried out but where the search was less than complete.

· The complainant was issued with documentation such as P60's which included the company registration number of the respondent and had the Complainant's representative carried out a proper search in the CRO using this information prior to referring the initial complaint she would have been in a position to identify the correct name of her employer.

· The complainant could have sought clarification from her employer regarding the correct legal identity of the Respondent prior to referring the present complaint. Such an enquiry could have taken the form of a letter from the Complainant or her representative simply seeking clarification as the appropriate entity to be named. The failure of the Complainant or her representative to take the said step of making an enquiry cannot be blamed upon the Respondent itself, who never received any correspondence or enquiry whatsoever from the Complainant's representative. The suggestion by the Complainant's representative that they are entitled to rely upon other cases involving completely different parties as a defence to their won negligence is without basis in fact or in law.

· The purpose of the Employment Equality Acts and the provisions contained therein for the extension of time within which to make a claim expressly require an animus or intention on the part of the Respondent to misrepresent the situation for the time to be extended. It is submitted that no such misrepresentation on the part of the Respondent could possibly exist in circumstances where the Respondent was never contacted by the Complainant or her representatives at any time following the incidents giving rise to the complaint. In essence, what the complainant's representative seeks to rely on is their own mistake rather than the Respondent's misrepresentation.

· The respondent disputes the complainant's contention that she did not become aware until June, 2014 that Smorgs (ROI) Management and submits that she was in possession of a letter from the respondent dated 22nd December, 2011 (prior to the referral of the initial complaint to the Tribunal) which correctly identified her employer as Smorgs (Ireland) Limited. The respondent submitted that the complainant received correspondence from her employer in December, 2011 relating to an internal appeal hearing connected to the grievances giving rise to the present complaint which clearly indicated that "Travelodge" was a trading name of "Smorgs Ireland Limited".

4. Conclusions of the Equality Officer on Jurisdictional Issue

4.1 It is common case that the alleged incidents of discrimination and/or victimisation which gave rise to the present complaint occurred during the period from September, 2011 to January, 2012. The complainant referred an initial complaint to the Director of the Equality Tribunal on 1st March, 2012 arising from these incidents against an entity named Travelodge Management Limited t/a Travelodge Waterford. It was not in dispute between the parties that this company was not the complainant's employer at any time material to this complaint. The complainant claims that the error in relation to naming the incorrect employer in the initial complaint arose as a result of the respondent having misrepresented its true identity. The complainant submitted that that the correct legal identity of her employer, namely Smorgs ROI Management Limited, only came to light on 25th June, 2014. The complainant subsequently referred a new complaint to the Director of the Equality Tribunal against the aforementioned company on 17th December, 2014.

4.2 Having regard to the foregoing, it is clear that the present complaint has been referred outside of the time limits prescribed at section 77(5) of the Acts. Therefore, the only avenue left open to her, in terms of the Commission having jurisdiction to investigate her complaint, is to avail of section 77(6) of the Acts. This provision provides as follows:

"Where a delay by a complainant in referring a case under this section is due to any misrepresentation by the respondent, subsection 5(a) shall be construed as if the reference to the date of occurrence of the discrimination or victimisation were references to the date on which the misrepresentation came to the complainant's notice."

The effect of the provision is that the time-limit for referring a complaint to the Commission, in circumstances where the respondent has engaged in any misrepresentation, only commences when the complainant becomes aware of that misrepresentation. In order to avail of the provision the complainant must prove, as a matter of probability, that there was misrepresentation by the respondent and that the delay in referring his complaint is due to this misrepresentation.

4.3 The respondent has argued that the error in naming the correct respondent was wholly attributable to the complainant and/or her representative and it submits that this error could have been avoided if they had undertaken a proper search of the CRO website or sought clarification regarding the correct legal identify of her employer prior to referring the initial complaint to the Equality Tribunal. The respondent has strenuously argued that this mistake and the subsequent delay in referring the complaint against the correct legal entity were occasioned due to any misrepresentation on the respondent's part.

4.4 In considering this issue, I note that the term "misrepresentation" is defined in Osborn's Concise Law Dictionary as "A statement or conduct which conveys a false or wrong impression. A false or fraudulent misrepresentation is one made with knowledge of its falsehood, and intended to deceive. A negligent misrepresentation is one made with no reasonable grounds for believing it to be true". I have had regard to the jurisprudence from the Irish High Court, the Labour Court and the Court of Justice of the European Union on the issue of misrepresentation and, in particular, I have taken note of the following case law. The Labour Court held in the case of the HSE –v- Tom Whelehan[1] that "The Court next considered the Complainant's submissions regarding the applicability of s.77(6) of the Act. It appears to the Court that a misrepresentation, for the purpose of the subsection, can only occur where an employer makes some false representation to an employee concerning a material fact".The Labour Court also held in the case of A Company –v- A Worker[2] that "In order to avail of the provision the complainant must satisfy the Court, as a matter of probability, that there was misrepresentation by the respondent and that the delay in referring his complaint is "due" to the "misrepresentation by the respondent.".

4.5 In the case of Stafford –v- Mahony, Smith and Palmer [1980] ILRM 53, Doyle J laid down the criteria for the action of negligent misrepresentation as follows: "In order to establish the liability for negligent or non-fraudulent misrepresentation giving rise to action there must first of all be a person conveying the information or the representation relied upon; secondly, that there must be a person to whom that information is intended to be conveyed or to whom it might reasonably be expected that the information would be conveyed; thirdly, that the person must act upon such information or representation to his detriment so as to show that he is entitled to damages.

4.6 The issue of misrepresentation was also dealt with by the Court of Justice of the European Union in the case of B.S. Levez –v- T.H. Jennings (Harlow Pools) Limited[3] where it was held that "Community law precludes the application of a rule of national law which limits an employee's entitlement to arrears of remuneration or damages for breach of the principle of equal pay to a period of two years prior to the date on which the proceedings were instituted, there being no possibility of extending that period, where the delay in bringing a claim is attributable to the fact that the employer deliberately misrepresented to the employee the level of remuneration received by persons of the opposite sex performing like work.".

4.7 In considering the alleged misrepresentation in the present case, I note that all of the employment related documentation (including the Statement of her Terms and Conditions of Employment, P.60's, Payslips, and Income Levy Certificates etc.) provided by the respondent to the complainant prior to the referral of the initial complaint to the Equality Tribunal identified the name of her employer as either "Travelodge" of "Travel Lodge" (with the exception of the letter referred to above from the respondent to the complainant dated 21st December, 2011). In this regard, it is clear that an employer has a statutory obligation under Section 3(1)(a) of the Terms of Employment (Information) Act 1994 to provide its employees with the "full name and address" of their employer. However, in the complainant's case, the respondent failed to include details of the correct legal identity of her employer in the Statement of Terms and Conditions of Employment issued to her following the commencement of her employment and instead included the trading name of the business. The respondent failed to provide any credible explanation regarding the reasons why the above-mentioned documents did not include the full and complete identity of the complainant's employer. I have taken note of the evidence adduced by the complainant to the effect that the respondent has included the full and complete identity of her employer on payslips since October, 2014.

4.8 In the circumstances of the present case, I am satisfied that it is not unreasonable to conclude that the respondent was liable for negligent misrepresentation in terms of the information conveyed by it, and the representations it made to the complainant regarding the identity of her employer during the period of her employment prior to the referral of the initial complaint to the Equality Tribunal in March, 2012. I find that this misrepresentation by the respondent of its full legal identity contributed significantly to the error in naming the incorrect legal entity as her employer (i.e. Travelodge Management Limited t/a Travelodge Waterford) in the initial complaint referred to the Equality Tribunal. I am of the view that the respondent had ample opportunity following the referral of the initial complaint to inform both the Equality Tribunal and the complainant that the proceedings had been initiated against the incorrect legal entity. However, the respondent accepted these proceedings and continued to engage with the Equality Tribunal and the complainant without demur in relation to the initial complaint of discrimination for a period in excess of two years following the referral of that complaint and also in relation to separate complaints which the complainant had referred to the Rights Commissioner Service under the Maternity Protection Act 1994 and the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997. It is also noteworthy that a settlement was agreed between the parties in relation to the latter complaint and the settlement agreement recorded that it was an agreement between the complainant and "Travelodge Management Limited".

4.9 In coming to this conclusion, I note that the complainant's representative submitted a request for information (on the Form EE2) to the company on 30th June, 2014 relating to the initial complaint to the Equality Tribunal prior to the scheduled hearing of that complaint. The covering letter sent by the complainant's representative clearly adverted to the fact that the hearing of the complaint was scheduled for 11th July, 2014. The complainant adduced evidence to confirm that this correspondence (which was sent by registered post) was received by the respondent and that a letter of reply was subsequently issued to her by the respondent's General Manager on 25th July, 2014. In the circumstances, I am satisfied that this clearly implies the respondent was fully aware of the hearing date of the initial complaint. I note that this is totally inconsistent with the respondent's stated position (at the oral hearing of the present complaint) that the reason it failed to appear at the initial hearing was because it had been unaware of arrangements for the hearing. Having regard to the foregoing, it is clear that the respondent had a further opportunity prior to the hearing of the initial complaint to signal the fact that the wrong legal entity had been identified as the respondent in those proceedings. However, the respondent failed to avail of this opportunity and in doing so it continued to hold itself out as the complainant's correct employer. I am satisfied that the respondent's actions in this regard clearly amounted to a misrepresentation of its identity within the meaning of section 77(6) of the Acts.

4.10 However, in order for the complainant to avail of the provisions of section 77(6) she must also be able to demonstrate that the present complaint was referred within the period of six months from the date that this misrepresentation came to her notice. In considering this issue, I accept the complainant's evidence that she only became aware of the correct legal identity of her employer on 25th June, 2014 after information had been imparted to her in the workplace to the effect that there had been a transfer of undertakings relating to her employment. This information prompted the complainant's representative to carry out further enquiries regarding the identity of her employer which resulted in it being established on the aforementioned date that she was employed by an entity called "Smorgs (Ireland) Limited". Accordingly, I find that the complainant has established that the delay in referring the present complaint was due to misrepresentation by the respondent within the meaning of section 77(6) of the Acts and that she is entitled to delay the start of the time limit for the purpose of the referral of the present complaint until 25th June, 2014. Having regard to the fact that the present complaint was referred to the Equality Tribunal on 17th December, 2014, it is clearly within the prescribed time limit in section 77 and I therefore find that I have jurisdiction to investigate the complaint.

5. Summary of Complainant's Case on Substantive Issue

5.1 The complainant submitted that she is a Polish national and commenced employment with the respondent as an Accommodation Assistant on 4th August, 2007. In September, 2008 the complainant secured a position on Reception which resulted in an increase in her hours. The complainant submitted that throughout 2009, 2010 and 2011 prior to maternity leave she worked shifts on Monday and Tuesday from 11 pm to 7 am, in addition to three day shifts with varying hours usually from 7 am to 3 pm, averaging 42.9 hours per week.

5.2 The complainant submitted that she commenced a period of maternity leave on 23rd March, 2011 and returned to work on 21st September, 2011. She submitted that her hours of work were reduced from an average of 42.9 hours per week to an average of 23.5 hours per week upon her return from maternity leave. The complainant acknowledged that her contract of employment stated that her normal hours of work were 24 hours per week. However, she claims that following a verbal agreement with the previous Manager it was agreed that she would be allocated "full-time hours" each week. The complainant submitted that she worked three day shifts per week prior to maternity leave whereas upon her return to work she was not allocated any day shifts (and this situation was not rectified until a new Manager commenced in April, 2013). The complainant also submitted that the respondent employed a new staff member from Cork to cover another employee on maternity leave when she was available to cover these shifts.

5.3 The complainant submitted that she raised concerns regarding these issues with the respondent's HR Manager by way of e-mail on 29th September, 2011. The complainant had a meeting with her new Manager, Mr. A, on 3rd October, 2011 and he expressed annoyance at her for raising these issues with the HR Manager. The complainant submitted that Mr. A produced her contract and indicated that it specified her normal hours were 24 hours per week and stated that "this is all I have to give you". The complainant replied that the 24 hours were the minimum hours and informed him that she had a verbal agreement with the previous Manager to work full-time hours during the three year period prior to her maternity leave. The complainant submitted that during this meeting Mr. A stated that "her English was not good enough to work days" to which she replied that she had been "working for three years and there was never a complaint". The complainant also claims that Mr. A also stated that she had "been off for the last six months with your baby speaking Polish at home" and that she would need to spend more time with her baby. The complainant replied that she could speak both Polish and English and that her partner was looking after the baby. The complainant submitted that the latter remarks amounted to discriminatory treatment on the grounds of her family status and race.

5.4 The complainant submitted that she sent a letter to the HR Manager on 27th October, 2011 raising a formal grievance against Mr. A arising from the aforementioned issues. She claims that after making this complaint Mr. A came into work on his day off and was hostile towards her and indicated that he would be watching her on CCTV with a view to initiating disciplinary procedures against her. The complainant submitted that she attended a meeting with a representative from the company's HR Department on 17th November, 2011 to discuss the grievances that she had previously raised in her formal complaint. The complainant received a written response to these grievances from the company on 29th November, 2011. The complainant submitted that she was not satisfied with response from the company and she wrote to the HR Manager on 19th December, 2011 to request an appeal in relation to her grievances. In this appeal letter the complainant again referred to the reduction in her weekly hours following her return from maternity leave, the unfavourable distribution of the more desirable shifts and the discriminatory comments which her Manager, Mr. A, had made during the course of their meeting on 3rd October, 2011 which she felt had not been addressed by the company. The complainant also informed the respondent in this letter that she felt she was being subjected to victimisation by Mr. A for raising these grievances.

5.5 The complainant submitted that this appeal was heard by the HR Manager on 10th January, 2012 and that she outlined and elaborated upon the issues raised in her grievance complaint at this hearing. The complainant explained to the HR Manager that she felt victimised by Mr. A since she had raised these grievances and referred to the fact that he had threatened her with using CCTV for disciplinary purposes. The complainant submitted that she subsequently received a letter from the HR Manager on 30th January, 2012 which confirmed that her appeal had been rejected and that her grievances had not been upheld.

5.6 The complainant submitted that she was called to a disciplinary meeting with her Manager, Mr. A and the HR Manager on the same day as the appeal hearing (i.e. 10th January, 2015) where it was alleged she had sold alcohol to non-residents. She claims that this arose as a result of Mr. A having trawled through CCTV footage and identifying a person getting out of a car in the hotel's carpark and purchasing alcohol at the reception. The complainant submitted that disciplinary action was not taken against her in relation to this incident because she was able to prove that the person in question was a resident and that she had not breached the hotel's procedures in relation to the sale of alcohol. The complainant submitted that this incident amounted to victimisation by Mr. A against her as he had previously threatened that he would be using CCTV footage for disciplinary purposes. The complainant submitted that the company raised a further issue with her at this disciplinary meeting on 10th January, 2012 in relation to her alleged failure to comply with new fire safety procedures. The complainant claims that she attempted to explain her concerns in relation to the new procedures but the respondent was dismissive of her explanation and she was subsequently issued with an informal warning letter by Mr. A in relation to this issue.

5.7 The complainant submitted that in January, 2012 the company advertised externally for a part-time worker to cover another employee on maternity leave and that this had been done when the complainant was in dispute with her employer over not getting her legal entitlement to have the same hours and shifts after returning from maternity leave in September, 2011. The complainant submitted that the company's failure to respond to or carry out an adequate investigation of her complaints of discrimination and victimisation all adversely affected her dignity and she claims that this amounted to victimisation and harassment within the meaning of the Employment Equality Acts.

6. Summary of Respondent's Case on Substantive Issue

6.1 The respondent submitted that it employs 160 people in its group of hotels in the Republic of Ireland with more than half of these employees being non-Irish nationals. The respondent submitted that the complainant was employed as a Receptionist on 4th August, 2007 and her contract of employment clearly stated that her normal hours of work were 24 hour per week. The respondent did not dispute that the complainant worked additional hours each week during the three year period prior to her maternity leave which commenced in March, 2011. However, the respondent submitted that the arrangement to work the additional hours over and above her normal contractual allocation had been agreed with her sister who was the Hotel Manager during that period of her employment. The respondent denies that the complainant was subjected to discrimination on the grounds of gender in relation to the number of weekly hours and type of shifts allocated to her following her return from maternity leave. The respondent submitted that she was always allocated at least 24 hours per week in accordance with the terms of her contract and additional hours were allocated to her depending on the business requirements of the hotel. The respondent also refutes the suggestion that a staff member was taken on to cover her during maternity leave and kept on after her return this reducing her working hours.

6.2 The respondent submitted that during the summer of 2011 a new manager, Mr. A, took over at the hotel where the complainant was employed. Mr. A was not present as an employee or manager when the complainant went on maternity leave earlier that year and only became familiar with her when she returned from maternity leave in late 2011. The respondent submitted that it was at a disadvantage in defending the present complaints in that Mr. A no longer works for the company and has since relocated to the United States. The respondent submitted it was aware that a history of animosity existed between Mr. A and the complainant as a consequence of the dismissal from his employment with the hotel of the complainant's partner sometime earlier than the present complaint relate to.

6.3 The respondent submitted that it is appalled at the allegations and suggestions that any one of its employees would be the subject of comments about their proficiency or otherwise in the English language. The respondent accepts unreservedly that the complainant was working at the front office prior to her maternity leave and that there had never been an issue with her competency in English or her ability to communicate with customers at any time. The respondent submitted that it absolutely and unreservedly regrets any inferences which may have been drawn by the complainant from comments made to her by Mr. A and does not stand over his behaviour in this regard if the Adjudication Officer finds that she was indeed the subject of a comment or commentary of the nature alleged by the complainant.

6.4 The respondent denies that the complainant was subjected to victimisation or harassment by the company in relation to her having made a complaint against her Manager, Mr. A, regarding her hours of work after returning from maternity leave. The respondent submitted that the hotel is routinely requested by An Garda Siochana to review CCTV footage and, in fact, does so of its own accord on a regular basis. The respondent submitted that a circular was sent to members of staff in respect of the allegations that some staff members had been selling alcohol on an off-licence basis to persons who were not residents of the hotel. The hotel does not have an off-licence and therefore anybody to whom alcohol is sold must only and always be a person who is at that time staying in the hotel. The respondent contends that any steps taken to enquire into the selling of alcohol to non-residents was thoroughly warranted and arose out of legitimate concern in the hotel that the complainant and others may have been inadvertently selling alcohol to persons who were not residents. The respondent submitted that the matter involving the complainant was investigated and no further action was taken against her when it was established that the hotel's policy on the sale of alcohol had not been breached.

6.5 The respondent submitted that a thorough investigation was carried out by its HR Manager in relation to all of the grievances raised by the complainant and it was established there was no evidence to suggest that she had been subjected to the discrimination, harassment or victimisation as alleged. The respondent strenuously denies that the complainant has been subjected to discrimination, harassment or victimisation within the meaning of the Employment Equality Acts.

7. Conclusions of the Equality Officer on Substantive Issues

7.1 The substantive issues for decision by me are as follows: (i) whether or not the respondent discriminated against the complainant on the grounds of gender, family status and race, in terms of section 6(2) of the Employment Equality Acts and contrary to section 8 of those Acts in terms of her conditions of employment following her return to work from maternity leave in September, 2011, (ii) whether or not the respondent victimised the complainant in terms of section 74(2) of the Employment Equality Acts and (iii) whether or not the respondent subjected the complainant to harassment contrary to section 14A of the Employment Equality Acts. In reaching my decision, I have taken into account all of the submissions, written and oral, made to me by the parties.

7.2 Section 85A of the Employment Equality Acts sets out the burden of proof which applies in a claim of discrimination. It requires the complainant to establish, in the first instance, facts from which it may be presumed that there has been discrimination in relation to her. If she succeeds in doing so, then, and only then, is it for the respondent to prove the contrary. The Labour Court has held consistently that the facts from which the occurrence of discrimination may be inferred must be of "sufficient significance" before a prima facie case is established and the burden of proof shifts to the respondent. In deciding on this complaint, therefore, I must first consider whether the existence of a prima facie case has been established by the complainant. It is only where such a prima facie case has been established that the burden of proving there was no infringement of the principle of equal treatment passes to the respondent.

7.3 Section 6(1) of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011 provides that discrimination shall be taken to occur where "a person is treated less favourably than another person is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation on any of the grounds specified in subsection (2).....". Section 6(2)(a) of the Acts defines the discriminatory ground of gender as follows – "as between any 2 persons, ... that one is a woman and the other is a man". Section 6(2)(c) of the Acts defines the discriminatory ground of family status as follows – "as between any 2 persons, ... that one has family status and the other does not" and Section 6(2)(h) of the Acts defines the discriminatory ground of race as follows– "as between any 2 persons, ... that they are of different race, colour, nationality or ethnic or national origins".

Complaint of discriminatory treatment on grounds of Gender

7.4 The first issue that I must decide relates to the complainant's claim that she was subjected to discrimination by the respondent in relation to her conditions of employment following her return to work after maternity leave in September, 2011. The case-law of the European Court of Justice makes it clear that any unfavourable treatment of a woman related to pregnancy or maternity constitutes direct discrimination on grounds of gender and this is incorporated into Irish law at section 6(2)(A) of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 - 2008. Article 15 of the EU Directive on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation (recast)[4] states that "a woman on maternity leave shall be entitled, after the end of her period of maternity leave, to return to her job or to an equivalent post on terms and conditions which are no less favourable to her....". It follows therefore that any departure from this entitlement constitutes direct discrimination of the woman concerned on grounds of gender.

7.5 In the present case the complainant has claimed that her hours of work were reduced and that she was allocated a less favourable shift pattern after her return to work in September, 2011 following a period of maternity leave. The complainant claims that she had been working an average of 42 hours per week over five shifts during the three year period prior to her maternity leave which commenced in March, 2011. The complainant accepts that the contract of employment which she signed following the commencement of her employment in August, 2007 indicated that her normal working hours were 24 hours per week. However, she claims that she had entered into a verbal agreement with her previous Manager which resulted in her being allocated the additional hours on a consistent and ongoing basis during the period from 2009 to 2011 prior to her maternity leave. The complainant contends that her working hours were significantly reduced and that she was not allocated any day shifts upon her return to work following maternity leave.

7.6 The respondent does not dispute that the complainant was allocated additional hours and shifts during this period but submitted that under the terms of her contract the company was only obliged to allocate her 24 hours per week. The respondent contends that the arrangement to work additional hours was put in place between the complainant and her sister who was the Hotel Manager at that juncture. The respondent submitted that the terms of the complainant's contract were adhered to in full following her return from maternity leave and that she was allocated thereafter a minimum of 24 hours and up to 32 hours per week depending on the business requirements of the hotel.

7.7 In considering this issue, I am satisfied that the complainant gave extensive and credible evidence that her working hours were significantly reduced and that she was allocated a less favourable shift pattern following her return to work from maternity leave in September, 2011. The complainant's oral evidence on this issue was corroborated with documentary evidence in relation to the number of hours and shift patterns that she was allocated both before and after this period of maternity leave. I note that the complainant's contract of employment (which she signed in August, 2007) stated that her normal weekly hours were 24 hours per week. However, it is clear from the evidence adduced that the complainant had been working on average 42 hours per week (over two night and three day shifts) by arrangement with the hotel's management during the three year period prior to her maternity leave. The respondent in its evidence adverted to the fact that this arrangement was made with the complainant's sister who was the Hotel Manager during the period in question. However, the respondent has not adduced any evidence to suggest that this was an illicit arrangement or that the Manager, notwithstanding the fact she was the complainant's sister, had been acting improperly in allocating these additional hours to the complainant.

7.8 The complainant also gave credible evidence that a person who commenced work as a Receptionist during her maternity leave was also retained in that role following her return from maternity leave. I am of the view that it was not unreasonable for the complainant to expect that she would return from maternity leave to the same number of working hours and shift pattern, which had become the norm through custom and practice, during the three year period prior to her absence. The respondent did not adduce any credible evidence to suggest that the reduction in the complainant's hours was necessary for economic or business related reasons. Indeed, the only explanation proffered by the respondent for the reduction in the complainant's hours following her return from maternity leave was the argument that it was only contractually bound to allocate her 24 hours per week. In light of the foregoing, I find that the complainant has established a prima facie case of discrimination on the grounds of gender and that the respondent has failed to rebut that inference. It follows therefore that the complainant is entitled to succeed in relation to this element of her complaint.

Complaint of discriminatory treatment on grounds of Race

7.9 The next element of the complainant's complaint relates to a claim of discriminatory treatment on the grounds of race in relation to an incident at a meeting with her Manager, Mr. A, on 3rd October, 2011. The complainant has claimed that Mr. A expressed annoyance at her during this meeting for raising concerns over her allocation of hours and shifts following her return from maternity leave. The complainant claimed that Mr. A stated that her "English was not good enough to work days" and that she had "been off for the last six months with your baby speaking Polish at home". The complainant claims that she was not allocated any day shifts for a period of eighteen months following this incident with her Manager. The respondent was not in a position to contradict the complainant's account of her interaction with Mr. A at this meeting. The respondent confirmed that Mr. A no longer works for the company and is currently resident in the United States and therefore, he did not attend the hearing to give oral evidence on the matter. However, the respondent denies that the allocation of shifts to the complainant following her return to work from maternity leave was in any way influenced by her race.

7.10 In considering this issue, I wish to note that I am satisfied from the manner in which the complainant gave her oral evidence at the hearing that she has an excellent command of the English language. It is clear from the evidence adduced that the complainant had competently performed the role of Receptionist on day shifts for three years prior to her maternity leave. I note that the respondent acknowledged in evidence that there had been no issues with the complainant's competency in the English language or her ability to communicate with customers. Having regard to the evidence adduced, it is clear that the complainant encountered a difficult working relationship with her new Manager, Mr. A, following her return from maternity leave in September, 2011 and that he took exception to her having raised concerns with senior management regarding the reduction in her working hours following her return from maternity leave. I have found the complainant to be a very credible and convincing witness and I accept her evidence that Mr. A, made the alleged remarks regarding her proficiency in the English language during the course of this meeting. In the circumstances, I find that the complainant was afforded less favourable treatment by her Manager, Mr. A, in relation to the allocation of shifts on grounds related to her race following her return from maternity leave. Accordingly, I find that the complainant has established a prima facie case of discrimination on the grounds of race and that the respondent has failed to rebut that inference. It follows therefore that the complainant is entitled to succeed in relation to this element of her complaint.

Complaint of discriminatory treatment on grounds of Family Status

7.11 The next element of the complaint that I must consider relates to the complainant's claim of discriminatory treatment on the ground of family status which she claims also arose during the course of her meeting with meeting with her Manager, Mr. A, on 3rd October, 2011. The complainant claims that Mr. A said to her that "you will need to spend more time to mind the baby" and this was said in the context of justifying the reduction in her hours following her return from maternity leave. As I have stated, I have found the complainant to be a credible and convincing witness and I accept her uncontested evidence in relation to the conversation which took place with Mr. A on this occasion.

7.12 In A Government Department v An Employee (Ms. B)[5] the Labour Court took account of the decision in Nagarajan v London Regional Transport[6] in holding "that the proscribed ground need not be the sole or even principal reason for the conduct impugned; it is enough that it is a contributing cause in the sense of being a significant factor".Having regard to the evidence adduced, I am satisfied that the fact that the complainant was returning from maternity leave and now had a young child significantly influenced Mr. A's decision to reduce the number of hours which she had become accustomed to working prior to her absence. Accordingly, I find that the complainant has established a prima facie case of discrimination on the grounds of family status and that the respondent has failed to rebut that inference. It follows therefore that the complainant is entitled to succeed in relation to this element of her complaint.

Victimisation

7.13 The next element of the claim that I must decide relates to the complainant's claim that she was subjected to victimisation contrary to the Employment Equality Acts following her return to work after a period of maternity leave. "Victimisation" is defined at section 74(2) of the Acts as "For the purposes of this Part victimisation occurs where dismissal or other adverse treatment of an employee by his or her employer occurs as a reaction to –

(a) a complaint of discrimination made by the employee to the employer,

(b) any proceedings by a complainant,

(c) an employee having represented or otherwise supported a complainant,

(d) the work of an employee having been compared with that of another employee for any of the purposes of this Act or any enactment repealed by this Act,

(e) an employee having been a witness is any proceedings under this Act or the Equal Status Act, 2000 or any such repealed enactment,

(f) an employee having opposed by lawful means an act which is unlawful under this Acts or the said Act of 2000 or which was unlawful under any such repealed enactment, or

(g) an employee having given notice of an intention to take any of the actions mentioned in the preceding paragraphs".

7.14 The Labour Court has held in the case of the Department of Foreign Affairs –v- Patricia Cullen[7] that "This definition is expressed in terms of there being both a cause and an effect in the sense that there must be a detrimental effect on the Complainant which is caused by him or her having undertaken a protected act of a type referred to at paragraphs (a) to (g) of subsection (2). If either the cause or the effect is missing there can be no finding of victimisation within the statutory meaning".Therefore, in order for the complainant to establish that she was victimised she has to establish that the adverse treatment she alleges occurred was a reaction to any one of the matters specified from (a) to (g) of section 74(2) of the Acts cited above. In the present case, it was not in dispute that the complainant raised a formal grievance with the respondent on 27th October, 2011 claiming that she had been subjected to discriminatory treatment by her Manager, Mr. A, in relation to her conditions of employment following her return to work and also signaling her intention to refer a complaint to the Equality Tribunal if the matter was not addressed. I am satisfied that these facts constitute a protected act within the meaning of Section 74(2) of the Acts.

7.15 The next issue I must consider is whether or not the treatment alleged by the complainant constitutes "adverse treatment" in terms of section 74(2) and if so, whether such adverse treatment was in reaction to having taken the protected act. The adverse treatment or detriment contended by the complainant are the alleged threats by Mr. A after she had raised these grievances with management that he would be watching her on CCTV with a view to initiating disciplinary procedures against her. The complainant contends that Mr. A not only made this threat but he also actually carried it out and brought the complainant to a disciplinary investigation meeting alleging she had sold alcohol to non-residents. As I have previously stated, I have found the complainant to be a reliable and credible witness and I accept her uncontested evidence that she was in fact subjected to these alleged threats by Mr. A during the course of their meeting after she had referred a formal grievance against him with the respondent.

7.16 I have also taken cognisance of the fact that the complainant raised concerns with the respondent that she was being victimised by Mr. A after she had raised a formal grievance against him on 27th October, 2011. In this regard, I note that the complainant raised this issue in an e-mail to the HR Manager on 19th November, 2011 (i.e. the e-mail requesting an appeal in relation to the respondent's findings on her initial grievances) and again during the appeal hearing relating to her grievances on 10th January, 2012. Whilst I accept that the respondent carried out an investigation in relation to the alleged discriminatory treatment raised by the complainant regarding her conditions of employment, I am not satisfied that the respondent conducted any meaningful investigation into the complainant's allegations of victimisation.

7.17 It was not in dispute that the complainant was called to a disciplinary investigation meeting by the respondent on 10th January, 2012 in relation to an incident where she was alleged to have sold alcohol to a non-resident. This disciplinary investigation was instigated by the respondent after Mr. A had identified the complainant, using CCTV footage, selling alcohol to a person who had driven into the hotel's car park and purchased alcohol at the reception. I fully accept that the respondent is entitled to investigate any suspected breaches of its alcohol policy and I am very cognisant of the severe consequences that any breaches of this policy may have for the business. However, having regard to the evidence adduced, I am satisfied the investigation into this incident was initiated at the behest of Mr. A in response to the formal grievance which the complainant had made against him. In doing so, it is clear that Mr. A acted upon his threat to scrutinise CCTV footage with a view to initiating disciplinary action against the complainant. It subsequently transpired that Mr. A's allegation was unfounded after the complainant established at the disciplinary investigation meeting o 10th January, 2012 that the person seen on the CCTV footage purchasing alcohol was a resident of the hotel. I am satisfied that the requirement for a formal disciplinary investigation into this matter could have been averted by the respondent in this instance if Mr. A had taken the opportunity to consult with the complainant to clarify the matter in the first instance rather than acting upon his threat to use the CCTV footage to initiate disciplinary proceedings against the complainant.

7.18 In the circumstances, I find that Mr. A's behaviour amounted to adverse treatment of the complainant in terms of section 74(2) of the Acts and this adverse treatment was in reaction to the complainant having raised a formal grievance alleging discriminatory treatment. Accordingly, I find that the complainant has has established a prima facie case of victimisation and that the respondent has failed to rebut that inference. It follows therefore that the complainant is entitled to succeed in relation to this element of her complaint.

Harassment

7.19 The final element of the complainant's claim that I must consider relates to her claim that she was subjected to harassment by the respondent. Having regard to the evidence adduced, I am satisfied that the complainant has not presented any evidence from which I could reasonably conclude that she was subjected to harassment contrary to Section 14A of the Acts. Accordingly, I find that the complainant has failed to establish a prima facie case of harassment within the meaning of Section 14A of the Acts.

8. Decision

8.1 Having investigated the above complaint, I hereby make the following decision in accordance with section 79(6) of the Employment Equality Acts. I find that:

(i) The complainant has established that the delay in referring the present complaint was due to misrepresentation by the respondent within the meaning of section 77(6) of the Acts, and accordingly, that I have jurisdiction to investigate the complaint;

(ii) The respondent discriminated against the complainant in relation to her conditions of employment contrary to Section 8 of the Acts, on the grounds of gender, family status and race;

(iii) The respondent subjected the complainant to victimisation contrary section 74(2) of the Acts;

(iv) The respondent did not subject the complainant to harassment contrary to section 14A of the Acts.

8.2 It is well established that the redress ordered must be effective, proportionate and dissuasive. I therefore order, in accordance with my powers under section 82 of the Employment Equality Acts that the respondent pays the complainant:

(i) the sum of €21,000 being the equivalent of one year's salary by way of compensation for the distress suffered and the effects of the discrimination, and;

(ii) the sum of €21,000 being the equivalent of one year's salary in compensation for the effects of the victimisation.

This compensation does not contain any element of remuneration and is therefore not subject to PAYE/PRSI.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (Fifth Chamber)

21 February 2018 (*)

(Reference for a preliminary ruling — Directive 2003/88/EC — Protection of the safety and health of workers — Organisation of working time — Article 2 — Concepts of 'working time' and 'rest periods' — Article 17 — Derogations — Firefighters — Stand-by times — Stand-by times at home)

In Case C−518/15,

REQUEST for a preliminary ruling under Article 267 TFEU from the cour du travail de Bruxelles (Higher Labour Court, Brussels, Belgium), made by decision of 14 September 2015, received at the Court on 28 September 2015, in the proceedings

Rudy Matzak,

THE COURT (Fifth Chamber),

composed of J.L. da Cruz Vilaça, President of the Chamber, E. Levits (Rapporteur), A. Borg Barthet, M. Berger and F. Biltgen, Judges, Advocate General: E. Sharpston,

– the European Commission, by D. Martin and J. Tomkin, acting as Agents, after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 26 July 2017, gives the following

Judgment

1 This request for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Article 2 and Article 17(3)(c)(iii) of Directive 2003/88/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time (OJ 2003 L 299, p. 9).

2 The request has been made in proceedings between the ville de Nivelles (town of Nivelles), (Belgium) and Mr Rudy Matzak concerning the remuneration of services performed within the fire service in that town.

Legal context

EU law

3 Article 1 of Directive 2003/88 provides:

‘1. This Directive lays down minimum safety and health requirements for the organisation of working time.

2. This Directive applies to:

(a) minimum periods of daily rest, weekly rest and annual leave, to breaks and maximum weekly working time; and

(b) certain aspects of night work, shift work and patterns of work.

3. This Directive shall apply to all sectors of activity, both public and private, within the meaning of Article 2 of [Council] Directive 89/391/EEC [of 12 June 1989 on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health of workers at work (OJ 1989 L 183, p. 1)], without prejudice to Articles 14, 17, 18 and 19 of this Directive.

4. The provisions of Directive 89/391 … are fully applicable to the matters referred to in paragraph 2, without prejudice to more stringent and/or specific provisions contained in this Directive.'

4 Article 2 of Directive 2003/88, entitled 'Definitions', provides in paragraphs 1 and 2:

'For the purposes of this Directive, the following definitions shall apply:

1. "working time" means any period during which the worker is working, at the employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties, in accordance with national laws and/or practice;

2. "rest period" means any period which is not working time.'

5 Article 15 of the directive, entitled 'More favourable provisions', is worded as follows:

'This Directive shall not affect Member States' right to apply or introduce laws, regulations or administrative provisions more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers or to facilitate or permit the application of collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry which are more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers.'

6 Article 17 of Directive 2003/88, entitled 'Derogations', states:

'1. With due regard for the general principles of the protection of the safety and health of workers, Member States may derogate from Articles 3 to 6, 8 and 16 …

3. In accordance with paragraph 2 of this article derogations may be made from Articles 3, 4, 5, 8 and 16:

(b) in the case of security and surveillance activities requiring a permanent presence in order to protect property and persons, particularly security guards and caretakers or security firms;

(c) in the case of activities involving the need for continuity of service or production, particularly:

(iii) press, radio, television, cinematographic production, postal and telecommunications services, ambulance, fire and civil protection services;

…'

Belgian law

7 The Loi du 14 décembre 2000 fixant certains aspects de l'aménagement du temps de travail dans le secteur public (Law of 14 December 2000 laying down certain aspects of the organisation of working time in the public sector) (Moniteur belge of 5 January 2001, p. 212) transposed Directive 2003/88 for the public sector.

8 Article 3 provides:

'For the application of the present law, the following definitions shall apply:

1 workers: persons who, under a legal or contractual relationship, including trainees and temporary workers, carry out work under the direction of another person;

2 employers: persons who employ the persons referred to in No 1.'

9 Article 8 of that law defines working time as 'time during which the worker is at the disposal of the employer'.

10 Article 186 of the Loi du 30 décembre 2009 portant des dispositions diverses (Law of 30 December 2009 covering miscellaneous provisions) (Moniteur belge of 31 December 2009, p. 82925) provides:

'Article 3 of the Law of 14 December 2000 on certain aspects of the organisation of working time in the public sector shall be interpreted in the sense that volunteers in the public fire services and the rescue zones as provided for in the Law of 15 May 2007 on civil security and volunteers in operational civil protection units do not fall under the definition of workers.'

11 The règlement organique du service d'incendie de la ville de Nivelles (Regulation governing the Nivelles fire service) adopted by the arrêté royal du 6 mai 1971 fixant les types de règlements communaux relatifs à l'organisation des services communaux d'incendie (Royal Decree of 6 May 1971 laying down the types of municipal regulations relating to the organisation of municipal firefighting services, Moniteur belge of 19 June 1971, p. 7891), regulates matters relating to staff in that service.

12 That regulation contains provisions specific to the professional staff and the volunteer staff. As regards recruitment, the conditions of which are the same for both groups, Article 11a(1) of that regulation provides:

'At the end of the first year of the probation period, the trainee volunteer … shall meet the following residence requirement:

1. for staff assigned to the Nivelles fire station:

be domiciled or reside in a place so as not to exceed a maximum of 8 minutes to reach the Nivelles fire station when traffic is running normally and complying with the Highway Code.

During periods of stand-by duty, every member of the volunteer fire service serving in the Nivelles fire station must:

- remain at all times within a distance of the fire station such that the period necessary to reach it when traffic is running normally does not exceed a maximum of 8 minutes;

- be particularly vigilant so as to remain within range of various technical means used to call staff and to leave immediately, by the most appropriate means, when staff on stand-by duty are called.'

13 As regards the remuneration and compensation of staff, Article 39 of the règlement organique du service d'incendie de la ville de Nivelles (Regulation governing the Nivelles fire service) provides that professional staff is remunerated in accordance with the conditions laid down by the financial rules governing the staff of the town of Nivelles.

14 Volunteer staff receive the allowances set out in Article 40 of that regulation. They are calculated pro-rata on the hours worked. As regards the 'stand-by time' of officers, an annual allowance is determined. That allowance corresponds to that of the professional staff.

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

15 The Nivelles fire service groups together professional firefighters and volunteer firefighters.

16 Volunteer firefighters are involved in the operations. Among other tasks devolved to them, they are, in particular, on stand-by and on duty at the fire station, for which a roster is established at the beginning of the year.

17 Mr Matzak entered the service of the town of Nivelles on 1 August 1980 and acquired the status of volunteer firefighter one year later. He is also employed in a private company.

18 On 16 December 2009, Mr Matzak brought judicial proceedings seeking an order that the town of Nivelles pay him a provisional sum of one euro by way of damages and interest for failure to pay remuneration for his services as a volunteer firefighter during his years of service, particularly for his stand-by services.

19 By judgment of 22 March 2012, the tribunal du travail de Nivelles (Nivelles Labour Court, Belgium) upheld Mr Matzak's action to a large extent.

20 The town of Nivelles appealed against the judgment in the cour du travail de Bruxelles (Brussels Higher Labour Court, Belgium).

21 By judgment of 14 September 2015, the referring court partially upheld the appeal. As regards the remuneration claimed for stand-by services which, according to Mr Matzak, must be categorised as working time, the referring court is uncertain whether such services may be considered to fall within the definition of working time, within the meaning of Directive 2003/88.

22 In those circumstances, the cour du travail de Bruxelles (Higher Labour Court, Brussels) decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Must Article 17(3)(c)(iii) of Directive 2003/88 … be interpreted as enabling Member States to exclude certain categories of firefighters recruited by the public fire services from all the provisions transposing that Directive, including the provision that defines working time and rest periods?

(2) Inasmuch as Directive … 2003/88 … provides for only minimum requirements, must it be interpreted as not preventing the national legislature from retaining or adopting a less restrictive definition of working time?

(3) Taking account of Article 153[5] TFEU and of the objectives of Directive 2003/88 …, must Article 2 of that directive, in so far as it defines the principal concepts used in the directive, in particular those of working time and rest periods, be interpreted to the effect that it is not applicable to the concept of working time which serves to determine the remuneration owed in the case of home-based on-call time?

(4) Does Directive 2003/88 … prevent home-based on-call time from being regarded as working time when, although the on-call time is undertaken at the home of the worker, the constraints on him during the on-call time (such as the duty to respond to calls from his employer within 8 minutes) very significantly restrict the opportunities to undertake other activities?'

Consideration of the questions referred

Preliminary observations

23 At the outset, it should be pointed out, first, that both the town of Nivelles and the European Commission claim that the questions referred for a preliminary ruling are inadmissible as regards the concept of remuneration. By virtue of Article 153(5) TFEU, Directive 2003/88, which is based on Article 153(2) TFEU, does not apply to the question of remuneration of workers falling within its field of application. They submit that the subject matter of the main proceedings is to resolve the question of Mr Matzak's remuneration for stand-by services carried out as a volunteer firefighter with the town of Nivelles.

24 In that regard, it must be observed that, save in the special case envisaged by Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 concerning annual paid holidays, that directive is limited to regulating certain aspects of the organisation of working time in order to protect the safety and health of workers so that, in principle, it does not apply to the remuneration of workers (judgment of 26 July 2017, Hälvä and Others, C−175/16, EU:C:2017:617, paragraph 25 and the case-law cited).

25 However, that finding does not mean that there is no need to reply to the questions referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling in this case.

26 As the Advocate General stated in point 20 of her Opinion, it appears from the order for reference that the referring court seeks to establish the interpretation of Article 2 and Article 17(3)(c)(iii) of Directive 2003/88, which that court considers necessary in order to be able to resolve the dispute pending before it. The fact that the dispute ultimately concerns a question of remuneration is irrelevant, in that context, since it is for the referring court and not for the Court of Justice to resolve that question in the context of the main proceedings.

27 Second, the Court has held that Directive 2003/88 is to apply to the activities of the fire service, even when they are carried out by operational forces on the ground and it does not matter whether the object of those activities is to fight a fire or to provide help in another way, so long as they are carried out under normal circumstances, consistent with the task allocated to the service concerned, and even though the actions which those activities may entail are inherently unforeseeable and liable to expose the workers carrying them out to certain safety and/or health risks (order of 14 July 2005, Personalrat der Feuerwehr Hamburg, C−52/04, EU:C:2005:467, paragraph 52).

28 Third, as regards Mr Matzak's classification as 'worker', it should be noted that, for the purposes of applying Directive 2003/88, that concept may not be interpreted differently according to the law of the Member States but has an autonomous meaning specific to EU law (judgment of 14 October 2010, Union syndicale Solidaires Isère, C−428/09, EU:C:2010:612, paragraph 28). In accordance with settled case-law on the matter, any person who pursues real, genuine activities — with the exception of activities on such a small scale as to be regarded as purely marginal and ancillary — must be regarded as a 'worker'. The defining feature of an employment relationship resides in the fact that for a certain period of time a person performs for and under the direction of another person services in return for which he receives remuneration (judgment of 26 March 2015, Fenoll, C−316/13, EU:C:2015:200, paragraph 27 and the case-law cited).

29 The Court has also held that the legal nature of an employment relationship under national law cannot have any consequence in regard to whether or not the person is a worker for the purposes of EU law (judgment of 20 September 2007, Kiiski, C−116/06, EU:C:2007:536, paragraph 26 and the case-law cited).

30 Thus, as regards the case in the main proceedings, the fact that under national law Mr Matzak does not have the status of a professional firefighter, but that of a volunteer firefighter, is irrelevant for his classification as 'worker', within the meaning of Directive 2003/88.

31 Having regard to the foregoing, it must be held that a person in Mr Matzak's circumstances must be classified as a 'worker', within the meaning of Directive 2003/88, in so far as it appears from the information available to the Court that he was integrated into the Nivelles fire service where he pursued real, genuine activities under the direction of another person for which he received remuneration; it is for the referring court to verify whether that is the case.

32 Fourth, as Articles 1 to 8 of Directive 2003/88 are drafted in terms which are in substance identical to those of Articles 1 to 8 of Council Directive 93/104/EC of 23 November 1993 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time (OJ 1993 L 307, p. 18), as amended by Directive 2000/34/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 June 2000 (OJ 2000 L 195, p. 41), the Court's interpretation of the latter is transposable to the abovementioned articles of Directive 2003/88 (order of 4 March 2011, Grigore, C−258/10, not published, EU:C:2011:122, paragraph 39 and the case-law cited).

The first question

33 By its first question the referring court asks, in essence, whether Article 17(3)(c)(iii) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as meaning that the Member States may derogate, with regard to certain categories of firefighters recruited by the public fire services, from all the obligations arising from the provisions of that directive, including Article 2 thereof, which defines, in particular, the concepts of 'working time' and 'rest periods'.

34 In that regard, the Court has held that Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 is not one of the provisions from which the directive allows derogations (order of 4 March 2011, Grigore,C−258/10, not published, EU:C:2011:122, paragraph 45).

35 According to the wording of Article 17(1) of Directive 2003/88, Member States may derogate from Articles 3 to 6, 8 and 16 of this directive, and Article 17(3) states that for services listed therein, including those of firefighters, derogations may be made from Articles 3, 4, 5, 8 and 16 of that directive.

36 Thus, the very wording of Article 17 of Directive 2003/88 does not allow a derogation from Article 2, which defines the main concepts contained in the directive.

37 Furthermore, as the Advocate General observed in point 27 of her Opinion, there is no scope for adopting a broad interpretation of Article 17 of the directive which might go beyond the express wording of the derogations which are authorised there.

38 It is clear from the Court's case-law that, as regards permitted derogations provided for by Directive 2003/88, in particular in Article 17, as exceptions to the European Union system for the organisation of working time put in place by that directive, those derogations must be interpreted in such a way that their scope is limited to what is strictly necessary in order to safeguard the interests which those derogations enable to be protected (see, to that effect, judgment of 14 October 2010, Union syndicale Solidaires Isère, C−428/09, EU:C:2010:612, paragraphs 39 and 40).

39 In view of the foregoing, the answer to the first question is that Article 17(3)(c)(iii) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as meaning that the Member States may not derogate, with regard to certain categories of firefighters recruited by the public fire services, from all the obligations arising from the provisions of that directive, including Article 2 thereof, which defines, in particular, the concepts of 'working time' and 'rest periods'.

The second question

40 By its second question, the referring court asks, in essence, whether Article 15 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as meaning that it permits Member States to maintain or adopt a less restrictive definition of the concept of 'working time' than that laid down in Article 2 of that directive.

41 To answer that question, it is necessary to examine the wording of Article 15 of Directive 2003/88, having regard to the scheme established by the directive and its purpose.

42 According to the wording of Article 15 of Directive 2003/88, Member States may apply or introduce laws, regulations or administrative provisions more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers. It follows from this article that the national provisions to which it refers are those which may be compared with those laid down by Directive 2003/88 for the protection of the safety and health of workers.

43 The latter provisions can only be those which, by virtue of their function and purpose, are designed to set a minimum level of protection of the safety and health of workers. This is the case for the provisions of Chapters 2 and 3 of the directive. By contrast, the provisions of Chapter 1 of that directive, which includes Articles 1 and 2 thereof, are different in nature. Those provisions do not set minimum rest periods or concern other aspects of the organisation of working time, but establish the necessary definitions to define the subject matter of Directive 2003/88 and its field of application.

44 Consequently, it follows from the wording of Article 15 of Directive 2003/88, read in the light of the scheme established by that directive, that the power provided for by that article does not apply to the definition of the concept of 'working time' set out in Article 2 of the directive.

45 That finding is borne out by the purpose of Directive 2003/88. As the Advocate General observed in point 33 of her Opinion, that directive seeks to ensure, in its field of application, a minimum protection applicable to all workers of the Union. For that purpose, and in order to ensure that the directive is fully effective, the definitions provided for in Article 2 thereof may not be interpreted differently according to the law of Member States but have an autonomous meaning specific to EU law as regards the concept of 'worker', as has been stated in paragraph 28 of the present judgment (see, to that effect, judgment of 1 December 2005, Dellas and Others, C−14/04, EU:C:2005:728, paragraph 44 and the case-law cited).

46 In that context, it should nevertheless be noted that while Member States are not entitled to alter the definition of 'working time', within the meaning of Article 2 of Directive 2003/88, they remain, as has been recalled in paragraph 42 of the present judgment, free to adopt in their national legislation provisions providing for periods of working time and rest periods which are more favourable to workers than those laid down in that directive.

47 Having regard to the foregoing, the answer to the second question is that Article 15 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as not permitting Member States to maintain or adopt a less restrictive definition of the concept of 'working time' than that laid down in Article 2 of that directive.

The third question

48 By its third question, the referring court asks, in essence, whether Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as meaning that it requires Member States to determine the remuneration of periods of stand-by time such as those at issue in the main proceedings according to the classification of those periods as 'working time' and 'rest period'.

49 In that regard, it should be noted, as pointed out by the referring court, that it is common ground that Directive 2003/88 does not govern the question of workers' remuneration, as that aspect falls outside the scope of the European Union's competence by virtue of Article 153(5) TFEU.

50 Therefore, although Member States are entitled to determine the remuneration of workers falling within the field of application of Directive 2003/88, according to the definition of 'working time' and 'rest period' in Article 2 of that directive, they are not obliged to do so.

51 Thus, Member States may lay down in their national law that the remuneration of a worker in 'working time' differs from that of a worker in a 'rest period', and even to the point of not granting any remuneration during the latter type of period.

52 Having regard to the foregoing, the answer to the third question is that Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as not requiring Member States to determine the remuneration of periods of stand-by time such as those at issue in the main proceedings according to the classification of those periods as 'working time' or 'rest period'.

The fourth question

53 By its fourth question, the referring court asks, in essence, whether Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as not meaning that stand-by time which a worker spends at home with the duty to respond to calls from his employer within 8 minutes, very significantly restricting the opportunities to have other activities, must be regarded as 'working time'.

54 In that regard, it should be recalled that the Court has already had occasion to give a ruling on the question of the classification of stand-by time as 'working time' or 'rest period' in respect of workers falling within the scope of Directive 2003/88.

55 In that context, the Court has specified, first of all, that the concepts of 'working time' and of 'rest period' are mutually exclusive (see, to that effect, judgments of 3 October 2000, Simap, C−303/98, EU:C:2000:528, paragraph 47, and of 10 September 2015, Federación de Servicios Privados del sindicato Comisiones obreras, C−266/14, EU:C:2015:578, paragraph 26 and the case-law cited). Thus, it must be observed that, as EU law currently stands, the stand-by time spent by a worker in the course of his activities carried out for his employer must be classified either as 'working time' or 'rest period'.

56 Moreover, the intensity of the work by the employee and his output are not among the characteristic elements of the concept of 'working time', within the meaning of Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 (judgment of 1 December 2005, Dellas and Others, C−14/04, EU:C:2005:728, paragraph 43).

57 It has also been held that the physical presence and availability of the worker at the place of work during the stand-by period with a view to providing his professional services must be regarded as carrying out his duties, even if the activity actually performed varies according to the circumstances (see, to that effect, judgment of 3 October 2000, Simap, C−303/98, EU:C:2000:528, paragraph 48).

58 If the stand-by period in the form of physical presence at the place of work were excluded from the concept of 'working time', that would seriously undermine the objective of Directive 2003/88, which is to ensure the safety and health of workers by granting them adequate rest periods and breaks (see, to that effect, judgment of 3 October 2000, Simap, C−303/98, EU:C:2000:528, paragraph 49).

59 Furthermore, it is apparent from the case-law of the Court that the determining factor for the classification of 'working time', within the meaning of Directive 2003/88, is the requirement that the worker be physically present at the place determined by the employer and to be available to the employer in order to be able to provide the appropriate services immediately in case of need. In fact, those obligations, which make it impossible for the workers concerned to choose the place where they stay during stand-by periods, must be regarded as coming within the ambit of the performance of their duties (see, to that effect, judgment of 9 September 2003, Jaeger, C−151/02, EU:C:2003:437, paragraph 63, and order of 4 March 2011, Grigore, C−258/10, not published, EU:C:2011:122, paragraph 53 and the case-law cited).

60 Finally, it must be observed that the situation is different where the worker performs a stand-by duty according to a stand-by system which requires that the worker be permanently accessible without being required to be present at the place of work. Even if he is at the disposal of his employer, since it must be possible to contact him, in that situation the worker may manage his time with fewer constraints and pursue his own interests. In those circumstances, only time linked to the actual provision of services must be regarded as 'working time', within the meaning of Directive 2003/88 (see, to that effect, judgment of 9 September 2003, Jaeger, C−151/02, EU:C:2003:437, paragraph 65 and the case-law cited).

61 In the case in the main proceedings, according to the information available to the Court, which it is for the referring court to verify, Mr Matzak was not only to be contactable during his stand-by time. He was, on the one hand, obliged to respond to calls from his employer within 8 minutes and, on the other hand, required to be physically present at the place determined by the employer. However, that place was Mr Matzak's home and not, as in the cases which gave rise to the case-law cited in paragraphs 57 to 59 of the present judgment, his place of work.

62 In that regard, it should be pointed out that, according to the Court's case-law, the concepts of 'working time' and 'rest period', within the meaning of Directive 2003/88, constitute concepts of EU law which must be defined in accordance with objective characteristics, by reference to the scheme and purpose of that directive, which is intended to improve workers' living and working conditions (judgment of 10 September 2015, Federación de Servicios Privados del sindicato Comisiones obreras, C−266/14, EU:C:2015:578, paragraph 27).

63 The obligation to remain physically present at the place determined by the employer and the geographical and temporal constraints resulting from the requirement to reach his place of work within 8 minutes are such as to objectively limit the opportunities which a worker in Mr Matzak's circumstances has to devote himself to his personal and social interests.

64 In the light of those constraints, Mr Matzak's situation differs from that of a worker who, during his stand-by duty, must simply be at his employer's disposal inasmuch as it must be possible to contact him.

65 In those circumstances, it is necessary to interpret the concept of 'working time' provided for in Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 as applying to a situation in which a worker is obliged to spend stand-by time at his home, to be available there to his employer and to be able to reach his place of work within 8 minutes.

66 It follows from all the foregoing that the answer to the fourth question is that Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as meaning that stand-by time which a worker spends at home with the duty to respond to calls from his employer within 8 minutes, very significantly restricting the opportunities for other activities, must be regarded as 'working time'.

Costs

67 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Fifth Chamber) hereby rules:

1. Article 17(3)(c)(iii) of Directive 2003/88/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time must be interpreted as meaning that the Member States may not derogate, with regard to certain categories of firefighters recruited by the public fire services, from all the obligations arising from the provisions of that directive, including Article 2 thereof, which defines, in particular, the concepts of 'working time' and 'rest periods'.

2. Article 15 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as not permitting Member States to maintain or adopt a less restrictive definition of the concept of 'working time' than that laid down in Article 2 of that directive.

3. Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as not requiring Member States to determine the remuneration of periods of stand-by time such as those at issue in the main proceedings according to the prior classification of those periods as 'working time' or 'rest period'.

4. Article 2 of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as meaning that stand-by time which a worker spends at home with the duty to respond to calls from his employer within 8 minutes, very significantly restricting the opportunities for other activities, must be regarded as 'working time'.

JUDGMENT

(The account of the facts and issues which is contained in the complete text of the judgment is not reproduced)

Decision

1 By a judgment of 18 January 1985, which was received at the Court on 25 January 1985, the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty three questions concerning the interpretation of Article 1 (1) of Council Directive No 77/187 of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses.

2 Those questions were raised in the course of proceedings brought by Jozef Maria Antonius Spijkers against Gebroeders Benedik Abattoir CV (hereinafter referred to as 'Benedik Abattoir') and Alfred Benedik en Zonen BV (hereinafter referred to as 'Alfred Benedik').

3 The Hoge Raad found that Mr Spijkers was employed as an assistant manager by Gebroeders Colaris Abattoir BV (hereinafter referred to as 'Colaris') at Ubach over Worms (The Netherlands), a company whose business consisted in the operation of a slaughter-house. The Hoge Raad also found that on 27 December 1982, by which date the business activities of Colaris 'had entirely ceased and there was no longer any goodwill in the business', the entire slaughter-house, with various rooms and offices, the land and certain specified goods, were purchased by Benedik Abattoir. 'Since that date, although in fact only since 7 February 1983', Benedik Abattoir has operated a slaughter-house for the joint account of Alfred Benedik and itself. All the employees of Colaris were taken over by Benedik Abattoir, apart from Mr Spijkers and one other employee. The Hoge Raad also states that the business activity which Benedik Abattoir carries on in the buildings is of the same kind as the activity previously carried on by Colaris and that the transfer of the business assets enabled Benedik Abattoir to continue the activities of Colaris, although Benedik Abattoir did not take over Colaris's customers.

4 By a judgment of the Rechtbank [District Court], Maastricht, of 3 March 1983, Colaris was declared insolvent. By a writ of 9 March 1983 Mr Spijkers summoned Benedik Abattoir and Alfred Benedik to appear in proceedings for interim relief before the President of the Rechtbank, Maastricht, and sought an order that they should pay him his salary from 27 December 1982, or at least from such date as the President thought fit, and should provide him with work within two days of the order. In support of his claims he contended that there had been a transfer of an undertaking within the meaning of the Netherlands legislation enacted in order to implement Directive No 77/187 and that this entailed, by operation of law, a transfer to Benedik Abattoir of the rights and obligations arising from his contract of employment with Colaris.

5 The application for interim relief was dismissed by the President of the Rechtbank, Maastricht, whose decision was confirmed on appeal by the Gerechtshof [Regional Court of Appeal], 's-Hertogenbosch. Mr Spijkers then appealed in cassation to the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden, which stayed the proceedings and referred the following questions to the Court of Justice:

'(1) Is there a transfer within the meaning of Article 1 (1) of Council Directive No 77/187 where buildings and stock are taken over and the transferee is thereby enabled to continue the business activities of the transferor and does in fact subsequently carry on business activities of the same kind in the buildings in question?

(2) Does the fact that at the time when the buildings and stock were sold the business activities of the vendor had entirely ceased and that in particular there was no longer any goodwill in the business prevent there being a "transfer" as defined in Question 1?

(3) Does the fact that the circle of customers is not taken over prevent there being such a transfer?'

6 In order to understand the purpose of those questions, it is necessary to consider them in the light of Directive No 77/187. That directive, which was adopted on the basis, inter alia, of Article 100 of the Treaty, is intended, according to the terms of its preamble, 'to provide for the protection of employees in the event of a change of employer, in particular, to ensure that their rights are safeguarded'. For that purpose Article 3 (1) of the directive provides for the transfer of the transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment or from an employment relationship, and Article 4 (1) provides for the protection of the workers concerned against dismissal by the transferor or the transferee solely by reason of the transfer. Article 1 (1), which the Court has been requested to interpret in this case, defines the scope of the directive; it provides that the directive 'shall apply to the transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger'.

7 It therefore appears that by its questions the Hoge Raad seeks a ruling on the scope of and the criteria for applying the expression 'transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer' in Article 1 (1) of the directive in relation to a case such as that described in the Hoge Raad's judgment. The questions must therefore be considered together.

8 Mr Spijkers maintains that there is a transfer of an undertaking within the meaning of Article 1 (1) where the undertaking's assets and business are transferred as a unit from one employer to another; it is immaterial whether at the time of the transfer the business activities of the transferor have ceased and the goodwill has already disappeared.

9 The Netherlands and United Kingdom Governments and the Commission, on the other hand, consider that the question whether there is a transfer of an undertaking for the purposes of Article 1 (1) must be considered in the light of all the circumstances characterizing the transaction, such as whether or not the tangible assets (buildings, movable property and stocks) and the intangible assets (know-how and goodwill) were transferred, the nature of the activities engaged in and whether or not those activities had ceased at the time of the transfer. However, none of those factors is in itself decisive.

10 The United Kingdom Government and the Commission suggest that the essential criterion is whether the transferee is put in possession of a going concern and is able to continue its activities or at least activities of the same kind. The Netherlands Government emphasizes that, having regard to the social objective of the directive, it is clear that the term 'transfer' implies that the transferee actually carries on the activities of the transferor as part of the same business.

11 That view must be accepted. It is clear from the scheme of Directive No 77/187 and from the terms of Article 1 (1) thereof that the directive is intended to ensure the continuity of employment relationships existing within a business, irrespective of any change of ownership. It follows that the decisive criterion for establishing whether there is a transfer for the purposes of the directive is whether the business in question retains its identity.

12 Consequently, a transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business does not occur merely because its assets are disposed of. Instead it is necessary to consider, in a case such as the present, whether the business was disposed of as a going concern, as would be indicated, inter alia, by the fact that its operation was actually continued or resumed by the new employer, with the same or similar activities.

13 In order to determine whether those conditions are met, it is necessary to consider all the facts characterizing the transaction in question, including the type of undertaking or business, whether or not the business's tangible assets, such as buildings and movable property, are transferred, the value of its intangible assets at the time of the transfer, whether or not the majority of its employees are taken over by the new employer, whether or not its customers are transferred and the degree of similarity between the activities carried on before and after the transfer and the period, if any, for which those activities were suspended. It should be noted, however, that all those circumstances are merely single factors in the overall assessment which must be made and cannot therefore be considered in isolation.

14 It is for the national court to make the necessary factual appraisal, in the light of the criteria for interpretation set out above, in order to establish whether or not there is a transfer in the sense indicated above.

15 Consequently, in reply to the questions submitted it must be held that Article 1 (1) of Directive No 77/187 of 14 February 1977 must be interpreted as meaning that the expression 'transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer' envisages the case in which the business in question retains its identity. In order to establish whether or not such a transfer has taken place in a case such as that before the national court, it is necessary to consider whether, having regard to all the facts characterizing the transaction, the business was disposed of as a going concern, as would be indicated inter alia by the fact that its operation was actually continued or resumed by the new employer, with the same or similar activities.

Costs

16 The costs incurred by the Netherlands and United Kingdom Governments and by the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, in so far as the parties to the main proceedings are concerned, in the nature of a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision as to costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT (Fifth Chamber),

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden by a judgment dated 18 January 1985, hereby rules:

Article 1 (1) of Directive No 77/187 of 14 February 1977 must be interpreted to the effect that the expression 'transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer' envisages the case in which the business in question retains its identity. In order to establish whether or not such a transfer has taken place in a case such as that before the national court, it is necessary to consider whether, having regard to all the facts characterizing the transaction, the business was disposed of as a going concern, as would be indicated inter alia by the fact that its operation was actually continued or resumed by the new employer, with the same or similar activities.

Hoffmeister, acting as Agent, at the hearing on 25 February 2003, after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 8 April 2003,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By an order of 12 March 2002, and an amended order of 25 March 2002, which were received at the Court on 26 April 2002, the Landesarbeitsgericht (Higher Labour Court) Schleswig-Holstein referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 234 EC four questions on the interpretation of Council Directive 93/104/EC of 23 November 1993 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time (OJ 1993 L 307, p. 18) and, in particular, Articles 2(1) and (3) thereof.

2 Those questions were raised in proceedings between Landeshauptstadt Kiel (hereinafter 'the City of Kiel') and Mr Jaeger concerning the definition of the concepts of 'working time' and 'rest period' within the meaning of Directive 93/104 in the context of the on-call service ('Bereitschaftsdienst') provided by doctors in hospitals.

Legal background

Community legislation

3 Article 1 of Directive 93/104 lays down minimum health and safety requirements concerning the organisation of working time and applies to all sectors of activity, both public and private, with the exception of air, rail, road, sea, inland waterway and lake transport, sea fishing, other work at sea and the activities of doctors in training.

4 Under the heading 'Definitions' Article 2 of Directive 93/104 provides:

'For the purposes of this Directive, the following definitions shall apply:

1. working time shall mean any period during which the worker is working, at the employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties, in accordance with national laws and/or practice;

2. rest period shall mean any period which is not working time;

...'.

5 Section II of Directive 93/104 lays down the measures which the Member States are required to adopt in order to enable every worker to benefit, inter alia, from minimum daily rest periods and weekly rest and it also regulates the maximum weekly duration of work.

6 Under Article 3 of that directive, entitled 'daily rest':

'Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that every worker is entitled to a minimum daily rest period of 11 consecutive hours per 24-hour period.'

7 As regards maximum weekly working time Article 6 of Directive 93/104 provides:

'Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, in keeping with the need to protect the safety and health of workers:

...

2. the average working time for each seven-day period, including overtime, does not exceed 48 hours.'

8 Article 15 of Directive 93/104 provides:

'This Directive shall not affect Member States' right to apply or introduce laws, regulations or administrative provisions more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers or to facilitate or permit the application of collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry which are more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers.'

9 Article 16 of Directive 93/104 is worded as follows:

'Member States may lay down:

...

2. for the application of Article 6 (maximum weekly working time), a reference period not exceeding four months.

10 Directive 93/104 also sets out a series of derogations from several of its basic rules, regard being had to the specific nature of certain activities and subject to fulfilment of certain conditions. In that regard Article 17 provides:

'1. With due regard for the general principles of the protection of the safety and health of workers, Member States may derogate from Articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 and 16 when, on account of the specific characteristics of the activity concerned, the duration of the working time is not measured and/or predetermined or can be determined by the workers themselves, and particularly in the case of:

(a) managing executives or other persons with autonomous decision-taking powers;

(b) family workers; or

(c) workers officiating at religious ceremonies in churches and religious communities.

2. Derogations may be adopted by means of laws, regulations or administrative provisions or by means of collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry provided that the workers concerned are afforded equivalent periods of compensatory rest or that, in exceptional cases in which it is not possible, for objective reasons, to grant such equivalent periods of compensatory rest, the workers concerned are afforded appropriate protection:

2.1. from Articles 3, 4, 5, 8 and 16:

(c) in the case of activities involving the need for continuity of service or production, particularly:

(i) services relating to the reception, treatment and/or care provided by hospitals or similar establishments, residential institutions and prisons;

...

(iii) press, radio, television, cinematographic production, postal and telecommunications services, ambulance, fire and civil protection services;

...

3. Derogations may be made from Articles 3, 4, 5, 8 and 16 by means of collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry at national or regional level or, in conformity with the rules laid down by them, by means of collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry at a lower level.

...

The derogations provided for in the first and second subparagraphs shall be allowed on condition that equivalent compensating rest periods are granted to the workers concerned or, in exceptional cases where it is not possible for objective reasons to grant such periods, the workers concerned are afforded appropriate protection.

11 Article 18 of Directive 93/104 is worded as follows:

'1. (a) Member States shall adopt the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with this Directive by 23 November 1996, or shall ensure by that date that the two sides of industry establish the necessary measures by agreement, with Member States being obliged to take any necessary steps to enable them to guarantee at all times that the provisions laid down by this Directive are fulfilled.

(b) (i) However, a Member State shall have the option not to apply Article 6, while respecting the general principles of the protection of the safety and health of workers, and provided it takes the necessary measures to ensure that:

— no employer requires a worker to work more than 48 hours over a seven-day period, calculated as an average for the reference period referred to in point 2 of Article 16, unless he has first obtained the worker's agreement to perform such work,

— no worker is subjected to any detriment by his employer because he is not willing to give his agreement to perform such work,

— the employer keeps up-to-date records of all workers who carry out such work,

— the records are placed at the disposal of the competent authorities, which may, for reasons connected with the safety and/or health of workers, prohibit or restrict the possibility of exceeding the maximum weekly working hours,

— the employer provides the competent authorities at their request with information on cases in which agreement has been given by workers to perform work exceeding 48 hours over a period of seven days, calculated as an average for the reference period referred to in point 2 of Article 16.

National legislation

12 German labour law distinguishes between readiness for work ('Arbeitsbereitschaft'), on-call service ('Bereitschaftsdienst') and stand-by ('Rufbereitschaft').

13 Those three concepts are not defined in the national legislation at issue but stem from case-law.

14 Readiness for work ('Arbeitsbereitschaft') covers the situation in which the worker must make himself available to his employer at the place of employment and is, moreover, obliged to remain continuously attentive in order to be able to intervene immediately in case of need.

15 While an employee is on call ('Bereitschaftsdienst') he is obliged to be present at a place determined by the employer, on or outside the latter's premises, and to keep himself available to answer his employer's call, but he is authorised to rest or to occupy himself as he sees fit as long as his services are not required.

16 The stand-by service ('Rufbereitschaft') is characterised by the fact that the employee is not obliged to remain waiting in a place designated by the employer but it is sufficient for him to be reachable at any time so that he may be called upon at short notice to perform his professional tasks.

17 Under German law only readiness for work ('Arbeitsbereitschaft') is as a general rule deemed to constitute full working time. Conversely, both on-call service ('Bereitschaftsdienst') and stand-by ('Rufbereitschaft') are categorised as rest time, save for the part of the service during which the employee has in fact performed his professional tasks.

18 In Germany the legislation on working time and rest periods is contained in the Arbeitszeitgesetz (Law on working time) of 6 June 1994 (BGBl. 1994 I, p. 1170, hereinafter the 'ArbZG'), which was enacted to transpose Directive 93/104.

19 Paragraph 2(1) of the ArbZG defines working time as the period between the beginning and end of work, with the exception of breaks.

20 Under Paragraph 3 of the ArbZG:

'Employees' daily working time must not exceed eight hours. It may be increased to a maximum of 10 hours only on condition that an average eight-hour working day is not exceeded over six calendar months or 24 weeks.'

21 Under Paragraph 5 of the ArbZG:

'(1) Employees must have a minimum rest time of 11 consecutive hours after their daily working time comes to an end.

(2) The length of rest time referred to in paragraph 1 above may be reduced by a maximum of one hour in hospitals and other establishments for the treatment, care and supervision of persons, hotels, restaurants and other establishments providing hospitality and accommodation, the transport industry, broadcasting, and agriculture and husbandry provided that each reduction in rest time is made up by an increase in other rest time to at least 12 hours within any calendar month or period of four weeks.

(3) By way of derogation from paragraph 1, reductions in rest time owing to an intervention during time spent on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") or on stand-by ("Rufbereitschaft") may, in hospitals and other establishments for the treatment, care and supervision of persons, be made up at other times, where those interventions do not exceed one half of the rest time.

22 Paragraph 7 of the ArbZG is worded as follows:

'(1) Under a collective agreement or a works agreement based on a collective agreement, provision may be made:

1. by way of derogation from Paragraph 3,

   (a) to extend working time beyond 10 hours per day even without offset where working time regularly and appreciably includes periods of readiness for work ("Arbeitsbereitschaft"),

   (b) to determine a different period of offset,

(c) to extend working time until 10 hours per day without offset for a maximum period of 60 days per year,

(2) Provided that the health of employees is safeguarded by an equivalent period of compensatory rest, it is permissible to make provision in a collective agreement or a works agreement based on a collective agreement:

1. notwithstanding paragraph 5(1), for rest times where time is spent on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") and stand-by ("Rufbereitschaft") to be adapted to the special circumstances of such duties, including, in particular, reductions in rest time due to work actually being carried out, with these periods of duty being made up at other times,

3. where persons are provided with treatment, care and supervision, for the rules in paragraphs 3, 4, 5(1) and 6(2) to be adapted in line with the particular features of that activity and the well-being of those persons;

4. in the case of Federal, State and municipal administrative authorities and other public corporations, institutions and foundations and in the case of other employers who are bound by collective agreements governing the public service or collective agreements with essentially the same content, for the rules in Paragraphs 3, 4, 5(1) and 6(2) to be adapted to the particular features of the activity at those locations;

23 Paragraph 25 of the ArbZG provides:

'Where, on the date of entry into force hereof, an existing collective agreement or one continuing to produce effects after that date, contains derogating rules under Paragraph 7(1) or (2)..., which exceed the maximum limits laid down in the provisions cited, those rules shall not be affected. Works agreements based on collective agreements shall be deemed equivalent to collective agreements such as those mentioned in the first sentence...'.

24 The Bundesangestelltentarifvertrag (collective agreement for public sector employees in Germany, hereinafter 'the BAT') specifically provides:

'Paragraph 15 Normal working time

(1) Normal working time shall comprise on average 38 and a half hours per week (excluding breaks). As a general rule average normal weekly working time shall be calculated over a period of 8 weeks....

(2) Normal working time may be extended

(a) to 10 hours per day (49 hours per week on average) if it regularly includes readiness for work ("Arbeitsbereitschaft") of at least two hours per day on average,

(b) to 11 hours per day (54 hours per week on average) if it regularly includes readiness for work ("Arbeitsbereitschaft") of at least three hours per day on average,

(c) to 12 hours per day (60 hours per week on average) if the employee merely has to be present at the place of work in order in case of need to perform the work required.

(6a) The employee shall be required, on the instructions of his employer, to keep himself available outside normal working time at a certain place determined by the employer where he can be called upon to work if need be (on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst")). The employer may require an employee to be on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") only where a certain workload may be expected but experience has shown that the length of time during which no work will be required is likely to be longer than that during which work will be required.

In order to calculate remuneration presence on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") including interventions shall be converted into hours worked on the basis of the percentage representing in practice the average duration of work required; working hours so determined shall be paid as overtime....

In lieu of payment, working hours calculated in such circumstances may, before the end of the third calendar month, be offset by the grant of an equivalent period of free time (compensatory rest)...'.

25 In tandem with Paragraph 15(6a) of the BAT, the social partners have agreed special provisions (Sonderregelungen) for the staff of hospitals and medical centres, care-home and maternity establishments and other homes and medical establishments ('SR 2a'). The specific provisions for doctors and dental surgeons employed by the centres and establishments referred to in SR 2a ('SR 2c') are worded as follows:

'No 8

With regard to Paragraph 15(6a)

On call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") and stand-by ("Rufbereitschaft")

...

(2) in order to calculate remuneration, presence on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst"), including interventions, shall be converted as follows into hours of service:

(a) presence on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst"), including interventions, shall be converted as follows into working hours on the basis of the average duration of work actually required to be performed:

Category	Work required during on-call service ("Bereitschaftsdienst"	Conversion to working time
A	From 0 to 10%	15%
B	More than 10% to 25%	25%
C	More than 25% to 40%	40%
D	More than 40% to 49%	55%

On-call service ("Bereitschaftsdienst") under Category A shall be reclassified in Category B if experience proves that whilst on call the person concerned is required to intervene more than three times on average between 22.00 hrs and 06.00 hrs.

(b) the duration of presence on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") required on each occasion shall be converted as follows in accordance with the number of on-call periods performed by the person concerned during the calendar month:

Number of on-call periods ("Bereitschaftsdienst") during the calendar month	Conversion into working time
1 to 8 on-call periods	25%
9 to 12 on-call periods	35%
13 on-call periods or more	45%

(7) In one calendar month

no more than seven on-call periods ('Bereitschaftsdienste') may be required in Categories A and B, no more than six on-call periods ("Bereitschaftsdienste") in Categories C and D.

Those figures may be temporarily exceeded if to observe them would result in care of patients not being guaranteed....

Main proceedings and questions referred

26 It is apparent from the order for reference that the parties to the main proceedings are at variance concerning the question whether time spent in the provision of the on-call service ('Bereitschaftsdienst') organised by the city of Kiel in the hospital operated by it must be deemed to be working time or a rest period. The dispute before the referring court solely concerns aspects of labour law in connection with on-call periods and not the conditions under which those periods are remunerated.

27 Mr Jaeger has worked as a doctor in the surgical department of a hospital in Kiel since 1 May 1992. He spends three quarters of his normal working hours on call (that is to say 28.875 hours). Under an ancillary arrangement, he is also required to carry out on-call duty under scale D in No 8(2) of SR 2c. In the contract of employment the parties to the main proceedings agreed that the BAT applies.

28 Generally, Mr Jaeger carries out six periods of on-call duty each month, offset in part by the grant of free time and in part by the payment of supplementary remuneration.

29 On-call duty begins at the end of a normal working day and the length of each period is 16 hours in the week, 25 hours on Saturdays (from 08.30 hrs to 09.30 hrs on Sunday morning), and 22 hours 45 minutes on Sundays (from 08.30 hrs to 07.15 hrs on Monday morning).

30 On-call duty is organised in the following manner. Mr Jaeger stays at the clinic and is called upon to carry out his professional duties as the need arises. He is allocated a room with a bed in the hospital, where he may sleep when his services are not required. The appropriateness of that accommodation is in dispute. However, it is common ground that the average time during which Mr Jaeger is called upon to carry out a professional task does not exceed 49% of the time spent on call.

31 Mr Jaeger is of the view that the on-call duty performed by him as a junior or emergency doctor in the context of the emergency service must in its entirety be deemed to constitute working time within the meaning of the ArbZG owing to the direct application of Directive 93/104. The interpretation by the Court of the concept of working time in its judgment in Case C-303/98 Simap [2000] ECR I-7963 may be transposed to the present case which concerns an essentially similar situation. In particular, the constraints of the on-call service in Spain, which were at issue in the case which gave rise to the judgment in Simap, are comparable to those to which he is subject. Consequently, Paragraph 5(3) of the ArbZG runs counter to Directive 93/104 and is therefore inapplicable. Mr Jaeger adds that the city of Kiel is not entitled to rely on the derogating provisions of Article 17 of that directive, which provides for exceptions concerning only the duration of rest periods, independently of the concept of work.

32 Conversely, the city of Kiel contends that, according to the consistent interpretation of the national courts and of the majority of academic writers, periods of inactivity during on-call duty must be regarded as rest periods and not as working time. Any other interpretation would render Paragraphs 5(3) and 7(2) of the ArbZG meaningless. Moreover, the judgment in Simap cannot be transposed to the present case. In fact, the Spanish doctors in question were engaged full-time in the provision of primary-care services, whereas the German doctors are called upon to perform professional tasks at most during 49% on average of the period of on-call duty. Finally, the national legislation introducing derogations from the duration of working time is covered by Article 17(2) of Directive 93/104 and the Member States have an extensive margin of discretion in the matter. It would have been superfluous to cite expressly Article 2 of the directive in Article 17 thereof since Article 2 contains definitions only.

33 At first instance the Arbeitsgericht (Labour Court) Kiel (Germany) by judgment of 8 November 2001 upheld Mr Jaeger's claim, taking the view that the on-call duty which he is required to perform at Kiel Hospital must be reckoned in its totality as working time within the meaning of Paragraph 2 of the ArbZG.

34 The city of Kiel thereupon brought the dispute before the Landesarbeitsgericht Schleswig-Holstein.

35 That court points out that the concept of on-call duty ('Bereitschaftsdienst') is not expressly defined in the ArbZG. It concerns the obligation to be present in a place determined by the employer and to hold oneself in readiness to perform professional tasks without delay in case of need. 'Active attention' ('wache Achtsamkeit') is not required and, outside periods of actual activity, the employee may rest or occupy himself in any way. During on-call duty the employee does not have to provide his professional services on his own initiative but only on the instructions of his employer.

36 According to the Landesarbeitsgericht, Mr Jaeger is performing such on-call duty which under German law is reckoned as a rest period and not as working time, apart from that portion of such duty during which the employee actually carries on his professional activities. That conception follows from Paragraphs 5(3) and 7(2) of the ArbZG. Indeed the fact that the reduction in rest periods owing to performance of his tasks during the period of on-call duty may be offset at other times demonstrates that the on-call period counts as a rest period as long as the person concerned is not actually called upon to provide professional services. Such was the intention of the national legislature since it is plain from the preparatory documents to the ArbZG that periods of on-call duty may be followed by periods of working.

37 In the present case the referring court considers that it is important to determine whether periods of on-call duty must be deemed in their totality to constitute working time, even if the person concerned does not actually perform his professional tasks but, on the contrary, is permitted to sleep during those periods. That question was not raised and, consequently, the Court did not answer it in the Simap judgment, cited above.

38 In the event that it is not possible to provide a clear answer to that question, resolution of the dispute depends on whether Paragraph 5(3) of the ArbZG is contrary to Article 2(1) and (2) of Directive 93/104.

39 Finally, in view of the ancillary application (for a declaration that Mr Jaeger is not required, in the context of the obligations laid down in his contract, to work in the ordinary course and in the context of his on-call duty, including overtime, for more than 10 hours per day and more than 48 hours on average per week) and since in that regard the city of Kiel relies on Paragraphs 5(3) and 7(2) of the ArbZG, it is necessary to decide whether those provisions are within the margin of discretion conferred by Directive 93/104 on the Member States and the social partners.

40 In fact, if periods of on-call duty should in their entirety be deemed to constitute working time and the organisation at national level of those services were adjudged to be contrary to Article 3 of Directive 93/104 owing to the fact that the rest period of 11 consecutive hours could be not only reduced but also interrupted, the German legislation could none the less be covered by Article 17(2) of that directive.

41 If national legislation or the applicable collective agreement secured for employees an adequate period of rest — notwithstanding the fact that the period of on-call duty is regarded by them as a rest period — it would be possible for the objectives of Directive 93/104, that is to say to ensure the safety and health of employees in the Community, to be safeguarded.

42 Taking the view that, under those circumstances, resolution of the dispute before it required an interpretation of Community law, the Landesarbeitsgericht Schleswig-Holstein decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Does time spent on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") by an employee in a hospital, in general, constitute working time within the meaning of Article 2(1) of Directive 93/104... even where the employee is permitted to sleep at times when he is not required to work?

2. Is it in breach of Article 3 of Directive 93/104/EC for a rule of national law to classify time spent on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") as a rest period unless work is actually carried out, where the employee stays in a room provided in a hospital and works as and when required to do so?

3. Is it in breach of Directive 93/104/EC for a rule of national law to permit a reduction in the daily rest period of 11 hours in hospitals and other establishments for the treatment, care and supervision of persons, where the amount of time actually worked during time spent on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") or stand-by ("Rufbereitschaft"), not exceeding one half of the rest period, is compensated for at other times?

4. Is it in breach of Directive 93/104/EC for a rule of national law to permit a collective agreement or a works agreement based on a collective agreement to allow rest periods, where time is spent on call ("Bereitschaftsdienst") and stand-by ("Rufbereitschaft"), to be adapted to the special circumstances of such duties, including in particular reductions in rest periods as a result of work actually being carried out, with these periods of duty being compensated for at other times?'

The questions referred 43 It must be borne in mind at the outset that, although it is not for the Court, under Article 234 EC, to rule upon the compatibility of a provision of domestic law with Community law or interpret domestic legislation or regulations, it may nevertheless provide the national court with an interpretation of Community law on all such points as may enable that court to determine the issue of compatibility for the purposes of the case before it (see, for example, Case C-292/92 Hünermund and Others [1993] ECR I-6787, paragraph 8; Case C-28/99 Verdonck and Others [2001] ECR I-3399, paragraph 28; Joined Cases C-285/99 and C-286/99 Lombardini and Mantovani [2001] ECR I-9233, paragraph 27).

First and second questions

44 In light of the matters pointed out in the preceding paragraph, the first two questions, which it is appropriate to examine together, must be understood as essentially asking whether Directive 93/104 must be interpreted as meaning that a period of duty spent by a doctor on call ('Bereitschaftsdienst'), where presence in the hospital is required, must be regarded as constituting in its entirety working time for the purposes of that directive, even though the person concerned is permitted to rest at his place of work during the periods when his services are not required, with the result that that directive precludes a Member State's legislation which classifies as a rest period an employee's periods of inactivity in the context of such on-call duty.

45 In replying to those questions as reformulated, it should be stated at the outset that it is clear both from Article 118a of the EC Treaty (Articles 117 to 120 of the EC Treaty have been replaced by Articles 136 EC to 143 EC), which is the legal basis of Directive 93/104, and from the first, fourth, seventh and eighth recitals in its preamble as well as the wording of Article 1(1) itself, that the purpose of the directive is to lay down minimum requirements intended to improve the living and working conditions of workers through approximation of national provisions concerning, in particular, the duration of working time (Case C-173/99 BECTU [2001] ECR I-4881, paragraph 37).

46 According to those same provisions, such harmonisation at Community level in relation to the organisation of working time is intended to guarantee better protection of the safety and health of workers by ensuring that they are entitled to minimum rest periods — particularly daily and weekly — and adequate breaks and by providing for a ceiling on the duration of the working week (see judgments in Simap, paragraph 49, and BECTU, paragraph 38).

47 In that context it is clear from the Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers, adopted at the meeting of the European Council held at Strasbourg on 9 December 1989, and in particular points 8 and 19, first subparagraph, thereof, which are referred to in the fourth recital in the preamble to Directive 93/104, that every worker in the European Community must enjoy satisfactory health and safety conditions in his working environment and must have a right, inter alia, to a weekly rest period, the duration of which in the Member States must be progressively harmonised in accordance with national practices.

48 With regard more specifically to the concept of 'working time' for the purposes of Directive 93/104, it is important to point out that at paragraph 47 of the judgment in Simap, the Court noted that the directive defines that concept as any period during which the worker is working, at the employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties, in accordance with national laws and/or practices, and that that concept is placed in opposition to rest periods, the two being mutually exclusive.

49 At paragraph 48 of the judgment in Simap the Court held that the characteristic features of working time are present in the case of time spent on call by doctors in primary care teams in Valencia (Spain) where their presence at the health centre is required. The Court found, in the case which resulted in that judgment, that it was not disputed that during periods of duty on call under those rules, the first two conditions set out in the definition of the concept of working time were fulfilled and, further, that, even if the activity actually performed varied according to the circumstances, the fact that such doctors were obliged to be present and available at the workplace with a view to providing their professional services had to be regarded as coming within the ambit of the performance of their duties.

50 The Court added, at paragraph 49 of the judgment in Simap, that that interpretation was in conformity with the objective of Directive 93/104, which is to ensure the safety and health of workers by granting them minimum periods of rest and adequate breaks, whereas to exclude duty on call from 'working time' within the meaning of the directive if physical presence is required would seriously undermine that objective.

51 At paragraph 50 of the judgment in Simap, the Court went on to state that the situation is different where doctors in primary care teams are on call by being contactable at all times without having to be at the health centre. In fact, even if they are at the disposal of their employer, in that it must be possible to contact them, the fact remains that in that situation doctors may manage their time with fewer constraints and pursue their own interests, so that only time linked to the actual provision of primary care services must be regarded as 'working time' within the meaning of Directive 93/104.

52 After pointing out at paragraph 51 of the judgment in Simap that overtime comes within the concept of 'working time' for the purposes of Directive 93/104, the Court concluded at paragraph 52 thereof that time spent on call by doctors in primary health care teams must be regarded in its entirety as working time, and where appropriate as overtime, within the meaning of the directive if they are required to be present at the health centre, whereas if they must merely be contactable at all times when on call, only time linked to the actual provision of primary care services must be regarded as working time (see to the same effect the order in Case C-241/99 CIG [2001] ECR I-5139, paragraphs 33 and 34).

53 First, it is not disputed that a doctor performing duties such as those at issue in the main proceedings performs his on-call duty under a regime requiring presence in the health centre.

54 Secondly, neither the context nor the nature of the activities of such a doctor are materially different from those in the case which gave rise to the judgment in Simap in such a way as to call in question the Court's interpretation of Directive 93/104 in that judgment.

55 In that regard those activities cannot be validly distinguished on the basis that in the case which gave rise to the judgment in Simap the doctors assigned to a primary care team were subject to uninterrupted working time which could extend for up to 31 hours without night rest, whereas in the case of on-call duty such as that at issue in the main proceedings, the relevant national legislation ensures that the periods during which the person concerned may be called upon to perform a professional task do not exceed 49% of the totality of the period of on-call duty with the result that he could be inactive during more than half of that period.

56 In fact, as the Advocate General pointed out in footnote 3 of his Opinion, it is not apparent from the Spanish legislation at issue in the case which resulted in the Simap judgment that the doctors performing on-call duty at the hospital must remain alert and active for the whole duration of such period. The same conclusion may also be drawn from paragraphs 15, 31 and 33 of the Advocate General's Opinion in that case.

57 Moreover, even though the figure of 49% appearing in the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings relates to the average time calculated over a certain period linked to the actual performance of services during the period of on-call duty, it is none the less the case that, during that period, a doctor may be required to provide his services as often and as long as proves to be necessary without there being any limitation in that regard under the legislation.

58 In any event the concepts of 'working time' and 'rest period' within the meaning of Directive 93/104 may not be interpreted in accordance with the requirements of the various legislations of the Member States but constitute concepts of Community law which must be defined in accordance with objective characteristics by reference to the scheme and purpose of that directive, as the Court did at paragraphs 48 to 50 of the judgment in Simap. Only such an autonomous interpretation is capable of securing for that directive full efficacy and uniform application of those concepts in all the Member States.

59 Accordingly, the fact that the definition of the concept of working time refers to 'national law and/or practice' does not mean that the Member States may unilaterally determine the scope of that concept. Thus, those States may not make subject to any condition the right of employees to have working periods and corresponding rest periods duly taken into account since that right stems directly from the provisions of that directive. Any other interpretation would frustrate the objective of Directive 93/104 of harmonising the protection of the safety and health of workers by means of minimum requirements (see Case C-84/94 United Kingdom v Council [1996] ECR I-5755, paragraphs 45 and 75).

60 The fact that in the Simap judgment the Court did not expressly rule on the fact that doctors performing on-call duty where they are required to be present in the hospital can rest or sleep during the periods when their services are not required is in no way material in that connection.

61 Thus, such periods of professional inactivity are inherent in on-call duty performed by doctors where they are required to be present in the hospital given that, unlike during normal working hours, the need for urgent interventions depends on the circumstances and cannot be planned in advance.

62 Thus, in the last sentence of paragraph 48 of the judgment in Simap, the Court expressly referred to that characteristic from which it necessarily follows that it proceeded on the basis that doctors on call at the hospital do not actually perform their professional duties uninterruptedly during the whole period of on-call duty.

63 According to the Court, the decisive factor in considering that the characteristic features of the concept of 'working time' within the meaning of Directive 93/104 are present in the case of time spent on call by doctors in the hospital itself is that they are required to be present at the place determined by the employer and to be available to the employer in order to be able to provide their services immediately in case of need. In fact, as may be inferred from paragraph 48 of the judgment in Simap, those obligations, which make it impossible for the doctors concerned to choose the place where they stay during waiting periods, must be regarded as coming within the ambit of the performance of their duties.

64 That conclusion is not altered by the mere fact that the employer makes available to the doctor a rest room in which he can stay for as long as his professional services are not required.

65 It should be added that, as the Court already held at paragraph 50 of the judgment in Simap, in contrast to a doctor on stand-by, where the doctor is required to be permanently accessible but not present in the health centre, a doctor who is required to keep himself available to his employer at the place determined by him for the whole duration of periods of on-call duty is subject to appreciably greater constraints since he has to remain apart from his family and social environment and has less freedom to manage the time during which his professional services are not required. Under those conditions an employee available at the place determined by the employer cannot be regarded as being at rest during the periods of his on-call duty when he is not actually carrying on any professional activity.

66 That interpretation cannot be called in question by the objections based on economic and organisational consequences which, according to the five Member States which submitted observations under Article 20 of the EC Statute of the Court of Justice, would result from the extension to a case such as that in the main proceedings of the solution adopted in the Simap judgment.

67 Moreover, it is clear from the fifth recital in the preamble to Directive 93/104 that 'the improvement of workers' safety, hygiene and health at work is an objective which should not be subordinated to purely economic considerations.'

68 It follows from all the foregoing that the conclusion reached by the Court in the Simap judgment, according to which time spent on call by doctors in primary health care teams, where they are required to be physically present in the health centre, must be regarded in its entirety as working time within the meaning of Directive 93/104, irrespective of the work actually performed by the persons concerned, must also apply in regard to on-call duty performed under the same regime by a doctor such as Mr Jaeger in the hospital where he is employed.

69 Under those circumstances Directive 93/104 precludes national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which treats as periods of rest periods of on-call duty during which the doctor is not actually required to perform any professional task and may rest but must be present and remain available at the place determined by the employer with a view to performance of those services if need be or when he is requested to intervene.

70 In fact that is the only interpretation which accords with the objective of Directive 93/104 which is to secure effective protection of the safety and health of employees by allowing them to enjoy minimum periods of rest. That interpretation is all the more cogent in the case of doctors performing on-call duty in health centres, given that the periods during which their services are not required in order to cope with emergencies may, depending on the case, be of short duration and/or subject to frequent interruptions and where, moreover, it cannot be ruled out that the persons concerned may be prompted to intervene, apart from in emergencies, to monitor the condition of patients placed under their care or to perform tasks of an administrative nature.

71 In light of all the foregoing considerations the reply to the first and second questions must be that Directive 93/104 must be interpreted as meaning that on-call duty ('Bereitschaftsdienst') performed by a doctor where he is required to be physically present in the hospital must be regarded as constituting in its totality working time for the purposes of that directive even where the person concerned is permitted to rest at his place of work during the periods when his services are not required with the result that that directive precludes legislation of a Member State which classifies as rest periods an employee's periods of inactivity in the context of such on-call duty.

The third and fourth questions

72 By its third and fourth questions, which must be examined together, the referring court is essentially asking whether Directive 93/104 must be interpreted as precluding legislation of a Member State which, in the case of on-call duty where physical presence in the hospital is required, has the effect of enabling, in an appropriate case by means of a collective agreement or a works agreement based on a collective agreement, a reduction in the daily rest periods of 11 hours subject to offset 'at other times during the periods worked during on-call duty.'

73 It appears from the context in which the third and fourth questions were raised that the referring court is questioning the compatibility with the requirements of Directive 93/104 of the matters prescribed in Paragraph 5(3) and the first subparagraph of Paragraph 7(2) of the ArbZG.

74 In that connection it appears at the outset that national provisions such as those alluded to by the referring court make a distinction according to whether the employee is or is not called upon actually to perform work during on-call duty since only the periods of actual activity during on-call duty may be offset whereas the periods of on-call duty during which the employee is not active are regarded as rest periods.

75 However, as may be inferred from the reply to the first two questions, on-call duty performed by a doctor in the hospital employing him must be regarded in its entirety as constituting work time, irrespective of the fact that, during that period of on-call duty, the employee is not continuously carrying on any activity. Consequently, Directive 93/104 precludes legislation of a Member State which treats as rest periods under that directive the employee's periods of inactivity whilst on call in the health centre and which thus provides only for periods during which the person concerned has actually performed any professional activity to be offset.

76 In order to give a useful reply to the referring court, it is also appropriate to state the requirements of Directive 93/104 in regard to rest periods and in particular to examine whether and, if so, to what extent national provisions such as Paragraph 5(3) and the first subparagraph of Paragraph 7(2) of the ArbZG may come within the possibilities for derogation under that directive.

77 In that context Article 3 of Directive 93/104 enshrines the right of every employee to benefit during each 24-hour period from a minimum rest period of 11 consecutive hours.

78 As to Article 6 of that directive it requires the Member States to adopt the measures necessary to ensure that, in keeping with the need to protect the safety and health of workers, the average working time for each seven-day period, including overtime, does not exceed 48 hours.

79 However, it is clear from the very wording of the two abovementioned provisions that they preclude in principle national legislation, such as that in issue in the main proceedings, which permits periods of work which may last for around 30 hours at a stretch where a period of on-call duty precedes or immediately follows a period of normal service, or more than 50 hours per week, including periods of on-call duty. It would be otherwise only if that legislation came within the possibilities for derogation provided for in Directive 93/104.

80 In that regard it follows from the system established by that directive that, although Article 15 allows generally for the application or introduction of national provisions more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of employees, the directive conversely provides in Article 17 that only certain of its provisions exhaustively enumerated may form the subject-matter of derogations provided for by the Member States or social partners.

81 However, first, it is significant that Article 2 of Directive 93/104 is not amongst the provisions in respect of which the directive expressly permits derogations.

82 That fact is such as to reinforce the finding at paragraphs 58 and 59 hereof according to which the definitions in Article 2 cannot be freely interpreted by the Member States.

83 Secondly, Article 6 of Directive 93/104 is mentioned only in Article 17(1) although it is undisputed that the latter provision covers activities which bear no relationship to those performed by a doctor during periods of on-call duty performed where physical presence in the hospital is required.

84 It is true that Article 18(1)(b)(i) of Directive 93/104 provides that the Member States have the right not to apply Article 6 provided that they observe the general principles of protection of safety and health of workers and that they satisfy a certain number of conditions set out cumulatively in that provision.

85 None the less, as the German Government expressly confirmed at the hearing, it is undisputed that the Federal Republic of Germany has not availed itself of that possibility of derogation.

86 Thirdly, Article 3 of Directive 93/104, on the other hand, is mentioned in several of the subparagraphs of Article 17 of that directive and in particular in Article 17(2), subparagraph 2.1, a provision that is relevant to the main proceedings since it refers, in subsubparagraph (c)(i), to 'activities involving the need for continuity of service..., particularly... services relating to the reception, treatment and/or care provided by hospitals or similar establishments...'.

87 The particular characteristics of the organisation of teams of on-call services in hospitals and similar establishments are therefore recognised by Directive 93/104 inasmuch as it provides in Article 17 for possibilities of derogation in connection with them.

88 Thus the Court considered at paragraph 45 of the judgment in Simap that the activity of doctors in primary care teams may come within the derogations provided for in that article provided that the conditions laid down in that provision are satisfied (see order in CIG, cited above, paragraph 31).

89 In that regard it should be pointed out that, since they are exceptions to the Community system for the organisation of working time put in place by Directive 93/104, the derogations provided for in Article 17 must be interpreted in such a way that their scope is limited to what is strictly necessary in order to safeguard the interests which those derogations enable to be protected.

90 Moreover, under the terms of Article 17(2) of Directive 93/104, the implementation of such a derogation, with particular regard to the duration of the daily rest provided for in Article 3, is expressly subject to the condition that the workers concerned are afforded equivalent periods of compensatory rest or that, in exceptional cases in which it is not possible, for objective reasons, to grant such equivalent periods of compensatory rest, those workers are afforded appropriate protection. Under Article 17(3) the same conditions are applicable in the case of derogation from Article 3 by collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry at national or regional level or, in conformity with the rules laid down by them, by means of collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry at a lower level.

91 However, on the one hand, as has already been noted at paragraph 81 hereof, Article 17 of Directive 93/104 does not allow derogations from the definitions of the concepts of 'working time' and 'rest period' in Article 2 of the directive by counting as rest periods the periods during which a doctor who is required to perform his on-call duty at the hospital itself is not active, whereas such periods must be regarded as forming an integral part of working time for the purposes of the directive.

92 Secondly, it should be pointed out that the purpose of Directive 93/104 is effectively to protect the safety and health of workers. In light of that essential objective each employee must in particular enjoy adequate rest periods which must not only be effective in enabling the persons concerned to recover from the fatigue engendered by their work but are also preventive in nature so as to reduce as much as possible the risk of affecting the safety or health of employees which successive periods of work without the necessary rest are likely to produce.

93 In that regard it is clear from paragraph 15 of the judgment in United Kingdom v Council that the concepts of 'safety' and 'health' as used in Article 118a of the Treaty, on which Directive 93/104 is based, should be interpreted widely as embracing all factors, physical or otherwise, capable of affecting the health and safety of the worker in his working environment, including in particular certain aspects of the organisation of working time. At the same paragraph of that judgment the Court further noted that such an interpretation derives support in particular from the preamble to the Constitution of the World Health Organisation to which all the Member States belong. Health is there defined as a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being that does not consist only in the absence of illness or infirmity.

94 It follows from the foregoing that 'equivalent compensating rest periods' within the meaning of Article 17(2) and (3) of Directive 93/104 must, in order to comply with both those qualifications and the objective of the directive as described at paragraph 92 of this judgment, be characterised by the fact that during such periods the worker is not subject to any obligation vis-à-vis his employer which may prevent him from pursuing freely and without interruption his own interests in order to neutralise the effects of work on his safety or health. Such rest periods must therefore follow on immediately from the working time which they are supposed to counteract in order to prevent the worker from experiencing a state of fatigue or overload owing to the accumulation of consecutive periods of work.

95 In order to ensure the effective protection of the safety and health of the worker provision must as a general rule be made for a period of work regularly to alternate with a rest period. In order to be able to rest effectively, the worker must be able to remove himself from his working environment for a specific number of hours which must not only be consecutive but must also directly follow a period of work in order to enable him to relax and dispel the fatigue caused by the performance of his duties. That requirement appears all the more necessary where, by way of exception to the general rule, normal daily working time is extended by completion of a period of on-call duty.

96 Conversely, a series of periods of work completed without the interpolation of the necessary rest time may, in a given case, cause damage to the worker or at the very least threaten to overtax his physical capacities, thus endangering his health and safety with the result that a rest period granted subsequent to those periods is not such as correctly to ensure the protection of the interests at issue. As has been established at paragraph 70 hereof, that risk is yet more real in regard to on-call duty performed by a doctor in a health centre, a fortiori where that duty is additional to normal working time.

97 Under those circumstances the increase in daily working time which the Member States or social partners may effect under Article 17 of Directive 93/104 by reducing the rest period accorded to the worker during the course of a given working day, in particular in hospitals and similar establishments, must in principle be offset by the grant of equivalent periods of compensatory rest made up of a number of consecutive hours corresponding to the reduction applied and from which the worker must benefit before commencing the following period of work. As a general rule, to accord such periods of rest only 'at other times' not directly linked with the period of work extended owing to the completion of overtime does not adequately take into account the need to observe the general principles of protection of the safety and health of workers which constitute the foundation of the Community regime for organisation of working time.

98 In fact it is only in entirely exceptional circumstances that Article 17 enables 'appropriate protection' to be accorded to the worker where the grant of equivalent periods of compensatory rest is not possible on objective grounds.

99 However, in the present case, it is in no way argued or even alleged that legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings may come within such a situation.

100 Furthermore, in no circumstances may a reduction in the daily rest period of 11 consecutive hours, as authorised by Directive 93/104 in certain circumstances and subject to compliance with various conditions, lead to the maximum weekly working time laid down in Article 6 of the directive being exceeded such that a worker is required to perform his activities for more than an average of 48 hours, including overtime, in any period of seven days, even if such time includes periods on call during which the employee, although available at his place of work, is not actually engaged in professional activities.

101 As was noted at paragraph 83 hereof, Article 17 does not permit derogation from Article 6 for activities such as those at issue in the main proceedings.

102 In view of the considerations set out herein, it must be concluded that national provisions such as those laid down in Paragraph 5(3) and the first subparagraph of Paragraph 7(2) of the ArbZG are not such as to come within the possible derogations provided for in Directive 93/104.

103 In those circumstances the reply to be given to the third and fourth questions is that Directive 93/104 must be interpreted as meaning that:

— in circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, that directive precludes legislation of a Member State which, in the case of on-call duty

where physical presence in the hospital is required, has the effect of enabling, in an appropriate case by means of a collective agreement or a works agreement based on a collective agreement, an offset only in respect of periods of on-call duty during which the worker has actually been engaged in professional activities;

— in order to come within the derogating provisions set out in Article 17(2), subparagraph 2.1(c)(i) of the directive, a reduction in the daily rest periods of 11 consecutive hours by a period of on-call duty performed in addition to normal working time is subject to the condition that equivalent compensating rest periods be accorded to the workers concerned at times immediately following the corresponding periods worked;

— furthermore, in no circumstances may such a reduction in the daily rest period lead to the maximum weekly working time laid down in Article 6 of the directive being exceeded.

Costs

104 The costs incurred by the German, Danish, French, Netherlands and United Kingdom Governments and the Commission, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Landesarbeitsgericht Schleswig-Holstein by order of 12 March 2002, amended by order of 25 March 2002, hereby rules:

1. Council Directive 93/104/EC of 23 November 1993 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time must be interpreted as meaning that on-call duty ('Bereitschaftsdienst') performed by a doctor where he is required to be physically present in the hospital must be regarded as constituting in its totality working time for the purposes of that directive even where the person concerned is permitted to rest at his place of work during the periods when his services are not required with the result that that directive precludes legislation of a Member State which classifies as rest periods an employee's periods of inactivity in the context of such on-call duty.

2. Directive 93/104 must also be interpreted as meaning that:

— in circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, that directive precludes legislation of a Member State which, in the case of on-call duty

where physical presence in the hospital is required, has the effect of enabling, in an appropriate case by means of a collective agreement or a works agreement based on a collective agreement, an offset only in respect of periods of on-call duty during which the worker has actually been engaged in professional activities;

— in order to come within the derogating provisions set out in Article 17(2), subparagraph 2.1(c)(i) of the directive, a reduction in the daily rest period of 11 consecutive hours by a period of on-call duty performed in addition to normal working time is subject to the condition that equivalent compensating rest periods be accorded to the workers concerned at times immediately following the corresponding periods worked;

— furthermore, in no circumstances may such a reduction in the daily rest period lead to the maximum weekly working time laid down in Article 6 of the directive being exceeded.

after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 15 October 1996,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By order of 30 November 1994, received at the Court Registry on 18 January 1995, the Arbeitsgericht (Labour Court), Bonn, referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EC Treaty two questions on the interpretation of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses (OJ 1977 L 61, p. 26, hereinafter 'the directive').

2 Those questions were raised in proceedings brought by Mrs Süzen against Zehnacker Gebäudereinigung GmbH Krankenhausservice (hereinafter 'Zehnacker').

3 Mrs Süzen was employed by Zehnacker, which assigned her to cleaning operations in the premises of the Aloisiuskolleg, a secondary school in Bonn-Bad-Godesberg, Germany, under a cleaning contract concluded between that school and Zehnacker. Zehnacker dismissed Mrs Süzen, together with seven other employees who, like her, worked as cleaners at the school, by reason of the fact that the Aloisiuskolleg terminated the contract between it and Zehnacker with effect from 30 June 1994.

4 The Aloisiuskolleg then contracted the cleaning of its premises to Lefarth GmbH (hereinafter 'Lefarth'), the party joined in the main proceedings, with effect from 1 August 1994. The order for reference does not state whether Lefarth offered to re-engage the employees dismissed by Zehnacker.

5 Mrs Süzen instituted proceedings before the Arbeitsgericht, Bonn, for a declaration that the notice of dismissal served on her by Zehnacker had not brought to an end her employment relationship with the latter.

6 Considering that the decision to be given depended on an interpretation of the directive, the Arbeitsgericht stayed proceedings pending a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice on the following questions:

'1. On the basis of the judgments of the Court of Justice of 14 April 1994 in Case C-392/92 Schmidt [1994] ECR I-1311 and of 19 May 1992 in Case C-29/91 Redmond Stichting [1992] ECR I-3189, is Directive 77/187/EEC applicable if an undertaking terminates a contract with an outside undertaking in order then to transfer it to another outside undertaking?

2. Is there a legal transfer within the meaning of the directive in the case of the operation described in Question 1 even if no tangible or intangible business assets are transferred?'

7 Article 1(1) of the directive provides: 'This directive shall apply to the transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger'.

8 In Schmidt, cited above, the Court held that that provision must be interpreted as covering a situation, such as that outlined in the order for reference, in which an undertaking entrusts by contract to another undertaking the responsibility for carrying out cleaning operations which it previously performed itself, even though, prior to the transfer, such work was carried out by a single employee. Earlier, in Redmond Stichting, cited above, the Court took the view in particular that the term 'legal transfer' covers a situation in which a public authority decides to terminate the subsidy paid to one legal person, as a result of which the activities of that legal person are fully and definitively terminated, and to transfer it to another legal person with a similar aim.

9 By its two questions, which it is appropriate to consider together, the national court asks whether the directive also applies to a situation in which a person who had entrusted the cleaning of his premises to a first undertaking terminates his contract with the latter and, for the performance of similar work, enters into a new contract with a second undertaking without any concomitant transfer of tangible or intangible business assets from one undertaking to the other.

10 The aim of the directive is to ensure continuity of employment relationships within an economic entity, irrespective of any change of ownership. The decisive criterion for establishing the existence of a transfer within the meaning of the directive is whether the entity in question retains its identity, as indicated inter alia by the fact that its operation is actually continued or resumed (Case 24/85 Spijkers [1986] ECR 1119, paragraphs 11 and 12, and, most recently, Joined Cases C-171/94 and C-172/94 Merckx and Neuhuys [1996] ECR I-1253, paragraph 16; see also the advisory opinion of the Court of the European Free Trade Association of 19 December 1996 in Case E-2/96 Ulstein and Røiseng, not yet reported, paragraph 27).

11 Whilst the lack of any contractual link between the transferor and the transferee or, as in this case, between the two undertakings successively entrusted with the cleaning of a school, may point to the absence of a transfer within the meaning of the directive, it is certainly not conclusive.

12 As has been held — most recently in Merckx and Neuhuys (paragraph 28) — the directive is applicable wherever, in the context of contractual relations, there is a change in the natural or legal person who is responsible for carrying on the business and who incurs the obligations of an employer towards employees of the undertaking. Thus, there is no need, in order for the directive to be applicable, for there to be any direct contractual relationship between the transferor and the transferee: the transfer may also take place in two stages, through the intermediary of a third party such as the owner or the person putting up the capital.

13 For the directive to be applicable, however, the transfer must relate to a stable economic entity whose activity is not limited to performing one specific works contract (Case C-48/94 Rygaard [1995] ECR I-2745, paragraph 20). The term entity thus refers to an organized grouping of persons and assets facilitating the exercise of an economic activity which pursues a specific objective.

14 In order to determine whether the conditions for the transfer of an entity are met, it is necessary to consider all the facts characterizing the transaction in question, including in particular the type of undertaking or business, whether or not its tangible assets, such as buildings and movable property, are transferred, the value of its intangible assets at the time of the transfer, whether or not the majority of its employees are taken over by the new employer, whether or not its customers are transferred, the degree of similarity between the activities carried on before and after the transfer, and the period, if any, for which those activities were suspended. However, all those circumstances are merely single factors in the overall assessment which must be made and cannot therefore be considered in isolation (see, in particular, Spijkers and Redmond Stichting, paragraphs 13 and 24 respectively).

15 As observed by most of the parties who commented on this point, the mere fact that the service provided by the old and the new awardees of a contract is similar does not therefore support the conclusion that an economic entity has been transferred. An entity cannot be reduced to the activity entrusted to it. Its identity also emerges from other factors, such as its workforce, its management staff, the way in which its work is organized, its operating methods or indeed, where appropriate, the operational resources available to it.

16 The mere loss of a service contract to a competitor cannot therefore by itself indicate the existence of a transfer within the meaning of the directive. In those circumstances, the service undertaking previously entrusted with the contract does not, on losing a customer, thereby cease fully to exist, and a business or part of a business belonging to it cannot be considered to have been transferred to the new awardee of the contract.

17 It must also be noted that, although the transfer of assets is one of the criteria to be taken into account by the national court in deciding whether an undertaking has in fact been transferred, the absence of such assets does not necessarily preclude the existence of such a transfer (Schmidt and Merckx, cited above, paragraphs 16 and 21 respectively).

18 As pointed out in paragraph 14 of this judgment, the national court, in assessing the facts characterizing the transaction in question, must take into account among other things the type of undertaking or business concerned. It follows that the degree of importance to be attached to each criterion for determining whether or not there has been a transfer within the meaning of the directive will necessarily vary according to the activity carried on, or indeed the production or operating methods employed in the relevant undertaking, business or part of a business. Where in particular an economic entity is able, in certain sectors, to function without any significant tangible or intangible assets, the maintenance of its identity following the transaction affecting it cannot, logically, depend on the transfer of such assets.

19 The United Kingdom Government and the Commission have argued that, for the entity previously entrusted with a service contract to have been the subject of a transfer within the meaning of the directive, it may be sufficient in certain circumstances for the new awardee of the contract to have voluntarily taken over the majority of the employees specially assigned by his predecessor to the performance of the contract.

20 In that regard, it should be borne in mind that the factual circumstances to be taken into account in determining whether the conditions for a transfer are met include in particular, in addition to the degree of similarity of the activity carried on before and after the transfer and the type of undertaking or business concerned, the question whether or not the majority of the employees were taken over by the new employer (Spijkers, cited above, paragraph 13).

21 Since in certain labour-intensive sectors a group of workers engaged in a joint activity on a permanent basis may constitute an economic entity, it must be recognized that such an entity is capable of maintaining its identity after it has been transferred where the new employer does not merely pursue the activity in question but also takes over a major part, in terms of their numbers and skills, of the employees specially assigned by his predecessor to that task. In those circumstances, as stated in paragraph 21 of Rygaard, cited above, the new employer takes over a body of assets enabling him to carry on the activities or certain activities of the transferor undertaking on a regular basis.

22 It is for the national court to establish, in the light of the foregoing interpretative guidance, whether a transfer has occurred in this case.

23 The answer to the questions from the national court must therefore be that Article 1(1) of the directive is to be interpreted as meaning that the directive does not apply to a situation in which a person who had entrusted the cleaning of his premises to a first undertaking terminates his contract with the latter and, for the performance of similar work, enters into a new contract with a second undertaking, if there is no concomitant transfer from one undertaking to the other of significant tangible or intangible assets or taking over by the new employer of a major part of the workforce, in terms of their numbers and skills, assigned by his predecessor to the performance of the contract.

Costs

24 The costs incurred by the Belgian, French, German and United Kingdom Governments and the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Arbeitsgericht, Bonn, by order of 30 November 1994, hereby rules:

Article 1(1) of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses is to be interpreted as meaning that the directive does not apply to a situation in which a person who had entrusted the cleaning of his premises to a first undertaking terminates his contract with the latter and, for the performance of similar work, enters into a new contract with a second undertaking, if there is no concomitant transfer from one undertaking to the other of significant tangible or intangible assets or taking over by the new employer of a major part of the workforce, in terms of their numbers and skills, assigned by his predecessor to the performance of the contract.

Judgment

1 By order of 10 July 1998, received at the Court on 3 August 1998, the Tribunal Superior de Justicia de la Comunidad Valenciana (High Court of Justice of the Valencia Autonomous Community) referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EC Treaty (now Article 234 EC) five questions on the interpretation of Council Directive 89/391/EEC of 12 June 1989 on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health of workers at work (OJ 1989 L 183, p. 1, hereinafter 'the basic Directive') and Council Directive 93/104/EC of 23 November 1993 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time (OJ 1993 L 307, p. 18).

2 Those questions were raised in proceedings between the Sindicato de Médicos de Sanidad de Asistencia Pública (Union of Doctors in the Public Health Service, hereinafter 'Simap') and the Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valenciana (Ministry of Health of the Valencia Region), Simap having brought a collective action against the latter on behalf of medical staff providing primary care at health centres in that region.

Legal background

The Community legislation

The basic Directive

3 The basic Directive provides the background to this case. It lays down general principles which have been developed by a series of specific directives, including Directive 93/104.

4 Article 2 of the basic Directive defines its scope in the following terms:

'1. This Directive shall apply to all sectors of activity, both public and private (industrial, agricultural, commercial, administrative, service, educational, cultural, leisure, etc.).

2. This Directive shall not be applicable where characteristics peculiar to certain specific public service activities, such as the armed forces or the police, or to certain specific activities in the civil protection services inevitably conflict with it.

In that event, the safety and health of workers must be ensured as far as possible in the light of the objectives of this Directive.'

Directive 93/104

5 Directive 93/104 seeks to encourage improvements in the safety and health of workers at work. It was adopted on the basis of Article 118a of the EC Treaty (Articles 117 to 120 of the EC Treaty have been replaced by Articles 136 EC to 143 EC).

6 The first two articles of Directive 93/104 define its purpose and ambit and the scope and meaning of the terms used in it.

7 Article 1 of that directive, entitled 'Purpose and scope', states:

'1. This Directive lays down minimum safety and health requirements for the organisation of working time.

2. This Directive applies to:

(a) minimum periods of daily rest, weekly rest and annual leave, to breaks and maximum weekly working time; and

(b) certain aspects of night work, shift work and patterns of work.

3. This Directive shall apply to all sectors of activity, both public and private, within the meaning of Article 2 of Directive 89/391/EEC, without prejudice to Article 17 of this Directive, with the exception of air, rail, road, sea, inland waterway and lake transport, sea fishing, other work at sea and the activities of doctors in training.

4. The provisions of Directive 89/391/EEC are fully applicable to the matters referred to in paragraph 2, without prejudice to more stringent and/or specific provisions contained in this Directive.'

8 Under the heading 'Definitions', Article 2 of that directive provides:

'For the purposes of this Directive, the following definitions shall apply:

1. working time shall mean any period during which the worker is working, at the employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties, in accordance with national laws and/or practice;

2. rest period shall mean any period which is not working time;

3. night time shall mean any period of not less than seven hours, as defined by national law, and which must include in any case the period between midnight and 5 a.m.;

4. night worker shall mean:

(a) on the one hand, any worker who, during night time, works at least three hours of his daily working time as a normal course; and

(b) on the other hand, any worker who is likely during night time to work a certain proportion of his annual working time, as defined at the choice of the Member State concerned:

(i) by national legislation, following consultation with the two sides of industry; or

(ii) by collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry at national or regional level;

5. shift work shall mean any method of organising work in shifts whereby workers succeed each other at the same work stations according to a certain pattern, including a rotating pattern, and which may be continuous or discontinuous, entailing the need for workers to work at different times over a given period of days or weeks;

6. shift worker shall mean any worker whose work schedule is part of shift work.'

9 Directive 93/104 lays down a set of rules concerning the maximum duration of the working week, minimum daily and weekly rest periods, annual leave and the duration and conditions of night work and shift work.

10 With regard to maximum weekly working time, Article 6 provides:

'Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, in keeping with the need to protect the safety and health of workers:

1. the period of weekly working time is limited by means of laws, regulations or administrative provisions or by collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry;

2. the average working time for each seven-day period, including overtime, does not exceed 48 hours.'

11 With regard to the length of night work, Article 8 provides:

'Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that:

1. normal hours of work for night workers do not exceed an average of eight hours in any 24-hour period;

2. night workers whose work involves special hazards or heavy physical or mental strain do not work more than eight hours in any period of 24 hours during which they perform night work.

For the purposes of the aforementioned, work involving special hazards or heavy physical or mental strain shall be defined by national legislation and/or practice or by collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry, taking account of the specific effects and hazards of night work.'

12 Article 15 provides:

'This Directive shall not affect Member States' right to apply or introduce laws, regulations or administrative provisions more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers or to facilitate or permit the application of collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry which are more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers.'

13 Article 16 lays down the reference periods to be taken into account for application of the rules mentioned in paragraphs 9 to 12 of this judgment. It states:

'Member States may lay down:

1. for the application of Article 5 (weekly rest period), a reference period not exceeding 14 days;

2. for the application of Article 6 (maximum weekly working time), a reference period not exceeding four months.

The periods of paid annual leave, granted in accordance with Article 7, and the periods of sick leave shall not be included or shall be neutral in the calculation of the average.

3. for the application of Article 8 (length of night work), a reference period defined after consultation of the two sides of industry or by collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry at national or regional level.

If the minimum weekly rest period of 24 hours required by Article 5 falls within that reference period, it shall not be included in the calculation of the average.'

14 Directive 93/104 also provides for a number of derogations from its basic rules, having regard to particular features of certain activities, and imposes certain conditions. Thus, Article 17 provides:

'1. With due regard for the general principles of the protection of the safety and health of workers, Member States may derogate from Article 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 or 16 when, on account of the specific characteristics of the activity concerned, the duration of the working time is not measured and/or predetermined or can be determined by the workers themselves, and particularly in the case of:

(a) managing executives or other persons with autonomous decision-taking powers;

(b) family workers; or

(c) workers officiating at religious ceremonies in churches and religious communities.

2. Derogations may be adopted by means of laws, regulations or administrative provisions or by means of collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry provided that the workers concerned are afforded equivalent periods of compensatory rest or that, in exceptional cases in which it is not possible, for objective reasons, to grant such equivalent periods of compensatory rest, the workers concerned are afforded appropriate protection:

2.1. from Articles 3, 4, 5, 8 and 16:

(a) in the case of activities where the worker's place of work and his place of residence are distant from one another or where the worker's different places of work are distant from one another;

(b) in the case of security and surveillance activities requiring a permanent presence in order to protect property and persons, particularly security guards and caretakers or security firms;

(c) in the case of activities involving the need for continuity of service or production, particularly:

(i) services relating to the reception, treatment and/or care provided by hospitals or similar establishments, residential institutions and prisons;

...

3. Derogations may be made from Articles 3, 4, 5, 8 and 16 by means of collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry at national or regional level or, in conformity with the rules laid down by them, by means of collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry at a lower level.

4. The option to derogate from point 2 of Article 16, provided in paragraph 2, points 2.1. and 2.2. and in paragraph 3 of this article, may not result in the establishment of a reference period exceeding six months.

However, Member States shall have the option, subject to compliance with the general principles relating to the protection of the safety and health of workers, of allowing, for objective or technical reasons or reasons concerning the organisation of work, collective agreements or agreements concluded between the two sides of industry to set reference periods in no event exceeding 12 months.

15 Article 18 of Directive 93/104 provides:

'1. (a)Member States shall adopt the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with this Directive by 23 November 1996, or shall ensure by that date that the two sides of industry establish the necessary measures by agreement, with Member States being obliged to take any necessary steps to enable them to guarantee at all times that the provisions laid down by this Directive are fulfilled.

(b) (i) However, a Member State shall have the option not to apply Article 6, while respecting the general principles of the protection of the safety and health of workers, and provided it takes the necessary measures to ensure that:

— no employer requires a worker to work more than 48 hours over a seven-day period, calculated as an average for the reference period referred to in point 2 of Article 16, unless he has first obtained the worker's agreement to perform such work,

— no worker is subjected to any detriment by his employer because he is not willing to give his agreement to perform such work,

— the employer keeps up-to-date records of all workers who carry out such work,

— the records are placed at the disposal of the competent authorities, which may, for reasons connected with the safety and/or health of workers, prohibit or restrict the possibility of exceeding the maximum weekly working hours,

— the employer provides the competent authorities at their request with information on cases in which agreement has been given by workers to perform work exceeding 48 hours over a period of seven days, calculated as an average for the reference period referred to in point 2 of Article 16.

The national legislation

16 Under the heading 'Working time', Article 6 of Royal Decree No 137/84 of 11 January 1984 (BOE No 27 of 1 February 1984, p. 2627) provides:

'1. The working time of staff forming part of primary care teams shall be 40 hours a week, without prejudice to work which they may be required to undertake as a result of being on call, such staff being obliged to respond to requests for home visits and urgent requests, in accordance with the provisions of the statutory staff regulations applicable to medical and auxiliary health staff employed by the social security authorities and the rules for the implementation thereof ...

2. In rural districts, care shall be provided for specified periods in the morning and afternoon at the health centre, local surgeries and at home, whether on an ordinary basis or by way of emergency.

Shift-work arrangements shall be made between members of teams in order to provide urgent assistance on a rotational basis, the services being centralised at the health centre every day of the week.'

17 By decision of 20 November 1992, published as an annex to the Resolution of 15 January 1993 (BOE No 28 of 2 February 1993, p. 2864), the Council of Ministers approved the agreement concluded on 3 July 1992 between the State health administration and the most representative trade-union organisations in the primary health care sector in Spain. The annex to that decision concerning agreements relating to primary care provides, under the heading 'B. Duty on call':

'... In general, the maximum number of hours of duty on call shall be 425 per year. In the case of primary care teams in rural districts, which are inevitably on call in excess of the limit of 425 hours per year laid down as a general rule, the maximum shall be 850 hours per year, the aim being progressively to reduce the number of hours of duty on call ...'

18 For the Valencia Autonomous Community, an agreement was also concluded on 7 May 1993 between the most representative trade unions and the regional administration in terms similar to those set out in the foregoing paragraph. That agreement provides inter alia as follows:

'... The staff shall be on call for a maximum of 425 hours per year. For primary care teams in rural districts, which are inevitably on call in excess of the 425 hours per year laid down as a general rule, it is agreed, with a view to progressively reducing the number of hours of duty on call, to apply a ceiling of 850 hours per year and to that end to engage additional doctors and specialised health assistants, at the same time complying with the budgetary limit imposed ...'

19 A regulation governing the organisation and operation of the primary care teams in the Valencia Autonomous Community (hereinafter 'the Regulation') was adopted by decision of 20 November 1991 of the Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valenciana. Article 17(3) of the Regulation reproduces Article 6 of Royal Decree No 137/84.

20 By judgment of 15 December 1993, the Administrative Chamber of the Tribunal Superior de Justicia of the Comunidad Valenciana annulled the decision approving the Regulation.

21 On 21 September 1995, Royal Decree No 1561/95 concerning the duration of special work was adopted (BOE No 230 of 26 September 1995, p. 28606). Its scope is limited to ordinary employment relationships governed by private law and it contains no provision concerning the health sector.

The main proceedings and the questions referred to the Court

22 By a collective action brought against the Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valenciana, Simap sought a declaration that all doctors working in primary care teams in the Valencia region enjoy the following rights:

— Article 17(3) of the regulations should be interpreted in the light of Articles 6, 8, 15 and 17 of Directive 93/104;

— their working time should not exceed 40 hours, including overtime, in any period of seven days (over a total of four months) and night work should not exceed eight hours in any period of 24 hours or, if that limit is exceeded, equivalent compensatory rest periods should be granted to them;

— or, in the alternative, their working time should not exceed 48 hours, including overtime, in any period of seven days (over a total of four months) and night work should not exceed eight hours in any period of 24 hours or, if that limit is exceeded, equivalent compensatory rest periods should be granted to them;

— their status as night workers and shift workers should be recognised and, accordingly, the special protection measures provided for in Articles 9 to 13 of Directive 93/104 should be implemented before they are required to undertake such work and periodically thereafter.

23 According to the national court, the action is based on the allegation that under Article 17(3) of the Regulation, which reproduces Article 6 of Royal Decree No 137/84, doctors who work in primary care teams are required to work without the benefit of any time-limit and without the duration of their work being subject to any daily, weekly, monthly or annual limits; moreover, the normal working period is followed by a period of duty on call, followed, in turn, by the normal working period for the next day, and that work pattern is applied in the manner required by the Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valenciana, on the basis of requirements which are determined unilaterally. Simap also contends that 'in fact, a doctor in a primary care team is obliged to work for an uninterrupted period of 31 hours, without night rest, whenever the programme for the week or the month so provides, sometimes at the rate of one day in every two; he must make his own eating arrangements; he must go out on house calls during the night, when there is no public transport, alone and without any security arrangements, travelling as best he can'.

24 The national court states that doctors in primary care teams at Puerto de Sagunto and Burjassot work from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m., to which period is added, every 11 days, a period of duty on call extending from the end of the working day until 8 o'clock the following morning, subject to exceptional unforeseen requirements, such as, in particular, standing in for colleagues who are ill. The weekly working time of the doctors concerned is 40 hours, to which must be added, where appropriate, duty on call, which forms part of the legal working time according to national practice in interpreting their staff regulations and the applicable internal rules.

25 The national court also observes that, in accordance with national practice for doctors whose links with the administration are governed by staff regulations, time on call has a special status, not qualifying as overtime, and is paid on a flat-rate basis, without the actual work performed being taken into consideration.

26 Moreover, where duty on call or stand-by duty is worked under the regime which requires the doctor to be contactable, only actual working hours have to be taken into account in determining the maximum working time. According to the national court, service on call in health establishments is never permitted to be regarded as overtime; overtime constitutes an extension of the normal working hours, with the same workload, whereas duty on call is carried out under conditions different from those under which work within the normal working hours is performed.

27 The national court also states that Directive 93/104 was not correctly transposed into Spanish law. Royal Decree No 1561/95 was the only measure adopted, its scope being limited to ordinary employment relationships governed by private law, and no provision of that decree is concerned with the health sector.

28 It was in those circumstances that the Tribunal Superior de Justicia de la Comunidad Valenciana decided to stay proceedings pending a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice on the following questions:

'1. Questions on the general application of the Directive:

(a) In view of Article 118a of the EC Treaty and the reference in Article 1(3) of the Directive to all sectors of activity, both public and private, within the meaning of Article 2 of Directive 89/391/EEC, which states that it is not applicable "where characteristics peculiar to certain specific public service activities ... inevitably conflict with it", must it be understood that the work of the doctors in the Equipos de Atención Primaria (Primary Health Care Teams) affected by the dispute is covered by the exception referred to?

(b) Article 1(3) of the Directive also refers to Article 17, using the phrase "without prejudice". Despite the fact that, as stated above, no harmonising legislation has been adopted by the State or the Autonomous Regions, must this silence be taken as a derogation from Article 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 or 16 when, on account of the specific characteristics of the activity concerned, the duration of the working time is not measured and/or predetermined?

(c) Does the exemption, in Article 1(3) in fine of the Directive, in respect of "the activities of doctors in training" lead, rather, to the conclusion that the activities of other doctors are in fact covered by the Directive?

(d) Does the reference to the fact that the provisions of Directive 89/391/EEC are "fully" applicable to the matters referred to in paragraph 2 have any particular implications with regard to reliance being placed upon it and its application?

2. Questions on working time

(a) Article 2(1) of the Directive defines working time as "any period during which the worker is working, at the employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties, in accordance with national laws and/or practice". In view of the national practice referred to above at paragraph 8 of this order and in view of the absence of harmonising legislation, must the national practice of excluding from the 40 hours per week the time spent on call continue to be applied, or must the general and specific provisions of Spanish legislation on working time relating to private law employment relationships be applied by analogy?

(b) Where the doctors concerned are on call without having to be present at the Centre, must the whole of that time be regarded as working time or only such time as is actually spent in carrying out the activity for which they are called out, as is the national practice referred to at paragraph 8 of the facts (in the order for reference)?

(c) Where the doctors concerned are on call at the Centre, must the whole of that time be regarded as ordinary working time or unsocial hours, according to the national practice referred to at paragraph 8 of the facts?

3. Average working time

(a) Must the working time spent on call be included when determining the average working time for each seven-day period, pursuant to Article 6(2) of the Directive?

(b) Must the time spent on call be regarded as overtime?

(c) Despite the absence of harmonising legislation, can the reference period mentioned in Article 16(2) of the Directive be understood to be applicable, including, if so, the derogations therefrom laid down in Article 17(2) and (3) in conjunction with paragraph (4)?

(d) If, as a result of the option provided for in Article 18(1)(b), Article 6 of the Directive is not applied, and despite the absence of harmonising legislation, may Article 6 be considered inapplicable on the ground that the worker's agreement to perform such work has been obtained? Is the agreement of the two sides of industry as expressed in a collective agreement or agreement between them tantamount to the worker's agreement in this respect?

4. Night work

(a) In view of the fact that normal working time is not at night, since only part of the time to be spent periodically on call by some of the doctors concerned is at night, and in the absence of harmonising legislation, are those doctors to be regarded as night workers pursuant to Article 2(4)(b) of the Directive?

(b) For the purposes of the option provided for in Article 2(4)(b)(i) of the Directive, could national legislation on night work by workers subject to private law be applied to the doctors concerned whose employment relationship is governed by public law?

(c) Do the "normal" hours of work referred to in Article 8(1) of the Directive also include time on call, whether or not their physical presence is required?

5. Shift work and shift workers

In view of the fact that the working time at issue is shift work only in relation to time on call, and in the absence of harmonising legislation, can the work of the doctors concerned be regarded as shift work and must they be regarded as shift workers in accordance with the definition contained in Article 2(5) and (6) of the Directive?'

The questions referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling

The scope of Directive 93/104 (Questions 1(a), (c) and (d))

29 By Questions 1(a), (c) and (d) the national court seeks essentially to ascertain whether the activity of doctors in primary health care teams comes within the scope of the basic Directive and Directive 93/104.

30 Article 1(3) of Directive 93/104 defines its scope first by referring expressly to Article 2 of the basic Directive and, second, by providing for a number of exceptions in relation to certain specified activities.

31 Accordingly, in order to determine whether an activity such as that of doctors in primary care teams falls within the scope of Directive 93/104, it is necessary first to consider whether that activity comes within the scope of the basic Directive.

32 By virtue of Article 2(1) thereof, the basic Directive applies to all sectors of activity, both public and private, including industrial, agricultural, commercial, administrative, service, educational, cultural and leisure activities. However, by virtue of Article 2(2), the basic Directive is not to apply where characteristics peculiar to certain specific public service activities, such as the armed forces or the police, or to certain specific activities in the civil protection services inevitably conflict with it.

33 Since doctors in primary care teams perform their activities in a context which links them to the public sector, it is necessary to consider whether such activities come within the scope of the exclusion mentioned in the foregoing paragraph.

34 It is important to note, first, that it is clear both from the object of the basic Directive, namely to encourage improvement in the safety and health of workers at work, and from the wording of Article 2(1) thereof, that it must necessarily be broad in scope.

35 It follows that the exceptions to the scope of the basic Directive, including that provided for in Article 2(2), must be interpreted restrictively.

36 In addition, Article 2(2) of the basic Directive refers to certain specific public service activities intended to uphold public order and security, which are essential for the proper functioning of society.

37 It is clear that, under normal circumstances, the activity of primary care teams cannot be assimilated to such activities.

38 The activity of primary care teams falls therefore within the scope of the basic Directive.

39 Accordingly, it is necessary to consider whether such an activity comes within the scope of any of the exceptions provided for in Article 1(3) of Directive 93/104.

40 It does not. According to that provision, only the activities of doctors in training come within the exceptions to the scope of that directive.

41 Accordingly, the answer to Questions 1(a), (c) and (d) is that an activity such as that of doctors in primary health care teams falls within the scope of the basic Directive and of Directive 93/104.

The application of Article 17 of Directive 93/104 (Question 1(b))

42 The essential aim of Question 1(b) is to ascertain whether the national court may, in the absence of express measures transposing Directive 93/104, apply its domestic law to the extent to which, having regard to the features of the activity of doctors in primary care teams, such activity falls within the derogations mentioned in Article 17 of that directive.

43 Article 17 of Directive 93/104 permits derogations from Articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 and 16 by means of laws, regulations or administrative provisions or by means of collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry, provided that certain conditions are met. In the case of derogations provided for in Article 17(1), only laws, regulations or administrative provisions are permitted.

44 It follows that, provided that, even in the absence of express measures transposing Directive 93/104, the national law applicable to a given activity observes the conditions laid down in Article 17 thereof, that law conforms to the directive and there is nothing to prevent national courts from applying it.

45 Consequently, the answer to Question 1(b) is that the national court may, in the absence of express measures transposing Directive 93/104, apply its domestic law to the extent to which, having regard to the characteristics of the activity of doctors in primary health care teams, that law meets the conditions laid down in Article 17 of that directive.

The concept of working time (Questions 2(a) to 2(c), 3(a), 3(b) and 4(c))

46 By Questions 2(a) to 2(c), 3(a), 3(b) and 4(c), which it is appropriate to consider together, the national court seeks essentially to determine whether time spent on call by doctors in primary care teams, whether they are required to be present in the health centre or merely contactable, must be regarded as working time or as overtime within the meaning of Directive 93/104.

47 It must be borne in mind that that directive defines working time as any period during which the worker is working, at the employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties, in accordance with national laws and/or practice. Moreover, in the scheme of the directive, it is placed in opposition to rest periods, the two being mutually exclusive.

48 In the main proceedings, the characteristic features of working time are present in the case of time spent on call by doctors in primary care teams where their presence at the health centre is required. It is not disputed that during periods of duty on call under those rules, the first two conditions are fulfilled. Moreover, even if the activity actually performed varies according to the circumstances, the fact that such doctors are obliged to be present and available at the workplace with a view to providing their professional services means that they are carrying out their duties in that instance.

49 That interpretation is also in conformity with the objective of Directive 93/104, which is to ensure the safety and health of workers by granting them minimum periods of rest and adequate breaks (eighth recital in the preamble to the directive). It is clear, as the Advocate General emphasises in point 35 of his Opinion, that to exclude duty on call from working time if physical presence is required would seriously undermine that objective.

50 As the Advocate General also states in point 37 of his Opinion, the situation is different where doctors in primary care teams are on call by being contactable at all times without having to be at the health centre. Even if they are at the disposal of their employer, in that it must be possible to contact them, in that situation doctors may manage their time with fewer constraints and pursue their own interests. In those circumstances, only time linked to the actual provision of primary care services must be regarded as working time within the meaning of Directive 93/104.

51 As regards the question whether time spent on call may be regarded as overtime, although Directive 93/104 does not define overtime, which is mentioned only in Article 6, relating to the maximum length of the working week, the fact remains that overtime falls within the concept of working time for the purposes of the directive, which draws no distinction according to whether or not such time is spent within normal hours of work.

52 The answer to Questions 2(a) to 2(c), 3(a), 3(b) and 4(c) is therefore that time spent on call by doctors in primary health care teams must be regarded in its entirety as working time, and where appropriate as overtime, within the meaning of Directive 93/104 if they are required to be present at the health centre. If they must merely be contactable at all times when on call, only time linked to the actual provision of primary care services must be regarded as working time.

Whether the work is night work (Questions 4(a) and 4(b))

53 By Questions 4(a) and 4(b) the national court seeks essentially to ascertain whether certain doctors who are regularly on call at night are to be regarded as night workers within the meaning of Article 2(4)(b) of Directive 93/104 and whether, for the purposes of the choice left to the Member State by that provision, the national legislation applicable to employment relationships governed by private law may be applied to doctors whose employment is governed by public law.

54 It appears from the order for reference that doctors in primary care teams at Puerto de Sagunto and Burjassot provide their services from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m., to which period is added, every 11 days, duty on call extending from the end of the working day until 8 o'clock the following morning, subject to exceptional unforeseen requirements such as, in particular, the need to replace colleagues who are ill. The working time of other primary care teams in the Valencia Region is not indicated in the file, but the national court starts from the premiss that in those cases duty on call occurs only periodically.

55 It must be borne in mind that Article 2(4)(a) of Directive 93/104 defines a night worker as 'any worker who, during night time, works at least three hours of his daily working time as a normal course'. Article 2(4)(b) also permits the national legislature or, at the option of the Member State concerned, the two sides of industry at national or regional level to treat as night workers other workers who work during night time a certain proportion of their annual working time.

56 Since no measure has been adopted by the Kingdom of Spain under Article 2(4)(b) of the directive regarding workers whose employment is governed by public law, doctors in primary care teams who are regularly on call at night may not be regarded as night workers by virtue of that provision alone.

57 Whether national legislation on night work by workers whose employment is governed by private law may be applied to doctors in primary care teams whose employment is governed by public law, for the purposes of the choice referred to in Article 2(4)(b)(i) of the said directive, is a question which the national court must resolve in accordance with domestic law.

58 The answer to Questions 4(a) and 4(b) is therefore that doctors in primary health care teams who are regularly on call at night may not be regarded as night workers by virtue of Article 2(4)(b) of the directive alone. Whether national legislation on night work by workers whose employment is governed by private law may be applied to doctors in primary health care teams, whose employment is governed by public law, is a question to be resolved by the national court in accordance with its domestic law.

Shift work and shift workers (Question 5)

59 By Question 5, the national court seeks essentially to ascertain whether the work performed by doctors in primary care teams whilst on call constitutes shift work and whether such doctors are shift workers within the meaning of Directive 93/104.

60 Doctors in primary care teams in Puerto de Sagunto and Burjassot provide their services from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m., to which period is added, every 11 days, a period of duty on call extending from the end of the working day until 8 o'clock the next morning, subject to unforeseen exceptional requirements; as regards the working time of other primary care teams in the Valencia Region, the national court starts from the premiss that such duty occurs only periodically.

61 Working time spent both on call where doctors in primary care teams are required to be present at health centres and on the actual provision of primary care services when doctors are on call by having merely to be contactable at all times fulfils all the requirements of the definition of shift work in Article 2(5).

62 The work of doctors in primary care teams is organised in such a way that workers are assigned successively to the same work posts on a rotational basis, which makes it necessary for them to perform work at different hours over a given period of days or weeks.

63 As regards the latter condition in particular, it must be noted that, notwithstanding the fact that duty on call is performed at regular intervals, the doctors concerned are called upon to perform their work at different times over a given period of days or weeks.

64 The answer to the fifth question is therefore that work performed by doctors in primary health care teams whilst on call constitutes shift work and that such doctors are shift workers within the meaning of Article 2(5) and (6) of Directive 93/104.

The applicability of the derogations provided for in Article 17(2), (3) and (4) of Directive 93/104 (Question 3(c))

65 By Question 3(c), the national court seeks essentially to ascertain whether, in the absence of national provisions transposing Article 16(2) of Directive 93/104 or, as the case may be, expressly adopting one of the derogations provided for in Article 17(2), (3) and (4) thereof, those provisions can be interpreted as having direct effect.

66 Article 16(2) of that directive allows the Member States to lay down, for the application of Article 6, which is concerned with maximum weekly working time, a reference period not exceeding four months.

67 However, Article 17(2), point 2.1(c)(i), of Directive 93/104 provides that the Member States may derogate from Article 16(2) thereof in the case of activities involving the need for continuity of service or production, particularly services relating to the reception, treatment and/or care provided by hospitals or similar establishments.

68 Even if those provisions of Directive 93/104 leave the Member States a degree of latitude regarding the reference period to be fixed for the purposes of applying Article 6 of that directive, that does not alter the precise and unconditional nature of the provisions of the directive at issue in the main proceedings. The latitude allowed does not make it impossible to determine minimum rights (see, to that effect, Case C-91/92 Faccini Dori v Recreb [1994] ECR I-3325, paragraph 17).

69 It is clear from the terms of Article 17(4) of that directive that the reference period may in no circumstances exceed 12 months. It is therefore possible to determine the minimum protection which must be provided in any event.

70 Consequently, the answer to Question 3(c) is that in the absence of national provisions transposing Article 16(2) of Directive 93/104 or, as the case may be, expressly adopting one of the derogations provided for in Article 17(2), (3) and (4) thereof, those provisions may be interpreted as having direct effect, and therefore they confer on individuals a right whereby the reference period for the implementation of the maximum duration of their weekly working time must not exceed 12 months.

The applicability of Article 18(1)(b) of Directive 93/104 (Question 3(d))

71 By Question 3(d) the national court seeks essentially to ascertain whether consent given by the trade-union representatives in the context of a collective or other agreement is equivalent to that given by a worker himself, as provided for in the first indent of Article 18(1)(b)(i) of Directive 93/104.

72 That provision allows the Member States not to apply Article 6 of that directive, relating to maximum weekly working time, whilst ensuring that the general principles relating to the protection of the safety and health of workers are observed, provided that the working time does not exceed 48 hours over a seven-day period, calculated as an average for the reference period referred to in point 2 of Article 16. A worker may, however, agree to work for a longer period.

73 It is clear from its wording that the first indent of Article 18(1)(b)(i) requires the consent of the individual worker. Moreover, as has been rightly pointed out by the United Kingdom Government, if the intention of the Community legislature had been to allow the worker's consent to be replaced by that of a trade union in the context of a collective or other agreement, Article 6 of that directive would have been included in the list in Article 17(3) of the directive of those from which derogations may be made by a collective agreement or agreement between the two sides of industry.

74 Consequently, the answer to Question 3(d) is that the consent given by trade-union representatives in the context of a collective or other agreement is not equivalent to that given by the worker himself, as provided for in the first indent of Article 18(1)(b)(i) of Directive 93/104.

Costs

75 The costs incurred by the Spanish, Finnish and United Kingdom Governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Tribunal Superior de Justicia de la Comunidad Valenciana by order of 10 July 1998, hereby rules:

1. An activity such as that of doctors in primary health care teams falls within the scope of Council Directive 89/391/EEC of 12 June 1989 on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health of workers at work and Council Directive 93/104/EEC of 23 November 1993 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time.

2. The national court may, in the absence of express measures transposing Directive 93/104, apply its domestic law to the extent to which, having regard to the characteristics of the activity of doctors in primary health care teams, that law meets the conditions laid down in Article 17 of that directive.

3. Time spent on call by doctors in primary health care teams must be regarded in its entirety as working time, and where appropriate as overtime, within the meaning of Directive 93/104 if they are required to be at the health centre. If they must merely be contactable at all times when on call, only time linked to the actual provision of primary health care services must be regarded as working time.

4. Doctors in primary health care teams who are regularly on call at night may not be regarded as night workers by virtue of Article 2(4)(b) of Directive 93/104 alone. Whether national legislation on night work by workers whose employment is governed by private law may be applied to doctors in primary health care teams, whose employment is governed by public law, is a question to be resolved by the national court in accordance with its domestic law.

5. Work performed by doctors in primary health care teams whilst on call constitutes shift work and such doctors are shift workers within the meaning of Article 2(5) and (6) of Directive 93/104.

6. In the absence of national provisions transposing Article 16(2) of Directive 93/104 or, as the case may be, expressly adopting one of the derogations provided for in Article 17(2), (3) and (4) thereof, those provisions may be interpreted as having direct effect, and therefore they confer on individuals a right whereby the reference period for the implementation of the maximum duration of their weekly working time must not exceed 12 months.

7. The consent given by trade-union representatives in the context of a collective or other agreement is not equivalent to that given by the worker himself, as provided for in the first indent of Article 18(1)(b)(i) of Directive 93/104.

JUDGMENT

(The account of the facts and issues which is contained in the complete text of the judgment is not reproduced)

Decision

1 By an order of 5 June 1984, which was received at the Court on 2 July 1984, the Bundesarbeitsgericht referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty three questions on the interpretation of Article 119 of that Treaty.

2 Those questions arose in the course of proceedings between Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH and its former employee Karin Weber von Hartz concerning the payment to Mrs Weber von Hartz of a retirement pension from a supplementary pension scheme established by Bilka for its employees.

3 It appears from the documents before the Court that for several years Bilka, which belongs to a group of department stores in the Federal Republic of Germany employing several thousand persons, has had a supplementary (occupational) pension scheme for its employees. This scheme, which has been modified on several occasions, is regarded as an integral part of the contracts of employment between Bilka and its employees.

4 According to the version in force since 26 October 1973, part-time employees may obtain pensions under the scheme only if they have worked full time for at least 15 years over a total period of 20 years.

5 Mrs Weber was employed by Bilka as a sales assistant from 1961 to 1976. After initially working full time, she chose to work part time from 1 October 1972 until her employment came to an end. Since she had not worked full time for the minimum period of 15 years, Bilka refused to pay her an occupational pension under its scheme.

6 Mrs Weber brought proceedings before the German labour courts challenging the legality of Bilka's refusal to pay her a pension. She argued inter alia that the occupational pension scheme was contrary to the principle of equal pay for men and women laid down in Article 119 of the EEC Treaty. She asserted that the requirement of a minimum period of full-time employment for the payment of an occupational pension placed women workers at a disadvantage, since they were more likely than their male colleagues to take part-time work so as to be able to care for their family and children.

7 Bilka, on the other hand, argued that it was not guilty of any breach of the principle of equal pay since there were objectively justified economic grounds for its decision to exclude part-time employees from the occupational pension scheme. It emphasized in that regard that in comparison with the employment of part-time workers the employment of full-time workers entails lower ancillary costs and permits the use of staff throughout opening hours. Relying on statistics concerning the group to which it belongs, Bilka stated that up to 1980 81.3% of all occupational pensions were paid to women, although only 72% of employees were women. Those figures, it said, showed that the scheme in question does not entail discrimination on the basis of sex.

8 On appeal the proceedings between Mrs Weber and Bilka came before the Bundesarbeitsgericht; that court decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court:

(1) May there be an infringement of Article 119 of the EEC Treaty in the form of 'indirect discrimination' where a department store which employs predominantly women excludes part-time employees from benefits under its occupational pension scheme although such exclusion affects disproportionately more women than men?

(2) If so:

(a) Can the undertaking justify that disadvantage on the ground that its objective is to employ as few part-time workers as possible even though in the department store sector there are no reasons of commercial expediency which necessitate such a staff policy?

(b) Is the undertaking under a duty to structure its pension scheme in such a way that appropriate account is taken of the special difficulties experienced by employees with family commitments in fulfilling the requirements for an occupational pension?

9 In accordance with Article 20 of the Protocol on the Statute of the Court of Justice of the EEC written observations were submitted by Bilka, Mrs Weber von Hartz, the United Kingdom and the Commission of the European Communities.

The applicability of Article 119

10 The United Kingdom puts forward the preliminary argument that the conditions placed by an employer on the admission of its employees to an occupational pension scheme such as that described by the national court do not fall within the scope of Article 119 of the Treaty.

11 In support of that argument it refers to the judgment of 15 June 1978 (Case 149/77 Defrenne v Sabena [1978] ECR 1365), in which the Court held that Article 119 concerns only pay discrimination between men and women workers and its scope cannot be extended to other elements of the employment relationship, even where such elements may have financial consequences for the persons concerned.

12 The United Kingdom cites further the judgment of 16 February 1982 (Case 19/81 Burton v British Railways Board [1982] ECR 555) where the Court held that alleged discrimination resulting from a difference in the ages of eligibility set for men and women for payment under a voluntary redundancy scheme was covered not by Article 119 but by Council Directive 76/207 of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions (Official Journal 1976, L 39, p. 40).

13 At the hearing the United Kingdom also referred to the proposal for a Council directive on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in occupational social security schemes submitted by the Commission on 5 May 1983 (Official Journal 1983, C 134, p. 7). According to the United Kingdom, the fact that the Commission considered it necessary to submit such a proposal shows that occupational pension schemes such as that described by the national court are covered not by Article 119 but by Articles 117 and 118, so that the application of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in that area requires the adoption of special provisions by the Community institutions.

14 The Commission, on the other hand, has argued that the occupational pension scheme described by the national court falls within the concept of pay for the purposes of the second paragraph of Article 119. In support of its view it refers to the judgment of 11 March 1981 (Case 69/80 Worringham and Humphreys v Lloyds Bank [1981] ECR 767).

15 In order to resolve the problem of interpretation raised by the United Kingdom it must be recalled that under the first paragraph of Article 119 the Member States must ensure the application of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work. The second paragraph of Article 119 defines 'pay' as 'the ordinary basic or minimum wage or salary and any other consideration, whether in cash or in kind, which the worker receives, directly or indirectly, in respect of his employment from his employer'.

16 In its judgment of 25 May 1971 (Case 80/70 Defrenne v Belgium [1971] ECR 445), the Court examined the question whether a retirement pension paid under a statutory social security scheme constitutes consideration received by the worker indirectly from the employer in respect of his employment, within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 119.

17 The Court replied in the negative, taking the view that, although pay within the meaning of Article 119 could in principle include social security benefits, it did not include social security schemes or benefits, in particular retirement pensions, directly governed by legislation which do not involve any element of agreement within the undertaking or trade concerned and are compulsory for general categories of workers.

18 In that regard the Court pointed out that social security schemes guarantee workers the benefit of a statutory scheme to which workers, employers and in some cases the authorities contribute financially to an extent determined less by the employment relationship between the employer and the worker than by considerations of social policy, so that the employer's contribution cannot be regarded as a direct or indirect payment to the worker for the purposes of the second paragraph of Article 119.

19 The question therefore arises whether the conclusion reached by the Court in that judgment is also applicable to the case before the national court.

20 It should be noted that according to the documents before the Court the occupational pension scheme at issue in the main proceedings, although adopted in accordance with the provisions laid down by German legislation for such schemes, is based on an agreement between Bilka and the staff committee representing its employees and has the effect of supplementing the social benefits paid under national legislation of general application with benefits financed entirely by the employer.

21 The contractual rather than statutory nature of the scheme in question is confirmed by the fact that, as has been pointed out above, the scheme and the rules governing it are regarded as an integral part of the contracts of employment between Bilka and its employees.

22 It must therefore be concluded that the scheme does not constitute a social security scheme governed directly by statute and thus outside the scope of Article 119. Benefits paid to employees under the scheme therefore constitute consideration received by the worker from the employer in respect of his employment, as referred to in the second paragraph of Article 119.

23 The case before the national court therefore falls within the scope of Article 119.

The first question

24 In the first of its questions the national court asks whether a staff policy pursued by a department store company excluding part-time employees from an occupational pension scheme constitutes discrimination contrary to Article 119 where that exclusion affects a far greater number of women than men.

25 In order to reply to that question reference must be made to the judgment of 31 March 1981 (Case 96/80 Jenkins v Kingsgate [1981] ECR 911).

26 In that judgment the Court considered the question whether the payment of a lower hourly rate for part-time work than for full-time work was compatible with Article 119.

27 Such a practice is comparable to that at issue before the national court in this case: Bilka does not pay different hourly rates to part-time and full-time workers, but it grants only full-time workers an occupational pension. Since, as was stated above, such a pension falls within the concept of pay for the purposes of the second paragraph of Article 119 it follows that, hour for hour, the total remuneration paid by Bilka to full-time workers is higher than that paid to part-time workers.

28 The conclusion reached by the Court in its judgment of 31 March 1981 is therefore equally valid in the context of this case.

29 If, therefore, it should be found that a much lower proportion of women than of men work full time, the exclusion of part-time workers from the occupational pension scheme would be contrary to Article 119 of the Treaty where, taking into account the difficulties encountered by women workers in working full-time, that measure could not be explained by factors which exclude any discrimination on grounds of sex.

30 However, if the undertaking is able to show that its pay practice may be explained by objectively justified factors unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex there is no breach of Article 119.

31 The answer to the first question referred by the national court must therefore be that Article 119 of the EEC Treaty is infringed by a department store company which excludes part-time employees from its occupational pension scheme, where that exclusion affects a far greater number of women than men, unless the undertaking shows that the exclusion is based on objectively justified factors unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex.

Question 2 (a)

32 In its second question the national court seeks in essence to know whether the reasons put forward by Bilka to explain its pay policy may be regarded as 'objectively justified economic grounds', as referred to in the judgment of 31 March 1981, where the interests of undertakings in the department store sector do not require such a policy.

33 In its observations Bilka argues that the exclusion of part-time workers from the occupational pension scheme is intended solely to discourage part-time work, since in general part-time workers refuse to work in the late afternoon and on Saturdays. In order to ensure the presence of an adequate workforce during those periods it was therefore necessary to make full-time work more attractive than part-time work, by making the occupational pension scheme open only to full-time workers. Bilka concludes that on the basis of the judgment of 31 March 1981 it cannot be accused of having infringed Article 119.

34 In reply to the reasons put forward to justify the exclusion of part-time workers Mrs Weber von Hartz points out that Bilka is in no way obliged to employ part-time workers and that if it decides to do so it may not subsequently restrict the pension rights of such workers, which are already reduced by reason of the fact that they work fewer hours.

35 According to the Commission, in order to establish that there has been no breach of Article 119 it is not sufficient to show that in adopting a pay practice which in fact discriminates against women workers the employer sought to achieve objectives other than discrimination against women. The Commission considers that in order to justify such a pay practice from the point of view of Article 119 the employer must, as the Court held in its judgment of 31 March 1981, put forward objective economic grounds relating to the management of the undertaking. It is also necessary to ascertain whether the pay practice in question is necessary and in proportion to the objectives pursued by the employer.

36 It is for the national court, which has sole jurisdiction to make findings of fact, to determine whether and to what extent the grounds put forward by an employer to explain the adoption of a pay practice which applies independently of a worker's sex but in fact affects more women than men may be regarded as objectively justified economic grounds. If the national court finds that the measures chosen by Bilka correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate with a view to achieving the objectives pursued and are necessary to that end, the fact that the measures affect a far greater number of women than men is not sufficient to show that they constitute an infringement of Article 119.

37 The answer to question 2 (a) must therefore be that under Article 119 a department store company may justify the adoption of a pay policy excluding part-time workers, irrespective of their sex, from its occupational pension scheme on the ground that it seeks to employ as few part-time workers as possible, where it is found that the means chosen for achieving that objective correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate with a view to achieving the objective in question and are necessary to that end.

Question 2 (b)

38 Finally, in Question 2 (b), the national court asks whether an employer is obliged under Article 119 of the Treaty to organize its occupational pension scheme in such a manner as to take into account the fact that family responsibilities prevent women workers from fulfilling the requirements for such a pension.

39 In her observations Mrs Weber von Hartz argues that the answer to that question should be in the affirmative. She argues that the disadvantages suffered by women because of the exclusion of part-time workers from the occupational pension scheme must at least be mitigated by requiring the employer to regard periods during which women workers have had to meet family responsibilities as periods of full-time work.

40 According to the Commission, on the other hand, the principle laid down in Article 119 does not require employers, in establishing occupational pension schemes, to take into account their employees' family responsibilities. In the Commission's view, that objective must be pursued by means of measures adopted under Article 117. It refers in that regard to its proposal for a Council directive on voluntary part-time work submitted on 4 January 1982 (Official Journal 1982, C 62, p. 7) and amended on 5 January 1983 (Official Journal 1983, C 18, p. 5), which has not yet been adopted.

41 It must be pointed out that, as was stated in the judgment of 15 June 1978, the scope of Article 119 is restricted to the question of pay discrimination between men and women workers. Problems related to other conditions of work and employment, on the other hand, are covered generally by other provisions of Community law, in particular Articles 117 and 118 of the Treaty, with a view to the harmonization of the social systems of Member States and the approximation of their legislation in that area.

42 The imposition of an obligation such as that envisaged by the national court in its question goes beyond the scope of Article 119 and has no other basis in Community law as it now stands.

43 The answer to Question 2 (b) must therefore be that Article 119 does not have the effect of requiring an employer to organize its occupational pension scheme in such a manner as to take into account the particular difficulties faced by persons with family responsibilities in meeting the conditions for entitlement to such a pension.

Costs

44 The costs incurred by the United Kingdom and the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. As these proceedings are, in so far as the parties to the main proceedings are concerned, in the nature of a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions submitted to it by the Bundesarbeitsgericht by order of 5 June 1984, hereby rules:

(1) Article 119 of the EEC Treaty is infringed by a department store company which excludes part-time employees from its occupational pension scheme, where that exclusion affects a far greater number of women than men, unless the undertaking shows that the exclusion is based on objectively justified factors unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex.

(2) Under Article 119 a department store company may justify the adoption of a pay policy excluding part-time workers, irrespective of their sex, from its occupational pension scheme on the ground that it seeks to employ as few part-time workers as possible, where it is found that the means chosen for achieving that objective correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate with a view to achieving the objective in question and are necessary to that end.

(3) Article 119 does not have the effect of requiring an employer to organize its occupational pension scheme in such a manner as to take into account the particular difficulties faced by persons with family responsibilities in meeting the conditions for entitlement to such a pension.

Judgment

1 By judgment of 24 June 1988, which was received at the Court on 30 June 1988, the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty four questions on the interpretation of Articles 2 and 3 of Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions (Official Journal 1976 L 39, p. 40; hereinafter referred to as 'the Directive').

2 Those questions arose in the context of a dispute between Mrs Dekker and the Stichting Vormingscentrum voor Jong Volwassenen (VJV-Centrum) Plus (hereinafter: 'the VJV'). In June 1981 Mrs Dekker applied for the post of instructor at the training centre for young adults run by the VJV. On 15 June 1981 she informed the committee dealing with the applications that she was three months' pregnant. The committee none the less put her name forward to the board of management of the VJV as the most suitable candidate for the job. By letter of 10 July 1981, however, the VJV informed Mrs Dekker that she would not be appointed.

3 In the letter the VJV explained that the reason for the decision was that Mrs Dekker was already pregnant at the time of lodging her application and that, according to the information it had obtained, the consequence would be that, if the VJV were to employ her, its insurer, the Risicofonds Sociale Voorzieningen Bijzonder Onderwijs (Assurance Fund for the provision of social benefits in special education; hereinafter referred to as 'the Risicofonds') would not reimburse the daily benefits that the VJV would be obliged to pay her during her maternity leave. As a result, the VJV would be financially unable to employ a replacement during Mrs Dekker's absence and would thus be short-staffed.

4 It is apparent from the documents before the Court that under Article 6 of the Ziekengeldreglement (the internal rules of the Risicofonds governing daily sickness benefits) the board of management of the Risicofonds is empowered to refuse to reimburse to a member (the employer) all or part of the daily benefits in the event that an insured person (the employee) becomes unable to perform his or her duties within six months of commencement of the insurance if, at the time when that insurance took effect, it was to be anticipated from the state of health of the person concerned that such incapacity would supervene within that period. Unlike Article 44(1)(b) of the Ziektewet (the Netherlands Law on sickness insurance), which lays down the insurance scheme generally applicable to private-sector employees, the Ziekengeldreglement, which alone applies to Mrs Dekker, contains no derogation for pregnancy from the rule permitting reimbursement of the daily benefits to be refused in cases of 'foreseeable sickness'.

5 The Arrondissementsrechtbank (District Court) Haarlem and the Gerechtshof (Regional Court of Appeal), in turn, dismissed Mrs Dekker's applications for an order requiring the VJV to pay her damages for her financial loss, whereupon she appealed to the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden (Supreme Court of the Netherlands).

6 Taking the view that the appeal raised problems as to the interpretation of Council Directive 76/207, the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden decided to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Is an employer directly or indirectly in breach of the principle of equal treatment laid down in Articles 2(1) and 3(1) of the Directive (Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions) if he refuses to enter into a contract of employment with a candidate, found by him to be suitable, because of the adverse consequences for him which are to be anticipated owing to the fact that the candidate was pregnant when she applied for the post, in conjunction with rules concerning unfitness for work laid down by a public authority under which inability to work in connection with pregnancy and confinement is assimilated to inability to work on account of sickness?

(2) Does it make any difference that there were no male candidates?

(3) Is it compatible with Articles 2 and 3 that:

(a) if a breach of the principle that the rejected candidate must be accorded equal treatment is established, fault on the part of the employer is also required before a claim based on that breach such as the present can be upheld;

(b) if such a breach is established, the employer for his part can still plead justification, even if none of the cases provided for in Article 2(2) to (4) applies?

(4) If fault as referred to in Question 3 above may be required or grounds of justification may be pleaded, is it then sufficient, in order for there to be absence of fault or for a ground of justification to exist, that the employer runs the risk referred to in the summary of the facts, or must Articles 2 and 3 be interpreted as meaning that he must bear those risks, unless he has satisfied himself beyond all doubt that the benefit on account of unfitness for work will be refused or that posts will be lost, and he has done everything possible to prevent that from happening?'

7 Reference is made to the Report for the Hearing for a fuller account of the facts of the case, the course of the procedure and the written observations submitted to the Court, which are mentioned or discussed hereinafter only in so far as is necessary for the reasoning of the Court.

First question

8 It should be noted at the outset that the purpose of the Directive, according to Article 1(1), is to put into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions.

9 Article 2(1) of the Directive provides that '... the principle of equal treatment shall mean that there shall be no discrimination whatsoever on grounds of sex either directly or indirectly by reference in particular to marital or family status'. Under Article 3(1) 'application of the principle of equal treatment means that there shall be no discrimination whatsoever on grounds of sex in the conditions, including selection criteria, for access to all jobs or posts ... '.

10 Consideration must be given to the question whether a refusal of employment in the circumstances to which the national court has referred may be regarded as direct discrimination on grounds of sex for the purposes of the Directive. The answer depends on whether the fundamental reason for the refusal of employment is one which applies without distinction to workers of either sex or, conversely, whether it applies exclusively to one sex.

11 The reason given by the employer for refusing to appoint Mrs Dekker is basically that it could not have obtained reimbursement from the Risicofonds of the daily benefits which it would have had to pay her for the duration of her absence due to pregnancy, and yet at the same time it would have been obliged to employ a replacement. That situation arises because, on the one hand, the national scheme in question assimilates pregnancy to sickness and, on the other, the Ziekengeldreglement contains no provision excluding pregnancy from the cases in which the Risicofonds is entitled to refuse reimbursement of the daily benefits.

12 In that regard it should be observed that only women can be refused employment on grounds of pregnancy and such a refusal therefore constitutes direct discrimination on grounds of sex. A refusal of employment on account of the financial consequences of absence due to pregnancy must be regarded as based, essentially, on the fact of pregnancy. Such discrimination cannot be justified on grounds relating to the financial loss which an employer who appointed a pregnant woman would suffer for the duration of her maternity leave.

13 In any event, the fact that pregnancy is assimilated to sickness and that the respective provisions of the Ziektewet and the Ziekengeldreglement governing reimbursement of the daily benefits payable in connection with pregnancy are not the same cannot be regarded as evidence of discrimination on grounds of sex within the meaning of the Directive. Lastly, in so far as as an employer's refusal of employment based on the financial consequences of absence due to pregnancy constitutes direct discrimination, it is not necessary to consider whether national provisions such as those mentioned above exert such pressure on the employer that they prompt him to refuse to appoint a pregnant woman, thereby leading to discrimination within the meaning of the Directive.

14 It follows from the foregoing that the answer to be given to the first question is that an employer is in direct contravention of the principle of equal treatment embodied in Articles 2(1) and 3(1) of Council Directive 76/207 of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions if he refuses to enter into a contract of employment with a female candidate whom he considers to be suitable for the job where such refusal is based on the possible adverse consequences for him of employing a pregnant woman, owing to rules on unfitness for work adopted by the public authorities which assimilate inability to work on account of pregnancy and confinement to inability to work on account of illness.

Second question

15 In its second question the Hoge Raad asks whether the fact that there was no male candidate for the job is liable to alter the answer to the first question.

16 The VJV contends that the second question must be answered in the affirmative, because what is involved is not the discriminatory effect of an abstract measure but a concrete decision by an employer not to engage a specific candidate. When an employer chooses from among exclusively female candidates, his choice cannot be attributable to discrimination on grounds of sex, because in such a case the employer is guided by other considerations of a financial or administrative nature.

17 It should be stressed that the reply to the question whether the refusal to employ a woman constitutes direct or indirect discrimination depends on the reason for that refusal. If that reason is to be found in the fact that the person concerned is pregnant, then the decision is directly linked to the sex of the candidate. In those circumstances the absence of male candidates cannot affect the answer to the first question.

18 The answer to be given to the second question must therefore be that the fact that no man applied for the job does not alter the answer to the first question.

Third question

19 The third question relates to whether it is contrary to Articles 2 and 3 of the Directive for a legal action in damages based on breach of the principle of equal treatment to be capable of succeeding only if it is also proved that the employer is at fault and cannot avail himself of any ground exempting him from liability.

20 Mrs Dekker, the Netherlands Government and the United Kingdom all take the view that, once an infringement of the principle of equal treatment is established, that infringement must be sufficient to make the employer liable.

21 For its part, the VJV notes that the distinction drawn in the two limbs of the third question between fault attributable to the employer and the possible absence of any ground exempting him from liability is partly linked to the national law applicable to the main proceedings, which provides different legal consequences, according to the case. The VJV claims that the Directive allows an answer to be given only to the question whether an infringement of the principle of equal treatment may be justified in any given case.

22 It must be observed in this regard that Article 2(2), (3) and (4) of the Directive provide for exceptions to the principle of equal treatment set out in Article 2(1), but that the Directive does not make liability on the part of the person guilty of discrimination conditional in any way on proof of fault or on the absence of any ground discharging such liability.

23 Article 6 of the Directive recognizes the existence of rights vesting in the victims of discrimination which can be pleaded in legal proceedings. Although full implementation of the Directive does not require any specific form of sanction for unlawful discrimination, it does entail that that sanction be such as to guarantee real and effective protection (judgment in Case 14/83 Von Colson and Kamann v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen [1984] ECR 1891, paragraph 23). It must, furthermore, have a real deterrent effect on the employer.

24 It must be observed that, if the employer's liability for infringement of the principle of equal treatment were made subject to proof of a fault attributable to him and also to there being no ground of exemption recognized by the applicable national law, the practical effect of those principles would be weakened considerably.

25 It follows that when the sanction chosen by the Member State is contained within the rules governing an employer's civil liability, any breach of the prohibition of discrimination must, in itself, be sufficient to make the employer liable, without there being any possibility of invoking the grounds of exemption provided by national law.

26 Accordingly, the answer must be that, although Directive 76/207 gives the Member States, in penalizing infringement of the prohibition of discrimination, freedom to choose between the various solutions appropriate for achieving its purpose, it nevertheless requires that, where a Member State opts for a sanction forming part of the rules on civil liability, any infringement of the prohibition of discrimination suffices in itself to make the person guilty of it fully liable, and no regard may be had to the grounds of exemption envisaged by national law.

Fourth question

27 In view of the answer to the third question, there is no need to give a ruling on the fourth question.

Costs

28 The costs incurred by the Netherlands Government, the United Kingdom and the Commission, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, in so far as the parties to the main proceedings are concerned, in the nature of a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden, by judgment of 28 June 1988, hereby rules as follows:

(1) An employer is in direct contravention of the principle of equal treatment embodied in Articles 2(1) and 3(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions if he refuses to enter into a contract of employment with a female candidate whom he considers to be suitable for the job where such refusal is based on the possible adverse consequences for him of employing a pregnant woman, owing to rules on unfitness for work adopted by the public authorities, which assimilate inability to work on account of pregnancy and confinement to inability to work on account of illness.

(2) The fact that no man applied for the job does not alter the answer to the first question.

(3) Although Directive 76/207 gives the Member States, in penalizing infringement of the prohibition of discrimination, freedom to choose between the various solutions appropriate for achieving its purpose, it nevertheless requires that, where a Member State opts for a sanction forming part of the rules on civil liability, any infringement of the prohibition of discrimination suffices in itself to make the person guilty of it fully liable, and no regard may be had to the grounds of exemption envisaged by national law.

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Articles 18(2) and 21 of Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (OJ 2001 L 12, p. 1).

2 The reference has been made in proceedings between Mr Mahamdia, an employee at the embassy of the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria in Berlin (Germany), and his employer.

Legal context

International law

The Vienna Convention

3 Under Article 3(1) of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, concluded in Vienna on 18 April 1961:

'1. The functions of a diplomatic mission consist, inter alia, in:

(a) Representing the sending State in the receiving State;

(b) Protecting in the receiving State the interests of the sending State and of its nationals, within the limits permitted by international law;

(c) Negotiating with the Government of the receiving State;

(d) Ascertaining by all lawful means conditions and developments in the receiving State, and reporting thereon to the Government of the sending State;

(e) Promoting friendly relations between the sending State and the receiving State, and developing their economic, cultural and scientific relations.'

European Union law

Regulation No 44/2001

4 Recital 2 in the preamble to Regulation No 44/2001 states:

'Certain differences between national rules governing jurisdiction and recognition of judgments hamper the sound operation of the internal market. Provisions to unify the rules of conflict of jurisdiction in civil and commercial matters … are essential.'

5 Recitals 8 and 9 in the preamble to that regulation, which concern the provisions on defendants domiciled in a third State, read as follows:

'(8) There must be a link between proceedings to which this Regulation applies and the territory of the Member States bound by this Regulation. Accordingly common rules on jurisdiction should, in principle, apply when the defendant is domiciled in one of those Member States.

(9) A defendant not domiciled in a Member State is in general subject to national rules of jurisdiction applicable in the territory of the Member State of the court seised, and a defendant domiciled in a Member State not bound by this Regulation must remain subject to the [Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters (OJ 1978 L 304, p. 1), as amended by the successive conventions on the accession of the new Member States to that Convention ("the Brussels Convention")].'

6 Recital 13 in the preamble, which concerns inter alia the rules on jurisdiction over individual contracts of employment, states:

'In relation to insurance, consumer contracts and employment, the weaker party should be protected by rules of jurisdiction more favourable to his interests than the general rules provide for.'

7 Article 1(1) of Regulation No 44/2001 defines the material scope of the regulation as follows:

'This Regulation shall apply in civil and commercial matters whatever the nature of the court or tribunal. It shall not extend, in particular, to revenue, customs or administrative matters.'

8 With respect to actions brought against persons domiciled in a third State, Article 4(1) of that regulation provides:

'If the defendant is not domiciled in a Member State, the jurisdiction of the courts of each Member State shall, subject to Articles 22 and 23, be determined by the law of that Member State.'

9 Article 5(5) of that regulation provides that a person domiciled in a Member State may be sued in another Member State 'as regards a dispute arising out of the operations of a branch, agency or other establishment, in the courts for the place in which the branch, agency or other establishment is situated'.

10 Section 5 of Chapter II of the regulation, which comprises Articles 18 to 21, sets out the rules of jurisdiction over disputes concerning individual contracts of employment.

11 Article 18 of the regulation reads as follows:

'1. In matters relating to individual contracts of employment, jurisdiction shall be determined by this Section, without prejudice to Article 4 and point 5 of Article 5.

2. Where an employee enters into an individual contract of employment with an employer who is not domiciled in a Member State but has a branch, agency or other establishment in one of the Member States, the employer shall, in disputes arising out of the operations of the branch, agency or establishment, be deemed to be domiciled in that Member State.'

12 Article 19 of the regulation provides:

'An employer domiciled in a Member State may be sued:

1. in the courts of the Member State where he is domiciled; or

2. in another Member State:

(a) in the courts for the place where the employee habitually carries out his work or in the courts for the last place where he did so, or

(b) if the employee does not or did not habitually carry out his work in any one country, in the courts for the place where the business which engaged the employee is or was situated.'

13 Article 21 of the regulation reads as follows:

'The provisions of this Section may be departed from only by an agreement on jurisdiction:

1. which is entered into after the dispute has arisen; or

2. which allows the employee to bring proceedings in courts other than those indicated in this Section.'

German law

14 Article 25 of the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany (Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland) provides:

'The general rules of international law are part of federal law. They take precedence over laws and create rights and obligations directly for the inhabitants of federal territory.'

15 Paragraph 18 of the Law on the judicial system (Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz), in the version published on 9 May 1975, provides:

'The members of the diplomatic missions established in the territory in which this Law applies, the members of their families and their private servants are exempt from German jurisdiction in accordance with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961…'

16 Paragraph 20 of the Law on the judicial system reads as follows:

'1. German jurisdiction also does not extend to representatives of other States and persons accompanying them who stay in the territory in which this Law applies on the official invitation of the Federal Republic of Germany.

2. Furthermore, German jurisdiction also does not extend to persons other than those mentioned in subparagraph 1 and in paragraphs 18 and 19 in so far as they are exempt therefrom under the general rules of international law or on the basis of international agreements or other legislation.'

17 Paragraph 38 of the German Code of Civil Procedure (Zivilprozessordnung), in the version published on 5 December 2005, 'Permitted agreement on jurisdiction', provides in subparagraph 2:

'The jurisdiction of a court of first instance can also be agreed if for at least one of the contractual parties there is no general jurisdiction in Germany. The agreement must be concluded in writing or, if it is made orally, be confirmed in writing… .'

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

18 Mr Mahamdia, who has Algerian and German nationality, lives in Germany. On 1 September 2002 he concluded with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria a contract of employment for a renewable period of one year, for work as a driver at the Algerian Embassy in Berlin.

19 The contract, which was in French, contained an agreement on jurisdiction which read as follows:

'VI. Settlement of disputes

In the event of differences of opinion or disputes arising from this contract, the Algerian courts alone shall have jurisdiction.'

20 According to the order for reference, in the exercise of his duties Mr Mahamdia had to drive guests and colleagues and, as a replacement driver, also the ambassador. In addition, he delivered embassy correspondence to entities in Germany and to the post office. Diplomatic post was received or passed on by a colleague at the embassy who for his part was driven by Mr Mahamdia. The order for reference states that the parties disagree, however, on whether he also provided interpreting services.

21 On 9 August 2007 Mr Mahamdia brought proceedings against the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria in the Arbeitsgericht Berlin (Labour Court, Berlin), seeking to be paid for overtime he claimed to have worked in the years 2005 to 2007.

22 On 29 August 2007, by letter from the embassy's chargé d'affaires, Mr Mahamdia was dismissed as from 30 September 2007.

23 Mr Mahamdia thereupon added to his principal claim before the Arbeitsgericht Berlin a claim for a declaration that the termination of his employment contract had been unlawful and for him to be paid compensation for non-acceptance and to have his employment continued until the end of the dispute.

24 In the proceedings concerning the dismissal, the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria raised the objection that the German courts had no jurisdiction, relying both on international rules on immunity from jurisdiction and on the agreement on jurisdiction in the employment contract.

25 By judgment of 2 July 2008, the Arbeitsgericht Berlin allowed that objection, and consequently dismissed Mr Mahamdia's claim. It took the view that, in accordance with the rules of international law, States enjoy immunity from jurisdiction in the exercise of their sovereign powers and the applicant's activities, which were functionally connected to the diplomatic activities of the embassy, were outside the jurisdiction of the German courts.

26 The applicant in the main proceedings appealed against that judgment to the Landesarbeitsgericht Berlin-Brandenburg (Higher Labour Court, Berlin and Brandenburg), which by judgment of 14 January 2009 quashed in part the judgment of the Arbeitsgericht Berlin.

27 It observed that, since the applicant was a driver at the embassy, his activities did not form part of the exercise of public powers by the defendant State, but constituted an activity that was ancillary to that State's exercise of sovereignty. The People's Democratic Republic of Algeria therefore did not enjoy immunity in this case. Moreover, it considered that the German courts had jurisdiction to hear the case, since the embassy was an 'establishment' within the meaning of Article 18(2) of Regulation No 44/2001. Consequently, the rules set out in Article 19 of the regulation applied. It pointed out that, while an 'establishment' is indeed normally a place where commercial activities are carried on, Article 18(2) of Regulation No 44/2001 is applicable to an embassy since, first, that regulation does not contain any provision under which the diplomatic representations of States are excluded from its scope and, secondly, an embassy has its own management which concludes contracts independently, including contracts in civil matters such as employment contracts.

28 The Landesarbeitsgericht Berlin-Brandenburg also rejected the agreement on jurisdiction in the employment contract in question. It considered that the agreement did not satisfy the conditions laid down in Article 21 of Regulation No 44/2001, as it had been concluded before the dispute arose and referred the employee to the Algerian courts exclusively.

29 The People's Democratic Republic of Algeria appealed on a point of law to the Bundesarbeitsgericht (Federal Labour Court), relying both on the immunity from jurisdiction it should enjoy and on the agreement on jurisdiction.

30 By judgment of 1 July 2010, the Bundesarbeitsgericht set aside the judgment appealed against and remitted the case to the Landesarbeitsgericht Berlin-Brandenburg. It ordered the Landesarbeitsgericht inter alia, on the basis of the evidence before it, to assess the activities of Mr Mahamdia, in particular those relating to interpreting, in order to establish whether they could be regarded as sovereign functions of the defendant State. In addition, should it emerge from the examination that that State did not enjoy immunity from jurisdiction, it instructed the Landesarbeitsgericht to determine the court with jurisdiction to hear the main proceedings, taking account inter alia of Article 18(2) of Regulation No 44/2001 and Article 7 of the European Convention on State Immunity, drawn up within the Council of Europe and opened to signature by the States in Basle on 16 May 1972.

31 As regards the law applicable to the contract at issue in the main proceedings, the Bundesarbeitsgericht ruled that the Landesarbeitsgericht should examine whether, in the absence of an express choice by the parties, they had impliedly decided on Algerian law as the law of the contract. Factors such as the language of the contract, the origin of the applicant or the nature of his activities could be indications.

32 In its order for reference the Landesarbeitsgericht Berlin-Brandenburg considers that, in accordance with Article 25 of the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany, States can plead immunity from jurisdiction only in disputes concerning the exercise of their sovereignty. According to the case-law of the Bundesarbeitsgericht, employment law disputes between embassy employees and the State concerned are within the jurisdiction of the German courts where the employee has not carried out, for the State by which he is employed, activities forming part of the sovereign functions of that State.

33 In the present case, the referring court 'presumes' that Mr Mahamdia did not carry out such activities, since the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria has not shown that he took part in those activities.

34 That court further considers that the jurisdiction of the German courts follows from Articles 18 and 19 of Regulation No 44/2001, but that, for the purpose of applying those articles, it must be established whether an embassy is a 'branch, agency or other establishment' within the meaning of Article 18(2) of that regulation. Only if that is the case may the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria be regarded as an employer domiciled in a Member State.

35 Furthermore, in that case, in accordance with Article 21(2) of Regulation No 44/2001, the agreement on jurisdiction in the contract at issue in the main proceedings cannot in principle be applied to oust the jurisdiction of the German courts.

36 On the basis of those considerations, the Landesarbeitsgericht Berlin-Brandenburg decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Is the embassy of a State outside the scope of ... Regulation No 44/2001 ... which is situated in a Member State a branch, agency or other establishment within the meaning of Article 18(2) of Regulation No 44/2001?

2. If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative: Can an agreement on jurisdiction, reached before the dispute arises, confer jurisdiction on a court outside the scope of Regulation No 44/2001, if, by virtue of the agreement on jurisdiction, the jurisdiction conferred under Articles 18 and 19 of Regulation No 44/2001 would not apply?'

Consideration of the questions referred

Question 1

37 By its first question, the referring court essentially asks whether Article 18(2) of Regulation No 44/2001 must be interpreted as meaning that an embassy is an 'establishment' within the meaning of that provision and, consequently, whether that regulation is applicable for the purpose of determining the court which has jurisdiction to hear an action brought against a third State by an employee of an embassy of that State in a Member State.

38 It should be noted, to begin with, that Regulation No 44/2001, which lays down the rules for determining the jurisdiction of the courts of the Member States, applies to all disputes in civil and commercial matters with the exception of certain matters expressly mentioned in that regulation. As may be seen from paragraph 10 above, Section 5 of Chapter II of the regulation, which comprises Articles 18 to 21, sets out the rules of jurisdiction for disputes relating to individual contracts of employment.

39 As regards the territorial scope of Regulation No 44/2001, it follows from recital 2 in the preamble to that regulation and from Opinion 1/03 [2006] ECR I-1145, paragraph 143, that the purpose of that regulation is to unify the rules on jurisdiction of the Member States, not only for disputes within the European Union but also for those with an external element, with the objective of eliminating obstacles to the functioning of the internal market which may derive from disparities between national legislations on the subject.

40 Regulation No 44/2001, in particular Chapter II of which Article 18 forms part, contains a set of rules forming a unified system, which apply not only to relations between different Member States but also to relations between a Member State and a third State (see Opinion 1/03, paragraph 144).

41 In particular, Article 18(2) of the regulation provides that, where an employee concludes a contract of employment with an employer who is domiciled outside the European Union but has a branch, agency or other establishment in a Member State, that employer must be regarded as domiciled in that State for the purpose of determining which court has jurisdiction.

42 To ensure the full effectiveness of that regulation, in particular Article 18, the legal concepts it uses must be given an independent interpretation common to all the States (see, to that effect, concerning the interpretation of the Brussels Convention, inter alia, Case 33/78 Somafer [1978] ECR 2183, paragraph 8).

43 In particular, to determine the elements which characterise the concepts of 'branch', 'agency' and 'other establishment' in Article 18(2) of Regulation No 44/2001, in the absence of any indication in the wording of the regulation, the purpose of the provision must be taken into account.

44 For disputes relating to employment contracts, Section 5 of Chapter II of Regulation No 44/2001 lays down a series of rules whose objective, as stated in recital 13 in the preamble to that regulation, is to protect the weaker party to the contract by means of rules of jurisdiction that are more favourable to his interests (see, to that effect, Case C-462/06 Glaxosmithkline and Laboratoires Glaxosmithkline [2008] ECR I-3965, paragraph 17).

45 In particular, they enable an employee to sue his employer before the court which he regards as closest to his interests, by giving him the option of proceeding before a court of the State in which he is domiciled, the State in which he habitually carries out his work, or the State in which his employer's establishment is situated. The provisions of that section also limit the choice of jurisdiction by an employer suing an employee, and the possibility of derogating from the rules of jurisdiction laid down by the regulation.

46 As follows from the Court's case-law on the rules of jurisdiction over contracts of employment in the Brussels Convention (see Case 133/81 Ivenel [1982] ECR 1891, paragraph 14; Case C-125/92 Mulox IBC [1993] ECR I-4075, paragraph 18; Case C-383/95 Rutten [1997] ECR I-57, paragraph 22; and Case C-437/00 Pugliese [2003] ECR I-3573, paragraph 18), the provisions of Section 5 of Chapter II of Regulation No 44/2001 must be interpreted with account being taken of the concern to ensure proper protection for the employee as the weaker of the contracting parties.

47 Moreover, to ensure continuity between that regulation and the Brussels Convention, the terms 'branch', 'agency' and 'other establishment' in the regulation must be interpreted in accordance with the criteria set out by the Court in its case-law on Article 5(5) of the Brussels Convention, which contains the same terms and lays down the special rules of jurisdiction for disputes relating to the operation of a secondary establishment of an undertaking. That provision is repeated word for word in Article 5(5) of Regulation No 44/2001.

48 In interpreting those concepts of 'branch', 'agency' and 'other establishment' the Court has identified two criteria which determine whether an action relating to the operations of one of those categories of establishments is linked to a Member State. First, the concept of 'branch', 'agency' or 'other establishment' implies a centre of operations which has the appearance of permanency, such as the extension of a parent body. It must have a management and be materially equipped to negotiate business with third parties, so that they do not have to deal directly with the parent body (see Case 139/80 Blanckaert & Willems [1981] ECR 819, paragraph 11). Secondly, the dispute must concern acts relating to the management of those entities or commitments entered into by them on behalf of the parent body, if those commitments are to be performed in the State in which the entities are situated (see, to that effect, Somafer, paragraph 13).

49 In the dispute in the main proceedings, it should be recalled that the functions of an embassy, as stated in Article 3 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, consist essentially in representing the sending State, protecting the interests of the sending State, and promoting relations with the receiving State. In the exercise of those functions, the embassy, like any other public entity, can act iure gestionis and acquire rights and obligations of a civil nature, in particular as a result of concluding private law contracts. That is the case where it concludes contracts of employment with persons who do not perform functions which fall within the exercise of public powers.

50 As regards the first criterion mentioned in paragraph 48 above, an embassy may be equated with a centre of operations which has the appearance of permanency and contributes to the identification and representation of the State from which it emanates.

51 As regards the second criterion mentioned in that paragraph, it is clear that the subject-matter of the dispute in the main proceedings, namely a dispute in the field of employment relations, has a sufficient link with the functioning of the embassy in question with respect to the management of its staff.

52 Consequently, as regards contracts of employment concluded by an embassy on behalf of the State, the embassy is an 'establishment' within the meaning of Article 18(2) of Regulation No 44/2001 where the functions of the employees with whom it concludes those contracts are connected with the management activity carried out by the embassy in the receiving State.

53 Before the German courts and in the observations it submitted in the present proceedings for a preliminary ruling, the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria argued that recognising the jurisdiction of a court of the receiving State of an embassy would amount to disregarding the rules of customary international law on immunity from jurisdiction, and that, taking those rules into account, Regulation No 44/2001, in particular Article 18, is not applicable in a dispute such as that in the main proceedings.

54 On this point, it must be observed that under the generally accepted principles of international law concerning immunity from jurisdiction a State cannot be sued before the court of another State in a dispute such as that in the main proceedings. Such immunity of States from jurisdiction is enshrined in international law and is based on the principle par in parem non habet imperium, as a State cannot be subjected to the jurisdiction of another State.

55 However, as the Advocate General observes in points 17 to 23 of his Opinion, in the present state of international law, that immunity is not absolute, but is generally recognised where the dispute concerns sovereign acts performed iure imperii. It may be excluded, by contrast, if the legal proceedings relate to acts performed iure gestionis which do not fall within the exercise of public powers.

56 Consequently, in view of the content of that principle of customary international law concerning the immunity of States from jurisdiction, it must be considered that it does not preclude the application of Regulation No 44/2001 in a dispute, such as that in the main proceedings, in which an employee seeks compensation and contests the termination of a contract of employment concluded by him with a State, where the court seised finds that the functions carried out by that employee do not fall within the exercise of public powers or where the proceedings are not likely to interfere with the security interests of the State. On the basis of that finding, the court seised of a dispute such as that in the main proceedings may also consider that that dispute falls within the material scope of Regulation No 44/2001.

57 It follows from the foregoing that the answer to Question 1 is that Article 18(2) of Regulation No 44/2001 must be interpreted as meaning that an embassy of a third State situated in a Member State is an 'establishment' within the meaning of that provision, in a dispute concerning a contract of employment concluded by the embassy on behalf of the sending State, where the functions carried out by the employee do not fall within the exercise of public powers. It is for the national court seised to determine the precise nature of the functions carried out by the employee.

58 By its second question, the referring court essentially asks whether Article 21(2) of Regulation No 44/2001 must be interpreted as meaning that an agreement on jurisdiction concluded before a dispute arises falls within that provision where the agreement confers exclusive jurisdiction on a court outside the scope of that regulation, ousting the jurisdiction based on the special rules in Articles 18 and 19 of that regulation.

59 The People's Democratic Republic of Algeria considers that Article 21 does not preclude the parties, by means of a term in a contract of employment, from conferring on a court of a third State jurisdiction over disputes relating to that contract. In the present case, that choice entails no disadvantage for the employee and coincides with the wish of the parties to the contract to subject it to the law of that State.

60 As stated in recital 13 in the preamble to Regulation No 44/2001, the objective of the special rules in Section 5 of Chapter II is to ensure proper protection for employees. According to the Court's case-law, recalled in paragraph 46 above, that objective must be taken into account when interpreting those rules.

61 Article 21 of Regulation No 44/2001 restricts the conclusion by the parties to a contract of employment of an agreement on jurisdiction. Such an agreement must thus be concluded after the dispute has arisen or, if it was concluded beforehand, must allow the employee to bring proceedings before courts other than those on which those rules confer jurisdiction.

62 Having regard to the purpose of Article 21 of Regulation No 44/2001, the last mentioned condition must, as the Advocate General observes in points 58 and 59 of his Opinion, be understood as meaning that such an agreement, concluded before the dispute arose, must confer jurisdiction over the action brought by the employee on courts additional to those provided for in Articles 18 and 19 of Regulation No 44/2001. The effect of the agreement is thus not to exclude the jurisdiction of the latter courts but to extend the employee's possibility of choosing between several courts with jurisdiction.

63 Moreover, in accordance with the wording of Article 21 of Regulation No 44/2001, agreements on jurisdiction may 'allow' the employee to bring proceedings in courts other than those indicated in Articles 18 and 19. Consequently, that provision cannot be interpreted as meaning that an agreement on jurisdiction could apply exclusively and thus prohibit the employee from bringing proceedings before the courts which have jurisdiction under Articles 18 and 19.

64 The objective of protecting the employee as the weaker party to the contract, recalled in paragraphs 44 and 46 above, would not be attained if the jurisdiction provided for by Articles 18 and 19 in order to ensure that protection could be ousted by an agreement on jurisdiction concluded before the dispute arose.

65 Furthermore, it does not follow either from the wording or from the purpose of Article 21 of Regulation No 44/2001 that such an agreement may not confer jurisdiction on the courts of a third State, provided that it does not exclude the jurisdiction conferred on the basis of the articles of the regulation.

66 It follows from the foregoing that the answer to Question 2 is that Article 21(2) of Regulation No 44/2001 must be interpreted as meaning that an agreement on jurisdiction concluded before a dispute arises falls within that provision in so far as it gives the employee the possibility of bringing proceedings, not only before the courts ordinarily having jurisdiction under the special rules in Articles 18 and 19 of that regulation, but also before other courts, which may include courts outside the European Union.

Costs

67 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Grand Chamber) hereby rules:

1. Article 18(2) of Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters must be interpreted as meaning that an embassy of a third State situated in a Member State is an 'establishment' within the meaning of that provision, in a dispute concerning a contract of employment concluded by the embassy on behalf of the sending State, where the functions carried out by the employee do not fall within the exercise of public powers. It is for the national court seised to determine the precise nature of the functions carried out by the employee.

2. Article 21(2) of Regulation No 44/2001 must be interpreted as meaning that an agreement on jurisdiction concluded before a dispute arises falls within that provision in so far as it gives the employee the possibility of bringing proceedings, not only before the courts ordinarily having jurisdiction under the special rules in Articles 18 and 19 of that regulation, but also before other courts, which may include courts outside the European Union.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT

30 June 1998 *

In Case C-394/96,

REFERENCE to the Court under Article 177 of the EC Treaty by the House of Lords for a preliminary ruling in the proceedings pending before that court between

and

Rentokil Initial UK Limited (formerly Rentokil Limited)

on the interpretation of Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions (OJ 1976 L 39, p. 40),

* Language of the case: English.

THE COURT,

composed of: C. Gulmann, President of the Third and Fifth Chambers, acting as President, H. Ragnemalm, M. Wathelet and R. Schintgen (Presidents of Chambers), G. F. Mancini, P. J. G. Kapteyn (Rapporteur), J. L. Murray, D. A. O. Edward, J.-P. Puissochet, P. Jann and L. Sevón, Judges, Advocate General: D. Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer,

Registrar: H. Von Holstein, Deputy Registrar,

after considering the written observations submitted on behalf of:

— Mrs Brown, by Colin McEachran QC, and Ian Truscott, Advocate, instructed by Mackay Simon, Solicitors,

— Rentokil Initial UK Ltd, by John Hand QC, and Gerard F. McDermott, Barrister, instructed by Gareth T. Brown, Solicitor,

— the United Kingdom Government, by Stephanie Ridley, of the Treasury Solicitor's Department, acting as Agent, and Dinah Rose, Barrister,

— the Commission of the European Communities, by Pieter Jan Kuyper, Legal Adviser, and Marie Wolfcarius, of its Legal Service, acting as Agents, having regard to the Report for the Hearing, after hearing the oral observations of Mrs Brown, Rentokil Initial UK Ltd, the United Kingdom Government and the Commission at the hearing on 16 December 1997, after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 5 February 1998,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By order of 28 November 1996, received at the Court Registry on 9 December 1996, the House of Lords referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EC Treaty two questions on the interpretation of Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions (OJ 1976 L 39, p. 40).

2 Those questions have been raised in proceedings brought by Mary Brown against Rentokil Initial UK Ltd (hereinafter 'Rentokil') in connection with her dismissal whilst pregnant.

3 According to the order for reference, Mrs Brown was employed by Rentokil as a driver. Her job was mainly to transport and change

'Sanitact' units in shops and other centres. In her view, it was heavy work.

4 In August 1990, Mrs Brown informed Rentokil that she was pregnant. Thereafter she had difficulties associated with the pregnancy. From 16 August 1990 onwards, she submitted a succession of four-week certificates mentioning various pregnancy-related disorders. She did not work again after mid-August 1990.

5 Rentokil's contracts of employment included a clause stipulating that, if an employee was absent because of sickness for more than 26 weeks continuously, he or she would be dismissed.

6 On 9 November 1990, Rentokil's representatives told Mrs Brown that half of the 26-week period had run and that her employment would end on 8 February 1991 if, following an independent medical examination, she had not returned to work by then. A letter to the same effect was sent to her on that date.

7 Mrs Brown did not go back to work following that letter. The parties agree that there was never any question of her being able to return to work before the end of the 26-week period. By letter of 30 January 1991, which took effect on 8 February 1991, she was accordingly dismissed while pregnant. Her child was born on 22 March 1991.

8 At the time when Mrs Brown was dismissed, section 33 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 provided that an employee who was absent from work wholly or partially because of pregnancy or confinement would, subject to certain conditions, be entitled to return to work. In particular, the employee had to have been in employment until immediately before the start of the 11th week before the expected date of confinement and, at the beginning of the 11th week, have been continuously employed for a period of not less than two years.

9 According to the order for reference, on the assumption that the date on which Mrs Brown's child was born was also the expected date of delivery, she was not entitled, because she had not been in employment for two years as at 30 December 1990, to absent herself from work from the beginning of the 11th week before delivery pursuant to section 33 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, or to return to work at any time during the 29 weeks following delivery. She was, however, entitled to statutory maternity pay under sections 46 to 48 of the Social Security Act 1986.

10 By order dated 5 August 1991, the Industrial Tribunal dismissed Mrs Brown's application under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 concerning her dismissal. The Tribunal held that, where absence through pregnancy-related illness, but which began long before the statutory maternity provisions could apply and subsisted continuously thereafter, is followed by dismissal, that dismissal does not fall into the category of dismissals which must automatically be considered discriminatory because they are due to pregnancy.

11 By order of 23 March 1992, the Employment Appeal Tribunal dismissed Mrs Brown's appeal.

12 By judgment of 18 January 1995, the Extra Division of the Court of Session reached the preliminary conclusion that in this case there was no discrimination within the meaning of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975. It pointed out that, since the Court of Justice had drawn a clear distinction between pregnancy and illness attributable to pregnancy (Case C-179/88 Handels-og Kontorfunktionærernes Forbund i Danmark v Dansk Arbejdsgiverforening [1990] ECR I-3979 ('Hertz')), Mrs Brown, whose absence was due to illness and who had been dismissed on account of that illness, could not succeed.

13 Mrs Brown appealed to the House of Lords, which referred the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'1 (a) Is it contrary to Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Directive 76/207 of the Council of the European Communities ("the Equal Treatment Directive") to dismiss a female employee, at any time during her pregnancy, as a result of absence through illness arising from that pregnancy?

(b) Does it make any difference to the answer given to Question 1(a) that the employee was dismissed in pursuance of a contractual provision entitling the employer to dismiss employees, irrespective of gender, after a stipulated number of weeks of continued absence?

2 (a) Is it contrary to Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of the Equal Treatment Directive to dismiss a female employee as a result of absence through illness arising from pregnancy who does not qualify for the right to absent herself from work on account of pregnancy or childbirth for the period specified by national law because she has not been employed for the period imposed by national law, where dismissal takes place during that period?

(b) Does it make any difference to the answer given to Question 2(a) that the employee was dismissed in pursuance of a contractual provision entitling the employer to dismiss employees, irrespective of gender, after a stipulated number of weeks of continued absence?'

The first part of the first question

14 It should be noted at the outset that the purpose of Directive 76/207, according to Article 1(1), is to put into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions.

15 Article 2(1) of the Directive provides that '... the principle of equal treatment shall mean that there shall be no discrimination whatsoever on grounds of sex either directly or indirectly by reference in particular to marital or family status'. According to Article 5(1) of the Directive, '[a]pplication of the principle of equal treatment with regard to working conditions, including the conditions governing dismissal, means that men and women shall be guaranteed the same conditions without discrimination on grounds of sex'.

16 According to settled case-law of the Court of Justice, the dismissal of a female worker on account of pregnancy, or essentially on account of pregnancy, can affect only women and therefore constitutes direct discrimination on grounds of sex (see Case C-177/88 Dekker v Stichting Vormingscentrum voor Jong Volwassenen (VJV-Centrum) Plus [1990] ECR I-3941, paragraph 12; Hertz, cited above, paragraph 13; Case C-421/92 Habermann-Beltermann v Arbeiterwohlfahrt Bezirksverband [1994] ECR I-1657, paragraph 15; and Case C-32/93 Webb v EMO Air Cargo [1994] ECR I-3567, paragraph 19).

17 As the Court pointed out in paragraph 20 of its judgment in Webb, cited above, by reserving to Member States the right to retain or introduce provisions which are intended to protect women in connection with 'pregnancy and maternity', Article 2(3) of Directive 76/207 recognises the legitimacy, in terms of the principle of equal treatment, first, of protecting a woman's biological condition during and after pregnancy and, second, of protecting the special relationship between a woman and her child over the period which follows pregnancy and childbirth.

18 It was precisely in view of the harmful effects which the risk of dismissal may have on the physical and mental state of women who are pregnant, women who have recently given birth or women who are breastfeeding, including the particularly serious risk that pregnant women may be prompted voluntarily to terminate their pregnancy, that the Community legislature, pursuant to Article 10 of Council Directive 92/85/EEC of 19 October 1992 on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health at work of pregnant workers and workers who have recently given birth or are breastfeeding (tenth individual Directive adopted within the meaning of Article 16(1) of Directive 89/391/EEC) (OJ 1992 L 348, p. 1), which was to be transposed into the laws of the Member States no later than two years after its adoption, provided for special protection to be given to women, by prohibiting dismissal during the period from the beginning of their pregnancy to the end of their maternity leave. Article 10 of Directive 92/85 provides that there is to be no exception to, or derogation from, the prohibition of dismissal of pregnant women during that period, save in exceptional cases not connected with their condition (see, in this regard, paragraphs 21 and 22 of the judgment in Webb, cited above).

19 In replying to the first part of the first question, which concerns Directive 76/207, account must be taken of that general context.

20 At the outset, it is clear from the documents before the Court that the question concerns the dismissal of a female worker during her pregnancy as a result of absences through incapacity for work arising from her pregnant condition. As Rentokil points out, the cause of Mrs Brown's dismissal lies in the fact that she was ill during her pregnancy to such an extent that she was unfit for work for 26 weeks. It is common ground that her illness was attributable to her pregnancy.

21 However, dismissal of a woman during pregnancy cannot be based on her inability, as a result of her condition, to perform the duties which she is contractually bound to carry out. If such an interpretation were adopted, the protection afforded by Community law to a woman during pregnancy would be available only to pregnant women who were able to comply with the conditions of their employment contracts, with the result that the provisions of Directive 76/207 would be rendered ineffective (see Webb, cited above, paragraph 26).

22 Although pregnancy is not in any way comparable to a pathological condition (Webb, cited above, paragraph 25), the fact remains, as the Advocate General stresses in point 56 of his Opinion, that pregnancy is a period during which disorders and complications may arise compelling a woman to undergo strict medical supervision and, in some cases, to rest absolutely for all or part of her pregnancy. Those disorders and complications, which may cause incapacity for work, form part of the risks inherent in the condition of pregnancy and are thus a specific feature of that condition.

23 In paragraph 15 of its judgment in Hertz, cited above, the Court, on the basis of Article 2(3) of Directive 76/207, also pointed out that that directive admits of national provisions guaranteeing women specific rights on account of pregnancy and maternity. It concluded that, during the maternity leave accorded to her under national law, a woman is protected against dismissal on the grounds of her absence.

24 Although, under Article 2(3) of Directive 76/207, such protection against dismissal must be afforded to women during maternity leave (Hertz, cited above, paragraph 15), the principle of non-discrimination, for its part, requires similar protection throughout the period of pregnancy. Finally, as is clear from paragraph 22 of this judgment, dismissal of a female worker during pregnancy for absences due to incapacity for work resulting from her pregnancy is linked to the occurrence of risks inherent in pregnancy and must therefore be regarded as essentially based on the fact of pregnancy. Such a dismissal can affect only women and therefore constitutes direct discrimination on grounds of sex.

25 It follows that Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Directive 76/207 preclude dismissal of a female worker at any time during her pregnancy for absences due to incapacity for work caused by an illness resulting from that pregnancy.

26 However, where pathological conditions caused by pregnancy or childbirth arise after the end of maternity leave, they are covered by the general rules applicable in the event of illness (see, to that effect, Hertz, cited above, paragraphs 16 and 17). In such circumstances, the sole question is whether a female worker's absences, following maternity leave, caused by her incapacity for work brought on by such disorders, are treated in the same way as a male worker's absences, of the same duration, caused by incapacity for work; if they are, there is no discrimination on grounds of sex.

27 It is also clear from all the foregoing considerations that, contrary to the Court's ruling in Case C-400/95 Larsson v Føtex Supermarked [1997] ECR I-2757, paragraph 23), where a woman is absent owing to illness resulting from pregnancy or childbirth, and that illness arose during pregnancy and persisted during and after maternity leave, her absence not only during maternity leave but also during the period extending from the start of her pregnancy to the start of her maternity leave cannot be taken into account for computation of the period justifying her dismissal under national law. As to her absence after maternity leave, this may be taken into account under the same conditions as a man's absence, of the same duration, through incapacity for work.

28 The answer to the first part of the first question must therefore be that Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Directive 76/207 preclude dismissal of a female worker at any time during her pregnancy for absences due to incapacity for work caused by illness resulting from that pregnancy.

The second part of the first question

29 The second part of the first question concerns a contractual term providing that an employer may dismiss workers of either sex after a stipulated number of weeks of continuous absence.

30 It is well settled that discrimination involves the application of different rules to comparable situations or the application of the same rule to different situations (see, in particular, Case C-342/93 Gillespie and Others v Northern Health and Social Services Board and Others [1996] ECR I-475, paragraph 16).

31 Where it is relied on to dismiss a pregnant worker because of absences due to incapacity for work resulting from her pregnancy, such a contractual term, applying both to men and to women, is applied in the same way to different situations since, as is clear from the answer given to the first part of the first question, the situation of a pregnant worker who is unfit for work as a result of disorders associated with her pregnancy cannot be considered to be the same as that of a male worker who is ill and absent through incapacity for work for the same length of time.

32 Consequently, application of that contractual term in circumstances such as the present constitutes direct discrimination on grounds of sex.

33 The answer to the second part of the first question must therefore be that the fact that a female worker has been dismissed during her pregnancy on the basis of a contractual term providing that the employer may dismiss employees of either sex after a stipulated number of weeks of continuous absence cannot affect the answer given to the first part of the first question.

The second question

34 In view of the answer given to the first question, it is unnecessary to answer the second question.

Costs

35 The costs incurred by the United Kingdom Government and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions referred to it by the House of Lords by order of 28 November 1996, hereby rules:

Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976, on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions, preclude dismissal of a female worker at any time during her pregnancy for absences due to incapacity for work caused by illness resulting from that pregnancy.

The fact that a female worker has been dismissed during her pregnancy on the basis of a contractual term providing that the employer may dismiss employees of either sex after a stipulated number of weeks of continuous absence does not affect the answer given.

gives the following

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Article 13 EC and Articles 2(1) and (6) of Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ 2000 L 303, p. 16).

2 The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Mr Palacios de la Villa and his employer, Cortefiel Servicios SA ('Cortefiel'), concerning the automatic termination of his contract of employment by reason of the fact that he had reached the age-limit for compulsory retirement, set at 65 years of age by national law.

Legal background

Community rules

3 Directive 2000/78 was adopted on the basis of Article 13 EC. Recitals 4, 6, 8, 9, 11 to 14, 25 and 36 state:

'(4) The right of all persons to equality before the law and protection against discrimination constitutes a universal right recognised by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, United Nations Covenants on Civil and Political Rights and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, to which all Member States are signatories. Convention No 111 of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) prohibits discrimination in the field of employment and occupation.

(6) The Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers recognises the importance of combating every form of discrimination, including the need to take appropriate action for the social and economic integration of elderly and disabled people.

...

(8) The Employment Guidelines for 2000 agreed by the European Council at Helsinki on 10 and 11 December 1999 stress the need to foster a labour market favourable to social integration by formulating a coherent set of policies aimed at combating discrimination against groups such as persons with disability. They also emphasise the need to pay particular attention to supporting older workers, in order to increase their participation in the labour force.

(9) Employment and occupation are key elements in guaranteeing equal opportunities for all and contribute strongly to the full participation of citizens in economic, cultural and social life and to realising their potential.

(11) Discrimination based on religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation may undermine the achievement of the objectives of the EC Treaty, in particular the attainment of a high level of employment and social protection, raising the standard of living and the quality of life, economic and social cohesion and solidarity, and the free movement of persons.

(12) To this end, any direct or indirect discrimination based on religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation as regards the areas covered by this Directive should be prohibited throughout the Community. ...

(13) This Directive does not apply to social security and social protection schemes whose benefits are not treated as income within the meaning given to that term for the purpose of applying Article 141 of the EC Treaty, nor to any kind of payment by the State aimed at providing access to employment or maintaining employment.

(14) This Directive shall be without prejudice to national provisions laying down retirement ages.

(25) The prohibition of age discrimination is an essential part of meeting the aims set out in the Employment Guidelines and encouraging diversity in the workforce. However, differences in treatment in connection with age may be justified under certain circumstances and therefore require specific provisions which may vary in accordance with the situation in Member States. It is therefore essential to distinguish between differences in treatment which are justified, in particular by legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and discrimination which must be prohibited.

(36) Member States may entrust the social partners, at their joint request, with the implementation of this Directive, as regards the provisions concerning collective agreements, provided they take any necessary steps to ensure that they are at all times able to guarantee the results required by this Directive.'

4 Article 1 of Directive 2000/78 states: '[t]he purpose of this Directive is to lay down a general framework for combating discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation as regards employment and occupation, with a view to putting into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment'.

5 Article 2 of Directive 2000/78, under the heading 'Concept of discrimination' states, in paragraphs (1) and (2)(a):

'1. For the purposes of this Directive, the "principle of equal treatment" shall mean that there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination whatsoever on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1.

2. For the purposes of paragraph 1:

(a) direct discrimination shall be taken to occur where one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation, on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1'.

6 Article 3(1) of Directive 2000/78, under the heading 'Scope', provides:

'Within the limits of the areas of competence conferred on the Community, this Directive shall apply to all persons, as regards both the public and private sectors, including public bodies, in relation to:

(c) employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay

7 Under Article 6 of Directive 2000/78, under the heading 'Justification of differences of treatment on grounds of age':

'1. Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that differences of treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination, if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary.

Such differences of treatment may include, among others:

(a) the setting of special conditions on access to employment and vocational training, employment and occupation, including dismissal and remuneration conditions, for young people, older workers and persons with caring responsibilities in order to promote their vocational integration or ensure their protection;

(b) the fixing of minimum conditions of age, professional experience or seniority in service for access to employment or to certain advantages linked to employment;

(c) the fixing of a maximum age for recruitment which is based on the training requirements of the post in question or the need for a reasonable period of employment before retirement.

2. Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that the fixing for occupational social security schemes of ages for admission or entitlement to retirement or invalidity benefits, including the fixing under those schemes of different ages for employees or groups or categories of employees, and the use, in the context of such schemes, of age criteria in actuarial calculations, does not constitute discrimination on the grounds of age, provided this does not result in discrimination on the grounds of sex.'

8 Article 8 of Directive 2000/78, under the heading 'Minimum requirements', is worded as follows:

'1. Member States may introduce or maintain provisions which are more favourable to the protection of the principle of equal treatment than those laid down in this Directive.

2. The implementation of this Directive shall under no circumstances constitute grounds for a reduction in the level of protection against discrimination already afforded by Member States in the fields covered by this Directive.'

9 Article 16 of Directive 2000/78, under the heading 'Compliance', provides:

'Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that:

(a) any laws, regulations and administrative provisions contrary to the principle of equal treatment are abolished;

(b) any provisions contrary to the principle of equal treatment which are included in contracts or collective agreements, internal rules of undertakings or rules governing the independent occupations and professions and workers' and employers' organisations are, or may be, declared null and void or are amended.'

10 In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 18 of Directive 2000/78, Member States were to adopt the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with the directive by 2 December 2003 at the latest or could entrust the social partners, at their joint request, with the implementation of the directive as regards provisions concerning collective agreements. In such cases, Member States were to ensure that, no later than 2 December 2003, the social partners introduced the necessary measures by agreement, the Member States concerned being required to take any necessary measures to enable them at any time to be in a position to guarantee the results imposed by that directive. They were forthwith to inform the Commission of the European Communities of those measures.

National law

11 From 1980 until 2001 compulsory retirement of workers who had reached a certain age was used by the Spanish legislature as a mechanism to absorb unemployment.

12 Thus the Fifth Additional Provision of Law 8/1980 on the Workers' Statute (Ley 8/1980 del Estatuto de los Trabajadores) of 10 March 1980 provided:

'The maximum age-limit applicable to capacity to work and the termination of employment contracts shall be set by the Government by reference to the resources of the social security system and the labour market. In any event, the maximum age shall be 69 years, without prejudice to the right to complete qualifying periods for retirement.

Retirement ages may be agreed freely during collective bargaining, without prejudice to the social security provisions in that regard.'

13 Royal Legislative Decree 1/1995 of 24 March 1995 (BOE No 75, of 29 March 1995, p. 9654) approved the consolidated version of Law 8/1980, the Tenth Additional Provision of which ('the Tenth Additional Provision') essentially reproduced the Fifth Additional Provision of Law 8/1980 permitting the use of compulsory retirement as an instrument of employment policy.

14 Decree-Law 5/2001 of 2 March 2001 on emergency measures to reform the labour market in order to increase employment and to improve its quality, ratified by Law 12/2001 of 9 July 2001, repealed the Tenth Additional Provision with effect from 11 July 2001.

15 The national court states in that regard that, on account of the improvement in the economic situation, the Spanish legislature went from regarding compulsory retirement as an instrument favouring employment policy to viewing it as a burden on the social security system, so that it decided to replace the policy of encouraging compulsory retirement with measures intended to promote the implementation of a system of flexible retirement.

16 Articles 4 and 17 of the Law 8/1980, in the amended version resulting from Law 62/2003 of 30 December 2003 laying down fiscal, administrative and social measures (BOE No 313 of 31 December 2003, p. 46874) ('the Workers' Statute'), which is designed to transpose Directive 2000/78 into Spanish law and entered into force on 1 January 2004, deal with the principle of non-discrimination, inter alia, on grounds of age.

17 According to Article 4(2) of the Workers' Statute:

'Workers have the right, in their employment:

(c) not to be discriminated against directly or indirectly, when seeking employment or once in employment, on the basis of sex, marital status, age within the limits laid down by this Law, racial or ethnic origin, social status, religion or beliefs, political ideas, sexual orientation, membership or lack of membership of a trade union or on the basis of their language on Spanish territory. Nor may workers be discriminated against on the basis of disability, provided that they are capable of carrying out the work or job in question.

18 Article 17(1) of the Workers' Statute provides:

'Regulatory provisions, clauses in collective agreements, individual agreements, and unilateral decisions by employers, which involve direct or indirect unfavourable discrimination on the basis of age ... shall be deemed to be null and void.'

19 According to the referring court, the repeal of the Tenth Additional Provision of the Workers' Statute has given rise to many disputes regarding the legality of clauses in collective agreements authorising the compulsory retirement of workers.

20 Subsequently, the Spanish legislature adopted Law 14/2005 on clauses in collective agreements concerning the attainment of normal retirement age (Ley 14/2005 sobre las cláusulas de los convenios colectivos referidas al cumplimiento de la edad ordinaria de jubiliación), of 1 July 2005 (BOE No 157, of 2 July 2005, p. 23634), which entered into force on 3 July 2005.

21 Law 14/2005 reintroduced the mechanism for compulsory retirement, but laid down in that respect different conditions depending on whether the definitive or transitional rules of that law were applicable.

22 Thus, as regards collective agreements concluded after its entry into force, the sole article of Law 14/2005 reinstates the Tenth Additional Provision of the Workers' Statute as follows:

'Collective agreements may contain clauses providing for the termination of a contract of employment on the grounds that a worker has reached the normal retirement age stipulated in social security legislation, provided that the following requirements are satisfied:

(a) such a measure must be linked to objectives which are consistent with employment policy and are set out in the collective agreement, such as increased stability in employment, the conversion of temporary contracts into permanent contracts, sustaining employment, the recruitment of new workers, or any other objectives aimed at promoting the quality of employment.

(b) a worker whose contract of employment is terminated must have completed the minimum contribution period, or a longer period if a clause to that effect is contained in the collective agreement, and he must have satisfied the conditions laid down in social security legislation for entitlement to a retirement pension under his contribution regime.'

23 However, as regards collective agreements concluded before its entry into force, the single transitional provision of Law 14/2001 ('the single transitional provision'), imposes only the second of the conditions laid down in the sole article of Law 14/2005, excluding any reference to the pursuit of an aim relating to employment policy.

24 The single transitional provision is worded as follows:

'Clauses in collective agreements concluded prior to the entry into force of this Law, which provide for the termination of contracts of employment where workers have reached normal retirement age, shall be lawful provided it is ensured that the workers concerned have completed the minimum period of contributions and satisfy the other requirements laid down in social security legislation for entitlement to a retirement pension under their contribution regime.

The preceding paragraph is not applicable to legal situations which became definitive before the entry into force of this Law.'

25 The relationship between the parties in the main proceedings is governed by the Textile Trade Collective Agreement for the Autonomous Community of Madrid ('the collective agreement').

26 The collective agreement was concluded on 10 March 2005 and published on 26 May 2005. In accordance with Article 3 thereof, it remained in force until 31 December 2005. As the collective agreement preceded the entry into force of Law 14/2005, the single transitional provision is applicable to it.

27 Thus, the third paragraph of Article 19 of the collective agreement provides:

'In the interests of promoting employment, it is agreed that the retirement age will be 65 years unless the worker concerned has not completed the qualifying period required for drawing the retirement pension, in which case the worker may continue in his employment until the completion of that period.'

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling 28 It is clear from the file transmitted to the Court by the referring court that Mr Palacios de la Villa, who was born on 3 February 1940, worked for Cortefiel from 17 August 1981 as organisational manager.

29 By letter of 18 July 2005, Cortefiel notified him of the automatic termination of his contract of employment on the ground that he had reached the compulsory retirement age provided for in the third paragraph of Article 19 of the collective agreement and that, on 2 July 2005, Law 14/2005 had been published, the single transitional provision of which authorises such a measure.

30 It is common ground that, at the date on which his contract of employment with Cortefiel was terminated, Mr Palacios de la Villa had completed the periods of employment necessary to draw a retirement pension under the social security scheme amounting to 100% of his contribution base of EUR 2 347.78, without prejudice to the maximum limits laid down by national legislation.

31 On 9 August 2005, Mr Palacios de la Villa, taking the view that the notification amounted to dismissal, brought an action before the Juzgado de lo Social n° 33 de Madrid. In that action, he requested that the measure taken in his regard be declared null and void on the ground that it was in breach of his fundamental rights and, more particularly, his right not to be discriminated against on the ground of age, since the measure was based solely on the fact that he had reached the age of 65.

32 Cortefiel submitted conversely, that the termination of Mr Palacio de Villa's contract of employment was in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 19 of the collective agreement and the single transitional provision and that, furthermore, it was not incompatible with the requirements of Community law.

33 The referring court expresses serious doubts as to whether the first paragraph of the single transitional provision complies with Community law, inasmuch as it authorises the maintenance of clauses contained in collective agreements existing at the date of the entry into force of Law 14/2005 that provide for the compulsory retirement of workers if they have reached retirement age and satisfy the other conditions imposed by national social security legislation for entitlement to a contributory retirement pension. That provision does not require the termination of the employment relationship on the ground that the worker has reached retirement age to be justified by the employment policy pursued by the Member State concerned, whereas agreements negotiated after the entry into force of Law 14/2005 may contain compulsory retirement clauses only if, in addition to the condition that the workers concerned must be entitled to a pension, that measure pursues objectives set out in the collective agreement relating to national employment policy, such as increased stability in employment, conversion of temporary into permanent contracts, sustaining employment, the recruitment of new workers or the improvement of the quality of employment.

34 In those circumstances, under the same law and in the same economic circumstances, workers who have reached the age of 65 would be treated differently by reason solely of the fact that the collective agreement applicable to them came into force before or after the date of publication of Law 14/2005, that is, 2 July 2005; if the collective agreement was in force before that date no account would be taken of the requirements of employment policy, even though those requirements are imposed by Directive 2000/78, the time-limit for transposition of which expired on 2 December 2003.

35 It is true that Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 authorises an exception to the principle of non-discrimination on the basis of age for the purposes of certain legitimate aims, so long as the means to achieve them are appropriate and necessary. Further, according to the referring court, the definitive rules laid down in the Tenth Additional Provision are undoubtedly covered by Article 6(1), since they require the existence of an actual connection between the compulsory retirement of workers and legitimate employment policy objectives.

36 By contrast, according to the referring court, the first paragraph of the single transitional provision does not require there to be such a connection and, therefore, it does not appear to comply with the conditions laid down in Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78. Furthermore, from 2001 labour market trends were clearly favourable and the decision of the Spanish legislature to introduce that transitional measure, influenced by the social partners, was aimed at amending the case-law of the Supreme Court. Moreover, the Constitutional Court has never accepted that collective bargaining may in itself constitute an objective and reasonable justification for the compulsory retirement of a worker who has reached a specific age.

37 The referring court adds that Article 13 EC and Article 2(1) of Directive 2000/78 constitute clear and unconditional rules requiring the national court, in accordance with the principle of the primacy of Community law, to disapply national law which is contrary to it, as in the case of the single transitional provision.

38 Furthermore, in Case C-15/96 Schöning-Kougebetopoulou [1998] ECR I-47 the Court has already declared a clause in a collective agreement to be contrary to Community law on the ground that it was discriminatory, holding that, without requiring or waiting for that clause to be abolished by collective bargaining or by some other procedure, the national court must therefore apply the same rules to the members of the group disadvantaged by that discrimination as those applicable to other workers.

39 It follows, in the view of the referring court, that, if Community law were to be interpreted as meaning that it in fact precludes the application in the case in the main proceedings of the first paragraph of the single transitional provision, the third paragraph of Article 19 of the collective agreement would have no legal basis and could not therefore apply in the case in the main proceedings.

40 In those circumstances, the Juzgado de lo Social n° 33 de Madrid decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Does the principle of equal treatment, which prohibits any discrimination whatsoever on the grounds of age and is laid down in Article 13 EC and Article 2(1) of Directive 2000/78, preclude a national law (specifically, the first paragraph of the single transitional provision ...) pursuant to which compulsory retirement clauses contained in collective agreements are lawful, where such clauses provide as sole requirements that workers must have reached normal retirement age and must have fulfilled the conditions set out in the social security legislation of the Spanish State for entitlement to a retirement pension under their contribution regime?

In the event that the reply to the first question is in the affirmative:

(2) Does the principle of equal treatment, which prohibits any discrimination whatsoever on the grounds of age and is laid down in Article 13 EC and Article 2(1) of Directive 2000/78, require this court, as a national court, not to apply to this case the first paragraph of the single transitional provision ...?'

The questions referred for a preliminary ruling

The first question

41 In order to give a useful reply to that question, it is appropriate to determine, first, whether Directive 2000/78 is applicable to a situation such as that in the main proceedings before examining secondly, and if necessary, whether and to what extent the directive precludes legislation such as that referred to by the national court.

Applicability of Directive 2000/78

42 As is clear both from its title and preamble and its content and purpose, Directive 2000/78 is designed to lay down a general framework in order to guarantee equal treatment 'in employment and occupation' to all persons, by offering them effective protection against discrimination on one of the grounds covered by Article 1, which includes age.

43 More particularly, it follows from Article 3(1)(c) of Directive 2000/78 that it applies, within the framework of the competence conferred on the Community, 'to all persons ... in relation to employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay'.

44 It is true that, according to recital 14 in its preamble, Directive 2000/78 is to be without prejudice to national provisions laying down retirement ages. However, that recital merely states that the directive does not affect the competence of the Member States to determine retirement age and does not in any way preclude the application of that directive to national measures governing the conditions for termination of employment contracts where the retirement age, thus established, has been reached.

45 The legislation at issue in the main proceedings, which permits the automatic termination of an employment relationship concluded between an employer and a worker once the latter has reached the age of 65, affects the duration of the employment relationship between the parties and, more generally, the engagement of the worker concerned in an occupation, by preventing his future participation in the labour force.

46 Consequently, legislation of that kind must be regarded as establishing rules relating to 'employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay' within the meaning of Article 3(1)(c) of Directive 2000/78.

47 In those circumstances, Directive 2000/78 is applicable to a situation such as that giving rise to the dispute before the national court.

The interpretation of Articles 2 and 6 of Directive 2000/78

48 By its first question, the referring court asks essentially whether the prohibition of any discrimination based on age in employment and occupation must be interpreted as meaning that it precludes national legislation such as that in the main proceedings, pursuant to which compulsory retirement clauses contained in collective agreements are regarded as lawful, where such clauses provide as sole requirements that workers must have reached retirement age, set at 65 years by the national legislation, and must fulfil the other social security conditions for entitlement to draw a contributory retirement pension.

49 In that connection, it should be recalled from the outset that, in accordance with Article 1, the aim of Directive 2000/78 is to combat certain types of discrimination, including discrimination on grounds of age, as regards employment and occupation with a view to putting into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment.

50 Under Article 2(1) of Directive 2000/78, for the purposes of the Directive, the 'principle of equal treatment' is to mean that there is to be no direct or indirect discrimination whatsoever on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1. Article 2(2)(a) states that, for the purposes of paragraph 1, direct discrimination is to be taken to occur where one person is treated less favourably than another person in a comparable situation, on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1.

51 National legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings, according to which the fact that a worker has reached the retirement age laid down by that legislation leads to automatic termination of his employment contract, must be regarded as directly imposing less favourable treatment for workers who have reached that age as compared with all other persons in the labour force. Such legislation therefore establishes a difference in treatment directly based on age, as referred to in Article 2(1) and (2)(a) of Directive 2000/78.

52 Specifically concerning differences of treatment on grounds of age, it is clear from the first subparagraph of Article 6(1) of the directive that such inequalities will not constitute discrimination prohibited under Article 2 'if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary'. The second subparagraph of Article 6(1) sets out several examples of differences of treatment having characteristics such as those mentioned in the first subparagraph and, therefore, compatible with the requirements of Community law.

53 In this case, it must be observed, as the Advocate General pointed out in point 71 of his Opinion, that the single transitional provision, which allows the inclusion of compulsory retirement clauses in collective agreements, was adopted, at the instigation of the social partners, as part of a national policy seeking to promote better access to employment, by means of better distribution of work between the generations.

54 It is true, as the national court has pointed out, that that provision does not expressly refer to an objective of that kind.

55 However, that fact alone is not decisive.

56 It cannot be inferred from Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 that the lack of precision in the national legislation at issue as regards the aim pursued automatically excludes the possibility that it may be justified under that provision.

57 In the absence of such precision, it is important, however, that other elements, taken from the general context of the measure concerned, enable the underlying aim of that law to be identified for the purposes of judicial review of its legitimacy and whether the means put in place to achieve that aim are appropriate and necessary.

58 In this case, it is clear from the referring court's explanations that, first, the compulsory retirement of workers who have reached a certain age was introduced into Spanish legislation in the course of 1980, against an economic background characterised by high unemployment, in order to create, in the context of national employment policy, opportunities on the labour market for persons seeking employment.

59 Secondly, such an objective was expressly set out in the Tenth Additional Provision.

60 Thirdly, after the repeal, in the course of 2001, of the Tenth Additional Provision, and following signature by the Spanish Government and employers' and trade union organisations of the Declaration for Social Dialogue 2004 relating to competitiveness, stable employment and social cohesion, the Spanish legislature reintroduced the compulsory retirement mechanism by Law 14/2005. The aim of Law 14/2005 itself is to create opportunities in the labour market for persons seeking employment. Its single article thus makes it possible, in collective agreements, to include clauses authorising the termination of an employment contract on the ground that the worker has reached retirement age, provided that that measure is 'linked to objectives which are consistent with employment policy and are set out in the collective agreement', such as 'the conversion of temporary contracts into permanent contracts [or] the recruitment of new workers'.

61 In that context, and given the numerous disputes concerning the repercussions of repeal of the Tenth Additional Provision on compulsory retirement clauses contained in collective agreements concluded under Law 8/1980, both in its original version and that approved by Royal Legislative Decree 1/1995, together with the ensuing legal uncertainty for the social partners, the single transitional provision of Law 14/2005 confirmed that it was possible to set an age-limit for compulsory retirement in accordance with those collective agreements.

62 Thus, placed in its context, the single transitional provision was aimed at regulating the national labour market, in particular, for the purposes of checking unemployment.

63 That assessment is further reinforced by the fact that, in this case, the third paragraph of Article 19 of the collective agreement expressly mentions the 'interests of promoting employment' as an objective of the measure established by that provision.

64 The legitimacy of such an aim of public interest cannot reasonably be called into question, since employment policy and labour market trends are among the objectives expressly laid down in the first subparagraph of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 and, in accordance with the first indent of the first paragraph of Article 2 EU and Article 2 EC, the promotion of a high level of employment is one of the ends pursued both by the European Union and the European Community.

65 Furthermore, the Court has already held that encouragement of recruitment undoubtedly constitutes a legitimate aim of social policy (see, in particular, Case C-208/05 ITC [2007] ECR I-181, paragraph 39) and that assessment must evidently apply to instruments of national employment policy designed to improve opportunities for entering the labour market for certain categories of workers.

66 Therefore, an objective such as that referred to by the legislation at issue must, in principle, be regarded as 'objectively and reasonably' justifying 'within the context of national law', as provided for by the first subparagraph of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78, a difference in treatment on grounds of age laid down by the Member States.

67 It remains to be determined whether, in accordance with the terms of that provision, the means employed to achieve such a legitimate aim are 'appropriate and necessary'.

68 It should be recalled in this context that, as Community law stands at present, the Member States and, where appropriate, the social partners at national level enjoy broad discretion in their choice, not only to pursue a particular aim in the field of social and employment policy, but also in the definition of measures capable of achieving it (see, to that effect, Case C-144/04 Mangold [2005] ECR I-9981, paragraph 63).

69 As is already clear from the wording, 'specific provisions which may vary in accordance with the situation in Member States', in recital 25 in the preamble to Directive 2000/78, such is the case as regards the choice which the national authorities concerned may be led to make on the basis of political, economic, social, demographic and/or budgetary considerations and having regard to the actual situation in the labour market in a particular Member State, to prolong people's working life or, conversely, to provide for early retirement.

70 Furthermore, the competent authorities at national, regional or sectoral level must have the possibility available of altering the means used to attain a legitimate aim of public interest, for example by adapting them to changing circumstances in the employment situation in the Member State concerned. The fact that the compulsory retirement procedure was reintroduced in Spain after being repealed for several years is accordingly of no relevance.

71 It is, therefore, for the competent authorities of the Member States to find the right balance between the different interests involved. However, it is important to ensure that the national measures laid down in that context do not go beyond what is appropriate and necessary to achieve the aim pursued by the Member State concerned.

72 It does not appear unreasonable for the authorities of a Member State to take the view that a measure such as that at issue in the main proceedings may be appropriate and necessary in order to achieve a legitimate aim in the context of national employment policy, consisting in the promotion of full employment by facilitating access to the labour market.

73 Furthermore, the measure cannot be regarded as unduly prejudicing the legitimate claims of workers subject to compulsory retirement because they have reached the age-limit provided for; the relevant legislation is not based only on a specific age, but also takes account of the fact that the persons concerned are entitled to financial compensation by way of a retirement pension at the end of their working life, such as that provided for by the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings, the level of which cannot be regarded as unreasonable.

74 Moreover, the relevant national legislation allows the social partners to opt, by way of collective agreements — and therefore with considerable flexibility — for application of the compulsory retirement mechanism so that due account may be taken not only of the overall situation in the labour market concerned, but also of the specific features of the jobs in question.

75 In the light of those factors, it cannot reasonably be maintained that national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings is incompatible with the requirements of Directive 2000/78.

76 Given the foregoing interpretation of Directive 2000/78, there is no need for the Court to give a ruling in relation to Article 13 EC — also referred to in the first question — on the basis of which that directive was adopted.

77 In the light of all the foregoing considerations, the answer to the first question must be that the prohibition on any discrimination on grounds of age, as implemented by Directive 2000/78, must be interpreted as not precluding national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, pursuant to which compulsory retirement clauses contained in collective agreements are lawful where such clauses provide as sole requirements that workers must have reached retirement age, set at 65 by national law, and must have fulfilled the conditions set out in the social security legislation for entitlement to a retirement pension under their contribution regime, where

— the measure, although based on age, is objectively and reasonably justified in the context of national law by a legitimate aim relating to employment policy and the labour market, and — it is not apparent that the means put in place to achieve that aim of public interest are inappropriate and unnecessary for the purpose.

The second question

78 In view of the answer in the negative given to the first question of the referring court, it is unnecessary to answer the second question.

Costs

79 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Grand Chamber) hereby rules:

The prohibition on any discrimination on grounds of age, as implemented by Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, must be interpreted as not precluding national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings, pursuant to which compulsory retirement clauses contained in collective agreements are lawful where such clauses provide as sole requirements that workers must have reached retirement age, set at 65 by national law, and must have fulfilled the conditions set out in the social security legislation for entitlement to a retirement pension under their contribution regime, where

— the measure, although based on age, is objectively and reasonably justified in the context of national law by a legitimate aim relating to employment policy and the labour market, and — the means put in place to achieve that aim of public interest do not appear to be inappropriate and unnecessary for the purpose.

having decided, after hearing the Advocate General, to proceed to judgment without an Opinion,

gives the following

Judgment

1 These references for a preliminary ruling concern the interpretation of Article 6(1) of Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ 2000 L 303, p. 16).

2 The references have been made in proceedings between Mr Fuchs and Mr Köhler, respectively, and the Land Hessen concerning their retirement at the age of 65.

Legal context

European Union ('EU') law

Directive 2000/78

3 Recitals 8, 9 and 11 in the preamble to Directive 2000/78 provide:

'(8) The Employment Guidelines for 2000 agreed by the European Council at Helsinki on 10 and 11 December 1999 stress the need to foster a labour market favourable to social integration by formulating a coherent set of policies aimed at combating discrimination against groups such as persons with disability. They also emphasise the need to pay particular attention to supporting older workers, in order to increase their participation in the labour force.

(9) Employment and occupation are key elements in guaranteeing equal opportunities for all and contribute strongly to the full participation of citizens in economic, cultural and social life and to realising their potential.

(11) Discrimination based on … age … may undermine the achievement of the objectives of the [EU] Treaty, in particular the attainment of a high level of employment and social protection, raising the standard of living and the quality of life, economic and social cohesion and solidarity, and the free movement of persons.'

4 Recital 25 in Directive 2000/78 states:

'The prohibition of age discrimination is an essential part of meeting the aims set out in the Employment Guidelines and encouraging diversity in the workforce. However, differences in treatment in connection with age may be justified under certain circumstances and therefore require specific provisions which may vary in accordance with the situation in Member States. It is therefore essential to distinguish between differences in treatment which are justified, in particular by legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and discrimination which must be prohibited.'

5 Article 1 of Directive 2000/78 states that its 'purpose … is to lay down a general framework for combating discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation as regards employment and occupation, with a view to putting into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment'.

6 Article 2(1) and (2)(a) of Directive 2000/78 provides:

'1. For the purposes of this Directive, the "principle of equal treatment" shall mean that there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination whatsoever on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1.

2. For the purposes of paragraph 1:

(a) direct discrimination shall be taken to occur where one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation, on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1'.

7 Article 3(1) of Directive 2000/78, headed 'Scope', provides:

'Within the limits of the areas of competence conferred on the Community, this Directive shall apply to all persons, as regards both the public and private sectors, including public bodies, in relation to:

(c) employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay;

...'.

8 Article 6(1) and (2) of Directive 2000/78 provides:

'1. Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that differences of treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination, if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary.

Such differences of treatment may include, among others:

(a) the setting of special conditions on access to employment and vocational training, employment and occupation, including dismissal and remuneration conditions, for young people, older workers and persons with caring responsibilities in order to promote their vocational integration or ensure their protection;

(b) the fixing of minimum conditions of age, professional experience or seniority in service for access to employment or to certain advantages linked to employment;

(c) the fixing of a maximum age for recruitment which is based on the training requirements of the post in question or the need for a reasonable period of employment before retirement.

2. Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that the fixing for occupational social security schemes of ages for admission or entitlement to retirement or invalidity benefits, including the fixing under those schemes of different ages for employees or groups or categories of employees, and the use, in the context of such schemes, of age criteria in actuarial calculations, does not constitute discrimination on the grounds of age, provided this does not result in discrimination on the grounds of sex.'

National legislation

9 The Federal legislature transposed Directive 2000/78 into German law by the General Law on equal treatment (Allgemeines Gleichbehandlungsgesetz) of 14 August 2006 (BGBl. 2006 I, p. 1897), as amended by Paragraph 15(66) of the Law of 5 February 2009 (BGB1. 2009 I, p. 160).

10 The Federal legislature adopted the provisions relating to the retirement of permanent civil servants of the Länder and municipalities set out in Paragraph 25 of the Federal Law governing the legal status of civil servants of the Länder (Beamtenstatusgesetz) of 17 June 2008 (BGBl. 2008 I, p. 1010), as amended by Paragraph 15(16) of the Law of 5 February 2009 (BGBl. 2009 I, p. 160), in the following terms:

'Permanent civil servants shall retire on reaching the retirement age.'

11 That provision does not itself determine that retirement age, but leaves it to the Länder to do so.

12 Paragraph 50 of the Law on the civil service of the Land Hessen (Hessisches Beamtengesetz), as amended by the Law of 14 December 2009 ('HBG'), sets the compulsory retirement age for civil servants of the Land Hessen as follows:

'(1) Permanent civil servants shall retire at the end of the month in which they reach the age of 65 (age limit).

(2) In derogation from subparagraph 1, the following provisions shall apply to the permanent civil servants listed below:

1. Public school teaching staff shall retire at the end of the last month of the school year in which they reach the age of 65;

2. Professors, university or college lecturers, members of the science or arts staff and teaching staff with special responsibilities in higher education establishments of the Land shall retire at the end of the last month of the semester in which they reach the age of 65;

(3) If it is in the interests of the service, retirement may, at the request of the civil servant concerned, be postponed beyond the age of 65 for periods of no more than one year, subject to an overall retirement age limit that shall not exceed 68. The decision shall be taken by the highest authority in the hierarchy or by such authority as it shall designate.'

13 The national court states that, until 1992, the continued employment of civil servants beyond retirement age was permitted if it was requested and not precluded by the interests of the service. From 1992, such continued employment was subject to the requirement that it should be in the interests of the service.

14 The HBG includes a special provision concerning the retirement age of civil servants appointed for a fixed term after being directly elected, such as mayors or local councillors. These are to retire on reaching the age of 71 if their term of office has not come to an end by that date.

15 At federal level, until 12 February 2009 the general retirement age applicable to civil servants was fixed at 65 years. Since that date the legislation has provided for that retirement age to be raised gradually to 67 years. At the material time as regards the main proceedings, similar provisions had been adopted in certain Länder but not in the Land Hessen.

16 Beyond the civil service, since 1 January 2008, Paragraph 35 of Book VI of the Code of social law (Sozialgesetzbuch, sechstes Buch), which applies to employed persons governed by private law, has also provided for the age at which a person is to be entitled to an old-age pension to be raised gradually to 67 years. Under transitional provisions, that age remains fixed at 65 years for persons born before 1 January 1947.

The disputes in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

17 The facts of the disputes in the main proceedings are virtually identical and the questions referred by the national court are the same.

18 The applicants in each of the main proceedings, Mr Fuchs and Mr Köhler, both born in 1944, worked as State prosecutors until they reached the age of 65 in 2009, the age at which they should normally have retired pursuant to Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG.

19 The applicants each applied to continue to work for a further year, pursuant to Paragraph 50(3) of the HBG.

20 The Ministry of Justice of the Land Hessen having rejected their applications on the grounds that it was not in the interests of the service for them to remain in post; the applicants in the main proceedings lodged an objection at the Ministry of Justice and also made an application for interim measures to the Verwaltungsgericht Frankfurt am Main (Frankfurt am Main Administrative Court) (Germany).

21 That court granted the applications for interim measures thus submitted, and ordered the Land Hessen to continue to employ Mr Fuchs and Mr Köhler. The decisions handed down by the Verwaltungsgericht Frankfurt am Main were, however, the subject of an appeal to the Hessischer Verwaltungsgerichtshof (Hessen Administrative Court) (Germany), which set aside the decisions and dismissed the applications for interim measures submitted by the applicants. Since 1 October 2009, the applicants have no longer been able to perform their duties as State prosecutors and have been paid a retirement pension.

22 As their objections were also dismissed by decisions of the Ministry of Justice of the Land Hessen, Mr Fuchs and Mr Köhler brought an action before the Verwaltungsgericht Frankfurt am Main against those decisions.

23 The Verwaltungsgericht Frankfurt am Main has doubts as to the compatibility of the retirement age set in respect of the duties of prosecutor with, in particular, Article 6 of Directive 2000/78. In its view, the compulsory retirement at the age of 65 of persons performing those duties constitutes discrimination on grounds of age, contrary to the provisions of Directive 2000/78.

24 The national court explains that the provision at issue was introduced at a time when the view was taken that fitness for work declines after that age. Current research shows that such fitness varies from one person to another. Furthermore, the increase in life expectancy had led the legislature to raise to 67 – for federal civil servants and private-sector employees – the general age limit for retirement and entitlement to a pension. The HBG provides, moreover, that civil servants appointed following an election may perform their duties until the age of 71.

25 According to the national court, it is apparent from the observations of the Land Hessen accompanying the HBG as applicable in 1962 that the HBG was intended to promote the employment of younger people and thus to ensure an appropriate age structure. Such an aim does not, however, according to that court, constitute objective justification, for there is not under national law a sufficiently precise criterion for the definition of an age structure that could be described as favourable or unfavourable. Nor does such an aim serve the public interest; it serves the individual interest of the employer. In any event, the Land Hessen has not described what it regards as the appropriate nature of or reasons for the age structure. The figures it has provided establish that a significant proportion of the public ministry's staff already comprises young people. The national court adds that recent studies show that there is no correlation between the compulsory retirement of persons who have reached the age limit and younger persons entering the profession. The national court also queries whether the figures which relate to the Land Hessen alone and, within that Land, to civil servants governed by public law, who represent only a small fraction of the staff of that Land and of the employees of the Member State concerned, are capable of demonstrating the existence of an aim in the public interest, and whether such an aim needs to be placed at a higher level, notably that of all civil servants and staff of the Land Hessen, or even of all civil servants and staff of that Member State.

26 The national court adds that the retirement of prosecutors does not always result in a recruitment exercise to fill newly-vacated posts. In this way, it suggests, the Land Hessen is endeavouring to make budgetary savings.

27 In addition, certain measures lack coherence. This applies in particular to the possibility of keeping an employee in post until the age of 68 notwithstanding an irrebuttable presumption that he is unfit for service from the age of 65, the restriction of voluntary retirement before the age of 65 and the raising of the retirement age already provided for in certain legislative texts.

28 In those circumstances the national court decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Are the rules laid down in the [HBG] on the compulsory retirement age for civil servants based on an aim in the public interest in accordance with standards of [EU] law?

The following main questions arise in this respect:

– What specific requirements in [EU] law should such an aim prescribed in the public interest satisfy? What additional issues relating to the clarification of the facts of the case should the referring court consider?

– Does an interest in saving budgetary resources and labour costs, in the present context by avoiding the recruitment of new staff and so reducing expenditure on personnel, represent a legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 …?

– Can an employer's aim of enjoying a degree of planning certainty as regards the retirement of civil servants be recognised as a legitimate aim in the public interest, even if every employer governed by the [HBG] or the [Federal Law on the status of civil servants of the Länder] may develop and implement staff management ideas of his own?

– Can an interest in a "favourable age stratification" or "favourable age structure" be recognised as an aim in the public interest, despite the absence of general standards or statutory rules on what constitutes a correct age stratification or age structure?

– Can an interest in creating opportunities for the promotion of civil servants already in place be regarded as a legitimate aim in the public interest within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 …?

– Does the adoption of rules on retirement ages to preclude individual legal disputes with older employees over their continued fitness for service constitute the pursuit of a legitimate aim in the public interest?

– Does the reference to the public interest within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 … presuppose a labour market policy concept extending beyond individual employers in the area of employment, and if so, how uniform and binding must it be?

– Is it in fact possible for individual employers to pursue aims in the public interest for groups of employees, limited here to civil servants governed by the [HBG], with retirement age rules of such limited scope?

– Under what conditions can the aim, which can be pursued by individual employers, but is not mandatory, of occupying posts vacated by retired employees with new recruits, where necessary after existing employees have been promoted, be regarded as being in the public interest within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 …? Must the reference to the public interest be backed not only by general claims that the rules serve that purpose, but also by statistics or other findings from which it can be inferred that such an aim is sufficiently serious and can actually be achieved?

2. (a) What specific requirements should be satisfied by the reasonableness and suitability of a retirement age arrangement within the meaning of the rules laid down in the [HBG]?

(b) Are more thorough investigations needed to determine the ratio of the – probable – number of civil servants remaining in service voluntarily after retirement age to the number who wish to receive a full pension on reaching retirement age, if not earlier, and therefore certainly want to leave the service? Would it not be appropriate in this respect to give voluntary retirement preference over compulsory retirement, provided that arrangements are made for pensions to be reduced where they are taken before the set retirement age is reached so as to preclude unreasonable pension budget spending and associated labour costs (voluntary departure rather than compulsion as the more appropriate and, in effect, hardly less suitable arrangement)?

(c) Can it be deemed reasonable and necessary to assume it to be irrefutable that all civil servants cease to be fit for service on reaching a given higher age, such as 65 years in this case, and so automatically to terminate their employment as civil servants at that age?

(d) Is it reasonable for the possibility of remaining employed in the civil service at least until the age of 68 years to be entirely dependent on the employer having special interests, but for employment in the civil service to be terminated with no legal possibility of securing reappointment where no such interests exist?

(e) Does a retirement age arrangement which leads to compulsory retirement, rather than being confined to specifying the conditions for entitlement to a full pension, as permitted under Article 6(2) of Directive 2000/78 …, result in an unreasonable devaluation of the interests of older people relative to the fundamentally no more valuable interests of younger people?

(f) If the aim of facilitating recruitment and/or promotion is deemed to be legitimate, what more precise requirements must actually be satisfied to demonstrate the extent to which such opportunities are actually seized by each employer taking advantage of the retirement age arrangement or by all employers, in and outside the general labour market, to whom the statutory arrangement applies?

(g) In view of the gaps already to be seen in the labour market owing to demographic trends and of the impending need for skilled staff of all kinds, including staff for the public service of the Federal German and Land governments, is it reasonable and necessary to force civil servants able and willing to continue working to retire from the civil service at a time when there will soon be a major demand for personnel which the labour market will hardly be able to meet? Will it possibly be necessary in the future to collect sectoral labour market data?

3. (a) What requirements need to be met as regards the coherence of Hessen's and possibly Federal German legislation on retirement ages?

(b) Can the relationship between Paragraph 50(1) and Paragraph 50(3) of the [HBG] be regarded as consistent if the possibility in principle of remaining in employment beyond retirement age depends entirely on the employer's interests?

(c) Should Paragraph 50(3) of the [HBG] possibly be interpreted to mean, in compliance with … Directive [2000/78], that, to preclude unreasonable discrimination on the grounds of age, employment must always continue unless service factors prevent this? What requirements should then be satisfied to prove the existence of any such factors? Must it be assumed in this respect that the interests of the service require continued employment if only because unjustifiable discrimination on the grounds of age would otherwise occur?

(d) How might advantage be taken of such an interpretation of Paragraph 50(3) of the [HBG] for a continuation or resumption of the applicant's employment as a civil servant, even though that employment has meanwhile been terminated? Should, in that case, Paragraph 50(1) of the [HBG] remain inapplicable at least until the age of 68 years?

(e) Is it reasonable and necessary, on the one hand, to impede the taking of voluntary retirement at the age of 60 or 63 years, with a permanent reduction in pension, and, on the other hand, to rule out the voluntary continuation of employment after the age of 65 years unless the employer has, by way of exception, a special interest in its continuation?

(f) Do the rules on retirement ages laid down in Paragraph 50(1) of the [HBG] cease to be reasonable and necessary as a result of the more favourable rules on part-time work on the grounds of age on the one hand and fixed-term civil servants on the other?

(g) What significance for coherence can be attributed to the various rules laid down in employment (public and private sector) and social insurance law which, first, are seeking permanently to raise the age at which a full pension can be drawn, second, prohibit the termination of employment on the grounds that the age specified for the standard retirement pension has been reached and, third, make it compulsory for employment to terminate when that precise age is reached?

(h) Is it relevant to coherence that the gradual raising of retirement ages in the social insurance and civil service law relating to the Federal German authorities and some Länder primarily serves the interests of employees in delaying as long as possible the need to meet the more stringent requirements for a full retirement pension? Are these questions insignificant because retirement ages have not yet been raised for civil servants governed by the [HBG], although this is due to become effective in the near future in the case of employees in employment relationships?'

29 By order of the President of the Court of 6 May 2010, Cases C−159/10 and C−160/10 were joined for the purposes of the written and oral procedures and of the judgment.

Consideration of the questions referred

30 The national court raises numerous queries, essentially grouped together into three questions, some of which relate to the interpretation of national law. In this regard, it must be borne in mind that the Court has no power, within the framework of Article 267 TFEU, to give preliminary rulings on the interpretation of rules pertaining to national law. The jurisdiction of the Court is confined to considering provisions of EU law only (see, in particular, Case C−222/04 Cassa di Risparmio di Firenze and Others [2006] ECR I−289, paragraph 63).

31 The questions raised must therefore be answered in the light of that limitation.

The first question

32 By its first question the national court asks, in essence, whether Directive 2000/78 precludes a law, such as the HBG, which provides for the compulsory retirement of permanent civil servants – in this instance prosecutors – at the age of 65, subject to the possibility that they may continue to work, if it is in the interests of the service, until the maximum age of 68, if that law has one or more of the following aims: the creation of a 'favourable age structure', planning of staff departures, promotion of civil servants, prevention of disputes or achieving budgetary savings.

33 It is common ground that the termination of contracts of employment of civil servants of the Land Hessen, in particular of prosecutors, when they reach the age at which they are entitled to a full pension, namely at the age of 65, constitutes a difference of treatment on grounds of age for the purposes of Article 6(1)(a) of Directive 2000/78.

34 A provision such as Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG affects employment and working conditions, within the meaning of Article 3(1)(c) of Directive 2000/78, by preventing the prosecutors concerned from continuing to work beyond the age of 65. Furthermore, by ensuring that they are treated less favourably than persons who have not reached that age, Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG introduces a difference of treatment directly based on age for the purposes of Article 2(1) of Directive 2000/78.

35 Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 states that a difference of treatment on grounds of age does not constitute discrimination if, within the context of national law, it is objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary.

36 In order to answer the question raised, it is necessary, therefore, to determine whether that provision is justified by a legitimate aim and whether the means put in place to achieve it are appropriate and necessary.

Whether there is a legitimate aim

37 The Court must begin by considering the consequences of the absence of any specific mention in the HBG of the aim pursued, the consequences arising from an alteration of that aim and its context, and also whether or not it is possible to rely on several aims.

38 It is apparent from the order for reference, first of all, that the HBG does not clearly state the aim pursued by Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG, which sets the retirement age of civil servants at 65.

39 In that regard, the Court has repeatedly held that it cannot be inferred from

Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 that the lack of precision in the legislation at issue as regards the aim pursued automatically excludes the possibility that it may be justified under that provision. In the absence of such precision, it is important that other elements, taken from the general context of the measure concerned, enable the underlying aim of that measure to be identified for the purposes of review by the courts of whether it is legitimate and whether the means put in place to achieve it are appropriate and necessary (Case C-411/05 Palacios de la Villa [2007] ECR I-8531, paragraphs 56 and 57; Case C-341/08 Petersen [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraph 40; and Case C-45/09 Rosenbladt [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraph 58).

40 With regard to the modification of the aim pursued, it is apparent from the order for reference that, originally, Paragraph 50 of the HBG was based on the irrebuttable presumption that a person is unfit to work beyond the age of 65. At the hearing, however, the representatives of the Land Hessen and the German Government emphasised that that presumption should no longer be regarded as underpinning the retirement age, and that the legislature had accepted that people can be fit to work beyond that age.

41 It must be concluded, in that regard, that a change in the context of a law leading to an alteration of the aim of that law does not, by itself, preclude that law from pursuing a legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.

42 Circumstances can change and the law may nevertheless be preserved for other reasons.

43 Thus, in the main proceedings in this instance, in addition to the change regarding the perception of fitness to work beyond the age of 65, the aspect referred to by the national court – that the age limit was introduced during a period of full employment and then maintained during a period of unemployment – could indeed have led to an alteration of the aim pursued, without thereby preventing that aim from being legitimate.

44 As regards reliance on several aims at the same time, it may be seen from the case-law that the coexistence of a number of aims does not preclude the existence of a legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.

45 That was the case in Rosenbladt, in which the Court held, in paragraphs 43 and 45 of its judgment, that aims such as those relied on by the German Government could be regarded as being among the aims referred to in Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.

46 The aims relied on may be linked to another (see, to that effect, Joined Cases C-250/09 and C-268/09 Georgiev [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraphs 45, 46 and 68) or classed in order of importance as in Petersen, in which, as can be seen from paragraphs 41 and 65 of that judgment, the German Government relied principally on one aim and, in the alternative, on another.

The aims relied on by the national court

47 According to the national court, the aim of Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG is, inter alia, the creation of a 'favourable age structure', which is achieved by the simultaneous presence within the profession at issue – that of prosecutors – of young employees at the start of their careers and older employees at a more advanced stage of theirs. The Land Hessen and the German Government submit that that is the principal aim of that provision. The obligation to retire at the age of 65 is, in their submission, designed to establish a balance between the generations, in addition to which the national court refers to three further aims: efficient planning of the departure and recruitment of staff, encouraging the recruitment and promotion of young people, and avoiding disputes relating to employees' ability to perform their duties beyond the age of 65.

48 The Land Hessen and the German Government maintain that the presence within the relevant civil service of staff of different ages also helps to ensure that the experience of older staff is passed on to younger colleagues and that younger staff share recently acquired knowledge, thus contributing to the provision of a high-quality public justice service.

49 It must be noted that, according to the case-law, encouragement of recruitment undoubtedly constitutes a legitimate aim of Member States' social or employment policy, in particular when the promotion of access of young people to a profession is involved (Georgiev, paragraph 45). The Court has, moreover, held that the mix of different generations of employees can also contribute to the quality of the activities carried out, inter alia by promoting the exchange of experience (see, to that effect, in relation to teaching staff and researchers, Georgiev, paragraph 46).

50 In the same way, it must be concluded that the aim of establishing an age structure that balances young and older civil servants in order to encourage the recruitment and promotion of young people, to improve personnel management and thereby to prevent possible disputes concerning employees' fitness to work beyond a certain age, while at the same time seeking to provide a high-quality justice service, can constitute a legitimate aim of employment and labour market policy.

51 The national court is, however, uncertain whether a measure such as Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG does not meet the interests of the employer rather than the public interest. In particular, it raises the issue whether the measures adopted by a single Land in respect of some of its staff, in this instance permanent civil servants, including prosecutors, do not cover too limited a group to constitute a measure pursuing an aim in the public interest.

52 The Court has held that the aims that may be considered 'legitimate' within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 are aims having a public interest nature distinguishable from purely individual reasons particular to the employer's situation, such as cost reduction or improving competitiveness, although it cannot be ruled out that a national rule may recognise, in the pursuit of those legitimate aims, a certain degree of flexibility for employers (see, to that effect, Case C-388/07 Age Concern England [2009] ECR I-1569, paragraph 46).

53 It must be observed that aims such as those referred to in paragraph 50 of the present judgment, which take into account the interests of all civil servants concerned, in the context of concerns relating to employment and labour market policy, in order to ensure a high-quality public service – in this instance that of justice – may be regarded as aims of public interest.

54 The Court has held, moreover, that it must be possible for the competent authorities at national, regional or sectoral level to alter the means used to attain a legitimate aim of public interest, for example by adapting them to changing circumstances in the employment situation in the Member State concerned (Palacios de la Villa, paragraph 70).

55 Thus, the fact that a provision is adopted at regional level does not prevent its pursuing a legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78. In a State such as the Federal Republic of Germany, the legislature may take the view that, in the interests of all the persons concerned, it is for the Länder rather than the Federal authorities to adopt certain legislative measures covered by that provision, such as the retirement age of permanent civil servants.

56 Retirement that is, in principle, compulsory at the age of 65, as laid down in Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG, must nevertheless also be appropriate and necessary.

57 As regards the appropriateness of such a measure, the Land Hessen and the German Government submit that the number of posts, particularly prosecutors' posts, available in the civil service is limited, particularly at the most senior levels. In the face of budgetary constraints, the opportunity of creating new posts is limited. They explain that prosecutors, like all civil servants, are appointed permanently and only rarely resign from their posts voluntarily and prematurely. Thus, the setting of a compulsory retirement age for prosecutors is the only means of ensuring that employment is distributed fairly among the generations.

58 The Court has already accepted in connection with professions in which the number of posts available was limited that retirement at an age laid down by law facilitated access to employment by younger people (see to that effect, in relation to panel dentists, Petersen, paragraph 70, and, in relation to university professors, Georgiev, paragraph 52).

59 As regards the profession of prosecutor in Germany, it is apparent that access to that profession is limited by the requirement that members should have obtained a special qualification entailing the successful completion of a course of study and a traineeship. In addition, the entry of young people into the profession could be restricted owing to the fact that the civil servants concerned are appointed permanently.

60 That being the case, it does not appear unreasonable for the competent authorities of a Member State to take the view that a measure such as Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG can secure the aim of putting in place a balanced age structure in order to facilitate planning of staff departures, ensure the promotion of civil servants, particularly the younger ones among them, and prevent disputes that might arise on retirement.

61 It must be borne in mind that the Member States enjoy broad discretion in the definition of measures capable of achieving that aim (see, to that effect, Palacios de la Villa, paragraph 68).

62 However, the Member States may not frustrate the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age set out in Directive 2000/78. That prohibition must be read in the light of the right to engage in work recognised in Article 15(1) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.

63 It follows that particular attention must be paid to the participation of older workers in the labour force and thus in economic, cultural and social life. Keeping older workers in the labour force promotes diversity in the workforce, which is an aim recognised in recital 25 in Directive 2000/78; moreover, it contributes to the realising of their potential and to the quality of life of the workers concerned, in accordance with the concerns of the European Union legislature set out in recitals 8, 9 and 11 in that directive.

64 However, the interest represented by the continued employment of those persons must be taken into account in respecting other, potentially divergent interests. Those who have reached the age at which they are entitled to a retirement pension may wish to avail themselves of it and to leave work with the benefit of that pension, instead of continuing to work. Furthermore, clauses on automatic termination of the employment contracts of employees who reach retirement age could, in the interests of sharing work among the generations, promote the entry of young workers into the labour force.

65 Therefore, in defining their social policy on the basis of political, economic, social, demographic and/or budgetary considerations, the national authorities concerned may be led to choose to prolong people's working life or, conversely, to provide for early retirement (see Palacios de la Villa, paragraphs 68 and 69). The Court has held that it is for those authorities to find the right balance between the different interests involved, while ensuring that they do not go beyond what is appropriate and necessary to achieve the legitimate aim pursued (see, to that effect, Palacios de la Villa, paragraphs 69 and 71, and also Rosenbladt, paragraph 44).

66 In that regard, the Court has accepted that a measure that allows for the compulsory retirement of workers when they reach the age of 65 can meet the aim of encouraging recruitment and be regarded as not unduly prejudicing the legitimate claims of the workers concerned, if those workers are entitled to a pension the level of which cannot be regarded as unreasonable (see, to that effect, Palacios de la Villa, paragraph 73). The Court has also held, in regard to a measure requiring the automatic termination of employment contracts at that age, in a sector in which, according to the national court, that measure was liable to cause significant financial hardship to the worker concerned, that that measure did not go beyond what was necessary to achieve the desired aims, in particular the encouragement of recruitment. The Court took into account the fact that the worker was eligible for payment of a pension while at the same time remaining in the labour market and enjoying protection from discrimination on grounds of age (see, to that effect, Rosenbladt, paragraphs 73 to 76).

67 In the present cases in the main proceedings, it is apparent from the documents before the Court that prosecutors retire, as a rule, at the age of 65 on a full pension equivalent to approximately 72% of their final salary. Furthermore, Paragraph 50(3) of the HBG provides for the possibility of prosecutors working for a further three years until the age of 68 if they so request and if it is in the interests of the service. Finally, national law does not prevent prosecutors from exercising another professional activity, such as that of legal adviser, with no age limit.

68 Taking those matters into account, it must be held that a measure which provides for prosecutors to retire when they reach the age of 65, as laid down under Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG, does not go beyond what is necessary to achieve the aim of establishing a balanced age structure in order to encourage the recruitment and promotion of young people, to improve personnel management and thereby to prevent possible disputes concerning employees' fitness to work beyond a certain age.

69 It must further be noted that the national court also asks the Court of Justice about the legitimacy, in the light of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78, of the aim of achieving budgetary savings.

70 The Land Hessen and the German Government have stated, however, that in their view Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG does not pursue such an aim. According to the Land Hessen, the fact that certain permanent civil servants – in this instance prosecutors – were not replaced is accounted for by the fact that they were appointed in response to an exceptional increase in particular litigation at a particular time. The Land Hessen comments that, leaving those cuts aside, the number of prosecutors has increased since 2006.

71 It is for the national court to ascertain whether the aim of achieving budgetary savings is one that is pursued by the HBG.

72 It should be borne in mind that questions on the interpretation of EU law referred by a national court in the factual and legislative context which that court is responsible for defining, and the accuracy of which is not a matter for the Court to determine, enjoy a presumption of relevance (see, in particular, Joined Cases C−188/10 and C−189/10 Melki and Abdeli [2010] ECR I−0000, paragraph 27 and the case-law cited). In the present case, since it is not altogether obvious that the interpretation of EU law that is sought bears no relation to the actual facts of the main action or its purpose, or that the problem is hypothetical, the Court must answer the question put forward.

73 As is apparent from paragraph 65 of the present judgment, in the context of the adoption of measures relating to retirement, EU law does not preclude the Member States from taking account of budgetary considerations at the same time as political, social or demographic considerations, provided that in so doing they observe, in particular, the general principle of the prohibition of age discrimination.

74 In that regard, while budgetary considerations can underpin the chosen social policy of a Member State and influence the nature or extent of the measures that the Member State wishes to adopt, such considerations cannot in themselves constitute a legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.

75 In the light of the foregoing, the answer to the first question is that Directive 2000/78 does not preclude a law, such as the HBG, which provides for the compulsory retirement of permanent civil servants – in this instance prosecutors – at the age of 65, while allowing them to continue to work, if it is in the interests of the service that they should do so, until the maximum age of 68, provided that that law has the aim of establishing a balanced age structure in order to encourage the recruitment and promotion of young people, to improve personnel management and thereby to prevent possible disputes concerning employees' fitness to work beyond a certain age, and that it allows that aim to be achieved by appropriate and necessary means.

76 By its second question the national court asks, in essence, what information must be produced by the Member State in order to demonstrate the appropriateness and necessity of the measure at issue in the main proceedings and, in particular, whether statistics or precise data with figures must be supplied.

77 It is clear from paragraph 51 of Age Concern England that mere generalisations indicating that a measure is likely to contribute to employment policy, labour market or vocational training objectives are not enough to show that the aim of that measure is capable of derogating from the principle of non-discrimination on grounds of age and do not constitute evidence on the basis of which it could reasonably be considered that the means chosen are likely to achieve that aim.

78 The Court has also pointed out, in paragraph 67 of that judgment, that Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 imposes on Member States the burden of establishing to a high standard of proof the legitimacy of the aim relied on as a justification.

79 According to recital 15 in Directive 2000/78, the appreciation of the facts from which it may be inferred that there has been discrimination is a matter for national judicial or other competent bodies, in accordance with rules of national law or practice. Such rules may provide in particular for indirect discrimination to be established by any means, including on the basis of statistical evidence.

80 In order to assess the degree of accuracy of the evidence required, it must be borne in mind that the Member States enjoy broad discretion in the choice of measure they consider appropriate.

81 That choice may, therefore, be based on economic, social, demographic and/or budgetary considerations, which include existing and verifiable data but also forecasts which, by their nature, may prove to be inaccurate and are thus to some extent inherently uncertain. The measure in question may, moreover, be based on political considerations, which will often involve a compromise between a number of possible solutions and, again, cannot with certainty lead to the expected result.

82 It is for the national court to assess, according to the rules of national law, the probative value of the evidence adduced, which may, inter alia, include statistical evidence.

83 Consequently, the answer to the second question is that, in order for it to be demonstrated that the measure concerned is appropriate and necessary, the measure must not appear unreasonable in the light of the aim pursued and must be supported by evidence the probative value of which it is for the national court to assess.

The third question

84 By its third question the national court queries the coherence of a law such as the HBG. Specifically, it raises the question, in essence, whether that law is inconsistent in compelling prosecutors to retire on reaching the age of 65, when (i) it allows them to continue to work until the age of 68 if it is in the interests of the service for them to do so; (ii) it seeks to restrict voluntary retirement at the age of 60 or 63 by a reduction in that case of pension rights; and (iii) the laws applicable to the civil service at Federal level and in a number of other Länder and also the Code of social law applicable to private sector employees provide for the age at which a person may retire on a full pension to be gradually raised from 65 to 67 years.

85 It must be observed, in accordance with settled case-law, that legislation is appropriate for ensuring attainment of the objective pursued only if it genuinely reflects a concern to attain it in a consistent and systematic manner (Case C−169/07 Hartlauer [2009] ECR I−1721, paragraph 55, and Petersen, paragraph 53).

86 Exceptions to the provisions of a law can, in certain cases, undermine the consistency of that law, in particular where their scope is such that they lead to a result contrary to the objective pursued by that law (see, to that effect, Petersen, paragraph 61).

87 With regard to the exception relating to the continued employment of a prosecutor until the age of 68, contained in Paragraph 50(3) of the HBG, it must be noted that this applies only if it is in the interests of the service and if the person concerned makes a request to that effect.

88 At the hearing, the Land Hessen indicated that that exception is intended to cover cases where a prosecutor reaches the age of 65 but has been allocated a criminal case in which proceedings have not yet been concluded. In order to avoid possible complications arising as a result of the replacement of the person concerned, the HBG provides, by way of exception, for him to be able to continue to perform his duties. The relevant administration might therefore regard it as preferable, in the interests of the service, to keep that prosecutor in post instead of appointing a replacement who would have to take on a case with which he was unfamiliar.

89 It must be held that such an exception is unlikely to undermine the aim pursued, namely that of guaranteeing a balanced age structure for the purposes of ensuring a high-quality service.

90 An exception of this kind can, on the other hand, mitigate the rigidity of a law, such as the HBG, in the interests of the civil service concerned. While departure and recruitment planning, owing to the automatic retirement of prosecutors when they reach the age of 65, contributes to the proper working of that service, the introduction, in that law, of the exception mentioned in paragraph 88 of the present judgment deals with specific situations in which the prosecutor's departure could be detrimental to the best possible accomplishment of the task conferred on him. In those circumstances, this exception is not incoherent in the light of the law in question.

91 It must be added that other exceptions in the HBG referred to by the national court, such as the continued employment of certain teaching staff for some additional months beyond the age of 65 so as to tie in with the end of a teaching period, or of certain elected persons to tie in with the end of their term of office, are similarly intended to ensure the accomplishment of tasks conferred on the persons concerned and appear no more likely to undermine the aim pursued.

92 According to the national court, another problem in terms of coherence arises from the fact that the HBG seeks to restrict the voluntary retirement of prosecutors who have reached the age of 60 or 63 by means of a provision reducing the amount of the pension granted in such cases, while Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG prevents them from continuing to work beyond the age of 65.

93 It must be observed that the problem of coherence raised by the national court has not been clearly established. A provision such as that referred to by the national court seems, on the contrary, to be the logical consequence of Paragraph 50(1) of the HBG. The implementation of such a provision, which involves planning for staff to retire at the age of 65, actually requires that exceptions to such departures should be limited. A provision reducing the amount of the pension is likely to deter or at least to restrict the early departures of prosecutors. Such a provision thus contributes to the attainment of the aim pursued and does not support the conclusion that the HBG lacks coherence.

94 The national court also refers to the gradual raising from 65 to 67 of the age at which a person may retire on a full pension, both under the law applicable to the civil service at Federal level and under laws adopted by a number of other Länder and also the Code of social law applicable to private sector employees. A similar increase was envisaged by the Land Hessen at the material time, but had not yet been adopted.

95 In that regard, the mere fact that, at a given point in time, the legislature envisages changing the law to raise the age at which a person may retire on a full pension does not mean that, from that point on, the existing law is unlawful. It must be acknowledged that any transition from one law to another will not be immediate but will take a certain amount of time.

96 As is apparent from recital 25 in Directive 2000/78, the pace of change can vary from one Member State to another to take account of the particular situation in those States. It can also differ from one region to another, in this instance from one Land to another, to take account of particular regional features and to enable the competent authorities to make the necessary adjustments.

97 It follows that the mere fact that a certain period of time may elapse between changes made to the law of one Member State or one Land and those made in another State or Land for the purpose of raising the age at which a person is entitled to retire on a full pension does not, by itself, mean that the legislation at issue lacks coherence.

98 Consequently, the answer to the third question is that a law such as the HBG, which provides for the compulsory retirement of prosecutors when they reach the age of 65, does not lack coherence merely because it allows them to work until the age of 68 in certain cases or also contains provisions intended to restrict retirement before the age of 65, and other legislation of the Member State concerned provides for certain – particularly elected – civil servants to remain in post beyond that age and also the gradual raising of the retirement age from 65 to 67 years.

Costs

99 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Second Chamber) hereby rules:

1. Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation does not preclude a law, such as the Law on the civil service of the Land Hessen (Hessisches Beamtengesetz), as amended by the Law of 14 December 2009, which provides for the compulsory retirement of permanent civil servants – in this instance prosecutors – at the age of 65, while allowing them to continue to work, if it is in the interests of the service that they should do so, until the maximum age of 68, provided that that law has the aim of establishing a balanced age structure in order to encourage the recruitment and promotion of young people, to improve personnel management and thereby to prevent possible disputes concerning employees' fitness to work beyond a certain age, and that it allows that aim to be achieved by appropriate and necessary means.

2. In order for it to be demonstrated that the measure concerned is appropriate and necessary, the measure must not appear unreasonable in the light of the aim pursued and must be supported by evidence the probative value of which it is for the national court to assess.

3. A law such as the Law on the civil service of the Land Hessen, as amended by the Law of 14 December 2009, which provides for the compulsory retirement of prosecutors when they reach the age of 65, does not lack coherence merely because it allows them to work until the age of 68 in certain cases or also contains provisions intended to restrict retirement before the age of 65, and other legislation of the Member State concerned provides for certain – particularly elected – civil servants to remain in post beyond that age and also the gradual raising of the retirement age from 65 to 67 years.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (Sixth Chamber)
19 November 2002 *

In Case C-188/00,

REFERENCE to the Court under Article 234 EC by the Verwaltungsgericht Karlsruhe (Germany) for a preliminary ruling in the proceedings pending before that court between

Bülent Kurz, né Yüce,

and

Land Baden-Württemberg,

on the interpretation of Article 6(1) and the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80 of 19 September 1980 on the development of the Association, adopted by the Association Council established by the Association Agreement between the European Economic Community and Turkey,

* Language of the case: German.

THE COURT (Sixth Chamber), composed of: R. Schintgen (Rapporteur), President of the Second Chamber, acting for the President of the Sixth Chamber, C. Gulmann, V. Skouris, F. Macken and N. Colneric, Judges, Advocate General: P. Léger,

Registrar: H. von Holstein, Deputy Registrar,

after considering the written observations submitted on behalf of:

— Mr Kurz, né Yüce, by I. Krebs, Rechtsanwältin, — Land Baden-Württemberg, by I. Behler, acting as Agent,

— the German Government, by W.-D. Plessing and B. Muttelsee-Schön, acting as Agents, — the Commission of the European Communities, by J. Sack, acting as Agent,

having regard to the Report for the Hearing, after hearing the oral observations of Mr Kurz, né Yüce, Land Baden-Württemberg and the Commission at the hearing on 21 February 2002, after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 25 April 2002,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By order of 22 March 2000, received at the Court on 22 May 2000, the Verwaltungsgericht Karlsruhe (Administrative Court, Karlsruhe) referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 234 EC five questions on the interpretation of Article 6(1) and the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80 of the Association Council of 19 September 1980 on the development of the Association ('Decision No 1/80'). The Association Council was set up by the Agreement establishing an Association between the European Economic Community and Turkey, signed at Ankara on 12 September 1963 by the Republic of Turkey and by the Member States of the EEC and the Community and concluded, approved and confirmed on behalf of the Community by Council Decision 64/732/EEC of 23 December 1963 (OJ 1973 C 113, p. 1).

2 Those questions were raised in proceedings between Mr Kurz, né Yüce, who is a Turkish national, and Land Baden-Württemberg concerning decisions by the latter rejecting his application for grant of a residence permit in Germany of unlimited duration, refusing to extend his temporary residence authorisation and ordering his expulsion from the territory of that Member State.

Decision No 1/80

3 Articles 6 and 7 of Decision No 1/80 are included in Section 1 ('Questions relating to employment and the free movement of workers') of Chapter II ('Social provisions') of that decision.

4 Article 6(1) is worded as follows:

'Subject to Article 7 on free access to employment for members of his family, a Turkish worker duly registered as belonging to the labour force of a Member State:

— shall be entitled in that Member State, after one year's legal employment, to the renewal of his permit to work for the same employer, if a job is available;

— shall be entitled in that Member State, after three years of legal employment and subject to the priority to be given to workers of Member States of the Community, to respond to another offer of employment, with an employer of his choice, made under normal conditions and registered with the employment services of that State, for the same occupation;

— shall enjoy free access in that Member State to any paid employment of his choice, after four years of legal employment.'

5 The second paragraph of Article 7 provides:

'Children of Turkish workers who have completed a course of vocational training in the host country may respond to any offer of employment there, irrespective of the length of time they have been resident in that Member State, provided one of their parents has been legally employed in the Member State concerned for at least three years.'

The main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

6 It is apparent from the documents in the main proceedings that Mr Kurz was born in Germany in 1977 as the illegitimate child of a Turkish migrant worker, Mr Yüce, who was legally employed in that Member State from 1969 to 1983.

7 From 1978 to 1984 he was placed in Germany with foster parents, Mr and Mrs Kurz, who were German nationals.

8 In 1984 he returned to Turkey with his natural parents under a repatriation assistance programme.

9 In September 1992 he was authorised to return to Germany in order to undergo vocational training. His entry visa and the successive temporary residence authorisations ('Aufenthaltsbewilligungen') which he obtained until 15 July 1997 stated that they were valid for the purposes of vocational training only.

10 Mr Kurz underwent training as a plumber in the host Member State, the conditions of which were laid down in a contract entered into on 16 November 1992 between him and Herbert Schulz GmbH ('Schulz'), a sanitary and heating equipment company established in Altlußheim (Germany).

11 During that training, which took place from 1 October 1992 to 5 May 1997, he attended theory classes at a vocational training establishment once or twice a week and spent the rest of the time working for Schulz by way of practical training, in return for which Schulz paid him a monthly wage of DEM 780 in the first year and DEM 840, DEM 940 and DEM 1 030 respectively in the following years.

12 On 22 February 1997 Mr Kurz passed the practical part of the final apprenticeship examination and, as agreed, terminated his training on 6 May 1997, without however having passed the theoretical part of that examination.

13 From 1992 he again lived with Mr and Mrs Kurz, who adopted him in May 1998. In accordance with the applicable national law, the adoption conferred on him the surname of his adoptive parents. However, according to the Verwaltungsgericht Karlsruhe, the adoption had the effect of bringing to an end his ties with his family of birth but did not entitle him either to German nationality or to authorisation to reside in Germany permanently.

14 On 7 July 1997 Mr Kurz applied for a residence permit ('Aufenthaltserlaubnis') allowing him to reside in Germany permanently and, in the alternative, for the extension of his temporary residence authorisation or the issue of a residence authorisation for humanitarian reasons ('Aufenthaltsbefugnis').

15 By decision of 18 August 1998, the Landratsamt Rhein-Neckar-Kreis (Rhine-Neckar District Administrator's Office) rejected his application of 7 July 1997 and ordered him to leave Germany within one month following notification of the refusal, stating that he would be deported if he failed to comply.

16 Mr Kurz lodged an administrative appeal against that decision and also requested that his appeal have suspensive effect.

17 That request was rejected on 19 November 1998 and Mr Kurz was deported to Turkey on 20 January 1999.

18 On 16 June 1999 the Regierungspräsidium Karlsruhe dismissed the administrative appeal on the ground that Mr Kurz did not fulfil the conditions laid down in Article 6 and the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80. First, he had not been duly registered as belonging to the labour force of a Member State, within the meaning of Article 6(1), during his vocational training, for which he obtained only a temporary residence authorisation. Second, his adoption by German nationals had taken away his status as child of a Turkish worker, he had not completed his vocational training in the host Member State since he had not passed all the tests in the final examination, and his biological father had left Germany for good at the time when he began his vocational training there.

19 Mr Kurz contended in support of the action challenging that decision which he brought before the Verwaltungsgericht Karlsruhe that Article 6(1) and the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80 entitled him to a residence authorisation in Germany. He also stated that he had been offered a job on 20 November 1998 by a business in Mannheim (Germany) but he had been unable to accept it in the absence of the requisite residence and work permits.

20 On 20 November 1999 Mr Kurz received a journeyman's certificate from the chamber of manual trades in Mannheim after the examining board had travelled to Istanbul to enable him to take the theoretical part of his final apprenticeship examination there.

21 According to the Verwaltungsgericht Karlsruhe, the decision of the Regierungspräsidium Karlsruhe of 16 June 1999 is consistent with the Ausländergesetz

(German Law on Aliens) but it should be established whether Mr Kurz was able to claim a right of residence on the basis of Article 6(1) and the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80.

22 The national court is uncertain whether Mr Kurz meets all the conditions laid down in Article 6(1) or, failing that, in the second paragraph of Article 7.

23 Should Mr Kurz be able to derive rights from Decision No 1/80, it considers that a further problem may arise with regard to Paragraph 8(2) of the Ausländergesetz which provides:

'An alien who has been expelled or deported may not re-enter Germany and reside there. He shall not be issued with a residence authorisation even where the conditions of entitlement under this Law are met. A time-limit shall as a rule, upon application, be placed on the effects referred to in the first and second sentences. The time-limit shall run from the time of leaving the country.'

24 The national court states that it should be decided whether it is compatible with Article 6 and the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80 for issue of a residence authorisation to be precluded by the prohibitive effect of the national provision cited in the preceding paragraph so long as no time-limit has been set with respect to deportation.

25 Since the Verwaltungsgericht took the view that, in those circumstances, an interpretation of Community law was necessary in order to decide the case, it resolved to stay proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Does a Turkish national who, with the approval of the competent authority for aliens, entered the country with a visa "valid only for the purpose of vocational training" issued by the Consulate General and who subsequently held a temporary residence authorisation restricted to vocational training activity with a specific employer fulfil the requirements of the first, second or third indent of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80... if, from 1 October 1992 to 5 May 1997, he was in the training relationship in question and received for that a monthly training remuneration?

(2) Does a Turkish national who is the child by birth of former Turkish workers in the host country fulfil the requirements of the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80... if he was adopted as an adult by German nationals with the effects of adoption of a minor and his kinship with his natural parents has thereby ceased to exist? Is it sufficient in that respect that he was the child of Turkish workers at the time of his parents' legal employment and at the start of his vocational training?

(3) Does a Turkish national fulfil the requirements of the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80... if, eight years after leaving the host country together with his parents who at that time were leaving definitively, he re-entered the country (without his parents) for the purpose of vocational training?

(4) Does a Turkish national fulfil the requirements of the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80... if he did not take the last part of the final examination in the host country, but in his country of origin before the host country's examining board which had travelled there?

(5) Is it compatible with Article 6 or the second paragraph of Article 7 of Decision No 1/80... that, in a case where deportation has taken place, residence authorisation must be refused, by virtue of the prohibitive effect of Paragraph 8(2) of the Ausländergesetz, until a time-limit has, upon application, been placed on the effects of the deportation?'

Question 1

26 The first point to be noted in answering this question is that, since the judgment in Case C-192/89 Sevince [1990] ECR I-3461, at paragraph 26, the Court has consistently held that Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80 has direct effect in the Member States and that Turkish nationals who satisfy its conditions may therefore rely directly on the rights which the three indents of that provision confer on them progressively, according to the duration of their employment in the host Member State (see, in particular, Case C-1/97 Birden [1998] ECR I-7747, paragraph 19).

27 Second, it is also settled case-law that the rights which that provision confers on Turkish workers in regard to employment necessarily imply the existence of a corresponding right of residence for the person concerned, since otherwise the right of access to the labour market and the right to work as an employed person would be deprived of all effect (see, inter alia, Birden, paragraph 20).

28 Third, it is apparent from the very wording of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80 that that provision requires the person concerned to be a Turkish worker in a Member State, to be duly registered as belonging to the labour force of the host Member State and to have been in legal employment there for a certain period (Birden, paragraph 21).

29 In order to give the national court a helpful answer, those three concepts should be examined in turn.

The concept of worker

30 As regards the first of the concepts, it should be recalled at the outset that the Court has consistently concluded from the wording of Article 12 of the EEC-Turkey Association Agreement of 12 September 1963 and Article 36 of the Additional Protocol, signed on 23 November 1970, annexed to that agreement and concluded by Council Regulation (EEC) No 2760/72 of 19 December 1972 (OJ 1973 C 113, p. 18), as well as from the objective of Decision No 1/80, that the principles enshrined in Articles 48 and 49 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Articles 39 EC and 40 EC) and Article 50 of the EC Treaty (now Article 41 EC) must be extended, so far as possible, to Turkish nationals who enjoy the rights conferred by Decision No 1/80 (see to that effect, inter alia, Case C-434/93 Bozkurt [1995] ECR I-1475, paragraphs 14, 19 and 20; Case C-171/95 Tetik [1997] ECR I-329, paragraphs 20 and 28; Birden, paragraph 23; and Case C-340/97 Nazli [2000] ECR I-957, paragraphs 50 to 55).

31 Reference should consequently be made to the interpretation of the concept of worker under Community law for the purposes of determining the scope of the same concept employed in Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80.

32 In that respect, it is settled case-law that the concept of worker has a specific Community meaning and must not be interpreted narrowly. It must be defined in accordance with objective criteria which distinguish an employment relationship by reference to the rights and duties of the persons concerned. In order to be treated as a worker, a person must pursue an activity which is genuine and effective, to the exclusion of activities on such a small scale as to be regarded as purely marginal and ancillary. The essential feature of an employment relationship is that for a certain period of time a person performs services for and under the direction of another person in return for which he receives remuneration. By contrast, neither the sui generis nature of the employment relationship under national law, nor the level of productivity of the person concerned, the origin of the funds from which the remuneration is paid or the limited amount of the remuneration can have any consequence in regard to whether or not the person is a worker for the purposes of Community law (see, as regards Article 48 of the Treaty, in particular Case 66/85 Lawrie-Blum [1986] ECR 2121, paragraphs 16 and 17; Case 197/86 Brown [1988] ECR 3205, paragraph 21; Case 344/87 Bettray [1989] ECR 1621, paragraphs 15 and 16; Case C-357/89 Raulin [1992] ECR I-1027, paragraph 10; and Case C-3/90 Bernini [1992] ECR I-1071, paragraphs 14 to 17; and, as regards Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80, Case C-36/96 Günaydin [1997] ECR I-5143, paragraph 31, Case C-98/96 Ertanir [1997] ECR I-5179, paragraph 43, and Birden, paragraphs 25 and 28).

33 As regards, more specifically, activities which, as in the main proceedings, have been carried out in the course of vocational training, the Court has held that a person who serves periods of apprenticeship in an occupation that may be regarded as practical preparation related to the actual pursuit of the occupation in question must be considered to be a worker, provided that the periods are served under the conditions of genuine and effective activity as an employed person. The Court has stated that that conclusion cannot be invalidated by the fact that the productivity of the person concerned is low, that he does not carry out full duties and that, accordingly, he works only a small number of hours per week and thus receives limited remuneration (see to that effect, in particular, Lawrie-Blum, cited above, paragraphs 19, 20 and 21, and Bernini, cited above, paragraphs 15 and 16).

34 It follows that any person who, even in the course of vocational training and whatever the legal context of that training, pursues a genuine and effective economic activity for and under the direction of an employer and on that basis receives remuneration which can be perceived as the consideration for that activity must be regarded as a worker for the purposes of Community law.

35 It is apparent from the documents before the Court that, from 1 October 1992 to 5 May 1997, Mr Kurz pursued a genuine and effective economic activity for and under the direction of Schulz, in return for which he received monthly remuneration which increased from DEM 780 in the first year to DEM 1 030 in the fourth year. That progressive increase in remuneration is indeed an indication that the work performed by Mr Kurz was of growing economic value to his employer.

36 Since persons such as Mr Kurz thus satisfy the fundamental criteria of an employment relationship, they must be considered to be workers within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80.

The concept of being duly registered as belonging to the labour force

37 In order to ascertain whether such a worker is duly registered as belonging to the labour force of a Member State for the purposes of that provision of Decision No 1/80, it is necessary, first, to determine, in accordance with settled case-law (Bozkurt, paragraphs 22 and 23, Günaydin, paragraph 29, Ertanir, paragraph 39, and Birden, paragraph 33, all cited above), whether the legal relationship of employment of the person concerned can be located within the territory of a Member State or retains a sufficiently close link with that territory, taking account in particular of the place where the Turkish national was hired, the territory on or from which the paid activity is pursued and the applicable national legislation in the field of labour and social security law.

38 In a situation such as that of the applicant in the main proceedings, that condition is undoubtedly satisfied, since the person concerned has been hired and has pursued, in the course of his apprenticeship, a paid activity on the territory of the host Member State and the employment has been subject to the legislation of that State, inter alia its labour and social security law.

39 Second, it is clear from the Court's case-law that the concept of being 'duly registered as belonging to the labour force' ('appartenant au marché régulier' in the French version) referred to in Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80 must be regarded as referring to all workers who have complied with the conditions laid down by law and regulation in the host Member State governing entry into its territory and employment and are thus entitled to pursue an occupation in that State (Birden, paragraph 51, and Nazli, paragraph 31).

40 In substantiating the interpretation that the term 'regular' ('régulier') is synonymous with 'legal', the Court has relied not only on an analysis of the various language versions in which Decision No 1/80 was drawn up (see Birden, paragraphs 47 to 50) but also on the objective of that decision, whose social provisions constitute a further stage in securing freedom of movement for workers on the basis of Articles 48, 49 and 50 of the Treaty (see Birden, paragraph 52). As the Advocate General has observed in points 60 and 61 of his Opinion, the performance of work under legal conditions promotes integration of the Turkish nationals in the host Member State.

41 Entitlement to the rights enshrined in the three indents of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80 is therefore subject only to the condition that the Turkish worker has complied with the legislation of the host Member State governing entry into its territory and pursuit of employment (Nazli, paragraph 32).

42 There is no doubt that a Turkish worker such as Mr Kurz satisfies that requirement, since it is not disputed that he legally entered the territory of the Member State concerned, that he was authorised there to pursue vocational training and that, in the course of that training, he was in legal employment for more than four years in succession.

43 The Court held in paragraph 51 of the judgment in Birden that the concept of being 'duly registered as belonging to the labour force of a Member State' cannot be interpreted as applying to the labour market in general as opposed to a restricted market with a specific objective.

44 It is accordingly not possible to accept the interpretation put forward by Land Baden-Württemberg, the German Government and the Commission that an apprentice is not duly registered as belonging to the labour force on the ground that he pursues an activity of a purely temporary and specific nature in the course of his vocational training, distinct from a normal employment relationship and intended to bring about only his future inclusion in the labour market in general.

45 Such an interpretation is inconsistent with the aim and broad logic of Decision No 1/80, which seek to promote the integration of Turkish workers in the host Member State (see paragraph 40 of the present judgment). An apprentice who, as in the main proceedings, has pursued a genuine and effective economic activity with an employer for more than four years, in return for which he has received remuneration corresponding to the work performed, is just as integrated in the host Member State as a worker who has carried out comparable work for an equivalent period.

46 Furthermore, the interpretation provided by the Court in paragraphs 40 to 45 of the judgment in Birden, according to which a Turkish national who has lawfully pursued a genuine and effective economic activity in a Member State under a work permit for an uninterrupted period of more than one year for the same employer, in return for which he received the usual remuneration, is duly registered as belonging to the labour force of the host Member State even if, pursuant to the legislation of that State, the activity in question was financed by public funds and restricted to a limited group of persons, in order to facilitate their integration into working life, must apply just as much — if not more so — with regard to gainful activity pursued in the course of vocational training.

47 Consequently, a Turkish worker such as Mr Kurz must be considered to be duly registered as belonging to the labour force of a Member State for the purposes of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80.

The concept of legal employment

48 As regards the question whether such a worker has been in legal employment in the host Member State for the purposes of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80, it should be recalled that, according to settled case-law (Sevince, cited above, paragraph 30, Case C-237/91 Kus [1992] ECR I-6781, paragraphs 12 and 22, Bozkurt, paragraph 26, and Birden, paragraph 55), legality of employment presupposes a stable and secure situation as a member of the labour force of a Member State and, by virtue of this, implies the existence of an undisputed right of residence.

49 In contrast to the factual and legal circumstances forming the basis of the judgments in Sevince, at paragraph 31, Kus, at paragraphs 13 and 16, and Case C-285/95 Kol [1997] ECR I-3069, at paragraph 27, where the Turkish nationals concerned were not legally entitled to a residence permit in the host Member State, it is clear that in a case such as the main proceedings the Turkish worker's right of residence in the host Member State is not in any way contested and the person concerned was not in a precarious situation that could be called into question at any time.

50 It is apparent from the documents before the Court that Mr Kurz was permitted to enter Germany and reside there in order to pursue vocational training under residence authorisations which were extended until 15 July 1997. It was in the course of that training that, having obtained national authorisations permitting him to work, he was legally engaged without interruption from 1 October 1992 to 5 May 1997, that is to say for more than four years in succession, under an employment relationship involving the pursuit of a genuine and effective economic activity for one employer in return for remuneration which appears to be the consideration for the services performed. It follows that his legal position was regular throughout that period.

51 Such a worker must consequently be regarded as having been in legal employment in the Member State concerned for the purposes of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80.

52 Since such a worker thus fulfils all the conditions laid down in the third indent of Article 6(1) of that decision, having been legally employed in a Member State for at least four years without interruption, he may rely directly on the rights conferred by that provision, in particular on the unconditional right to seek and take up any employment freely chosen by him, without being subject to any priority for workers of Member States, and on a corresponding right of residence likewise founded on Community law.

53 The foregoing interpretation cannot be affected by the fact that the authorisations to work and reside obtained by Mr Kurz were limited to temporary employment with a specific employer.

54 First, it is settled case-law that the rights conferred on Turkish workers by Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80 are accorded irrespective of whether or not the authorities of the host Member State have issued a specific administrative document, such as a work permit or residence permit (see, to that effect, Bozkurt, paragraphs 29 and 30, Günaydin, paragraph 49, Ertanir, paragraph 55, and Birden, paragraph 65).

55 Secondly, the Court has repeatedly held that if the temporary nature of the employment contract were sufficient to raise doubts as to whether the employment of the person concerned was in fact 'legal employment', Member States would be able wrongly to deprive Turkish migrant workers whom they permitted to enter their territory, and who have pursued an economic activity there which fulfils the conditions laid down in Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80, of the progressively more extensive rights on which they are entitled to rely directly under that provision. Any other interpretation would render Decision No 1/80 meaningless and deprive it of any practical effect (see Günaydin, paragraphs 36 to 40, and Birden, paragraphs 37, 38, 39 and 64).

56 Finally, the Court has held equally consistently that Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80 does not make recognition of the rights which it confers on Turkish workers subject to any condition connected with the reason for which the right to enter, work or reside was initially granted (see, in particular, Kus, paragraphs 21, 22 and 23, Günaydin, paragraph 52, and Birden, paragraph 67).

57 Land Baden-Württemberg submits, however, that Mr Kurz, who was not employed after his training contract ended, thereby forfeited any rights he may have acquired during his apprenticeship.

58 Suffice it to state in that regard that a Turkish national such as Mr Kurz, who was in legal employment in a Member State for an uninterrupted period of more than four years but who has subsequently been unemployed, does not forfeit, as a result of not working for a certain period, the rights conferred on him directly by the third indent of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80.

59 Such a Turkish worker has not left the labour market of the host Member State for good and may claim there an extension of his residence authorisation for the purposes of continuing to exercise his right of free access to any paid employment of his choice under that provision, not only by responding to job offers actually made but also by seeking a new job over a reasonable period (see, to that effect, Bozkurt, paragraphs 38 and 39, Tetik, paragraph 46, and Nazli, paragraphs 40 and 41).

60 Moreover, it is apparent from the documents before the Court that Mr Kurz had an offer of employment from the firm Messebau Thome in Mannheim, subject however to the condition that he possessed a work permit. Mr Kurz stated in his written observations and at the hearing, without being contradicted in this regard, that since he was unable to obtain the extension of his authorisation to reside in Germany or, consequently, issue of a work permit, he was not in a position to take up the offer of employment made to him.

61 In view of the foregoing considerations, the answer to the first question must be that, on a proper construction of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80, a Turkish national:

— who was authorised to enter the territory of a Member State with a visa 'valid only for the purpose of vocational training',

— who subsequently received a temporary residence authorisation restricted to vocational training activity with a specific employer, and

— who, in this context, has lawfully pursued a genuine and effective economic activity for that employer in return for which he has received remuneration corresponding to the work performed, is a worker duly registered as belonging to the labour force of that Member State and legally employed there for the purposes of the said provision.

Where such a Turkish national has thus worked for that employer for an uninterrupted period of at least four years, he enjoys in the host Member State, in accordance with the third indent of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80, the right of free access to any paid employment of his choice and a corresponding right of residence.

Questions 2, 3 and 4

62 It is apparent from the order for reference that the second, third and fourth questions are asked only if the first question is answered in the negative.

63 Since the first question has been answered in the affirmative, it is unnecessary to answer the second, third and fourth questions.

Question 5

64 At the hearing, Land Baden-Württemberg claimed that it was no longer necessary to answer the fifth question since, by decision of 13 November 2000, the competent national authorities had limited to 21 January 2002 the prohibitive effect of Paragraph 8(2) of the Ausländergesetz, so that there was no longer anything to prevent Mr Kurz from returning to Germany after that date.

65 However, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, in which it appears that an expulsion has taken place in breach of employment and residence rights conferred on him by Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80, the Turkish worker retains an obvious interest in securing the grant by the national courts enjoying jurisdiction of a declaration of illegality, and of relief penalising the illegality, from the time when it was committed, and in obtaining for that purpose an interpretation by the Court of Justice of the relevant Community law.

66 In answering this question concerning the relationship between Decision No 1/80 and national legislation on aliens, it should be remembered that it follows both from the primacy of Community law over Member States' domestic law and from the direct effect of a provision such as Article 6 of Decision No 1/80 that a Member State is not permitted to modify unilaterally the scope of the system of gradually integrating Turkish workers into the host Member State's labour force (see, in particular, Birden, paragraph 37, and Nazli, paragraph 30).

67 It follows that the Member States cannot adopt legislation concerning the control of aliens or apply a measure relating to residence of a Turkish national on their territory which is liable to impede the exercise of rights expressly granted by Community law to such a national.

68 Where, as in the main proceedings, the Turkish national fulfils the conditions laid down by a provision of Decision No 1/80 and accordingly is already duly integrated in a Member State, the latter no longer has the power to restrict application of those rights, as otherwise that decision would be rendered redundant (see, in particular, Birden, paragraph 37, Nazli, paragraph 30, and Case C-65/98 Eyüp [2000] ECR I-4747, paragraph 41).

69 Furthermore, every court of a Member State must apply Community law in its entirety and protect the rights which Community law confers directly on individuals, setting aside any provision of national law which may conflict with it (see Eyüp, paragraph 42, and, by analogy, Case 106/77 Simmenthal [1978] ECR 629, paragraph 21).

70 In view of the foregoing considerations, the answer to the fifth question must be that, where a Turkish national who fulfils the conditions laid down in a provision of Decision No 1/80 and therefore enjoys the rights which it confers has been expelled, Community law precludes application of national legislation under which issue of a residence authorisation must be refused until a time-limit has been placed on the effects of the expulsion order.

Costs

71 The costs incurred by the German Government and the Commission, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT (Sixth Chamber),

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Verwaltungsgericht Karlsruhe by order of 22 March 2000, hereby rules:

1. On a proper construction of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80 of 19 September 1980 on the development of the Association, adopted by the Association Council established by the Association Agreement between the European Economic Community and Turkey, a Turkish national:

— who was authorised to enter the territory of a Member State with a visa 'valid only for the purpose of vocational training',

— who subsequently received a temporary residence authorisation restricted to vocational training activity with a specific employer, and

— who, in this context, has lawfully pursued a genuine and effective economic activity for that employer in return for which he has received remuneration corresponding to the work performed, is a worker duly registered as belonging to the labour force of that Member State and legally employed there for the purposes of the said provision.

Where such a Turkish national has thus worked for that employer for an uninterrupted period of at least four years, he enjoys in the host Member State, in accordance with the third indent of Article 6(1) of Decision No 1/80, the right of free access to any paid employment of his choice and a corresponding right of residence.

2. Where a Turkish national who fulfils the conditions laid down in a provision of Decision No 1/80 and therefore enjoys the rights which it confers has been expelled, Community law precludes application of national legislation under which issue of a residence authorisation must be refused until a time-limit has been placed on the effects of the expulsion order.

JUDGMENT

(The account of the facts and issues which is contained in the complete text of the judgment is not reproduced)

Decision

1 By a judgment of 24 January 1985, which was received at the Court on 14 March 1985, the Bundesverwaltungsgericht referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty a question on the interpretation of Article 48 of the EEC Treaty and Article 1 of Regulation No 1612/68 of the Council of 15 October 1968 on freedom of movement for workers within the Community (Official Journal, English Special Edition 1968 (II), p. 475).

The subject-matter of the dispute

2 That question arose in proceedings brought against the Land Baden-Württemberg by Deborah Lawrie-Blum, a British national, who, after passing at the University of Freiburg the examination for the profession of teacher at a Gymnasium [secondary school], was refused admission, on the ground of her nationality, by the Oberschulamt Stuttgart [Secondary Education Office, Stuttgart] to the Vorbereitungsdienst, a period of preparatory service leading to the Second State Examination, which qualifies successful candidates for appointment as teachers in a Gymnasium.

3 It appears from the documents and the observations submitted to the Court that in the Federal Republic of Germany teacher training is essentially a matter for the Länder. That training consists of university studies, leading to the First State Examination and a period of preparatory service followed by the Second State Examination, the qualifying examination for teachers.

4 At the material time, the period of preparatory service was governed in Land Baden-Württemberg by the Verordnung des Ministeriums für Kultus und Sport über den Vorbereitungsdienst und die Pädagogische Prüfung für das Lehramt an Gymnasien [Order of the Ministry of Education and Sport on Preparatory Service and the Examination for the Profession of Teacher at a Gymnasium] of 14 June 1976 (Gesetzblatt Baden-Württemberg, p. 504), which has since been replaced by the Verordnung des Ministeriums für Kultus und Sport über der Vorbereitungsdienst und die zweite Staatsprüfung für die Laufbahn des höheren Schuldienstes an Gymnasien [Order of the Ministry of Education and Sport on Preparatory Service and the Second State Examination for Admission as a Teacher in the Higher Education Service qualified to teach in a Gymnasium] of 31 August 1984 (Gesetzblatt Baden-Württemberg, p. 576).

5 The period of preparatory service, the purpose of which is to introduce the trainee teacher to educational theory and teaching, consists of two stages, each lasting one year. The first stage consists of training at a teachers' training college (Seminar) and at a school, generally a State school, to which the trainee teacher has been attached and the second stage consists in further developing the abilities and skills needed in order to carry out educational and teaching duties in a school. During the latter period, the trainee may be called upon to give lessons for up to 11 hours a week in different classes in the Gymnasium, initially under the direct supervision of an instructor and later, during the last six months, on his own.

6 Completion of the period of preparatory service and possession of the diploma granted for passing the Second State Examination are, de jure, essential for admission to the profession of teacher in the State school system and de facto necessary for employment in private schools.

7 A candidate admitted to preparatory service is appointed Studienreferendar [trainee teacher] with the status of temporary civil servant [Beamte auf Widerruf] and in that capacity enjoys all the advantages of civil service status. The above-mentioned orders of 1976 and 1984 restrict admission to persons satisfying the personal conditions for appointment to the civil service. Paragraph 6 of the Landesbeamtengesetz für Baden-Württemberg [Law of the Land of Baden-Württemberg on the Civil Service], in the version in force since 8 August 1979 (Gesetzblatt, p. 398), requires the possession of German nationality within the meaning of Article 116 of the Grundgesetz [Constitution], unless an express derogation is granted by the Minister for the Interior on account of the imperative requirements of the service.

8 After being refused admission to preparatory service because she did not have German nationality, Mrs Lawrie-Blum brought an action before the Verwaltungsgericht Freiburg [Administrative Court, Freiburg] for the annulment of the decision of refusal on the ground that it was contrary to the Community rules prohibiting all discrimination on grounds of nationality as regards access to employment. The Verwaltungsgericht Freiburg and the Verwaltungsgerichtshof Baden-Württemberg [Higher Administrative Court for Baden-Württemberg], before which an appeal was brought, dismissed her application on the ground that Article 48 (4) of the EEC Treaty provided that the rules concerning freedom of movement for workers did not apply to employment in the public service. The appeal court also stated that the State school system was excluded from the scope of the Treaty because it did not form part of economic life.

9 Mrs Lawrie-Blum appealed to the Bundesverwaltungsgericht, which decided to stay the proceedings until the Court of Justice had given a preliminary ruling on the following question:

'Do the rules of European law on the free movement of persons (Article 48 of the EEC Treaty) and Article 1 of Regulation (EEC) No 1612/68 of the Council of 15 October 1968 (Official Journal, English Special Edition 1968 (II), p. 475, later amended) give nationals of a Member State the right to be appointed trainee teachers in the State school system of another Member State under the same conditions as nationals of that Member State, even where such trainee teachers, according to national law, have civil service status (in this case, as temporary civil servants [Beamten auf Widerruf] under German law) and conduct classes independently, and where national law requires that persons appointed to the civil service must in principle be nationals of the Member State concerned?'

10 The national court is essentially asking in the first place whether a trainee teacher undergoing a period of service as preparation for the teaching profession during which he enjoys civil service status and provides services by conducting classes for which he receives remuneration must be regarded as a worker within the meaning of Article 48 of the EEC Treaty and secondly whether such preparatory service must be regarded as employment in the public service within the meaning of Article 48 (4) to which nationals of other Member States may be refused admission.

11 In its carefully reasoned order for reference the Bundesverwaltungsgericht states that, in its view, a trainee teacher appointed as a temporary civil servant may not be regarded as a worker within the meaning of Article 48 of the EEC Treaty and that in any event he comes within the exception in Article 48 (4) since he exercises powers conferred by public law or contributes towards the safeguarding of the general interests of the State.

On the meaning of 'worker' in Article 48 (1)

12 Mrs Lawrie-Blum considers that any paid activity must be regarded as an economic activity and that the sphere in which it is exercised must necessarily be of an economic nature. A restrictive interpretation of Article 48 (1) would reduce freedom of movement to a mere instrument of economic integration, would be contrary to its broader objective of creating an area in which Community citizens enjoy freedom of movement and would deprive the exception in Article 48 (4) of any meaning of its own. The term 'worker' covers any person performing for remuneration work the nature of which is not determined by himself for and under the control of another, regardless of the legal nature of the employment relationship.

13 The Land Baden-Württemberg espouses the considerations put forward by the Bundesverwaltungsgericht in its order for reference to the effect that, since a trainee teacher's activity falls under education policy, it is not an economic activity within the meaning of Article 2 of the Treaty. The term 'worker' within the meaning of Article 48 of the Treaty and Regulation No 1612/68 covers only persons whose relationship to their employer is governed by a contract subject to private law and not persons whose employment relationship is subject to public law. The period of preparatory service should be regarded as the last stage of the professional training of future teachers.

14 The United Kingdom considers that a distinction between students and workers must be made on the basis of objective criteria and that the term 'worker' in Article 48 must be given a Community definition. Objectively defined, a 'worker' is a person who is obliged to provide services to another in return for monetary reward and who is subject to the direction or control of the other person as regards the way in which the work is done. In the present case, account must be taken of the fact that a trainee teacher is required, at least towards the end of the period of preparatory service, to conduct lessons and therefore provides an economically valuable service for which he receives remuneration which is based on the starting salary of a duly appointed teacher.

15 The Commission takes the view that the criterion for the application of Article 48 is the existence of an employment relationship, regardless of the legal nature of that relationship and its purpose. The fact that the period of preparatory service is a compulsory stage in the preparation for the practice of a profession and that it is spent in the public service is irrelevant if the objective criteria for defining the term 'worker', namely the existence of a relationship of subordination vis-à-vis the employer, irrespective of the nature of that relationship, the actual provision of services and the payment of remuneration, are satisfied.

16 Since freedom of movement for workers constitutes one of the fundamental principles of the Community, the term 'worker' in Article 48 may not be interpreted differently according to the law of each Member State but has a Community meaning. Since it defines the scope of that fundamental freedom, the Community concept of a 'worker' must be interpreted broadly (judgment of 23 March 1982 in Case 53/81 Levin v Staatssecretaris van Justitie [1982] ECR 1035).

17 That concept must be defined in accordance with objective criteria which distinguish the employment relationship by reference to the rights and duties of the persons concerned. The essential feature of an employment relationship, however, is that for a certain period of time a person performs services for and under the direction of another person in return for which he receives remuneration.

18 In the present case, it is clear that during the entire period of preparatory service the trainee teacher is under the direction and supervision of the school to which he is assigned. It is the school that determines the services to be performed by him and his working hours and it is the school's instructions that he must carry out and its rules that he must observe. During a substantial part of the preparatory service he is required to give lessons to the school's pupils and thus provides a service of some economic value to the school. The amounts which he receives may be regarded as remuneration for the services provided and for the duties involved in completing the period of preparatory service. Consequently, the three criteria for the existence of an employment relationship are fulfilled in this case.

19 The fact that teachers' preparatory service, like apprenticeships in other occupations, may be regarded as practical preparation directly related to the actual pursuit of the occupation in point is not a bar to the application of Article 48 (1) if the service is performed under the conditions of an activity as an employed person.

20 Nor may it be objected that services performed in education do not fall within the scope of the EEC Treaty because they are not of an economic nature. All that is required for the application of Article 48 is that the activity should be in the nature of work performed for remuneration, irrespective of the sphere in which it is carried out (see the judgment of 12 December 1974 in Case 36/74 Walrave v Union Cycliste Internationale [1974] ECR 1405). Nor may the economic nature of those activities be denied on the ground that they are performed by persons whose status is governed by public law since, as the Court pointed out in its judgment of 12 February 1974 in Case 152/73 (Sotgiu v Deutsche Bundespost [1974] ECR 153), the nature of the legal relationship between employee and employer, whether involving public law status or a private law contract, is immaterial as regards the application of Article 48.

21 The fact that trainee teachers give lessons for only a few hours a week and are paid remuneration below the starting salary of a qualified teacher does not prevent them from being regarded as workers. In its judgment in Levin, cited above, the Court held that the expressions 'worker' and 'activity as an employed person' must be understood as including persons who, because they are not employed full time, receive pay lower than that for full-time employment, provided that the activities performed are effective and genuine. The latter requirement is not called into question in this case.

22 Consequently, the reply to the first part of the question must be that a trainee teacher who, under the direction and supervision of the school authorities, is undergoing a period of service in preparation for the teaching profession during which he provides services by giving lessons and receives remuneration must be regarded as a worker within the meaning of Article 48 (1) of the EEC Treaty, irrespective of the legal nature of the employment relationship.

On the meaning of 'employment in the public service' in Article 48 (4)

23 Mrs Lawrie-Blum points out that, according to case-law, a post is covered by the reservation in Article 48 (4) only if it involves the exercise of powers conferred by public law and contributes to safeguarding the general interests of the State. The activities of a teacher and a fortiori of a trainee teacher do not, however, involve the exercise of powers conferred by public law.

24 According to the Land Baden-Württemberg, which espouses the considerations put forward by the Bundesverwaltungsgericht, a trainee teacher does in fact exercise powers conferred by public law in the course of his activities, inasmuch as he prepares lessons, awards marks to pupils and participates in the decisions on whether they should move to a higher class. In any event, in performing those activities he contributes towards the safeguarding of the general interests of the State, which encompass education; that fact alone justifies the application of Article 48 (4).

25 According to the Commission, the reservation contained in Article 48 (4) is subject to the formal condition that the post concerned should involve the discharge of functions governed by public law and the substantive condition that it should involve the exercise of powers conferred by public law and contribute towards the safeguarding of the general interests of the State, those two criteria being cumulative. The normal activities of a teacher in State schools and, a fortiori, in private schools do not, however, meet those conditions.

26 In deciding this question it must be borne in mind that, as a derogation from the fundamental principle that workers in the Community should enjoy freedom of movement and not suffer discrimination, Article 48 (4) must be construed in such a way as to limit its scope to what is strictly necessary for safeguarding the interests which that provision allows the Member States to protect. As the Court pointed out in its judgment of 3 June 1986 in Case 307/84 (Commission v France [1986] ECR 1725), access to certain posts may not be limited by reason of the fact that in a given Member State persons appointed to such posts have the status of civil servants. To make the application of Article 48 (4) dependent on the legal nature of the relationship between the employee and the administration would enable the Member States to determine at will the posts covered by the exception laid down in that provision.

27 As the Court has already stated in its judgment of 17 December 1980 in Case 149/79 Commission v Belgium [1980] ECR 3881 and of 26 May 1982 in Case 149/79 Commission v Belgium [1982] ECR 1845, 'employment in the public service' within the meaning of Article 48 (4), which is excluded from the ambit of Article 48 (1), (2) and (3), must be understood as meaning those posts which involve direct or indirect participation in the exercise of powers conferred by public law and in the discharge of functions whose purpose is to safeguard the general interests of the State or of other public authorities and which therefore require a special relationship of allegiance to the State on the part of persons occupying them and reciprocity of rights and duties which form the foundation of the bond of nationality. The posts excluded are confined to those which, having regard to the tasks and responsibilities involved, are apt to display the characteristics of the specific activities of the public service in the spheres described above.

28 Those very strict conditions are not fulfilled in the case of a trainee teacher, even if he does in fact take the decisions described by the Land Baden-Württemberg.

29 Consequently, the reply to the second part of the question must be that the period of preparatory service for the teaching profession cannot be regarded as employment in the public service within the meaning of Article 48 (4) to which nationals of other Member States may be denied access.

Costs

30 The costs incurred by the United Kingdom and the Commission, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, in so far as the parties to the main proceedings are concerned, in the nature of a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the question referred to it by the Bundesverwaltungsgericht by order of 24 January 1985, hereby rules:

(1) A trainee teacher who, under the direction and supervision of the school authorities, is undergoing a period of service in preparation for the teaching profession during which he provides services by giving lessons and receives remuneration must be regarded as a worker within the meaning of Article 48 (1) of the EEC Treaty, irrespective of the legal nature of the employment relationship.

(2) The period of preparatory service for the teaching profession cannot be regarded as employment in the public service within the meaning of Article 48 (4) to which nationals of other Member States may be denied access.

gives the following

Judgment

1 By order of 21 January 1991, received at the Court on 28 January 1991, the Kantongerecht, Groningen, referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty a series of questions on the interpretation of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses (hereinafter referred to as 'the directive').

2 The questions arose in proceedings between, on the one hand, the Dr Sophie Redmond Stichting, a foundation (hereinafter referred to as 'the Redmond Foundation'), and, on the other, Hendrikus Bartol and eight other persons.

3 It appears from the case-file that the plaintiff in the main proceedings is a foundation engaged, inter alia, in the provision of assistance to drug addicts from certain groups in Dutch society. The defendants are employees of the foundation bound to it by employment contracts to which the provisions of the Dutch Civil Code apply.

4 The Municipality of Groningen, which used to grant the foundation subsidies which were its sole resources, ceased to do so with effect from 1 January 1991 and transferred them to another foundation engaged in assisting drug addicts, namely the Sigma Foundation.

5 The Redmond Foundation, which was now without any resources, applied to the Kantongerecht, Groningen, under Article 1639w of the Civil Code to set aside its contracts of employment with such members of its staff as were not taken on by the Sigma Foundation.

6 Since some of the defendants in the main proceedings relied upon the provisions of Article 1639aa et seq., which were inserted into the Dutch Civil Court in order to transpose the directive into national law, the Kantongerecht, which is a court of first and last instance, was prompted to consider the interpretation of the directive and decided to stay the proceedings until such time as the Court had given a preliminary ruling on the following questions:

'(a) Does "transfer of an undertaking ... to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger" within the meaning of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses also cover the situation in which the subsidizing body decides to terminate the subsidy paid to one legal person, as a result of which the activities of that legal person are fully and definitively terminated, and simultaneously to switch it to another legal person with identical or comparable aims and objects, it being intended by and agreed between the two legal persons and the subsidizing body not only that, so far as possible, the clients/patients of the first legal person should be "switched" to the second legal person but also that, thereupon, a lease should be granted to the second legal person of the immovable property leased by the first legal person from the subsidizing body and that, so far as is possible (and desirable), use should be made of the "knowledge and the resources (e. g. staff)" of the first legal person?

(b) For the purpose of answering the foregoing question, does it make any difference that the inventory of the first legal person is not also transferred to the second legal person?

(c) Is it of any significance, for the purpose of answering Question (b), whether the untransferred inventory consists exclusively or well-nigh exclusively of aids for the purposes of the abovementioned social and recreational function?

(d) Can (the transferred part of) the undertaking still be said to retain its identity if the abovementioned social and recreational function of the first legal person is not transferred but the function of providing assistance is?

(e) For the purpose of answering Question (d), does it make any difference whether the social and recreational activities must be regarded as constituting a separate object or solely as an aid for the purposes of an optimum provision of assistance?

(f) For the purposes of answering the above questions, does it, lastly, still make any difference that the (intended) transfer of the activities of the first legal person to the second was not brought about in the first instance by (an) agreement(s) to that end between the subsidizing body and the two legal persons but by a decision, based on a change of policy on the part of the subsidizing public body, to terminate the subsidy paid to the first legal person and to switch it to the second legal person?'

7 Reference is made to the Report for the Hearing for a fuller account of the facts of the case, the procedure and the written observations submitted to the Court, which are mentioned or discussed hereinafter only in so far as is necessary for the reasoning of the Court.

8 Article 1(1) of the directive provides as follows:

'This directive shall apply to the transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger'.

9 The six questions submitted by the Kantongerecht are concerned in fact with two separate aspects of the directive's scope, as defined by Article 1. Part of the first question and the sixth question are concerned with the interpretation of the expression 'legal transfer', the other questions with the expression 'transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business'. In order to answer the national court's questions, it is appropriate to examine successively the possible difficulties of interpretation raised by those two expressions, regard being had to the concerns expressed by that court.

The expression 'legal transfer'

10 In its judgment in Case 135/83 Abels v Bedrijfsvereniging voor de Metaalindustrie en de Electrotechnische Industrie [1985] ECR 469, paragraphs 11, 12 and 13, the Court held that the scope of the provision at issue could not be appraised solely on the basis of a textual interpretation on account of the differences between the language versions of the provision and the divergences between the laws of the Member States with regard to the concept of legal transfer.

11 It has therefore given that concept a sufficiently flexible interpretation in keeping with the objective of the directive, which is to safeguard employees in the event of a transfer of their undertaking, and has held that the directive is applicable wherever, in the context of contractual relations, there is a change in the natural or legal person who is responsible for carrying on the business and who incurs the obligations of an employer towards employees of the undertaking (see, most recently, the judgment in Case 101/87 Bork International v Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark [1988] ECR 3057, paragraph 13).

12 The Court has considered in particular that the directive was applicable where premises were leased, the lease was rescinded and the owner took over the operation of the undertaking (judgment in Case 287/86 Landsorganisationen i Danmark fr Tjenerforbundet i Danmark v Ny Mølle Kro [1987] ECR 5465), in a case where a restaurant was leased, the lease terminated and the business leased to a new lessee who carried on the business (judgment in Case 324/86 Tellerup v Daddy's Dance Hall [1988] ECR 739) and even where a bar-discothèque was transferred pursuant to a lease-purchase agreement and restored to its owner by a judicial decision (judgment in Joined Cases 144 and 145/87 Berg v Besselsen [1988] ECR 2559).

13 As the Court observed in its judgment in Bork International, cited above, paragraph 14, where, upon the expiry of a lease, the lessee ceases to be the employer and a third party becomes the employer thereafter under a contract of sale concluded with the owner, the resulting operation may fall within the scope of the directive as defined in Article 1(1) thereof. The fact that in such a case the transfer is effected in two stages, inasmuch as the undertaking is first restored by the lessee to the owner who then transfers it to the new owner, does not prevent the directive from applying.

14 The operation to which the Kantongerecht's questions relate, as described in the order for reference, is comparable in structure. The situation in question is where a municipality which finances, through subsidies, the activities of a foundation engaged in providing assistance for drug addicts decides to discontinue the subsidies, and thus causes the foundation to cease its activities and transfer them to another foundation carrying on the same activities.

15 Admittedly, the national court asks in its sixth question whether the fact that the transfer decision was taken unilaterally by the public authority and was not the result of an agreement concluded by it with the subsidized bodies renders the directive inapplicable in this case.

16 That question must be answered in the negative.

17 In the first place, there is a unilateral decision both where an owner decides to change his lessee and where a public body changes its policy on subsidies. In that connection, it is inappropriate to take account of the nature of the subsidy, which is granted by a unilateral act coupled with certain conditions in some Member States and by subsidy contracts in others. In every case, the change in the recipient of the subsidy is carried out in the context of contractual relations within the meaning of the directive and the relevant case-law (judgments in Berg, cited above, paragraph 19, and in Bork International, cited above, paragraphs 13 and 14). What is more, although the Redmond Foundation, in its observations to the Court, disputes that any agreements were concluded, the Kantongerecht expressly observes in the grounds of its order that 'both the plaintiff and the Sigma Foundation have declared themselves ready to cooperate actively in the "transfer" of the plaintiff's clients/patients to the Sigma Foundation and a working party for the "Incorporation of the Activities of the Redmond Foundation into the Sigma Foundation" has come into being'.

18 Secondly, as the Commission emphasizes in its observations, moreover, the fact that in this case the origin of the operation lies in the grant of subsidies to foundations or associations whose services are allegedly provided without remuneration does not exclude that operation from the scope of the directive. The directive, as has already been stated, is designed to ensure that employees' rights are safeguarded, and covers all employees who enjoy some, albeit limited, protection against dismissal under national law (judgments in Case 105/84 Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Danmols Inventar [1985] ECR 2639, paragraph 27, and in Case 237/84 Commission v Belgium [1986] ECR 1247, paragraph 13). According to the order for reference, the employees concerned are subject to the Dutch Civil Code.

19 At the hearing, counsel for the plaintiff in the main proceedings put forward another argument, based on the fact that the Redmond Foundation is in a situation comparable to insolvency, which is expressly excluded from the scope of the directive by the Court's case-law owing to the serious risk, in the event of the application of the directive to insolvency, of a general deterioration in the working and living conditions of workers, contrary to the social objectives of the Treaty (judgment in Abels, cited above, paragraph 23).

20 That new argument, which was not put forward in the written observations submitted to the Court and is not supported by any document in the case-file, cannot be accepted. It appears from the judgment in Abels, cited above, that only transfers relating to undertakings declared insolvent are excluded from the scope of the directive. Even on the assumption, which is by no means established, that the Redmond Foundation was experiencing difficulties in honouring its commitments at the date of the transfer, that fact alone would not be sufficient to exclude the said transfer from the scope of the directive (see, in particular, the judgment in Danmols Inventar, cited above, paragraphs 9 and 10).

21 Accordingly, the answer to the national court's questions or parts of questions relating to the interpretation of the expression 'legal transfer' within the meaning of Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187 must be that that provision is to be interpreted as meaning that the expression covers a situation in which a public authority decides to terminate the subsidy paid to one legal person, as a result of which the activities of that legal person are fully and definitively terminated, and to transfer it to another legal person with a similar aim.

The expression 'transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business'

22 In its judgment in Case 24/85 Spijkers v Benedik [1986] ECR 1119, the Court specified the conditions under which the factual circumstances capable of being described as a transfer of an undertaking within the meaning of the directive had to be assessed. Three points should be called to mind in that regard.

23 First, the decisive criterion for establishing whether there is a transfer for the purposes of the directive is whether the entity in question retains its identity, as indicated inter alia by the fact that its operation is actually continued or resumed (judgment in Spijkers, cited above, paragraphs 11 and 12).

24 Secondly, in order to determine whether those conditions are met, it is necessary to consider all the facts characterizing the transaction in question, including the type of undertaking or business, whether or not the business's tangible assets, such as buildings and movable property, are transferred, the value of its intangible assets at the time of the transfer, whether or not the majority of its employees are taken over by the new employer, whether or not its customers are transferred and the degree of similarity between the activities carried on before and after the transfer and the period, if any, for which those activities were suspended. It should be noted, however, that all those circumstances are merely single factors in the overall assessment which must be made and cannot therefore be considered in isolation (judgment in Spijkers, cited above, paragraph 13).

25 Lastly, it is for the national court to make the necessary factual appraisal, in the light of the criteria for interpretation specified by the Court, in order to establish whether or not there is a transfer in the sense indicated (judgment in Spijkers, cited above, paragraph 14).

26 In this case, it is stated in the order for reference that the transfer of subsidies from the one foundation to the other has the following characteristics: the Redmond Foundation ceased its activities; the two foundations pursue the same or a similar aim; the Sigma Foundation partially absorbed the Redmond Foundation; the two foundations cooperated in finalizing the transfer operations; it was agreed that the Redmond Foundation's knowledge and resources would be transferred to the Sigma Foundation; the premises rented by the Redmond Foundation were leased to the Sigma Foundation; and the latter offered new employment contracts to some of the Redmond Foundation's former employees.

27 All those facts are essential if not decisive features of a transfer and may be used to interpret and apply Article 1 of the directive.

28 In its second, third, fourth and fifth questions, the Kantongerecht describes the particular circumstances in which certain property is used and certain activities carried on and asks whether they are capable of altering the manner in which the aforesaid factors are to be categorized for the purpose of establishing whether or not there is a transfer.

29 As regards the movables, the fact that they were not transferred does not seem in itself to prevent the directive from applying, and it is for the national court to appraise their importance by incorporating them in the overall assessment which has to be made, as pointed out in paragraph 24.

30 The same observation applies to the social and recreational activities, it being understood that the mere fact that those activities are said to have constituted an independent function is not sufficient to rule out the application of the aforementioned provisions of the directive, which were laid down not only for transfers of undertakings, but also for transfers of businesses or parts of businesses, with which activities of a special nature may be equated.

31 Accordingly, the reply to the national court's questions relating to the interpretation of the expression 'transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business' within the meaning of Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187 must be that that provision is to be interpreted as meaning that that expression refers to the case in which the entity in question has retained its identity. In order to ascertain whether or not there has been such a transfer in a case such as that which is the subject of the main proceedings, it is necessary to determine, having regard to all the factual circumstances characterizing the operation in question, whether the functions performed are in fact carried out or resumed by the new legal person with the same or similar activities, it being understood that activities of a special nature which constitute independent functions may, where appropriate, be equated with a business or part of a business within the meaning of the directive.

Costs

32 The costs incurred by the Commission of the European Communities, which has submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Kantongerecht, Groningen, by order of 21 January 1991, hereby rules:

1. Article 1(1) of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses is to be interpreted as meaning that the expression 'legal transfer' covers a situation in which a public authority decides to terminate the subsidy paid to one legal person, as a result of which the activities of that legal person are fully and definitively terminated, and to transfer it to another legal person with a similar aim.

2. The expression 'transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business' contained in the same article refers to the case in which the entity in question has retained its identity. In order to ascertain whether or not there has been such a transfer in a case such as that which is the subject of the main proceedings, it is necessary to determine, having regard to all the factual circumstances characterizing the operation in question, whether the functions performed are in fact carried out or resumed by the new legal person with the same or similar activities, it being understood that activities of a special nature which constitute independent functions may, where appropriate, be equated with a business or part of a business within the meaning of the directive.

Judgment

1 By judgments of 1 May 1987, which were received at the Court on 11 May 1987, the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden (Supreme Court of the Netherlands) referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty two questions, which were identical in the two joined cases, on the interpretation of Articles 1 (1) and 3 (1) of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses (Official Journal 1977, L 61, p. 26).

2 These questions were raised in the course of two sets of proceedings instituted, on the one hand, by Harry Berg (Case 144/87) and, on the other, by Johannes Theodorus Maria Busschers (Case 145/87), against their former employer, Ivo Martin Besselsen, who operated a bar-discothèque known as 'Besi Mill'.

3 On 15 February 1983 a commercial partnership owned by a Mr Manshanden and a Mr Tweehuijzen took over the operation of the establishment under a lease-purchase agreement within the meaning of Article 1576 of the Netherlands Civil Code. According to this provision 'lease-purchase is a purchase and sale on deferred payment, by which the parties agree that the object sold shall not become the property of the purchaser by mere transfer'. Mr Berg and Mr Busschers continued to work in the establishment following the transfer. By decison of 25 November 1983, on an application by Mr Besselsen, the Kantonrechter, Harderwijk, made a ruling terminating the lease-purchase agreement on the ground of the purchasers' non-performance and ordered that the establishment be restored to Mr Besselsen.

4 By their actions, which came before the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden on appeal, Mr Berg and Mr Busschers seek in substance an order requiring Mr Besselsen to pay them their arrears of salary for the period in which the establishment was managed by Mr Manshanden and Mr Tweehuijzen. In support of these claims, they argue inter alia that the transfer of an undertaking cannot have the effect of extinguishing the transferor's liability regarding the obligations deriving from a contract of employment, without the consent of the employees concerned.

5 The Hoge Raad der Nederlanden stayed the proceedings and requested the Court for a preliminary ruling on the following questions:

'1. (a) Must Article 3 (1) of the abovementioned directive be interpreted as meaning that, in so far as it is not otherwise provided in the directive or by the Member States, after the date of transfer the transferor is no longer liable for the obligations arising from the employment contract?

(b) If the answer to that question is in the affirmative: Must that provision therefore be interpreted as meaning that the consent of the employee is required for that legal consequence (that is to say, that the transferor is no longer liable) to take effect?

(c) If not, must that provision be understood as meaning that that legal consequence does not occur where the employee lodges an objection, with the result that he remains in the employ of the transferor?

2. (a) Can a lease-purchase agreement as described above . . . result in the transfer of an undertaking for the purposes of Article 1 (1) of the directive?

(b) Can the termination of a lease-purchase agreement as described above, result in a transfer as referred to above, with the legal consequence that the obligations of the purchaser by lease-purchase arising from the contract of employment existing at the time of the termination are transferred by that transfer to the vendor by way of lease-purchase.'

6 Reference is made to the Report for the Hearing for a fuller account of the facts of the case in the main proceedings, the provisions of Community law in question, the course of the proceedings and the observations submitted to the Court, which are mentioned or discussed hereinafter only in so far as is necessary for the reasoning of the Court.

The first question

7 The first question seeks in substance to ascertain whether Article 3 (1) of Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 must be interpreted as meaning that, after the date of the transfer, the transferor is released from his obligations under the contract of employment or the employment relationship solely by reason of the transfer, even where the employees of the undertaking do not consent to that effect or oppose it.

8 According to Mr Berg and Mr Busschers, that question must be answered in the negative because the transferor can be discharged of his liability vis-à-vis his employees only with their consent. In their view, this follows, first, from the aim of Directive 77/187/EEC which seeks to ensure that the transfer of undertakings is not effected at the expense of their employees, and, secondly, from the principle of the law of obligations according to which no one may assume the debt of a third party without the creditor's consent.

9 On the other hand, Mr Besselsen, the Netherlands and Portuguese Governments, the United Kingdom and the Commission stress that the transfer of an undertaking entails the automatic transfer of the rights and obligations deriving from the contract of employment. Consequently, the effect which the transfer has of releasing the transferor from liability cannot depend on the will of the employees concerned and the fact that they object to the transfer does not mean that they remain in the transferor's employ.

10 It should be observed that according to the first subparagraph of Article 3 (1) of Directive 77/187/EEC 'the transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment or from an employment relationship existing on the date of the transfer . . . shall, by reason of such transfer, be transferred to the transferee.' The second subparagraph of this provision states however that: 'Member States may provide that, after the date of the transfer . . . and in addition to the transferee, the transferor shall continue to be liable in respect of obligations which arose from a contract of employment or an employment relationship'.

11 An analysis of Article 3 (1) and, more particularly, the relationship between the first and second subparagraphs of this paragraph show that the transfer of an undertaking entails the automatic transfer from the transferor to the transferee of the employer's obligations arising from a contract of employment or an employment relationship, subject however to the right of Member States to provide for joint liability of the transferor and transferee following the transfer. It follows that, unless the Member States avail themselves of this possibility, the transferor is released from his obligations as an employer solely by reason of the transfer and that this legal consequence is not conditional on the consent of the employees concerned.

12 Mr Berg and Mr Busschers are mistaken in arguing that this interpretation is not consistent with the aim pursued by Directive 77/187/EEC. As the Court has consistently held, most recently in its judgment of 10 February 1988 in Case 324/86 (Daddy's Dance Hall [1981] ECR 739), this directive is intended to safeguard the rights of workers in the event of a change of employer by making it possible for them to continue to work for the transferee under the same conditions as those agreed with the transferor. Its purpose is not, however, to ensure that the contract of employment or the employment relationship with the transferor is continued where the undertaking's employees do not wish to remain in the transferee's employ.

13 Similarly, the argument based on a principle of the law of obligations which, it is claimed, is generally recognized in the legal systems of the Member States, namely that a debt may be transferred only with the creditor's consent, cannot be accepted. Without there being any need to assess the effect of that principle, it is sufficient to observe that the rules applicable in the event of a transfer of an undertaking or a business to another employer are intended to safeguard, in the interests of the employees, the existing employment relationships which are part of the economic entity transferred. That is why the directive provides for the automatic transfer of obligations arising from employment contracts to the transferee, thereby overriding the principle relied on by the plaintiff in the main proceedings. Moreover, by giving the Member States the power to provide for joint liability of the transferor and the transferee following the transfer, the second subparagraph of Article 3 (1) of Directive 77/187 enables them to reconcile the rule of automatic transfer with the principles of their domestic legal systems.

14 Accordingly, the reply to the first question must be that Article 3 (1) of Directive 77/187 of 14 February 1977 must be interpreted as meaning that after the date of transfer and by virtue of the transfer alone, the transferor is discharged from all obligations arising under the contract of employment or the employment relationship, even if the workers employed in the undertaking did not consent or if they object, subject however to the power of the Member States to provide for joint liability of the transferor and the transferee after the date of transfer.

The second question

15 The second question seeks in substance to ascertain whether Article 1 (1) of Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 must be interpreted as meaning that the directive applies, on the one hand, to the transfer of an undertaking under a lease-purchase agreement such as that provided for in Netherlands law and, on the other, to the retransfer of that undertaking following the termination of the lease-purchase agreement by judicial decision.

16 It is common ground between all the parties in these proceedings who have submitted observations on this point that the directive applies to the transfer of an undertaking under a lease-purchase agreement. However, they differ with regard to the applicability of the directive to the retransfer of the undertaking following the termination of a lease-purchase agreement by judicial decision. Mr Berg and Mr Busschers, the Netherlands Government, and the United Kingdom, and also the Commission, in its observations at the hearing, consider that the termination, even by judicial decision, of a contract is so bound to the very existence of the contract that the transfer of an undertaking resulting therefrom must be regarded as equivalent to a transfer resulting from a contract. On the other hand, Mr Besselsen argues that the directive does not cover a transfer resulting from a judicial decision, since such a decision does not constitute an agreement.

17 As the Court has already held, in its judgment of 17 December 1987 in Case 287/86 (Ny Mølle Kro [1987] ECR 5465), Directive 77/187 is applicable where, following a legal transfer or merger, there is a change in the legal or natural person who is responsible for carrying on the business and who by virtue of that fact incurs the obligations of an employer vis-à-vis the employees of the undertaking, regardless of whether or not ownership of the undertaking is transferred.

18 It follows that, in so far as the purchaser of an undertaking becomes, by virtue of a lease-purchase agreement, the employer in the sense set out above, the transfer must be regarded as a transfer of an undertaking as a result of a legal transfer within the meaning of Article 1 (1) of the directive, notwithstanding the fact that such a purchaser acquires the ownership of the undertaking only when the totality of the purchase price has been paid.

19 Similar considerations apply where the undertaking transferred in this way is restored to the former employer, following the termination of the lease-purchase agreement, regardless of whether the termination results from an agreement between the contracting parties or a unilateral declaration by one of them or indeed a judicial decision. In all these cases, the transfer of the undertaking occurs on the basis of a contract. Consequently, in so far as the retransfer of the undertaking deprives the purchaser of the status of employer, a status which reverts to the vendor, it must be regarded as a transfer of an undertaking to another employer as a result of a legal transfer within the meaning of Article 1 (1) of the directive.

20 For those reasons the reply to the second question must be that Aritcle 1 (1) of Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 must be interpreted as meaning that the directive applies both to the transfer of an undertaking pursuant to a lease-purchase agreement of the kind available under Netherlands law and to the retransfer of the undertaking upon the termination of the lease-purchase agreement by a judicial decision.

Costs

21 The costs incurred by the Netherlands and Portuguese Governments and by the United Kingdom and those incurred by the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. As these proceedings are, in so far as the parties to the main proceedings are concerned, in the nature of a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision as to costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds

THE COURT (Fifth Chamber),

in answer to the questions referred to by the judgments of the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden of 1 May 1987, hereby rules:

(1) Article 3 (1) of Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 must be interpreted as meaning that after the date of transfer and by virtue of the transfer alone, the transferor is discharged from all obligations arising under the contract of employment or the employment relationship, even if the workers employed in the undertaking do not consent or if they object, subject however to the power of the Member States to provide for joint liability of the transferor and the transferee after the date of transfer.

(2) Article 1 (1) of Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 must be interpreted as meaning that the directive applies both to the transfer of an undertaking pursuant to a lease-purchase agreement of the kind available under Netherlands law and to the retransfer of the undertaking upon the termination of the lease-purchase agreement by a judicial decision.

gives the following

Judgment

1 These references for a preliminary ruling concern the interpretation of Article 6(1) of Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ 2000 L 303, p. 16).

2 The references have been made in proceedings between Mr Georgiev and the Tehnicheski universitet – Sofia, filial Plovdiv (Technical University of Sofia, Plovdiv Branch) ('the university') concerning, first, Mr Georgiev's employment by means of a fixed-term contract to which he has been subject as of the age of 65 and, secondly, his compulsory retirement at the age of 68.

Legal context

European Union law

Directive 2000/78

3 Recital 25 in the preamble to Directive 2000/78 states:

'The prohibition of age discrimination is an essential part of meeting the aims set out in the Employment Guidelines and encouraging diversity in the workforce. However, differences in treatment in connection with age may be justified under certain circumstances and therefore require specific provisions which may vary in accordance with the situation in Member States. It is therefore essential to distinguish between differences in treatment which are justified, in particular by legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and discrimination which must be prohibited.'

4 Article 1 of Directive 2000/78 states that its 'purpose … is to lay down a general framework for combating discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation as regards employment and occupation, with a view to putting into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment'.

5 Article 2(1) and (2)(a) of Directive 2000/78 provides:

'1. For the purposes of this Directive, the "principle of equal treatment" shall mean that there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination whatsoever on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1.

2. For the purposes of paragraph 1:

(a) direct discrimination shall be taken to occur where one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation, on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1'.

6 Article 3 of Directive 2000/78, headed 'Scope', states in paragraph 1(c):

'Within the limits of the areas of competence conferred on the Community, this Directive shall apply to all persons, as regards both the public and private sectors, including public bodies, in relation to:

(c) employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay'.

7 Article 6(1) of the directive provides:

'Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that differences of treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination, if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary.

Such differences of treatment may include, among others:

(a) the setting of special conditions on access to employment and vocational training, employment and occupation, including dismissal and remuneration conditions, for young people, older workers and persons with caring responsibilities in order to promote their vocational integration or ensure their protection;

(b) the fixing of minimum conditions of age, professional experience or seniority in service for access to employment or to certain advantages linked to employment;

(c) the fixing of a maximum age for recruitment which is based on the training requirements of the post in question or the need for a reasonable period of employment before retirement.'

The framework agreement on fixed-term work

8 Clause 5, point 1, of the framework agreement on fixed-term work concluded on 18 March 1999, which is attached as an Annex to Council Directive 1999/70/EC of 28 June 1999 concerning the framework agreement on fixed-term work concluded by ETUC, UNICE and CEEP (OJ 1999 L 175, p. 43), is worded as follows:

'To prevent abuse arising from the use of successive fixed-term employment contracts or relationships, Member States, after consultation with social partners in accordance with national law, collective agreements or practice, and/or the social partners, shall, where there are no equivalent legal measures to prevent abuse, introduce in a manner which takes account of the needs of specific sectors and/or categories of workers, one or more of the following measures:

(a) objective reasons justifying the renewal of such contracts or relationships;

(b) the maximum total duration of successive fixed-term employment contracts or relationships;

(c) the number of renewals of such contracts or relationships.'

National legislation

9 Article 68(1)(1) and (4) of the Bulgarian Labour Code (DV No 26 of 1 April 1986), in the amended version published in DV No 105 of 29 December 2005 ('the Labour Code'), provides:

'(1) A fixed-term employment contract shall be concluded:

1. for a fixed period which may not exceed three years, as long as a law or an act of the Council of Ministers does not provide otherwise;

(4) As an exception, a fixed-term employment contract pursuant to paragraph (1), subparagraph 1, may be concluded for a period of not less than one year for work or activities that are not of a temporary, seasonal or short-term nature. Such an employment contract may even be concluded for a shorter period upon request in writing by the worker or employee. In such cases the fixed-term employment contract referred to in paragraph (1), subparagraph 1, may be renewed only once for a period of not less than one year with the same worker or employee for the same type of work.'

10 Article 325(3) of the Labour Code provides that an employment contract is to end on expiry of the contractual period without the parties giving prior notice.

11 Article 328 of the Labour Code provides:

'(1) An employer may terminate an employment contract by giving prior written notice to the worker or employee within the periods provided for in Article 326(2) in the following cases:

10. When the right to receive a retirement pension has been acquired, and, in the case of professors, lecturers and level I and II assistants, and holders of doctorates in science, when they reach the age of 65;

…'

12 The Law on higher education (DV No 112 of 27 December 1995), in the amended version published in DV No 103 of 23 December 2005, provides in paragraph 11 of the Transitional and final provisions:

'On a proposal from the board of professors and the central and/or branch council, by decision of the academic council, employment contracts with persons qualified to teach may, when those persons reach the age referred to in Article 328(1)(10) of the Labour Code, be extended by periods of one year, up to a total of three years in the case of persons occupying the post of "professor", and up to a total of two years in the case of persons occupying the post of "lecturer".'

13 Article 7(1)(6) of the Law on Protection against Discrimination (DV No 86 of 30 September 2003), in the amended version published in DV No 105 of 29 December 2005, provides that 'the fixing of a maximum age for recruitment, based on the training requirements of the post in question or the need for a reasonable period of employment before retirement, on condition that this is objectively justified for the achievement of a legitimate aim and the means of achieving it do not go beyond what is necessary,' does not constitute discrimination.

The actions in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling 14 Mr Georgiev began work as a lecturer at the University in 1985.

15 His employment contract was terminated as from 6 February 2006 on the ground that he had reached the retirement age of 65.

16 The academic council of the University, however, authorised Mr Georgiev to continue to work, in accordance with paragraph 11 of the transitional and final provisions of the Law on Higher Education. A new one-year employment contract was therefore concluded for that purpose, specifying that Mr Georgiev would work as a lecturer in the faculty of engineering ('the contract').

17 By a supplementary agreement dated 21 December 2006, the contract was extended for one year.

18 In January 2007, Mr Georgiev was appointed to the post of 'professor'.

19 By a new supplementary agreement dated 18 January 2008, the contract was extended for a further year.

20 In 2009, the year in which Mr Georgiev reached the age of 68, by a decision of the rector of the University, the employment relationship between Mr Georgiev and the University was terminated, in accordance with Article 325(3) of the Labour Code.

21 Mr Georgiev brought two actions before the national court. The first, which forms the basis of Case C-268/09, seeks to establish that the clause in his fixed-term contract, which limited that contract to one year, is null and void and that that contract should be reclassified as a contract of indefinite duration. The second action, which gave rise to Case C-250/09, relates to the decision of the rector of the University terminating Mr Georgiev's employment relationship with the University once he reached the age of 68.

22 That court stated that it had doubts as regards the interpretation of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78 with a view to disposing of the two cases before it.

23 In those circumstances the Rayonen sad Plovdiv (Plovdiv district court) decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions, the first two of which are common to both cases whereas the third is referred only in Case C-268/09, to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Do the provisions of [Directive 2000/78] preclude the application of a national law which does not permit the conclusion of employment contracts of indefinite duration with professors who have reached the age of 65? In this context and, more precisely, taking Article 6(1) of the directive into consideration, are the measures in Article 7(1)(6) of the Law on Protection against Discrimination, which introduce age limits for employment in specific posts, objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, and proportionate, bearing in mind that the directive has been fully transposed into Bulgarian law?

2. Do the provisions of [Directive 2000/78] preclude the application of a national law under which professors who have reached the age of 68 are compulsorily retired? In view of the foregoing facts and circumstances of the present case, and if it is found that a conflict exists between the provisions of [Directive 2000/78] and the relevant national legislation which transposed the directive, is it possible that the interpretation of the provisions of Community law results in the national legislation not being applied?

3. Does national law establish the reaching of the specified age as the sole condition for the termination of the employment relationship of indefinite duration and for the possibility that the relationship can be continued as a fixed-term employment relationship between the same worker and employer for the same post? Does national law establish a maximum duration and a maximum number of extensions of the fixed-term employment relationship with the same employer after the contract of indefinite duration has been converted into a fixed-term contract, beyond which a continuation of the employment relationship between the parties is not possible?'

24 By order of the President of the Court of 14 September 2009, Cases C−250/09 and C−268/09 were joined for the purposes of the written and oral procedure and of the judgment.

Consideration of the questions referred

The first two questions

25 By its first two questions, which should be examined together, the national court asks in essence whether Directive 2000/78, in particular Article 6(1) thereof, precludes national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, under which university professors who have reached the age of 68 are compulsorily retired and may continue working beyond the age of 65 only by means of fixed−term contracts concluded for a period of one year and renewable at most twice. If so, the national court asks whether such national legislation must be disregarded.

26 It must be pointed out at the outset, as is apparent both from its title and the preamble and from its content and purpose, that Directive 2000/78 seeks to lay down a general framework in order to guarantee equal treatment 'in employment and occupation' to all persons, by offering them effective protection against discrimination on one of the grounds covered by Article 1 of the directive, which include age.

27 In order to provide an answer to the first two questions, it should be examined whether national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings falls within the scope of Directive 2000/78, whether it introduces a difference of treatment on grounds of age and, if so, whether that directive precludes such a difference of treatment.

28 As regards, first, the question whether national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings falls within the scope of Directive 2000/78, it follows from Article 3(1)(c) thereof that the directive applies, within the framework of the areas of competence conferred on the European Union, to all persons in relation to employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay.

29 The national provision which provides for the compulsory retirement of university professors at the age of 68 affects employment and working conditions within the meaning of Article 3(1)(c) of Directive 2000/78 by prohibiting the persons concerned from working beyond that age.

30 The provision relating to the conclusion of fixed-term contracts affects employment and working conditions within the meaning of Article 3(1)(c) of Directive 2000/78 as it precludes university professors over 65 from working under a contract of indefinite duration.

31 Secondly, as regards whether the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings contains a difference of treatment on grounds of age for the purposes of Article 2(1) of Directive 2000/78, it should be recalled that, under that provision, 'the "principle of equal treatment" shall mean that there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination whatsoever on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1' of that directive. Article 2(2)(a) of that directive states that, for the purposes of applying Article 2(1), direct discrimination is to be taken to occur where one person is treated less favourably than another person in a comparable situation, on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1.

32 The application of a law which provides for the compulsory retirement of university professors who have reached the age of 68 has the consequence that those persons are being treated less favourably than other persons practising the same profession on the ground that they are over the age of 68. Such a provision introduces a difference of treatment directly on grounds of age for the purposes of Article 2(2)(a) of Directive 2000/78 (see, to that effect, Case C-411/05 Palacios de la Villa [2007] ECR I-8531, paragraph 51).

33 As regards the national provision relating to the application of fixed-term contracts to professors who have reached the age of 65, it must be pointed out that, in imposing that type of employment contract on them and preventing them from continuing working under contracts of indefinite duration, the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings also involves a difference of treatment with regard to them as opposed to younger professors who are not subject to such a prohibition.

34 The argument of the University and the Bulgarian Government, that such legislation is not unfavourable to the professors concerned because it makes it possible for them, where appropriate, to work for another three years after reaching the age at which they may be made to take retirement with a pension, is not capable of undermining the finding in the preceding paragraph. Such a situation does not prevent the employment conditions of those professors, since they no longer have an employment of indefinite duration, from becoming more precarious than those of professors under 65.

35 Thirdly, it must be examined whether the difference of treatment resulting from the application of the provisions of national law at issue in the main proceedings may be justified under Article 6 of Directive 2000/78.

36 In that regard, it is important to bear in mind that the first subparagraph of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 states that differences of treatment on grounds of age are not to constitute discrimination, if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary. The second subparagraph of Article 6(1) lists a number of examples of differences of treatment of the kind referred to in the first subparagraph of Article 6(1).

37 It must, in that regard, be pointed out that the example in point (c) of the second subparagraph of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78, which was transposed into Bulgarian national law by Article 7(1)(6) of the Law on Protection against Discrimination to which the national court expressly refers in its first question, does not appear to be relevant in the present case. The dispute in the main proceedings relates to the application of fixed-term contracts as from the age of 65 and therefore to employment conditions after a certain age, and not to a maximum age for recruitment referred to in that law.

38 It is therefore important to examine the national provisions at issue in the main proceedings in the light of their aims.

39 The order for reference does not contain any information on that point and it is not apparent from the case-file that the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings states the aim it pursues.

40 That situation does not however mean that that legislation does not pursue a legitimate aim. As the Court has previously held, where the national legislation in question does not specify the aim pursued, it is important that other elements, taken from the general context of the measure concerned, enable the underlying aim of that measure to be identified for the purposes of review by the courts of whether it is legitimate and whether the means put in place to achieve it are appropriate and necessary (see Palacios de la Villa, paragraph 57; Case C-388/07 Age Concern England [2009] ECR I-1569, paragraph 45; and Case C-341/08 Petersen [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraph 40).

41 The University and the Bulgarian Government submit that the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings pursues a social policy aim linked to the training and employment of teaching staff and to the application of a specific labour market policy which takes account of the specific situation of the staff in the discipline concerned, the needs of the university establishment under consideration and the professional abilities of the person covered.

42 The other Governments which submitted observations to the Court, namely the German and Slovak Governments, and the Commission of the European Communities take the view that the legitimate aim of national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings may be the concern to ensure the quality of teaching and research by renewing the teaching staff through the employment of younger professors and to allocate the posts in the best possible way by establishing a balance between the generations.

43 The University and the Bulgarian Government do not clearly specify the aim of that national legislation and, in essence, merely state that it pursues the type of aim referred to in Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78. It is nevertheless important, in order to assess the compatibility of such legislation with that directive, to identify precisely the aim which it pursues, a task which it is for the national court to carry out.

44 In order to furnish the national court with a helpful reply, account should be taken of the observations submitted by the University and the Bulgarian Government as regards the aim of the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings and also of the observations submitted on that point by the German Government, the Slovak Government and the Commission.

45 In that regard, the training and employment of teaching staff and the application of a specific labour market policy which takes account of the specific situation of the staff in the discipline concerned, put forward by the University and the Bulgarian Government, may be consonant with the intention of allocating the posts for professors in the best possible way between the generations, in particular by appointing young professors. As regards the latter aim, the Court has already held that encouragement of recruitment undoubtedly constitutes a legitimate aim of Member States' social or employment policy (Palacios de la Villa, paragraph 65), in particular when the promotion of access of young people to a profession is involved (see, to that effect, Petersen, paragraph 68). Consequently, encouragement of recruitment in higher education by means of the offer of posts as professors to younger people may constitute such a legitimate aim.

46 Furthermore, as the Advocate General pointed out in point 34 of his Opinion, the mix of different generations of teaching staff and researchers is such as to promote an exchange of experiences and innovation, and thereby the development of the quality of teaching and research at universities.

47 However, the case-file does not permit the finding that the aims mentioned by the German and Slovak Governments and the Commission correspond to those of the Bulgarian legislature. A doubt exists in particular in the light of Mr Georgiev's remarks in his written observations. Mr Georgiev submits that the University and the Bulgarian Government merely make assertions and maintains that the legislation at issue in the main proceedings is not aligned to the reality of the labour market concerned. He submits that the average age of university professors is 58 and that there are not more than 1 000 of them, a situation which is explained by the absence of interest on the part of young people in a career as a professor. The legislation at issue in the main proceedings does not, in his view, therefore encourage the recruitment of young people.

48 In that regard it is for the national court to examine the facts and determine whether the aims asserted by the University and the Bulgarian Government correspond to the facts.

49 It still remains to be examined whether the means implemented to achieve such aims are 'appropriate and necessary' within the meaning of the first subparagraph of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.

50 In that regard, it must be borne in mind that the Member States enjoy broad discretion in their choice, not only to pursue a particular aim in the field of social and employment policy, but also in the definition of measures capable of achieving it (see Case C-144/04 Mangold [2005] ECR I-9981, paragraph 63, and Palacios de la Villa, paragraph 68).

51 As regards, first, the setting of an age limit of 68, the Court has held, in paragraph 70 of Petersen, that, in view of developments in the employment situation in the sector concerned, it does not appear unreasonable for the authorities of a Member State to consider that the application of an age limit, leading to the withdrawal from the labour market of older practitioners, may make it possible to promote the employment of younger ones and that that age is sufficiently high to serve as the endpoint of admission to practise as a panel dentist.

52 Those findings are also relevant as regards engaging in employment such as that of a university professor. In so far as the posts for university professors are, in general, of a limited number and open only to people who have attained the highest qualifications in the field concerned, and since a vacant post has to be available for a professor to be appointed, the Court takes the view that a Member State may consider it appropriate to set an age limit to achieve aims of employment policy such as those mentioned in paragraphs 45 and 46 of this judgment.

53 It is however for the national court to determine, having regard to the objections submitted by Mr Georgiev and referred to in paragraph 47 of this judgment, whether the situation of university professors in Bulgaria corresponds to the general situation of university professors as described in the preceding paragraph.

54 As for the age limit applied by the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings, namely 68, it is apparent from the case-file that it is five years higher than the statutory age at which men may normally acquire the right to a pension and be made to take retirement in the Member State concerned. It therefore allows university professors, who are offered the opportunity to work until 68, to pursue their careers for a relatively long period. Such a measure cannot be regarded as unduly prejudicing the legitimate claims of workers subject to compulsory retirement because they have reached the age limit provided for; the relevant legislation is not based only on a specific age, but also takes account of the fact that the persons concerned are entitled to financial compensation by way of a retirement pension at the end of their working life, such as that provided for by the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings (see, to that effect, Palacios de la Villa, paragraph 73).

55 It follows that the setting of an age limit for the termination of a contract of employment does not exceed what is necessary to attain employment policy aims such as those mentioned in paragraphs 45 and 46 of this judgment, provided that that national legislation reflects those aims in a consistent and systematic manner.

56 It is for the national court to ascertain whether such an age limit genuinely reflects a concern to attain the aims pursued in a consistent and systematic manner (see Case C-169/07 Hartlauer [2009] ECR I-1721, paragraph 55, and Petersen, paragraph 53). In particular, it is for that court to examine whether the legislation at issue in the main proceedings distinguishes between, on the one hand, lecturers and university professors and, on the other hand, other university teaching staff by not providing for the compulsory retirement of the latter, as Mr Georgiev claims. It would thus be necessary to ascertain whether such a distinction corresponds to a necessity in the light of the aims pursued and the particular characteristics of the teaching staff at issue or whether, on the contrary, it indicates an inconsistency in the legislation, which does not therefore satisfy the conditions set out in Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.

57 Secondly, as regards the appropriate and necessary nature of the conclusion of fixed-term contracts as from the age of 65, the Court has already had occasion to examine the compatibility with Directive 2000/78 of national provisions providing for the application of such contracts as from a certain age.

58 In Mangold the Court thus examined national legislation which allows the employers concerned to conclude fixed-term contracts of employment with workers who have reached the age of 52, without distinction, whether or not they were unemployed before the conclusion of the contract, in the light of the objective pursued, namely to promote the integration of unemployed older workers.

59 In that judgment the Court, first, pointed out that such legislation leads to a situation in which the workers concerned may be offered fixed-term contracts which may be renewed an indefinite number of times until the age at which they may claim their entitlement to a retirement pension and are thus in danger, during a substantial part of their working life, of being excluded from the benefit of stable employment which constitutes, according to the Court, a major element in the protection of workers (see Mangold, paragraph 64). Secondly, it held that in so far as such legislation takes the age of the worker concerned as the only criterion for the application of a fixed-term contract of employment, when it has not been shown that fixing an age threshold, as such, regardless of any other consideration linked to the structure of the labour market in question or the personal situation of the person concerned, is objectively necessary to the attainment of the objective which is the vocational integration of unemployed older workers, it must be considered to go beyond what is appropriate and necessary in order to attain the objective pursued (Mangold, paragraph 65).

60 It must be pointed out that national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings is clearly different from that examined in Mangold and appears to be capable of being justified within the meaning of Directive 2000/78.

61 First, the application of fixed-term one-year contracts, which are renewable at most twice, may, like the age limit of 68, be capable of reflecting an employment policy which seeks inter alia to encourage the promotion of younger teaching staff to posts as university professors. In so far as the number of those posts is limited, the application to those professors, as from the age of 65, of fixed-term contracts, makes it possible to secure their departure after a relatively brief period and thus to appoint younger professors in their stead. It is however for the national court to ascertain whether that is the position of the university professors covered by the legislation at issue in the main proceedings.

62 Secondly, the application of those contracts is not solely linked to the condition that the worker has reached a certain age.

63 On the contrary, as is apparent from the national legislation referred to in paragraphs 11 and 12 of this judgment, the decisive factor is that the professor has acquired a right to a retirement pension, in addition to the fact that he has reached a certain age, which is moreover much higher than that at issue in

Mangold, namely 65 instead of 52.

64 It follows from such legislation that the professors to whom a fixed-term contract is offered may choose either to retire with a pension or to continue to work beyond the age of 65.

65 In addition, the fixed-term contracts at issue in the main proceedings are limited to a period of one year and renewable at most twice and thus meet the requirements set out in clause 5, point 1, of the framework agreement on fixed-term work with a view to preventing abuse arising from the use of successive fixed-term contracts.

66 In those circumstances, national legislation which provides for the conclusion of fixed-term contracts, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, is capable of reconciling both the needs of the professors concerned and those of universities and may constitute an appropriate and necessary means for the purposes of achieving the aims referred to in paragraphs 45 and 46 of this judgment if that legislation reflects those aims in a consistent and systematic manner.

67 In any event, as was stated in paragraph 56 of this judgment, it is for the national court to determine whether the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings distinguishes between, on the one hand, lecturers and university professors and, on the other hand, the other university teaching staff as regards the application of fixed-term contracts or contracts of indefinite duration as from the time when the person concerned has reached retirement age. It is also for the national court to ascertain, in particular, whether such a distinction corresponds to a necessity in the light of the aims pursued and the particular characteristics of the teaching staff at issue or whether, on the contrary, it indicates an inconsistency in the legislation, which does not therefore satisfy the conditions set out in Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.

68 Consequently, the answer to the first two questions is that Directive 2000/78, in particular Article 6(1), must be interpreted as meaning that it does not preclude national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, under which university professors are compulsorily retired when they reach the age of 68 and may continue working beyond the age of 65 only by means of fixed-term one-year contracts renewable at most twice, provided that that legislation pursues a legitimate aim linked inter alia to employment and labour market policy, such as the delivery of quality teaching and the best possible allocation of posts for professors between the generations, and that it makes it possible to achieve that aim by appropriate and necessary means. It is for the national court to determine whether those conditions are satisfied.

69 If those conditions are not satisfied the national court also asks whether the national legislation should be disregarded.

70 In accordance with the settled case-law of the Court, where the necessary conditions for the provisions of a directive to be relied on by individuals before the national courts against the State are satisfied, they may do so regardless of the capacity in which the State is acting, whether as employer or as public authority (see, to that effect, inter alia, Case C-188/89 Foster and Others [1990] ECR I−3313, paragraph 17, and Case C-157/02 Rieser Internationale Transporte [2004] ECR I-1477, paragraph 23).

71 It is apparent from the case-file that the national court regards it as established that the University is a public institution against which the provisions of a directive capable of having direct effect may be relied on (see, in that regard, inter alia, Case C-180/04 Vassallo [2006] ECR I−7251, paragraph 26 and the case-law cited).

72 The Court has already had occasion to state the consequences arising, in a dispute between an individual and such an entity, from an incompatibility of national law with the prohibition, in relation to employment and working conditions, of discrimination on grounds of age, laid down in Articles 2 and 3(1)(c) of Directive 2000/78. It has held that national law which is contrary to that directive must, in such a case, be disapplied (see, to that effect, Petersen, paragraph 81).

73 Accordingly, the answer to be given to the referring court is that, since this is a dispute between a public institution and an individual, if national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings does not satisfy the conditions set out in Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78, the national court must decline to apply that legislation.

The third question

74 By its third question the national court requests that the Court interpret the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings.

75 In that regard it is important to bear in mind that, under the procedure laid down in Article 267 TFEU, the Court has no jurisdiction to interpret national law, that being exclusively for the national court (see Case C-53/04 Marrosu and Sardino [2006] ECR I-7213, paragraph 54).

76 In certain cases the Court has been able to infer from questions which apparently related to national law an issue relating to the interpretation of European Union law, examination of which by the Court could help the national court to resolve the dispute before it.

77 However, in Case C-268/09, in which the third question is referred, it is not possible to identify such an issue which would be distinct from those examined in answer to the first two questions.

78 Consequently, there is no need to answer the third question.

Costs

79 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Second Chamber) hereby rules:

Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, in particular Article 6(1), must be interpreted as meaning that it does not preclude national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, under which university professors are compulsorily retired when they reach the age of 68 and may continue working beyond the age of 65 only by means of fixed-term one-year contracts renewable at most twice, provided that that legislation pursues a legitimate aim linked inter alia to employment and labour market policy, such as the delivery of quality teaching and the best possible allocation of posts for professors between the generations, and that it makes it possible to achieve that aim by appropriate and necessary means. It is for the national court to determine whether those conditions are satisfied.

Since this is a dispute between a public institution and an individual, if national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings does not satisfy the conditions set out in Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78, the national court must decline to apply that legislation.

gives the following

Judgment

1 These references for a preliminary ruling concern the interpretation of Article 7 of Directive 2003/88/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time (OJ 2003 L 299, p. 9).

2 The references were made in two sets of proceedings, the first between Mr Schultz-Hoff and his former employer, Deutsche Rentenversicherung Bund ('DRB'), and the second between a number of employees, some of whom have been dismissed, and their employer or former employer, Her[2350] Majesty's Revenue and Customs, regarding the questions whether a worker who is absent on sick leave is entitled to take paid annual leave during that period of sick leave and whether, and if so to what extent, a worker absent on sick leave for the whole or part of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period is entitled to an allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken by the time the employment relationship is terminated.

Legal framework

3 Article 1 of Directive 2003/88 provides as follows:

'Purpose and scope

1. This Directive lays down minimum safety and health requirements for the organisation of working time.

2. The Directive applies to:

(a) minimum periods of … annual leave …

…'

4 Article 7 of the directive reads as follows:

'Annual leave

1. Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that every worker is entitled to paid annual leave of at least four weeks in accordance with the conditions for entitlement to, and granting of, such leave laid down by national legislation and/or practice.

2. The minimum period of paid annual leave may not be replaced by an allowance in lieu, except where the employment relationship is terminated.'

5 Article 17 of Directive 2003/88 allows Member States to derogate from certain provisions of the directive. No derogation is allowed with regard to Article 7 of the directive.

The main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

Case C-520/06

6 The appellants in the main proceedings can be divided into two categories.

7 The first category concerns a worker who was absent from work for several months on indefinite sick leave. In the course of that sick leave, she informed her employer that she wished to take, during the two months following her request, a number of days of paid annual leave.

8 The workers falling into the second category were, before their dismissal, on long-term sick leave. Since they had not taken their paid annual leave during the leave year, the only period during which paid annual leave can be taken under United Kingdom law, they claimed payment in lieu.

9 The workers in those two categories were successful before the Employment Tribunal. The Employment Appeal Tribunal dismissed the employer's appeals but gave permission to appeal to the Court of Appeal (England and Wales) (Civil Division), which allowed the appeals.

10 The appellants in the main proceedings appealed to the House of Lords, which decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Does Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 … mean that a worker on indefinite sick leave is entitled (i) to designate a future period as paid annual leave and (ii) to take paid annual leave, in either case during a period that would otherwise be sick leave?

2. If a Member State exercises its discretion to replace the minimum period of paid annual leave with an allowance in lieu on termination of employment under Article 7(2) of Directive 2003/88 …, in circumstances in which a worker has been absent on sick leave for all or part of the leave year in which the employment relationship is terminated, does Article 7(2) [of that directive] impose any requirements or lay down any criteria as to whether the allowance is to be paid or how it is to be calculated?'

Case C-350/06

11 Mr Schultz-Hoff, the appellant in the main proceedings, had been employed by DRB since 1 April 1971. As of 1995, Mr Schultz-Hoff, who is recognised as having a serious disability, experienced alternate periods of fitness for work and incapacity for work due to illness. In 2004, he was physically fit to work until the beginning of September. Thereafter, he was on continuous sick leave until 30 September 2005, the date on which his employment relationship terminated.

12 By letter of 13 May 2005, Mr Schultz-Hoff requested DRB to authorise him to take, from 1 June 2005, paid annual leave in respect of the calendar year 2004, the leave year. On 25 May 2005, the request was refused on the ground that the competent medical service had first to establish whether he was fit to work. In September 2005, DRB found that Mr Schultz-Hoff was incapacitated for work and, in its capacity as pensions authority, granted him a permanent pension backdated to 1 March 2005.

13 Mr Schultz-Hoff brought an action before the Arbeitsgericht (Labour Court) Düsseldorf seeking payment of allowances in respect of paid annual leave not taken in the calendar years 2004 and 2005, the leave years.

14 DRB maintains that Mr Schultz-Hoff's incapacity for work continues to the present day, and therefore beyond the carry-over period under Paragraph 7(3) of the Federal law on leave (Bundesurlaubsgesetz) of 8 January 1963, in the version applicable to the main proceedings, granted to a worker who has not been able to take his annual leave during the leave year on imperative operational grounds or for reasons connected to the worker himself. As a result, according to German law, the right to paid annual leave has been extinguished and Mr Schultz−Hoff is not entitled to any allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken.

15 The Arbeitsgericht Düsseldorf dismissed Mr Schultz-Hoff's action and he appealed to the Landesarbeitsgericht (Higher Labour Court) Düsseldorf.

16 The national court indicates that according to the relevant provisions of national law, as interpreted by the Bundesarbeitsgericht (Federal Labour Court), a worker's entitlement to an allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken is extinguished at the end of the calendar year concerned and at the latest at the end of a carry−over period which, except in the case of a derogation in favour of the worker laid down in a collective agreement, is of three months' duration. If the worker has been incapacitated for work until the end of the carry-over period, compensation by means of an allowance in lieu of the paid annual leave not taken is not permitted on termination of the employment relationship.

17 The Landesarbeitsgericht Düsseldorf, doubting whether that case-law of the Bundesarbeitsgericht is compatible with Article 7 of Directive 2003/88, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Is Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 … to be understood as meaning that workers must in any event receive minimum annual paid leave of four weeks [and that] in particular leave not taken by a worker because of illness during the leave year must be authorised at a later date, or can national legal provisions and/or national practice stipulate that an entitlement to paid annual leave is extinguished if workers become incapacitated for work during the leave year before leave is authorised and do not recover their capacity for work before the end of the leave year or the carry−over period laid down by statute, collective agreement or individual agreement?

2. Is Article 7(2) of Directive 2003/88 … to be understood as meaning that at the end of the employment relationship workers have, in any event, a claim to financial compensation in respect of leave accrued, but not taken (an allowance in lieu of leave), or can national legislation and/or national practice stipulate that workers will not receive an allowance in lieu of leave if, up to the end of the leave year or the relevant carry-over period, they are incapacitated for work and/or if after the ending of the employment relationship they draw a disability or invalidity pension?

3. In the event that the Court of Justice answers Questions 1 and 2 in the affirmative:

Is Article 7 of Directive 2003/88 … to be understood as meaning that the entitlement to annual leave or an allowance in lieu requires the worker actually to have worked during the leave year, or does the entitlement arise also in the case of excusable absence (by reason of illness) or inexcusable absence in the same leave year?'

18 Given the connection between the two cases in the main proceedings, confirmed at the hearing, they should be joined for the purposes of the judgment.

Questions referred for a preliminary ruling

19 As a preliminary point, it should be noted that the sick leave at issue in the cases in the main proceedings did not exceed the duration of the leave years applicable, in relation to paid annual leave, under the national law in each of those cases.

The right to take paid annual leave during a period of sick leave

20 By the first question referred in Case C-520/06, the national court asks, essentially, whether Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as precluding national legislation or practices which provide that a worker on sick leave is not entitled to take paid annual leave during that sick leave.

21 All the governments and the Commission of the European Communities in their observations consider that that question should be answered in the negative.

22 According to settled case-law, the entitlement of every worker to paid annual leave must be regarded as a particularly important principle of Community social law from which there can be no derogations and whose implementation by the competent national authorities must be confined within the limits expressly laid down by Council Directive 93/104/EC of 23 November 1993 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time (OJ 1993 L 307, p. 18) itself (see Case C-173/99 BECTU [2001] ECR I-4881, paragraph 43; Case C-342/01 Merino Gómez [2004] ECR I-2605, paragraph 29; and Joined Cases C-131/04 and C-257/04 Robinson-Steele and Others [2006] ECR I-2531, paragraph 48).

23 A worker must normally be entitled to actual rest, with a view to ensuring effective protection of his health and safety, since it is only where the employment relationship is terminated that Article 7(2) of Directive 2003/88 permits an allowance to be paid in lieu of paid annual leave (see, to that effect, BECTU, paragraph 44, and Merino Gómez, paragraph 30).

24 Article 7 of Directive 2003/88 is not, furthermore, one of the provisions from which the directive expressly allows derogation.

25 It is common ground that the purpose of the entitlement to paid annual leave is to enable the worker to rest and to enjoy a period of relaxation and leisure. The purpose of the entitlement to sick leave is different. It is given to the worker so that he can recover from being ill.

26 The Court has already held that a period of leave guaranteed by Community law cannot affect the right to take another period of leave guaranteed by that law (see Merino Gómez, paragraphs 32 and 33; Case C-519/03 Commission v Luxembourg [2005] ECR I-3067, paragraph 33; and Case C-116/06 Kiiski [2007] ECR I-7643, paragraph 56). In the case, in particular, of Merino Gómez, the Court held that Article 7(1) of Directive 93/104 must be interpreted as meaning that, where the dates of a worker's maternity leave coincide with those of the general annual leave fixed, by a collective agreement, for the entire workforce, the requirements of that directive relating to paid annual leave cannot be regarded as met.

27 However, by contrast with the rights to maternity leave or parental leave at issue in the case-law cited in the previous paragraph, the right to sick leave and the conditions for exercise of that right are not, as Community law now stands, governed by that law. In addition, the interpretation of Article 7(1) of Directive 93/104 in Merino Gómez was necessary, in the light of the other Community directives at issue in that case, in order to guarantee observance of the rights connected with the employment contract of a worker in the event of maternity leave.

28 With regard to the right to paid annual leave, as is clear from the terms of Directive 2003/88 and the case-law of the Court, it is for the Member States to lay down, in their domestic legislation, conditions for the exercise and implementation of that right, by prescribing the specific circumstances in which workers may exercise the right, without making the very existence of that right, which derives directly from Directive 93/104, subject to any preconditions whatsoever (see, to that effect, BECTU, paragraph 53).

29 It follows, in those circumstances, on the one hand, that Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 does not, as a rule, preclude national legislation or practices according to which a worker on sick leave is not entitled to take paid annual leave during that sick leave, provided however that the worker in question has the opportunity to exercise the right conferred by that directive during another period.

30 According to the case-law of the Court, while the positive effect of paid annual leave for the safety and health of the worker is deployed fully if it is taken in the year prescribed for that purpose, namely the current year, the significance of that rest period in that regard remains if it is taken during a later period (Case C-124/05 Federatie Nederlandse Vakbeweging [2006] ECR I-3423, paragraph 30).

31 On the other hand, nor does Directive 2003/88 preclude national legislation or practices which allow a worker on sick leave to take paid annual leave during that sick leave.

32 In the light of the foregoing, the answer to the first question referred in Case C-520/06 is that Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as not precluding national legislation or practices according to which a worker on sick leave is not entitled to take paid annual leave during that sick leave.

The right to paid annual leave in the event of sick leave which lasts for the whole or part of the leave year, where the incapacity for work persists beyond the end of that year and/or of a carry-over period laid down by national law

33 By the first question and, in the alternative, by the third question to the extent that it relates to the right to leave and not to the allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken, referred in Case C-350/06, the national court asks, essentially, whether Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as precluding national legislation or practices according to which the entitlement to paid annual leave is extinguished at the end of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period laid down by national law even where the worker has been on sick leave for the whole or part of the leave year and where his incapacity to work persisted until the end of his employment relationship.

34 As pointed out inter alia by the German Government at the hearing, with reference to paragraph 53 of BECTU, it is clear from Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 that the conditions for application of the right to paid annual leave in the various Member States are governed by national legislation and/or practice. The German Government thus concludes that the question of carrying over leave and therefore of the specification of a period during which a worker prevented from taking his paid annual leave during the leave year can still take that leave falls within the conditions for the exercise and implementation of the right to paid annual leave and is therefore governed by national legislation and/or practice.

35 While that conclusion can be accepted as a matter of principle, it is nevertheless subject to certain limits.

36 Accordingly the limits to that principle in the specific circumstances of Case C−350/06 must be examined.

– Sick leave lasting for the whole leave year and persisting beyond the end of that year and/or of a carry-over period

37 As a preliminary point, it should be noted that, according to recital 6 in the preamble, Directive 2003/88 has taken account of the principles of the International Labour Organisation with regard to the organisation of working time.

38 In that regard, under Article 5(4) of Convention No 132 of the International Labour Organisation of 24 June 1970 concerning Annual Holidays with Pay (Revised), '… absence from work for such reasons beyond the control of the employed person concerned as illness, … shall be counted as part of the period of service'.

39 With regard, first, to the provisions concerning minimum rest periods in Chapter 2 of Directive 2003/88, they refer in most cases to 'every worker', as indeed does Article 7(1) of the directive in relation to entitlement to paid annual leave (BECTU, paragraph 46).

40 In addition, concerning that entitlement, Directive 2003/88 does not make any distinction between workers who are absent from work on sick leave, whether short-term or long-term, during the leave year and those who have in fact worked in the course of that year.

41 It follows that, with regard to workers on sick leave which has been duly granted, the right to paid annual leave conferred by Directive 2003/88 itself on all workers (BECTU, paragraphs 52 and 53) cannot be made subject by a Member State to a condition concerning the obligation actually to have worked during the leave year laid down by that State.

42 A provision of national law setting out a carry-over period for annual leave not taken by the end of the leave year aims, as a rule, to give a worker who has been prevented from taking his annual leave an additional opportunity to benefit from that leave. The laying down of such a period forms part of the conditions for the exercise and implementation of the right to paid annual leave and therefore falls, as a rule, within the competence of the Member States.

43 It follows that Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 does not preclude, as a rule, national legislation which lays down conditions for the exercise of the right to paid annual leave expressly conferred by the directive, including even the loss of that right at the end of a leave year or of a carry-over period, provided, however, that the worker who has lost his right to paid annual leave has actually had the opportunity to exercise the right conferred on him by the directive.

44 It must therefore be held that a worker, who, like the appellant in the main proceedings in Case C-350/06 in relation to the year 2005, is on sick leave for the whole leave year and beyond the carry-over period laid down by national law, is denied any period giving the opportunity to benefit from his paid annual leave.

45 To accept that, in the specific circumstances of incapacity for work described in the previous paragraph, the relevant provisions of national law, and in particular those laying down the carry-over period, can provide for the loss of the worker's right to paid annual leave guaranteed by Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88, without the worker actually having the opportunity to exercise the right conferred on him by that directive, would mean that those provisions undermined the social right directly conferred by Article 7 of the directive on every worker.

46 Thus, although the Court has accepted that Member States are free to lay down, in their domestic legislation, conditions for the exercise and implementation of the right to paid annual leave, it has nevertheless made clear that Member States are not entitled to make the very existence of that right, which derives directly from Directive 93/104, subject to any preconditions whatsoever (see, to that effect, BECTU, paragraph 53).

47 According to the same case-law, the Court has stated that the requisite arrangements for implementation and application of the requirements of Directive 93/104 may display certain divergences as regards the conditions for exercising the right to paid annual leave, but that that directive does not allow Member States to exclude the very existence of a right expressly granted to all workers (BECTU, paragraph 55).

48 It follows that if, under the case-law cited in the previous paragraphs, the right to paid annual leave guaranteed to the worker by Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 may not be undermined by provisions of national law which exclude the creation or existence of that right, a different result cannot be allowed in relation to provisions of national law which provide for the loss of that right, in the case of a worker on sick leave for the whole leave year and/or beyond a carry-over period, such as Mr Schultz-Hoff, who has not been able to exercise his right to paid annual leave. As in the circumstances in BECTU, where the Court held that the Member States could not exclude the existence of the right to paid annual leave, in a situation such as that of Mr Schultz-Hoff the Member States may not provide for the loss of that right.

49 It follows from the above that Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as meaning that it precludes national legislation or practices which provide that the right to paid annual leave is extinguished at the end of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period laid down by national law even where the worker has been on sick leave for the whole leave year and where his incapacity for work persisted until the end of his employment relationship, which was the reason why he could not exercise his right to paid annual leave.

– Sick leave for part of the leave year, persisting until the end of that year and/or of a carry-over period

50 In the light of the reasoning set out in paragraphs 37 to 49 above, the conclusion to be drawn in relation to the right to paid annual leave of a worker who has worked, like Mr Schultz-Hoff in respect of 2004, for part of the leave year before being put on sick leave, must be the same as that drawn in paragraph 49 above.

51 Every worker denied the benefit of a period of paid annual leave on account of long-term sick leave is in the same situation as that described in paragraph 44 above, inasmuch as incapacity for work owing to sickness is not foreseeable.

52 In the light of all of the foregoing, the answer to the first and third questions, in so far as the latter relates to the right to leave and not to the allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken, referred in Case C−350/06, is that Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as precluding national legislation or practices which provide that the right to paid annual leave is extinguished at the end of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period laid down by national law even where the worker has been on sick leave for the whole or part of the leave year and where his incapacity to work has persisted until the end of his employment relationship, which was the reason why he could not exercise his right to paid annual leave.

The right to an allowance in lieu, on termination of the employment relationship, in respect of paid annual leave not taken in the leave year and/or in a carry-over period on account of incapacity for work for the whole or part of the leave year and/or of the carry-over period

53 By the second question and, in the alternative, by the third question to the extent that it relates to the allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken, referred in Case C−350/06, and by the second question referred in Case C−520/06, the national courts ask, essentially, whether Article 7(2) of

Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as precluding national legislation or practices which provide that, on termination of the employment relationship, no allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken is to be paid where the worker has been on sick leave for the whole or part of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period. If that question is answered in the affirmative, the national court in Case C-520/06 would like to know the criteria for the calculation of the allowance in lieu.

54 In that regard, it should be pointed out first that, as is clear from the very wording of Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88, a provision from which that directive allows no derogation, every worker is entitled to paid annual leave of at least four weeks. That right to paid annual leave, which, according to the case-law referred to in paragraph 22 above, must be regarded as a particularly important principle of Community social law, is therefore granted to every worker, whatever his state of health.

55 Second, as is clear from paragraph 52 above, the right to paid annual leave is not extinguished at the end of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period laid down by national law where the worker was on sick leave for the whole or part of the leave year and has not actually had the opportunity to exercise the right conferred on him by Directive 2003/88.

56 On termination of the employment relationship, it is in fact no longer possible to take paid annual leave. In order to avoid that, as a result, the right in question cannot be enjoyed by the worker, even in pecuniary form, Article 7(2) of Directive 2003/88 provides that the worker is entitled to an allowance in lieu.

57 No provision in Directive 2003/88 expressly lays down the way in which the allowance in lieu of the minimum period or periods of paid annual leave must be calculated where the employment relationship is terminated.

58 However, according to the case-law of the Court, the expression 'paid annual leave' in Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 means that, for the duration of annual leave within the meaning of that directive, remuneration must be maintained and that, in other words, workers must receive their normal remuneration for that period of rest (see Robinson-Steele and Others, paragraph 50).

59 When determining the allowance in lieu payable to the worker under Article 7(2) of Directive 2003/88, the Member States must ensure that the conditions for application laid down by national law take account of the limits which derive from the directive itself.

60 According to the case-law of the Court, Directive 2003/88 treats entitlement to annual leave and to a payment on that account as being two aspects of a single right. The purpose of the requirement of payment for that leave is to put the worker, during such leave, in a position which is, as regards remuneration, comparable to periods of work (see Robinson-Steele and Others, paragraph 58).

61 It follows that, with regard to a worker who has not been able, for reasons beyond his control, to exercise his right to paid annual leave before termination of the employment relationship, the allowance in lieu to which he is entitled must be calculated so that the worker is put in a position comparable to that he would have been in had he exercised that right during his employment relationship. It follows that the worker's normal remuneration, which is that which must be maintained during the rest period corresponding to the paid annual leave, is also decisive as regards the calculation of the allowance in lieu of annual leave not taken by the end of the employment relationship.

62 In the light of all of the foregoing, the answer to the second and third questions, in so far as the latter relates to the allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken, referred in Case C−350/06, and to the second question referred in Case C−520/06, is that Article 7(2) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as precluding national legislation or practices which provide that, on termination of the employment relationship, no allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken is to be paid to a worker who has been on sick leave for the whole or part of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period, which was the reason why he could not exercise his right to paid annual leave. For the calculation of the allowance in lieu, the worker's normal remuneration, which is that which must be maintained during the rest period corresponding to the paid annual leave, is also decisive.

Costs

63 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national courts, the decision on costs is a matter for those courts. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Grand Chamber) hereby rules:

1. Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time must be interpreted as not precluding national legislation or practices according to which a worker on sick leave is not entitled to take paid annual leave during that sick leave.

2. Article 7(1) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as precluding national legislation or practices which provide that the right to paid annual leave is extinguished at the end of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period laid down by national law even where the worker has been on sick leave for the whole or part of the leave year and where his incapacity to work has persisted until the end of his employment relationship, which was the reason why he could not exercise his right to paid annual leave.

3. Article 7(2) of Directive 2003/88 must be interpreted as precluding national legislation or practices which provide that, on termination of the employment relationship, no allowance in lieu of paid annual leave not taken is to be paid to a worker who has been on sick leave for the whole or part of the leave year and/or of a carry-over period, which was the reason why he could not exercise his right to paid annual leave. For the calculation of the allowance in lieu, the worker's normal remuneration, which is that which must be maintained during the rest period corresponding to the paid annual leave, is also decisive.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

WESTERN EXCAVATING (E.C.C.) LTD. v. SHARP

1977 Nov. 1, 2; 14

Lord Denning M.R., Lawton and Eveleigh L.JJ.

Industrial Relations—Unfair dismissal—Constructive dismissal—Whether test of contract or unreasonable conduct to be applied—Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 (c. 52), Sch. 1, para. 5 (2) (c)

An employee was suspended from work for five days without pay because he had taken time off after his employers had refused permission for him to do so. As a result of the suspension he was short of money and sought an advance from the employers of his accrued holiday pay. That having been refused on the ground that it was against company policy to pay holiday money unless a holiday was being taken, the employee asked the employers for a loan to make up his week's wages. When told that he could not have a loan to that extent, the employee, in order to obtain his holiday pay, left his employment. The employee made a complaint of unfair dismissal. The industrial tribunal, by a majority, held that, pursuant to paragraph 5 (2) (c) of Schedule 1 to the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974,[1] the employee had been justified by the employers' conduct in terminating his employment and awarded him compensation. The Employment Appeal Tribunal, dismissing an appeal by the employers, refused to interfere with the decision on the ground that it was impossible to say that the industrial tribunal had gone so badly wrong in law or had reached a conclusion to which no reasonable tribunal could have come.

On appeal by the employers:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that whether an employee was entitled to terminate his contract of employment by reason of the employer's conduct and so be treated as having been dismissed, pursuant to paragraph 5 (2) (c) of Schedule 1 to the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974, had to be determined in accordance with the law of contract and not by applying a test of unreasonableness to the employer's conduct; and that there had been no breach or repudiation of the contract of employment by the employers and the employee could not be treated as having been dismissed.

APPEAL from Employment Appeal Tribunal.

In March 1976 the employee, Colin John Sharp, made a complaint under the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 that he had been unfairly dismissed by his employers, Western Excavating (E.C.C.) Ltd. On April 22, 1976, an industrial tribunal at St. Austell by a majority decision found the complaint proved and awarded the employee £658 compensation. The award was upheld by the Employment Appeal Tribunal on November 15, 1976.

The employers appealed, by notice dated December 24, 1976, on the grounds (1) that the Employment Appeal Tribunal erred in holding that there was any or any sufficient evidence on which an industrial tribunal properly directing itself in law could find that the employers had dismissed the employee; (2) that the industrial tribunal and the Employment Appeal Tribunal misdirected themselves as to the meaning of paragraph 5 (2) of Schedule 1 to the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974; (3) that the Employment Appeal Tribunal erred in holding that there was any or any sufficient evidence on which an industrial tribunal properly directing itself in law could find that the employers had repudiated and/or had been in breach of their contract of employment with the employee; (4) that the Employment Appeal Tribunal erred in not holding that the industrial tribunal misdirected itself in law in failing to consider whether the employers repudiated and/or were in breach of their contract of employment with the employee; and (5) that the Employment Appeal Tribunal erred in not holding that the industrial tribunal failed to direct itself properly in law by considering whether there was any term in the contract of employment of which the employers were in breach.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Denning M.R.

Andrew Smith for the employers.
Francis Gilbert for the employee.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 14. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING M.R. Mr. Sharp was only employed by the China-Clay Co. for 20 months. He left of his own accord. Yet he has been awarded £658 as compensation for unfair dismissal. There seems something wrong about that award. What is it?

To fill in the details, the employee started work with the company on July 9, 1974. One of the terms was that, if he worked extra time, he could have time off in lieu. One day in February 1976 he wanted to play a card game for a team. He asked the foreman for three hours off. The foreman said that he could not have it that afternoon as there was a lot of work to be done. But the employee took it off and played his game of cards. Next morning—Friday, February 27, 1976—the foreman dismissed him, giving him two weeks' notice for failing to carry out a reasonable order. The employee appealed to a panel set up by the company under its disciplinary procedure. On March 5, 1976, the panel allowed his appeal, saying:

> "Having considered all the evidence presented to us, we are of the unanimous decision that the dismissal be withdrawn, as there was room for confusion the way the situation was left, but having regard to the seriousness of what has happened, we substitute the dismissal with five working days' suspension without pay."

Thus, the employee lost five days' pay. He does not dispute the justice of the panel's decision. But it left him in financial difficulties. He was living with a woman who was, in modern terminology, his "common law wife" and their two children. His take-home pay was £42·40 a week. He had no savings, but he had holiday pay accrued to him of £117·17 net.

As a result of the five days' loss of pay, the employee had no money to pay his household expenses. He went to the social security and was given £6·45. But that was not enough to carry on. So he went to his employers. He asked for an advance on his accrued holiday pay. He was told, quite correctly, that it was against company policy to pay holiday pay unless the holiday was itself actually taken. The employee then asked for a loan. He said he wanted £40. The welfare officer told him that the company could not make him a loan to that extent. The welfare officer suggested that he should see him again to discuss the details. That did not satisfy the employee. He said: "If the company cannot help me, I must sort it out myself. I shall have to obtain my holiday pay." That is just what he did. He went to see the workshop manager, and said: "I don't want to leave, but circumstances force me to do so. I am leaving and want my holiday pay now." So on March 11, 1976, the employee picked up his holiday pay of £117·17, and left. He went straight off to the industrial tribunal and made a complaint of unfair dismissal.

The industrial tribunal were divided in opinion. Two of them thought the employee had been unfairly dismissed and that he should be awarded £658. They said that the company "ought to have leant over backwards" to help him and that the company's conduct "justified the employee in terminating his employment in order to obtain his accrued holiday pay, and so to meet his commitments." The third member disagreed. He thought that the employee ought to have talked to the welfare officer again. He held:

> ". . . the employee's decision to resign was not caused or originated by any misconduct on the part of the company, but was solely his own personal decision. There has, therefore, been no dismissal, whether constructive or otherwise. . ."

The company appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal. They said significantly:

> "If each one of us individually had been sitting on this industrial tribunal, we would have been minded to take the same view as that of the minority member."

But they dismissed the company's appeal because they said they were > ". . . forced to the conclusion that it is impossible to say that this industrial tribunal went so badly wrong in law, or reached such a conclusion that no reasonable tribunal could have come to it."

So the employee (who left work of his own accord, because he was not granted a loan as to the full amount he asked) was awarded £658 compensation. It does seem strange. Especially as the industrial tribunal said:

> ". . . in finding against the company . . . we imply no criticism of their general treatment of the employee, or of their personnel administration and procedures as a whole. On the contrary, we consider all these aspects to have been quite excellent and the company to have been good, responsible and careful employers. . . We regard the events of March 9 and 10 as something exceptional."

The law

Until recently, an ordinary servant had no security of tenure. He could be dismissed on a month's notice or a month's salary in lieu of notice, although he might have served his master faithfully for years. That was altered by the provisions of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, which have now been re-enacted in Schedule 1 to the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974. Paragraph 4 says: ". . . every employee shall have the right not to be unfairly dismissed by his employer. . ." If he is unfairly dismissed, he can complain to an industrial tribunal. The tribunal may recommend that he be reinstated in his job, if that is practicable. Alternatively, it may award him compensation in such amount as is fair and equitable. It may be as much as £5,200. So, whereas at common law an employer could dismiss a man on a month's notice or a month's wages in lieu, nowadays an employer cannot dismiss a man even on good notice, except at the risk of having to pay him a large sum should the industrial tribunal find that the dismissal was unfair.

These provisions are not confined to cases where the employer himself dismisses the man. They also apply to cases where the man leaves of his own choice, if he can show that it was due to the way the employer treated him. In other words, compensation is payable, not only for actual dismissal, but also for "constructive dismissal." We have here to consider the doctrine of "constructive dismissal."

The statutory provisions

The circumstances in which an employee qualifies as being "dismissed" by his employer were first set out in the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, section 3 (1), in these words:

> ". . . an employee shall . . . be taken to be dismissed by his employer if, but only if,—(a) the contract under which he is employed by the employer is terminated by the employer, whether it is so terminated by notice or without notice, or (b) where under that contract he is employed for a fixed term, that term expires without being renewed under the same contract, or (c) the employee terminates that contract without notice in circumstances . . . such that he is entitled so to terminate it by reason of the employer's conduct."

A similar provision was contained in section 23 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, but with the significant omission of paragraph (c).

In paragraph 5 (2) of Schedule 1 to the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 the original provision was re-enacted, but with paragraph (c) restored. But on being restored there was an important amendment. The amended paragraph reads:

> "(c) the employee terminates that contract, with or without notice, in circumstances such that he is entitled to terminate it without notice by reason of the employer's conduct."

The words "with or" were inserted because it was realised that paragraph (c) as enacted in 1965 left a gap. A man who was considerate enough to give notice was worse off than one who left without notice.

Paragraph 5 (2) (c) has given rise to a vast body of case law as to what comes within it. It is spoken of as "constructive dismissal." It has given rise to a problem upon which there has been a diversity of views among chairmen of industrial tribunals and among the judges of the Employment Appeal Tribunal. On July 28, 1977, the Employment Appeal Tribunal attempted to settle these differences in Wetherall (Bond St. W1) Ltd. v. Lynn [1978] I.C.R. 205 but they were unsettled again by the discovery of some obiter dicta in the Court of Appeal in Turner v. London Transport Executive [1977] I.C.R. 952. This led the Employment Appeal Tribunal on October 4, 1977, to think that they ought to follow those obiter dicta and to give guidance accordingly. It is to be found in Scott v. Aveling Barford Ltd. [1978] I.C.R. 214. But this guidance was expressed to be given as an interim measure pending an authoritative statement of the law by the Court of Appeal or the Court of Session.

It is with diffidence that we approach the task. The rival tests are as follows.

The contract test

On the one hand, it is said that the words of paragraph 5 (2) (c) express a legal concept which is already well settled in the books on contract under the rubric "discharge by breach." If the employer is guilty of conduct which is a significant breach going to the root of the contract of employment, or which shows that the employer no longer intends to be bound by one or more of the essential terms of the contract, then the employee is entitled to treat himself as discharged from any further performance. If he does so, then he terminates the contract by reason of the employer's conduct. He is constructively dismissed. The employee is entitled in those circumstances to leave at the instant without giving any notice at all or, alternatively, he may give notice and say he is leaving at the end of the notice. But the conduct must in either case be sufficiently serious to entitle him to leave at once. Moreover, he must make up his mind soon after the conduct of which he complains: for, if he continues for any length of time without leaving, he will lose his right to treat himself as discharged. He will be regarded as having elected to affirm the contract.

The unreasonableness test

On the other hand, it is said that the words of paragraph 5 (2) (c) do not express any settled legal concept. They introduce a new concept into contracts of employment. It is that the employer must act reasonably in his treatment of his employees. If he conducts himself or his affairs so unreasonably that the employee cannot fairly be expected to put up with it any longer, the employee is justified in leaving. He can go, with or without giving notice, and claim compensation for unfair dismissal.

It would seem that this new concept of "unreasonable conduct" is very similar to the concept of "unfairness" as described in paragraph 6 (8) of Schedule 1 to the Act of 1974 which says:

> ". . . the determination of the question whether the dismissal was fair or unfair, having regard to the reason shown by the employer, shall depend on whether the employer can satisfy the tribunal that in the circumstances (having regard to equity and the substantial merits of the case) he acted reasonably in treating it as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee."

Those who adopt the unreasonableness test for dismissal say quite frankly that it is the same as the "unreasonableness" test for fairness. That was the view taken by Megaw L.J. in Turner's case [1977] I.C.R. 952, 964. He said:

> "So far as (c) is concerned, in my judgment, the wording of this subparagraph is not a wording which involves, or implies, the same concept as the common law concept of fundamental breach of a contract resulting in its unilateral repudiation and acceptance of that unilateral repudiation by the innocent party. The employer's 'conduct' here is employer's conduct to be adjudged by the industrial tribunal by the criteria which they regard as right and fair in respect of a case in which the issue is whether or not there has been 'unfair' dismissal."

Previous cases

The only previous case in the Court of Appeal on the words is Marriott v. Oxford and District Co-operative Society Ltd. (No. 2) [1970] 1 Q.B. 186. It was under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. Section 3 (1) (c) did not apply because it only applied where the employee terminated his contract without notice, whereas Marriott had terminated it with notice. So the court put it on section 3 (1) (a). But since the amendment to the wording of paragraph (c), it would have been more properly brought under paragraph (c). It was not really an (a) case: but we had to stretch it a bit. It was not the employer who terminated the employment. It was the employee: and he was entitled to do so by reason of the employer's conduct.

All the other cases are in the Employment Appeal Tribunal. We have studied them all, but I hope I will be excused from going through them.

The result

In my opinion, the contract test is the right test. My reasons are as follows. (i) The statute itself draws a distinction between "dismissal" in paragraph 5 (2) (c) and "unfairness" in paragraph 6 (8). If Parliament intended that same test to apply, it would have said so. (ii) "Dismissal" in paragraph 5 (2) goes back to "dismissal" in the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. Its interpretation should not be influenced by paragraph 6 (8) which was introduced first in 1971 in the Industrial Relations Act 1971. (iii) Paragraph 5 (2) (c) uses words which have a legal connotation, especially the words "entitled" and "without notice." If a non-legal connotation were intended, it would have added "justified in leaving at once" or some such non-legal phrase. (iv) Paragraph 5 (2) (a) and (c) deal with different situations. Paragraph 5 (2) (a) deals with cases where the employer himself terminates the contract by dismissing the man with or without notice. That is, when the employer says to the man: "You must go." Paragraph 5 (2) (c) deals with the cases where the employee himself terminates the contract by saying: "I can't stand it any longer. I want my cards." (v) The new test of "unreasonable conduct" of the employer is too indefinite by far. It has led to acute difference of opinion between the members of tribunals. Often there are majority opinions. It has led to findings of "constructive dismissal" on the most whimsical grounds. The Employment Appeal Tribunal tells us so. It is better to have the contract test of the common law. It is more certain: as it can well be understood by intelligent laymen under the direction of a legal chairman. (vi) I would adopt the reasoning of the considered judgment of the Employment Appeal Tribunal in Wetherall (Bond St. W1) Ltd. v. Lynn [1978] I.C.R. 205, 211:

> "Parliament might well have said, in relation to whether the employer's conduct had been reasonable having regard to equity and the substantial merits of the case, but it neither laid down that special statutory criterion or any other. So, in our judgment, the answer can only be, entitled according to law, and it is to the law of contract that you have to look."

(vii) The test of unreasonableness gives no effect to the words "without notice." They impose a legal test which no test of "unreasonableness" can do.

Conclusion

The present case is a good illustration of a "whimsical decision." Applying the test of "unreasonable conduct," the industrial tribunal decided by a majority of two to one in favour of the employee. All three members of the Employment Appeal Tribunal would have decided in favour of the employers, but felt that it was a matter of fact on which they could not reverse the industrial tribunal. So, counting heads, it was four to two in favour of the employers, but yet the case was decided against them—because of the test of "unreasonable conduct."

If the contract test had been applied, the result would have been plain. There was no dismissal, constructive or otherwise, by the employers. The employers were not in breach at all. Nor had they repudiated the contract at all. The employee left of his own accord without anything wrong done by the employers. His claim should have been rejected. The decision against the employers was most unjust to them. I would allow the appeal, accordingly.

LAWTON L.J. Two questions require to be answered in this appeal. First, did the industrial tribunal at St. Austell which adjudicated upon the employee's claim for compensation for unfair dismissal direct itself correctly in law when purporting to apply to the evidence in the case paragraph 5 (2) (c) of Schedule 1 to the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974. Secondly, even if it did, could it reasonably have decided as it did on the evidence before it? In my judgment, the answer to each of these questions is "no."

The answer to the first question turns upon the construction of paragraph 5. It has a legislative history going back to the Redundancy Payments Act 1965; but, for my part, I prefer to get the meaning out of paragraph 5 (2) (c) from the enacted words and the context in which they were used. Paragraph 4 established an employee's right not to be dismissed unfairly. What meaning was to be applied to dismissal? What to unfair? There could be no unfairness until there had been a dismissal. The word "dismissal" is a noun connoting a state of affairs—the condition of being sent away. That state of affairs either exists or it does not. The word is positive and definitive. The adjective "unfair" qualifies the state of affairs which amounts to a dismissal. Paragraphs 5 (2) (c) and 6 reflect the difference between the noun and the adjective. The former states what in law constitutes the state of affairs which is to be considered as a dismissal. Paragraph 6 deals with fairness. From the concept which is inherent in the word "dismissal" the state of affairs amounting to a dismissal must be clearly identifiable. Paragraph 5 (2) (a) defines one state of affairs amounting to dismissal by reference to the termination of the contract of employment. This necessarily involves the tribunal in considering the ending of contractual rights. Sub-sub-paragraph (a) does not apply at all unless the employee's contractual rights have been terminated. Contractual rights have to be considered again under sub-sub-paragraph (b). It would be odd if they did not have to be considered under sub-sub-paragraph (c) which sets out the circumstances in which an employee can terminate his contract of employment. When he does so, he purports to release himself from his contractual obligations; but he can only do so in the circumstances specified which must be "such that he is entitled to (do so) without notice by reason of the employer's conduct." The word "entitled" in this context connoted the existence of a right. The only right which the employee can have to terminate his contract of employment is that which the law gives him. His right is of a specified kind. It is a right to terminate "without notice by reason of the employer's conduct." In my judgment, this is the language of contract; language which has a significant meaning in law in that it confers a right on an employee to be released from his contract and extinguishes the right of the employer to hold the employee to it. Any other construction would produce an odd result. As Mr. Smith pointed out in argument, if sub-sub-paragraph (c) did not bring the contract to an end altogether the nonsensical position would arise that the employee could terminate it but the employer could sue him for damages for doing so without notice. In my judgment, contracts can only be brought to an end in ways known to the law.

For the purpose of this judgment, I do not find it either necessary or advisable to express any opinion as to what principles of law operate to bring a contract of employment to an end by reason of an employer's conduct. Sensible persons have no difficulty in recognising such conduct when they hear about it. Persistent and unwanted amorous advances by an employer to a female member of his staff would, for example, clearly be such conduct; and for a chairman of an industrial tribunal in such a case to discuss with his lay members whether there had been a repudiation or a breach of a fundamental term by the employer would be for most lay members a waste of legal learning. There may occasionally be border-line cases which would require a chairman to analyse the legal principles applicable for the benefit of the lay members; but when such cases do occur he should try to do so in the kind of language which 19th century judges used when directing juries about the law applicable to contracts of employment, rather than the language which nowadays would be understood and appreciated by academic lawyers. I appreciate that the principles of law applicable to the termination by an employee of a contract of employment because of his employer's conduct are difficult to put concisely in the language judges use in court. Lay members of industrial tribunals, however, do not spend all their time in court and when out of court they may use, and certainly will hear, short words and terse phrases which describe clearly the kind of employer of whom an employee is entitled without notice to rid himself. This is what paragraph 5 (2) (c) is all about; and what is required for the application of this provision is a large measure of common sense.

This it did not get from the industrial tribunal at St. Austell. The employee did not suggest, nor could he have done so, that the employers had been in breach of their contract with him. He had been guilty of misconduct at work and had been dismissed. Under a procedure between the employers and the unions represented in their undertaking he had successfully appealed against his dismissal, which was varied to a five days' suspension without pay. He had no right to be given any money other than that which he had earned; and at the material time because of his own acts he had earned hardly any. To suggest, as the majority of the tribunal did, that in these circumstances the employers should > ". . . have leant over backwards to ensure that the same result as the discredited dismissal was not to be achieved through administrative blockage or any over rigid adherence to criteria or procedures not designed for this abnormal situation" is to cut adrift from common sense and reason and to decide cases on the kind of whimsical grounds to which Phillips J. referred and disapproved of in Scott v. Aveling Barford Ltd. [1978] I.C.R. 214, 220.

The statutory provisions which have been under consideration in this case have brought social justice into labour relations; but this new and desirable factor must be based on justice, not on whimsy or sentimentality. No justice was shown to the employers in this case. In blunt legal terms, this was a perverse decision.

Lord Denning M.R. has reviewed the case law relevant to this appeal. I agree with what he has said about it and have nothing to add.

I too would allow the appeal.

EVELEIGH L.J. I agree with both judgments and have nothing to add.

Appeal allowed with costs.
Order for costs not to be enforced without leave.
Leave to appeal refused.

Judgment

Lord Justice Elias :

This is the judgment of the court

1. This appeal raises issues of construction relating to regulation 24 of the Working Time Regulations 1998.

2. The appellant is a security guard who works for the respondent employer. His employer provides security guarding services for various clients. The appellant was assigned to a site at Croydon owned by Orange, the telecommunications company, where the respondent was providing twenty four hour security coverage. The appellant guarded the site together with two other security officers. It was a single manned site so that on any one day one security guard worked a day shift, another worked a night shift, and the third had a rest day. This apparently is a typical arrangement for single manned sites.

3. This appeal raises the question whether the appellant was given an appropriate rest break during his shift as required by the Regulations. Unlike most workers, he was not able to take uninterrupted rest breaks. His job duties required him to be continuously available to supervise and monitor access to the Croydon site. He was provided with a kitchen area where breaks could be taken but he had to remain on call during these periods. He was permitted to leave a message on the reception desk where the monitoring and security equipment was placed saying that he was on his break and leaving a contact number. This meant, however, that his break might be interrupted by visitors to the site. If his break was interrupted then he was permitted to start it again. Sometimes, particularly at night, he would in fact have a complete uninterrupted break although he could never be sure in advance that that would be the position.

4. The appellant complained that this arrangement did not comply with the employer's obligations to provide him with a break under the Working Time Regulations.

The relevant law.

5. The Working Time Regulations give effect to Council Directive 93/04EC, known as the Working Time Directive. (This was subsequently amended by Directive 2003/88/EEC but not in any material way.) The Directive lays down minimum health and safety requirements for the organisation of working time. The Directive stipulates maximum hours in the working week and seeks to ensure that workers receive adequate periods of rest between periods of work, and also have proper breaks during the course of their working hours.

6. The following Recitals of the Directive identify its fundamental underlying purposes. They demonstrate that whilst the purpose is the protection of the health and safety of workers, some flexibility in applying the standards may be justified to take into account unusual or particular working arrangements where strict compliance would cause operational difficulties.

> "Whereas….
> (2) Article 137 of the Treaty provides that the Community is to support and complement the activities of the Member States with a view to improving the working environment to protect workers' health and safety. Directives adopted on the basis of that Article are to avoid imposing administrative, financial and legal constraints in a way which would hold back the creation and development of small and medium-sized undertakings.

(4) The improvement of workers' safety, hygiene and health at work is an objective which should not be subordinated to purely economic considerations.

(5) All workers should have adequate rest periods. The concept of "rest" must be expressed in units of time, ie in days, hours and/or fractions thereof. Community workers must be granted minimum daily, weekly and annual periods of rest and adequate breaks. It is also necessary in this context to place a maximum limit on weekly working hours.

(16) It is necessary to provide that certain provisions may be subject to derogation implemented, according to the case, by the Member States or the two sides of industry. As a general rule, in the event of a derogation, the workers concerned must be given equivalent compensation rest periods."

7. These principles are then reflected in the detailed rights conferred by the Articles of the Directive. Article 2 sets out the definitions. It defines both working time and rest periods as follows:

> "working time" means any period which the worker is working, at the employer's disposal and carrying out his activities and duties, in accordance with national laws and/or practice."
> "rest period" means any period which is not working time."

8. Chapter 2 is headed "Minimum rest periods - other aspects of the organisation of working time". Article 3 deals with daily rests and provides that workers should receive a minimum of 11 consecutive hours per 24 hour period; Article 4 with breaks; Article 5 with weekly rest periods, entitling a worker to a minimum of uninterrupted 24 hours in a seven day period; Article 6 provides for a maximum weekly working time of 48 hours; and Article 7 provides that workers should have at least four weeks' paid annual leave.

9. Article 4 is directly in issue in this case. It is as follows:

> "Breaks
>
> Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, where the working day is longer than six hours, every worker is entitled to a rest break, the details of which, including the duration and the terms on which it is granted, shall be laid down in collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry or, failing that, by national legislation."

10. Article 17 then identifies a number of areas where derogation from the rights conferred by the Directive is permitted. Article 17(2) is as follows:

> "2. Derogations provided for in paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 may be adopted by means of laws, regulations or administrative provisions or by means of collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry provided that the workers concerned are afforded equivalent periods of compensatory rest or that, in exceptional cases in which it is not possible, for objective reasons, to grant such equivalent periods of compensatory rest, the workers concerned are afforded appropriate protection."

11. Paragraph 3 of that Article then identifies particular kinds of work activities where derogations from some of the Articles, including the right to a break conferred by Article 4, may be permitted. They include "security and surveillance activities requiring a permanent presence." The appellant has conceded that the exception applies to him and his colleagues providing security work at the Croydon site, although for reasons we give later, we do not think that this concession was consistent with the arguments advanced before the Employment Tribunal.

12. The Working Time Regulations give effect to the Directive, frequently by adopting virtually the same language. The material provisions are as follows:

> "2 Interpretation
>
> (1) In these Regulations -
>
> ……
>
> 'rest period' in relation to a worker, means a period which is not working time, other than a rest break or leave to which the worker is entitled under these Regulations;
>
> ……..
>
> 'working time', in relation to a worker, means –
>
> (a) any period during which he is working, at his employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties….
>
> and 'work' shall be construed accordingly;"

13. Regulation 12 provides that there must be certain rest breaks in the course of a worker's working time.

> "12) Rest Breaks

> (1) Where a worker's daily working time is more than six hours, he is entitled to a rest break."

The regulation then specifies that the details of the entitlement, including the duration of the break and the terms on which it is granted, should be in accordance with any relevant collective agreement. Absent any such agreement, the default position is set out in regulation 12(3) as follows:

> "(3) Subject to the provisions of any applicable collective agreement or workforce agreement, the rest break provided for in paragraph (1) is an uninterrupted period of not less than 20 minutes, and the worker is entitled to spend it away from his workstation if he has one…"

14. The Government chose to take advantage of the right to create derogations conferred by Article 17 of the Directive. Part III of the Regulations sets out various provisions where the regulations have either been excluded altogether or have been modified in certain respects. Certain sectors of activity are excluded by regulation 18; domestic service by regulation 19; those working unmeasured working time by regulation 20; there is then a category defined as "other special cases" in regulation 21 with respect to whom certain of the rights are excluded including the right to a break under regulation 12; and regulation 23 empowers collective parties to modify or exclude certain rights again including regulation 12 rights.

15. For the most part the exceptions are defined by reference to the activities in which a worker is engaged. The relevant exception here is regulation 21(b) which provides:

> "Subject to regulation 24, regulations ….12(1) do not apply in relation to a worker…
> … (b) where the worker is engaged in security and surveillance activities requiring a permanent presence in order to protect property and persons, as may be the case for security guards and caretakers of security firms …"

16. The fact that exclusions or exceptions have been made with respect to certain workers does not mean that they are left without any rights under these Regulations. This is made clear by regulation 24 which is cast in the same language as Article 17.2 of the Directive:

> "Where the application of any provision of these Regulations is excluded by regulation 21 or 22, or modified or excluded by means of a collective agreement or a workforce agreement under regulation 23(a), and a worker is accordingly required by his employer to work during a period which would otherwise be a rest period or rest break –
> (a) his employer shall wherever possible allow him to take an equivalent period of compensatory rest, and

> (b) in exceptional cases in which it is not possible, for objective reasons, to grant such a period of rest, his employer shall afford him such protection as may be appropriate in order to safeguard the worker's health and safety."

The scope of regulation 21and its relationship to regulation 24.

17. In our judgment, an issue of some importance in this case is whether regulation 21 requires the court to focus on the activities carried out by the employer or those carried out by the worker. The language of the regulation, and indeed of the Directive which it implements, is somewhat opaque about this. The security activities referred to in paragraph 21(b) do not require the worker's permanent presence; obviously no activities could. Rather they require that the employer ensures that a worker is permanently present on site. If the intention were that paragraph (b) would apply whenever that situation arises, this would mean that all employees employed in that activity would be deprived of their rights under regulation 12. That would be so even if the employer could readily organise the work so as to secure breaks for them which are identical in every way to a regulation 12 break. If, however, the proper construction is that the paragraph applies only when the nature of the activity requires the particular worker to be permanently present throughout their shift, the derogation will be much narrower. It will apply only to those workers whose own work pattern satisfies the relevant conditions.

18. This question was considered by the Court of Appeal in Gallagher v Alpha Catering Services Ltd [2005] ICR 673. That case concerned regulation 21(c) rather than 21(b) but in our view it raises precisely the same issue of construction. Regulation 21(c) permits derogation where a worker's activities "involve the need for continuity of service or production as the case may be" in relation to various activities, one of which is work at docks or airports.

19. The appellant in Gallagher was employed by a company which provided food and drink to airlines operating out of Gatwick Airport. They had to load and unload aeroplanes very speedily. In between those bursts of activity they were entitled to "downtime" when they were not actually doing anything but had to remain in their vehicles so that they could be called upon by the employer as and when required. The employees alleged that they were not being given their regulation 12 work breaks. The company relied upon regulation 21(c) claiming that they required continuity of service for their operations so that regulation 12 was disapplied. In the alternative, they submitted that downtime of at least twenty minutes duration constituted a rest break within the meaning of regulation 12.

20. The Employment Tribunal held that the workers did fall within the scope of regulation 21(c) because the employer's activities required continuity of service. The EAT upheld the employees' appeals on the grounds that the Employment Tribunal had wrongly focused on the employer's activities, whereas in fact they should have concentrated on the activity of the particular workers. It appears to have been accepted that had they done so, the regulation would not have been applicable because the staff rotas could have been so arranged as to secure an appropriate regulation 12 break for those concerned. Accordingly, the continuous presence throughout the shift of any particular worker was not required and so regulation 21(b) was not engaged.

21. The Court of Appeal dismissed the employer's appeal. Peter Gibson LJ, with whose judgment Buxton and Jacob LJJ agreed, observed that whilst the Directive was not as clear on this point as it might have been, it was tolerably plain that the intention was to focus on the activities of the worker. The judge concluded (para 37):

> "… No doubt the activities of the worker are the activities of the employer in law, but the focus is on the activities of the worker rather than the employer, which activities involve the requisite need for continuity of service or production."

22. In this case it has always been conceded that regulation 21(b) applied although as we shall explain, that appears to have been because it was thought that the appropriate test was what the activities of the employer required.

23. The construction of regulation 21 in turn influences the correct interpretation of regulation 24. If when determining whether regulation 21 applied, the relevant activities to consider were those of the employer and not the worker, the right to a regulation 12 work break would be excluded in a significant number of cases where the employer could in fact readily organise the work so as to secure to the staff full regulation 12 breaks. They would not be regulation 12 breaks because that regulation would have been disapplied; they would necessarily constitute "equivalent periods of compensatory rest" under regulation 24(a) even though in every sense identical to regulation 12 breaks. It would then be necessary for the tribunal to ask, in the context of applying regulation 24, whether there were objective reasons why the working arrangements could not be arranged so as to secure a full break. However, since the focus is on the worker's activities, that question has to be considered at the prior stage of determining whether regulation 21 is engaged at all. It follows that the concept of an equivalent period of compensatory rest under regulation 24(a) cannot be a period identical to a regulation 12 break. It is something given in place of that break. Precisely what form any alternative arrangement can make whilst still falling within the scope of regulation 24(a) is an issue arising in this appeal.

24. In Gallagher, once the court had determined that regulation 21 did not dis-apply regulation 12, the issue was whether the break afforded to the workers complied with the requirements of that provision. The Court of Appeal had regard to two decisions of the ECJ, SIMAP v Conselleria de Sandidad [2000] IRLR 845 and Landeschauptstadt Kiel v Jaeger [2003] IRLR 804, which establish that when a worker is required to be on call at his place of work so that he can resume duties when required by his employer, that will still count as working time even if the worker is entitled to sleep whilst awaiting the employer's summons. It was argued for the employer that working time and rest breaks were not mutually exclusive, but Peter Gibson LJ, by implication at least, rejected that submission. He held that the characteristics of the break granted in that case did not amount to a regulation 12 rest break, and that was so even if in fact the employee had an uninterrupted twenty minute period of downtime (para 50):

> "… a period of downtime cannot retrospectively become a rest break only because it can be seen after it is over that it was an uninterrupted period of at least 20 minutes. The worker is entitled …to a rest break if his working time exceeds six hours, and he must know at the start of the break that it is such. To my mind a rest break is an uninterrupted period of at least 20 minutes which the worker can use as he pleases."

It follows that the break afforded to the appellant in this case would not satisfy the regulation 12 definition of a rest break because it was subject to possible interruption.

The history of the litigation.

25. The litigation in this case has had a somewhat chequered history. The original claim to the Employment Tribunal was lodged over 4 years ago in June 2007. Initially the appellant claimed that he was entitled to a break under regulation 12, or alternatively under regulation 24. However, he did not pursue the regulation 12 argument before the Tribunal because it was accepted that the appellant was covered by the exception in regulation 21(b). Accordingly, the arguments below were advanced on the premise that the rights conferred by regulation 12 were inapplicable and that the source of any rights was therefore regulation 24.

26. The argument before the first Employment Tribunal took on a very different hue from that now relied upon. The parties were agreed that the only relevant provision was regulation 24(a) and that paragraph (b) was not in issue. The employers contended that they had provided equivalent compensatory rest by allowing the appellant his full rest after his shift had ended, that is during the daily rest periods available to him. Not surprisingly the Tribunal rejected that submission, holding that if possible any compensatory rest had to be taken during working time. The Tribunal re-listed the case for a hearing to determine whether the claimant had been afforded where possible an equivalent period of compensatory rest during his working time and if not, to consider what, if any, compensation was payable.

27. The employer appealed to the EAT. Although they succeeded in aspects of their appeal, they again failed in their argument that the compensatory break could be given during the rest period immediately following the completion of the shift. In the course of his judgment in the EAT, Silber J (presiding) set out the way in which tribunals ought to approach regulation 24 (para. 31):

> "When considering regulation 24, the Employment Tribunal has a two-stage approach in which it has first to be decided if the claimant's case was such that it was not "possible for objective reasons [to] grant such [an equivalent period of compensatory] rest". If the answer was in the affirmative in the sense that it was possible, the claimant would be entitled to an equivalent period of compensatory rest but if the answer was in the negative in the sense that it was not possible, then pursuant to regulation 24(b), the respondent will have to "afford the claimant such protection as may be appropriate in order to safeguard the [claimant]".

28. The EAT then formulated four issues to be considered by the Tribunal on remission. The first two essentially reflected the two stage test which the Tribunal had identified:

> (a) whenever the claimant works for more than 6 hours if it was not possible for the respondent to grant the claimant an equivalent period of uninterrupted 20 minutes compensatory leave which he can use as he pleases and which falls within his shift;
> (b) if it was not possible for objective reasons to grant such a period of rest how the respondent can afford the claimant such protection as may be adequate to safeguard him.

29. In fact, the first issue as originally formulated by the first EAT said "falls outside his shifts" rather than "within his shift". The EAT on the second appeal pointed out that this was not apparently what had been intended. There is no doubt that this was an error by the first EAT, as everyone accepts, and that the issue as reformulated by the second EAT - which is how we have set out the issue above - is the correct one and it is how the issue was understood by the second Employment Tribunal on remission.

30. There were two more issues also identified by the first EAT which were considered by the Employment Tribunal on remission. They both went to the assessment of compensation payable if a breach were established. However since no breach was established in either the Employment Tribunal or the EAT, the issue of compensation did not strictly arise.

31. We agree with the EAT's approach to regulation 24 as set out above. However, the EAT wrongly focused on the employer's activities when determining whether regulation 21 applied (no doubt because it does not appear to have been referred to Gallagher on this point). It directed the Tribunal to consider in the context of determining whether regulation 24(b) applied whether the employer could organise the work shifts so as to allow a full Gallagher break. For reasons we have given above, in our judgment that is a false analysis. If working arrangements can be made so as to enable the worker to carry out his duties without his permanent presence being required throughout his shift, regulation 21(b) is not engaged. That issue ought not to be considered in the context of regulation 24.

The conclusions of the Employment Tribunal on remission.

32. As to the first issue, the argument before the Tribunal was largely directed to the question whether there were objective reasons which made it not possible for a Gallagher break to be given during the shift. The implicit assumption was that since regulation 12 had been disapplied, this would amount to an equivalent period of compensatory rest. The Tribunal considered various possible ways in which such a rest period that might in theory have been provided. These included employing a mobile guard who could provide cover across various single manned sites when a break was necessary; twinning or pairing guards so that one would always be available when another took a break; and by the client, Orange, providing the necessary cover from its own employees.

33. The Tribunal rejected each of these, not merely on the grounds that they were unduly costly, but also because they would impose administrative and logistical difficulties for the employers. Any of these arrangements could potentially jeopardise the employer's ability to undertake the contract which could in turn threaten the appellant's job. The Tribunal rejected in terms a submission from the appellant that the employers were in reality relying solely on financial considerations, which the Directive, in Recital 4, states is not a legitimate factor. It said this (para 41):

> "The claimant argued the reasons put forward by the respondents were all based upon cost. However, the Tribunal considered that it is safe to conclude that significant decisions made by the majority of limited companies operating in a free market economy could be and usually are ultimately quantifiable in financial terms. However, the Directive is specific that the considerations must not be "purely" financial and the Tribunal accepts the Respondent's evidence that its reasons were not solely financial. The Tribunal also confirmed that financial factors were not determinative when reaching its own conclusions."

34. The Tribunal also considered a suggestion from the appellant that he should be given time off in lieu after the shift had ended. Ironically, this submission reflected the argument unsuccessfully advanced by the employer at the first Employment Tribunal save that the appellant was seeking to be paid for the break. The Tribunal did not consider that this was an appropriate solution. It was inconsistent with the objectives of the Directive since it was not an arrangement designed to protect the health and safety of the worker concerned. Effectively it was simply buying out the employee's right.

35. In reaching its conclusion that there were objective reasons for not providing a Gallagher break, the Tribunal made reference a decision of the ECJ, Adeneler v Ellinikos Organismos Galkatos [2006] IRLR 716, where the concept of objective reasons had been discussed. That case was concerned with a different Directive, the Fixed Term Work Directive. The ECJ observed that the concept of objective reasons had to be considered in the light of the objective of the relevant legislation. Having regard to that principle, the Tribunal considered that in determining whether the equivalent period of rest was "not possible" in regulation 24, it should have regard to all the objectives of the Directive. In that context it said this (para 38):

> "… a step which provides compensatory rest for workers that is financially and/or logistically crippling for a small or medium sized employer that is neither immediately terminal to the business nor wholly impossible generally, is unlikely to be envisaged under the Directive as falling outside the exemption of being "not possible objective reasons", particularly having regard to the Recitals to the Directive".

36. Having concluded that there were objective reasons why the full Gallagher break could not be afforded to the appellant, the Tribunal went on to consider the second issue, namely whether the employer had complied with paragraph (b) and had afforded such protection as may be adequate to safeguard the health and safety of the appellant. It concluded without difficulty that the employers had satisfied that test. It identified the characteristics of the arrangement in place and noted that there were times when there was in fact a complete 20 minute break without interruption. It observed that whilst it was only possible to say with hindsight that it was in fact uninterrupted, nonetheless this provided appropriate protection, particularly when the arrangement permitted any interrupted break to be resumed.

The appeal to the EAT.

37. The employee then appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal (The Honourable Lady Smith presiding). On this occasion the employers cross-appealed and contended for the first time that the arrangements which had been put in place, and which the Employment Tribunal had found satisfied the provisions of regulation 24(b), in fact fell within regulation 24(a) itself. This was not a possibility that had been considered by the Employment Tribunal since the case had been argued before them on the basis that this was a regulation 24(b) case once it had been established that a full Gallagher break was not possible. The EAT allowed this argument to be advanced and were persuaded by it. They gave their reasons as follows (para 13):

> "In a special case, such as the present one, the worker is not entitled to a "Gallagher " rest break. The employer is, however, obliged "wherever possible" to allow the worker to take "an equivalent period of compensatory rest". It is plain that this is not the same as a "Gallagher" rest break. Certainly, the objective is to provide the worker with some break from his duties but the language of equivalence and compensation shows that it is something which is not identical to a "Gallagher" break. It can denote something which makes up for the fact that the worker does not receive such a break, by providing a break that is as near in character, quality, and value to a "Gallagher" rest break as possible. The precise elements of that equivalent period of compensatory rest will obviously vary according to the facts and circumstances of the individual case. In some cases, it may be possible for the employer to provide a break that very nearly meets the "Gallagher" criteria – circumstances where the worker is technically "on call" during the 20 minute break, but is, in practice, never called on, for example. In others, it may be that less freedom is able to be afforded to the worker during his break but he does get one or it may be that no break at all can possibly be given during the shift of each cycle, but that is compensated for by the worker being given a double break of 40 minutes in the second shift he works in the cycle. There are, no doubt, many other possible scenarios.
> It seems to us that that approach to the interpretation of paragraph 24(a) properly reflects the aims and objects of the Working Time Directive in accordance with the obligation to interpret domestic law in conformity with the relevant Directive (see e.g.: Adeneler & Ors v Ellinikos Organismos Galkatos [2006] IRLR 716."

38. The EAT limited the scope of regulation 24(b) to cases where no paragraph 24(a) rest could possibly be provided during the shift. In those circumstances the employer would have to afford such protection as was appropriate to safeguard health and welfare. The EAT gave by way of example structuring the way in which the work is organised during the shift and providing health checks for workers.

39. The EAT concluded that the findings of the Tribunal properly demonstrated that it was not on the facts possible for the work to be arranged so as to allow a full Gallagher rest break during the shifts. Although the arrangements fell marginally short of that, because it was not known in advance whether the rest break would be interrupted, nevertheless the EAT was fully satisfied that it was an equivalent period of compensatory rest falling within regulation 24(a). The arrangements put in place met the criteria of equivalence and compensation:

> "We are readily satisfied that the rest actually afforded to the Claimant amounted to an "equivalent period of compensatory rest". He was freed of all aspects of his work apart from the need to remain on the premises (which can be a feature of a "Gallagher" rest break) and to be on call. The latter, we accept, cannot be a feature of a "Gallagher" rest break (although, interestingly, it may not be working time, depending on the circumstances). He was, in principle, allowed a 20 minute break. He was compensated for the fact that he could not know in advance whether he would be interrupted and for the risk of actual interruption by being allowed to choose when to have his break and, if interruption occurred, to start his break again. These facts amply satisfy, in our view, the requirements of equivalence and compensation."

40. The EAT went on to find that, if it was wrong about the break falling within regulation 24(a), it in any event satisfied the requirements in paragraph 24(b). In that context the EAT considered a submission from the appellant which had not, in terms, been addressed by the Employment Tribunal, namely that the arrangements could not satisfy paragraph (b) unless there has been a risk assessment under paragraph 3 of the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999. This provision requires employers to carry out risk assessments for each of their workers. It was not disputed that such an assessment had been carried out in respect of the appellant, but the argument addressed to the EAT, and repeated before us, is that there should have been a specific assessment of the risks to health and safety resulting from the fact that the period of rest afforded to the appellant might be interrupted.

41. The EAT rejected that submission on the grounds that whilst an employer might choose to include a risk assessment of that nature, there was no obligation for him to do so under the Regulations. So it found that even if contrary to its preferred view the arrangement for a break did not fall within regulation 24(a), the Employment Tribunal had been entitled to find that it satisfied the requirements in regulation 24(b).

The grounds of appeal.

42. The grounds of appeal can usefully be analysed in three categories. First, it is submitted that for both procedural and substantive reasons the EAT was wrong to find that the breaks afforded to this appellant fell within the terms of regulation 24(a). Second, it is alleged that the Employment Tribunal was wrong to find that there were objective factors justifying the failure to provide the appellant with his full Gallagher rest break. Third, so far as regulation 24(b) is concerned, the appellant submitted that the arrangements could not be justified under that provision both because this was not an exceptional case as that provision requires, and also because the arrangements put in place could not be said to have afforded appropriate health and safety protection.

43. For reasons we have already given, the submissions falling into the second category, which are designed to show that there was no good reason why the appellant should not have been given a regulation 12 break, are not material to the regulation 24 issues. They go to the question whether regulation 21 was engaged at all, and it was conceded that it did. It seems that the concession was made on the false premise that regulation 21(b) applied because the employer's activities required a permanent presence. However, we shall consider the points as if the complaint had been that regulation 21 was not engaged, and therefore regulation 12 was not disapplied, because it was not necessary for the employer to require the appellant to be on duty throughout his shift.

44. The grounds advanced in the third category do not arise at all if the EAT was correct to conclude that the arrangements fell under paragraph (a) and not paragraph (b).

45. We will now consider the various grounds in turn.

Did the breaks fall within regulation 24(a)?

46. The first point arising in the appeal is whether the EAT was entitled to conclude that these arrangements were capable of falling within regulation 24(a). Mr Gray-Jones, who represented the appellant, submitted as a preliminary point that the EAT ought not to have allowed this point to be advanced at all since it had been conceded in the Employment Tribunal that the arrangements actually put in place could only be lawful if they fell within paragraph (b). He relied upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in Jones v Governing Body of Burdetts School [1999] ICR 38 where Robert Walker LJ, as he then was, said this, after referring to a number of authorities (p.44A):

> "…These authorities show that, although the appeal tribunal has a discretion to allow a new point of law to be raised or a conceded point to be re-opened, the discretion should be exercised only in exceptional circumstances, especially if the result would be to open up fresh issues of fact which, because the point was not in issue, were not sufficiently investigated before the industrial tribunal."

47. In granting permission for the point to be argued, the EAT noted that it was a point of some general significance, that there was no prejudice to the appellant (and in that context it needs to be noted that no new findings of fact were required), and that it could not have been argued before the Employment Tribunal since that body was in any event bound by the terms of the remission from the EAT.

48. Whether or not it was appropriate to allow this new point to be argued was a matter for the EAT. It cannot in our judgment seriously be said that this was an improper exercise of the EAT's discretion. Indeed, in our view it was plainly sensible to allow the point to be argued, essentially for the reasons which the EAT gave. We therefore reject this ground.

49. The second and substantive point was that the EAT erred in law in finding that the arrangement fell within regulation 24(a). Mr Gray-Jones submitted that any period of compensatory rest had to be a "rest period" as defined in the Directive and therefore had to be outside working time. Since the appellant had to remain in the workplace and was on call, this break was taken within working time as defined in the Directive and therefore could not as a matter of law amount to "compensatory rest".

50. Mr Glyn disputed that it was necessary for a rest break to be outside working hours under the Directive. He conceded that this was true of a Gallagher rest break but argued that it was not a necessary requirement for all such breaks. For example, he suggested that collectively agreed arrangements could provide for breaks in working time.

51. We do not accept that a rest break can occur within working hours. Under the Directive a rest period is defined as period which is not working time, and we see no basis for saying that a rest break is somehow different to other rest periods, as Mr Glyn contends. Moreover, as we read his judgment, that was the view expressed by Peter Gibson LJ in the Gallagher case. Accordingly, if the period of compensatory rest has itself to be a rest break as defined before it can qualify as a relevant rest period in regulation 24(a), the break afforded to this appellant did not satisfy that requirement.

52. However, the premise of the second EAT analysis was that an equivalent period of compensatory rest need not be a rest break as defined. The EAT held that there may be a period of rest within the meaning of regulation 24(a) - in the sense at least of a period when the appellant is discharged from his obligation to perform work unless actively called upon to do so - notwithstanding that it falls within the concept of working hours. That fact does not of itself preclude it from being treated as a period of compensatory rest.

53. Was that premise correct? We confess that we have not found this an entirely easy point. The natural meaning of "equivalent period of compensatory leave" is that a break of the same length and the same nature should be provided, although at some alternative time, to make up for the right lost. But adopting that construction could frustrate the health and safety objective which the legislation is designed to achieve. Take this case: in practice the period of rest, in the sense of freedom from work activities, could be very significant since the break starts again if the rest is subject to interruption. This is far preferable to an arrangement whereby the appellant were given an additional Gallagher break on a later shift, even if that were otherwise possible. Yet if the arrangements fall under paragraph (b) rather than (a), the employer would be obliged to provide the break in the later shift unless there were objective reasons for not doing so. That would be a curious result which in our view cannot have been intended. In our view, therefore, the EAT was right in its analysis.

54. We would accept that if a period is properly to be described as an equivalent period of compensatory rest, it must have the characteristics of a rest in the sense of a break from work. Furthermore, it must so far as possible ensure that the period which is free from work is at least 20 minutes. If the break does not display those characteristics then we do not think it would meet the criteria of equivalence and compensation. In this case the arrangements plainly did meet those criteria, as the EAT found. Indeed, since the rest break begins again following any interruption, many would say that this was more beneficial than a regulation 12 Gallagher break would be.

55. We would add that we do not think that it is likely to matter in practical terms which paragraph is applicable, at least in circumstances where the employer is unable to offer a Gallagher rest break but adopts arrangements which come as close as possible to replicating that break. Even if such an arrangement does not fall within paragraph (a), we would have thought that it is bound to fall within paragraph (b).

Could full Gallagher breaks have been afforded to the appellant?

56. We turn to the second ground which, as we have said, really embraces submissions why the Employment Tribunal ought to have found that regulation 21(b) was not engaged at all. Mr Gray-Jones advances this aspect of his case on a number of fronts. Because it was argued in the context of regulation 24 he focused on the issue whether there were objective reasons why a full Gallagher break could not have been provided, but we would accept that in principle this is what the employer would have to show in order to demonstrate that regulation 21 applied.

57. There were three interrelated aspects to this ground. First, it is said that notwithstanding that the Tribunal stated in terms that it was not influenced solely by economic factors, nonetheless that was in substance the reason why it was considered that it was impossible for the employers to provide appropriate cover. If the employers had been prepared to pay for another security guard, the full rest break could have been provided.

58. Second, the Tribunal was wrong to have regard to the meaning of objective grounds as set out by the ECJ in Adeneler, because that case was concerned with fixed term contracts whereas this case concerned a different Directive whose object was to protect health and safety.

59. Third, it was alleged that the Tribunal ought to have particularised in more detail precisely why it was so difficult for the employers to arrange matters so as to ensure an appropriate rest break. This was in substance a reasons challenge. It was suggested, for example, that the tribunal ought not to have found in the employer's favour without evidence as to the costs of providing extra cover.

60. We would reject each of these grounds. As to the first, this was not a case where the only reason for failing to provide the requisite cover was to maximise profits. Any significant additional cost could have undermined the ability of the employers to secure the contract at all and would have threatened the jobs of the security officers or their pay. As the Tribunal pointed out, it will always be possible to provide the requisite rest breaks if money is no object. However, the recitals emphasise that imposing administrative, financial and legal constraints may hold back the creation and development of small and medium-sized undertakings. In our judgment, the Tribunal was fully alive to that consideration, and properly allowed it to enter the equation whether the reasons were objectively justified or not. The appellant's argument ignores it. In addition, the Tribunal found in terms that there were logistical and administrative problems which would arise if additional staff had to be employed.

That is a finding of fact, sustainable on the evidence, and there is no basis for going behind it.

61. We do not accept either that the Tribunal erred in citing, and placing some reliance on, the Adeneler decision. This is one of the few ECJ cases where the concept of objective grounds found in various EU Directives has been discussed. The Tribunal recognised in terms that the meaning of objective reasons had to be informed by the objective pursued by the Directive and by the context of Article 17(2), and it specifically had regard to the recitals of the Directive when assessing its objective. It did not make the error attributed to it of simply lifting the language in Adelener without any consideration of the very different statutory context.

62. In our judgment, the reasons challenge also fails. The Tribunal explained fully and cogently why it reached the decision it did. It was not necessary for it to have extensive and detailed information about the costs of employing extra staff. It was obvious that this would inevitably add considerably to the overall costs of the contract and in a competitive market would be bound to jeopardise the employer's ability to perform it.

63. It follows that in our judgment even if these arguments had been advanced in the context of a submission that the Employment Tribunal ought to have found that regulation 21(b) was not engaged, they would have failed.

Was the Tribunal entitled to find that the criteria in regulation 24(b) were satisfied?

64. As we have said, this ground is immaterial given that the arrangements in fact fall under regulation 24(a). However, we will briefly deal with them in case we are wrong and the arrangements fall under paragraph (b).

65. The appellant raises two issues. First, and fundamentally, he submits that it is only if there are exceptional circumstances that paragraph (b) arises. These are not exceptional circumstances since there will frequently be single manned security arrangements. Therefore it is immaterial whether there are objective factors justifying the failure to provide compensatory rest. A condition precedent to the application of paragraph (b) has not been met.

66. We reject that submission. In our view paragraph (b) merely requires that there should be objective reasons why an equivalent period of compensatory rest cannot be provided. Cases where the employer can provide neither a Gallagher rest break nor a compensatory alternative will perforce be exceptional. The reference to exceptional circumstances, as the Tribunal observed, confirms the fact that the derogation is narrow and should be restrictively applied. But we do not accept that the provision sets two hurdles of exceptional circumstances and objective reasons; the presence of the latter establishes the former.

67. The second ground under this head repeats the submission, rejected by the EAT, that the arrangements could not properly be considered to be appropriate within the meaning of regulation 24(b) without the employers first conducting a specific health and safety assessment as to the specific risks arising from the fact that there was the potential for the rest break to be interrupted.

68. Like the EAT, we are wholly unpersuaded by this submission. There is nothing in the Directive which requires this. Moreover, it is fanciful to think that there will be significant additional health risks resulting from the fact that the break is not guaranteed to be uninterrupted. This is particularly so where on the arrangement adopted the appellant may end up with a break which is in fact significantly longer than the twenty minutes typically allowed under regulation 12. In our judgment, the Tribunal was plainly entitled to conclude that the breaks provided gave appropriate protection even without any risk assessment of the kind suggested.

Disposal

69. For these various reasons, we would dismiss this appeal.

27.2.70 and Mr Land's acceptance dated 2 March. Under that contract Mr Land was engaged as a whole-time fireman at Morley Fire Station as from 23 March, 1970. Some two and a half years later he was offered, and accepted, the obligations of a retained fireman at Batley Fire Station. His obligation to act as a retained fireman related only to his off-duty periods. It related only to his free time when he had no duties whatever to perform at Morley. It may be noted – although it has no direct relevance – that this arrangement was flexible to the extent that Mr Land could notify the officer in charge of Batley if he should cease to be available for duty in any off-duty period, and he was to inform the officer in charge when he again became available. I shall, again for simplicity, ignore the fact that later on Batley became Mr Land's full-time station and Morley his off-duty station.

28 It has been expressed as common ground between the parties in this court that the Morley engagement and the Batley engagement constituted a single contract; and that, I think, was so found by the Tribunal. In a sense it is true. It was obviously not intended, for instance, that Mr Land should be entitled to give notice to terminate his full-time engagement at Morley while continuing his off-duty engagement at Batley. But does the reverse apply?

29 The case was argued in the lower courts and has been argued in this court on the basis that Mr Land was not entitled to give notice terminating his off-duty engagement at Batley without at the same time throwing up his full-time engagement at Morley. If he were so entitled, quite clearly the county council would have the reciprocal right to terminate his off-duty engagement at Batley without interfering with his full-time engagement at Morley.

30 It is that underlying assumption which I think needs to be critically examined. Although it may be true to say that the Morley engagement and the Batley engagement were comprised in a single contract of employment, the Batley offer and acceptance made in 1972 were in no sense whatever a variation of the Morley contract constituted by the letters written in 1970. The Batley engagement left the Morley engagement wholly unchanged. Mr Land's hours of work, his pay, his duty, and all his other conditions of service at Morley remained precisely the same, unaltered in any respect. The Batley engagement did not impinge in any way whatever upon the Morley engagement. His Morley contract was not varied in any real sense.

31 If an employee voluntarily accepts duties in his spare time for his employer at a different place of work and the arrangement says nothing about the duration of his extra duty, is it to be said that the employee is unable to withdraw from this voluntary spare-time work at a different location without giving up his whole-time job with which, ex hypothesi, his spare-time job has no connection? Take this case: suppose that Mr Land and his neighbour entered into full-time employment as firemen at Morley. Suppose that each was asked whether he would be willing to work in his spare time at Batley. Suppose that Mr Land accepted, but his neighbour declined. Suppose that Mr Land worked in his spare time at Batley for five years. Then suppose that his circumstances changed. Perhaps his wife becomes an invalid and he needs his spare time to care for her. Is it to be said that he has no legal right under his contract to give up his spare-time work at Batley unless he also gives notice to terminate his work at Morley? Why should he be penalised in this way and be placed in a worse position than his neighbour just because he volunteered to work
221 elsewhere in his spare time? I would find such a legal 224 result fantastic. I cannot believe it to be correct. I would not hesitate to imply a provision in the Batley engagement to the effect that the spare-time work, voluntarily assumed, can be given up on reasonable notice. If that is correct for the fireman, it must also be correct for the employer. There can be no question in the present case that the notice given was not reasonable in relation to the spare-time work.

32 I appreciate that this point was not taken in the court below, if I have understood the position correctly. But I decline to deal with a case on a false premise, whatever concessions or assumptions may have been made by counsel in the course of arguing the case below, if I am satisfied that the premise is false. The approach which I think is the right one seems to me to be logical and to lead to a wholly equitable result with which no one, having appreciated the point, could possibly quarrel. On that basis, it is unnecessary for me to express one view on the questions debated before us concerning the incorporation of collective agreements in individual contracts, repudiatory breaches of contract, and the like. No question of compensation for unfair dismissal arises because only the supplemental part of the contract of employment has been determined. I would hold that there has been no breach of contract on the part of the council and no termination of the applicant's employment, and I would deal with the appeal on that basis.

33 SIR GEORGE BAKER: I agree, and there is nothing I can usefully add.

34 Order: Appeal allowed on issue of dismissal. No order as to costs save legal aid taxation of Mr Land's costs.

Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 section: 57(3)

The facts:
Mr Swift was dismissed after 18 years' service with the appellants after a road fund licence belonging to a company Land Rover was found on Mr Swift's own vehicle. When asked by the police about the matter, Mr Swift said that he had found the tax disc outside the factory. He was charged with theft of a road fund licence or alternatively with fraudulent use of a road fund licence. Before the Magistrates he pleaded not guilty to theft but guilty to fraudulently using the licence. He was convicted and fined a total of £30.

When Mr Swift's conviction came to the knowledge of the company an investigation was carried out. Mr Swift then maintained that he had lent his Land Rover to a friend on the understanding that the friend would have the vehicle taxed and tested before he used it. When the vehicle was returned to him, the tax disc was in position and he had no idea that it was false. Following the investigation, Mr Swift was dismissed. He claimed that this dismissal was unfair.

An Industrial Tribunal held that "there was abundant evidence available on which any reasonable employer would have come to the conclusion that the applicant had been guilty of gross misconduct". However, they went on to find that the dismissal was unfair. According to the Tribunal, given Mr Swift's previous good work record, dismissal was too severe a penalty for what they saw as a relatively minor offence which had already been dealt with by the Magistrates. And, they pointed out, Mr Swift was not employed in a fiduciary capacity. Compensation was reduced by 75% on the grounds of contributory fault.

This decision was upheld on appeal on a majority decision by the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

The Court of Appeal (The Master of the Rolls [Lord Denning], Lord Justice Ackner, Lord Justice Griffiths) on 17.10.80 allowed the appeal and substituted a finding that the dismissal was fair.

The Court of Appeal held:

irlr 253.3 253.53 253.54 The Industrial Tribunal had erred in holding that the appellants had acted unreasonably in dismissing the respondent employee after he had been found guilty in the Magistrates Court of fraudulently using a road fund licence belonging to a company vehicle on his own vehicle.

The Industrial Tribunal had wrongly applied a test of whether a reasonable employer would have considered that a lesser penalty than dismissal was appropriate. The correct test is was it reasonable of the employer to dismiss the employee? If no reasonable employer would have dismissed him, then the dismissal is unfair. But if a reasonable employer might reasonably have dismissed him, then the dismissal is fair. There is a band of reasonableness within which one employer might reasonably dismiss the employee whilst another would quite reasonably keep him on. It depends entirely on the circumstances of the case whether dismissal is one of the penalties which a reasonable employer would impose. If it was reasonable to dismiss, the dismissal must be upheld as fair even though some other employers might not have dismissed.

The Industrial Tribunal had also erred in failing to take into account the fact that the respondent when challenged had persistently lied about the incident. The conduct of an employee after an offence was discovered is a relevant consideration for an employer to take into account in deciding whether it is reasonable to dismiss. If an employee persistently lies about the matter, that is a breach of trust which would influence any reasonable employer to dismiss him.

In the present case, therefore, it could not be said that no reasonable employer would have dismissed the respondent who was not only guilty of an act of gross misconduct but who had persistently put forward a wholly untruthful account of the incident. The appeal would therefore be allowed and the dismissal held fair.

per Lord Denning MR:

The inference in the Industrial Tribunal's decision that the employee had paid the penalty for the offence after being fined in the Magistrates Court and ought not to be penalised for it any further indicated a wrong approach. If a man is convicted and fined, it is a ground for dismissing him, not for keeping him on.

Appearances:
For the Appellants:
Mr P NAUGHTEN, instructed by R P A Coles
For the Respondent:
Mr D GRANT, instructed by Messrs Collyer Bristow, London agents for Messrs Band Hatton & Co

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS: This is a troublesome case. Mr Swift had been employed by British Leyland at their works in Coventry for some 18 years. In October 1977 he was working near a car park where there was a Land Rover. It was the company's vehicle. Its registration number was GRW 110L. In October 1977 the tax disc (that is, the road fund licence) was found to be missing from that Land Rover. The company reported it as missing: and got a duplicate from Swansea. 1

About six or seven months later, in April or May 1978, Mr Swift was driving a Land Rover. Something was wrong with the tail light. The police stopped his Land Rover: and asked him to show his road fund licence. Lo and behold – it was the very same tax disc which someone had taken from the works in October 1977. The police asked Mr Swift about it. He said that he had 'found' it outside the factory. He was then charged with the theft of a road fund licence or alternatively with the fraudulent use of a road licence. The matter came before the magistrates. He pleaded not guilty to theft: but guilty of fraudulent use of the licence. He was fined £15 for fraudulent use; £10 for having no excise licence; and £5 for having no test certificate. 2

Mr Swift's conviction came to the knowledge of the company. The company held some inquiries. 3

Firstly, there was an inquiry by the machine shop superintendent. Before him Mr Swift told a different story from that which he told the police. He said that he had lent his Land Rover to a friend on the understanding that his friend would have it taxed and tested before using it. When the vehicle was returned to him, the tax disc was in position and he had no idea that it was false. So he blamed his friend. The machine shop superintendent was not satisfied with Mr Swift's explanation. He suspended him without pay pending further inquiries. But he told Mr Swift that he had a right of appeal. 4

Secondly, there was an internal appeal before the area manager. Both the management and the union were represented. Mr Swift told the same story about a friend. He said that the friend was named Rawlins. Mr Rawlins was not present on that occasion. Another hearing was later held when he was present. After listening to all the evidence, the area manager dismissed Mr Swift's appeal. As a result, he was dismissed. On a further inquiry, the dismissal was upheld. 5

Mr Swift took the case before the Industrial Tribunal. He complained that he had been unfairly dismissed. In answer, the company said: 6

> 'It was discovered that the applicant had been convicted for fraudulent use of a road fund licence belonging to the company. Following an investigation into the matter, the company decided that it was reasonable in all the circumstances to treat the applicant's conduct as sufficient reason for his dismissal. This decision was upheld following an appeal hearing.'

The Industrial Tribunal had the circumstances before them. They inquired very closely into the matter. They said: 7

> 'It is our unanimous view that there was abundant evidence available on which any reasonable employer would have come to the conclusion that the applicant' – Mr Swift – 'had been guilty of gross misconduct.'

They added later:

> '. . . there is in our view abundant evidence as already stated on which the employers reasonably formed the view that the applicant had been guilty of gross dishonesty.'

8 Strangely enough, the Industrial Tribunal went on to find that there had been an unfair dismissal. I will read the whole of paragraph 12 in which the Tribunal set out their reasons:

> 'The employers have to satisfy the additional onus under para.6(8) and we are of the view that they failed to do so. The applicant is a man of long service with a good work record. We were told that there was only one warning recorded in relation to something quite different from this matter. It is conceded by the respondents that that played no part in their decision to dismiss. It is said on their behalf that the reason for the dismissal is that the fundamental confidence between employer and employee has been destroyed. The offence was a relatively minor one for which he has already been dealt with in the Magistrates Courts so far as the criminal aspect is concerned. Mr Swift is not employed in a fiduciary capacity. There is no evidence that they have suffered in any way as a result of this lapse in the interval between the conviction and it being brought to their notice. The penalty should obviously be related to the offence and we consider that the employers have over-reacted. They have chosen the ultimate penalty of dismissal when a reasonable employer would, in our opinion, have considered that a lesser penalty was appropriate. Therefore we find that the dismissal was unfair and the application succeeds.'

9 But the Industrial Tribunal did say that Mr Swift was three-quarters to blame. So they would reduce the compensation. Nevertheless they found that it was an unfair dismissal.

10 There was an appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal. They by a majority of two to one affirmed that decision. Now there is an appeal to this court.

11 The first question that arises is whether the Industrial Tribunal applied the wrong test. We have had considerable argument about it. They said: '. . . a reasonable employer would, in our opinion, have considered that a lesser penalty was appropriate'. I do not think that that is 253.3 the right test. The correct test is: Was it reasonable for the employers to dismiss him? If no reasonable employer would have dismissed him, then the dismissal was unfair. But if a reasonable employer might reasonably have dismissed him, then the dismissal was fair. It must be remembered that in all these cases there is a band of reasonableness, within which one employer might reasonably take one view: another quite reasonably take a different view. One would quite reasonably dismiss the man. The other would quite reasonably keep him on. Both views may be quite reasonable. If it was quite reasonable to dismiss him, then the dismissal must be upheld as fair: even though some other employers may not have dismissed him.

12 But there is a further point. It is whether the Industrial Tribunal took into account all relevant considerations. It seems to me that they failed to take into account the conduct of Mr Swift after the offence was discovered. He did not come forward and say, 'I am sorry; I made a mistake. I ought not to have done it. It will not do anything of the kind again'. He did not even tell the same story he told to the police officer. He put forward a 'cock and bull' story about his having lent his Land Rover to another man: and the other man had got the tax disc: and it was the other man's fault: and so forth. As to that, the Industrial Tribunal were quite outspoken. They said: 'It is flying in the face of probability to suggest that he and Mr Rawlins were giving a truthful and accurate account'. So there it is. Mr Swift did not 'come clean' when he was found out. He put forward a wholly untruthful account. That seems to me to be a most relevant consideration for 253.53 the employers to take into account in deciding whether it 253.54 was reasonable to dismiss him or not. But there is not a word about it in paragraph 12 when they set out their reasons. On the contrary, the offence was mentioned as being 'a relatively minor one'. They refer to it almost as if he had paid the penalty and ought not to be penalised for it any more. That was the wrong approach. If a man is convicted and fined, it is a ground for dismissing him, not for keeping him on.

13 The Employment Appeal Tribunal were very troubled about the case. They said:

> 'We have thought, all of us, deeply, carefully and long over this case, which must come very near the borderline. Had we been the Industrial Tribunal who had to exercise the function which it exercised in this case, it seems highly likely that we would have decided the case in the opposite sense. One of our number is wholly convinced by the reasoing which is put forward on behalf of the employers, that this is a perverse decision; that an employer, in particular a motor manufacturer, faced with these circumstances, must, in view of the finding of gross misconduct or gross dishonesty, have had available to him, while acting reasonably, at any rate an available option of dismissal. The other two of us, while far from being convinced by the reasoning of the Tribunal, have not found it possible to come to the conclusion that the Tribunal acted perversely . . .'

14 Now it comes to us. It is my opinion that the Industrial Tribunal failed to take into account the conduct of Mr Swift when he was tackled with this offence. That is a very relevant consideration, which would influence any reasonable employer. I am not prepared to say that no reasonable employer would have dismissed him in the circumstances. On the contrary, it seems to me that many a reasonable employer in the circumstances would have thought it right to dismiss him.

15 I would therefore allow the appeal and hold that the dismissal was fair and not unfair.

16 LORD JUSTICE ACKNER: Where an employee is guilty of gross dishonesty, as the respondent was so held to have been, there is generally speaking available to the employer a number of options which he can reasonably take. It depends entirely on the circumstances of the case whether dismissal is one of the penalties which a reasonable employer would impose.

17 As has been frequently said in these cases, there may well be circumstances in which reasonable employers might react differently. An employer might reasonably take the view, if the circumstances so justified, that his attitude must be a firm and definite one and must involve 253.3 dismissal in order to deter other employees from like conduct. Another employer might quite reasonably on compassionate grounds treat the case as a special case.

18 As my Lord the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, the basis of the plea by the respondent before the Magistrates' Court to the fraudulent use of the road fund licence was that he had found that licence and had merely put it on his vehicle. But when the question of his future employment came to be considered, an entirely new story was provided. He said that he had been approached by a friend, who at that time was employed by the company, for the loan of his Land Rover, which was untaxed and without an MOT certificate. He agreed to lend it to this person on the condition that the latter would have it taxed and tested before it was used. When the vehicle was returned to him, the tax disc was in position, and he had no idea that it was false. That would have been, of course, a complete defence in the Magistrates' Court, but he chose not to tell it.

19 The employers concluded that there was a chain of circumstances which were too incredible to believe. Firstly, Mr Rawlins just happened to find a tax disc which happened to be appropriate for a Land Rover; secondly, the tax happened to be valid when he needed to borrow Mr Swift's Land Rover; thirdly, Mr Swift happened not to notice that the tax ran out in April, whereas if Mr Rawlins had taxed the vehicle, as suggested, the tax would not have expired until at least the end of June; fourthly, that after Mr Swift had helped Mr Rawlins by lending him his Land Rover, it would be highly unlikely that he would cover up for him and face a possible sentence of imprisonment for what is an offence of some seriousness; fifthly, that he made a false statement under caution to the police; and, lastly, the coincidence that the company Land Rover was usually parked very near where Mr Swift worked.

20 As a result of considering the material before it, the Tribunal said that it was their unanimous view that there was abundant evidence on which any reasonable employer would have come to the conclusion that the applicant had been guilty of gross misconduct. They said: 'It is flying in the face of probability to suggest that he and Mr Rawlins were giving a truthful and accurate account'. They said that in their view there was abundant evidence on which the employers reasonably formed the view that the applicant had been guilty of gross dishonesty.

21 What then accounts for this surprising decision – to put it bluntly – that no reasonable employer would have dismissed a person not only guilty of gross dishonesty, but a person who persistently and unrepentently sought to lie his way out of that offence? The explanation is to be found in one paragraph, paragraph 12, where the Tribunal say:

> 'The offence was a relatively minor one for which he has already been dealt with in the Magistrates Courts so far as the criminal aspect is concerned. Mr Swift is not employed in a fiduciary capacity. There is no evidence that they have suffered in any way as a result of this lapse in the interval between the conviction and it being brought to their notice. The penalty should obviously be related to the offence and we consider that the employers have over-reacted.'

22 It seems to me quite clear that in justifying their surprising conclusion, to which I have referred, they have confined their attention to the offence, and they have not done that wholly accurately; because the offence, which they say was dealt with by the magistrates, was an offence based upon an assertion of fact which neither the employers nor the Tribunal accepted as being correct. He knew that it was the company's disc, and that was not put before the magistrates. But what is much more important is that they leave out of account his subsequent behaviour. The apparent justification for leaving that out seems to be found in the phrase, 'Mr Swift is not employed in a fiduciary capacity'. But it is a truism that trust is one of the important foundations of the relationship between master and servant; and, in my judgment, to have confined their attention to the offence, and not to his conduct subsequent to the offence, was a misdirection. It is clear that the Tribunal itself thought that the matter was close to the borderline because they concluded that the applicant was largely responsible for his own downfall, and that was why they reduced his compensation by 75%. If they had taken into account the subsequent conduct, I feel sure they would have reached another conclusion – a conclusion that a reasonable employer had at least the option to dismiss an employee in these circumstances, if the employer were so minded.

23 I also agree that the appeal should be allowed.

24 LORD JUSTICE GRIFFITHS: There have been a number of reported decisions of this court, of the Court of Session, of the Employment Appeal Tribunal and of Industrial Tribunals in which it has been held that, where employees have stolen from their employers, their subsequent dismissal was not unfair. I find nothing surprising in that. But here we have a case in which a man is dismissed for gross dishonesty because his employers reasonably believe that he either stole from them or, alternatively, he used their property knowing that it had been stolen; and, when challenged about it, he concocted and persisted in a lying explanation. Yet it is held by the Industrial Tribunal that his dismissal is unfair. This I do find surprising.

25 The Employment Appeal Tribunal also found that it was surprising. Two of their members thought it highly likely that they would have considered that the employers had not acted unfairly. One of their members was convinced that the employers had not acted unfairly. Yet the Employment Appeal Tribunal felt powerless to intervene because they considered that they could not go so far as to say that the finding of the Industrial Tribunal was perverse.

26 Finding that a Tribunal is perverse only arises when they have arrived at a conclusion having considered all relevant factors and applied their minds properly; and, standing back from it, one can say, 'That is an utterly unreasonable conclusion'. That is a very strong finding.

27 Unwilling to think that an Industrial Tribunal would be perverse, I ask myself, how did they come to this rather astonishing conclusion? For myself, I agree, for the reasons given by my Lord the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Ackner, that the answer is to be found in the fact that, when they came to consider the fairness or otherwise of the dismissal, they appear to have concentrated exclusively on the mitigating factors affecting the employee, and entirely disregarded the very serious breakdown in trust which must have arisen from this employee persisting in a lying explanation of his conduct.

253.53 253.54

28 Accordingly I agree that this Industrial Tribunal did not direct its mind to all the matters it should have taken into account; and I am convinced that, had they had those factors in mind, they could not have concluded that an employer who had the option of dismissal open to him acted unfairly in the circumstances of this case. Accordingly I too think that this appeal should be allowed.

29 Order: Appeal allowed. No order as to costs. Cross-appeal dismissed.

A Court of Appeal

Gallagher and others v Alpha Catering Services Ltd (trading as Alpha Flight Services)

[2004] EWCA Civ 1559

B 2004 Nov 8 Peter Gibson, Buxton and Jacob LJJ

Employment — Working time provisions — Excluded sectors — Activities connected with provision of meals to aircraft between flights — Whether involving "need for continuity of service" — Whether routine increase in activity "surge of activity" — Whether rest break provision excluded — Whether period when employees not doing work but at employer's disposal "rest break" — Working
C Time Regulations 1998 (SI 1998/1833), regs 12(1)(3), 21(c)(d)

The applicants were employed by the respondent employer in delivering meals and other necessaries to, and removing catering equipment from, aircraft. Their working time included periods of "down time", when those with no immediate duties were at the employer's disposal, waiting to resume work if required. The applicants complained to an employment tribunal that the employer had unlawfully
D denied them rest breaks to which they were entitled under regulation 12(1) of the Working Time Regulations 1998[1]. At a preliminary hearing the tribunal ruled that, because of time pressures and consequential financial penalties on the employer if an aircraft was delayed, the applicants' duties involved the need for "continuity of service" and they were therefore deprived of the protection of regulation 12(1) by regulation 21(c); but that a routine increase or decrease of activity occurring naturally in the daily or weekly cycle was not a "surge of activity" within the
E meaning of regulation 21(d) and so did not exclude the protection of regulation 12(1); and that down time could not amount to a "rest break" within the meaning of regulation 12(3). The Employment Appeal Tribunal allowed an appeal by the applicants against the finding of continuity of service and dismissed a cross-appeal by the employer against the other findings.

On the employer's appeal and application for permission to appeal—

Held, (1) dismissing the appeal, that the focus in regulation 21 of the Working
F Time Regulations 1998 was on the activities of the worker, rather than the employer, and the evidence did not establish that the activities of the applicants, as distinct from those of their employer, involved "the need for continuity of service" within the meaning of regulation 21(c); and that, therefore, regulation 21(c) did not exclude the applicants' right to rest breaks under regulation 12(1) (post, paras 26, 33, 37, 40, 53, 54).

(2) Refusing permission to appeal in relation to regulation 21(d), that a "surge of G activity" within the meaning of regulation 21(d) only occurred when there was an exceptional level of activity, beyond the fluctuation experienced within the working day and working week, and the evidence had not disclosed such a surge (post, paras 45, 53, 54).

(3) Refusing permission to appeal in relation to "down time", that a rest break was an uninterrupted period of at least 20 minutes which was neither a rest period nor working time and which the worker could use as he pleased, and a period of
H down time could not retrospectively become a "rest break" for the purposes of regulation 12(1) only because it could be seen after it was over that it was an uninterrupted period of at least 20 minutes (post, paras 50, 53, 54).

APPEAL from the Employment Appeal Tribunal

By an order of 17 March 2004 the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Judge McMullen QC, Ms K Bilgan and Miss D Whittingham) allowed an appeal by the applicants, Mr J P Gallagher and 27 other employees of Alpha Catering Services Ltd (trading as Alpha Flight Services), from a decision of an employment tribunal, sitting at London South, that the applicants were excluded by regulation 21(c) of the Working Time Regulations 1998 from the right to rest breaks under regulation 12(1) of the Regulations.

The employer appealed and also applied for permission to appeal on other issues also decided in favour of the employees.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Peter Gibson LJ.

Peter Oldham for the employer.

Andrew Hogarth QC for the applicant employees.

PETER GIBSON LJ

1 This is an appeal by Alpha Catering Services Ltd, trading as Alpha Flight Services ("Alpha"), from the order made by the Employment Appeal Tribunal on 17 March 2004 [2004] ICR 1489 whereby it allowed the appeal of Mr J P Gallagher and 27 other employees of Alpha (together "the employees") from the decision of an employment tribunal sitting at London South. By that decision, sent to the parties on 7 October 2003, the employment tribunal determined that the employees were excluded by regulation 21(c) of the Working Time Regulations 1998 from the right under regulation 12 to rest breaks. Accordingly, the employment tribunal dismissed the employees' originating applications. On certain other points in dispute the employment tribunal decided in favour of the employees and the Employment Appeal Tribunal upheld the employment tribunal's decision on those points.

2 Alpha applied for permission to appeal against the appeal tribunal's decision on the regulation 21(c) point and the appeal tribunal granted such permission. Alpha sought but was refused permission to appeal against the appeal tribunal's affirmation of the employment tribunal's decision on the other points.

3 By its appellant's notice Alpha sought such permission from this court. At the hearing of the appeal we heard Alpha's application for permission to appeal on three points. I will deal with that application after I consider Alpha's application on the regulation 21(c) point.

A The Working Time Regulations 1998

4 The Regulations are derived from Council Directive 93/104/EC of 23 November 1993 (OJ 1993 L307, p 18), commonly known as the Working Time Directive. The Directive lays down, as is stated in article 1(1), minimum safety and health requirements for the organisation of working time. Article 1(2) provides that the Directive applies to minimum periods of
B daily rest, weekly rest and annual leave, to breaks and maximum weekly working time. By article 2(1) various definitions are given. Relevant to this appeal are the definitions of "working time" as meaning "any period during which the worker is working, at the employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties, in accordance with national law and/or practice" and "rest period" as meaning "any period which is not working time".

5 Article 3 provides for daily rest. Article 4 relates to breaks and is in C this form:

> "Member states shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, where the working day is longer than six hours, every worker is entitled to a rest break, the details of which, including duration and the terms on which it is granted, shall be laid down in collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry or, failing that, by national D legislation."

6 Article 5 relates to a weekly rest period, article 6 to maximum weekly working time and article 7 to annual leave.

7 The Directive provides by article 15 that member states are entitled to apply or introduce provisions more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers than is provided by the Directive.

E 8 Certain derogations are permitted in article 17(2):

> "Derogations may be adopted by means of laws, regulations or administrative provisions or by means of collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry provided that the workers concerned are afforded equivalent periods of compensatory rest or that, in exceptional cases in which it is not possible, for objective reasons, to F grant such equivalent periods of compensatory rest, the workers concerned are afforded appropriate protection . . ."

9 Paragraph 2.1 then proceeds, so far as relevant, in this way: "from [article 4] . . . (c) in the case of activities involving the need for continuity of service or production, particularly"—I break off at this point to say that there then follow eight numbered sub-paragraphs, of which six specify
G activities or industries and two specify particular types of workers. Sub-paragraph (ii) refers to "dock or airport workers". Sub-paragraph (viii) refers to "workers concerned with the carriage of passengers on regular urban transport services". A further derogation from article 4 is permitted by article 17.2.1(d): "where there is a foreseeable surge of activity, particularly in—(i) agriculture; (ii) tourism; (iii) postal services".

10 The 1998 Regulations were intended to implement Directive 93/104.
H For the most part they follow the language of the Directive, although there are some, in my view minor, differences. Regulation 2 contains definitions of "rest period" and "working time" which accord with the Directive's definitions. As in the Directive, there is no definition in the Regulations of a break or a rest break.

11 Regulation 12(1) sets out the basic entitlement of a worker to a rest break where his daily working time is more than six hours. By paragraph (2) [as substituted by the Working Time (Amendment) Regulations 2003 (SI 2003/3128)]:

> "The details of the rest break to which a worker is entitled under paragraph (1), including its duration and the terms on which it is granted, shall be in accordance with any provisions for the purposes of this regulation which are contained in a collective agreement or a workforce agreement."

There is no relevant collective agreement or workforce agreement. By paragraph (3):

> "Subject to the provisions of any applicable collective agreement or workforce agreement, the rest break provided for in paragraph (1) is an uninterrupted period of not less than 20 minutes, and the worker is entitled to spend it away from his workstation if he has one."

The employment tribunal found that the employees had no workstation.

12 Regulation 18 provides for regulation 12(1) not to apply, inter alia, to certain sectors of activity, including air transport, or to the activities of doctors in training.

13 Derogations from regulation 12(1) include the following in regulation 21 (headed "Other special cases"). By regulation 21(c), subject to regulation 24, regulation 12(1) does not apply in relation to a worker "where the worker's activities involve the need for continuity of service or production, as may be the case in relation to— . . . (ii) work at docks or airports".

14 By regulation 21(d), subject again to regulation 24, regulation 12(1) does not apply in relation to a worker "where there is a foreseeable surge of activity, as may be the case in relation to—(i) agriculture; (ii) tourism; and (iii) postal services".

15 Regulation 24 entitles a worker to compensatory rest in these terms:

> "Where the application of any provision of these Regulations is excluded by regulation 21 . . . and a worker is accordingly required by his employer to work during a period which would otherwise be a rest period or rest break—(a) his employer shall wherever possible allow him to take an equivalent period of compensatory rest, and (b) in exceptional cases in which it is not possible, for objective reasons, to grant such a period of rest, his employer shall afford him such protection as may be appropriate in order to safeguard the worker's health and safety."

The facts

16 Alpha is a large company in the airline catering business. A substantial part of its work consists of the delivery to and loading onto aircraft of airline meals, drinks and sundry items, and what is known as the "de-catering" of aircraft which have arrived, that is to say the unloading of catering material from such aircraft.

17 Alpha services airlines which use Gatwick Airport. It has premises near to the airport. There food is prepared and packed, and drinks and other items stored. Among its 400 employees at Gatwick are those in the service delivery department, numbering between 150 and 170 persons. They have duties connected with the transportation of food and other items to and from the airport. They include drivers, designated FEH1s; loaders, FEH2s; and service team representatives, STRs. The applicant employees are FEH1s or FEH2s or STRs.

18 The employment tribunal made the following findings of fact at para 6.

"(4) FEH1s and FEH2s work together on shifts as teams of two. Their working days start and finish at [Alpha's] premises. Their main function is to load their heavy goods vehicle, drive it to the airport, deliver food and equipment to the aircraft and/or 'de-cater' them and return whatever has been removed to [Alpha's] premises. The round-trip (including stops to collect drinks from the nearby bonded warehouse) is typically 6 to 7 miles in total. It seems that, generally speaking, a team will complete two round trips per shift.

"(5) Very often there are intervals when FEH1s and FEH2s are at the airport but have no duties to undertake immediately. Such time is usually referred to as 'down time'. During down time the driver/loader team must maintain radio contact with [Alpha]. A hand-held radio is provided and one member of the team must have it in his possession at all times. The FEH1s and FEH2s do not have access to the airport facilities. Unlike the STRs, they are not provided with passes enabling them to enter the airport buildings. There is a toilet which they can use and a designated 'smoking shed'. Many take refreshments with them and consume them during down time. During down time drivers and loaders will ordinarily remain in their vehicles or very close by. They are not permitted to sleep during down time and it is understood that they are at their employer's disposal.

"(6) STRs discharge supervisory roles, ensuring that vehicles are duly loaded and sealed at the depots and that the loading and 'de-catering' operations at the airport run smoothly. They are required to hold a driver's licence and are provided with a van. They have an airside pass giving them access to certain parts of the airport. Like the drivers and loaders, they have down time on occasions. They are obliged to maintain radio contact with [Alpha] and may take refreshment within the airport building if time and circumstances permit.

"(7) [Alpha's] work is time-critical. The 'window' for loading and (where necessary) unloading is typically 35 minutes in the case of a short-haul flight and 70 minutes where international flights are concerned. The time pressure is increased by the fact that other service providers (such as cleaners) must also have access to the aircraft during the turnaround period. [Alpha] is liable to financial penalties where an aircraft is delayed owing to their failure to complete their duties within the prescribed time. Those penalties are payable under the terms of their contracts with the airlines they serve.

"(8) Not surprisingly, there are fluctuations in the amount of work which [Alpha] must carry out. Most weekdays are busy in the mornings and quieter in the afternoons. In the weekly cycle Fridays and Sundays are busier than other days. Self-evidently, during holiday times traffic volumes increase. Ms Nicol [a witness for Alpha] told us, and we accept, that during a morning shift on a Monday there may be 25 flights leaving Gatwick for which [Alpha is] responsible, and that during the corresponding shift on a Saturday the number may be no more than ten. We accept her evidence that in a busy week [Alpha] may service 1,100 aircraft, whereas in a quiet week the figure may be as low as 800.

"(9) Fluctuations in activity may arise not only from predictable cyclical causes but also as a result of unforeseeable events. For example, fog may cause long delays before aircraft are permitted to land. Once the fog lifts there is likely to be particularly heavy demand upon [Alpha's] services for a limited period of time."

The proceedings before the employment tribunal

19 The employees presented originating applications, by which they complained that Alpha unlawfully denied them rest breaks to which they were entitled under regulation 12(1). Mr Gallagher's originating application referred to seven specific recent occasions when Alpha had required that he work for more than six hours without a rest break.

20 In its notice of appearance Alpha disputed the jurisdiction of the employment tribunal on the ground that the employees had no right under the 1998 Regulations to take rest breaks. Among the provisions on which it relied were regulation 21(c) and (d). It also claimed that down time (that is to say time during which the employee is not actually doing work, but is waiting for the next loading or de-catering assignment), when of not less than 20 minutes of uninterrupted duration, qualified as a rest break. It gave factual statistics which showed that the days to which Mr Gallagher referred were days on which he had substantial amounts of down time.

21 At a case management hearing on 14 March 2003 the employment tribunal directed a preliminary hearing to determine whether and to what extent the employees' claims were sustainable in law. Certain issues were identified and they, together with a further issue on which the employment tribunal was invited to rule, were the issues decided by the employment tribunal at a hearing on 9 July 2003.

22 The issues which the employment tribunal decided relevant to this appeal and to the application for permission to appeal and the conclusions which the employment tribunal reached on those issues were the following. (1) Are the employees (or any of them) deprived of the protection of regulation 12(1) by operation of regulation 21(c), on the ground that their activities involve the need for continuity of service or production? The employment tribunal held that the activities of each category of the employees involved the need for continuity of service or production, and so the protection of regulation 12 was excluded for all the employees. (2) Are the employees excluded from the protection of regulation 12(1) by operation of regulation 21(d) where there is a foreseeable surge of activity? The employment tribunal held that routine increases and decreases of activity occurring naturally in the daily and weekly cycle were not surges of activity within the meaning of the regulation, and so did not exclude the protection of regulation 12(1). However, the employment tribunal said that it would be a matter for evidence whether regulation 12(d) was brought into operation as a consequence of foreseeable increases in activity during particularly busy periods of the year. (3) Does down time of not less than 20 minutes' uninterrupted duration qualify for the purposes of

A regulation 12(3) as a rest break? The employment tribunal held that periods of down time did not amount to rest breaks within the meaning of regulation 12(3).

23 The employment tribunal accordingly dismissed all the originating applications for want of jurisdiction.

B The appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal

24 The employees appealed against the employment tribunal's decision on issue (1). Alpha cross-appealed on the tribunal's decision on three issues, but only proceeded on its appeal against the decision on issues (2) and (3).

25 The Employment Appeal Tribunal [2004] ICR 1489 allowed the employees' appeal and dismissed Alpha's cross-appeal. The appeal tribunal directed itself by reference to the following, amongst other, legal principles.
C (1) The three elements in the definition of working time in regulation 2(1), that is to say any period during which the worker is working, at his employer's disposal and carrying out his activity or duties, are to be construed conjunctively. (2) It is relevant to look at the relationship between the definition of working time and other times since there is no definition of rest break. (3) Derogations from Directive 93/104, and thus the exclusion of D workers from protection under a health and safety measure, should be construed strictly.

26 The appeal tribunal found that it was the worker's activities which by regulation 21(c) required continuity rather than the activities of the employer. It held that as a matter of construction regulation 21(c) excludes a worker's right to rest breaks where his or her activities involve the need for continuity of service, rather than when his or her employer's activities
E involve that need. If wrong on that, it said that it would nevertheless uphold the employees' contention that the employment tribunal had yet to deal with a claim under regulation 24 for compensatory rest breaks, and that it would allow the appeal on that ground.

27 On regulation 21(d) the appeal tribunal accepted the approach of the employment tribunal to the concept of a surge. It held that the employment
F tribunal was entitled to find that the relatively modest fluctuations which Alpha experienced over the working day and week could not be described as surges. On down time the appeal tribunal said that the employment tribunal made a factual determination about what the workers were required to do in their down time, and that the appeal tribunal should not disturb the tribunal's judgment on that point.

G The appeal to this court

28 In addition to appealing to this court on the regulation 21(c) point, Alpha seeks permission to appeal on the regulation 21(d) point, the down time point and the ground which the appeal tribunal said that, if wrong on the regulation 21(c) point, it would have allowed the appeal, that is to say, regulation 24.

H

(1) Regulation 21(c)

29 On Alpha's appeal Mr Oldham, for Alpha, submits that the employment tribunal was right and the appeal tribunal was wrong on regulation 21(c). He points out, by reference to para 6(7) of the employment tribunal's decision, that Alpha's work was time-critical, that there was a short window for loading and unloading, and that that time pressure was increased by the need for other service providers to have access to the aircraft during the turnaround period, and that Alpha was liable to financial penalties if there were delays due to its failure to complete its duties within the time available.

30 Mr Oldham further points out that in para 12 the employment tribunal found that the activities undertaken by FEH1s, FEH2s and STRs clearly involved the need for continuity of service or production. He says that the employment tribunal looked at the employees' activities collectively, and so in effect looked at Alpha's business. He also drew attention to the fact that the employment tribunal accepted that derogations from rights provided by EU legislation should be narrowly construed, that the employment tribunal noted that both the Regulations and the Directive envisage the derogation applying in respect of work at airports and that employees who could not rely on regulation 21 could, where appropriate, rely on regulation 24 to have compensatory rest breaks.

31 Mr Oldham criticised the appeal tribunal for accepting the contention of the employees that regulation 21(c) focuses upon the workers' activities and not that of the employer. That, he says, was not consistent with the Directive, in accordance with which the Regulations fell to be construed.

32 In para 12 of its decision, the employment tribunal expressed its brief reasoning on the regulation 21(c) point. It started by saying that it appeared to it on the face of it that the activities undertaken by each category of the employees clearly involved the need for continuity of service or production. It added that the reference to work at docks or airports reinforced what it called "this initial view". It then accepted the argument of Mr Hogarth, for the employees, that it was a central principle of Community jurisprudence that derogations from a right prescribed by a Directive had to be narrowly construed. It referred to the purpose of the Directive as being to ensure that health and safety rights should be made available to the greater part of the workforce within the Community. It then continued:

> "The difficulty, however, is that the exclusion itself is unqualified. Moreover, it seems to us that the Directive, and the Regulations, clearly envisage the sort of activities undertaken by the [employees] as falling within the exception, since they give work at docks or airports as a particular instance of the kind of activity in which the need for continuity of service or production is acknowledged as arising. The time pressures under which onboard catering services must be completed, and the potential consequences, in terms not only of financial penalties upon [Alpha] but also disruption of a fundamental public service, are, to our minds, telling factors."

33 In the passage cited, the employment tribunal plainly focuses on the employer's activities and to my mind that throws light on its "initial view" which it asserted without explanation in the first sentence of para 12, that the activities of the employees involved the need for continuity of service or production. The statistics in para 6(7) of the decision do not support the view that the activities of the employees, as distinct from their employer, involve the need for continuity of service or production. It is not explained why the employees, operating as they do in small units, cannot have their working time so organised as to have rest breaks within each six-hour period of working time. No doubt the working time of Alpha's employees would need to be carefully organised so that there would be an adequate number of workers available while others are taking a 20-minute rest break. But it has not been explained why the employees' activities involve the need for continuity of service or production. In truth it is the employer's activities or need to which the employment tribunal must be referring in the first sentence of para 12, and that is made express in the passage which I have cited from the latter part of para 12. The question therefore is whether the employment tribunal was right to focus on the employer's activities and need, or whether it should have concentrated on those of the worker. That turns on the true construction of regulation 21(c), as read in the light of article 17.2.1(c) of the Directive.

34 Mr Oldham points to the fact that article 17.2.1(c) is worded "in the case of activities involving the need for continuity of service or production". That, he says, is apt to describe, not what the worker is doing, but what the employer's function is. However, that is an incomplete citation from article 17.2.1(c), which continues, so far as relevant: "particularly: . . . to dock or airport workers."

35 The Directive is not very happily worded. Some preposition or prepositional phrase linking the activities with the workers is missing. However, to my mind it is tolerably clear that the "dock or airport workers" are intended to be related to the relevant activities, and that relationship I would understand to be that the activities are those of the dock or airport workers.

36 Mr Oldham suggests that because others of the numbered paragraphs in article 17.2.1(c) refer to industries like agriculture, the reference to dock or airport workers can be construed as a reference to their employer's business. He poses the question: why, if the employees' contentions are correct, are the exceptions in the numbered sub-paragraphs, both of article 17.2.1(c) and regulation 21(c), stated so generally in terms of whole industries? He suggests that both the Directive and the Regulations were directed to the way employers in particular industries operate.

37 I am not able to agree with this submission. In article 17.2.1(c) the numbered sub-paragraphs sometimes refer to specific activities or industries and sometimes to categories of workers. In regulation 21(c) the numbered sub-paragraphs set out which activities of the worker may involve the need for continuity of service or production in relation to particular services, activities or industries. In neither the Directive nor the Regulations is there any reference to the employer. No doubt the activities of the worker are the activities of the employer in law, but the focus is on the activities of the worker rather than the employer, which activities involve the requisite need for continuity of service or production. The employment tribunal, in my judgment, erred in looking to the activities of the employer.

38 Mr Oldham asserts that the economic consequences of the employees' interpretation would be devastating. That assertion is not backed by a finding of the employment tribunal, and I am not persuaded that so apocalyptic a consequence would flow if the employees are right. No doubt health and safety requirements do add to the economic burdens of an employer, but that fact cannot justify an interpretation which the Directive and the Regulations would otherwise not allow.

39 The appeal tribunal found support for its view on this issue in what Advocate General Tizzano said in his opinion in Bowden v Tuffnells Parcels Express Ltd (Case C-133/00) [2001] ECR I-7031, para 40. Mr Oldham submits that para 40 sets out the reasoning of the appellants in Bowden, and that such reasoning was rejected by the Advocate General in para 21. I agree. The Bowden case was concerned with a different point. The appeal tribunal also refers to passages in the judgment of the European Court of Justice, but in my judgment they do not assist on this particular point.

40 However, for the reasons which I have already given, the conclusion reached by the appeal tribunal was in my judgment correct. As Mr Hogarth observed in his skeleton argument, any other interpretation would allow an employer to avoid the duty imposed by the Regulations by the simple expedient of not employing enough staff to cover for rest breaks.

41 I would dismiss Alpha's appeal on this point.

(2) Regulation 21(d)

42 Alpha seeks permission to appeal from the Employment Appeal Tribunal's affirmation of the employment tribunal's decision that Alpha had not demonstrated that there were foreseeable surges in activities. The employment tribunal expressed its view on the meaning of surge thus, in para 14:

> "the concept of a 'surge' is intended to refer to something much more extreme than the natural fluctuations in activity which most workers in most industries experience. The examples under paragraph (d) (again, taken from the Directive) point, we think, to exceptional levels of activity arising seasonally or on special days or during particular periods of the year, and not to routine increases and decreases in activity occurring naturally in the daily and weekly cycle."

43 The employment tribunal found that the relatively modest fluctuations which Alpha experienced within the working day and working week were not capable of amounting to surges within the meaning of regulation 21(d).

44 Mr Oldham submits that there is no difference in principle between variations occurring daily or weekly, on the one hand, and variations occurring seasonally or on special days or during particular periods. He says that the variations faced by Alpha occurred just as naturally as those faced by other industries of different cycles, and he instances that it is just as predictable that Monday morning would see a surge of activity for Alpha as that Christmas would be busy for the Post Office, or that harvest time would be busy for farmers. On the facts found Mr Oldham points to the finding in para 6(8) of the employment tribunal's decision that Monday mornings might see activity two and a half times as great as on a Saturday morning.

45 I would refuse Alpha permission to appeal on this point, as I do not think Alpha had a reasonable prospect of success on it. The employment tribunal was concerned with the meaning of an ordinary word, "surge", which was undefined and which it had to construe in the context of the Regulations, and in particular having regard to the heading of regulation 21 that such surges would only occur "in special cases". In my

A view, it was correct in taking a restrictive view of this derogation and in holding that a surge only occurred when there is an exceptional level of activity, beyond the fluctuations experienced within the working day and working week, and that the evidence had not disclosed any such surge. I would not interfere with the employment tribunal's assessment and finding. Accordingly, I would dismiss the application on this point.

B 46 For the sake of completeness, I would add that it is not obvious that the reference to tourism in regulation 21(d) causes the derogation to be applicable, or might cause the derogation to be applicable, to the circumstances of the employees. But it is unnecessary to decide that point in view of the conclusion which I have reached on the meaning of surge.

(3) Down time

C 47 Alpha seeks permission to appeal from the appeal tribunal's affirmation of the employment tribunal's decision that there was no rest break in the employees' down time. The employment tribunal in its consideration of this point said that it is of the essence of a rest break that the period of rest is the employee's own, and that an employee who is on call and may be summoned at any moment is not enjoying a rest break. It added in

D para 20 of its decision:

> "It does not (retrospectively) become a rest break because, fortuitously, 20 minutes have passed without the employee being interrupted. The essence of the entitlement under regulation 12(1) is that the employee knows when his break begins that his time is his own until the period of the break has expired."

E 48 Mr Oldham submits that the 1998 Regulations impose no qualification on what a rest break may consist of, and no restriction on its scope is to be implied by reference to Directive 93/104. All that is required for a rest break, he says, is that there is an uninterrupted period of at least 20 minutes which can be taken away from the workstation. By article 4 the details of the rest break to which every worker is entitled where the working

F day is longer than six hours are to be laid down in collective agreements or agreements between the two sides of industry or in national legislation. Nothing is specified in the Regulations and, as I have already said, there is no relevant collective agreement or agreement between the two sides of industry.

49 Mr Oldham acknowledges that he is in difficulty if the meaning of "working time" is relevant to the meaning of rest break, because the

G authorities show that a period when a worker is required to be on call at the place of work so as to resume the performance of his duties immediately he is required to do so by his employer is working time, even if the worker is asleep during that period (see Sindicato Médicos de Asistencia Pública (SIMAP) v Conselleria de Sanidad y Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valenciana (Case C-303/98) [2001] ICR 1116 and H Landeshauptstadt Kiel v Jaeger (Case C-151/02) [2004] ICR 1528). But he submits before us today, contrary to what he had argued in his skeleton argument for this court, that working time and rest breaks are not mutually exclusive.

50 I would refuse permission on this point also, as in my view it is not a point on which Alpha had any real prospect of success. Whilst I accept on the authority of SIMAP [2001] ICR 1116 (see para 50 of the judgment of the European Court of Justice) that a period in which the worker is on call is not in itself sufficient to make that period working time, it seems plain to me that down time in the present case, the incidents of which are stated by the employment tribunal in para 6(5), cannot be a rest break, and a fortiori a period of down time cannot retrospectively become a rest break only because it can be seen after it is over that it was an uninterrupted period of at least 20 minutes. The worker is entitled under regulation 12(1) to a rest break if his working time exceeds six hours, and he must know at the start of a rest break that it is such. To my mind a rest break is an uninterrupted period of at least 20 minutes which is neither a rest period nor working time and which the worker can use as he pleases.

(4) Regulation 24

51 The appeal tribunal said that, even if wrong on regulation 21(c), the originating applications should not have been dismissed by the employment tribunal because there remained the question of whether the employees were entitled to compensatory rest breaks under regulation 24. Alpha submits that this was incorrect for several reasons. It is unnecessary to go into those reasons, and we have heard no argument on this point, in view of the conclusion which I have reached on the other points.

52 In the result, I would dismiss this appeal.

Employment—Unfair dismissal—Reasonableness of dismissal—Misconduct—Dismissal for reason relating to employee's conduct—Employer's investigation into alleged misconduct—Whether permissible for tribunal to substitute its own view—Whether band of reasonable responses appropriate test of fairness—Employment Rights Act 1996 (c. 18), s. 98(1)(2)(4)

In the first case the applicant employee when working on a late shift one night had been allowed by his manager to leave early following a telephone request from his wife that her state of health required his attention at home. The employee was seen shortly after leaving work by another manager at a nearby public house. Following a disciplinary hearing the employee, who had a clean conduct record, was dismissed for unauthorised absence from duty. The employee's claim that, pursuant to section 98 of the Employment Rights Act 1996,[1] his dismissal was unfair was rejected by an employment tribunal, which held that the employer, having carried out as much investigation into the matter as was reasonable in all the circumstances of the case, had established reasonable grounds for believing that the employee was guilty of misconduct and that the employer's decision to dismiss though harsh was reasonable. The Employment Appeal Tribunal allowed an appeal by the employee.

In the second case the applicant employee was suspected by his employer, a bank, of involvement in the misappropriation and fraudulent use of customers' debit cards. Following a disciplinary hearing he was summarily dismissed for gross misconduct. On his complaint of unfair dismissal, an employment tribunal considering the fairness of the dismissal under section 98 of the Act of 1996 concluded that those carrying out the investigation on behalf of the employer had closed their minds to any possibility other than that of the employee's guilt, that the employer had accordingly failed to carry out a sufficient investigation and that the dismissal was unfair. An appeal by the employer was dismissed by the Employment Appeal Tribunal on the ground that no substantial reason had been shown for the dismissal within the intendment of section 98(1)(2) of the Act of 1996.

On appeals by the employers:—

Held, (1) that the correct approach for employment tribunals when applying section 98(1)(2) and (4) of the Employment Rights

[1] Employment Rights Act 1996, s. 98: "(1) In determining . . . whether the dismissal of an employee is fair or unfair, it is for the employer to show—(a) the reason (or, if more than one, the principal reason) for the dismissal, and (b) either that it is either a reason falling within subsection (2) . . . (2) A reason falls within this subsection if it— . . . (b) relates to the conduct of the employee . . . (4) . . . the determination of the question whether the dismissal is fair or unfair (having regard to the reason shown by the employer)—(a) depends on whether in the circumstances (including the size and administrative resources of the employer's undertaking) the employer acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating it as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee, and (b) shall be determined in accordance with equity and the substantial merits of the case."

Act 1996 was to give to those provisions the same interpretation as had for many years been placed by the courts on the equivalent provisions in section 57(1)(2) and (3) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 and thus, for all practical purposes, to consider whether the employer's decision to dismiss fell within the band of reasonable responses to the employee's conduct which a reasonable employer could adopt and to apply the tripartite approach to the reason for, and the reasonableness of, a dismissal for a reason relating to the conduct of an employee; and that that approach required the employer to establish the fact of his belief in the employee's misconduct, that he had reasonable grounds on which to sustain that belief and that, at the stage at which he formed the belief on those grounds, he had carried out as much investigation into the matter as was reasonable in the circumstances of the case (post, pp. 1287C-1288A, 1296C-D).

Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd. v. Jones [1983] I.C.R. 17, E.A.T.; Neale v. Hereford and Worcester County Council [1986] I.C.R. 471, C.A.; dictum of Arnold J. in British Home Stores Ltd. v. Burchell (Note) [1980] I.C.R. 303, 304, E.A.T. and W. Weddel & Co. Ltd. v. Tepper [1980] I.C.R. 286, C.A. applied.

Haddon v. Van den Bergh Foods Ltd. [1999] I.C.R. 1150, E.A.T. overruled.

(2) Allowing the first appeal, that the employment tribunal, having considered that the employer had established reasonable grounds for its belief that the employee was guilty of misconduct and that it had carried out as much investigation as was reasonable, had concluded that the employer acted reasonably in treating that as a sufficient reason for dismissing him; and that there was no error of law in its approach or its conclusion and, accordingly, no ground on which an appellate tribunal could interfere with its decision (post, pp. 1290C-D, 1291A-C).

(3) Allowing the second appeal, that the employer, not the tribunal, was the proper person to conduct the investigation into the alleged misconduct; that the function of the tribunal was to decide whether the investigation was reasonable in the circumstances and whether the decision to dismiss, in the light of the results of that investigation, was a reasonable response; that the employment tribunal had erred in impermissibly substituting itself as employer in place of the bank in assessing the quality and weight of the evidence before the investigator; and that no reasonable tribunal properly directed could have concluded either that the bank had failed to conduct a reasonable investigation or that the dismissal was outside the range of reasonable responses (post, p. 1295D-H).

Decisions of Employment Appeal Tribunal reversed.

APPEALS from the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

FOLEY v. POST OFFICE

By an originating application dated 17 October 1997 the applicant, John Foley, sought compensation for unfair dismissal from the respondent employer, The Post Office. On 16 April 1998 an industrial tribunal sitting at London (North) dismissed the application, finding the dismissal to have been fair. On 31 March 1999 the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Holland J., Mr. K. M. Hack and Ms D. Warwick) allowed an appeal by the applicant and substituted a finding that the applicant had been unfairly dismissed.

Pursuant to leave granted by Peter Gibson L.J. on 15 July 1999, the employer appealed on, inter alia, the following grounds. (1) The conduct for which the applicant was dismissed was clearly within a band which a reasonable employer could conclude to be gross misconduct. (2) The appeal tribunal relied on two matters on which no reasonable tribunal would have relied, namely, (a) that the conduct complained of did not fit within the categories listed in the employer's disciplinary procedure as typical of gross misconduct, whereas such misconduct merely needed to be such as to show disregard for the essentials of the contract of employment, and (b) the employer's decision to dismiss with notice for its finding that it never regarded the applicant's conduct as being gross misconduct. (3) In any event, even if a finding of gross misconduct was made by the employer, the employer had a duty to consider whether dismissal or some other penalty was the appropriate one, and the finding by the appeal tribunal that both the employer and the industrial tribunal had failed to consider whether the applicant's dismissal fell within the band of reasonable responses was perverse and wrong in law. (4) The appeal tribunal erred in law in substituting its view, that the applicant's dismissal was not within the band of reasonable responses open to the employer given the employee's misconduct, for that of the industrial tribunal that dismissal for such misconduct was within the band of reasonable responses.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Mummery L.J.

HSBC BANK PLC. (FORMERLY MIDLAND BANK PLC.) v. MADDEN

By an originating application dated 21 January 1998, the applicant, John Madden, made a complaint of unfair dismissal against the respondent employer, Midland Bank Plc. (now HSBC Bank Plc.). On 17 July 1998 an industrial tribunal sitting at London (North) upheld the complaint. On 7 March 2000 the employer's appeal was dismissed by the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Lindsay J., Mr. P. M. Smith and Mr. P. D. Wickens).

Pursuant to permission granted on 9 May 2000 by Lindsay J. the employer appealed on, inter alia, the following grounds. (1) The industrial tribunal had substituted its own view for that of the employer, and the Employment Appeal Tribunal, having correctly decided that it was not open to any court short of the Court of Appeal to deny reference to the band of reasonable responses as a determinative test, thereafter erred by failing to uphold the test in unqualified terms and wrongly held that an employment tribunal was entitled to substitute its view, for that of the employer. (2) The appeal tribunal failed to recognise that the industrial tribunal had impermissibly substituted its views for those of the employer, applied too high a standard of proof for the employer's belief when dismissing and, when dealing with the adequacy of the investigation, assessed the quality of the evidence for the purposes of deciding whether the applicant should be dismissed rather than any particular shortcoming in the investigation.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Mummery L.J.

David Bean Q.C. and Robin White for The Post Office, the employer in the first appeal.

David Reade for Mr. Foley, the applicant employee in the first appeal.

Peter McMaster for HSBC Bank Plc., the employer in the second appeal.

Manjit S. Gill Q.C. and Edward Fitzpatrick for Mr. Madden, the applicant employee in the second appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

31 July. NOURSE L.J. Mummery L.J. will deliver the first judgment on these appeals.

A MUMMERY L.J. The court expedited the hearing of these two appeals in view of the current state of uncertainty in the employment tribunals on some fundamental aspects of the law of unfair dismissal following two recent decisions of the Employment Appeal Tribunal: Haddon v. Van den Bergh Foods Ltd. [1999] I.C.R. 1150 which has been followed in Wilson v. Ethicon Ltd. [2000] I.R.L.R. 4, but was settled while under appeal to this court, and Midland Bank Plc. v. Madden [2000] I.R.L.R. 288, from which B we have heard the appeal, along with the appeal in Post Office v. Foley, an unreported case decided by the Employment Appeal Tribunal before Haddon and Madden were decided. The judgments in both Haddon and Madden are analysed in detail, in the context of both the legislative history of unfair dismissal and the development of judicial interpretation, in yet another recent decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal, Beedell v. C West Ferry Printers Ltd. [2000] I.C.R. 1263, in which judgment on behalf of the appeal tribunal was given by Judge Peter Clark.

General introduction

Since employment tribunals throughout Great Britain decide thousands of unfair dismissal cases every month, it is crucial that D uncertainty about the law to be applied by them should be dispelled as soon as possible.

In my judgment, the employment tribunals should continue to apply the law enacted in section 98(1), (2) and (4) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 giving to those subsections the same interpretation as was placed for many years by this court and the Employment Appeal Tribunal on the equivalent provisions in section 57(1), (2) and (3) of the Employment E Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978. This means that for all practical purposes:

(1) "The band or range of reasonable responses" approach to the issue of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of a dismissal, as expounded by Browne-Wilkinson J. in Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd. v. Jones [1983] I.C.R. 17, 24F–25D and as approved and applied by this court (see Gilham v. Kent F County Council (No. 2) [1985] I.C.R. 233; Neale v. Hereford and Worcester County Council [1986] I.C.R. 471; Campion v. Hamworthy Engineering Ltd. [1987] I.C.R. 966 and Morgan v. Electrolux Ltd. [1991] I.C.R. 369), remains binding on this court, as well as on the employment tribunals and the Employment Appeal Tribunal. The disapproval of that approach in Haddon v. Van den Bergh Foods Ltd. [1999] I.C.R. 1150, 1160E–F, on the basis that (a) the expression was a "mantra" which led employment G tribunals into applying what amounts to a perversity test of reasonableness, instead of the statutory test of reasonableness as it stands, and that (b) it prevented members of employment tribunals from approaching the issue of reasonableness by reference to their own judgment of what they would have done had they been the employers, is an unwarranted departure from binding authority.

H (2) The tripartite approach to (a) the reason for, and (b) the reasonableness or unreasonableness of, a dismissal for a reason relating to the conduct of the employee, as expounded by Arnold J. in British Home Stores Ltd. v. Burchell (Note) [1980] I.C.R. 303, 304 and 308G–H, and as approved and applied by this court in W. Weddel & Co. Ltd. v. Tepper [1980] I.C.R. 286, remains binding on this court, as well as on employment tribunals and the Employment Appeal Tribunal. Any departure from that approach indicated in Madden (for example, by suggesting that reasonable grounds for belief in the employee's misconduct and the carrying out of a reasonable investigation into the matter relate to establishing the reason for dismissal rather than to the reasonableness of the dismissal) is inconsistent with binding authority.

Unless and until the statutory provisions are differently interpreted by the House of Lords or are amended by an Act of Parliament, that is the law which should continue to be applied to claims for unfair dismissal. In so holding I am aware that there is a body of informed opinion which is critical of this interpretation of the Act of 1996. Those views have been comprehensively debated in the able arguments advanced on these appeals by Mr. Bean, Mr. Reade, Mr. McMaster and Mr. Gill.

A reminder of the fundamental constitutional difference between the interpretation of legislation, which is a judicial function, and the enactment and amendment of legislation, which is a parliamentary function, is required in view of the number of occasions on which reference was made in the submissions to a "judicial gloss" on the legislation. As Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead said in Inco Europe Ltd. v. First Choice Distribution [2000] 1 W.L.R. 586, 592E–F:

> "The courts are ever mindful that their constitutional role in this field is interpretative. They must abstain from any course which might have the appearance of judicial legislation. A statute is expressed in language approved and enacted by the legislature."

In this case the interpretation placed by the tribunals and courts, including this court, on the provisions of the Act of 1978 in Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd. [1983] I.C.R. 17 and British Home Stores Ltd. v. Burchell has not led Parliament to amend the relevant provisions, even though Parliament has from time to time made other amendments to the law of unfair dismissal since those authoritative rulings on interpretation were first made. So those rulings, which have been followed almost every day in almost every employment tribunal and on appeals for nearly 20 years, remain binding.

They should be applied to the two cases under appeal with the result that both appeals should be allowed and both claims for unfair dismissal fail.

A The Post Office appeal

Mr. Foley was employed by The Post Office as a postal worker from 18 September 1989 until 19 June 1997, when he was dismissed for a reason relating to his conduct. On 3 November 1997 he presented a complaint of unfair dismissal to the employment tribunal which held, as explained in the extended reasons sent to the parties on 16 April 1998, that he was not unfairly dismissed. His appeal against that decision was allowed by the Employment Appeal Tribunal on 30 March 1999 and the case was

A remitted to the employment tribunal for a remedies hearing. The Post Office appeals with the permission of Peter Gibson L.J.

The decision of the employment tribunal

The tribunal found that the reason for Mr. Foley's dismissal was "unauthorised absence for part or whole of a duty on 16 May 1997," that that was a reason relating to conduct within section 98(2)(b) of the Act of B 1996, and that the decision to dismiss him for the conduct alleged, though "harsh," was reasonable pursuant to section 98(4) of the Act. It was fair. The tribunal was "mindful that we must not impose our decision upon that of a reasoned on the spot management decision." The dismissal was "within the range of reasonable responses."

C The facts

That conclusion was based on the following findings of fact.

(1) Mr. Foley was on a late shift on Friday, 16 May 1997 at the Princess Royal Distribution Centre, Stonebridge Park, London NW10. The shift was due to finish at 11.00 p.m. His wife telephoned him at 7.30 p.m. from home at Portland Road, London W11, saying she was in a D bad state of nerves and required his attention. His immediate line manager, Mr. Joyce, gave him permission to leave work early. He left between 7.30 and 7.45 p.m. (2) At about 8.47 p.m. another manager, Mr. Kowalski, who was off duty, reported that he saw Mr. Foley at the Innisfree Public House in Harrow Road, Wembley, which was about 12 minutes away from the depot, and notified Mr. Joyce on his mobile phone. The late shift manager, Ms Johnson, sent two managers (the E indoor patrol) to the pub, but Mr. Foley could not be seen. (3) On 20 May Ms Johnson instructed Mr. Kowalski to conduct a fact-finding interview. He then passed the papers to Ms Johnson, who sent a charge letter to Mr. Foley on 3 June 1997. (4) On 11 and 12 June a disciplinary hearing was conducted by Ms Johnson. Mr. Foley was accompanied by his trade union representative. There was a dispute about the timing of the events F on 16 May. Mr. Foley's case was that he was not in the pub at the time when Mr. Kowalski said he had seen him. He had gone into the pub at about 8.00 p.m. to phone for a taxi as he wished to get home early and the bus would not arrive for another 18 minutes. The taxi came at 8.20 p.m. According to Mrs. Foley, he arrived home at 8.40 p.m. (5) Ms Johnson dismissed Mr. Foley, who had a clean conduct record, for the alleged misconduct. The hearing was not, however, "conducted as fairly as it G might have been." Ms Johnson had not followed up lines of inquiry with the licensee of the pub, Mr. Mulvaney, who supplied a letter saying that he had called a minicab for Mr. Foley at 8.00 p.m. and that it had arrived at 8.20 p.m., nor with the minicab company, which supplied a document from driver number 98 indicating a time of 8.00 p.m.

(6) Mr. Foley appealed. His appeal, at which he was accompanied by H his trade union representative, was heard by the appeals manager, Miss Susan Little, on 19 August 1997. Miss Little "considered the issues with great care and in great depth" and investigated the documentation in relation to the licensee of the pub and the minicab company. She could see no reason for disbelieving Mr. Kowalski and concluded that Mr. Foley was in the pub after 8.20 p.m. She attempted unsuccessfully to obtain more information from the minicab company about the time of the pick-up. There was uncontradicted evidence in the chairman's notes of evidence that, like Ms Johnson, she considered the range of responses to the conduct of Mr. Foley before concluding that dismissal was the appropriate remedy. It was a permissible option in The Post Office conduct code, which provided in section 12.5 (by way of a general guide) that the possible penalties ("not automatic") for "unauthorised absence for all or part of duty" were "warning or dismissal." Her "careful conduct of the appeal hearing rectified an otherwise unfair dismissal." Mr. Foley was informed on 3 October 1997 of the decision to uphold the dismissal.

The legal position

An appeal from the employment tribunal only lies on a question of law. In my judgment, there was no error of law in the extended reasons for dismissing Mr. Foley's claim. The Employment Appeal Tribunal was not entitled to reverse its decision.

The legal position is as follows.

(1) Reason for dismissal

Why did The Post Office dismiss Mr. Foley?

The Post Office established to the satisfaction of the employment tribunal that the reason for the dismissal of Mr. Foley related to his conduct within the meaning of section 98(2)(b) of the Act of 1996, i.e., unauthorised absence from duty for part of a duty on 16 May 1997. That was the reason for dismissal in the accepted sense that it was a set of facts known to the Post Office, or a set of beliefs held by it, which caused it to dismiss Mr. Foley: W. Devis & Sons Ltd. v. Atkins [1977] I.C.R. 662, 678A. There is no appeal against that finding of fact. I should, however, add that, although there was some argument about the tribunal's reference (in paragraph 25 of the extended reasons) to the faith that The Post Office must have in the employee giving the "real reason" for a request to be absent from work, it is clear that the tribunal proceeded on the basis that Mr. Foley had given the "real reason" in stating that Mrs. Foley had phoned at 7.30 p.m. requiring his attention to her at home and that had led him to seek and obtain permission to go home. There is no suggestion in the facts found by the tribunal that Mr. Foley had obtained permission to go home by giving a false reason to obtain permission to leave early.

This paragraph is directed not so much to the particular facts surrounding the reason for dismissal in this case as to a more general explanation of the importance of the employer's trust and confidence in his employee and to the future effect on that trust and confidence if an employee does not use his absence from duty for the purpose for which he has obtained it.

A (2) Reasonableness of dismissal

In the circumstances did The Post Office act reasonably or unreasonably in treating that reason as a sufficient reason for dismissing Mr. Foley?

The argument on this appeal has focused on the tribunal's conclusion that The Post Office acted reasonably in treating that as a sufficient reason for dismissing Mr. Foley. I am unable to find any error of law in that B conclusion or in the reasoning process by which the tribunal arrived at it. In accordance with section 98(4) the tribunal considered all the relevant circumstances and determined the question whether the dismissal was fair or unfair in accordance with the equity and substantial merits of the case. In particular, in accordance with the approach in British Home Stores Ltd. v. Burchell (Note) [1980] I.C.R. 303, the tribunal considered whether C The Post Office had established reasonable grounds for its belief that Mr. Foley was guilty of misconduct and whether it had carried out as much investigation into the matter as was reasonable in all the circumstances of the case.

Appeal rehearing point

D Although the tribunal found that the disciplinary hearing by Ms Johnson was not conducted as fairly as it might have been, because she had not followed up lines of inquiry with the minicab company and the licensee of the pub, this deficiency was remedied on the appeal.

There is no error of law in that approach. The appeal was a rehearing and not merely a review of the unsatisfactory initial disciplinary hearing by Ms Johnson. The appeal was properly regarded as part of the overall E process of terminating Mr. Foley's employment: Whitbread & Co. Plc. v. Mills [1988] I.C.R. 776, 792G–795C; Clark v. Civil Aviation Authority [1991] I.R.L.R. 412, 415, 416, paras. 22, 25 and 26. That process constituted an investigation which was reasonable in all the circumstances. The rehearing was conducted thoroughly by Miss Little. She investigated the documentation with the minicab company and the licensee of the Innisfree F public house and weighed that against the evidence of Mr. Kowalski, whom she had no reason to disbelieve.

Range of reasonable responses approach

The employment tribunal then followed, as it was bound by authority to do, the approach in Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd. v. Jones [1983] I.C.R. 17 and held that, although it was of the view that the decision to G dismiss was "harsh," it was not entitled to substitute itself for the employer and impose its "decision upon that of a reasoned on the spot management decision" (paragraph 23). Instead it asked, as required by authority, whether the dismissal was "within the range of reasonable responses for this employer to have dismissed this employee." It found that it was. That finding is not erroneous in law, unless it can be characterised by an H appellate body as one which no reasonable tribunal could have reached. That is not, however, the basis on which Mr. Reade, on behalf of Mr. Foley, attacked the decision of the tribunal. His submission, based on Haddon v. Van den Bergh Foods Ltd. [1999] I.C.R. 1150, was that the tribunal ought to have started from the position of considering what it would do in the circumstances and then consider on the objective test in section 98(4) whether the decision to dismiss was reasonable or unreasonable. It should not simply have applied what was described in Haddon as the "mantra" (i.e., the band of reasonable responses and the warning against substituting its own judgment for that of the employer) which drove employment tribunals to subvert the provisions of section 98 and in effect apply a more extreme perversity test. If the tribunal had taken the approach in Haddon it would have given effect to its express view that the decision to dismiss was "harsh" and it would have concluded that the dismissal of Mr. Foley, who had a clean record, for an offence which was not gross misconduct, was manifestly unreasonable.

I would reject these submissions on the perversity point and on the substitution point as contrary to authority binding on this court.

Perversity point

It was made clear in Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd. v. Jones [1983] I.C.R. 17, 25B–D, that the provisions of section 57(3) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 (which were re-enacted in section 98(4) of the Employment Rights Act 1996) did not require "such a high degree of unreasonableness to be shown that nothing short of a perverse decision to dismiss can be held to be unfair within the section." The tribunals were advised to follow the formulation of the band of reasonable responses approach instead. If an employment tribunal in any particular case misinterprets or misapplies that approach, so as to amount to a requirement of a perverse decision to dismiss, that would be an error of law with which an appellate body could interfere.

The range of reasonable responses approach does not, however, become one of perversity nor is it rendered "unhelpful" by the fact that there may be extremes and that (as observed in Haddon v. Van den Bergh Foods Ltd. [1999] I.C.R. 1150, 1160D) "Dismissal is the ultimate sanction." Further, that approach is not in practice required in every case. There will be cases in which there is no band or range to consider. If, for example, an employee, without good cause, deliberately sets fire to his employer's factory and it is burnt to the ground, dismissal is the only reasonable response. If an employee is dismissed for politely saying "Good morning" to his line manager, that would be an unreasonable response. But in between those extreme cases there will be cases where there is room for reasonable disagreement among reasonable employers as to whether dismissal for the particular misconduct is a reasonable or an unreasonable response. In those cases it is helpful for the tribunal to consider "the range of reasonable responses."

Substitution point

It was also made clear in Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd., at pp. 24G–25B, that the members of the tribunal must not simply consider whether they personally think that the dismissal is fair and they must not substitute their decision as to what was the right course to adopt for that of the employer. Their proper function is to determine whether the decision to dismiss the employee fell within the band of reasonable responses "which a reasonable employer might have adopted."

In one sense it is true that, if the application of that approach leads the members of the tribunal to conclude that the dismissal was unfair, they are in effect substituting their judgment for that of the employer. But that process must always be conducted by reference to the objective standards of the hypothetical reasonable employer which are imported by the statutory references to "reasonably or unreasonably" and not by reference to their own subjective views of what they would in fact have done as an employer in the same circumstances. In other words, although the members of the tribunal can substitute their decision for that of the employer, that decision must not be reached by a process of substituting themselves for the employer and forming an opinion of what they would have done had they been the employer, which they were not.

B The Madden appeal

Mr. Madden was employed by the Midland Bank Plc. (now HSBC Bank Plc.) from September 1986. He was a lending officer (grade 4) at the date when he was summarily dismissed on 24 October 1997 for a reason relating to his conduct. He presented a complaint of unfair dismissal to the employment tribunal on 21 January 1998. The tribunal unanimously held that he was unfairly dismissed for the reasons set out in the extended reasons sent to the parties on 17 July 1998. The Employment Appeal Tribunal dismissed the bank's appeal on 7 March 2000. The employment tribunal held that a sufficient investigation into the alleged misconduct of Mr. Madden was not carried out in all the circumstances before the decision was made to dismiss him, that more inquiries and investigations should have been made and that the decision to dismiss was not taken on reasonable grounds and was therefore unfair.

The facts

The conclusions of the tribunal were based on the following findings of fact.

(1) Mr. Madden was regarded as a good and trustworthy employee at the Enfield Town branch of the bank. In June 1996 he was transferred from that branch to the Palmers Green branch, but continued to work one Saturday in four at Enfield Town. He had an unblemished record.

(2) In June and July 1997 three customers of the bank had their debit cards misappropriated when they were despatched for collection by them at their branches. The cards were used to obtain goods by deception. Two of the customers, Mr. Wood and Mr. Clark, expected to collect their cards at the Enfield Town branch and the third, Mr. Porter, expected to collect his card at the Palmers Green branch.

(3) In July 1997 a bank employee made unauthorised inquiries through the bank's internal Nixdorf computer system about the status of each of the three customers' accounts to which the debit cards related. The inquiries coincided with the fraudulent use of the cards.

(4) Mr. Madden was in the relevant branches when the cards might have been misappropriated and he was the only member of the staff who was at the respective branches when all three inquiries were made by accessing the internal Nixdorf computer.

(5) On 1 September 1997 Mr. Madden was arrested. He was later released without charge. He was suspended on full pay pending further investigations.

(6) On 7 October 1997 an investigation report was made by Mr. Murphy, an investigating officer with the bank's security. He reported that the evidence indicated that Mr. Madden may have had an involvement in the thefts, although he consistently denied taking the cards or making unauthorised computer inquiries on the customers' accounts.

(7) On 24 October 1997 a disciplinary hearing was held by the area manager, Mr. Brian Fielder. Mr. Madden was represented by a BIFU official. At the end of the hearing he was summarily dismissed on the ground that the bank had a reasonable belief that he had been involved in the misappropriation of the cards which had been used fraudulently and that trust had irretrievably broken down.

(8) Mr. Madden exercised his right of appeal, but did not proceed with it. His appeal was dismissed in his absence.

The legal position

In my judgment there was an error of law in the extended reasons given by the employment tribunal for concluding that Mr. Madden was unfairly dismissed. The Employment Appeal Tribunal ought to have allowed the appeal and dismissed Mr. Madden's claim.

In view of the earlier discussion of the relevant statutory provisions and case law the legal position can be briefly stated as follows.

(1) Reason for dismissal

Why did the bank dismiss Mr. Madden?

There was no dispute that the reason for the dismissal of Mr. Madden related to his conduct within the meaning of section 98(2)(b) of the Employment Rights Act 1996, i.e., the bank's reasonable belief that he had been involved in the misappropriation of the three debit cards which were subsequently used fraudulently and that that led to an irretrievable breakdown in trust between the bank and Mr. Madden.

(2) Reasonableness of the dismissal

In the circumstances did the bank act reasonably or unreasonably in treating that reason as a sufficient reason for dismissing Mr. Madden?

In holding that the dismissal of Mr. Madden for that reason was unreasonable the employment tribunal erred in law. It did not correctly apply the law as laid down in the authorities already discussed in the Post Office case. It impermissibly substituted itself as employer in place of the bank in assessing the quality and weight of the evidence before Mr. Fielder, principally in the form of the investigating officer's report. Instead, it should have asked whether, by the standards of the reasonable employer, the bank had established reasonable grounds for its belief that Mr. Madden was guilty of misconduct and whether the bank's investigation into the matter was reasonable in the circumstances.

A The extent of the tribunal's substitution of itself as employer in place of the bank, rather than taking a view of the matter from the standpoint of the reasonable employer, is evident from the tenor of the views expressed by the tribunal on the quality and weight of the available evidence against Mr. Madden. I refer to the tribunal's cumulative critical comments on the bank's internal investigation by Mr. Murphy, on the disciplinary hearing by Mr. Fielder and on the probative value of the B material on which Mr. Fielder based the summary dismissal: that "there was no clear culprit for the misappropriation of the cards;" that there was "no firm evidence of the precise dates on which the cards were taken;" that there was "no direct evidence that Mr. Madden had accessed the Nixdorf system;" that there was no investigation of the "personal or financial affairs" of other members of the staff; that no account was taken of the C nature of the goods bought with the stolen cards; that Mr. Fielder failed to take account of the fact that a man in Mr. Madden's financial and career position would not have jeopardised all for such a "relatively paltry theft;" that "the facts of the case should have produced more than reasonable doubt in Mr. Fielder's mind;" that the investigators had closed their minds to any possibility other than the guilt of Mr. Madden; that Mr. Fielder "came to a hasty conclusion that Mr. Madden was probably D guilty" and was content to accept the report of the investigators too readily and uncritically; and that Mr. Fielder's decision to dismiss Mr. Madden, who had a stainless record of 11 years' service, would effectively ruin his career and was not taken on reasonable grounds.

In my judgment no reasonable tribunal, properly applying the approach in British Home Stores Ltd. v. Burchell (Note) [1980] I.C.R. 303 and Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd. v. Jones [1983] I.C.R. 17 to the facts, could E have concluded either (a) that the bank had failed to conduct such investigation into the matter as was reasonable in all the circumstances or (b) that dismissal for that reason was outside the range of reasonable responses. Instead of determining whether the bank had made reasonable investigations into the matter and whether it had acted within the range of responses of a reasonable employer, the tribunal in effect decided that, had F it been the employer, it would not have been satisfied by the evidence that Mr. Madden was involved in the misappropriation of the debit cards or their fraudulent use and would not have dismissed him. The tribunal focused on the insufficiency of the evidence to prove to its satisfaction that Mr. Madden was guilty of misconduct rather than on whether the bank's investigation into his alleged misconduct was a reasonable investigation.

This case illustrates the dangers of encouraging an approach to unfair G dismissal cases which leads an employment tribunal to substitute itself for the employer or to act as if it were conducting a rehearing of, or an appeal against, the merits of the employer's decision to dismiss. The employer, not the tribunal, is the proper person to conduct the investigation into the alleged misconduct. The function of the tribunal is to decide whether that investigation is reasonable in the circumstances and whether the decision H to dismiss, in the light of the results of that investigation, is a reasonable response.

I would accordingly allow both appeals and dismiss the complaints of unfair dismissal.

RIX L.J. I agree with the judgment of Mummery L.J. which I have had the advantage of reading in draft, and only wish to add a few words on what has been call the "substitution" point.

The possibility of an employment tribunal or of the Employment Appeal Tribunal substituting its own view for that of the employer in question could, in theory, arise in at least three different situations:

(1) Either tribunal may be tempted to substitute its own views as to the correct conclusion to be arrived at as to the employee's responsibility for the misconduct complained of.

(2) The employment tribunal is charged under section 98(4) of the Act of 1996 with the determination of the question whether the dismissal is fair or unfair and, in so doing, has to decide whether the employer acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating the section 98(2) reason as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee.

(3) The Employment Appeal Tribunal may be tempted to substitute its own views as to the section 98(4) question of reasonableness or unreasonableness.

In my judgment only the second of those three alternatives is legitimate. As a matter of authority binding in this court, that determination required by statute is to be answered by the employment tribunal with the assistance of the "band of reasonable responses" approach set out in the judgment of Browne-Wilkinson J. in Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd. v. Jones [1983] I.C.R. 17.

The first and third of those three alternatives are illegitimate. The reason why the first alternative is illegitimate was well explained by Arnold J. in British Home Stores Ltd. v. Burchell (Note) [1980] I.C.R. 303, 304. The reason why the third alternative is illegitimate is because the Employment Appeal Tribunal is only entitled to differ from the employment tribunal on a question of law. Therefore, it is only in a very exceptional case, where an employment tribunal can be said to have come to a perverse conclusion, that the Employment Appeal Tribunal can interfere in the employment tribunal's determination as to the section 98(4) test, a determination which is essentially a question of fact. That is authoritatively stated in Gilham v. Kent County Council (No. 2) [1985] I.C.R. 233 and in Neale v. Hereford and Worcester County Council [1986] I.C.R. 471.

NOURSE L.J. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgment of Mummery L.J. I agree with it and would allow both appeals accordingly.

Appeals allowed with costs.

Discrimination — Sex — Burden of proof — Employee made redundant after return from maternity leave — Whether tribunal adopting proper approach to shifting burden of proof — Whether comparison with hypothetical male comparator appropriate — Whether employer under duty to carry out health and safety
C risk assessment — Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s 63A (as inserted by Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/2660), reg 5) — Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999 (SI 1999/3242), reg 16

The claimant, who was employed as a senior banker in the employer's equity capital markets department, informed her line manager in November 2000 that she
D was pregnant. While she was away on maternity leave between March and July 2001, there were significant redundancies in the department following deteriorating market conditions, and after her return the claimant was informed that she was at risk of redundancy. She received the lowest score in a redundancy selection process compared with two male colleagues and was made redundant in November 2001. On her complaint of discrimination contrary to the Sex Discrimination Act 1975[1], the employment tribunal directed itself on the burden of proof under section 63A(2), holding that it had to consider whether the claimant was treated any
E less favourably than a hypothetical male comparator would have been treated in the same circumstances, and, if so, whether it was on the ground of her sex or her pregnancy, and, if she had been so treated, whether the employer had proved that it did not commit the act of unlawful discrimination. The tribunal dismissed various allegations of sex discrimination but found that the employer had failed to carry out a health and safety risk assessment in connection with her pregnancy, pursuant to regulation 16 of the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999[2].
F On appeal by the claimant, the Employment Appeal Tribunal allowed the appeal in respect of two allegations of sex discrimination, which it remitted to the tribunal for review, and dismissed the appeal in respect of the other allegations. It allowed the employer's cross-appeal in respect of the health and safety risk assessment and remitted that matter to the same tribunal for review.

On the claimant's appeal—

Held, dismissing the appeal, (1) that on a complaint under the Sex Discrimination
G Act 1975 the complainant had to prove, pursuant to section 63A(2), facts from which an employment tribunal "could" properly conclude that the respondent had committed an unlawful act of discrimination; that the section did not prevent the tribunal at that stage from hearing, accepting or drawing inferences from evidence adduced by the respondent disputing and rebutting the complaint; that, once a prima facie case was established, the burden of proof moved to the respondent to prove that it had not committed any act of unlawful discrimination, but it did not shift simply
H on the complainant establishing the facts of a difference in status and a difference in treatment; that it was only once the burden had shifted that the absence of an adequate explanation for the differential treatment became relevant; and that the

[1] Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s 63A(2), as inserted: see post, para 3.
[2] Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999, reg 16: see post, para 131.

employment tribunal had not erred in following the two-stage approach, considering at the first stage whether the claimant was treated less favourably than a hypothetical male comparator in the same circumstances and whether it was on the grounds of her sex or pregnancy, and, where the burden shifted, dealing at the second stage with the adequacy of the explanation provided by the employer for its alleged less favourable treatment of the claimant (post, paras 52–54, 56, 60, 69, 71, 77, 84, 172–174).

Igen Ltd (formerly Leeds Careers Guidance) v Wong [2005] ICR 931, CA applied.

Laing v Manchester City Council [2006] ICR 1519, EAT approved.

(2) That, although there was no place for a hypothetical male comparator in the case of the dismissal of a female employee for being pregnant, it did not follow that it was wrong for an employment tribunal to make such a comparison in order to determine whether pregnancy or some other reason was the ground for the particular treatment of a pregnant female employee; and that, accordingly, the tribunal did not err in law in comparing the claimant's treatment with that of a hypothetical male comparator (post, paras 118–119).

(3) That the appeal tribunal was right to find that the employment tribunal had erred in law in upholding the claimant's complaint that the employer was in breach of regulation 16 of the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999; that a finding that the claimant's work involved potential risk to the health and safety of the claimant or her baby was necessary before there was an obligation on the employer under regulation 16 to carry out a risk assessment; and that the tribunal had made no express finding of a risk to health and safety and there was no evidence on which it could have made such a finding (post, para 138).

(4) That the appeal tribunal's decision to remit three of the numerous allegations of sex discrimination to the same tribunal was a proportionate and appropriate response in terms of cost, time and efficiency without any real possibility of a risk of apparent bias; and that the appeal tribunal clearly had power to remit those matters for review rather than for rehearing in the exercise of its discretion, and it did not err in exercising that discretion (post, paras 145, 148, 149).

Per curiam. Where the complainant is seeking to compare her treatment with that of a hypothetical comparator, though it would often be desirable for a tribunal to go through the two stages suggested in Igen Ltd (formerly Leeds Careers Guidance) v Wong [2005] ICR 931, it would not necessarily be an error of law to fail to do so, acting on the assumption that the burden of proof may have shifted to the respondent and then considering the explanation put forward by the respondent. In such a case the complainant cannot usually complain, as she would not be prejudiced by the decision to move straight to the second stage and to place the burden of proof on the respondent (post, paras 81–82).

Decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal affirmed.

D APPEAL from the Employment Appeal Tribunal

By an application to the employment tribunal dated 14 December 2001 the claimant, Ms Andrea Madarassy, complained of sex discrimination, victimisation and unfair dismissal while she was employed by the respondent, Nomura International plc, from 17 January 2000 to 22 November 2001. The tribunal at London Central on 18 February 2003 dismissed the claims of sex discrimination, save for one, namely the E employer's failure to carry out a health and safety risk assessment in connection with the claimant's pregnancy, and the claim for victimisation and found that the claimant had been fairly dismissed by reason of redundancy. The Employment Appeal Tribunal (Nelson J, Mr D Bleiman and Mr J Mallender) on 16 December 2004 dismissed the claimant's appeal, save for two allegations, namely the employer's failure to set objectives for the claimant in the fiscal year 2001 whilst they were set for male colleagues F and the failure to supply her with information about the broad redundancy exercise carried out while she was on maternity leave, and the appeal tribunal remitted those matters to the same tribunal for review. The appeal tribunal allowed the employer's cross-appeal in respect of the discrimination complaint on the health and safety risk assessment for the tribunal's lack of adequate findings and remitted that matter to the same tribunal for review. G The appeal tribunal on 16 June 2005 ordered the claimant to pay £2,000 costs on the basis of her unreasonable conduct on the appeal while acting in person in making allegations of bias, false evidence, misrepresentation and perversity which she later withdrew.

By a notice of appeal filed on 22 April 2005 the claimant appealed on the following grounds. (1) The employment tribunal and the appeal tribunal H erred in law in their approach to the incidence of the burden of proof under section 63A of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975. (2) The employment tribunal erred in its approach to evidence, for example in requiring corroborative evidence of any incident before holding that it might be proved, and in finding that there was no evidence on which an allegation could be found proved when the claimant had herself given evidence on the matter in question. (3) The employment tribunal erred in requiring a male comparator in relation to the claimant's complaints regarding her pregnancy and maternity-related treatment and in failing to examine whether that treatment was for a reason connected to pregnancy, and the appeal tribunal erred in failing to remit all complaints regarding the same for rehearing. (4) The employment tribunal erred in its approach to limitation issues in that it determined issues relating to "just and equitable" and "continuing act" before reaching a conclusion on the facts and complaints; in addition it erred in considering the issue of "continuing act" in a compartmentalised fashion without considering the similarity of the acts complained of in separate allegations, and so deprived itself of the benefit of making a judgment having regard to the totality of the evidence and its findings. (5) The employment tribunal and the appeal tribunal erred in their approach to the complaint relating to the failure to carry out a risk assessment by concluding that there was no obligation to carry out a risk assessment in respect of new or expectant mothers unless it was proven as a matter of fact that the work was of a kind which could involve risk and/or that there was some evidence that the work was of a kind which could involve risk. (6) The appeal tribunal erred in remitting certain complaints to the same tribunal when, in the circumstances, there was a clear risk of the perception of bias in the remittance of matters to that same tribunal. (7) The appeal tribunal erred in directing the tribunal to review the matters in relation to which it considered the tribunal had erred rather than directing that there should be a rehearing, since the tribunal's power of review was available only in limited circumstances either on the application of a party or of its own motion.

At the hearing of the appeal on 31 October 2006 the claimant sought permission to appeal against the costs order of 16 June 2005.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Mummery LJ.

Robin Allen QC and Jonathan Cohen for the claimant.
Paul Goulding QC and Claire Weir for the employer.

Cur adv vult

26 January 2007. The following judgments were handed down.

MUMMERY LJ

General introduction

1 This adjourned sex discrimination appeal was heard immediately before two race discrimination appeals, Brown v Croydon London Borough Council (Note) [2007] ICR 909 and Appiah v Governing Body of Bishop Douglass Roman Catholic High School (Note) [2007] ICR 897. Brown, like Madarassy, is an employment case. Appiah is an appeal from the county court in a school exclusion case.

2 Although we are handing down separate judgments on each appeal, they cross-refer to one another, as all of them cover a common question—the burden of proof in discrimination cases. The appeals were listed for hearing together because the grounds of appeal in each case included complaints that, at first instance, the burden of proof had been misunderstood or misapplied and that this error had resulted in the unjustified rejection of well-founded discrimination claims. In each appeal it

A was argued by the complainants that, as the decisions were flawed by error of law, the cases should be remitted for rehearing, in the cases of Madarassy and Brown by a differently constituted employment tribunal, and in the case of Appiah by a different county court judge.

3 In Madarassy, which has been informally treated as the lead case, the appeal on the burden of proof point turns on the construction and application of section 63A(2) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975. The 1975 B Act was amended with effect from 12 October 2001 in order to implement the Burden of Proof Directive (Council Directive 97/80/EC (OJ 1998 L14, p 6)) and to provide:

> "Where, on the hearing of the complaint, the complainant proves facts from which the tribunal could, apart from this section, conclude in the absence of an adequate explanation that the respondent—(a) has C committed an act of discrimination against the complainant which is unlawful by virtue of Part 2, or (b) is by virtue of section 41 or 42 to be treated as having committed such an act of discrimination against the complainant, the tribunal shall uphold the complaint unless the respondent proves that he did not commit, or, as the case may be, is not to be treated as having committed, that act."

4 The appeals on the burden of proof point in Brown and Appiah turn on sections 54A(2) and 57ZA(2) respectively of the Race Relations Act 1976 (as inserted by regulations 41 and 43 of the Race Relations Act 1976 (Amendment) Regulations 2003 (SI 2003/1626)), which contain similar provisions for the hearing of race discrimination complaints.

5 We were informed that, as evidenced by this clutch of appeals and by E appeals pending in other cases, employment tribunals are experiencing difficulty with the burden of proof in sex and race discrimination cases. This is surprising as the Court of Appeal analysed the law in depth and gave clear and sound detailed guidance in Igen Ltd (formerly Leeds Careers Guidance) v Wong [2005] ICR 931. At the end of the judgment of the court an Annex set out guidance in 13 short and logically arranged numbered paragraphs. The judicial guidelines were framed with expert assistance from the F Commissions for Equal Opportunities, Racial Equality and Disability Rights which, with the permission of the court, intervened in Igen Ltd v Wong and made submissions through leading counsel (Mr Robin Allen QC). None of the parties in these appeals challenges the correctness of Igen Ltd v Wong.

6 Some of the difficulties with the new burden of proof are attributable to the process of adapting to change. It takes time for everyone to get used to G a new law. Over the years tribunals were guided by Neill LJ's lucid explanation of the burden of proof in discrimination cases. For over a decade the passage in his judgment in King v Great Britain-China Centre [1992] ICR 516, 528–529 became one of the most frequently cited in all discrimination law. It clarified and settled the law. It worked well in practice.

H 7 Now tribunals and courts are faced with amended statutory provisions, which changed the law but do not explain how it actually works. The difficulty is in knowing how much difference the amendments should make in practice. Although Igen Ltd v Wong is authoritative on the construction of the statutory provisions and helpful in its guidance, it seems that tribunals are now faced, as was this court on these appeals, with contradictory arguments by the parties about the effect of Igen Ltd v Wong. As Elias J (President) observed in one of the more recent cases, Laing v Manchester City Council [2006] ICR 1519, para 71: "There still seems to be much confusion created by the decision in Igen [2005] ICR 931." A 8 Some submissions in these appeals prompt me to alert practitioners to what Igen Ltd v Wong did not decide.

9 First, it did not decide that judicial guidance is a substitute for section 63A(2) (or section 57ZA(2)). On the contrary, the Court of Appeal went out of its way to say that its guidance was not a substitute for statute: para 16. Courts do not supplant statutes. Judicial guidance is only guidance. B

10 Secondly, Igen Ltd v Wong did not decide that a tribunal commits an error of law by omitting to repeat the judicial guidance in its decision or by failing to work through the guidance paragraph by paragraph. The Court of Appeal expressly warned against this possible misuse of the guidance: see para 16. Omitting to refer to guidance or to apply it may increase the risk of errors of law in a decision, but such an omission is not in itself an error of law on which to found a successful appeal. C

11 Having said what Igen Ltd v Wong did not decide, I should add that there really is no need, at this level of decision, for another judgment giving general guidance. Repetition is superfluous, qualification is unnecessary and contradiction is confusing. D

12 I do not underestimate the significance of the burden of proof in discrimination cases. There is probably no other area of the civil law in which the burden of proof plays a larger part than in discrimination cases. Arguments on the burden of proof surface in almost every case. The factual content of the cases does not simply involve testing the credibility of witnesses on contested issues of fact. Most cases turn on the accumulation of multiple findings of primary fact, from which the court or tribunal is invited to draw an inference of a discriminatory explanation of those facts. It is vital that, as far as possible, the law on the burden of proof applied by the fact-finding body is clear and certain. The guidance in Igen Ltd v Wong meets these criteria. It does not need to be amended to make it work better. E

13 The only possible value of this judgment and of the judgments in Brown and Appiah is in showing how the burden of proof should work. Problems arise when the parties are in dispute about the application of the relevant law to the facts of their particular case. F

14 Other decisions in the Court of Appeal and in the Employment Appeal Tribunal, both before and after Igen Ltd v Wong, were cited. The discussions in them clarify law and practice and assist in their development. They iron out some of the misunderstandings evident from the legal submissions to the tribunal. They illustrate the implications of the amended legislation as it is worked through in practice, case by case: see Bahl v The Law Society [2004] IRLR 799 (Court of Appeal, pre-section 63A(2) applying King v Great Britain-China Centre [1992] ICR 516, 528–529 and Glasgow City Council v Zafar [1998] ICR 120, 125–126); Brown v Croydon London Borough Council (unreported) 20 February 2006, EAT, Elias J presiding (one of the appeals heard along with this case); Network Rail Infrastructure Ltd v Griffiths-Henry [2006] IRLR 865 (EAT, Elias J presiding); National Union of Teachers v Watson (unreported) 13 June 2006 (EAT, Elias J presiding); Li v Atkins & Gregory Ltd (unreported) 5 July 2006 G H

A (EAT, Elias J presiding); Fox v Rangecroft [2006] EWCA Civ 1112; Fernandez v Parliamentary Comr for Administration and the Health Service Comrs (unreported) 28 July 2006 (EAT, Bean J presiding) and Laing v Manchester City Council [2006] ICR 1519.

The proceedings

B 15 On 14 December 2001 Ms Andrea Madarassy, the appellant, presented an originating application to the employment tribunal complaining of sex discrimination, victimisation and unfair dismissal. She subsequently served particulars specifying 33 separate allegations of sex discrimination spanning the whole of the period from 17 January 2000 to 22 November 2001 during which she was employed by the respondent, Nomura International plc ("Nomura"), a multi-service financial institution C transacting business on a global basis.

16 At a hearing lasting 21 days in November and December 2002 the tribunal heard 38 witnesses. Thirty-two of them attended for cross-examination. Ms Madarassy gave evidence for seven days. Mr Michael Boardman, who was her line manager at Nomura, was cross-examined for four days. There were 21 lever arch files of documents. Litigation on this D scale is now typical of the increasing numbers of sex and race discrimination claims by senior members of staff against financial institutions, professional firms and public authorities.

17 In extended reasons (76 pages, 437 paragraphs) sent to the parties on 18 February 2003 the employment tribunal made findings on 33 allegations of sex discrimination. It found that only one allegation was well-founded E (allegation 1.12—failure to carry out a health and safety risk assessment in connection with Ms Madarassy's pregnancy). It dismissed all the other claims, including a complaint of victimisation.

18 As for the unfair dismissal claim, the tribunal found that the reason for her dismissal was redundancy following a diminution of her work and a fair selection procedure. The tribunal rejected the claim that she was dismissed for a reason connected with her pregnancy, with childbirth or with F her taking maternity leave.

19 Following a preliminary hearing her substantive appeal in the Employment Appeal Tribunal was confined to the sex discrimination claims. After a four-day hearing in July 2004 the appeal tribunal, for reasons given in the judgment (90 pages, 237 paragraphs) prepared by Nelson J and handed down on 16 December 2004, dismissed the appeal on all save two G claims which had been dismissed by the employment tribunal (allegation 1.15—the failure to set objectives for her in the fiscal year 2001, whereas they were set for male colleagues; and allegation 1.18—the failure to supply information to her about the "broad redundancy exercise" carried out while she was on maternity leave). It remitted the two matters to the same tribunal for review in the light of its judgment. Nomura does not appeal against the order of the appeal tribunal remitting these two allegations. Ms Madarassy H objects to the form of the order in several respects.

20 The appeal tribunal allowed Nomura's cross-appeal against the decision of the employment tribunal against it on the complaint of discrimination in respect of the health and safety risk assessment (allegation 1.12).

21 The appeal tribunal order under appeal was entered on 8 April 2005 following further submissions.

22 On 16 June 2005 the Employment Appeal Tribunal, after considering written submissions from the parties, made an order for costs against Ms Madarassy under rule 34(1) of the Employment Appeal Tribunal Rules 1993 (SI 1993/2854). She was ordered to pay £2,000 towards Nomura's costs on the ground of her unreasonable conduct on the appeal (while she was acting in person) in making allegations of bias, false evidence, misrepresentation and perversity, which she later withdrew. A warning as to the costs of the appeal had been given by the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Judge Peter Clark) on 9 May 2003.

23 Permission to appeal against the substantive judgment was granted by this court, subject to limitations, at an adjourned application on 31 August 2005. There is also before this court an application by Ms Madarassy for permission to appeal against the costs order. The application was adjourned to be heard by the full court at the same time as the substantive appeal.

24 The hearing of this appeal began on 22 February 2006, but it had to be adjourned in the extraordinary circumstances described in the judgment handed down by the court on 4 April 2006: see [2006] EWCA Civ 371 and [2006] EWHC 748 (QB) (Bean J). It is unnecessary to say any more about this aspect of the appeal. Directions were given by this court for the future conduct of the appeal.

Outline facts

25 As appears from the 45 paragraphs in Ms Madarassy's "Schedule of inaccurate assertions as to the facts in the respondent's skeleton" factual disagreements between the parties abound. There are now disagreements about the proceedings themselves in addition to the disputed facts leading up to the proceedings. In an appellate judgment, which can only properly address points of law, I do not propose to examine the factual points in the schedule in any detail.

26 Ms Madarassy was born in 1964. She is a Hungarian-born British citizen. She was employed by Nomura for less than two years until her employment was terminated on 22 November 2001. In January 2000 she had been appointed at a basic salary of £70,000 pa (plus a discretionary bonus) as a "senior banker" on the basis of a six-month probationary period. She was assigned to "equity corporate finance", joining Nomura's equity capital markets ("ECM") team. She specialised in originating and executing ECM transactions in emerging markets, particularly Hungary and Turkey. Mr Michael Boardman was a senior executive in ECM and her line manager. She had limited experience in these matters.

27 In mid-June 2000 Ms Madarassy became pregnant. Nobody at Nomura was aware of this until early to mid-November 2000.

28 After the probationary period her appointment was confirmed on 4 September 2000 by Mr Boardman, who supplied her with a list of objectives. Although he had concerns about her performance, he thought that the weaknesses could be overcome with hard work.

29 On or around 7 November 2000 Ms Madarassy informed Mr Boardman that she was pregnant.

A 30 On 14 February 2001 there was a first performance appraisal meeting, followed by a second performance appraisal meeting on 26 February 2001. Mr Boardman assessed her performance as not being up to the Nomura standard.

31 On 27 February 2001 Mr Sumino, the head of ECM, conducted a performance appraisal meeting and Ms Madarassy signed the performance
B appraisal form.

32 From 3 March 2001 to 8 July 2001 Ms Madarassy was away on pregnancy and maternity leave. Her daughter was born on 18 March 2001.

33 After her return from maternity leave a meeting was held with Mr Boardman, Mr Sumino and human resources personnel on 16 August 2001 to consider potential redundancies in ECM. Nomura said that its revenues were down on the previous year and that the market was poor.
C There had been a significant number of redundancies in Nomura in June and July 2001 as a result of restructuring. This was consequent on deteriorating market conditions.

34 On 7 September 2001 Ms Madarassy was informed that she was at risk of redundancy. Redundancy consultations took place. Her consultation period for redundancy was extended on 12 October and again on
D 16 October. It expired on 22 November 2001. In the redundancy selection process Ms Madarassy scored worst, as compared with a Mr Salim Salam and a Mr Adams. No suitable alternative employment could be found for her.

35 She had indicated that she might wish to invoke the grievance procedure on 3 October 2001. She submitted a written grievance on 16 November. Nomura proceeded to terminate her employment on grounds
E of redundancy on 22 November 2001. She received pay in lieu of notice.

Grounds of appeal

36 Nine grounds of appeal were argued: (A) Burden of proof. (B) Tribunal's approach to evidence. (C) Pregnancy and hypothetical male comparator. (D) Time limits. (E) Health and safety risk assessment.
F (F) Remission to same or different tribunal. (G) Review or re-hearing. (H) Bonus issue. (I) Costs order.

(A) Burden of proof

Self-direction on law

37 This is the main ground of appeal. It was contended by Mr Allen,
G who appeared on behalf of Ms Madarassy in this court (though not in the employment tribunal or in the Employment Appeal Tribunal), that the employment tribunal misdirected itself in law on the burden of proof. In particular, there was an erroneous self-direction of law in para 175 of the decision. Mr Allen submitted that this error infected the conclusions of the tribunal on the numerous individual allegations of sex discrimination reached in other parts of the decision.
H

38 An unfortunate feature of the case is that the employment tribunal did not have the benefit of the appellate rulings on the construction of the amended legislation. They came later: first, in the Employment Appeal Tribunal in Barton v Investec Henderson Crosthwaite Securities Ltd [2003] ICR 1205 and then in the Court of Appeal in Igen Ltd v Wong [2005]

ICR 931. Without help from the judicial rulings and guidance the employment tribunal set out its own self-direction on the burden of proof in general terms:

> "175. . . . We have then considered whether Ms Madarassy was treated any less favourably than a hypothetical male comparator would have been treated in the same circumstances and, if so, whether it was on the grounds of her sex or pregnancy. If so, the tribunal has to consider whether the respondent has proved that it did not commit the act in question pursuant to section 63A(2) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975."

39 Mr Allen contended that this was a complete misdirection in law and that the tribunal repeated the error in many paragraphs of its decision. The error was in failing to place on Nomura the burden of proving that it did not commit the alleged acts of unlawful discrimination against Ms Madarassy. On the contrary (and quite wrongly) the tribunal had placed the burden on Ms Madarassy of proving all the elements of her discrimination claims. The tribunal then dismissed her complaints because she had not proved that she was treated less favourably on the ground of her sex or pregnancy.

40 Mr Allen argued that this direction on the burden of proof was completely inconsistent with the purpose of the Directive, which was intended to guarantee the effectiveness of the principle of equal treatment. It was also inconsistent with the proper construction of section 63A(2) and with the ruling and guidance in Igen Ltd v Wong. The error deprived Ms Madarassy of the benefit of the statutory reversal of the burden of proof. The tribunal had scrutinised her case and rejected it. It should have scrutinised Nomura's case and rejected the adequacy of Nomura's explanation for its discriminatory treatment of her.

41 This serious error of law was apparent, Mr Allen said, from many paragraphs of the tribunal's decision dealing with the individual allegations of sex and pregnancy discrimination. He criticised paras 203, 204, 206, 209, 216, 218, 225, 228, 267, 282, 323, 350 and 365 of the decision on this ground. I shall return to these paragraphs later and I shall examine them in the light of Mr Allen's general criticism.

42 The appeal tribunal dismissed Ms Madarassy's appeal on this point. It failed, Mr Allen said, to recognise and correct the errors of law, which undermined all the conclusions of the employment tribunal. Nothing short of a complete rehearing of the case by a different tribunal could correct the errors.

43 Mr Allen had other more detailed points on the burden of proof. I shall deal with them later in this judgment. For the moment I shall concentrate on the general point on the erroneous displacement of the burden of proof.

Discussion and conclusion on burden of proof direction

44 The relevant passages of the tribunal's decision, in particular para 175, must be set in context. Earlier paragraphs of the decision set out the text of section 63A(2) (see para 162), which had come into effect before the tribunal hearing in November and December 2001 (12 October 2001). The appellate rulings on the construction of section 63A(2) and the judicial guidance could not be cited by the tribunal in its decision, because they were

A given after this tribunal had heard the case and reached its decision. The unavailability of the rulings and guidance does not, of course, necessarily mean that the tribunal's self-direction was erroneous. The tribunal may have correctly anticipated the later appellate rulings.

45 The tribunal had also quoted in its decision, at para 161, and referred to, at para 167, section 5(3) of the 1975 Act. This is an important provision which requires that a comparison of cases of persons of different
B sex must be such that the relevant circumstances in the one case are the same, or not materially different, in the other.

46 The general point on the burden of proof and the detailed points which I shall deal with later must also be viewed from the larger perspective of the issue for the employment tribunal and the issue for this court.

47 The issue for the employment tribunal was whether Nomura had
C committed acts of discrimination against Ms Madarassy which were unlawful by virtue of Part 2 of the 1975 Act. The issue for this court is whether a question of law arises from the decision of or the proceedings in the employment tribunal. These reminders are advisable in case immersion in the detail obscures the overall object of the exercise.

D Paragraph 175

48 The tribunal, in this section of its decision, had referred to authorities which were decided before section 63A(2) was enacted. In para 175 of the decision the tribunal stated that it considered whether Ms Madarassy was treated any less favourably than a hypothetical male comparator would have been treated in the same circumstances and, if so, whether it was on the grounds of her sex or her pregnancy. If the tribunal
E considered that Ms Madarassy had been treated in that way (a second "if so"), it had to consider whether Nomura had proved that it did not commit the act of unlawful discrimination in question.

49 As I read para 175 the tribunal dealt with the burden of proof in two stages. It placed the burden of proof on Nomura at the second stage. It did not place the burden of proof on Nomura at the first stage. The Employment
F Appeal Tribunal took a similar view of para 175: see para 193 of its judgment. Mr Goulding, who appeared for Nomura, submitted that there was no misdirection of law in para 175. It correctly anticipated and accorded with the substance of the two-stage analysis in Igen Ltd v Wong [2005] ICR 931 on the construction of section 63A(2) and the annexed guidance.

50 Mr Allen disagreed. He contended that the direction in para 175
G was legally flawed. It wrongly put all the burden on Ms Madarassy to prove sex and pregnancy discrimination before Nomura was required to prove anything.

51 According to Mr Allen the correct approach was that, as Ms Madarassy had established two fundamental facts, namely, a difference in status (e g sex) and a difference in treatment, section 63A(2) required the H tribunal (as distinct from entitling it, as under the pre-amendment ruling by the Court of Appeal in King v Great Britain-China Centre [1992] ICR 516, approved by the House of Lords in Glasgow City Council v Zafar [1998] ICR 120) to draw an inference of unlawful discrimination by Nomura. The burden shifted to Nomura to prove that it had not committed an act of discrimination which was unlawful. It could discharge this burden of proof by providing to the tribunal an adequate and acceptable non-discriminatory explanation of its treatment of Ms Madarassy. If Nomura's explanation did not survive the scrutiny of the tribunal at the second stage, the tribunal must ("shall") uphold Ms Madarassy's complaints of discrimination.

52 Much of what Mr Allen said about the effect of reversing the burden of proof is correct. Mr Allen is obviously right in saying that the subsection does not require Ms Madarassy to prove a "conclusive case" of unlawful discrimination. She only has to prove facts from which the tribunal "could" conclude that there had been unlawful discrimination by Nomura, in other words she has to set up a "prima facie" case.

53 I do not, however, read para 175 (or any of the other paragraphs of the tribunal's decision) as requiring Ms Madarassy to prove a "conclusive case". If the tribunal were saying that she had to do that, the latter part of its direction in para 175 following the second "if so" would have been superfluous.

54 I am unable to agree with Mr Allen's contention that the burden of proof shifts to Nomura simply on Ms Madarassy establishing the facts of a difference in status and a difference in the treatment of her. This analysis is not supported by Igen Ltd v Wong [2005] ICR 931 nor by any of the later cases in this court and in the Employment Appeal Tribunal. It was not accepted by the appeal tribunal in the above-mentioned cases of Network Rail Infrastructure [2006] IRLR 865, para 15 and Fernandez (paras 23 and 24) and by the Court of Appeal in Fox [2006] EWCA Civ 1112, paras 9–18.

55 In my judgment, the correct legal position is made plain in paras 28 and 29 of the judgment in Igen Ltd v Wong:

> "28. . . . The language of the statutory amendments [to section 63A(2)] seems to us plain. It is for the complainant to prove the facts from which, if the amendments had not been passed, the employment tribunal could conclude, in the absence of an adequate explanation, that the respondent committed an unlawful act of discrimination. It does not say that the facts to be proved are those from which the employment tribunal could conclude that the respondent 'could have committed' such act.
> "29. The relevant act is, in a race discrimination case . . . that (a) in circumstances relevant for the purposes of any provision of the 1976 Act (for example in relation to employment in the circumstances specified in section 4 of the Act), (b) the alleged discriminator treats another person less favourably and (c) does so on racial grounds. All those facts are facts which the complainant, in our judgment, needs to prove on the balance of probabilities."

(The court then proceeded to criticise the Employment Appeal Tribunal for not adopting this construction and in regarding "a possibility" of discrimination by the complainant as sufficient to shift the burden of proof to the respondent.)

56 The court in Igen Ltd v Wong [2005] ICR 931 expressly rejected the argument that it was sufficient for the complainant simply to prove facts from which the tribunal could conclude that the respondent "could have" committed an unlawful act of discrimination. The bare facts of a difference in status and a difference in treatment only indicate a possibility of discrimination. They are not, without more, sufficient material from which

A a tribunal "could conclude" that, on the balance of probabilities, the respondent had committed an unlawful act of discrimination.

57 "Could . . . conclude" in section 63A(2) must mean that "a reasonable tribunal could properly conclude" from all the evidence before it. This would include evidence adduced by the complainant in support of the allegations of sex discrimination, such as evidence of a difference in status, a B difference in treatment and the reason for the differential treatment. It would also include evidence adduced by the respondent contesting the complaint. Subject only to the statutory "absence of an adequate explanation" at this stage (which I shall discuss later), the tribunal would need to consider all the evidence relevant to the discrimination complaint; for example, evidence as to whether the act complained of occurred at all; evidence as to the actual comparators relied on by the complainant to prove C less favourable treatment; evidence as to whether the comparisons being made by the complainant were of like with like as required by section 5(3) of the 1975 Act; and available evidence of the reasons for the differential treatment.

58 The absence of an adequate explanation for differential treatment of the complainant is not, however, relevant to whether there is a prima facie D case of discrimination by the respondent. The absence of an adequate explanation only becomes relevant if a prima facie case is proved by the complainant. The consideration of the tribunal then moves to the second stage. The burden is on the respondent to prove that he has not committed an act of unlawful discrimination. He may prove this by an adequate non-discriminatory explanation of the treatment of the complainant. If he does not, the tribunal must uphold the discrimination claim.

E 59 Mr Allen submitted that the tribunal had applied the wrong law. It had cited and applied the law as laid down in the Great Britain-China Centre case [1992] ICR 516, instead of the amended law contained in section 63A(2) as construed in Igen Ltd v Wong [2005] ICR 931. He added that, if this court rejects his criticisms of para 175, it will be holding that the burden of proof has not been reversed, that section 63A(2) does F not give effect to the Directive and that no material change in the law has been made.

60 I do not accept these submissions. The amendments changed the law. They did so by stating the circumstances in which the burden of proof moves from the complainant to the respondent. If and when this happens, the tribunal has to decide whether or not the respondent has proved that he G has not committed an unlawful act of discrimination. If the tribunal accepts the respondent's evidence of a non-discriminatory reason for his treatment of the complainant as an adequate explanation, the respondent will have discharged the burden of proof. If the respondent does not discharge the burden of proof, the complainant "shall" succeed. This was not the law as laid down in the Great Britain-China Centre case [1992] ICR 516 and the Zafar case [1998] ICR 120 and applied by the tribunals before 12 October H 2001, according to which the tribunals "may", not "must", infer unlawful discrimination from the absence of an adequate explanation for discriminatory treatment.

61 I would reject Mr Allen's contention that the tribunal erred in law in para 175.

62 I shall now deal with two related points on the burden of proof, which are relevant to the decision of the tribunal on the individual allegations.

"In the absence of an adequate explanation"

63 There was substantial argument (supplemented by written submissions after the hearing) on the construction of the expression "in the absence of an adequate explanation" in the opening part of section 63A(2) and its implications for the evidence which the tribunal could consider at the first stage.

64 Igen Ltd v Wong [2005] ICR 931, para 22, held that this expression indicates that, in considering what inferences or conclusions could be drawn from the primary facts (stage 1), the employment tribunal is required to make an assumption:

> "which may be contrary to reality, the plain purpose being to shift the burden of proof at the second stage, so that unless the respondent provides an adequate explanation, the complainant will succeed. It would be inconsistent with that assumption to take account of an adequate explanation by the respondent at the first stage."

65 There has been a debate in the cases and on this appeal as to what evidence from the respondent is relevant at the first stage. It was observed in Igen Ltd v Wong, para 24, that the language of section 63A(2) points to the complainant having to prove facts, but there is no mention of evidence from the respondent. The court added that it would be unreal if the employment tribunal could not take account of evidence from the respondent, if such evidence assisted the employment tribunal to conclude that, in the absence of an adequate explanation, unlawful discrimination by the respondent on a proscribed ground would have been established. The court referred to the examples given in Barton [2003] ICR 1205 of unsatisfactory conduct of the respondent being relevant to the drawing of inferences at the first stage: for example an unsatisfactory response to the statutory questionnaire or a breach of the code of practice by the respondent.

66 We should take this opportunity to consider the relevance of the respondent's evidence at the first stage. This point has been contentious in the appeal and is of practical importance.

67 As Elias J pointed out in Laing v Manchester City Council [2006] ICR 1519, the evidence from the respondent at the first stage goes wider than the particular examples given in Igen Ltd v Wong, para 24. It was argued in Laing v Manchester City Council, para 56, that the only material that the tribunal can consider at the first stage is the evidence adduced by the complainant together with any evidence adduced by the respondent which assists the tribunal in reaching the conclusion that a prima facie case has been made out. It was argued that the tribunal must not consider, however, any other evidence, such as evidence from the respondent pointing the other way and tending to undermine the complainant's case.

68 In Laing, for example, the key factor which caused the complainant to fail at the first stage was the respondent's evidence that the complainant was indiscriminately treated by the alleged discriminator in the same way as all subordinate employees. (This point was also made by Nomura in its evidence to the tribunal in response to many of Ms Madarassy's individual

A allegations of discrimination.) In Laing the complainant objected that this was part of the respondent's "explanation" which, in accordance with section 63A(2), had to be ignored at the first stage.

69 The Employment Appeal Tribunal (Elias J (President) presiding) in Laing rightly rejected the complainant's submission. It accepted the respondent's submission that, at the first stage, the tribunal should have regard to all the evidence, whether it was given on behalf of the complainant B or on behalf of the respondent, in order to see what inferences "could" properly be drawn from the evidence. The treatment (or mistreatment) of others by the alleged discriminator was plainly a highly material fact. All the evidence has to be considered in deciding whether "a prima facie case exists sufficient to require an explanation": para 59. The only factor which section 63A(2) stipulates shall not form part of the material from which C inferences may be drawn at the first stage is "the absence of an adequate explanation" from the respondent.

70 Although no doubt logical, there is an air of unreality about all of this. From a practical point of view it should be noted that, although section 63A(2) involves a two-stage analysis of the evidence, the tribunal does not in practice hear the evidence and the argument in two stages. The D employment tribunal will have heard all the evidence in the case before it embarks on the two-stage analysis in order to decide, first, whether the burden of proof has moved to the respondent and, if so, secondly, whether the respondent has discharged the burden of proof.

71 Section 63A(2) does not expressly or impliedly prevent the tribunal at the first stage from hearing, accepting or drawing inferences from evidence adduced by the respondent disputing and rebutting the E complainant's evidence of discrimination. The respondent may adduce evidence at the first stage to show that the acts which are alleged to be discriminatory never happened; or that, if they did, they were not less favourable treatment of the complainant; or that the comparators chosen by the complainant or the situations with which comparisons are made are not truly like the complainant or the situation of the complainant; or that, even if there has been less favourable treatment of the complainant, it was not on F the ground of her sex or pregnancy.

72 Such evidence from the respondent could, if accepted by the tribunal, be relevant as showing that, contrary to the complainant's allegations of discrimination, there is nothing in the evidence from which the tribunal could properly infer a prima facie case of discrimination on the proscribed ground. As Elias J observed in Laing v Manchester City Council G [2006] ICR 1519, para 64, it would be absurd if the burden of proof moved to the respondent to provide an adequate explanation for treatment which, on the tribunal's assessment of the evidence, had not taken place at all.

73 Mr Allen disputed the correctness of the judgment of the Employment Appeal Tribunal in Laing on this point. Mr Allen took up rather an extreme position on the construction of "in the absence of an adequate explanation". H

74 Mr Goulding's position was that the effect of the expression was that at the first stage the tribunal must disregard altogether (or "put on one side") any possible explanation by the respondent.

75 Mr Allen's position, on the other hand, was that under section 63A(2) it must be presumed at the first stage that the respondent had no adequate explanation. This presumption then assisted the complainant in securing the reversal of the burden of proof. He relied on Igen Ltd v Wong [2005] ICR 931, paras 21 and 22, to support this submission.

76 In my view, Mr Allen's submission goes further than Igen Ltd v Wong warrants. He argued for a presumed lack of an adequate explanation providing "a material premise" for the reversal of the burden of proof. The "absence of an adequate explanation" may, he said, be the only basis on which the tribunal could infer that a significant ground for the treatment of the complainant was a proscribed one.

77 In my judgment, it is unhelpful to introduce words like "presume" into the first stage of establishing a prima facie case. Section 63A(2) makes no mention of any presumption. In the relevant passage in Igen Ltd v Wong, which is probably more favourable to Mr Allen than to Mr Goulding, the court explained why the court does not, at the first stage, consider the absence of an adequate explanation. The tribunal is told by the section to assume the absence of an adequate explanation. The absence of an adequate explanation only becomes relevant to the burden of proof at the second stage when the respondent has to prove that he did not commit an unlawful act of discrimination. In Igen Ltd v Wong the court did not go so far as to say that there was a "statutory presumption that there was no adequate explanation" for the respondent's treatment of the complainant and that there was therefore discrimination on a proscribed ground and that this presumption alone caused the burden of proof to move to the respondent.

78 I would add that I do not think that there is much to be gained in this context by invoking or analysing possible distinctions between "explanations", "reasons" and "facts" that were debated in argument and have featured in some of the recent authorities.

79 I do not accept Mr Allen's submission on the construction of the expression "in the absence of an adequate explanation" or his criticisms of Elias J in Laing [2006] ICR 1519. It seems to me that the approach of Elias J is sound in principle and workable in practice. This court should approve it. No alteration to the guidelines in Igen Ltd v Wong is necessary.

Hypothetical comparators and the two stages

80 Mr Allen made an alternative submission that this case was distinguishable from Barton [2003] ICR 1205 and Igen Ltd v Wong [2005] ICR 931 as there is no actual comparator. If the comparator is hypothetical, he argued, it is unnecessary for the complainant to prove more than a difference in status and a difference in treatment in order to shift the burden of proof to the respondent. Those facts are sufficient to establish less favourable treatment for the purpose of stage 1, so that there is something to be explained by the respondent as to the reason for the treatment. The employment tribunal erred in law in not proceeding directly to the second stage and placing the burden of proof on Nomura to provide an explanation for its treatment of Ms Madarassy without requiring Ms Madarassy to prove less favourable treatment. He cited Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in Shamoon v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary [2003] ICR 337, paras 10–12, for the proposition that, in the case of less favourable treatment than a hypothetical comparator, tribunals could concentrate primarily on the reason why the complainant was treated as she was: was it

A on the proscribed ground which is the foundation of the application, or was it for some other reason?

81 Elias J clarified this point in Laing v Manchester City Council [2006] ICR 1519, para 74, in his valuable discussion of cases in which "it might be sensible for a tribunal to go straight to the second stage". He gave as an example the case where the complainant is seeking to compare his treatment with that of a hypothetical comparator. He said that, as Lord Nicholls B pointed out in Shamoon, the question whether there is a hypothetical comparator is often inextricably linked to the issue of the explanation for the treatment. He added that "it must surely not be inappropriate for a tribunal in such cases to go straight to the second stage". While it would often be desirable for a tribunal to go through the two stages suggested in Igen Ltd v Wong [2005] ICR 931, it would not necessarily be an error of law to fail to C do so acting on the assumption that the burden may have shifted to the respondent and then considering the explanation put forward by the respondent.

82 This particular aspect of the hypothetical comparator point arose in and is dealt with in our judgments on the Brown appeal [2007] ICR 909. In such a case the complainant cannot usually complain of any error of law, as he would not be prejudiced by the tribunal's decision to move straight to D the second stage and the placing of the burden of proof on the respondent. The possible prejudice in passing over the first stage is to the respondent, if the burden of proof ought not to have moved to him in the first place.

83 Mr Allen sought to develop this aspect of the case of the hypothetical comparator by constructing a different proposition, namely that there is an error of law in a tribunal in such a case, if it does not move straight to the E second stage. Such a proposition cannot, in my view, be derived from section 63A(2) itself or from Shamoon [2003] ICR 337 or Igen Ltd v Wong. In Shamoon, para 12, Lord Nicholls made it clear that:

> "The most convenient and appropriate way to tackle the issues arising on any discrimination application must always depend upon the nature of the issues and all the circumstances of the case."

F 84 In my judgment, there was no error of law by the employment tribunal dealing with Ms Madarassy's allegations by following the conventional two-stage approach of first requiring facts to be established from which the tribunal could infer sex discrimination before placing the burden on Nomura to provide an explanation for its treatment of Ms Madarassy. As we shall see, the tribunal in fact dealt, when appropriate, G with the adequacy of the explanation provided by Nomura for its alleged less favourable treatment of Ms Madarassy.

Application of burden of proof to particular allegations of discrimination

85 I will now consider Mr Allen's criticisms of the tribunal's treatment of the individual allegations of sex discrimination in particular paragraphs in the decision.

H 86 Having set out in para 175 its general direction on section 63A(2), the tribunal applied the burden of proof to the numerous individual allegations of sex discrimination. At the first stage the tribunal considered the evidence relevant to whether Ms Madarassy, as she claimed, had been treated less favourably on the grounds of her sex or pregnancy. It should be noted that no mention was made in para 175 of Ms Madarassy having to prove that Nomura had committed an unlawful act of sex discrimination. All that this employment tribunal did at the first stage was to consider whether Ms Madarassy was treated any less favourably than a hypothetical male comparator in the same circumstances and whether it was on the grounds of her sex or pregnancy.

87 Although the tribunal did not in every case spell out the process of making inferences, it was well aware of the familiar process of drawing appropriate inferences from primary facts: see paras 163, 164, 167 and 169(4) of its decision. The tribunal's approach was that, if it considered that there were no relevant facts from which inferences could be drawn supporting her allegations of sex discrimination, then it was entitled to dismiss her claim without shifting the burden of proof to Nomura and requiring it to provide a non-discriminatory explanation proving that it had not committed an unlawful act of discrimination.

88 The majority of Ms Madarassy's allegations of sex and pregnancy discrimination failed at the first stage. It is clear, however, that in some instances the tribunal also considered the second stage, at which it accepted as adequate Nomura's explanation for its treatment of Ms Madarassy. The reasons given for the rejection of the particularised individual allegations of discrimination show that the tribunal applied the correct construction of section 63A(2).

89 For example, she alleged sex discrimination in the criticisms of work undertaken by her on behalf of Nomura on the Videoton deal in summer and autumn 2000. (Videoton is an electronics manufacturing company.) Although the tribunal ruled that the complaints were out of time and that it was not just and equitable to extend the time, it nevertheless considered the complaints and it rejected them in paras 203, 204, 206 and 209 of the decision.

90 The language differs slightly from paragraph to paragraph. The essence of each of them was that the sex discrimination complaint failed because Ms Madarassy "failed to show" (paras 203 and 209), or "has not satisfied us" (para 204), or "has not established" (para 206) that a hypothetical male in the same situation would have been treated differently. The first stage of section 63A(2) was not passed by Ms Madarassy, as the tribunal could not conclude that she had suffered less favourable treatment on the ground of sex. There was nothing for Nomura to disprove by way of an adequate non-discriminatory explanation.

91 Paragraphs 216 and 218 dealt with allegations of sex discrimination in connection with delays in the confirmation of her employment from July 2000 and in the provision of written objectives and of critical comments about her. The tribunal held that these complaints were in time. It then considered whether "a hypothetical male comparator in the same situation would have been treated differently": para 215. The tribunal concluded that "there is no evidence that had she been a male she would have been treated any differently in relation to this": para 216, and that "she has failed to satisfy the tribunal that she was less favourably treated than a hypothetical male employee in the same situation in respect of whom the respondent had concerns over his communication skills, written work and other matters that were concerns in relation to Ms Madarassy": para 218. The complaints therefore failed at the first stage, because there was no evidence of less favourable treatment from which the tribunal could conclude that Nomura had committed an act of sex discrimination. There is no error of law in this approach.

92 Paragraph 225 dealt with Ms Madarassy's absence from work on 6 September 2000 to attend a scan at her doctors. At this time Mr Boardman did not know that she was pregnant. Although the tribunal held that this was a complaint about an isolated act which was out of time, it considered the allegation of sex discrimination and held that it failed as there was no evidence to show that a hypothetical male comparator in the same situation as she had been—absent for several hours without explanation—would have been treated any differently from Ms Madarassy. There is no error of law in rejecting a claim for sex discrimination if the complainant has no evidence of less favourable treatment than a comparator of a different sex.

93 Paragraph 228 dealt with complaints that Mr Boardman conducted a discriminatory campaign against her from September 2000, regularly shouting at her, abusing, intimidating and threatening her. The tribunal held that it was satisfied on the evidence that Mr Boardman shouted at members of staff whether they were male or female: "There was equality of shouting regardless of gender or level within ECM." This was the culture of this workplace. It might be horrible, but it was not sexist. The complaint of discrimination failed at the first stage, as there was no comparative less favourable treatment of Ms Madarassy. Again there is no error of law. It is also clear that the tribunal referred to and accepted the evidence of Nomura on Mr Boardman's indiscriminate treatment of all employees under him by shouting at them.

94 Paragraph 267 dealt with Ms Madarassy's complaint, which it held was out of time, that in December 2000 Mr Boardman refused to speak to her in private when he went outside to have a cigarette with Mr Salam. The tribunal said that there was evidence that Mr Boardman indicated to Ms Madarassy, who was a non-smoker, that she could accompany him, but she said she would await his return. It concluded that, even if this amounted to less favourable treatment, there was no evidence to suggest that a hypothetical male non-smoker would be treated any differently. The claim failed as Ms Madarassy was not treated less favourably on the ground of sex and section 63A(2) was not satisfied. The tribunal accepted the evidence of Mr Boardman on the facts of this incident.

95 The complaint considered in para 282 related to the performance review in February 2001, which the tribunal held was an isolated act, which was out of time and it was not just and equitable to extend time to found jurisdiction. The tribunal went on, however, to consider the allegation of sex discrimination based on the claim that the review was incorrect, incomplete and false, and rejected it on the ground that she was not treated unfairly and that a hypothetical male comparator in the same situation would not have been treated any differently.

96 The complaint dealt with in para 323 was that, after her return from maternity leave, she was not allowed to concentrate on the financial sector. Whilst her male colleagues were allowed to concentrate on their sectors of specialisation, she said that she was given impossible tasks. The tribunal accepted the evidence of Mr Boardman that he did involve her in financial institutions work and held that she "failed to show that she has sustained any less favourable treatment in relation to this allegation". In holding that her complaint failed the tribunal had concluded that there was in fact no unfavourable treatment which could found a claim for sex discrimination. A

97 The complaint dealt with in para 350 was that Ms Madarassy was not properly considered for the risk management roles vacant within Nomura in October 2001. The tribunal rejected her claim because "she has not shown that she suffered less favourable treatment". The tribunal accepted Nomura's evidence that she had insufficient relevant experience to fulfil this role. There was no error of law in holding that in these circumstances the claim failed. B

98 The complaint dealt with in para 365 was that her dismissal was discriminatory. This was rejected, as the tribunal found that, as explained in the part of the decision on unfair dismissal, she was redundant. It was also satisfied that "a hypothetical male employee in the same situation as Ms Madarassy would have suffered the same fate". She had scored lower than male colleagues in the redundancy matrix. The fact that she was dismissed, that she was a woman and suffered detriment, whereas male colleagues were not dismissed, was insufficient to move the burden of proof to Nomura. It was necessary to consider the treatment of Ms Madarassy as compared with a male comparator in the same or not materially different circumstances. This approach does not involve any error of law. C D

99 In my judgment, none of these paragraphs rejecting claims of sex discrimination involves any misunderstanding or misapplication of the burden of proof applying to sex discrimination claims.

(B) The tribunal's approach to evidence

100 According to this ground of appeal the employment tribunal erred in its approach to the evidence and its findings of fact by seeking corroboration of facts where none was required and by concluding that there was no evidence, when in fact there was evidence from Ms Madarassy. The tribunal therefore failed to direct itself properly in relation to what was evidence for the purposes of making findings of fact and the impact of section 63A(2). E F

101 Mr Allen sought to make good this ground of appeal by referring to a number of paragraphs in the decision of the employment tribunal.

102 Paragraph 182 dealt with alleged discrimination in relation to Ms Madarassy's title and its use on business cards. She was called "associate director". She said she should be called "senior banker", which was in fact printed on her business cards. She alleged that there was a conversation or discussion in which she was told by Mr Hoshino that she should be described as associate director on the business cards. The tribunal said in para 182 that there was "no corroborative evidence that this discussion took place and the tribunal was unable to make any finding on it". G

103 This is one of the allegations (paragraph 1.1 of the particulars) which in granting permission to appeal this court ruled could not be pursued. Mr Allen nevertheless used it as an instance of the tribunal's wrong approach to the evidence in the case. H

104 Mr Goulding pointed out that the evidence on this point was unsatisfactory. The alleged discussion about business cards had not in fact been mentioned in the particulars. According to Ms Madarassy she was told that she should be described as associate director on her business cards.

According to Mr Boardman she had business cards on which she was described as senior banker. In the closing written submissions on behalf of Ms Madarassy the significance of this evidence was not mentioned. The business cards were not put in evidence. In these circumstances it is not surprising that the tribunal said that it was unable to make any finding on the alleged discussion.

105 Paragraph 236 dealt with allegations about Mr Boardman's behaviour (allegation 1.8). The tribunal stated: "There is no evidence before us from which we can find that Ms Madarassy's working conditions became unpleasant or the attitudes of her colleagues changed." Mr Allen criticised this paragraph, pointing out that there was evidence, as Ms Madarassy herself gave evidence on the issue.

106 The tribunal had not overlooked the fact that she had given evidence on this point in support of her case. This is apparent from para 226 onwards, in which the tribunal summarised and considered her allegations about Mr Boardman's conduct. It is also apparent from the written submissions from each side on the evidence given by Ms Madarassy and by Mr Boardman. I am satisfied that, read in context, the meaning of para 236 is that the evidence before the tribunal was insufficient to satisfy it of the facts alleged by Ms Madarassy.

107 Paragraph 246 dealt with allegation 1.11 that in about December 2000 Mr Boardman began to interrupt and intentionally cut short her discussion with colleagues. The tribunal said that "Ms Madarassy has put forward no evidence in relation to this matter" and held that the complaint failed. Although Mr Allen criticised the tribunal, it appears that the tribunal was correct on this. No evidence was given by Ms Madarassy to support the allegation. No such evidence was mentioned in Ms Madarassy's closing submissions. The tribunal accepted Nomura's submission that the allegation was unsupported by the evidence.

108 Paragraph 328 dealt with allegation 1.22 that in July 2001 Mr Boardman started giving Ms Madarassy secretarial/assistant tasks, such as addressing envelopes for him by hand, saying "women tend to have nicer handwriting". The tribunal said: "there is no evidence before the tribunal of Mr Boardman asking Ms Madarassy to address envelopes for him by hand, or saying that women tend to have nicer handwriting. The allegation is not proved."

109 Although Mr Allen criticised the tribunal on this point, it appears that Ms Madarassy in fact gave no evidence in support of this allegation. There was no error by the tribunal in finding that the allegation was not proved.

110 There is no substance in this ground of appeal. It is reasonably clear that the tribunal sometimes used the expression "no evidence" to cover both the situation where Ms Madarassy produced no evidence on the point either from herself or from any one else and the situation in which she gave evidence on the point, which the tribunal did not accept as establishing the allegation.

111 It would have been better if the tribunal had not used the expression "no evidence" when it meant "no credible evidence" but the substance of its approach to the relevant evidence and its treatment of it is reasonably clear. It discloses some rather loose use of language, but that does not amount to an error of law in the decision of an employment tribunal if the factual conclusions and reasoning of the tribunal are sufficient to explain the decision reached on the point. These allegations failed for lack of evidence acceptable to the tribunal.

(C) Pregnancy and a male comparator

112 The tribunal dismissed the allegation that Ms Madarassy's treatment was affected by her pregnancy and maternity. The ground of appeal is that, in relation to complaints of pregnancy and maternity-related discrimination, there is no requirement for either a real or a hypothetical male comparator. The tribunal had not drawn the distinction between sex discrimination and pregnancy discrimination. In the latter case the sole question is whether she was treated less favourably.

113 Mr Allen submitted that the tribunal erred in law in referring to a hypothetical male comparator. The following paragraphs were singled out for criticism by Mr Allen for wrongly including references to a hypothetical male comparator: 175, 215 and 218, 267, 282, 333, 346, 352, 354 and 365.

114 Mr Allen cited Webb v Emo Air Cargo (UK) Ltd (No 2) [1995] ICR 1021 for the proposition that, in a pregnancy case, there is no need for a comparator for the purpose of establishing unlawful discrimination. The tribunal wrongly thought that such a comparator was necessary. It had failed properly to distinguish between sex discrimination and pregnancy discrimination.

115 Mr Goulding submitted that this ground of appeal should be rejected for three reasons: first, the point was not taken before the appeal tribunal and two of the paragraphs of the employment tribunal now criticised (paras 215 and 218 relating to treatment in relation to her maternity leave) have in any case been remitted by the appeal tribunal to the employment tribunal: secondly, the point taken rests on a misconception of the law that a hypothetical male comparator is irrelevant to every allegation of pregnancy discrimination; and, thirdly, on the facts the tribunal dismissed the allegation that her treatment was affected by her pregnancy.

116 In my judgment, Nomura has a good answer to this ground of appeal quite apart from the dispute about whether this point had been taken before the appeal tribunal. Mr Goulding submitted that the point was not taken, but Mr Allen pointed to paragraph 21(c) of the grounds of appeal.

117 No question of pregnancy discrimination could have arisen before November 2000, as her pregnancy was not known to Nomura before then. In respect of particular allegations of treatment thereafter, such as those considered in paras 267, 282, 333, 346, 352, 354 and 365, the finding of the tribunal was that the treatment complained of was not affected or influenced by Ms Madarassy's pregnancy because a hypothetical male comparator would have been treated in the same way in the situation in question. They were findings of fact by the tribunal, not errors of law by it.

118 The submission that a hypothetical male comparator is always irrelevant in cases of alleged pregnancy discrimination is incorrect. The mere fact that a tribunal compared Ms Madarassy's treatment with that of a hypothetical male comparator does not disclose an error of law in this case. It is necessary to take account of the factual nature of the particular allegation. As is clear, for example, from the Webb v Emo Air Cargo case [1995] ICR 1021 there is no place for a hypothetical male comparator in

A the case of dismissal of a female employee for becoming or being pregnant.

119 It does not follow, however, that it is wrong for an employment tribunal to make a comparison with a hypothetical male comparator for the purpose of determining whether pregnancy or some other reason was the ground for the particular treatment of a pregnant female employee. As explained earlier, two routes are open to the tribunal and both of them are B legitimate. The first route is to identify the attributes of a hypothetical comparator. The second is to go straight to the question why the complainant was treated as she was. There was no error of law on taking the first route of the hypothetical comparator.

(D) Time limits

C 120 A significant number of the 33 individual complaints were based on facts occurring outside the strict three-month time limit set for complaints in section 76(1) of the 1975 Act.

121 The tribunal found that certain acts were out of time, as they did not extend over a period within the meaning of section 76(6)(b). It also refused to extend time on the just and equitable ground under section 76(5). D As the appeal is academic in all those instances where the appeal has failed on the burden of proof ground and where the allegations have been remitted for review by the employment tribunal (allegation 1.18), I shall only deal briefly with the submissions on the time limit ground.

122 The employment tribunal's approach to limitation was criticised by Mr Allen (a) for determining issues on "continuing act" and "just and equitable" before reaching conclusions on the disputed facts and the E complaints; and (b) for considering the issue of "continuing act" without considering the similarity of the acts complained of in similar allegations and having regard to the totality of the evidence as laid down by this court in Comr of Police of the Metropolis v Hendricks [2003] ICR 530.

123 The following paragraphs in particular were criticised for dealing with the continuing act point in a compartmentalised fashion and for failing F to consider the connection between the alleged acts in order to ascertain whether there was a discriminatory course of conduct by Nomura. The tribunal held in paras 211 (the content of a conversation on 3 September 2000), 223 (an alleged shouting incident on 6 September 2000) and 326 (Mr Boardman's request to Ms Madarassy to address envelopes) that the acts in question were one-off acts which did not extend over a period or form part of a course of conduct or of a discriminatory state of affairs. They were G therefore out of time.

124 I am unable to find any error of law in the decision on the continuing act point. The rulings of the tribunal were made after the tribunal had heard all the evidence in the case. It is distinguishable from a case like Hendricks in which an attempt was made to have the continuing act point decided before hearing all the evidence relating to an alleged course of conduct extending over many years.

H 125 In my judgment, there was no error of law in the decision of the tribunal on the refusal of the tribunal to exercise its discretion to extend time on the just and equitable ground. The grounds of appeal made no direct challenge to the substantive decision refusing to extend time and so no permission was granted to appeal on this ground. Although there are submissions on this point in the skeleton argument, they do not identify any error of principle or demonstrate that the refusal was plainly wrong.

126 I would reject these grounds of appeal.

(E) Health and safety risk assessment complaint

127 This ground was raised by Nomura in its cross-appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal against the finding of the employment tribunal in favour of Ms Madarassy of unlawful discrimination by reason that a health and safety risk assessment was not undertaken in relation to Ms Madarassy's pregnancy (allegation 1.12).

128 Nomura's cross-appeal was allowed, the order of the employment tribunal was set aside and the matter was remitted to the same tribunal. Nomura does not challenge the remission, the appeal tribunal having accepted its contention that the employment tribunal erred in law in upholding Ms Madarassy's complaint that it was in breach of the relevant provisions of the health and safety regulations protecting new or expectant mothers and that this constituted sex discrimination. Ms Madarassy now seeks to have the decision of the employment tribunal restored.

129 This point involves consideration of the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999. They were made under section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972 and implement Council Directive 89/391/EEC (OJ 1989 No L183, p 1) (a Directive to encourage improvements in the safety and health of workers at work) and Council Directive 92/85/EEC (OJ 1992 No L348, p 1) (the Pregnant Workers Directive), which make provision for the conducting of risk assessments in the case of pregnant women and women who have recently given birth or who are breastfeeding.

130 Regulation 3(1) requires employers to make an assessment of the risks to the health and safety of employees to which they are exposed whilst they are at work.

131 Regulation 16 concerns risk assessment in respect of new or expectant mothers. It provides:

> "(1) Where—(a) the persons working in an undertaking include women of child-bearing age; and (b) the work is of a kind which could involve risk, by reason of her condition, to the health and safety of a new or expectant mother, or to that of her baby, from any processes or working conditions, or physical, biological or chemical agents, including those specified in Annexes I and II of the Council Directive 92/85/EEC . . . on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health at work of pregnant workers and workers who have recently given birth or are breastfeeding, the assessment required by regulation 3(1) shall also include an assessment of such risk.
> "(2) Where, in the case of an individual employee, the taking of any other action the employer is required to take under the relevant statutory provisions would not avoid the risk referred to in paragraph (1) the employer shall, if it is reasonable to do, and would avoid such risks, alter her working conditions or hours of work."

132 Regulation 18 provides that regulation 16(2) and (3) does not impose any obligation on an employer in relation to an employee until she has notified him in writing that she is pregnant, has given birth within the previous six months, or is breastfeeding. Ms Madarassy gave notification of her pregnancy in early November 2000. Nomura did not carry out any risk assessment pursuant to regulation 16(1), which does not depend on such notification.

133 Ms Madarassy's case was that proof of some risk was not required before the 1999 Regulations imposed an obligation on Nomura to undertake a risk assessment. The purpose of the assessment was to determine whether such a risk exists in relation to the vulnerable category of workers. It was not for the pregnant worker to identify a risk. It was the function of the risk assessment to do that. Failure to carry out the protective step of an assessment required by regulation 16 was sex or pregnancy discrimination and was a "detriment" within section 6(2)(b) of the 1975 Act. The decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal in Hardman v Mallon (trading as Orchard Lodge Nursing Home) [2002] IRLR 516, paras 14–15 was cited on the disparate impact on pregnant workers of a failure to carry out a risk assessment under the 1999 Regulations and the automatic unlawful discrimination which occurs in such a case. In that case there was direct medical evidence that the employee's work, as a care assistant in a nursing home for the elderly, could involve heavy lifting, which posed a risk to her or her baby's health and safety.

134 If, contrary to her submission that it was not necessary to identify a potential risk, it was necessary to do so, it was submitted that there was such evidence of risk in the form of Ms Madarassy's unchallenged evidence as to radiation exposure and the findings of the employment tribunal (paras 260–261).

135 Nomura contended that its obligation as employer did not arise unless three conditions are satisfied by the evidential material before the employment tribunal. The work must be of a kind (a) which could involve risk, (b) by reason of her condition, (c) to the health and safety of a new or expectant mother, or to that of her baby.

136 As to the employment tribunal's conclusion, in para 261, that Nomura's obligation arose in relation to the comfort of Ms Madarassy sitting before a computer and to radiation from a computer, Nomura submitted that there was no evidence, expert or otherwise, apart from some general statements made by Ms Madarassy herself about pain and discomfort, as to her working conditions or as to discomfort and radiation in particular. The tribunal had reached a conclusion without evidence to support it. It had confused discomfort with risk to health and safety. In particular, it had not found that radiation from the computer could involve risk to health or safety nor was there any evidence of detriment to Ms Madarassy on which a complaint of discrimination could be founded.

137 Mr Allen responded that it was sufficient to establish a possible risk and that Ms Madarassy suffered detriment in not getting the benefit of a risk assessment.

138 On this point I agree with the appeal tribunal (paras 216–221) that the employment tribunal erred in law. It did not make an express finding of a risk to health and safety arising from exposure to radiation emitted from the computer; nor was there evidence before it on which it could make such a finding. A finding that the work involved potential risk to health and safety was necessary before there was an obligation on Nomura under regulation 16 to carry out a risk assessment.

139 I would therefore dismiss Ms Madarassy's appeal on this ground, leaving in place the order remitting the matter of the health and safety risk assessment to the same employment tribunal.

(F) Remission to same or different tribunal

140 This ground of appeal is that the appeal tribunal erred in remitting the two allegations 1.15 and 1.18, on which it found that the employment tribunal had erred in law, to the same employment tribunal which would also review its decision on the alleged failure (allegation 1.12) of Nomura to carry out a health and safety risk assessment.

141 Sinclair Roche & Temperley v Heard [2004] IRLR 763, para 46, was cited for the guidance given by the Employment Appeal Tribunal on this point. Factors relevant to whether the remission should be to the same tribunal or to a different tribunal include the length of time which has passed since the tribunal's decision; the risk of loss of recollection and the ability of the original tribunal to refresh the memories of the members from notes of evidence and submissions; the length and complexity of the case; the extent to which the decision under appeal was flawed or mishandled; the risk that the tribunal has already made up its mind to reach a certain result in the case and its ability to reconsider the matter fully and reach a different decision on the evidence and arguments; and the ability of the tribunal to exercise its usual professional approach and skills on the remission.

142 Mr Allen contended that the allegations in question should have been remitted for rehearing by a different tribunal. A considerable time had passed since the original hearing. The tribunal had produced a totally flawed decision, misdirecting itself on the fundamental point of the burden of proof and on its approach to the evidence in the case.

143 Mr Allen also referred to Ms Madarassy's original grounds of appeal, which were later withdrawn (see the section below on the costs order), and to the tone of the members' comments when responding to her allegations against the tribunal ("insulting", "preposterous"). From the standpoint of the objective observer this gave rise to a real possibility of a risk of bias on the part of the tribunal at a remitted hearing.

144 Further, the numerous factual findings against Ms Madarassy in the original decision gave the impression that the tribunal had so committed itself to the decision in favour of Nomura that an objective re-think by it was impracticable.

145 I am satisfied that the appeal tribunal did not err in law in exercising its discretion to remit the three allegations to the same tribunal. It directed itself in accordance with the principles stated in the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal in the Sinclair Roche case. For the reasons given earlier the decision of the tribunal was not flawed by misdirection on the burden of proof or on its approach to the evidence. The decision to remit a small number of the numerous allegations to the same tribunal, which knows the detailed factual background to the case, having heard all the evidence in the course of a long hearing, is proportionate and appropriate in terms of cost, time and efficiency without any real possibility of a risk of apparent bias on the part of a fair-minded and informed observer or other obstacle to the attainment of justice: see Amec Capital Projects Ltd v

Whitefriars City Estates Ltd [2005] 1 All ER 723. Despite the passage of time the tribunal will be able to refresh its memory from the notes of evidence and the other papers and can be safely trusted to deal with the remitted matters in an impartial and professional manner.

146 I would not interfere with the discretion of the appeal tribunal on this point.

(G) Review or rehearing

147 The ground of appeal is that the appeal tribunal erred in remitting the three allegations on which it found errors of law by the employment tribunal for a review rather than for a rehearing. Reference was made to the limited circumstances in which an employment tribunal has power to review its decisions on the application of a party or of its own motion: rule 13(1) of the Employment Tribunals Rules of Procedure in Schedule 1 to the Employment Tribunals (Constitution and Rules of Procedure) Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/1171). It was contended that the passage of time since the decision of the employment tribunal made it inappropriate to direct the tribunal to review its decision on the three allegations rather than rehear the remitted matters from scratch.

148 This point has no substance, amounting to little more than a verbal quibble. The appeal tribunal had power to make this form of order in the exercise of its discretion to remit under section 35(1)(a) and (b) of the Employment Tribunals Act 1996. The appeal tribunal made it clear that, in carrying out its review in accordance with the judgment of the appeal tribunal, the employment tribunal had power to hear further evidence on the application of the parties or of its own motion.

149 I am unable to find any respect in which the appeal tribunal erred in directing the review of the decisions on the particular allegations. It had power to make the order in its discretion. In exercising the discretion it neither erred in principle nor took a course that was plainly wrong.

(H) Bonus claim

150 There is an issue between the parties as to whether the issue about a bonus claim is before this court.

151 Ms Madarassy made an allegation of sex discrimination in relation to the provision and amount of a bonus in April 2001 (allegation 1.16). She alleged that she received a smaller bonus than her male colleagues. She later named seven male comparators, including Mr Boardman and Mr Salam. The chairman of the tribunal refused an application by her for disclosure of the bonuses of the individuals, holding that none of them appeared to be true comparators.

152 At the substantive hearing the tribunal directed that the issue of disclosure on comparators be deferred to the end of the hearing when the parties could make submissions on it in the closing submissions. In the closing submissions Ms Madarassy's then counsel submitted that it was appropriate to disclose the figures and that the matter could be dealt with at any remedies hearing.

153 The tribunal found that only Mr Salam was an appropriate comparator, that it did not have the evidence to enable it to resolve the allegation of less favourable treatment and that in any case it was a one-off issue which was out of time.

154 It is said that the point was before the appeal tribunal because every refusal of the employment tribunal to find for Ms Madarassy on a specified act of discrimination was raised on the appeal, unless it had been expressly excluded at the preliminary hearing. The point was, however, a complaint about the failure to make the order for disclosure about Mr Salam's April 2001 bonus.

155 At a preliminary hearing on 3 February 2004 Burton J rejected the ground of appeal against the failure of the employment tribunal to order Nomura to disclose the remuneration levels of the named male comparators for the purposes of the bonus claim. The disclosure issue was excluded on the ground that it had no prospect of success. It did not proceed to a full hearing. The decision to exclude this ground was not appealed.

156 Before this court Ms Madarassy appealed against every rejection of her sex discrimination claims, unless the court had excluded an allegation on the grant of permission to appeal. This issue was not expressly excluded.

157 Mr Goulding did not accept that this issue is properly before the Court of Appeal. He said that Nomura had proceeded on the basis that the bonus issue did not feature in the appeal to this court. He pointed out that it was not before the Employment Appeal Tribunal at the full hearing. The skeleton argument for Ms Madarassy made no criticism of the tribunal's approach to the bonus claim allegation 1.16, not even in relation to the burden of proof ground as particularised by reference to particular paragraphs. The allegation was not referred to in the oral argument.

158 The skeleton argument for Ms Madarassy in this court referred to many paragraphs of the tribunal on the burden of proof ground, but made no mention of the tribunal's approach to the bonus issue. It also referred to paragraphs on the issue of time limits, but not to the paragraph in which the bonus issue was held to be out of time. As the matter was not raised in the grounds of appeal or in the skeleton argument there was no call for it to be expressly excluded when permission to appeal was granted with limitations.

159 I agree with Mr Goulding on this point. The issue is not before this court. It is unnecessary to deal with the bonus issue other than to say that it does not in any event appear to raise any point that is not covered by the rulings made above rejecting Ms Madarassy's grounds of appeal on the burden of proof and the time limits points.

(I) Costs

160 This point arises on an adjourned application for permission to appeal.

161 Ms Madarassy was acting in person when she lodged her very long notice of appeal (108 paragraphs, 31 pages) with the Employment Appeal Tribunal on 31 March 2003. She made allegations of bias and improper conduct on the part of the employment tribunal.

162 On 9 May 2003 Judge Peter Clark ordered her to lodge an affidavit giving details in support of her allegations of bias or improper conduct. Judge Peter Clark gave a costs warning to the effect that the unsuccessful pursuit of the allegations might give rise to an award of costs. The order also directed the notice of appeal to be served on Nomura, which was invited to

A lodge concise submissions in opposition for consideration at the preliminary hearing.

163 On 23 May 2003 Nomura filed and served concise written submissions directed at persuading the Employment Appeal Tribunal not to allow the appeal to proceed beyond the preliminary hearing. Mr Goulding relied on the costs incurred in so doing to justify the award of costs later made in favour of Nomura by the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

B 164 Mr Allen submitted that there was no sensible reason for Nomura responding to the allegations made by Ms Madarassy in her notice of appeal. The order made by Judge Peter Clark provided for Nomura to have an opportunity to respond to the affidavit following its receipt. There was nothing to respond to until the affidavit was submitted.

165 In her affidavit lodged on 23 May 2003 in accordance with the C direction Ms Madarassy expressly withdrew some of the allegations, but not all of them. A number of allegations of improper conduct remained in the notice of appeal. Some additional allegations were made by Ms Madarassy in the affidavit itself.

166 A first draft amended notice of appeal was submitted on 23 September 2003. The allegations of bias and improper conduct were no longer pursued.

D 167 Mr Allen contended that the appeal tribunal erred in making an order against Ms Madarassy in respect of costs incurred after she had acted upon a costs warning given at the earliest possible stage by withdrawing parts of her appeal. The award of costs was, he contended, perverse in that no reasonable tribunal would have made an award of costs in the circumstances. Such orders would denude costs warnings of any effect. E They would discourage parties from abandoning weak allegations at an early stage. The order should be set aside.

168 While I agree with Mr Allen that it would be contrary to the purpose of a costs warning to make the party warned liable for costs incurred after the party had heeded the warning and ceased the conduct warned against, I have reached the conclusion that, on the facts of this case, the appeal tribunal did not err in principle in the exercise of its discretion F to order Ms Madarasssy to pay costs of £2,000 to Nomura. Although Mr Allen commented on the amount of the costs claimed by Nomura, there was no appeal against the quantum of the costs ordered against Ms Madarassy.

169 Nomura had incurred legal costs in responding to the notice of appeal, which contained the allegations that led the appeal tribunal to G make the order directing affidavit evidence from Ms Madarassy and inviting Nomura to make concise submissions. Ms Madarassy's allegations of improper conduct were only completely dropped when the amended notice of appeal was served several months after the respondent had incurred the costs in respect of the concise submissions and only shortly before the preliminary hearing which was due to take place on 29 September 2003.

H 170 In these circumstances the appeal tribunal was entitled to come to the conclusion that Ms Madarassy had behaved improperly and unreasonably in making the allegations in the first place and that Nomura's costs in relation to the written submissions were incurred in consequence of the allegations.

171 I would refuse the application for permission to appeal the costs order on the ground that there is no real prospect of persuading the Court of Appeal to interfere with the discretion of the appeal tribunal.

Result

172 I would dismiss the appeal on the ground, first that there was no error of law in the decision of the employment tribunal on any of the many aspects of its decision which were appealed to this court, and, secondly, there was no error of law in the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal to remit three of the allegations for review by the same employment tribunal or to make the £2,000 costs order against Ms Madarassy.

MARKET INVESTIGATIONS LTD.

v.

MINISTER OF SOCIAL SECURITY

1968 July 24; 29 — Cooke J.

Master and Servant—Contract of service—Service of, or for services—Market research interviewer—Part-time services—Series of contracts—Company controlling conduct of interviews—Interviewer free to work at time of choice—Freedom to work for others—Whether performing services as person in business on own account—Whether extent of control consistent with contract of service—Whether nature of whole contract consistent with contract of service—Considerations—Whether interviewers "employed person"—National Insurance Act, 1946 (9 & 10 Geo. 6, c. 67)—National Insurance Act, 1965 (c. 51), s. 1 (2).[1]

A member of a panel of part-time interviewers of a company engaged in market research was supplied with the company's "Interviewer's Guide" which gave detailed instructions as to the method in which interviews were to be conducted on behalf of the company. When the company was making a survey, the interviewer might be asked if she was willing to do a number of days' work within a fixed period. If she agreed, she would be sent the particulars and detailed instructions of the assignment, including the persons she was to interview and the questions she was to ask; she might also be asked to attend the company's briefing meetings, or she might receive instructions from the company's supervisor. She was paid for the number of days which the company estimated the interviews would take and expenses but, provided she completed the work within the allotted time, she was free to work when she chose; during the assignment she could work for others, and the company considered that they could not dismiss her. The Minister held that she was an employed person under section 1 (2) of the National Insurance Acts, 1946 and 1965,[1] and in insurable employment within section 1 (2) of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Acts, 1946 and 1965.

On the company's appeal, contending that she was engaged under a series of contracts for services and not contracts of service:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that since control, although a matter for consideration, was not decisive, the fundamental test in determining whether a person was performing services under a contract of service or for services was whether the person engaged to perform those services was performing them as a person in business on his own account and thus under a contract for services (post, p. 184G–H) but that no exhaustive list of the relevant considerations or their weight could be compiled

[1] National Insurance Act, 1965, s. 1: "(2) For the purposes of this Act, insured persons shall be divided into the following three classes, namely—(a) employed persons, that is to say, persons gainfully occupied in employment in Great Britain, being employment under a contract of service; (b) self-employed persons, that is to say, persons gainfully occupied in employment in Great Britain who are not employed persons; (c) non-employed persons. . . ."

(post, pp. 184G–185B); that, in the present case, the extent of control exercised by the company was so extensive as to be consistent with the interviewer being employed under a contract of service, notwithstanding that she had a discretion as to when to do the work (post, pp. 186D–H); and that, having regard to the nature and provisions of the contract looked at as a whole, the interviewer was not in business on her account, but was employed by the company under a series of contracts of service (post, pp. 186H–188C), the right to work for others not being inconsistent with the existence of a contract of service (post, p. 186F), and was accordingly, in insurable employment.

Per curiam: The opportunity to deploy individual skill and personality is frequently present in what is undoubtedly a contract of service (post, p. 188B).

CASE STATED by the Minister of Social Security.

On August 2, 1966, Market Investigations Ltd. (hereinafter called "the company"), who were the appellants in this case, applied for the decision of the Minister of Social Security, under section 64 (1) of the National Insurance Act, 1965, and section 35 (1) of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1965, of the questions whether whilst working in association with the company Mrs. Anne Florence Irving [hereinafter called "Mrs. Irving"] of [an address in Cheshire] was (1) included in the class of employed persons or in the class of self-employed persons for the purposes of the National Insurance Acts, 1946 and 1965; (2) employed in insurable employment within the meaning of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Acts, 1946 and 1965.

On October 11, 1966, the Minister appointed Mrs. C. M. Vivian Williams, barrister-at-law and member of the solicitor's office of the Ministry of Social Security, to hold an inquiry into questions arising on the application and to report thereon. On December 1, 1966, Mrs. Williams held an inquiry in London. The company was represented by counsel and adduced evidence. Mrs. Irving was given due notice of the inquiry, but she declined to attend and was not represented.

On consideration of the evidence led at the inquiry the Minister found the following facts. The company, whose registered office was at 1/2, Berners Street, London, W.1, was engaged in the field of market research, and in addition to their permanent staff at the headquarters office they employed interviewers for about eight to ten thousand interviews annually to provide information for the company's customers about the habits and opinions of members of the general public, retailers or other people in commerce, industry and the professions. A small number of the interviewers, whom the company directed to work anywhere at any time, were employed full time, but for the most part the company drew from a panel of about 470 interviewers, mostly married women wishing to earn pin money: the company had only 39 male interviewers. The company preferred to draw from a large number of interviewers infrequently rather than from a small number frequently as from the nature of the work it was important to diminish the effect of any personal prejudice on the part of the interviewer. Interviewers were recruited either by advertisement or through personal contacts. All interviewers were issued with or had access to a copy of the company's "Interviewer's Guide" a copy whereof was annexed and might be read as part of this case. That was a 26 page document outlining the techniques in interviewing and on page 1 it stated

> "The value and success of any survey depends primarily on the care taken over interviewing, the accuracy of recording and the absence of bias. Any errors in interviewing can be carried through analysis to the final report and may lead to totally misleading results" and it proceeded to give detailed examples of various types of surveys, methods of interviewing, recording of information and classification of persons interviewed into social grades. Before each survey went into the field the questionnaire was piloted to make sure that it was unambiguous in that questions would be asked, and answers recorded, in the best possible way. The final questionnaire, samples and interviewing instructions were then compiled by the company's research executives who were also able to estimate the time a given number of interviews should take. The company's field office staff organised the allocation of assignments and the area organiser was responsible for selecting the interviewers she thought could cope with each assignment: she then telephoned them to enquire whether they were free to work on a given number of days within a given period, say two or three days' work during a 10 to 14 day period. There was no obligation on a member of the panel to accept offers of work, but if there were frequent refusals that member would not be offered any further assignments. An interviewer was free to work for other firms doing similar work during the same period, provided he or she submitted work within the deadline required by the company. Each interviewing assignment was a distinct and separate arrangement and once a member of the panel had indicated that he or she was available, he was sent particulars of the assignment and instructions. The area organiser was also responsible for collecting and checking work carried out by the interviewers. The company checked with approximately 10 per cent. of the people stated by the interviewers to have been seen to ensure that they had been interviewed. The company did not allow interviewers to send a substitute without prior permission of the company. Interviewers were sent so many days' work based on the number of interviews the research executives determined could properly be done in a seven hour day, including travelling time. Thus it was known how much an interviewer would be paid, less expenses, when she received a particular assignment. When an interviewer was first engaged, a supervisor accompanied her to see that the techniques the company liked for interviewing were understood. On some of the more difficult assignments, a briefing meeting for interviewers was held at one of the company's centres or at other times the supervisor met the interviewer and gave the interviewer a personal briefing and might even accompany her on the first one or two interviews to make sure that the interviewing was carried out correctly. Once the interviewer was actually working in the field, the supervisor had no means of contacting her as the company had no record of where or when she would be working.

Mrs. Irving, resident at [a different address in Cheshire] (known to the company as "Dicti Irving") applied to be put on the company's panel of interviewers on April 15, 1964: this was at the suggestion of the area organiser since at that time the company required interviewers to work in pairs on a particular survey and Mrs. Irving's husband was already on the company's panel of interviewers. At that time Mrs. Irving had experience of interviewing, but not in the field of market research. She described herself as a housewife, indicating that on average she would be free to work four days a week, including weekend work, briefing sessions and that she was free to travel and work away from home if requested for three nights at a time. Between May 14, 1964, and December 3, 1965, a period of approximately 81 weeks, Mrs. Irving was paid by the company for a total of 61 days' work and eight half-day's work. She was paid by the company for that work a total of £122. In addition she was paid sums totalling £48 10s. 1d. for expenses incurred by her in performing the work. In the aforesaid period Mrs. Irving rendered services for the company for more than eight hours a week during the following 14 weeks, that is to say, the weeks which began on June 29, 1964, August 10, 1964, October 19, 1964, November 2, 9, 16, 23 and 30, 1964, January 4 and 11, 1965, February 15, 1965, April 5, 1965, September 20, 1965, and November 29, 1965. For the most part Mrs. Irving was paid on a daily basis as outlined [above] (at first the daily rate was 30s. increased to 35s. and latterly to 40s. daily): at other times she was paid 5s. or 10s. per interview. She also received a meal allowance and travelling expenses. One of the company's supervisors accompanied Mrs. Irving during the first few interviews on her first assignment.

The terms and conditions of each assignment varied. The company through their officers issued instructions in writing relating to the way in which each assignment was to be carried out and issued variously record sheets (a specimen copy was enclosed between pages 6 and 7 of the "Interviewer's Guide"), quota sheets (a specimen copy was enclosed at page 7 of the "Interviewer's Guide"), blank questionnaires on which to record informant's answers, prompt cards (a specimen copy was enclosed at page 17 of the said "Interviewer's Guide"), recruitment sheets, samples of products, expense sheets, labels and return envelopes. For the purpose of some of the surveys Mrs. Irving was given lists of the persons to be interviewed, the precise questions to be asked, the order in which they were to be asked and recorded and how to probe if she received a vague answer. For other surveys she had discretion to interview various persons in divers specified age or income groups In all cases the answers had to be recorded in the form required by the company. On some assignments it was suggested that interviews should be conducted in the afternoons or evenings, but provided the assignment was completed within the specified deadline, Mrs. Irving could work as and when she chose and did not necessarily have to complete seven hours' work during one day.

Mrs. Irving was required to forward the completed questionnaires to the company's head office at the end of each day's interviewing, the object being to facilitate internal organisation and to avoid swamping the company's processing department. On occasion, when there was a complicated survey, Mrs. Irving was required to attend the company's briefing sessions in London and on at least one occasion (in April, 1965) she was paid £2 for attending such a meeting plus travelling expenses. The company's officers were of the opinion that they could not have dismissed Mrs. Irving in the middle of an assignment, but if they had been dissatisfied with her work they would have sent her no further assignments. On December 22, 1965, Mrs. Irving wrote to the company's area supervisor, apologised for not undertaking the previous two assignments offered and suggested that her name be removed from the panel of interviewers. The company did not pay national insurance contributions at the rate appropriate for employed persons in respect of Mrs. Irving, neither did they make deductions from her earnings for tax under the P.A.Y.E. system, which they did in respect of their full-time interviewers. A

The following contentions were made on behalf of the company. That the problem was whether Mrs. Irving was engaged under a contract of service or a contract for services. That the law did not lay down any test of universal application by which one type of contract was to be distinguished from the other. That the tests most frequently applied were those B laid down by Lord Thankerton in Short v. J. and W. Henderson Ltd., 1946 S.C.(H.L.) 24, 33. The most important of those tests in reference to the present case was whether the master has the right to control the method of doing the work. It was this test which was applied in Wilson v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance, The Times, February 10, 1955, and Amalgamated Engineering Union v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1963] 1 W.L.R. 441 and Gould v. Minister of C National Insurance [1951] 1 K.B. 731. It was also applied by the Minister in a decision given in July, 1955, in respect of a B.B.C. interviewer (Decision M.48). It was also the test suggested by the Ministry in its note to the form of application. That the alternative tests suggested in Stevenson, Jordan and Harrison Ltd. v. MacDonald and Evans [1952] 1 T.L.R. 101 and Morren v. Swinton and Pendlebury Borough Council [1965] D 1 W.L.R. 576, C.A., were applicable only to professional people who were engaged for their skill and experience. That Mrs. Irving was not such a person and accordingly the tests did not apply to her. That Mrs. Irving was not continuously engaged under one contract, but was intermittently engaged under a series of contracts. That none of these contracts contained any provision for termination by the company of Mrs. Irving's services. That since each contract involved so many hours' work to be E done and a very much larger working period in which Mrs. Irving could do it as and when she liked, any form of control was impossible. That one of the essential features of control was that the person controlled must be at work during specified periods. That, therefore, the company had no right to control how the work was to be done. That, in the premises, Mrs. Irving worked for the company pursuant to a series of contracts for F services and was not employed under a contract of service.

On consideration of all the above-mentioned matters the Minister concluded that: Mrs. Irving's employments by the company were employments under contracts of service, and she was gainfully occupied in those employments in Great Britain; by virtue of section 1 (2) (a) of the National Insurance Act, 1946, and subsequently by virtue of section 1 (2) (a) of the National Insurance Act, 1965, Mrs. Irving was included in the class of G employed persons for the purposes of the aforesaid Acts respectively by virtue of her work for the company during the weeks stated [above]; by virtue of regulation 2 of, and paragraph 10 (b) of Schedule 1 to, the National Insurance (Classification) Regulations, 1948, as amended (S.I. 1948 No. 1425 and S.I. 1957 No. 2175 (the eight-hour rule)), Mrs. Irving was not included in the class of insured persons during other weeks in H which she worked for the company during the period from May 14, 1964, to December 3, 1965; by virtue of section 1 of, and paragraph 1 of Part I of Schedule 1 to, the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, and subsequently by virtue of section 1 of, and paragraph 1 of Part I of Schedule 1 to, the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1965, Mrs. Irving's employment by the company during the last aforesaid period was insurable employment within the meaning of the last two aforesaid Acts respectively.

On February 16, 1967, the Minister accordingly decided that, while working in association with the company during the weeks commencing June 29, August 10, October 19, November 2, 9, 16, 23, and 30, 1964, January 4 and 11, February 15, April 5, September 20, and November 29, 1965, Mrs. Irving was (1) included in the class of employed persons for the purposes of the National Insurance Acts, 1946 and 1965, and (2) was employed in insurable employment within the meaning of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Acts, 1946 and 1965.

On February 16, 1967, notice of the decision was sent to Mrs. Irving and, through its solicitors, to the company.

On March 1, 1967, the company's solicitors on behalf of the company requested the Minister to state the grounds of the decision, and on April 27, 1967, a statement of the grounds of the decision was sent to the company's solicitors in the terms set out in a copy annexed to the case.

On May 18, 1967, the company, through its solicitors, by notice in writing addressed to the Minister required the Minister to state a case, setting forth the facts on which her decision was based and her decision thereof, which, in accordance with the provisions of R.S.C. Ord. 111, the Minister did in the terms set out herein.

Peter Pain Q.C. and Keith Evans for the appellant company. The two approaches to the determination of whether a person is an employed person under a contract of service or a self-employed under a contract for services are, first, the application of the classic test, the degree of control, and, secondly, the consideration of all the contractual terms to determine whether they are more consistent with a contract of service or a contract for services. Absence of control is a strong indication that there is a contract for services, and here the company's lack of control over Mrs. Irving is consistent with a contract for services.

When considering the contract as a whole, the matters which indicate that this is a contract for services includes the fact that the company considered it had no power to dismiss Mrs. Irving during a contractual period. The Minister qualified this, saying " the company officers were of the opinion that they could not have dismissed Mrs. Irving in the middle of an assignment." If so-called employers consider they have no right of dismissal it is an indication that there is no such right and here the company were content with the negative power that, if the work was done badly, they would not enter into a further contract with Mrs. Irving. The contract neither provides for specific times of working nor for time off, holidays or sick pay. These are matters which are usually to be found in a contract of service. Even in a part-time contract of service, it is to be expected that the service is a continuous one, but here the work is intermittent, and there are substantial gaps between the contractual periods. During the contractual periods, Mrs. Irving has to work to a deadline, but she is at liberty to work for others. She works for a fixed fee, and she is in a similar position to a chartered accountant who is brought in to do a prescribed task for an organisation but, provided the task is completed by a fixed date, he is at liberty to work as and when he chooses.

The modern authorities which state the present-day position of the law are Morren v. Swinton and Pendlebury Borough Council [1965] 1 W.L.R. 576; Whittaker v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1967] 1 Q.B. 156; Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd. v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1968] 2 Q.B. 497. Such matters as ownership of assets, chances of profit and risk of loss do not really help in this case. The test of skill alone does not help, for there are many examples of employed persons with considerably more skill than an interviewer; but Mrs. Irving must exercise a degree of skill in obtaining the answers to the questions, even though those questions are formulated by the company.

Mrs. Irving is a person who can work when she chooses, she has no duty to accept employment, and she can disregard any control the company attempts to assert over her whilst she is working, for the contractual terms do not permit any interference by the company in the manner and times she works. Neither she nor the company considered that she was an employed person in an insurable employment. This series of contracts is more consistent with a series of contracts for services than contracts of service.

Gordon Slynn for the Minister of Social Security. The courts have adopted a number of tests to determine whether a relationship is that of master and servant or of independent contractors. It is important to bear in mind that these tests have been used for different purposes including consideration of vicarious liability in tort, the transfer of a servant, contracts, the Workmen's Compensation Acts. Firstly, the classic test is based on control but, although absence of control is a strong indication of a contract for services, the presence of control is not conclusive against the relationship of independent contractors if other factors outweigh it. The degree of control an employer exerts over an employee varies with the degree of skill needed by the employee to perform his task. Secondly, there is the test applied by Lord Thankerton in Short v. J. and W. Henderson Ltd., 1946 S.C.(H.L.) 24, 33 who adopted the four indicia: whether an employer paid the servants wages and had the right to select and dismiss the servant and to control the method of doing the work. Another test applied in Stevenson, Jordan & Harrison Ltd. v. MacDonald and Evans [1952] 1 T.L.R. 101 and referred to in Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Slatford [1953] 1 Q.B. 248 was whether the person performing the task was part of the organisation. Finally, MacKenna J. in Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd. v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1968] 2 Q.B. 497 applied the test of economic reality and that test incorporates the four elements propounded by Lord Wright in Montreal v. Montreal Locomotive Works Ltd. (1947) 1 D.L.R. 161 of ownership of assets, control, chance of profit and risk of loss. Not one of these tests is absolute or conclusive and the correct approach is to consider all the factors and, applying all the tests, so far as relevant, determine whether the contract is one of service or for services: see Atiyah's Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts (1967), p. 38.

A Control is, however, an important element even if it is less determinative than formerly: see Short v. J. and W. Henderson Ltd., 1946 S.C. 24, Whittaker v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1967] 1 Q.B. 156 and Gould v. Minister of National Insurance [1951] 1 K.B. 731. Although, as in Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd. v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1968] 2 Q.B. 497 control is not a B decisive factor if other factors outweigh it, control is a strong indication that the contract is one of service. Conversely, absence of control is a strong indication of a contract for services, but again it is not a conclusive factor; see Morren v. Swinton and Pendlebury Borough Council [1965] 1 W.L.R. 576.

In this case the company exert a very considerable degree of control C over the manner in which Mrs. Irving carries out and conducts the interviews. The Interviewer's Guide gives detailed directions as to how the interviews are to be conducted. The fact that the interviewer cannot be contacted when in the field must be read in the light of all the other factors including the instructions from the supervisor, form of questions and the briefing sessions in London. The instructions are so detailed that the interviewers are left with very little initiative and independence. D Flexibility as to the time worked, and the fact that the work is part time, does not mean that a person is not an employee: Hobbs v. Royal Arsenal Co-operative Society Ltd. (1930) 23 B.W.C.C. 254. In Amalgamated Engineering Union v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1963] 1 W.L.R. 441 it could not have been known when a sick steward was visiting the sick and, in every case where canvassers are employed, an employer E cannot know when and where they are working. Nor does it matter that it cannot be said at the beginning how long the job will take.

A number of short contracts may suggest independence, but they may in fact create a master-and-servant relationship: see Sadler v. Henlock (1855) 4 E. & B. 570. If a man is employed once as a servant he does not cease to be a servant because he is subsequently engaged from time to time, e.g., a sandwich-board man, a hall attendant engaged on specific F occasions. The lack of provision for holiday, time off and sick pay in these contracts does not indicate contracts for services as by the very nature of the contracts such provisions are not applicable in the circumstances even if the contracts are contracts of service.

The fact that the company thought it could not dismiss during a period or in the middle of an assignment makes no difference. The contract of G a servant like that of an independent contractor can be terminated for repudiation; in the case of a servant it is called dismissal. Equally, both may be subject to termination on notice under an implied term, but not if this would be inconsistent with the express terms as where the contract whether of service or for services was for a fixed period. Then you can only terminate for a repudiation. [Reference was made to Willy Scheidegger Swiss Typing School (London) Ltd. v. Minister of Social Security H (1968) 5 K.I.R. 65.]

The degree of control in this case is such that they are contracts of service but, even if control is not an important test, the application of the economic reality and integration tests achieve the same result and these are contracts of service. The interviewer here clearly did not have an independent business. A Pain Q.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29. COOKE J. The appellant company in this case, Market Investigations Ltd., are engaged in the field of market research. In addition to their permanent staff at the headquarters office, they employ interviewers for about eight to ten thousand interviews annually to provide information for the company's customers about the habits and opinions of members of the general public, retailers or other people in commerce, industry and the professions. B

The company employ a small number of interviewers who work full time, but for the most part they draw from a panel of about 470 interviewers, mostly married women wishing to earn pin-money. C

Between May 14, 1964, and December 3, 1965, Mrs. Ann Florence Irving was a member of that panel and from time to time during that period she engaged herself to the company to act as an interviewer in connection with particular surveys which the company were conducting. D

On August 2, 1966, the company applied to the Minister for a decision whether, whilst working under those engagements, Mrs. Irving was included in the class of employed persons for the purpose of the National Insurance Acts, 1946 and 1965, and was employed in insurable employment within the meaning of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Acts, 1946 and 1965.

Section 1 (2) of the National Insurance Act, 1965, defines "employed persons" as persons gainfully occupied in employment in Great Britain, being employment under a contract of service. The definition in the National Insurance Act, 1946, was to the same effect. E

By section 1 (2) of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1965, and paragraph 1 of Part I of Schedule 1 to that Act, insurable employment for the purposes of that Act includes, subject to exceptions not here material, employment in Great Britain under any contract of service. The corresponding provisions of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, were to the like effect. F

The submission of the company before the Minister was that Mrs. Irving worked for the company under a series of contracts for services. The Minister's conclusion was that Mrs. Irving's employments by the company were employments under contracts of service. The Minister went on to hold that in certain weeks during the period between May 14, 1964, and December 3, 1965, Mrs. Irving was included in the class of employed persons for the purposes of the National Insurance Acts and that her employment with the company was insurable employment within the meaning of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Acts. G

From that decision the company now appeals. The sole issue for determination in the appeal is whether, as the company say, Mrs. Irving was employed during the relevant period under a series of contracts for services or, as the Minister says, she was employed during that period H under a series of contracts of service. [His Lordship referred to the facts found by the Minister in the case stated, and continued:]

The authorities on the distinction between a contract of service and a contract for services have been extensively reviewed in a number of recent cases, and in particular I refer to the judgment of Mocatta J. in Whittaker v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1967] 1 Q.B. 156 and the judgment of MacKenna J. in Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd. v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1968] 2 Q.B. 497.

With these and other recent decisions before me, I do not myself propose to embark on a lengthy review of the authorities. I begin by pointing out that the first condition which must be fulfilled in order that a contract may be classified as a contract of service is that stated by MacKenna J. in the Ready Mixed Concrete case [1968] 2 Q.B. 497, 515, namely, that A agrees that, in consideration of some form of remuneration, he will provide his own work and skill in the performance of some service for B. The fact that this condition is fulfilled is not, however, sufficient. Further tests must be applied to determine whether the nature and provisions of the contract as a whole are consistent or inconsistent with its being a contract of service.

I think it is fair to say that there was at one time a school of thought according to which the extent and degree of the control which B was entitled to exercise over A in the performance of the work would be a decisive factor. However, it has for long been apparent that an analysis of the extent and degree of such control is not in itself decisive. Thus in Collins v. Hertfordshire County Council [1947] K.B. 598, it had been suggested that the distinguishing feature of a contract of service is that the master cannot only order or require what is to be done but also how it shall be done. The inadequacy of this test was pointed out by Somervell L.J. in Cassidy v. Ministry of Health [1951] 2 K.B. 343, 352, where he referred to the case of a certified master of a ship. The master may be employed by the owners under what is clearly a contract of service, and yet the owners have no power to tell him how to navigate his ship. As Lord Parker C.J. pointed out in Morren v. Swinton and Pendlebury Borough Council [1965] 1 W.L.R. 576, 582, when one is dealing with a professional man, or a man of some particular skill and experience, there can be no question of an employer telling him how to do work; therefore the absence of control and direction in that sense can be of little, if any, use as a test.

Cases such as Morren's case [1965] 1 W.L.R. 576 illustrate how a contract of service may exist even though the control does not extend to prescribing how the work shall be done. On the other hand, there may be cases when one who engages another to do work may reserve to himself full control over how the work is to be done, but nevertheless the contract is not a contract of service. A good example is Queensland Stations Proprietary Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1945) 70 C.L.R. 539, the " drover " case, where Dixon J. said, at p. 552:

> " In considering the facts it is a mistake to treat as decisive a reservation of control over the manner in which the droving is performed and the cattle are handled. For instance, in the present case the circumstance that the drover agrees to obey and carry out all lawful instructions cannot outweigh the countervailing considerations which are found in the employment by him of servants of his own, the provision of horses, equipment, plant, rations, and a remuneration at a rate per head delivered."

If control is not a decisive test, what then are the other considerations which are relevant? No comprehensive answer has been given to this question, but assistance is to be found in a number of cases.

In Montreal v. Montreal Locomotive Works Ltd. [1947] 1 D.L.R. 161, Lord Wright said, at p. 169:

"In earlier cases a single test, such as the presence or absence of control, was often relied on to determine whether the case was one of master and servant, mostly in order to decide issues of tortious liability on the part of the master or superior. In the more complex conditions of modern industry, more complicated tests have to be applied. It has been suggested that a fourfold test would in some cases be more appropriate, a complex involving (1) control; (2) ownership of the tools; (3) chance of profit; (4) risk of loss. Control in itself is not always conclusive. Thus the master of a chartered vessel is generally the employee of the shipowner though the charterer can direct the employment of the vessel. Again the law often limits the employer's right to interfere with the employee's conduct, as also do trade union regulations. In many cases the question can only be settled by examining the whole of the various elements which constitute the relationship between the parties. In this way it is in some cases possible to decide the issue by raising as the crucial question whose business is it, or in other words by asking whether the party is carrying on the business, in the sense of carrying it on for himself or on his own behalf and not merely for a superior."

In Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Slatford [1953] 1 Q.B. 248, Denning L.J. said, at p. 295:

"The test of being a servant does not rest nowadays on submission to orders. It depends on whether the person is part and parcel of the organisation."

In United States of America v. Silk (1946) 331 U.S. 704, the question was whether certain men were "employees" within the meaning of that word in the Social Security Act, 1935. The judges of the Supreme Court decided that the test to be applied was not "power of control, whether exercised or not, over the manner of performing service to the undertaking," but whether the men were employees "as a matter of economic reality."

The observations of Lord Wright, of Denning L.J. and of the judges of the Supreme Court suggest that the fundamental test to be applied is this: "Is the person who has engaged himself to perform these services performing them as a person in business on his own account?" If the answer to that question is "yes," then the contract is a contract for services. If the answer is "no," then the contract is a contract of service. No exhaustive list has been compiled and perhaps no exhaustive list can be compiled of the considerations which are relevant in determining that question, nor can strict rules be laid down as to the relative weight which the various considerations should carry in particular cases. The most that can be said is that control will no doubt always have to be considered, although it can no longer be regarded as the sole determining factor; and that factors which may be of importance are such matters as whether the man performing the services provides his own equipment, whether he hires his own helpers, what degree of financial risk he takes, what degree of responsibility for investment and management he has, and whether and how far he has an opportunity of profiting from sound management in the performance of his task.

The application of the general test may be easier in a case where the person who engages himself to perform the services does so in the course of an already established business of his own; but this factor is not decisive, and a person who engages himself to perform services for another may well be an independent contractor even though he has not entered into the contract in the course of an existing business carried on by him.

In the present case it is clear that on each occasion on which Mrs. Irving engaged herself to act as an interviewer for a particular survey she agreed with the company, in consideration of a fixed remuneration, to provide her own work and skill in the performance of a service for the company. I therefore proceed to ask myself two questions: First, whether the extent and degree of the control exercised by the company, if no other factors were taken into account, be consistent with her being employed under a contract of service. Second, whether when the contract is looked at as a whole, its nature and provisions are consistent or inconsistent with its being a contract of service, bearing in mind the general test I have adumbrated.

As to the first question: The facts found by the Minister show that the control of the company is exercised at two stages. Before the interviewer engages herself for the particular survey, she will probably have seen the company's "Interviewer's Guide." This document contains detailed instructions on the technique of interviewing, and much of it is couched in imperative language. It would be tedious to cite examples at length, and I quote only a few. On page 3, I read:

> "It will always be necessary to recall several times if you cannot contact your informant at the first call. It is only after you have done this that you will be allowed to take a substitute name from your list."

On page 8,

> "No interviews may be taken with children under 16 without the prior consent of a parent or guardian."

On page 13, under "Factual Questions,"

> "This type of question must be asked in strict order as shown on your questionnaire."

On page 16, under "Open Ended Questions,"

> "You must—(a) record all your informant says verbatim and not attempt to summarise or paraphrase even a very vague and/or wordy reply; (b) probe until you are satisfied that you have obtained the fullest answer possible."

On the Minister's findings, I have no doubt that the instructions in the "Interviewer's Guide," after having been seen by the interviewer, are incorporated into the terms of any contract which the interviewer may thereafter make with the company to participate in a particular survey.

The second stage of control comes after the interviewer has agreed to take part in a particular survey, that is to say, after the contract has been made. The interviewer is then sent instructions which according to the Interviewer's Guide give details of whom to interview, what to say to informants, how to handle the questionnaire and other forms, and also deal with contact with the office. In addition to that, the interviewer might in particular cases be required to attend the office of the company for instructions, or might receive instructions from a supervisor.

The control which the company had the right to exercise was, however, limited in various ways. They had no right to instruct Mrs. Irving as to when she should do the work. The only requirement imposed on her was that the work should be completed within a specified period. During that period Mrs. Irving was free to do similar work for other organisations, so that the company had no right to prohibit her from doing that. No doubt it would be agreed before Mrs. Irving accepted the assignment that her work would be in a given area; if so, the company would have no right to send her to another area. In addition to those limitations on the right of the company to give instructions to her, there was a practical limitation on the possibility of giving instructions to her while actually working in the field, because, as found by the Minister, the supervisor would then have no means of getting into touch with her.

It is apparent that the control which the company had the right to exercise in this case was very extensive indeed. It was in my view so extensive as to be entirely consistent with Mrs. Irving's being employed under a contract of service. The fact that Mrs. Irving had a limited discretion as to when she should do the work was not in my view inconsistent with the existence of a contract of service. For examples of a servant having such a discretion, see Hobbs v. Royal Arsenal Co-operative Society Ltd. (1930) 23 B.W.C.C. 254, C.A., and Amalgamated Engineering Union v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1963] 1 W.L.R. 441. Nor is there anything inconsistent with the existence of a contract of service in the fact that Mrs. Irving was free to work for others during the relevant period. It is by no means a necessary incident of a contract of service that the servant is prohibited from serving any other employer. Again, there is nothing inconsistent with the existence of a contract of service in the master having no right to alter the place or area within which the servant has agreed to work. So far as concerns practical limitations on a master's power to give instructions to his servant, there must be many cases when such practical limitations exist. For example, a chauffeur in the service of a car hire company may, in the absence of radio communication, be out of reach of instructions for long periods.

I therefore turn to the second question, which is whether, when the contract is looked at as a whole, its nature and provisions are consistent or inconsistent with its being a contract of service.

Mr. Pain, for the company, points first to the fact that Mrs. Irving was appointed on each occasion to do a specific task at a fixed fee. He points to the fact that the company's officers were of the opinion that they could not have dismissed Mrs. Irving in the middle of an assignment. He says that these factors are more consistent with the conception of a contract for services than a contract of service.

As to the first factor, appointment to do a specific task at a fixed fee, I do not think that this is inconsistent with the contract being a contract of service. See, for example, Sadler v. Henlock (1855) 4 E. & B. 570.

As to the right of dismissal, it is necessary to distinguish between a right of dismissal for breach and a right of dismissal irrespective of breach.

It is noticeable that as regards the right of dismissal for breach, the Minister's finding is somewhat cautiously worded; it relates to what the company's officers thought and not to what the provisions of the contract were. In the absence of some special term either expressed in the contract or to be implied from particular circumstances, I should have thought that certain types of breach might well justify dismissal of an interviewer, even in the middle of an assignment. I cannot see on what ground the right to dismiss in the middle of an assignment is said to be entirely excluded in this case; but assuming that it is, that fact does not in my view assist the company in establishing that the contract is a contract for services and not a contract of service. Even in a contract for services a breach by one party which goes to the root of the contract will entitle the other party to terminate it. In this respect, there is no difference between a contract for services and a contract of service, except that in the latter case the master's right is spoken of as a right of dismissal—a peculiarity of words which makes no difference to the substance.

So far as concerns dismissal irrespective of breach, it is of course clear that the interviewer in this case could not, in the absence of a breach, be dismissed in the middle of an assignment. But there is nothing in this which is inconsistent with the contract being a contract of service. It is quite common for contracts of service to be entered into for fixed periods with no provision, express or implied, for dismissal during the specified period.

Then Mr. Pain says that the fact that the contract makes no provision for time off, sick pay and holidays, suggests that it is not a contract of service. I cannot accept that this is a test which is of great assistance in the present case. The fact that the contract makes no provision for time off is merely a reflection of the fact that there are no specified hours of work. I have already dealt with this. The fact that there is no provision for sick pay and holidays is merely a reflection of the fact that the contract is of very short duration. If a man engages himself as an extra kitchen hand at a hotel for a week in the holiday season, there will be no provision for sick pay and holidays, but the contract will almost certainly be a contract of service.

The company then refer to the fact that Mrs. Irving's work was performed under a series of contracts, each for a specific survey. They say that the relationship of master and servant is normally conceived of as a continuous relationship, and that the fact that there is a series of contracts is more consistent with those contracts being contracts for services than contracts of service. For my part, I doubt whether this factor can usefully be considered in isolation. It must I think be considered in connection with the more general question whether Mrs. Irving could be said to be in business on her own account as an interviewer. In considering this more general question I take into account the fact that Mrs. Irving was free to work as an interviewer for others, though I think it is right to say that in this case there is no finding that she did so. I also take into account the fact that in her work as an interviewer Mrs. Irving would, within the limits imposed by her instructions, deploy a skill and personality which would be entirely her own. I can only say that in the circumstances of this case these factors are not in my view sufficient to lead to the conclusion that Mrs. Irving was in business on her own account. The opportunity to deploy individual skill and personality is frequently present in what is undoubtedly a contract of service. I have already said that the right to work for others is not inconsistent with the existence of a contract of service. Mrs. Irving did not provide her own tools or risk her own capital, nor did her opportunity of profit depend in any significant degree on the way she managed her work.

Taking all the factors into account and giving full weight, I hope, to Mr. Pain's persuasive arguments, I am clearly of opinion that on the facts of this case the Minister was right in concluding that Mrs. Irving was employed by the company under a series of contracts of service, and the appeal accordingly must fail.

Appeal dismissed.
Minister to pay the costs of the appeal under section 65 of the National Insurance Act, 1965.

[Reported by R. W. LUCIE-SMITH, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

estate of Terence, the father; and that there is rent due from him, to one-seventh of which the estate of Ann, the testatrix, is entitled: the Plaintiff has, therefore, in his hands, monies which belong to the estate of the testatrix; and I think the Court ought not to disregard that fact, and decree the full payment of his legacy by the executors of Ann. It is not suggested that there was any joint lease of the premises to the four tenants in common, who at different times occupied the house: they appear to be, at law, severally liable in respect of their occupation. I cannot, however, direct an account of what is due from the Plaintiff unless the whole of the residuary legatees are parties, and are bound by the account and inquiries. If the residuary legatees of Terence, who are not before the Court, will appear and [99] consent to be bound by the account, I may direct it to be taken in this suit. If anything be found due from the Plaintiff, William Mac Mahon, as the tenant of the premises in question, that will be set off as against his legacy; but it will not form any set-off against the legacy to the Plaintiff Henrietta, his wife.

The Plaintiffs consented to waive the undertaking on behalf of Charles, who was abroad, and an account was directed of the two legacies and interest. And all the residuary legatees of Terence appearing by their counsel, and consenting to be bound by the inquiries and accounts thereby directed, and the Plaintiffs and Defendants not opposing their appearance, but, so far as they were able, consenting thereto, it was referred to the Master to ascertain whether the Plaintiff, William Mac Mahon, was during any and (if any) what time in the occupation of "The Lower House" in, &c., since the death of the said Terence Mac Mahon, and, if so, whether the Plaintiff, William Mac Mahon, ought to be charged with any and (if any) what sum of money, in respect of such occupation; and the Master was to state whether anything and what was paid, and when, since the death of the said Terence Mac Mahon, by the Plaintiff, William Mac Mahon, for or in respect of repairs and outgoings of the said house, or otherwise on account thereof; and whether, at the death of the testatrix, Ann Mac Mahon, the Plaintiff, William Mac Mahon, had any and what assets of the said Ann Mac Mahon in his hands applicable to pay the said legacies, with liberty to state special circumstances.

[S. C. at law, 6 Q. B. 288; 11 Q. B. 1015. See Mutrie v. Binney, 1887, 35 Ch. D. 620; In re Henderson, 1887-89, 35 Ch. D. 716; 37 Ch. D. 244; and (sub nom. Nouvion v. Freeman), 15 A. C. 1. Discussed, Worman v. Worman, 1889, 43 Ch. D. 296.]

The next of kin of an intestate filed their bill in equity in the Supreme Court of Newfoundland against A., the brother and deceased partner of the intestate, for an account of the estate of the father of A. and of the intestate possessed by A., and an account of the partnership transactions, and the dealings of A. with the estate since the death of the intestate. The bill was taken, pro confesso, against A. in the Colonial Court, and, on a reference, the Master reported that certain sums were due to the several next of kin on the account of the estate of the intestate's father possessed by A.; but that no account between A. and the intestate had been laid before him: the Supreme Court decreed that the sums found by the Master to be due to the next of kin and the costs should be paid to them by A. The next of kin brought their actions in this country against A. upon the decree. A. then filed his bill in this Court against the next of kin and personal representative of the intestate, stating that the intestate's estate was indebted to him on the partnership accounts and on private transactions; alleging various errors and irregularities in the proceedings in the Supreme Court, and that A. intended to appeal therefrom to the Privy Council; and praying that the estate of the intestate might be administered, the partnership accounts taken, the amount of the debt due to A. ascertained and paid, and the next of kin restrained by injunction from proceeding in their actions.

Demurrer, for want of equity, allowed on the ground that the whole of the matters were in question between the parties, and might properly have been the subject of adjudication in the suit before the Supreme Court of Newfoundland.

That, inasmuch as the Privy Council is the Court of Appeal from the Colonial Court, and has jurisdiction to stay the execution of the decree pending the appeal, the Court will not interfere by injunction, on the ground of error or irregularity in the decree of the Colonial Court.

Whether, in a case of error shewn in the judgment of the Court of a foreign country, from which there was no appeal to any of Her Majesty's Courts, the decision would be the same, quære?

The bill was filed in May 1843 by Bethel Henderson against Elizabeth Henderson, the widow of Jordan Henderson, his deceased brother, and Charles Simms and Joanna, his wife, who was the daughter of Jordan; and also against J. Gadsden, the administrator of the estate of Jordan, in England; and it stated that William Henderson, a merchant in Bristol and Newfoundland, the father of the Plaintiff and Jordan Henderson, in 1808, admitted them into partnership with him, and in 1817 resigned all his interest in the trade to them: that the Plaintiff and Jordan carried on the business in partnership from 1817: that the share or interest in the partnership, which their father gave up to them, was worth £15,000 or thereabouts, and was continued in, and formed part of, the partnership of the Plaintiff and Jordan: that Jordan Henderson died in March 1830 intes-[101]-tate, leaving the Defendants, Elizabeth, his widow, Joanna (the wife of the Defendant, C. Simms), his daughter, and also leaving William, a son: that Elizabeth, the widow, obtained letters of administration of the estate of Jordan in Newfoundland, and, together with the Plaintiff, carried on the partnership business for the purpose of winding it up; but before that was done, a fire in the island in August 1832 destroyed the buildings and plant of the partnership, and all the books, except the ledgers; and that disputes then arose between the Plaintiff and Elizabeth, the widow.

The bill then set forth a petition presented in November 1832 by the Defendants, the widow and children of Jordan, to the Judges of the Supreme Court in Newfoundland, which alleged that William, the father, before his death, gave or bequeathed £1000 to or for the Petitioner, Joanna, and gave or bequeathed the rest of his estate between Bethel, the Plaintiff, and Jordan, his sons, equally: that Bethel was living with William, the father, at Bristol, and possessed himself of his estate: that Jordan died possessed of considerable real and personal estate in the partnership, both in England and Newfoundland: that Bethel had possessed himself of all such estate, as well as of the partnership books, and carried on trade therewith, and had drawn monies thereout: that he also refused to satisfy the Petitioners whether Jordan had left any will; and prayed that Bethel might be decreed by the Supreme Court to come to an account in respect of all and singular the premises; and that as well the estate of William, the father, as the estate of Jordan, might be applied in a course of administration.

The bill stated that no personal representative of William, the father, or of Jordan, was a party to the said proceeding in the Supreme Court: that Elizabeth, [102] the widow, presented another petition, dated the 8th of December 1832, not intituled in any cause to the said Judges, which alleged that, since administration of the estate of her husband had been granted to her, Bethel, the Plaintiff, had rendered her certain accounts of debts and assets in Newfoundland, but refused to account to her for the property of the deceased in England: that he was then about to leave the country, whereby the Petitioner would, in all probability, be prevented from bringing him to any account respecting the said estate, unless the Supreme Court should grant immediate process against him: that a brig, called "The Elizabeth," belonging to the intestate and Bethel equally, had, without the Petitioner's authority, been laden at Harbor Grace, by Bethel, principally on freight, under an engagement to sail on the 10th of December for Bristol: that the Petitioner had good reason to know that the monies of Jordan, in the possession of Bethel in England, amounted from £5000 to £8000: the Petitioner therefore prayed the writ of ne exeat regno, to restrain Bethel from departing out of the jurisdiction, and that he might be ordered to exhibit to the Court a full account of all the estate of Jordan come to his hands: that C. Simms, by affidavit, intituled "Elizabeth Henderson v. Bethel Henderson," deposed that Bethel was then justly indebted to Elizabeth, the widow, administratrix of the estate of Jordan, in the sum of £3100 sterling, exclusive of such further sum as he might be indebted to her on account of monies and property in England; and that he threatened to leave the island and go beyond sea, out of the jurisdiction of the Court, whereby the said debt would be lost or endangered, or the recovery thereof would be difficult.

The bill stated that an instrument purporting to be a writ of ne exeat regno, dated the 10th of December [103] 1832, was issued out of the Supreme Court, with a summons or subpœna, in the first-mentioned suit: that the Plaintiff, on the 22d of December, executed his bond, with two sureties, to the high sheriff of the island, in the sum of £6200, conditioned to be void if the Plaintiff should personally appear before the Court by the 10th of June then next, and render a full account of the estate of Jordan come to his hands, whether arising from the estate of William, the father, or otherwise; and also an account of the said partnership business, and answer and fulfil the orders and decrees of the Supreme Court touching the said estate, and also touching a certain bill, then filed, of Elizabeth Henderson and others, against the Plaintiff: that the Plaintiff then quitted the island and returned in 1834: that, on the 14th of June 1834, the Supreme Court ordered the bond to be put in suit, unless the Plaintiff should put in his answer to the first petition; and, in July 1834, the Plaintiff appeared in that suit by H. A. Emerson, Esq., Her Majesty's Solicitor-General in the island, who also prepared the Plaintiff's answer, which was sworn and filed on the 11th of July 1834, intituled in the first suit only.

The bill then stated the purport of the Plaintiff's answer: that exceptions were taken by the Petitioners, for that he had not set out an account of the partnership transactions, or of the estate of Jordan possessed by him; or whether William, the father, left any and what estate, for the use of Jordan or his family: that the Supreme Court ordered that the accounts prayed for in the first suit should be filed before the 25th of July, or that the bond should be assigned to the Petitioners to be put in suit: that the Plaintiff had, for several years, employed J. Fitzgerald, an accountant in the island, in keeping the accounts of the said business; and in order that Fitzgerald might make out the accounts of the [104] partnership, the Plaintiff, on the 20th of July, delivered over to him the books and accounts of the business in England, and on the same day the Plaintiff quitted the island.

The bill then stated that Fitzgerald made out in distinct parts the accounts of the partnership from 1817 to the death of Jordan, and the subsequent accounts of the Plaintiff, and filed the same on the 4th of August 1834, and verified them by affidavit, as true extracts from the Plaintiff's books: the bill stated the balances appearing by the several accounts; the result of which was that £4500 and £883, 7s. 5d. were owing to the Plaintiff from the Newfoundland concern, and that a further sum of £2366, 15s. 4d. was owing to him from the estate of Jordan, in respect of transactions since his death; and a large sum was also owing to the Plaintiff as a private debt, in respect of advances he had made for the use of Jordan and his family.

The bill then set forth a letter received by the Plaintiff from his solicitor and counsel, H. A. Emerson, Esq., stating that delay had occurred in the report on the exceptions, owing to the answer having been mislaid by the Clerk of the Court, and adverting to what had been since done: that the Plaintiff received no further information respecting the suit, except that he had recently learnt that the Master, on the 26th of December 1835, reported the Plaintiff's answer to be sufficient, but that the accounts had been subsequently filed; and, upon the motion of the Plaintiff's counsel, the accounts were referred to the Master for his report: that the Petitioners excepted to the Master's report, and in January 1835 obtained an order discharging the order by which the accounts were referred to the Master: that no further proceedings were ever taken on the said peti-[105]-tion: that in 1836 the Plaintiff discharged H. A. Emerson, Esq., as his solicitor, and did not employ any other solicitor, and thenceforwards had no counsel or solicitor in the island, as all the Defendants and their solicitor well knew.

The bill then stated that in January 1837 the Defendants obtained a rule for leave to amend the first-mentioned petition or bill, no person being authorized by the Plaintiff, who was out of the jurisdiction, to oppose the same; that in May 1837

the Defendants exhibited a bill in their own names (and in that of William, the son, without his authority), addressed to the Judges of the Supreme Court. [The bill was then set forth: it charged the Plaintiff with having possessed the sum of £30,000 in respect of the estate of William, the father, impeached the partnership and other accounts put in by the Plaintiff in various specific points, and charged him with misappropriation and loss of the partnership property and estate since the death of Jordan, and calling for discovery on various subjects: and it prayed that the Plaintiff might account and pay to the Defendants their share of the alleged assets of William, the father, the partnership property which belonged to Jordan, the amount of the losses thereto by the carrying on of the trade since his death, and that they might be at liberty to inspect the original books of account of the Bristol trade.]

The bill stated that the summons or subpœna, requiring the Plaintiff to appear to the bill, was served on H. A. Emerson, Esq., on the pretence that as he had been the Plaintiff's solicitor and agent in the petitions, he was so in the said third suit: that a commission was issued by the Supreme Court to take the Plaintiff's answer, and that in October 1837 one of the persons named in the [106] commission communicated with the Plaintiff, then residing at Bristol, and required him to put in his answer, and lent the Plaintiff a copy of the bill, being the first intimation of the suit which he had received. The bill then stated that the pretended service and other proceedings were wholly irregular, contrary to the rules of the Supreme Court, which were set out, and also to the statute for the better administration of justice in Newfoundland (5 Geo. 4, c. 67): that the commission was returned with a declaration by the commissioners that the Plaintiff had not put in, and did not intend to put in, any answer.

The bill then stated that the Defendants (the Plaintiffs in the third suit) in December 1839 obtained a rule nisi to take their bill pro confesso against the Plaintiff, and served the same on H. A. Emerson, Esq., who, without authority, took upon himself to appear on the motion as the Plaintiff's counsel and solicitor, and on the 11th of February 1840 the Supreme Court ordered the last-mentioned bill to be taken pro confesso, and referred it to the Master to compute principal and interest due to the Defendants: that on the 18th of April 1840 the Master of the Supreme Court made a rule or order, addressed to H. A. Emerson, Esq., appointing the 23d of April to take the account: that the meeting was adjourned to the 30th of April, when the Defendants' solicitor put in an account, charging the Plaintiff with sums amounting to £17,054, 12s. 9d. in respect of the partnership transactions, and £15,000 in respect of the estate of William, the father, but allowing no credits whatever to the Plaintiff: that the Master made his report, dated the 6th of June 1840, and thereby, after stating that he had not had any account between Bethel and Jordan laid before him, he found that the [107] Defendant, Bethel, received from William, the father, some time previous to his death, which occurred in the year 1821, the sum of £30,000 sterling, in trust to pay one moiety thereof to Jordan; and that Jordan died intestate, in 1830, leaving the Plaintiff Elizabeth, his widow, and two children only, namely, Joanna (married to C. Simms) and William; and he found that of the said sum of £30,000 sterling, one moiety, or £15,000, together with interest thereupon, was then due to the widow and children of Jordan by the Defendant, Bethel, to be paid in the proportions thereinafter directed; and, upon the said sum of £15,000, he computed simple interest, from the 1st of January 1822, to the 1st of June 1840, at £4 per cent. per annum, which amounted to £11,650 sterling, making, with the principal, the sum of £26,650, which he thereby reported to be due and payable to the Plaintiffs by the Defendant, Bethel, in the following proportions, namely, the sum of £8883, 6s. 8d. to the Plaintiff, Elizabeth Henderson; a like sum to the Plaintiff, C. Simms and Joanna, his wife; and a like sum to the Plaintiff, William Henderson.

The bill stated that this report was filed on the 6th of June 1840: that an order nisi to confirm was served on H. A. Emerson, Esq., and that the same was confirmed absolutely on the 10th of June 1840: that the Defendants obtained an order for a final decree nisi, but the Judges of the Supreme Court directed that as H. A. Emerson, Esq., had withdrawn from the defence of the suit, the notice of motion for the final decree should be served on the Plaintiff personally: and that, if cause should not be shewn by the then next term, the final decree should be made: that no notice of such motion was ever served upon the Plaintiff; but that in March 1841 the Plaintiff was served with a document purporting to be a subpœna to hear judgment; to which was [108] attached a notice, signed by the solicitor of the Defendants, "that the Master's report, filed on the 6th of June 1840," stood confirmed; that, on the affidavit of the service of the said document, the Supreme Court, on the 6th of June 1841, made a decree. [The bill set forth the decree, which recited the various proceedings, as having been duly prosecuted; and ordered and decreed that Bethel, the Defendant therein named, should pay to Elizabeth, the widow, £8883, 6s. 8d. sterling; to C. Simms and Joanna, his wife, £8883, 6s. 8d., and to William, the son, £8883, 6s. 8d.; and that he should also pay to the Plaintiffs their costs of the suit.]

The bill then specified many of the statements recited in the decree, which it alleged were untrue; that the third bill was in fact an original, and not an amended, bill; and that there were various other irregularities in the proceedings; the bill alleged that in December 1841, before the Plaintiff had notice of the decree, the same was inrolled; that in August 1842 the Plaintiff was applied to, by the attorney of the Defendants, for payment of the said sum of £8883, 6s. 8d. to the Defendant Elizabeth, the widow, and the like sum to the Defendant, Simms, and Joanna, his wife, with £55 costs, which was the first notice he received of the final decree; and that the Defendants had lately brought two actions against the Plaintiff in the Queen's Bench to recover the said sums.

The bill charged that the decree was wholly irregular, and ought not to be enforced, and that the same ought to be reversed by Her Majesty in Council, on the Plaintiff's appealing against the said decree, which, notwithstanding the inrolment thereof, he intended to do; that there was no personal representative of Jordan Henderson, appointed in this country, party to any of the [109] proceedings; and that there was no personal representative whatever of William, the father, a party thereto; that none but a personal representative of Jordan Henderson was entitled to, or could give a discharge for, any part of his personal estate.

The bill alleged that the whole of the estate of William, the father, had consisted of the partnership property, given up by him to Jordan Henderson and the Plaintiff, his sons, and continued by them in the business, and that the Plaintiff was only accountable for the same with, and as part of, the other partnership assets; and, if the partnership accounts were properly taken, it would appear, and was the fact, that a very large sum of money was due and owing to the Plaintiff from the estate of Jordan, in respect of advances by the Plaintiff to the concern, payments beyond his receipts, and money drawn out by Jordan, his widow and family; and that the estate of Jordan was also indebted to the Plaintiff in two sums of £547 and £538, in respect of monies which the Plaintiff had expended, at Jordan's request, in the education of his said children.

The bill prayed that an account might be taken of what was due to the Plaintiff from the estate of Jordan, and of the other debts of Jordan, and of his personal estate, and that the same might be applied in a due course of administration: that an account of the partnership transactions between the Plaintiff and Jordan might be also taken: that all necessary inquiries might be directed to ascertain the personal estate of William, the father; that so much, if any, of the said two sums of £8883, 6s. 8d. as might be found payable by the Plaintiff (he not admitting that any part thereof was so payable) might be applied and administered as part of the assets of Jordan: that the Defendants, Elizabeth, the widow, and Simms and [110] his wife, might be restrained by injunction from proceeding with the said or any other action to recover the said two sums of £8883, 6s. 8d.: and that a commission might be issued to examine witnesses in Newfoundland.

To this bill the Defendants, Elizabeth, the widow, and Simms and his wife, demurred for want of equity, want of parties and multifariousness.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Burge and Mr. Rolt, for the demurrer.

Mr. Purvis and Mr. Bagshawe, for the bill.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR [Sir James Wigram]. The Plaintiff by his bill alleges that he and Jordan, his late brother, were partners in business, one branch of which was carried on at Bristol and the other at Newfoundland: and that, in respect of that partnership, he is [111] a creditor to a large amount on the estate of Jordan; that part of the partnership property was derived from their father; and that all the property which they derived from their father formed part of the assets of the partnership. The Plaintiff also alleges that he is a creditor on the estate of Jordan, in respect of a private debt; and the bill prays such an account as would comprise all these matters which are in question between the Plaintiff and the estate of Jordan. Upon these facts a decree for an account against Gadsden, the personal representative of Jordan in England, would be of course, and perhaps also, if that had been the object of the suit, the decree for an account might have been extended to Elizabeth, the widow, as the personal representative of Jordan in Newfoundland. The widow of Jordan and Simms and his wife are, however, before the Court in the character of next of kin, and there is no pretence for making them parties in that character in a suit for the mere administration of the estate of Jordan. The relief sought against those parties is founded upon the proceedings which have taken place in the Court in Newfoundland, and the use which they are about to make of these proceedings in this country.

The Defendants, who have demurred, insist, in support of their demurrer, first, that all and every part of the matter in question on this bill was concluded by a final decree of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, dated in June 1841, made in a suit wherein the Defendants and William, the son of Jordan, were Plaintiffs, and the present Plaintiff was Defendant, except in so far as that decree is subject to be reviewed in the Privy Council; secondly, that by that decree the amount recovered was decreed to be paid to the Plaintiffs in that suit as beneficial owners, and that the same thereby ceased to be part of the estate of Jordan, subject to his debts. They [112] insist, moreover, that the proceedings appear upon the bill with sufficient certainty to sustain the decree upon the grounds advanced; and that the only party against whom the Plaintiff can proceed to recover his claim, or any part of it, is the Defendant, Gadsden.

I have read the bill carefully, and, without going minutely through the facts of the case, it is sufficient to say, for the purpose of explaining the order I am about to make, that the original bill in the Supreme Court of Newfoundland claimed an account of the same partnership dealings, of which accounts are prayed by the present bill; and also sought accounts in respect of the estate of William Henderson, the father, possessed by Bethel on account of Jordan; that the Defendant in that suit, who is the Plaintiff here, made claims by his answer to the original bill corresponding in substance with those which he makes by his bill in the present suit: that an amended bill, or a bill which the Court at least thought it right to term an amended bill, was afterwards filed by the same Plaintiffs against Bethel: that the amended bill stated and charged that Bethel was largely indebted to the estate of Jordan on the partnership accounts; but that such accounts could not be taken in consequence of Bethel absenting himself from the island and not producing the documents; and it further appears that, Bethel having absented himself from the jurisdiction, an order of the Supreme Court was made in February 1840 for taking the amended bill pro confesso; and that the amended bill was by the same order referred to the Master to compute principal and interest due to the Plaintiffs; and that the Master made his report in June 1840. [His Honor stated the report (supra, pp. 106, 107).] It appears further that the Supreme Court pronounced its final [113] decree in June 1841, and thereby, after referring to all the antecedent proceedings in the cause, decreed that Bethel Henderson should pay to the widow and two children of Jordan, who were Plaintiffs, the sum of £8883, 6s. 8d. each, and costs of the suit.

This decree, explained by the report, has in effect severed William the father's estate from the bulk of the property in question, and the partnership accounts and the private debt are not specifically the subject of adjudication. Upon this decree Elizabeth, the widow, and Joanna, the daughter of Jordan, and the husband of Joanna have brought their actions in this country.

The bill charges that the proceedings leading to this decree were irregular, that the decree itself was irregular, that a large balance was due to the Plaintiff, and that the decree ought not to be enforced, but ought to be reversed by Her Majesty in Council, on appeal, which the Plaintiff intends to bring. The bill specially alleges, as one ground of irregularity, that the report of the Master, of the 6th of June 1840, wholly omitted any notice of the account connected with the partnership, and is confined to the monies alleged to be due from the Plaintiff, in respect of the estate of William Henderson, the father; and that a large sum of money is due to the Plaintiff on the partnership accounts, as would appear if they were properly taken. On behalf of the Defendants, it has been argued that the proceedings on the face of the bill shewed that the decree concluded the whole matter, that I could not rehear that decree, and that it was final and conclusive, unless reversed by the Privy Council, the proper appellate tribunal.

Without giving any opinion upon the question whether charges, shewing that the proceedings in a foreign [114] Court were altogether null and void, as being against natural justice, would or not, upon general demurrer, have been treated as null, and have sustained the bill as to the whole of the relief prayed, I have no doubt that mere irregularity in the proceedings is insufficient for that purpose, in a case in which an appeal lies from the Colonial Court to the mother country, and there is a tribunal competent to reform the errors of the Court below, and even to suspend the execution of the decree pending the appeal, if justice requires that it should be suspended.(1)

But as the Plaintiff in this case argued only that the whole question between the parties was not concluded by the decree, and did not contend that, upon the charges in the bill, I ought to disregard the decree, I assume, for the present purpose, that I must, upon this demurrer, consider the amount due from Bethel, in respect of William the father's estate, as concluded by the decree of the Supreme Court, subject only to the appeal to the Privy Council; and that the only question I have now to decide is whether I am to consider the partnership account and the claim of Bethel in respect of the private account as having been likewise the subject of adjudication by the Supreme Court in the island, or whether those items in the general account, which certainly might have been taken in that suit, are to be considered as excepted out of the operation of the decree, under the special circumstances appearing on the Master's report, and the other proceedings stated in the bill..

In trying this question I believe I state the rule of the [115] Court correctly when I say that, where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in, and of adjudication by, a Court of competent jurisdiction, the Court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not (except under special circumstances) permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward, only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the Court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time. Those who have had occasion to investigate the subject of bills of review in this Court will not discover anything new in the proposition I have stated, so far as it may apply to proceedings in this country: and in an application to a Court of Equity in this country, for its aid against the effect of a proceeding by a Court of Equity in one of the colonies, I conceive it to be the duty of this Court to apply the same reasoning, at least in the absence of charges in the bill, shewing that a different principle ought to be applied. (See Bentinck v. Willink, 2 Hare, 1.) The observations of Lord Cottenham in the case of The Marquis of Breadalbane v. The Marquis of Chandos (2 Myl. & Cr. 732, 733) have an important bearing upon this point. I may mention also the cases of Farquharson v. Seton (5 Russ. 45), Partridge v. Usborne (Id. 195), and the judgment of Lord Eldon in Chamley v. Lord Dunsany (2 Sch. & Lef. 718), as shewing the general principle to which I have adverted. It is plain that litigation would be intermin-[116]-able if such a rule did not prevail. Now, undoubtedly the whole of the case made by this bill might have been adjudicated upon in the suit in Newfoundland, for it was of the very substance of the case there, and primâ facie, therefore, the whole is settled. The question then is whether the special circumstances appearing upon the face of this bill are sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the general rule.

Now, what are those circumstances? One circumstance relied upon was that, by the decree of the Colonial Court of the 11th of February 1840, the amended bill only was taken pro confesso. The amended bill, it appears, is not, as in this Court, the original bill amended and written upon, so that the amended bill wholly supersedes and comes in the place of the original bill; but the amendments are upon a distinct record.

The bill in this cause charges that the last bill was in fact and substance an original bill, and addressed to different Judges, and that it was not an amended bill; this charge I might have been bound to take as a fact if the Plaintiff had not, by settling out the amended bill and the final decree, given me an opportunity of judging in what sense only the charge is true. I find that the amended bill proceeds upon and refers to the original bill, and to the answer of the Defendant thereto, and the final decree of the Court recites the whole of the proceedings anterior to the final decree, beginning with the original bill. It is impossible, therefore, to contend with effect that the amended bill, though in a sense distinct from the original bill, as being written upon other paper, leaving the first bill still on the record, was not a continuance of the pleadings in one and the same cause, and this, critically considered, is not inconsistent with the charge in the bill which I have just read.

[117] Another objection was the absence or the irregularity of service upon the Plaintiff. Although it is not necessary that I should go into the question respecting the notice, I ought not to disregard the fact that the Plaintiff represents that he had on different occasions actual notice of the suit, and of the relief which was sought against him by it, however irregularly that notice might have been communicated; and if the Plaintiff thought that he might safely disregard the proceedings, and abstain from interposing any defence, on the ground of their irregularity, I think I ought to consider him as having relied on the strength of his case for establishing that irregularity by a complaint in the same jurisdiction, or in the Court of Appeal, and not to have relied on being therefore able to set the decree of the Supreme Court at defiance, even while it remained unreversed.

I may here recur to the observation that the omission of the Master to take the partnership accounts is stated in the bill to be an error in the decree, forming one ground for appeal to the Privy Council.

The point upon which I have had most difficulty in satisfying myself is this: if the decree of the Supreme Court is conclusive upon one party it must, I conceive, be conclusive upon both; and, if not conclusive upon both, it ought to be conclusive upon neither. Now the amended bill alleged that the Plaintiffs there were creditors upon the partnership account, but that the accounts of the partnership cannot be taken, owing to the manner in which the Defendant in that suit had acted. These allegations were established as facts, by the effect of the order for taking the bill pro confesso; and it appeared to me during the argument that the present Defendants (the Plaintiffs in Newfoundland) might have a [118] right to say that the accounts not taken by the Master were open for their benefit, by reason that it was the conduct of the Defendant alone which had prevented those accounts from being taken. But that, I think, is not a correct view of the case. The decree was to compute what was due to the Plaintiffs for principal and interest; that is, upon all the accounts in question in the pleadings, including the partnership and private account. The Plaintiffs were not compelled to take such a decree, but, having taken it, they are bound by the consequences, and must be taken to have waived any disadvantage to themselves which would result from it.

The conclusion to which I must come, in a case where relief is sought in this Court in consequence of errors and irregularities in the decree of a Colonial Court, and an appeal lies from that decree to the appellate jurisdiction in this kingdom, is to allow the demurrer. I do not say that my conclusion would have been the same if the proceedings which were impeached had taken place in a foreign Court, from which there was no appeal to any superior jurisdiction which a Court of Equity in this country could regard as certain to administer justice in the case. I express no opinion on that point.

Demurrer allowed, with liberty to amend.

Dec. 18. The bill was not amended; and this day, on the motion of the Defendants, was ordered to be dismissed.

[119] HUMBLE v. SHORE. Dec. 23, 1842.

[See the judgment more fully reported, 1 H. & M. 550 (n.). Overruled, In re Palmer, [1893], 3 Ch. 369; In re Allan [1903], 1 Ch. 276, and cases there cited.]

A suit was instituted to administer and ascertain the residue of an estate, and one of the residuary legatees, after the bill was filed, and before he was served with the subpœna to appear and answer, assigned his share: the assignee was held to be a necessary party to the suit.

In an administration suit, a party interested in the residue, by his answer, averred that, according to his information and belief, the suit was collusive as between the Plaintiffs and the executors and other parties: there being no replication, the allegation was taken as proof of the fact; and it was held that the fact was no objection to the making of the decree.

The Plaintiffs were entitled, under the will of Lydia Shore, to certain residuary shares in her real and personal estate, and the bill was filed against the executors and trustees, and the other parties interested in the residuary estate of the testatrix, to carry into execution the trusts of the will. The cause coming on for hearing,

Mr. Temple and Mr. Freeling, for one of the residuary legatees, objected that he had executed an assignment of his share in the residuary estate after the filing of the bill, but before he had been served with the subpœna, and that the assignee was a necessary party to the suit: Pigott v. Nower (3 Swans. 529, n.).

Mr. Rolt, for the Plaintiffs, submitted that an assignee pendente lite would be bound by the proceedings in the cause, and that the absence of the assignee was not therefore any ground for refusing the usual decree: Landon v. Morris (5 Sim. 262).

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR allowed the objection and the cause stood over.

May 13, 1843. The Plaintiffs filed their supplemental bill against the assignee of the residuary share, seeking the like relief against the Defendant as was prayed by the original bill. The Defendant admitted the will, but said he was informed and believed that the suit was collusive as be-[120]-tween the Plaintiffs and the executors and other parties; and that he had instituted another suit against the executors, impeaching their conduct with respect to particular matters which did not form the subject of any special charge in this suit. The Plaintiffs did not reply to this answer. At the hearing,

Mr. Romilly and Mr. Rolt said that the allegation that the Defendant was "informed and believed" the Plaintiffs and Defendants colluded was no averment of the fact; and if it were true, the fact was wholly unimportant. The Plaintiffs and the other residuary legatees (except the Defendant to the supplemental bill and his assignor) desired that the accounts should be taken, and the trusts executed in this suit: in that sense a great part of the suits in this Court were collusive: any special inquiries which the objecting Defendants could suggest might be made in the decree.

Mr. Daniel, for the executors, offered to submit to any inquiries with respect to that, in my judgment, this appeal fails because upon its proper construction the statute does not grant the right asserted by the applicant. I only desire to add that in all relevant respects I adopt the most carefully argued and lucid judgment of the deputy judge.

Appeal dismissed with costs. Leave to appeal to House of Lords.

A written contract between a company marketing and selling concrete and L., which declared L. to be an independent contractor, provided, inter alia, that for payment at mileage rates L. at his own expense would carry concrete for the company and make available throughout the contract period a vehicle bought by him from a finance organisation associated with the company. He was to obtain an A carriers' licence and was to maintain, repair and insure the vehicle (which was to be painted in the company's colours) and an attached mixing unit belonging to the company, and to drive the vehicle himself, but might with the company's consent hire a competent driver if he should be unable to drive at any time. L. was obliged to wear the company's uniform and to comply with the company's rules and was prohibited from operating as a carrier of goods except under the contract. The company had control over major repairs to the vehicle and power to ensure that L.'s accounts were prepared by an accountant in a form approved by the company.

The Minister of Pensions and National Insurance determined that L. was within the class of employed persons under section 1 (2) of the National Insurance Act, 1965,[1] as being an "employed person" under contract of service with the company under section 3 (a).

On appeal, on the contentions that the contract was not a contract of service, and that L. was an independent contractor:—

Held, allowing the appeal, (1) that the inference that parties under a contract were master and servant or otherwise was a conclusion of law dependent on the rights conferred and duties imposed by the contract and if the contractual rights and duties created the relationship of master and servant, a declaration by the parties that the relationship was otherwise was irrelevant (post, pp. 512G—513A).

(2) That a contract of service existed if (a) the servant agreed in consideration of a wage or other remuneration to provide his own work and skill in the performance of some service for his master, (b) the servant agreed expressly or impliedly that, in performance of the service he would be subject to the control of the other party sufficiently to make him the master, and (c) the other provisions of the contract were consistent with its being a contract of service (post, p. 515C–D); but that an obligation to do work subject to the other party's control was not invariably a sufficient condition of a contract of service, and if the provisions of the contract as a whole were inconsistent with the contract being a contract of service, it was some other kind of contract and the person doing the work was not a servant (post, p. 517A); that where express provision was not made for one party to have the right of control, the question where it resided was to be answered by implication (post, p. 516A); and that since the common law test of the power of control for determining whether the relationship of master and servant existed was not restricted to the power of control over the manner of performing service but was wide enough to take account of investment and loss (post, p. 522F), in determining whether a business was carried on by a person for himself or for another it was relevant to consider who owned the assets or bore the financial risk (post, p. 520G—521A).

READY MIXED CONCRETE (SOUTH EAST) LTD. v. MINISTER OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL INSURANCE

APPEAL against a decision of the Minister of Pensions and National Insurance.

The following case was stated by the Minister of Social Security (formerly the Minister of Pensions and National Insurance) under section 65 of the National Insurance Act, 1965 and R.S.C. Ord. 111.

1. On November 15, 1965, a company, Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd., applied for determination by the Minister under section 64 of the National Insurance Act, 1965, of the question whether Thomas Henry Latimer was by virtue of a contract between himself and the company dated May 15, 1965, an employed or self-employed person for the purposes of the National Insurance Act, 1965, during the week commencing November 8, 1965: and also whether the company was liable for payment of flat rate contributions in respect of Mr. Latimer for the purposes of section 3 of the Act, during that week.

2. The Minister appointed Mr. M. W. M. Osmond, Barrister-at-Law and member of the Legal Department of the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance to hold an inquiry into questions arising on the application and to report to her thereon. Mr. Osmond accordingly held an inquiry in London on January 11 and 12, 1966, and both Mr. Latimer and the company were represented at the inquiry by Mr. G. Slynn, of counsel.

3. Subject to all questions of relevance and admissibility the Minister accepted the evidence led at the inquiry as establishing the following facts.

Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd. v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance

(1) Ready Mixed Concrete (United Kingdom) Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "Ready Mixed"), carried on the business of making and selling ready mixed concrete and similar materials, and operated through a number of wholly or partly owned subsidiary companies, one of which was the company.

(2) The company was incorporated in 1963 and operated at eight plants at various places in the South East of England one such plant being at Crayford, Kent.

(3) It was, and always had been, the policy of the Ready Mixed Group that the business of making and selling concrete should be carried on as far as possible separately from the business of delivering the concrete to customers, and in furtherance of that policy, on commencing trading some ten years ago, Ready Mixed entered into a contract for the delivery of concrete with an independent company of haulage contractors. In 1959, being dissatisfied with the operations of the independent company, Ready Mixed determined the contract and introduced a scheme of delivery by drivers (hereinafter referred to as "owner-drivers") working under contracts similar to, but not identical with, a form of agreement known as agreement "D" (a copy whereof was annexed to the case). It was considered that not only would the scheme further the policy of keeping the making and selling of concrete separate from its delivery, but that the scheme would benefit the Ready Mixed Group by stimulating speedy and efficient cartage, the maintenance of trucks in good condition, and the careful driving thereof, and would benefit the owner-driver by giving him an incentive to work for a higher return without abusing the vehicle in the way which often happened if an employee was given a bonus scheme related to the use of his employer's vehicle.

(4) In a letter dated September 6, 1962, addressed to Ready Mixed, the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance expressed the opinion that agreements in the form of agreement "D," being one of a series of agreements by which the owner-driver scheme was given legal effect, did not constitute contracts of service between members of the Ready Mixed Group and owner-drivers, who were accordingly to be regarded as self-employed persons for the purposes of the National Insurance Act, 1946.

(5) It was, and always had been, since the introduction of the owner-driver scheme in 1959, the intention both of the Ready Mixed Group and of the owner-drivers that the latter should be treated as independent contractors, and not servants of member companies of the Ready Mixed Group. Some owner-drivers had, in addition to delivering concrete in pursuance of contract with such members, carried on other remunerative occupations. A few owner-drivers had an interest in more than one truck, themselves employing drivers to work for them, and the company was willing to allow suitable owner-drivers to own more than one truck.

(6) Notices under the Contracts of Employment Act, 1963, were not issued to owner-drivers. Income Tax was paid by owner-drivers under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Contributions were paid by owner-drivers as self-employed persons under the National Insurance Act, 1946, until March, 1965, when the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance requested the payment of contributions by and in respect of them as employed persons.

(7) Mr. Latimer became employed under a contract of service by a member of the Ready Mixed Group in 1958 as a yardman batcher at Northfleet. In 1960 he was transferred to the plant at Crayford as a batcher. In 1963 he entered into a contract with the company whereby he agreed to collect, carry and deliver concrete as an owner-driver for two years. At the same time he entered into a hire purchase agreement relating to a Leyland lorry. He finished paying for that in about one year, and the vehicle then became his property. On May 15, 1965, he entered into a contract (hereinafter referred to as "the contract") with the company whereby he agreed to collect, carry and deliver concrete as an owner-driver for a further period of five years. (A copy of the contract was annexed to the case.†)

On June 17, 1965, he entered into a hire purchase agreement with Readymix Finance Ltd. whereby in place of his other vehicle which he sold he agreed to purchase a Leyland vehicle, EUW 152 C, by means of 48 consecutive monthly instalments of £62 19s. 6d., the first instalment being payable on July 1, 1965.

(8) From May 15, 1965, Mr. Latimer collected, carried and delivered concrete at and from the company's plant at Crayford and was paid an allowance in accordance with the contract. In particular the company had made the payments in respect of earnings to Mr. Latimer required by clause 20 of the contract. Such payments were estimated to amount to approximately £4,500 a year. For the years ending June 30, 1964 and June 30, 1965, Mr. Latimer received £4,204 and £4,512 respectively from the company under the contract between them then in force. After the payment of all expenses the net amount of remuneration remaining in Mr. Latimer's hands for the two years was £3,327 and £2,004 respectively.

(9) In November 1965, 709 persons were employed as owner-drivers under contracts with the Ready Mixed Group, 58 persons were so employed with the company, and eight persons in addition to Mr. Latimer were so employed at the company's Crayford plant.

(10) The method of collecting, carrying and delivering concrete in operation at the Crayford plant was as follows. Loading commenced each day at a time fixed by the plant manager and proceeded in accordance with a system organised by the nine owner-drivers whereby the truck which was loaded with concrete first on one day was loaded last the next day and so on in rotation. Owner-drivers awaited the announcement by loudspeaker of their turn for loading in a room known as the mess room. Before leaving the plant with a load of concrete each driver obtained from the ticket office four tickets upon which appeared such details as the quantity and quality of the concrete or other material to be delivered, its destination and the time of loading. One ticket was retained in the office and one by the owner-driver: the other two were signed by the customer as a receipt for the load, one being then retained by the owner-driver and the other being returned to the office. Having delivered his load, the owner-driver returned to the plant to collect a further load and so on throughout the day. Owner-drivers did not work set hours, and there were no fixed meal breaks. While on the plant premises owner-drivers were expected to comply with, and did comply with, directions given on behalf of the company for the purposes of securing an orderly and safe system of loading, parking and driving of the vehicles. No instructions were given on behalf of the company to owner-drivers concerning the method of driving trucks from the plant to the place of delivery, and in particular owner-drivers were not instructed as to the routes which they were to follow. No instructions were given on behalf of the company to owner-drivers as to how to discharge the concrete at the delivery site. While on the delivery site owner-drivers complied with instructions of the site foreman concerning the discharge.

(11) Holidays were taken by nine owner-drivers employed at the company's Crayford plant on dates arranged between themselves so as to ensure as far as possible that no more than one owner-driver was on holiday at any one time.

(12) A relief truck driver was employed by the nine owner-drivers who carried from the company's Crayford plant with the knowledge and approval of the company. The relief driver was paid a wage of £25 a week out of funds provided equally by the owner-drivers. The relief driver was employed to take over the operation of any vehicle whose regular owner-driver was absent through sickness or being on holiday or any other reason. The relief driver received his wage each week irrespective of whether or not he had been required to take over the operation of a vehicle in that week.

(13) Three or four drivers were employed by the company under contracts of service during the months of March to September in each year when the demand for and production of concrete was high. Those drivers had fixed hours of work from 8 a.m. until 5.30 p.m. and the length and time of their holidays was controlled by the company. They were paid at the rate of 5s. 11d. per hour, with an addition for overtime. An average weekly wage for such an employee was between £18 and £20. They paid income tax by means of P.A.Y.E. and contributions as employed persons were paid by and in respect of them under the National Insurance Act. They were not responsible for the maintenance or running costs of the trucks. If not occupied during working hours in delivering concrete they were, unlike owner-drivers, required to perform other tasks about the plant. They were instructed by the plant manager as to the routes which they were to follow between the plant and delivery site.

(14) Owner-drivers who carried from the company's Crayford plant were free to purchase fuel for their trucks either from a pump on the plant premises or from any supplier elsewhere. It was not the practice of Mr. Latimer to purchase fuel from the plant pump. The drivers employed by the company were required to draw fuel from the plant pump; owner-drivers could use truck maintenance facilities available at the plant, or if they preferred make use of any garage of their choice. If owner-drivers used the company's maintenance facilities they were charged for all the work done to their vehicles.

(15) No rules, regulations or requirements of the kind envisaged by clause 14 (b) of the schedule to the contract had been issued by the company, other than for securing orderly and safe working at the plant. One such rule issued recently prohibited the presence of children on the plant premises.

(16) If any person acting on behalf of the company had sought to instruct Mr. Latimer how to deliver concrete or how to drive his truck, Mr. Latimer would have told that person to mind his own business. No such person so instructed Mr. Latimer.

1967

(17) Mr. Latimer caused accounts to be prepared by a professional accountant as required by clause 25 of the contract. Such accounts were headed "T. H. Latimer, Esq., Haulage Contractor, Ready Mixed Concrete, 13 Morgan Drive, Stone, Kent."

(18) Mr. Latimer was, and had been during the week commencing November 8, 1965, the holder of an "A" licence issued for the purposes of section 166 (2) of the Road Traffic Act, 1960.

(19) The cost of the concrete mixing or agitating unit, referred to in the contract as "the equipment" was £2,000 or thereabouts.

(20) Clause 6 of the schedule to the contract had never been operated.

4. It was contended on behalf of Mr. Latimer and the company that the contract between the parties was not one of service. It was submitted:

(1) in relation to clauses, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27 and 32 of the schedule to the contract that they were inconsistent with the master/servant relationship, and, in particular, that the obligation to purchase, maintain, licence and insure the vehicle would, though sitting lightly upon an independent contractor, be impositions upon a servant, and further that while clauses of that nature are not usually to be found in "independent contractor" contracts, they were implied.

(2) in relation to clauses 5, 6, 9, 14, 17, 25, 26, 29 and 31 of the schedule: (a) That if the clauses were construed, as they should be, in the context of the contract as a whole, their true meaning was not inconsistent with the relationship of principal and independent contractor. In particular the obligations to carry out orders, rules, regulations or requirements (whether or not in terms qualified by the word "reasonable") could only be obligations to obey orders etc. which might properly have been given by a principal to an independent contractor, and although the obligations to obey were expressed to exist at all times when operating the truck, the words "at all times" had to be interpreted as limited to those times when it would have been proper for a principal to give an order to a sub-contractor. (b) That if, contrary to the company's and Mr. Latimer's contention, a wide degree of control was envisaged by the working of the contract, the evidence showed such control was not exercised. As regarded collecting and delivering the only control exercised by the company and the customer respectively was that which must of necessity be exercised over servant and independent contractor alike, to ensure safe and orderly working. As to carrying, no control was exercised at all, and any attempt to exercise control would have been bitterly resented by Mr. Latimer in particular, and owner-drivers in general, as being an interference with the manner in which he conducted his own business and looked after his own property. (c) That the kind of control which was exercised in fact was the only kind which the company was entitled under the contract to exercise. (d) That the use of the words "as if he were an employee" in clause 14 (e) of the contract emphasised that in truth Mr. Latimer was not a servant. The provision enjoined Mr. Latimer to obey orders of the kind, but only of the kind, which might properly be given to an independent contractor as faithfully and fully as if he were an employee. (e) That even if the clauses did bear their prima facie meaning and entitled the company to exercise a stringent control over Mr. Latimer, control was neither the only nor the conclusive test. It was merely one factor among many to be considered.

(3) in relation to clauses 10, 11, 12 and 13 which relate to Mr. Latimer's right to employ, with the company's consent, a deputy driver, that they were wholly inconsistent with the master/servant relationship.

(4) In relation to clauses 7 and 15, that they merely imposed upon Mr. Latimer a contractual obligation to comply with certain statutory requirements.

(5) In relation to clause 30, which declared Mr. Latimer to be an independent contractor that the clause conclusively determined the status of the parties to the contract as between themselves and that such a declaration as to status was binding upon the Minister unless it were shown that the contract as a whole was a sham, entered into with the deliberate intention of deceiving third parties, and this could not be shown. If clause 30 was not decisive of the issue, on a proper construction of the whole contract including clause 30, alternatively of the remaining clauses, the contract was one for services and not of service. Alternatively if the Minister was entitled to go behind clause 30, all the facts and circumstances should have been looked at, including the intention and behaviour of the parties.

5. The Minister, having regard to the fact that the contract had been reduced to writing, considered as irrelevant so much of the evidence given at the inquiry as related:

Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd. v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance

(1) to the Ministry's informal expression of opinion as to the nature of a contract between members of the Ready Mixed Group and owner-drivers, and generally to the evolution of the contract;

(2) to the opinions professed by the solicitor employed by Ready Mixed, the General Manager of the company, and by Mr. Latimer as to the true meaning and effect of the contract and to any action which had been or might have been taken in reliance upon any such opinions;

(3) to the intentions of the company and of Mr. Latimer as to the relationship to be created inter se by the contract;

(4) to the way in which statutory provisions other than the National Insurance Act were regarded as applying to Mr. Latimer and other owner-drivers; and, accordingly, for the purpose of arriving at her decision the Minister disregarded the following: (i) Correspondence passing on various dates in July, August and September, 1962, between Ready Mixed Concrete (United Kingdom) Ltd. and the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance concerning the classification of owner-drivers for the purpose of the National Insurance Act; (ii) Copy form of agreement, known as agreement "D" between the company and an owner-driver; (iii) All in paragraph 3 (4) of this case; (iv) All in the first sentence of paragraph 3 (5) of this case; (v) All in paragraph 3 (6) of this case; (vi) All in paragraph 3 (16) of this case.

6. The Minister considered that she could have regard to the remaining facts set out in paragraph 3 of the case, as they showed the surrounding circumstances in which the contract came to be made.

7. The Minister was of the opinion that the contention put forward on behalf of Mr. Latimer and the company that the contract was not a contract of service was wrong, and, in particular, rejected the following submissions referred to in paragraph 4 of this case; namely that contained in sub-paragraph (1), sub-paragraph (2) (a), sub-paragraph (2) (c), sub-paragraph (2) (d), sub-paragraph (3) and sub-paragraph (5) of paragraph 4.

8. Accordingly, the Minister decided that: (a) Thomas Henry Latimer of 13, Morgan Drive, Horns Cross, Stone, near Greenhithe, Kent, was included in the class of employed persons for the purposes of the National Insurance Act, 1965, during the week commencing Monday, November 8, 1965; and (b) the company, as the employer of the said Thomas Henry Latimer, was liable to pay a flat rate contribution in respect of him under section 3 (b) of the said Act for the said week.

REFERENCE by the Minister of Social Security.

The Minister, by notice of motion in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 111, referred to the court for an order a question as to the construction of a written contract dated December 6, 1965, between Arthur William Bezer and Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd., namely whether his employment was under a contract of service for the purposes of section 1 (2) (a) of the National Insurance Act, 1965. A case was stated by the Minister. The facts do not call for report.

The three cases were listed and heard together. In each case the question was whether the contract was a contract of service. The parties were agreed that, if the contract between the company and Latimer was not a contract of service, the contracts of King and Bezer respectively were not contracts of service.

Cur. adv. vult.

December 8. MACKENNA J. read the following judgment. The first of these three cases is an appeal against a decision of the Minister of Pensions and National Insurance, now the Minister of Social Security, by which she determined that Thomas Henry Latimer was included in the class of employed persons for the purposes of the National Insurance Act, 1965, during the week commencing November 8, 1965, and that Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd. were his employers and liable under section 3 (b) of the Act to pay in respect of him a flat rate contribution for that week. The company required the Minister to state a case setting forth her decision and the facts on which it was based, which she has done, and that case comes before me on appeal.

An employed person means for the purposes of the Act one employed under a contract of service, and the question raised by the appeal is whether Latimer was employed under such a contract. The Minister has found that he was; the company say that he was not.

The company are one of the Ready Mixed Group and are engaged in the business of making and selling concrete. On May 15, 1965, Latimer and the company entered into a written contract which was in force at the material time. The circumstances preceding the making of that contract were described in the case.

Latimer began to work for the company in 1958 as a yardman batcher. In that capacity he served them first at Northfleet and later at Crayford, two of the eight plants which they operated. At the time when he entered their service they delivered the concrete to their customers through an independent company of haulage contractors. In 1959, being dissatisfied with the operations of these contractors, they determined their contract with them, and introduced a scheme of delivery by owner-drivers. It is stated in the case that the provisions of the company's contract with the owner-drivers, when the scheme was introduced, were similar to those of the contract in force at the material time, to which I shall come presently, though not identical with them. The case also states that it is, and always has been, the policy of the group "that the business of making and selling concrete should be carried on as far as possible separately from the business of delivering the concrete to the customers," and that the owner-driver scheme was introduced to further that policy, in the belief that it would stimulate > "speedy and efficient cartage, the maintenance of trucks in good condition, and the careful driving thereof, and would benefit the owner-driver by giving him an incentive to work for a higher return without abusing the vehicle in the way which often happens if an employee is given a bonus scheme related to the use of his employer's vehicle."

This was in 1959. In 1963 Latimer ceased to be employed as a batcher and agreed to work for the company as an owner-driver. He entered into a contract for the carriage of concrete, presumably in the form used at the inception of the scheme, and also into a hire-purchase contract relating to a Leyland lorry. The first-mentioned contract continued for two years, during which time Latimer became the owner of the lorry. At the end of the two years the contract was determined, and the Leyland lorry was sold. On May 15, 1965, he entered into a new contract with the company, and, a month later, into a hire-purchase contract relating to another vehicle, a new Leyland, EUW 152 C. The hire-purchase company are Ready Mixed Finance Ltd. They are, as their name indicates, one of the group.

There are other facts which I must mention, but before doing so it is convenient that I should summarise the provisions of the new contract between the company and Latimer. The commencement date was June 1, 1965, and the termination date April 30, 1970. The company are to procure that the hire-purchase company will offer to sell the Leyland to Latimer on credit terms, painted in colours and with distinguishing signs selected by the company, and adapted to carry the company's concrete-mixing unit, fleet number 52140, which the company will fix to the Leyland, and he is to buy the Leyland from the hire-purchase company. The contract refers to the Leyland as "the vehicle," and to the Leyland with the mixing unit attached as "the truck," and I shall use these descriptions. If required to do so he must at his expense instal radio equipment on the vehicle. He is to procure an "A" contract licence under the Road Traffic Act, 1960, covering the use of the truck.

1967

Clause 5 is in these terms:

> "The owner-driver shall at all times of the day or night during the term of this agreement (excepting only in accordance with the terms hereof) make available the truck to the company for the purpose of collecting carrying and delivering the materials used for or in connection with the business of the company (not being a business of carrying or arranging for the carriage of goods) whenever and wherever so required by the company whether such requirement is notified to the owner-driver or to his servants or agents and shall duly and promptly collect carry and deliver such quantity or quantities of the materials as and when required in the manner at the time and to the destination directed by the company, and it is further provided that the truck shall be used exclusively for the purposes set out in this agreement and for no other purpose. In furtherance of the terms of this clause the owner-driver shall if so required by the company at his own expense ensure that the company is able to contact him by telephone at his usual residence or residences."

The company can call on him to make the truck available for delivering the materials of any other group company, subject to his obtaining a "B" licence, which he must in that case try to get. He must comply with the conditions of his licences and obey any other rules or regulations, parliamentary, local or parochial. Under clause 10 he may, with the company's consent and subject to clause 12, appoint a competent driver to operate the truck in his place. He must pay this driver National Joint Council wages or better, and, if the company are dissatisfied with the driver, he must provide another. Clause 12 is in these terms:

A "Notwithstanding the provisions of clause 10 of this schedule the company shall be entitled to require the owner-driver himself to operate the truck on every or any day up to the maximum number of hours permitted under the provisions of section 73 of the Road Traffic Act, 1960, or any statutory amendment or re-enactment thereof and the owner-driver shall comply with such requirement unless he shall B have a reason for not so doing which would have been valid had he been the employed driver of the company and shall have notified the company in advance of such reason and shall be able to produce and upon the request of the company in fact produce evidence to substantiate the same. The owner-driver shall not himself be obliged to operate the truck during such holiday times and periods (not extending for more than two weeks in any calendar year) as have been C agreed by the company in writing."

I read clauses 10 and 12 to mean that Latimer must drive himself if required to do so by the company, unless he has an excuse which would be valid in the case of a servant.

He must not operate as a haulier or carrier of goods except D under the contract. If he fails to operate the truck himself or to cause another driver to do so, the company may appoint a driver on his behalf, and he must pay that driver's wages, and that driver shall be deemed to be in his employment.

He must wear the company's uniform, complying with all the company's rules, regulations or requirements (clause 14 (b)), carry E out all reasonable orders from any competent servant of the company "as if he were an employee of the company," and by his conduct and appearance "including the speed and manner in which he operates the truck" use his best endeavours to further the good name of the company. He must not alter the truck without the company's consent. He must keep it freshly painted F in the colours and with the signs directed by the company. He must keep it washed, cleansed, oiled, greased, maintained and in good and substantial repair. This obligation extends to the company's mixing unit, whose worn parts he must, with certain exceptions, renew if the need for renewal is due to fair wear and tear. All these things are to be done at his expense. Where the G repairs would cost more than £50 or take more than a day to execute, the company may require the work to be done by a named group company or by someone else of the company's choice. The company may specify any repair work which they think should be done, and he must do it.

For all these services he is to be paid 8s. 6d. per cubic yard for the first radial mile and 1s. 1d. per cubic yard for each mile thereafter. Provision is made for minimum annual earnings: £1,500 x $\frac{280-Y}{280}$, where Y represents the number of days in excess of 85 when the truck and a driver were not available for at least four hours. Those rates are to be revised at the request of either party if there is any alteration in the National Joint Council's rates of wages or in the cost of fuel, or at his request "in the event of any substantial reduction in the profitability of the agreement to the owner-driver by reason of any levy or tax imposed by Parliament on carriers of goods by road transport generally."

He is to pay all the running costs. He may not charge the vehicle or the mixing unit or make them subject to any lien except under the hire-purchase contract. The company, if they wish, may pay the hire-purchase instalments direct, and debit them to him. If he does not pay his bills, the company may pay them for him. He must have his accounts prepared in a form and by an accountant approved by the company. If any provision is made in the account, he must set it aside in a manner approved by the company.

The company are to insure the vehicle in his name and the mixing unit in his or theirs, in each case in such form and for such amounts as they think fit but at his expense, debiting his account with the charges which he authorises them to pay. He must spend any money he receives under these policies in repairing or replacing the insured property. He must, if required to do so, assign to the company any rights he may have under the policies.

The company are given the right to acquire the vehicle on the expiration or determination of the contract.

Either party may determine the contract by notice after April 30, 1970. Before that date the company may determine it by 28 days' notice if he has been incapacitated for 60 days, and summarily if (i) he commits a breach of any term of the contract, or (ii) is guilty of conduct tending to bring the company into disrepute, or (iii) commits an act of bankruptcy, etc., or (iv) if he, "having been warned by the company of any grounds for dissatisfaction it may have in respect of the operation of the truck shall not within a reasonable time have removed the cause of such dissatisfaction."

Clause 30 of the contract declares him to be an independent contractor.

It may be stated here that whether the relation between the parties to the contract is that of master and servant or otherwise is a conclusion of law dependent upon the rights conferred and the duties imposed by the contract. If these are such that the relation is that of master and servant, it is irrelevant that the parties have declared it to be something else. I do not say that a declaration of this kind is always necessarily ineffective. If it were doubtful what rights and duties the parties wished to provide for, a declaration of this kind might help in resolving the doubt and fixing them in the sense required to give effect to that intention.

So much for the contract between the company and Latimer.

There is nothing unusual in the provisions of the hire-purchase contract. The cash price of the vehicle is £2,380 11s. 6d.; the charges are £642 3s. 6d.; and the money is payable by 48 monthly instalments of £62 19s. 6d. The hire-purchase company are given the right to determine the contract if these instalments are not paid and in certain other events. Latimer is described in the contract as a "contractor self employed."

The Minister has found a number of facts which she has stated in the case.

(a) Payments to Latimer under the previous agreement for the year ended June 30, 1964, were £4,204. After the payment of all his expenses he was left with £3,327. The corresponding figures for the year ended June 30, 1965, were £4,512 and £2,004. (b) In November, 1965, the group employed 709 persons as owner-drivers, of whom nine, including Latimer, were employed at the company's Crayford plant. (c) Loading at that plant begins at a time fixed by the plant manager. The nine owner-drivers have established a system under which the truck first loaded today will be last loaded tomorrow and so on in rotation. The owner-driver waits in a mess room until a loudspeaker calls him for loading. When he has delivered his load he returns to collect another, and so on through the day. He does not work set hours and has no fixed meal break. While on the plant premises he is expected to comply with directions given on the company's behalf to secure an orderly and safe system of loading, parking and driving, and he does comply with them. The company give no instructions to owner-drivers about the method of driving the trucks from the plant to the place of delivery or of discharging the concrete, and do not tell them what routes to take. While on the delivery site they follow the site foreman's instructions about discharge. (d) The nine owner-drivers arrange the dates of their holidays so as to ensure as far as possible that no more than one driver is on holiday at any one time. With the knowledge and approval of the company they employ between them a single relief driver, contributing equally to his weekly wage of £25. He takes over the operation of any vehicle whose regular owner-driver is absent through sickness, or because he is on holiday, or for any other reason. (e) During the busy season the company employ three or four additional drivers under contracts of service. Those men work fixed hours and are paid at the hourly rate of 5s. 11d. Their wages (with overtime at a higher rate) average between £18 and £20 a week. They are not responsible for the maintenance or running costs of the trucks they drive. When not engaged in delivering concrete, they, unlike the owner-drivers, do other jobs. They are told what routes to take. (f) The owner-drivers can, if they wish, buy their petrol from a pump on the plant premises. Latimer does not. The drivers mentioned in (e) must take their supplies from the pump. Owner-drivers are allowed to use the company's maintenance facilities, but they are charged for all work done to their vehicles. (g) The company have made no "rules, regulations or requirements" under clause 14 (b) of the schedule except for securing orderly and safe working at the plant. (h) If anyone acting for the company sought to instruct Latimer how to deliver concrete or how to drive his truck, he would tell that person to mind his own business. Nobody has sought to instruct him. (i) The accounts prepared for him by his accountant in accordance with the requirements of the contract are headed "T. H. Latimer, Esq., Haulage Contractor, Ready Mixed Concrete, 13 Morgan Drive, Stone, Kent." (j) Latimer holds an "A" licence. (k) The cost of the mixing unit is £2,000. (l) Latimer has not been required to deliver materials for other group companies. (m) In 1962 the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance expressed the opinion that the form of contract then used by the company was not one of service. (Many of the provisions of the later form of contract are not present in the earlier.) Owner-drivers have been treated under other Acts (including the National Insurance Act, 1946) as self-employed persons. (n) It is, and always has been since the introduction of the owner-driver scheme in 1959, the intention both of the Ready Mixed Group and of the owner-drivers that the latter should be treated as independent contractors, and not servants of member companies of the Ready Mixed Group.

1967

MacKenna J.

A B C D E F G

It is stated in the case that the Minister disregarded the facts summarised in (h), (m) and (n). In my opinion this was rightly done. (h) is irrelevant: it is the right of control that matters, not its exercise. As to (n), I have already said that whether the relation between the parties to a contract is that of master and servant is a conclusion of law dependent upon the provisions of the contract. If the rights conferred and the duties imposed by the contract are such that the relation is that of master and servant, it is irrelevant that the parties who made the contract would have preferred a different conclusion. As to (m), opinions expressed by Ministries on the question which I have to decide, and any action taken on those opinions, are also irrelevant unless they create an estoppel in the company's favour, and it is not argued that they do.

I must now consider what is meant by a contract of service.

A contract of service exists if these three conditions are fulfilled. (i) The servant agrees that, in consideration of a wage or other remuneration, he will provide his own work and skill in the performance of some service for his master. (ii) He agrees, expressly or impliedly, that in the performance of that service he will be subject to the other's control in a sufficient degree to make that other master. (iii) The other provisions of the contract are consistent with its being a contract of service.

I need say little about (i) and (ii).

As to (i). There must be a wage or other remuneration. Otherwise there will be no consideration, and without consideration no contract of any kind. The servant must be obliged to provide his own work and skill. Freedom to do a job either by one's own hands or by another's is inconsistent with a contract of service, though a limited or occasional power of delegation may not be: see Atiyah's Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts (1967) pp. 59 to 61 and the cases cited by him.

As to (ii). Control includes the power of deciding the thing to be done, the way in which it shall be done, the means to be employed in doing it, the time when and the place where it shall be done. All these aspects of control must be considered in deciding whether the right exists in a sufficient degree to make one party the master and the other his servant. The right need not be unrestricted.

MacKenna J.

To find where the right resides one must look first to the express terms of the contract, and if they deal fully with the matter one may look no further. If the contract does not expressly provide which party shall have the right, the question must be answered in the ordinary way by implication.

The third and negative condition is for my purpose the important one, and I shall try with the help of five examples to explain what I mean by provisions inconsistent with the nature of a contract of service.

(i) A contract obliges one party to build for the other, providing at his own expense the necessary plant and materials. This is not a contract of service, even though the builder may be obliged to use his own labour only and to accept a high degree of control: it is a building contract. It is not a contract to serve another for a wage, but a contract to produce a thing (or a result) for a price.

(ii) A contract obliges one party to carry another's goods, providing at his own expense everything needed for performance. This is not a contract of service, even though the carrier may be obliged to drive the vehicle himself and to accept the other's control over his performance: it is a contract of carriage.

(iii) A contract obliges a labourer to work for a builder, providing some simple tools, and to accept the builder's control. Notwithstanding the obligation to provide the tools, the contract is one of service. That obligation is not inconsistent with the nature of a contract of service. It is not a sufficiently important matter to affect the substance of the contract.

(iv) A contract obliges one party to work for the other, accepting his control, and to provide his own transport. This is still a contract of service. The obligation to provide his own transport does not affect the substance. Transport in this example is incidental to the main purpose of the contract. Transport in the second example was the essential part of the performance.

(v) The same instrument provides that one party shall work for the other subject to the other's control, and also that he shall sell him his land. The first part of the instrument is no less a contract of service because the second part imposes obligations of a different kind: Amalgamated Engineering Union v. Minister of Pensions and National Insurance.[2]

I can put the point which I am making in other words. An obligation to do work subject to the other party's control is a necessary, though not always a sufficient, condition of a contract of service. If the provisions of the contract as a whole are inconsistent with its being a contract of service, it will be some other kind of contract, and the person doing the work will not be a servant. The judge's task is to classify the contract (a task like that of distinguishing a contract of sale from one of work and labour). He may, in performing it, take into account other matters besides control.

I find authority for this way of dealing with the case in the judgment of Dixon J. in Queensland Stations Proprietary Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation.[3] There the question was whether a payment made by the company to a drover was "wages" within the meaning of a Pay-roll Tax Assessment Act, which depended on whether the relation between the company and the drover was that of master and servant. The drover was employed under a written contract to drove 317 cattle to a destination. The contract provided that he should obey and carry out all lawful instructions and use the whole of his time, energy and ability in the careful droving of the stock, that he should provide at his own expense all men, plant, horses and rations required for the operation, and that he should be paid at a rate per head for each of the cattle safely delivered at the destination. He was held to be an independent contractor. This passage comes from the judgment of Dixon J.[4]:

> "There is, of course, nothing to prevent a drover and his client forming the relation of employee and employer. . . . But whether they do so must depend on the facts. In considering the facts it is a mistake to treat as decisive a reservation of control over the manner in which the droving is performed and the cattle are handled. For instance, in the present case the circumstance that the drover agrees to obey and carry out all lawful instructions cannot outweigh the countervailing considerations which are found in the employment by him of servants of his own, the provision of horses, equipment, plant, rations, and a remuneration at a rate per head delivered. That a reservation of a right to direct or superintend the performance of the task cannot transform into a contract of service what in essence is an independent contract appears from . . ."

There follows the citation of a number of English cases, including Hardaker v. Idle District Council,[5] the building contractor's case.

MACKENNA J.

If the independent contractor need not be free from the other party's control "in the performance of the task," what freedom must he possess if he is to be called "independent"? Must he be free to choose the plant, equipment and materials as he wishes, or can he submit to some control in these respects too without affecting the substance of his independent contract? I do not see why not. In practice there will always be some scope for independent action by the man who undertakes to provide the means of performance and to accomplish the result for which he is to be paid.

I compare, and to some extent contrast, with this judgment of Dixon J.[6] another judgment of the same judge in Humberstone v. Northern Timber Mills.[7] There the question was whether the owner-driver of a truck was a servant under a contract of service so as to be covered by a Workmen's Compensation Act. For a number of years the owner had taken his truck at about the same time each day to the respondents' factory where he had been given goods to deliver to their customers. He carried on delivering goods until about the same time each evening when he knocked off. He maintained the truck and supplied the fuel at his own expense, and was paid for goods carried at a rate per car-mile. From these facts it was inferred that there was a continuing contract between the respondents and the owner which was not a contract of service. For this last conclusion Dixon J. gave these reasons[8]:

> "The question is not whether in practice the work was in fact done subject to a direction and control exercised by an actual supervision or whether an actual supervision was possible but whether ultimate authority over the man in the performance of his work resided in the employer so that he was subject to the latter's order and directions. In the present case the contract by the deceased was to provide not merely his own labour but the use of heavy mechanical transport, driven by power, which he maintained and fuelled for the purpose. The most important part of the work to be performed by his own labour consisted in the operation of his own motor truck and the essential part of the service for which the respondents contracted was the transportation of their goods by the mechanical means he thus supplied. The essence of a contract of service is the supply of the work and skill of a man. But the emphasis in the case of the present contract is upon mechanical traction. This was to be done by his own property in his own possession and control. There is no ground for imputing to the parties a common intention that in all the management and control of his own vehicle, in all the ways in which he used it for the purpose of carrying their goods, he should be subject to the commands of the respondents.

[8] Ibid. 404.

"In essence it appears to me to have been an independent contract and I do not think that it was open to the board to find otherwise.

"The subject has recently been dealt with in this court in Queensland Stations Proprietary Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation.[9] As in that case the contract is one for the performance of a service for one party by another who is to employ plant for the purpose and to be paid by the results."

Were it not for the words which I have italicised I would have said that the reasoning here was the same as in the earlier case. Because of the driver's obligation to provide the truck, to maintain and fuel it, and to accept payment by results, it was a contract for the transportation of goods and not a contract of service. But the italicised words seem to make the consignor's right of control (if it existed) a sufficient condition of a contract of service, and to treat the owner-driver's obligation to provide the truck, etc., merely as evidence, making difficult, or precluding, the imputation of an intention to the parties that he should be subject to control. If the obligation to provide the truck, etc., were relevant only as evidence of intention in the matter of control, it would cease to be relevant where the parties had expressed their intention in that matter, and if, as in the Queensland case, the contract expressly provided that the driver should be subject to the other party's control, he would be a servant. But the Queensland case decided that the driver's was an "independent contract": his obligation to provide the men, the horses, etc., determined its nature and made it, notwithstanding his submission to control, something other than a contract of service.

If there is in this respect a difference between the two judgments, I prefer the earlier.

The opinion of Lord Wright in Montreal v. Montreal Locomotive Works Ltd.,[10] forgotten by at least one of the counsel who argued the case, and discovered by Mr. Atiyah, must be mentioned here. There were two questions in that case; whether a corporation was the occupant of an armaments factory so as to be liable to pay an occupation tax, and whether it was carrying on a business in the factory so as to be liable to pay a business tax. The answer to both questions depended on whether the corporation was acting

1967

as the government's agent in the manufacture of the armaments or as an independent contractor. All the funds necessary for the enterprise were provided by the government, which bore all the financial risks. The corporation was subject to the government's control in making the armaments and received a fee for each unit of production. It was held on these facts that the corporation was not liable to pay the taxes. Mr. Atiyah cites the following passage from Lord Wright's opinion [11]:

> "In earlier cases a single test, such as the presence or absence of control, was often relied on to determine whether the case was one of master and servant, mostly in order to decide issues of tortious liability on the part of the master or superior. In the more complex conditions of modern industry, more complicated tests have to be applied. It has been suggested that a fourfold test would in some cases be more appropriate, a complex involving (1) control; (2) ownership of the tools; (3) chance of profit; (4) risk of loss. Control in itself is not always conclusive. Thus the master of a chartered vessel is generally the employee of the shipowner though the charterer can direct the employment of the vessel. Again the law often limits the employer's right to interfere with the employee's conduct, as also do trade union regulations. In many cases the question can only be settled by examining the whole of the various elements which constitute the relationship between the parties. In this way it is in some cases possible to decide the issue by raising as the crucial question whose business is it, or in other words by asking whether the party is carrying on the business, in the sense of carrying it on for himself or on his own behalf and not merely for a superior."

In Lord Wright's first illustration of the shipowner, the charterer and the shipmaster, control is shown in two ways not to be conclusive. Though the shipowner had delegated to the charterer his right to give directions to the shipmaster, and in that limited sense no longer had control, he was still the master. Again, though the charterer had the power of giving directions, and in that sense had control, he was not the master. The second illustration shows that a right of control limited by law or by trade union regulations may be sufficient for the relation of master and servant. This does not take us very far in the direction of a fourfold test. It is easier to relate Lord Wright's (2), (3) and (4) to the case mentioned in the last sentence of the quotation. If a man's activities have the character of a business, and if the question is whether he is carrying on that business for himself or for another, it must be relevant to consider which of the two owns the assets ("the ownership of the tools") and which bears the financial risk ("the chance of profit," "the risk of loss"). He who owns the assets and bears the risk is unlikely to be acting as an agent or a servant. If the man performing the service must provide the means of performance at his own expense and accept payment by results, he will own the assets, bear the risk, and be to that extent unlike a servant. I should add that there is nothing in the Canadian case, Montreal v. Montreal Locomotive Works Ltd.,[12] to support the view that the ownership of the assets is relevant only to the question of control. Lord Wright treats his three other tests as having a value independent of control in determining the nature of the contract.

U.S. v. Silk[13] was the most important of the American cases cited to me. The case disposed of two suits raising the question whether men working for the plaintiffs, Silk and Greyvan, were "employees" within the meaning of that word in the Social Security Act, 1935. The judges of the Supreme Court agreed upon the test to be applied, though not in every instance upon its application to the facts. It was not to be what they described as "the common law test," viz., "power of control, whether exercised or not, over the manner of performing service to the undertaking." The test was whether the men were employees "as a matter of economic reality." Important factors were said to be "the degrees of control, opportunities of profit or loss, investment in facilities, permanency of relation and skill required in the claimed independent operation."

Silk sold coal by retail, using the services of two classes of workers, unloaders and truck drivers. The unloaders moved the coal from railway vans into bins. They came to the yard when they wished and were given a wagon to unload and a place to put the coal. They provided their own tools and were paid so much per ton for the coal they shifted. All the nine judges held that these men were employees[14]:

> "Giving full consideration to the concurrence of the two lower courts in a contrary result, we cannot agree that the unloaders in the Silk case were independent contractors. They provided only picks and shovels. They had no opportunity to gain or lose except from the work of their hands and these simple tools. That the unloaders did not work regularly is not significant. They did work in the course of the employer's trade or business. This brings them under the coverage of the Act. They are of the group that the Social Security Act was intended to aid. Silk was in a position to exercise all necessary supervision over their simple tasks. Unloaders have often been held to be employees in tort cases."

Silk's drivers owned the trucks in which they delivered coal to Silk's customers. They paid all the expenses of operating their trucks including the wages of any extra help they needed or chose to employ. They came to the yard when they pleased and were free to haul goods for other people. They were paid for their deliveries at a rate per ton. Greyvan carried on a road haulier's business. Their drivers too owned their trucks and were required to pay all the costs of operation. They were not allowed to work for anyone else but Greyvan, and had to drive the trucks themselves or, if they employed a relief driver, to be present when he drove. They had to follow all the rules, regulations and instructions of Greyvan. They were paid a percentage of the tariff which Greyvan charged the customers.

By a majority of the court both sets of drivers were held to be independent contractors [15]:

> ". . . where the arrangements leave the driver-owners so much responsibility for investment and management as here, they must be held to be independent contractors. These driver-owners are small business men. They own their own trucks. They hire their own helpers. In one instance they haul for a single business, in the other for any customer. The distinction, though important, is not controlling. It is the total situation, including the risk undertaken, the control exercised, the opportunity for profit from sound management, that marks these driver-owners as independent contractors."

This reasoning apparently requires that there should be some power of control vested in the driver if he is to qualify as an independent contractor. That the power need not be very extensive appears from the facts in Greyvan's case. The driver's investment, and the risk undertaken by him, seem to be the important things.

The authorities I have already cited (the judgment of Dixon J. and the opinion of Lord Wright in the Canadian case) show that the common law test is not to be restricted to the power of control "over the manner of performing service," but is wide enough to take account of investment and risk.

Section 220 (2) of the American Restatement, Agency 2d, includes among the relevant factors:

[15] (1946) 331 U.S. 719.

A "(e) Whether the employer or the workman supplies the instrumentalities, tools, and the place of work for the person doing the work."

The comment on the first part of this paragraph is in these words:

B "Ownership of instrumentalities. The ownership of the instrumentalities and tools used in the work is of importance. The fact that a worker supplies his own tools is some evidence that he is not a servant. On the other hand, if the worker is using his employer's tools or instrumentalities, especially if they are of substantial value, it is normally understood that he will follow the directions of the owner in their use, and this indicates that the owner is a master. This C fact is, however, only of evidential value."

This says in effect that the employer's ownership of the instrumentalities is relevant only because of a rebuttable presumption that the parties meant him to control the use of his own property. It also says that the worker's ownership is evidence that he is not a servant, but it does not say why. If the reason is the same in D both cases, and the worker's ownership is evidence only because of its bearing on control, it is plain from what I have already said that I do not agree.

The point is discussed in Mr. Atiyah's book at pp. 64, 65. I quote these three sentences:

E "It seems, therefore, that the importance of the provision of equipment lies in the simple fact that, in most circumstances, where a person hires out a piece of work to an independent contractor he expects the contractor to provide all the necessary tools and equipment. . . . Indeed, it may well be that little weight can today be put on the provision of tools of a minor character, as opposed to the provision of plant and equipment on a large scale. In the latter case the F real object of the contract is often the hiring of the plant, and the services of a workman to operate the plant are purely incidental."

I have had these sentences in mind when framing my five examples.

I note a United States decision later than Silk's in which a G Federal Court of Appeal held that an owner-driver was a servant, stating that his ownership of a trailer merely raised an inference about control which was rebutted by the express terms of the contract: National Labour Relations Board v. Nu-Car Carriers Inc.[16-18]

I have almost completed my review of the authorities. There is, as well, the dictum of Denning L.J. in Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Slatford,[19] repeated in his Hamlyn Lectures:

> "In this connection I would observe that the test of being a servant does not rest nowadays on submission to orders. It depends on whether the person is part and parcel of the organisation."

This raises more questions than I know how to answer. What is meant by being "part and parcel of an organisation"? Are all persons who answer this description servants? If only some are servants, what distinguishes them from the others if it is not their submission to orders? Though I cannot answer these questions I can at least invoke the dictum to support my opinion that control is not everything.

Then there are "the four indicia" of a contract of service, first mentioned in Park v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company Ltd.[20] and repeated by Lord Thankerton in Short v. J. and W. Henderson Ltd.[21]:

> "(a) The master's power of selection of his servant; (b) the payment of wages or other remuneration; (c) the master's right to control the method of doing the work; and (d) the master's right of suspension or dismissal."

It seems to me that (a) and (d) are chiefly relevant in determining whether there is a contract of any kind between the supposed master and servant, and that they are of little use in determining whether the contract is one of service. The same is true of (b), unless one distinguishes between different methods of payment, payment by results tending to prove independence and payment by time the relation of master and servant. Reference to the facts in Park v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company Ltd.[22] shows the use for which these tests were devised. Park had contracted with the company to drive a stonemine at a money rate per fathom, and he had engaged Haggerty to help him. Park and Haggerty had been injured by the negligence of other men admittedly in the company's service. The question was whether Park and Haggerty were fellow-servants of those whose negligence had injured them, so as to be caught by the doctrine of common employment. In deciding whether Haggerty was a servant of the company or of Park, it was obviously relevant to inquire who had selected him, who paid his wages and who had the right of suspending or dismissing him, and if Park did (or could do) these things otherwise than as the company's agent, he himself was unlikely to be their servant.

Three workmen's compensation cases in Ireland raised the question whether men whose work was carrying goods and materials were employed under contracts of service: Moroney v. Sheehan[23]; O'Donnell v. Clare County Council[24]; and Clarke v. Bailieborough Co-operative Agricultural and Dairy Society Ltd.[25] It appears from the statement of facts in each case that the workman had his own horse and cart, but this is not referred to either in the arguments or in the judgments which held that the men were employed under contracts of service. Doggett v. Waterloo Taxi-Cab Co. Ltd.[26] is an English case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in which it was held that the owners of a taxi-cab, hired by them to a driver in consideration of a share in the takings, were not his employers under a contract of service. I mention these cases to show that they have not been overlooked.

I mention also, and for the same reason, an argument addressed to me by Mr. Parker, on the provisions of the Road Traffic Act, 1960. The argument, founded on section 164 (1) and (3), was to the effect that when Latimer was driving his truck a licence was needed under this part of the Act only if he was carrying on his own business. If he was merely the company's servant employed by them to drive his own vehicle on their business, no licence was needed. This cannot have been intended. The draftsman must have considered that a man in Latimer's position would always be an independent contractor, and if he did so he was probably right. That was the argument. But one cannot be sure that he considered the point, and if one is not sure of that the argument proves nothing.

It is now time to state my conclusion, which is that the rights conferred and the duties imposed by the contract between Latimer and the company are not such as to make it one of service. It is a contract of carriage.

I have shown earlier that Latimer must make the vehicle available throughout the contract period. He must maintain it (and also the mixing unit) in working order, repairing and replacing worn parts when necessary. He must hire a competent driver to take his place if he should be for any reason unable to drive at any time when the company requires the services of the vehicle. He must do whatever is needed to make the vehicle (with a driver) available throughout the contract period. He must do all this, at his own expense, being paid a rate per mile for the quantity which he delivers. These are obligations more consistent, I think, with a contract of carriage than with one of service. The ownership of the assets, the chance of profit and the risk of loss in the business of carriage are his and not the company's.

If (as I assume) it must be shown that he has freedom enough in the performance of these obligations to qualify as an independent contractor, I would say that he has enough. He is free to decide whether he will maintain the vehicle by his own labour or that of another, and, if he decides to use another's, he is free to choose whom he will employ and on what terms. He is free to use another's services to drive the vehicle when he is away because of sickness or holidays, or indeed at any other time when he has not been directed to drive himself. He is free again in his choice of a competent driver to take his place at these times, and whoever he appoints will be his servant and not the company's. He is free to choose where he will buy his fuel or any other of his requirements, subject to the company's control in the case of major repairs. This is enough. It is true that the company are given special powers to ensure that he runs his business efficiently, keeps proper accounts and pays his bills. I find nothing in these or any other provisions of the contract inconsistent with the company's contention that he is running a business of his own. A man does not cease to run a business on his own account because he agrees to run it efficiently or to accept another's superintendence.

A comparison of Latimer's profits with the wages earned by men who are admittedly the company's servants confirms my conclusion that his status is different, that he is, in the words of the judgment in Silk's case, a "small business man," and not a servant.

That is all I need to say about Latimer's case.

Happily I need say less about the two other cases, King's and Bezer's. In each of these the question is whether the man's contract is one of service. The parties are agreed that if Latimer's contract is not one of service, neither is King's nor Bezer's. I agree, and these two cases will be decided accordingly.

APPENDIX

The schedule to the contract, annexed to the case stated, provided: "1. This agreement shall be operative as from the commencement date.

2. On or before the commencement date: (a) The company shall procure that the hire purchase company will effect all structural alterations and additions to the vehicle (including any power take off unit or front-end modification to the engine) necessary to the operation thereon of the equipment and shall paint the vehicle in the colour or colours and with the distinguishing signs and marks specified by the company and shall then offer the vehicle for sale to the owner-driver. (b) The owner-driver shall purchase the vehicle from the hire purchase company. (c) The company shall ensure that credit facilities are available to the owner-driver for the purchase of the vehicle from the hire purchase company.

3. On or before the date of the purchase and sale referred to in the preceding clause the company shall at its own expense provide and fit the equipment to the vehicle. The equipment shall at all times remain the property of the company and shall not be removed from the vehicle except in accordance with the terms of this agreement.

4. The owner-driver shall forthwith upon the exchange of this agreement obtain an "A" contract licence based upon this agreement covering the use of the truck hereunder.

5. The owner-driver shall at all times of the day or night during the term of this agreement (excepting only in accordance with the terms hereof) make available the truck to the company for the purpose of collecting carrying and delivering the materials used for or in connection with the business of the company (not being a business of carrying or arranging for the carriage of goods) whenever and wherever so required by the company whether such requirement is notified to the owner-driver or to his servants or agents and shall duly and promptly collect carry and deliver such quantity or quantities of the materials as and when required in the manner at the time and to the destination directed by the company and it is further provided that the truck shall be used exclusively for the purposes set out in this agreement and for no other purpose. In furtherance of the terms of this clause the owner-driver shall if so required by the company at his own expense ensure that the company is able to contact him by telephone at his usual residence or residences.

6. The company may require the owner-driver to make the truck available to any associated company for the purpose of collecting, carrying and delivering the materials of such associated company and the owner-driver shall subject to his obtaining a "B" licence as hereinafter mentioned comply with such requirement in accordance with the terms of the preceding clause. If any such requirement is made by the company the owner-driver shall use his best endeavours to obtain in substitution for the "A" contract licence the grant of a "B" licence covering the use of the truck from any plants both of the company and of such associated company. The parties hereto hereby agree that unless a "B" licence is obtained by the owner-driver in accordance with this clause the truck will not be used for or in connection with the carriage of any goods of any parent or subsidiary company of the company.

7. The owner-driver shall at all times ensure that he holds a licence in accordance with clause 4 or clause 6 of this schedule and that the operation of the truck at all times falls within the provisions of such licence and shall further comply with all conditions, provisions, regulations and rules for the time being in force . . . in any way relating the vehicle or its use or operation and shall indemnify the company against all actions proceedings claims demands and expenses and other liabilities incurred by the company in respect of any breach of this provision.

8. The owner-driver shall not during the continuance of this agreement or within 14 days after its termination (howsoever caused) without the prior written consent of the company (except in the case of any hire purchase agreement with the hire purchase company) charge or sell or purport to charge or sell the vehicle or the equipment or in any manner permit or allow the same or purport to allow them to become subject to any lien charge or incumbrance.

9. Where the truck is not or will not be available to the company in accordance herewith for any reason whatsoever the owner-driver shall so notify the company by at least seven days' notice or by such shorter notice as in the circumstances be reasonable.

10. The owner-driver shall with the consent of the company be entitled (subject to clause 12 . . .) to appoint a competent and suitably qualified driver to operate the truck in place of him. If any such other driver is so appointed the owner-driver shall ensure that such other driver complies with all the terms conditions and obligations of this agreement applicable to the operation and use of the truck. If the company has reasonable grounds for dissatisfaction with any driver appointed by the owner-driver it shall be entitled to give notice of this to the owner-driver and the owner-driver shall forthwith provide a suitable and acceptable driver in lieu of such driver and shall not permit such driver to operate the truck.

11. Any driver employed by the owner-driver to operate the truck shall be employed on conditions of employment and at rates of wages no less favourable to such driver than those for the time being laid down by the National Joint Council for the Ready Mixed Concrete Industry.

12. Notwithstanding the provisions of clause 10 . . . the company shall be entitled to require the owner-driver himself to operate the truck on every or any day up to the maximum number of hours permitted under section 73 of the Road Traffic Act, 1960, or any statutory amendment or re-enactment thereof and the owner-driver shall comply with such requirement unless he shall have a reason for not so doing which would have been valid had he been the employed driver of the company and shall have notified the company in advance of such reason and shall be able to produce and upon the request of the company in fact produce evidence to substantiate the same. The owner-driver shall not himself be obliged to operate the truck during such holiday times and periods (not extending for more than two weeks in any calendar year) as have been agreed by the company in writing.

13. If at any time the owner-driver shall fail both to operate and to cause any other driver to operate the truck in accordance herewith then without prejudice to any other rights of the company arising from such breach the company shall be entitled to appoint a driver or drivers to operate the truck in accordance with this agreement on behalf of the owner-driver for such period as the company may at the time of such appointment consider reasonable and to revoke any such appointment: and the owner-driver hereby irrevocably authorises the company to make or revoke any such appointment or appoints and undertakes to be responsible for all wages earnings and liabilities earned or incurred by any driver so appointed by the company and hereby agrees that for all purposes such driver or drivers shall be deemed to be in the exclusive employment of the owner-driver.

14. The owner-driver shall at all times while operating the truck:

(a) Wear a clean and presentable uniform of the pattern and colours prescribed by the company which shall be provided by and at the expense of the owner-driver. (b) Comply with all rules regulations or requirements of the company. (c) Ensure that no water or other substance is added to the materials unless the customer to whom the materials are being delivered or a responsible person on behalf of such customer insists upon such an addition and completes the appropriate part of the delivery docket. (d) Ensure that none of the details on any delivery docket is altered. (e) Carry out all reasonable orders from any competent servant of the company as if he were an employee of the company. (f) Where so requested by the company be responsible for the collection of and transmission to the company of any moneys to be paid to the company on the delivery of any of the materials. (g) By his conduct and appearance (including the speed and manner in which he operates the truck) use his best endeavours to further the good name of the company.

15. The owner-driver shall not do anything which might cause a contravention of the Road Traffic Act, 1960 (and especially of sections 4, 24 and 73 the provisions of which have been brought to the notice of the owner-driver), or of any statutory amendment or re-enactment thereof or of any rules or orders thereunder for the time being in force and he shall not accept or carry out any orders or instructions given to him which would result in any such contravention.

16. The owner-driver shall at all times hold a current driving licence valid for the class of vehicles into which the truck falls.

17. The owner-driver shall not carry out or permit to be carried out any alteration to the truck except with the written consent of the company.

18. (a) The owner-driver shall at all times to the satisfaction of the company: (i) Keep the truck well and freshly painted and signwritten in the colours and in the manner directed by the company. (ii) Wash cleanse oil grease and maintain the truck (including in particular the internal cleansing of the drum forming part of the equipment and the removal of all residual concrete and other solids therefrom) both mechanically and otherwise (including the replacement or reconditioning of all worn damaged or defective parts thereof) with the exception only of the replacement of the main drum and cradle (excluding accessories attached thereto and in particular excluding drum blades) of the equipment where the need for such replacement or reconditioning is due only to fair wear and tear. (iii) Generally keep the truck in good and substantial repair and condition.

(b) The works to be carried out by the owner-driver under (a) of this clause shall be carried out in such a manner that the truck shall cease to be available to the company for as short a time as possible and shall on each occasion that the truck will not be available to the company in accordance herewith notify the company as soon as possible specifying the precise nature of the works to be carried out and of any defect making necessary such works.

(c) Where the owner-driver is about to carry out any replacement or reconditioning of or any major repair on the vehicle of the equipment or any other works whose cost exceeds £50 or which would result in the truck being unavailable to the company in accordance herewith for more than twenty-four hours the company shall have the option to require that the work shall be carried out for and at the expense of the owner-driver by Readymix Transport Ltd. or by any other person firm or company nominated by the company.

(d) The owner-driver may with the consent of and shall upon the written requirement of the company without charge maintain wash down and garage the truck in the open air or otherwise at any plant from which it is operating Provided that the company may at any time and without assigning any reason therefor withdraw such consent or requirement And Provided Also that the owner-driver shall at no time be entitled as of right to use any of the company's facilities or equipment for such maintenance washing down or garaging.

(e) The owner-driver shall if so required by the company cause the truck to be available for inspection by the company or by any person firm or company and at any place nominated by it and if after such inspection or at any other time the company considers that the condition of the truck is such that the provisions of this agreement have not been complied with the company may thereupon require the owner-driver forthwith to put in hand and complete such works as may be specified by the company and the owner-driver shall comply with such requirement. If the owner-driver shall fail forthwith to put in hand or to complete such works as aforesaid the company shall without prejudice to any other right which it might have by reason of such breach be entitled forthwith to carry out such works or to nominate any person firm or company to carry out such works on its behalf and the owner-driver shall forthwith repay to the company the cost of such works.

(f) The company may at any time serve notice on the owner-driver that it wishes to replace the equipment or the main drum the cradle or any other part thereof and thereupon the owner-driver shall forthwith make the truck available for such purpose as when and where requested by the company and the company shall carry out or have carried out such replacement at its own expense with all reasonable speed.

19. The owner-driver shall in addition to the other obligations referred to in clause 18 . . . be responsible for the wear and tear on the equipment with the exception of fair wear and tear on the main drum and cradle thereof (excluding accessories attached thereto and in particular excluding drum blades) and upon any replacement thereof whether in accordance with clause 18 (f) . . . or otherwise or upon the termination of this agreement (howsoever caused) shall pay to the company such a sum calculated with reference to the expired portion of the estimated life of the equipment (other than as aforesaid) or of the separate component parts thereof as is certified by the company to be due in respect of such wear and tear.

20. (a) Subject as hereinafter mentioned the owner-driver shall be entitled to earnings for the services provided hereunder calculated as follows: (i) At (subject to (c) of this clause) the rates for each delivery of the materials on the basis that the quantity of the materials constituting each delivery was not less than the minimum delivery Provided that in the case of concrete which weighs less that 138 pounds per cubic foot (known as "Lightweight Concrete") such calculation shall be on the basis that the quantity of the materials constituting each delivery was not more than the capacity of the equipment referred to in clause 2 (c) of this agreement. (ii) At the waiting period rate for all the time in excess of the waiting period during which the truck is while delivering the materials delayed on a site through no act or default of the owner-driver. Provided that a statement showing the length of such delay and signed by the customer to whom the materials are being delivered or by a responsible person on behalf of such customer or on behalf of the company is on the day of such delay passed to "shipper" at the plant from which the materials were dispatched.

(b) (i) The rates have been calculated on the basis that the truck will operate from the specified plants: during such time as the truck operates from any other plant than the specified plants then (a) of this clause shall be read as if the reference to "the rates" were a reference to "the current rates of payment from time to time paid by the company to new owner-drivers at the plant from which the truck is operating." (ii) For the purpose of any calculation under (a) of this clause the number of radial miles in each delivery of the materials shall be taken from the radial mile map at the plant from which the delivery is made by the "shipper" or other employee of the company responsible for deliveries at the said plant. If any dispute shall arise as to the number of radial miles in any delivery notice thereof shall be given to the owner-driver or the company as the case may be within seven days of the day of the delivery concerned. Such dispute shall be referred to a senior executive of the company whose decision shall be final.

(c) (i) Within seven days from the end of each week the owner-driver shall submit to the company invoices in the form specified by the company showing in respect of that week the quantity of the materials delivered by the truck during that week and the amounts due in respect of such deliveries in accordance with the previous provisions of this clause.

(ii) Within seven days after the end of each calendar month the owner-driver shall render to the company a detailed statement of such invoices as relate to that month in the form specified by the company. (d) The company shall (subject to the right of the company to make any deductions retentions or to obtain reimbursement from the owner-driver under any other provision of this agreement) by the end of the month following that in respect of which the detailed monthly statement is rendered to the company make payment of the amount found to be owing in respect thereof and notice by the owner-driver of any dispute arising from any such payment shall be given to the company within seven days thereof.

21. The owner-driver shall be entitled to receive in respect of each minimum earnings period (having regard to all sums laid out by the company on behalf of the owner-driver) at least such a sum as is obtained from the calculation of minimum earnings. Minimum earnings are based on a working year of two hundred and eighty days and "y" represents the number of days (if any) in excess of 85 days in any minimum earnings period on which the truck and a driver to operate it were not available to the company for the carriage of the materials in accordance with this agreement (otherwise than as a result of any action on the part of the company) for a period in any one day of at least four hours. Calculations of minimum earnings shall be prepared by the owner-driver at his own expense and submitted to the company within six weeks after the end of any minimum earnings period and if the amount found to be owing under this clause is in excess of the amount actually earned by the owner-driver under this agreement during the minimum earnings period in question then the company shall within three months after the end of such minimum earnings period pay the deficit to the owner-driver.

22. Either party hereto shall be entitled to have the rates increased or decreased by the amount (to the nearest penny) appropriate to allow for any variations in the following expenses at the date hereof: (a) The cost at which the owner-driver is able to provide drivers for the truck (including for all times at which the truck is operated by the owner-driver the wages to which the owner-driver would have been entitled had he been an employee) in accordance with the conditions of employment and rates of wages laid down by the National Joint Council for the Ready Mixed Concrete Industry. (b) The cost at which the owner-driver is able to purchase fuel lubricating oils and tyres for use on the truck and it is further provided that the rates shall at the request of the owner-driver be subject to review in the event of any substantial reduction in the profitability of this Agreement to the owner-driver by reason of any levy or tax imposed by Parliament on carriers of goods by road transport generally.

23. (a) The company shall be entitled to pay (and until it shall have given to the owner-driver 14 days' notice in writing shall pay) any instalments due from the owner-driver under the terms of any hire purchase agreements between the hire purchase company and the owner-driver as the same fall due and to charge the same to the owner-driver. (b) Subject to (a) of this clause the owner-driver shall pay all debts and liabilities and perform all obligations in respect of the truck and any goods or materials supplied or work carried out in connection therewith (including where the company shall have given notice to the owner-driver in accordance with (a) of this clause all instalments due under any such hire purchase agreement and also including all debts and liabilities under any such hire purchase agreement) as the same fall due and shall not allow the vehicle or the equipment to become subject to any charge or lien (other than any such hire purchase agreement) and if the driver shall not after a reasonable time have remedied any breach of this sub-clause the company shall be entitled without prejudice to any other rights of the company arising from such breach to pay such debts or liabilities or meet such obligations on behalf of the owner-driver and to recover any moneys so expended by deduction from any payments from time to time due to the owner-driver from the company or from the reserve fund or otherwise.

24. The company from time to time shall notwithstanding anything else herein contained be entitled to retain from the earnings of the owner-driver for any month a sum not exceeding the sum resulting from the calculation of the deduction rate so that at any time it holds a balance up to but not exceeding the amount of the reserve fund and shall hold such moneys as security for the proper performance of all the obligations of the owner-driver hereunder. The company shall be entitled to retain the reserve fund free of interest and at any time to draw upon it to meet any debts liabilities or obligations of the owner-driver hereunder whether to the company or otherwise and shall account to the owner-driver for any such drawings made in any calendar month at the same time as it makes payment of his earnings for that month. After the termination of this agreement the company shall render its final account in respect of the reserve fund and any such drawings at the same time as making the last payment of earnings hereunder Provided that if the company has reasonable grounds for believing that any of the obligations of the owner-driver hereunder has not been performed it shall be entitled to continue to retain and if necessary to draw on a reasonable proportion of the reserve fund for a reasonable time thereafter.

25. The owner-driver shall at his own expense and to the satisfaction of the company cause to be maintained by a professional accountant or firm of accountants approved by the company in a form approved by the company profit and loss accounts for each period of three months ended on the last day of February May August and November in each year or for any shorter period commencing on the commencement date and ending on the next of such dates thereafter and balance-sheets as at the end of each of such periods relating to the business carried on by the owner-driver hereunder and the owner-driver shall in any manner specified by the company set aside any provision made in such accounts. The owner-driver shall submit such accounts and balance-sheets to the company by the end of the month following the period covered thereby.

26. (a) On or before the date of the purchase and sale referred to in clause 2 of this schedule the company shall negotiate for and use its best endeavours to effect on behalf of in the name of and at the expense of the owner-driver a policy (which expression shall in this clause include the plural) of motor insurance on the vehicle. The policy shall be in such form for such amounts through such insurance brokers with such insurance company and on such terms and conditions and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the company may require. Such policy shall have indorsed thereon the interest of the company as owners of the equipment and where applicable both the interest of the hire purchase company as owners of the vehicle under any hire purchase agreement with the owner-driver and the interest of the owners of the radio equipment. Where such policy is effected through insurance brokers the company shall not be entitled to any commission fee or other brokerage from the owner-driver for effecting or maintaining the same nor shall it be entitled to claim any reimbursement of its own administrative expenses from the owner-driver. The owner-driver hereby irrevocably authorises the company during the term of this agreement to effect or on the termination of this agreement to cancel such policy on his behalf and agrees that no alteration or amendment thereto shall be made without the written consent of the company. The owner-driver further irrevocably authorises the company during the terms of this agreement to pay on his behalf all premiums due under such policy as and when they fall due and to deduct the amount thereof from any payments from time to time due to the owner-driver from the company or from the reserve fund and to collect and in due course to account to the owner-driver for any return premium due on the cancellation of any policy as aforesaid. (b) The company shall negotiate and effect a policy of insurance on the equipment on the same terms as those contained in (a) of this clause relating to the vehicle save that the policy may at the option of the company be in the name of the company and save that if a policy is so effected in the name of the company it shall not bear the indorsements referred to in (a) of this clause. (c) The company shall at all times during the continuance of this agreement use its best endeavours to keep in force any policy effected in accordance with (a) and (b) of this clause or to effect and keep in force an alternative policy in accordance therewith. (d) In the event that the company is unable to effect or to keep in force a policy in accordance with (a) (b) and (c) of this clause whether by reason of the driving or claims record of the owner-driver or of any drivers appointed by him or otherwise the company shall forthwith notify the owner-driver accordingly and thereupon the owner-driver shall endeavour to negotiate for and to obtain at his own expense a policy on the insured goods through such insurance brokers such insurance company in such form and upon such terms and conditions and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the company may in their absolute discretion approve and in the event of the owner-driver failing to effect a policy so approved by the company within 14 days of such notification or at any time failing to keep such policy in force then this agreement shall thereupon terminate. Any policy effected by the owner-driver hereunder together with all renewal notes and receipts for premiums shall at all times be available to the company and the owner-driver shall produce the same to the company for inspection within three days of being required in writing so to do. (e) In the event either of the total loss of or any damage to the insured goods or any of them the owner-driver shall forthwith lay out any insurance moneys received by him in respect thereof on repairing reinstating or replacing the same Provided that the owner-driver shall if so required by the company forthwith and at his own expense assign to the company all rights claims and benefits under any such policy in his name And Provided Also that any moneys payable under any such policy in his name in respect of loss of or damage to the insured goods shall if so required by the company be paid by the insurance company to the company and the owner-driver hereby irrevocably authorises the company to give a good discharge for the receipt of such moneys. The company shall deal with any rights claims and benefits assigned to it or any moneys paid to it under the provisos aforesaid in accordance with the obligations of the owner-driver hereunder. (f) The owner-driver shall comply with the terms and conditions of any policy effected hereunder and in particular in the event of any loss of or damage to the insured goods or of the insured goods being involved or concerned in any loss damage or accident the owner-driver shall forthwith give notice thereof in writing both to the company and to the insurance company or where applicable to the insurance brokers in the manner laid down therein.

27. The owner-driver at his own expense shall forthwith if required so to do by the company in writing provide and instal radio equipment on the vehicle and shall at all times at his own expense maintain the radio equipment in good and substantial repair and condition and shall pay a licence fee which may be required. The owner-driver shall operate the radio equipment in accordance with any rules regulations and laws appertaining thereto whether of the company or otherwise.

28. This agreement shall be personal to the owner-driver and the owner-driver shall not be entitled to assign the benefit hereof.

29. The owner-driver shall not without the written consent of the company at any time during the continuance of this agreement except as herein provided engage or be concerned in any employment business or trade as a haulier or carrier of any goods or materials of whatever description.

30. The owner-driver is hereby declared to be an independent contractor.

31. Any rule or regulation of the company referred to in this agreement shall be deemed to include any rule or regulation of any of the plants of the company or of any associated company from which the truck is operating . . . and any order or requirement of the company referred to in this agreement shall be deemed to include any order or requirement of any competent servant of the company or of any associated company (whether such requirement is in writing or otherwise).

32. (a) On the expiration or sooner determination of this agreement (howsoever caused) the company shall for seven days have the option to purchase the vehicle free from all liens charges or encumbrances at the market price thereof (as if the equipment were not mounted thereon) such price to be determined in default of agreement by an independent valuer. The owner-driver shall take any action or pay any sums necessary to release the vehicle from any such liens charges or encumbrances and in default of his so doing the owner-driver hereby irrevocably authorises the company to do so on his behalf. Such option shall be exercisable by the company by the service of notice in writing to that effect on the owner-driver and upon the service of such notice the property in the vehicle (whether or not it is subject to any charge) shall pass to the company. (b) If the company shall not exercise the option referred to in (a) of this clause, the owner-driver shall within eight days from the termination of this agreement (howsoever caused) or within 24 hours of such sooner time as the company shall inform the owner-driver that it does not intend to exercise such option make the vehicle available to the company for not less than three working days so that the company may remove the equipment from the vehicle. In default of the owner-driver making the vehicle available in accordance herewith the company in addition to any other rights arising as a result of such default shall be entitled to drive the vehicle and to take it away for up to six working days for the purpose aforesaid.

33. This agreement shall remain in force until determined by either party giving to the other not less than 28 days' previous notice in writing expiring on or at any time after the termination date Provided that this agreement shall be subject to termination by the company—(a) By not less than 28 days' notice in writing given at any time while the owner-driver shall have been incapacitated from driving the truck in accordance herewith by reason of ill health or accident for a total period of 60 days in the preceding six months. (b) By a summary notice in writing if the owner-driver shall have committed a breach of any of the covenants and conditions on his part herein contained or shall have been guilty of conduct tending to bring himself or the company or any associated company into disrepute or shall have committed an act of bankruptcy or entered into any arrangement or composition with his creditors or suffered execution to be levied on his property. (c) By a summary notice in writing if the owner-driver having been warned by the company of any grounds for dissatisfaction it may have in respect of the operation of the truck shall not within a reasonable time have removed the cause of such dissatisfaction.

34. The expiring agreement shall terminate on the commencement date and where the expiring agreement provided for the payment of any sum by way of minimum earnings in a similar manner to the provisions of clause 21 of this schedule minimum earnings hereunder shall be calculated as if the commencement date were the calculation date and as if his earnings under the expiring agreement from the calculation date to the commencement date had been earned under this agreement.

For the Respondent	MR MARK LINDSAY (The Respondent in Person)

SUMMARY

UNFAIR DISMISSAL – Reasonableness of dismissal

The Claimant, a manager, was dismissed for sending pornographic material to a more junior employee.

The Employment Tribunal erred in substituting its own view of the appropriateness of the sanction of dismissal rather than considering whether dismissal was within the range of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer in the circumstances. Finding of unfair dismissal set aside. Case remitted to a different Employment Tribunal.

THE HONOURABLE MRS JUSTICE SLADE

1. The Royal Bank of Scotland appeals from the judgment of an Employment Tribunal entered in the register on 8 September 2009 that Mr Lindsay had been unfairly dismissed. We will refer to the parties as Claimant and Respondent, their titles before the Employment Tribunal.

2. Having found that Mr Lindsay, the Claimant, was dismissed for misconduct, the Employment Tribunal concluded that the Respondent had carried out an appropriate and reasonable investigation by the time of its decision to dismiss, that the Respondent had genuinely formed the belief that Mr Lindsay had been guilty of misconduct and it, therefore, directed itself that the essential question in the case was whether the Respondent's decision to dismiss fell outside the range of reasonable responses of the reasonable employer. The Employment Tribunal answered that question at paragraph 55 of their judgment. They held that the decision of the Respondent to dismiss the Claimant was grossly disproportionate and fell outside the range of reasonable responses. Accordingly the Claimant's unfair dismissal complaint was upheld. It is from that conclusion that the Respondent appeals.

3. The Respondent contends that the Employment Tribunal erred by substituting their view as to the appropriate sanction for the Claimant's conduct, rather than applying their self-direction to assess whether objectively the dismissal of the Claimant was within the range of reasonable responses of the reasonable employer in all the circumstances.

Summary of Facts

4. The Claimant was employed by the Respondent from 1 April 2007 until his dismissal on 6 October 2008. He worked in the management role of regional head of business development in the invoice financing business of the Respondent. His role was to head up a team whose task it was to attract clients to the Respondent. Amongst the employment policies of the Respondent which applied to the Claimant was the group's IT security policy. That set out generic descriptions of inappropriate material and levels of disciplinary action which may be taken for possession of such material at work.

5. The policy set out three categories of material, A, B and C. Category B concerned:

> "Material which may be legally possessed, but which may nevertheless be classed as obscene such that its publication for gain may constitute an offence:
>
> - Material which is inappropriate for the workplace
> - Soft core pornography
> - Sexual jokes"

On the published policy matrix against Category B the potential level of disciplinary action is set out as:

> "Gross Misconduct or Misconduct
>
> Each case will be reviewed individually. Employee action on receipt of the material will impact on the disciplinary action taken."

It is to be noted that in the introduction to the matrix the policy contains the following:

> "Please note that the examples given are not exhaustive; depending on content it is possible that material sharing the same generic description (e.g. sexual jokes) may fall within separate categories."

6. In the course of an investigation into other allegations against the Claimant in 2008 his email account was accessed. An email sent by the Claimant to a Mr Dearden, another employee of the Respondent, dated 24 June 2008, was seen. That email had the heading "FW: European Soccer Uniforms XXX". It contained eight untitled JPEG attachments. It had been sent to the Claimant by a Mr Donnelly on that day. The Employment Tribunal found that the images featured naked women made up to appear as if they are wearing football kits. The Employment Tribunal found that three images in particular were sexually explicit.

7. On 1 October 2008 the Claimant attended a disciplinary meeting convened to consider five allegations against him, one of which related to the sending of pornographic images. The disciplinary hearing was conducted by Miss Saville. Miss Saville concluded that three of the allegations, including that concerning the sending of the pornographic images, were made out and she decided to dismiss the Claimant for gross misconduct. Miss Saville considered that each one of the matters which she had found to be proved against the Claimant on their own would have been sufficient to warrant a decision to summarily dismiss the Claimant.

8. The Claimant appealed. The appeal hearing took place on 11 November 2008 and it was conducted by Mr Morrin. By a decision dated 30 January 2009 Mr Morrin upheld the Claimant's appeal on all issues save for the finding that the Claimant had abused the Respondent's IT facilities. Mr Morrin dismissed the Claimant's appeal against the sanction of dismissal for that offence.

The Conclusions of the Employment Tribunal

9. At paragraph 43 the Employment Tribunal found:

> "We find that the Respondent genuinely believed that the Claimant had forwarded an email containing pornographic images to a junior member of staff on 24 June 2008. We agree with Miss Thompson that Mr Morrin could reasonably conclude that the Claimant was sitting next to or near Mr Dearden on the day in question, that he opened it, viewed its contents and forwarded it to Mr Dearden."

10. The Tribunal held:

> "45. We also conclude that the Respondent carried out such investigation into the matter as was fair and reasonable and within the range of reasonable responses in the circumstances.
>
>
> 47. Accordingly, it is the judgment of the Tribunal that the Respondent has made out its case it had a potentially fair reason for the dismissal of the Claimant based upon his conduct and that the Respondent had in its mind reasonable grounds upon which to sustain that belief, following reasonable investigation, at the time of the decision to dismiss the Claimant.
>
>
> 55. The Tribunal has been extremely careful not to substitute its own view for that of the employer. However, in this case, the Claimant's offence was towards the lowest end of the spectrum. This is not, in our judgment, one of those cases where the misconduct in question can be said to be such that any employee would know or believe that it would result in instant dismissal (whether set out in a policy or not). It was a one-off, isolated incident. It was sent by the Claimant shortly after one of his senior managers had forwarded sexist material concerning female drivers. The sender of the email to the Claimant was well-known to the Claimant and was recognised by the Respondent as being an introducer of work. The recipient was well-known to the Claimant and to the Claimant's own sender. It is our judgment that the decision of the Respondent to dismiss the Claimant was grossly disproportionate and fell outside the range of reasonable responses. Accordingly, the Claimant's unfair dismissal complaint is upheld."

Submissions

11. Ms Thompson, counsel for the Respondent, relies on four matters in support of the contention that the Employment Tribunal substituted their own view of the reasonableness of the sanction of dismissal rather than considering whether the dismissal fell within the band of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer. In support of that contention Ms Thompson relies on four matters.

12. First, in paragraph 48 of the judgment, in setting out the mitigating features of the Claimant's offence the Tribunal introduced their own mitigating features. Ms Thompson draws attention to the fact that, having set out the mitigating features to which she had drawn attention which were considered by the Respondent, the Employment Tribunal added:

> "To that, we might add that the Claimant knew Mr Donnelly and Mr Donnelly in turn knew Mr Dearden. [Mr Dearden was the end recipient of the pornographic material] In other words all of the three individuals in the chain were well-known to each other and had forged business relations together."

The Tribunal also added as a mitigating feature:

> "It is also accepted by the Respondent that Mr Noble, who is senior to the Claimant, did send inappropriate sexist emails although those were not of a pornographic nature."

13. Ms Thompson contends that the Employment Tribunal erred in relying on the mitigation introduced by them in that those matters were not relevant to the employer's decision. Their introduction indicates very clearly that the Tribunal made their own assessment of the gravity of the Claimant's conduct rather than assessing the reasonableness of the approach of the Respondent to it.

14. Secondly, Ms Thompson relies on paragraph 48 of the judgment in another regard. She contends that the Tribunal's judgment in that paragraph shows that the Tribunal failed to set out perhaps the most aggravating feature of the Claimant's offence; a feature which was relied upon to a considerable extent by the Respondent in taking the decision to dismiss the Claimant. That was the senior position that the Claimant held within the Respondent organisation. He was a manager responsible for managing other staff and that he could be expected to set an example to such staff.

15. Thirdly, Ms Thompson says that it is clear from comments of the Employment Tribunal in paragraphs 54 and 55 of their judgment that they relied upon their own view of the seriousness of the pornography and also took into account that emails containing sexist jokes had been sent to the Claimant by a more senior employee. It is to be noted that the Employment Tribunal did not have before it the text of those allegedly sexist jokes, nor indeed did the employers. All that the Tribunal had before them to make their observations was the title of those emails: "Why middle aged women should stay at home" and "Women Drivers…eh?". The Employment Tribunal did not have any further material about those emails to enable them to assess their comparable gravity with the sexually explicit pornographic material which they did have before them.

16. Fourthly, it is said by Ms Thompson that the Tribunal erred by making their own assessment of what would be the least serious of Category B infringing material according to the matrix which forms part of the Respondent's IT policy. It was their own assessment of the seriousness of the pornographic material which led the Employment Tribunal to comment that infringement of the IT by possession in forwarding such material should not be regarded as gross misconduct.

17. The Claimant, appearing in person, contends that Ms Thompson's approach is over analytical and that we should not go through the Employment Tribunal judgment line by line. In effect, we should not go through it with a fine toothcomb. Read as a whole, Mr Lindsay contended, that the Employment Tribunal reached a conclusion which was open to them on the evidence.

Discussion and Conclusion

18. The principles of law relied upon by both the Respondent and the Claimant are clear and correctly stated by them. The task of the Employment Tribunal in these circumstances was to consider whether the employer's conduct in dismissing the Claimant fell within the band of reasonable responses to the employee's conduct. The Employment Tribunal in these circumstances must not stray into taking that decision by relying upon what they would have decided. A decision of an Employment Tribunal must not be subject to a fine toothcomb analysis and it should not be interfered with unless there is a demonstrable error of law, or perversity.

19. The Employment Tribunal stated in their judgment that they had been extremely careful not to substitute their own view for that of the employer. It is not sufficient to articulate that correct approach; it must be carried out in practice. In our judgment the contentions of Ms Thompson, that the Employment Tribunal substituted their own approach and judgment for that of the employer and failed to consider whether the sanction of dismissal as a response to the Claimant's conduct was one which was within the band of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer is well made out.

20. In our judgment the Employment Tribunal erred in their reliance as a mitigating feature on at least one of the two matters relied upon by Ms Thompson as having been added by them. That was the Tribunal's reliance on emails sent by Mr Noble which were referred to them in their judgment. As we have observed, neither the Employment Tribunal nor the Respondent were in a position to assess the gravity of those emails. The Tribunal did not see their content, only their titles. Yet, the Employment Tribunal did apparently rely on the sending of those emails by a more senior manager to the Claimant as justifying a more lenient view to be taken of the pornography which the Claimant forwarded on to a more junior employee.

21. Secondly, the Employment Tribunal erred in omitting what was on the evidence a serious consideration in the mind of Mr Morrin in upholding the decision to dismiss the Claimant. Ms Thompson took us to a number of passages in which the managerial position of the Claimant had been referred to as a significant factor in the decision to dismiss. We refer to one as an example. In re-examination Mr Morrin said, as appears from a document in our bundle at page 71 at paragraph 34:

> "He adds that the behaviour of senior managers within the business is important because, as Managing Director, he is looking to senior managers to lead by example. This is undermined when senior managers do not follow the Group's standards of behaviour. The Claimant was in the role of senior manager. He was a regional director responsible for a team of people, not a small group of people in the office, including 6 other associate employees."

22. Thirdly, in our judgment, the Employment Tribunal made their own assessment of the relative gravity of the pornography forwarded by the Claimant and the assumed sexist emails sent by Mr Noble. They relied on their views and erred in so doing. They also erred in basing their views on an assumption without evidence of the contents of those emails.

23. Fourthly, the Employment Tribunal made their own assessment of the gravity of the offence of the Claimant and their own assessment of the seriousness of the material forwarded by the Claimant within the matrix on IT policy. They said in paragraph 55 of the judgment: "However, in this case, the Claimant's offence was towards the lowest end of the spectrum." In our judgment, they erred in making their own assessment rather than considering whether the assessment and judgment made by the Respondent was one within the range of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer in the circumstances.

24. In our judgment, the Employment Tribunal erred in substituting their own view of the reasonableness of the sanction of dismissal rather than considering whether the dismissal fell within the range of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer. Accordingly, this appeal is allowed. We remit the case to a differently constituted Employment Tribunal to decide whether the sanction of dismissal was within the range of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer in the circumstances. Dependent on this determination, the remission is for the Employment Tribunal to determine the fairness of the dismissal within the Employment Rights Act 1996 section 98(4).

25. The relevant findings of fact and determinations are otherwise to stand. Those include the conclusions and decisions of the Employment Tribunal on all the factors in British Home Stores Ltd v Burchell [1978] IRLR 379, namely the belief by the employer that the employee was guilty of misconduct, the reasonableness of the investigation and any other steps up to the assessment of the reasonableness of the sanction imposed.

vexatious to return to the appeal tribunal in order to argue his remaining grounds of appeal. If he does, he may find himself in peril as to the order for costs which the appeal tribunal have jurisdiction to make under paragraph 19 (1) of Schedule 11 to the Act of 1978. We make these observations having regard to the facts that before us the employee made his submissions with moderation and common sense, and his Pyrrhic forensic victory before the appeal tribunal may carry with it a risk that he might feel that it should encourage him to continue with his litigation although the decision of this court has removed the foundation of at least a great deal of the grounds of appeal pleaded in his notice of appeal to the appeal tribunal. We therefore allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.
No order as to costs.

[EMPLOYMENT APPEAL TRIBUNAL]

ICELAND FROZEN FOODS LTD. v. JONES

1982 July 28, 29

Browne-Wilkinson J., Mr. J. P. Bell and Mrs. M. Boyle

Employment—Unfair dismissal—Reasonableness of dismissal—Misconduct—Foreman's failure to secure warehouse—Dismissal—Finding that employer unreasonable in treating conduct as ground for dismissal—Test of whether employer acting reasonably—Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 (c. 44), s. 57 (3) (as amended by Employment Act 1980 (c. 42), s. 6)

The employee, a night shift foreman, was dismissed by the employers for failing to operate the security system at the employers' premises and for taking part in an attempt to deceive the employers into making extra overtime payments. On his complaint to an industrial tribunal that his dismissal was unfair, the tribunal rejected the employers' submission that when applying section 57 (3) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, as amended,[1] a tribunal should not find the dismissal unfair unless the decision to dismiss was so unreasonable that no reasonable employer would have decided to take that course. They took the view that the correct test was whether in their opinion the employers had acted reasonably, and they found that the employee's misconduct was not sufficiently serious to warrant dismissal. They accordingly held that the employers had acted unreasonably in dismissing him, within the meaning of section 57 (3), and that the dismissal was unfair.

[1] Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, s. 57, as amended: "(3) . . . the determination of the question whether the dismissal was fair or unfair, having regard to the reason shown by the employer, shall depend on whether in the circumstances (including the size and administrative resources of the employer's undertaking) the employer acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating it as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee; and that question shall be determined in accordance with equity and the substantial merits of the case."

On the employers' appeal:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the correct approach for an industrial tribunal, when applying section 57 (3) of the Act of 1978, was to consider whether the employers' decision to dismiss fell within the band of reasonable responses to the employee's conduct which a reasonable employer could adopt; that the industrial tribunal had erred in law in rejecting that approach; and that, accordingly, the case would be remitted to a different industrial tribunal for reconsideration.

Jowett v. Earl of Bradford (No. 2) [1978] I.C.R. 431, E.A.T. not followed.

Per curiam. Although the statement of principle in Vickers Ltd. v. Smith [1977] I.R.L.R. 11, is entirely accurate in law, for the reasons given in N. C. Watling & Co. Ltd. v. Richardson [1978] I.C.R. 1049, we think industrial tribunals would do well not to direct themselves by reference to it (post, p. 25B).

APPEAL from an industrial tribunal sitting at Shrewsbury.

The employers, Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd., appealed from a decision of the industrial tribunal on November 13, 1981, that the employee, John Graham Jones, had been unfairly dismissed, on the ground, inter alia, that the industrial tribunal had erred in law in their construction of section 57 (3) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

J. Tracy Forster for the employers.
D. J. Hale for the employee.

BROWNE-WILKINSON J. delivered the following judgment of the appeal tribunal. This is an appeal from a decision of an industrial tribunal which held that Mr. Jones, the employee, had been unfairly dismissed by his employers, Iceland Frozen Foods Ltd. He was employed by the company from April 13, 1980, until July 2, 1981, when he was summarily dismissed by the warehouse distribution manager, Mr. Boyland. The employers carry on business in retail food distribution selling frozen foods. They operate 43 shops all of which are supplied from a cold store at the Deeside Industrial Estate at Queensferry. Adjacent to that store are the administrative offices of the company. The store and the administrative offices do not intercommunicate. At the time of his dismissal the employee was the night shift foreman at the warehouse. The company is of fair size with about 450 employees altogether.

The circumstances of the dismissal were these. The night shift operated a 40 hour week. If, on any night, they had finished their work they knocked off early; if they had not finished their work by the end of the shift they continued to work thereafter. Only if in any week they had in all worked more than 40 hours was overtime paid. They were also working under a scheme which provided a bonus in the event that errors in the loading of the lorries were avoided. The ordinary night shift hours were from 10 p.m. until 6 a.m. There was a break between the last day shift and the commencement of the night shift, and also a break between the end of the night shift at 6 a.m. and the commencement of ordinary work some hour and a half later. It was part of the employee's duties at the start of the night shift to unlock the warehouse and disconnect the electronic security system covering both the warehouse and the office. At the end of the night shift, it was his duty to lock up the warehouse (and the office accommodation if it were open) and to re-activate the security system which was itself linked to a central security system run by an independent contractor.

The events in question took place on the night of July 1 and 2, 1981. When the day shift arrived on the morning of July 2 it was found that the office accommodation was unlocked and although the warehouse was locked the electronic security system had not been re-activated. Mr. Boyland was present when that was discovered. Mr. Boyland then looked into the matter with the security company and confirmed that the electronic alarm had not been re-activated. He drew the inference, correctly, that the employee could not have locked the administrative block or re-activated the alarm before leaving the premises after the conclusion of the night shift. He also discovered that the night shift had worked for the full eight hours on the night of July 1 and 2 but the number of items that had been loaded was substantially smaller that the normal average for a full eight hour shift; indeed, it was approximately 20 per cent. less than on the previous night. He reached the conclusion that there had been a deliberate " go-slow " by the night shift workers with the objective of earning overtime for that week. He thought that the employee, as foreman, must be a party to that deliberate go-slow.

As a result, Mr. Boyland summoned the employee to an interview before the start of the night shift on the evening of July 2. The meeting took place at 6.30 p.m. and lasted for about 10 minutes. The industrial tribunal were unable to make express findings as to what took place at that meeting save in certain respects which we will mention hereafter. At the conclusion of the meeting Mr. Boyland summarily dismissed the employee.

The employee then brought proceedings claiming that he had been unfairly dismissed. The industrial tribunal held that the dismissal was unfair and awarded him compensation assessed at £1,719, having held the employee to have contributed to his own dismissal to the extent of 40 per cent. and reduced the compensation by that proportion.

The industrial tribunal approached the question of the substantive fairness of the dismissal and the procedural fairness of the dismissal separately. The tribunal came to the conclusion that the reason for dismissal of the employee was his failure to re-activate the security alarm and to lock up the premises, and also the belief which Mr. Boyland held that the employee, as foreman, had allowed or possibly encouraged the night shift to "go-slow" that night.

As to the substantive merits of the decision to dismiss, the industrial tribunal asked itself this question: Did the two-fold faults by the employee make it reasonable to dismiss him? They answered that "In our view, they did not." They did not regard his failure in relation to the alarm as being serious, saying that everyone makes mistakes sometimes. They did not regard the particular error as to security as being of an obviously serious nature on that occasion. They obviously regarded the time of day at which it took place, namely, in the morning between 6 a.m. and 7.30 a.m. as being a time at which the premises were not very vulnerable and pointed out that there were drivers around at that time.

As to the "go-slow," they did not think it was reasonable to dismiss on that ground bearing in mind the fact that some three months previously the employee, as foreman, had been told that he had been too tough and peremptory with his gang. Having set out their reasons much more fully than we have sought to summarise them they conclude by saying:

> ". . . in our view neither of the [employee's] faults, either singly or taken together, came anywhere near being sufficiently serious to make it reasonable to dismiss him applying the provisions of section 57 (3) as amended. For these reasons we find this dismissal to be unfair on its general merits."

They then went on to say that in their view the dismissal was also unfair on procedural grounds. The employee, under his contract, had the right to be accompanied by a representative at any disciplinary meeting before a decision was taken to dismiss him. That provision had been breached. They also came to the conclusion that at the short 10 minute meeting the employee was not allowed to put over his case at all, his case being that the night shift were working slower than usual with the object of avoiding errors and thereby earning the full bonus for careful loading. The industrial tribunal also took the view that the reality of the case was that there had been over much haste in the dismissal. The tribunal for those and other reasons held that the dismissal would have been unfair on procedural grounds alone.

Although, as will appear, we do not regard the treatment of the case in two separate portions (the one dealing with the reasonableness of the substantive decision and the other the reasonableness of the procedure) to be a desirable course, in order to deal with the arguments presented to us we too will divide it into those two sections.

As to the decision of the industrial tribunal that the dismissal was unfair in that dismissal was an inappropriate sanction for the offence committed, it is submitted that the industrial tribunal misdirected themselves in law in the way they approached section 57 (3). From the passages we have read (which in our view are the only ones that are material) it is clear that the industrial tribunal simply find that it was not reasonable to dismiss him. They do not indicate in the passage we have read whether in so saying they are taking the view that they would not have thought it reasonable in the circumstances, or whether they were considering whether the decision to dismiss fell within the band of reasonable conduct which a reasonable employer could adopt. However, in paragraph 20 of their decision they make it clear that they were not adopting the latter test. They say:

> " In this connection we would mention the case of Rolls-Royce Ltd. v. Walpole [1980] I.R.L.R. 343. Miss Tracy Forster's submission was that this case decided that an industrial tribunal should not when applying section 57 (3) find the dismissal to be unfair unless the decision to dismiss was so unreasonable that no reasonable employer would have decided to dismiss. If the Walpole case really decides this, then it is really harking back to the decision in Vickers Ltd. v. Smith [1977] I.R.L.R. 11, which the present chairman endeavoured in the case of Jowett v. Earl of Bradford (No. 2) [1978] I.C.R. 431 to apply in his dissenting view at first instance in the latter case: it seems to us that if the Walpole case really has the effect submitted by Miss Tracy Forster then it must be regarded as inconsistent with Jowett v. Earl of Bradford. We do not really regard the Walpole case as being any more than a primarily factual decision that in that particular case there was no evidence upon which the industrial tribunal could reasonably find that the dismissal was other than reasonable applying the section 57 (3) test. There can be no doubt of course (with all respect to the Employment Appeal Tribunal) that different divisions of the Employment Appeal Tribunal have from time to time set out the test in different language, and we would not wish to try and reconcile all the statements of the law in a considered paper on the subject. It seems to us that the right course is simply to endeavour to apply as industrial jurors the test laid down by section 57 (3) as amended without adorning the language of that section in any way. That is what we have endeavoured to do in this case. . . . It certainly seems to us that if a test on the lines of Vickers Ltd. v. Smith is the true test, then it would result in the number of successful claims for unfair dismissal (presently, we understand, only about one-third of the cases which are actually contested) being very much reduced because the number of cases which come before us in which there has been a 'conduct' dismissal on grounds so slim that a tribunal would be likely to form the view that no reasonable employer would have dismissed, is relatively small."

In our judgment, the industrial tribunal misdirected themselves in law in their approach to this question. The paragraph we have just read indicates that the industrial tribunal disregarded the principle enunciated in Rolls-Royce Ltd. v. Walpole [1980] I.R.L.R. 343 (which they regarded as being identical with the principle in Vickers Ltd. v. Smith) relying, as they did, on the decision of another division of the appeal tribunal in Jowett v. Earl of Bradford (No. 2) [1978] I.C.R. 431. In the Jowett case it was held that Vickers Ltd. v. Smith did not lay down any rule of law as to the principle to be adopted in approaching the application of section 57 (3) but merely laid down guidelines. Therefore, in the view of the appeal tribunal in the Jowett case, an industrial tribunal could not misdirect itself in law if it failed to adopt the approach set out in Vickers Ltd. v. Smith.

In our view, the decision in Jowett's case is no longer good law. The history of the matter is this. In Vickers Ltd. v. Smith [1977] I.R.L.R. 11, 12, this appeal tribunal reversed the decision of an industrial tribunal on the grounds:

> " not only was it necessary to arrive at the conclusion that the decision of the management was wrong, but that it was necessary to go a stage further, if they thought that the management's decision was wrong, and to ask themselves the question whether it was so wrong, that no sensible or reasonable management could have arrived at the decision at which the management arrived in deciding who should be selected . . . for redundancy."

This appeal tribunal only has jurisdiction to alter the decision of an industrial tribunal if it has erred in law. It necessarily followed that in Vickers Ltd. v. Smith the appeal tribunal was regarding the principle we have just read as a principle of law, failure to comply with which constituted an error of law.

Next, comes the decision in the Jowett case which treated Vickers Ltd. v. Smith as laying down guidelines only, not as stating a principle of law.

Very shortly thereafter the matter was considered by another division of this appeal tribunal in N. C. Watling & Co. Ltd. v. Richardson [1978] I.C.R. 1049. In that case Phillips J., having quoted the words of the predecessor of section 57 (3), said, at p. 1056:

> " The difficulty is that the words can be applied in practice in more than one way. One view—now rejected in the authorities, and to be regarded as heretical—is that all the industrial tribunal has to do is say to itself, reciting the words of paragraph 6 (8), ' Was the dismissal fair or unfair? '; that having done that it has arrived at an unappealable decision; and that in answering that question it is not required to apply any standard other than its own collective wisdom. What the authorities, including Vickers Ltd. v. Smith, have decided is that in answering that question the industrial tribunal, while using its own collective wisdom is to apply the standard of the reasonable employer; that is to say, the fairness or unfairness of the dismissal is to be judged not by the hunch of the particular industrial tribunal, which (though rarely) may be whimsical or eccentric, but by the objective standard of the way in which a reasonable employer in those circumstances, in that line of business, would have behaved. It has to be recognised that there are circumstances where more than one course of action may be reasonable. In the case of redundancy, for example, and where selection of one or two employees to be dismissed for redundancy from a larger number is in issue, there may well be and often are cases where equally reasonable, fair, sensible and prudent employers would take different courses, one choosing A, another B and another

> C. In those circumstances for an industrial tribunal to say that it was unfair to select A for dismissal, rather than B or C, merely because had they been the employers that is what they would have done, is to apply the test of what the particular industrial tribunal itself would have done and not the test of what a reasonable employer would have done. It is in this sense that it is said that the test is whether what has been done is something which 'no reasonable management would have done.' In such cases, where more than one course of action can be considered reasonable, if an industrial tribunal equates its view of what itself would have done with what a reasonable employer would have done, it may mean that an employer will be found to have dismissed an employee unfairly although in the circumstances many perfectly good and fair employers would have done as that employer did. . . . The moral is that none of the phrases used in the authorities, such as 'did the employer act in a way in which no reasonable employer would have acted?' is to be substituted as the test to be applied. The test is, and always is, that provided by paragraph 6 (8). The authorities do no more than try, according to the circumstances, to indicate the standard to be used by the industrial tribunal in applying the paragraph. But every time the starting point for the industrial tribunal is the language of the paragraph."

It does not appear that the decision in the Jowett case was cited in N. C. Watling & Co. Ltd. v. Richardson.

In Rolls-Royce Ltd. v. Walpole [1980] I.R.L.R. 343, exactly the same principle as that set out in N. C. Watling & Co. Ltd. v. Richardson [1978] I.C.R. 1049 was enunciated in different but helpful words; the decision of the industrial tribunal was reversed by the appeal tribunal for failure to conform to that principle. Mr. J. D. Hughes said, at p. 346:

> "As this appeal tribunal pointed out in the judgment in Watling's case, in a given set of circumstances it is possible for two perfectly reasonable employers to take different courses of action in relation to an employee. Frequently there is a range of responses to the conduct or capacity of an employee on the part of an employer, from and including summary dismissal downwards to a mere informal warning, which can be said to have been reasonable. It is precisely because this range of possible reasonable responses does exist in many cases that it has been laid down that it is neither for us on an appeal, nor for an industrial tribunal on the original hearing, to substitute our or its respective views for those of the particular employer concerned. It is in those cases where the employer does not satisfy the industrial tribunal that his response had been within that range of reasonable responses, that the industrial tribunal is enjoined by the statute to find that the dismissal of the relevant employee has been unfair."

Again, the Jowett case does not appear to have been cited in Rolls-Royce Ltd. v. Walpole.

Finally, in British Leyland U.K. Ltd. v. Swift [1981] I.R.L.R. 91 the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of an industrial tribunal that a dismissal was unfair and substituted a decision that it was fair. Lord Denning M.R. said, at p. 93: A

> "The first question that arises is whether the industrial tribunal applied the wrong test. We have had considerable argument about it. They said: '. . . a reasonable employer would, in our opinion, have considered that a lesser penalty was appropriate.' I do not think that that is the right test. The correct test is: Was it reasonable for the B employers to dismiss him? If no reasonable employer would have dismissed him, then the dismissal was unfair. But if a reasonable employer might reasonably have dismissed him, then the dismissal was fair. It must be remembered that in all these cases there is a band of reasonableness, within which one employer might reasonably take one view: another quite reasonably take a different view. One would quite reasonably dismiss the man. The other would quite reasonably C keep him on. Both views may be quite reasonable. If it was quite reasonable to dismiss him, then the dismissal must be upheld as fair: even though some other employers may not have dismissed him."

Ackner L.J. said, at p. 93:

> "As has been frequently said in these cases, there may well be circumstances in which reasonable employers might react differently. An D employer might reasonably take the view, if the circumstances so justified, that his attitude must be a firm and definite one and must involve dismissal in order to deter other employees from like conduct. Another employer might quite reasonably on compassionate grounds treat the case as a special case."

E

Although the reasons given by the third member of the Court of Appeal, Griffiths L.J., are not the same, in our judgment the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Swift case was that the industrial tribunal had erred in law by failing to apply the right principle. Even though the Jowett case was not cited in the Court of Appeal it is, in our view, inconsistent with the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case and is no longer good law. It follows that in the present case the industrial tribunal F has misdirected itself in law by failing to follow the Watling v. Richardson principle.

Since the present state of the law can only be found by going through a number of different authorities, it may be convenient if we should seek to summarise the present law. We consider that the authorities establish that in law the correct approach for the industrial tribunal to adopt in G answering the question posed by section 57 (3) of the Act of 1978 is as follows: (1) the starting point should always be the words of section 57 (3) themselves; (2) in applying the section an industrial tribunal must consider the reasonableness of the employer's conduct, not simply whether they (the members of the industrial tribunal) consider the dismissal to be fair; (3) in judging the reasonableness of the employer's conduct an industrial H tribunal must not substitute its decision as to what was the right course to adopt for that of the employer; (4) in many, though not all, cases there is a band of reasonable responses to the employee's conduct within which

A one employer might reasonably take one view, another quite reasonably take another; (5) the function of the industrial tribunal, as an industrial jury, is to determine whether in the particular circumstances of each case the decision to dismiss the employee fell within the band of reasonable responses which a reasonable employer might have adopted. If the dismissal falls within the band the dismissal is fair: if the dismissal falls outside the band it is unfair.

B Although the statement of principle in Vickers Ltd. v. Smith [1977] I.R.L.R. 11 is entirely accurate in law, for the reasons given in N. C. Watling & Co. Ltd. v. Richardson [1978] I.C.R. 1049 we think industrial tribunals would do well not to direct themselves by reference to it. The statement in Vickers Ltd. v. Smith is capable of being misunderstood so as to require such a high degree of unreasonableness to be shown that C nothing short of a perverse decision to dismiss can be held to be unfair within the section. This is how the industrial tribunal in the present case seems to have read Vickers Ltd. v. Smith. That is not the law. The question in each case is whether the industrial tribunal considers the employer's conduct to fall within the band of reasonable responses and industrial tribunals would be well advised to follow the formulation of the principle D in N. C. Watling & Co. Ltd. v. Richardson [1978] I.C.R. 1049 or Rolls-Royce Ltd. v. Walpole [1980] I.R.L.R. 343.

Reverting now to the facts of this case, it is suggested that notwithstanding the misdirection, we can uphold the decision of the industrial tribunal on the ground that on any footing it was manifestly unreasonable for the employers to dismiss in the circumstances of this case. The industrial tribunal obviously regarded the employee's faults as minor ones. E We cannot accede to the view that notwithstanding the misdirection we can substitute our own decision in this case. Take, for example, the failure to lock the office and to set the alarm. The industrial tribunal took the view that the offence was comparatively trivial; it does not necessarily follow that all reasonable employers would share their view on the matter. It may well be that the misdirection on this point is fundamental to the decision F of the case. We do not know enough of the circumstances of the employers' business to decide whether the importance which they obviously attached to the breach of security was such that a reasonable employer might take the view that the risk of repetition of the breach of security was too great to allow the risk to continue. We express no view on the point one way or the other. We simply cannot decide the matter ourselves on the material we have before us.

G As to the alternative ground relied on by the industrial tribunal, namely, procedural unfairness, as we have said we do not think it the correct approach to deal separately with the reasonableness of the substantive decision to dismiss, and the reasonableness of the procedure adopted. The correct approach is to consider together all the circumstances of the case, both substantive and procedural, and reach a conclusion in all the H circumstances. Moreover, it has been demonstrated to us from the notes of evidence that on an important issue on procedure the industrial tribunal apparently misdirected itself. The industrial tribunal took the view that Mr. Boyland at the short interview did not give the employee an opportunity to state his case as to the reason for the go-slow. The notes of evidence disclose that both Mr. Boyland and the employee himself gave evidence that at that interview the employee did put forward his explanation of the go-slow by the night shift. In the circumstances, it cannot be safe for us to uphold the decision of the industrial tribunal on the ground of procedural unfairness alone.

We therefore allow the appeal and remit the case to a differently constituted industrial tribunal to consider the matter afresh. It will be for the new industrial tribunal to consider whether in all the circumstances of the case the nature of the employee's shortcomings were such that a reasonable employer carrying on the employers' business would have regarded the dismissal as being a reasonable response and whether, in the circumstances of the case, the dismissal was carried out in a fair way. As we say, that is a matter entirely for the new industrial tribunal. But we do point out that whatever the merits of the substantive decision in this case, the procedure by which the dismissal was carried out has to be carefully considered and taken into account. It may not have been fair, and we say no more than that, to have dismissed the employee with the haste which was shown in this case without giving him an opportunity to have a representative there. But that will be a matter for the tribunal to weigh together with all the other circumstances of the case.

Appeal allowed.
Case remitted to another tribunal for reconsideration.

Judge Ansell, Mrs D M Palmer and Mr G H Wright

B Discrimination — Sex — Burden of proof — Burden on complainant to establish facts capable of constituting unlawful discrimination — Burden shifting to employer to prove treatment in no sense on ground of sex — Inferences to be drawn from employer's disregard of code of practice or questionnaire — Whether relevant to equal pay claim — Equal Pay Act 1970, s 1(3) (as substituted by Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations 1983 (SI 1983/1794), reg 2(2)) — Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (as amended by Race Relations Act 1976, Sch 4, para 1 and Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/2660), regs 3, 5), ss 1(2), 56A(10), 63A, 74(2)

C

On a complaint of sex discrimination under section 1(2) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975[1], it is for the applicant, pursuant to section 63A, to prove on the balance of probabilities facts from which the employment tribunal could conclude, in the absence of an adequate explanation, that the employer has committed an act of discrimination against the applicant which is unlawful by virtue D of Part 2, or which by virtue of section 41 or 42 is to be treated as having been committed by the employer. Whether the applicant has proved such facts will usually depend on what inferences it is proper to draw from the primary facts found by the tribunal. Those inferences can include any that it is just and equitable to draw in accordance with section 74(2)(b) from an evasive or equivocal reply to a questionnaire or any other questions falling within section 74(2). Likewise, the tribunal must decide whether any provision of a code of practice is relevant, and, E if so, take it into account pursuant to section 56A(10). At this stage the tribunal does not have to reach a definitive determination of unlawful discrimination (para 25(1)–(7)).

Once the applicant has proved facts from which the inference could be drawn that the employer has treated the applicant less favourably on the ground of sex, the burden of proof moves to the employer, and it is for the employer to prove that he did not commit, or as the case may be, is not to be treated as having committed, that act, F by proving on the balance of probabilities that the treatment was in no sense whatsoever on the ground of sex. A tribunal is thus required to assess, not merely whether the employer has proved an explanation for the facts from which inferences can be drawn, but whether it is adequate to discharge the burden of proof on the balance of probabilities that sex was not any part of the reasons for the treatment in question; and, since the facts necessary to prove an explanation would normally be in the possession of the employer, a tribunal would normally expect cogent evidence to G discharge that burden of proof, in particular where the employer sought to explain a failure to deal with the questionnaire procedure, or to follow a code of practice (post, para 25(8)–(12)).

tribunal, despite the tribunal's concerns over the employer's response to a sex discrimination questionnaire and its non-transparent bonus policy, and the applicant appealed—

Held, allowing the appeal, (1) that there was an abundance of primary fact material from which the tribunal could, and should, have drawn inferences, in the absence of an adequate explanation from the employer, entitling it to conclude that an act of discrimination falling within section 1(2) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 had been committed and that the burden of proof was placed on the employer to prove that sex was not a reason for the less favourable treatment; and that the employment tribunal had not dealt with the matter by the required two-stage process, and the complaint would be remitted for rehearing (post, paras 31, 32, 33).

(2) That, in determining the claim under the Equal Pay Act 1970, the tribunal had failed adequately to take into account important factors in concluding that the material factor defence in section 1(3) had been established by the employer, and that matter also would be remitted (post, para 37).

Per curiam. (i) Where section 74 of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 refers to "this Act" it should not, as a matter of construction, be taken to include the Equal Pay Act 1970; nor is section 74 to be treated as having been incorporated into the 1970 Act by inference. However, the parties were agreed that under the normal common law rules of evidence inferences against an employer which could be drawn under section 74, particularly if the employer fails to deal with questions in relation to aspects of contractual pay, could also be used against the employer in 1970 Act proceedings (post, para 28).

(ii) No tribunal should be seen to condone a City bonus culture, involving secrecy and/or lack of transparency because of the potentially large amounts involved, as a reason for avoiding equal pay obligations (post, para 30).

APPEAL from an employment tribunal sitting at London Central

By an originating application dated 5 September 2001, the applicant, C Ms Louise Barton, made a complaint of discrimination contrary to the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and a claim for equality of pay with two comparators under section 1 of the Equal Pay Act 1970 against her employer, Investec Henderson Crosthwaite Securities Ltd. By a decision promulgated on 30 September 2002 the employment tribunal held that (1) the employer had proved that the variation in salary and long-term D incentive payments between the applicant and her comparator was genuinely due to a material factor which was not the difference of sex; (2) difference in treatment between the applicant and the comparator in relation to the grant of share options was due to a material factor which was not the difference of sex for the purposes of the 1970 Act, or if the share options were not regulated by the contract of employment, did not amount to less favourable treatment of the applicant on the ground of her sex; and E (3) the employer did not treat the applicant less favourably on the ground of sex in awarding bonuses.

By notice of appeal dated 18 October 2002 the applicant appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) in determining the sex discrimination claim the tribunal had not adopted the correct approach to the issue of sex discrimination; and (2) in determining for the purposes of the claim under F the 1970 Act whether the material factor defence provided in section 1(3) of the Act was made out, the tribunal had, notwithstanding its correct identification of the appropriate test, failed properly to apply such test to the facts.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Cur adv vult

3 April. The following judgment of the appeal tribunal was handed down.

H JUDGE ANSELL

1 This is an appeal from a decision of an employment tribunal sitting at London Central, which, following a hearing held in June 2002, by a reserved decision promulgated on 30 September 2002, unanimously held that (1) the employer had proved that the variation in salary and long-term incentive payments between the applicant and her comparator, Matthew Horsman, was genuinely due to a material factor which was not the difference of sex; (2) a difference in treatment between the applicant and Matthew Horsman in relation to the grant of share options was due to a material factor which was not the difference of sex for the purposes of the Equal Pay Act 1970 or, if the share options were not regulated by the contract of employment, did not amount to less favourable treatment of the applicant on the ground of her sex; (3) the employer did not treat the applicant less favourably on the ground of sex in awarding bonuses.

2 This case raises important issues both as regards the burden of proof in sex discrimination cases, following the insertion of section 63A into the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 in October 2001, and also with regard to what are termed the "opaque pay structures" in City of London financial institutions, particularly those structures which allow individual managers considerable discretion, which, the applicant contends, runs contrary to the whole ethos of the equal pay and anti-discrimination legislation over the last 30 years.

3 The applicant, aged 52 at the time of the hearing, has 23 years' experience in the fund management and broking investment banking fields and, in particular, 20 years as a respected media expert. She joined the employer as an analyst in June 1990, and by the late 1990s she had become their research director. She was particularly successful in the old style of backroom analysis, but was said to be less happy with the more modern rôle of the analyst, involving a high profile image for both herself and her employer. Over the years, she had also involved herself in stock sales for her clients, although, again, the modern trend was towards concentrating sales with specialist salesmen. The tribunal found that the applicant's way of doing her own sales was not appreciated or encouraged by senior management. The tribunal's conclusion was, however, that the applicant had a genuinely high profile in a limited specialist media context, but less so in the developing broader media world of broadcasting and the internet.

4 The employer employs 150 staff, comprising 40 in credit finance, 40 in sales, 40 in research, and the rest in support functions. The employer is a subsidiary of a larger organisation, Investec Bank UK, which is itself linked to Guinness Mahon and the Bank of Yokohama. The employer's only witness before the employment tribunal was Perry Crosthwaite, the chairman, and the person who, the tribunal found, was very much the key figure in the setting of salaries and other benefits and bonuses. The tribunal found that the four elements to the final package of the employees concerned in these events comprised the basic salary, a bonus awarded at the end of the financial year, share options and long-term incentive payments. Long-term incentive payments are amounts awarded, but paid over a period of time between two to four years, whose principal aim is to keep valuable employees within the organisation.

5 Matthew Horsman joined the employer on 1 January 1997 as a research director, having previously been a respected financial journalist with "The Independent" newspaper. The applicant had been actively involved in his recruitment. In the years after his arrival, the applicant and Mr Horsman pooled their bonuses, although they were not necessarily

A shared. By June or July 1999, the tribunal found, Mr Crosthwaite had been made aware that there were attempts being made by other organisations to poach Mr Horsman. He was desperate not to lose him as he was regarded as one of the three key members of staff within the organisation. At that time, both he and the applicant were on a basic salary of £105,000, and a decision was made to increase Mr Horsman's salary to £150,000 and to
B award him a long-term incentive payment of £75,000. Further, in December 1999, he was granted 12,000 share options, whereas the applicant only received 7,500. It is these three aspects of pay that give rise to the claim under the 1970 Act, although, as we have already indicated, the tribunal was unsure as to whether or not share options fell within the ambit of the 1970 Act.

6 By early 2001, the applicant had been given information in relation to
C the possible disparity of salaries between her and Mr Horsman; that information did not extend to the disparity as regards share options or long-term incentive payments. As a result of a complaint to her employer, the employer increased her salary from April 2001 to £150,000, the same as Mr Horsman, but said nothing to her about the other aspects of salary. She only found out about those matters much later in the year, once proceedings
D had been commenced. The other main issue in the case relates to the setting of bonuses. The tribunal held that after 1998 bonuses were less closely based on the revenue produced by the particular employee. The determination as to what factors were taken into account with regard to bonus setting after that date and the nature of the process involved are very much at the heart of this case.

E 7 Michael Savage joined the media term as a specialist media salesperson in June 2000, having 14 years' experience in the City, and having both trained as a research analyst and then developed specialist sales skills. The tribunal found that the employer saw him as a very valuable acquisition, combining sales, analytical, organisational and client-handling skills, and to secure him they offered him a salary of £150,000 and a long-term incentive payment of £150,000 per annum for two years, and a guaranteed minimum
F bonus of £50,000, although the long-term incentive payment element in the remuneration did involve some compensation for benefits that he had lost from his previous employment. He was not the comparator for equal pay purposes, since the tribunal held, and it is not disputed, that he was not involved in like work with the applicant. The tribunal also held, although the issue had been a matter of some argument within the tribunal hearing,
G that Mr Savage was put in charge of the team at the end of 2000. They found that the applicant had received this news badly and became increasingly non co-operative, declining to contribute to a team budget and compiling her own.

8 The 1975 Act claim arises from the award of the 2001 budget in the spring of that year. The tribunal found that the employer's bonus setting was: "a rough and ready process, not a precise science. It was not a paper
H based exercise." They also spoke of an "underlying philosophy of avoiding precision and written material to prevent giving individuals the material on which they could challenge their bonuses". The bonuses awarded in the spring of 2001 were £1m to Mr Horsman, £600,000 to Mr Savage and £300,000 to the applicant. It is said that she had generated revenue of £3·2m, Mr Savage £5·3m and Mr Horsman £10m. There was considerable cross-examination in the tribunal as to respects in which the applicant's figures had been undervalued and Mr Savage's overvalued. The applicant's complaint was in relation to the differential between her bonus and that of Mr Savage, particularly as he had been in the organisation for only ten months of the bonus year.

9 The tribunal found that, comparing the cases of the applicant and Mr Horsman, the genuine material factor defence in section 1(3) of the 1970 Act was made out. It referred in particular to the employer's concern about the threat of Mr Horsman being head-hunted, and its desire to keep him on a par with the other two key players in the organisation; and it went on to find:

> "all the increases were conscientious, unscientific efforts to secure Matthew Horsman for the future of the business by putting his benefits at the top of the range sustainable within the [employer] organisation: putting his benefits in line with those of other key players established proportionally."

10 With regard to the bonus issue, the tribunal held that after 1998 the approach to bonuses was "multi-factorial" and not simply driven by revenues. It referred to public profile, client management and team participation as being relevant considerations. In paragraph 81 of its reasons, the tribunal said:

> "The tribunal also had questions in relation to the history of the litigation in this case, the avoidance of disclosure of information and the changing of the [employer's] case over time. More generally, the tribunal [was] also concerned about the backdrop of an unwritten, non-transparent bonus policy in an organisation without an appraisal system and without an equal opportunities policy. It took into account that this was a culture with a significant preponderance of men where the applicant was the most senior female."

Later, in paragraph 88, the tribunal said:

> "The tribunal took as part of [its] industrial knowledge that it is a vital component of the City bonus culture that bonuses are discretionary, scheme rules are unwritten and individuals' bonuses are not revealed. [It was] satisfied that the cultural reason for this is that invidious comparisons would become inevitable. If such comparisons were generally possible the bonus system would collapse. The tribunal accepted the [employer's] unwillingness to disclose bonuses until compelled by law to do so as part of that culture, particularly bearing in mind that the applicant was until January 2002 an employee still in employment, seeking bonus details about fellow employees. It found Perry Crosthwaite's unwillingness to be open on the subject of bonus figures consistent with that culture."

Yet it concluded in paragraph 90: "the differentials were [not] consciously or subconsciously motivated or permeated by discrimination."

11 The applicant contends that this case raises important issues for this court to consider. First, we are invited to look at the issue of the burden of

A proof and sex discrimination claims in the light of the changes brought about by section 63A of the 1975 Act. Next, we are asked to consider the proper approach to a failure to comply with the questionnaire procedure and/or the code of practice. Then we are asked to consider effectively whether the court should condone, as the tribunal appeared to do, an "opaque" procedure for bonus setting, involving lack of transparency and
B objectivity which, according to the tribunal's views, appears to be prevalent in some financial institutions. Indeed, Mr Allen, on behalf of the applicant, with his usual clear and erudite manner, called this case a "paradigm example" of how inequality occurs in a system.

Statutory framework

C 12 Section 1 of the Equal Pay Act 1970, which did not come into operation until 29 December 1975, provides:

> "(1) If the terms of a contract under which a woman is employed at an establishment in Great Britain do not include (directly or by reference to a collective agreement or otherwise) an equality clause they shall be deemed
D to include one.
> "(2) An equality clause is a provision which relates to terms (whether concerned with pay or not) of a contract under which a woman is employed (the 'woman's contract'), and has the effect that—(a) where the woman is employed on like work with a man in the same employment—(i) if (apart from the equality clause) any term of the woman's contract is or becomes less favourable to the woman than a
E term of a similar kind in the contract under which that man is employed, that term of the woman's contract shall be treated as so modified as not to be less favourable . . .
> "(3) An equality clause shall not operate in relation to a variation between the woman's contract and the man's contract if the employer proves that the variation is genuinely due to a material factor which is not
F the difference of sex and that factor—(a) in the case of an equality clause falling within subsection (2)(a) or (b) above, must be a material difference between the woman's case and the man's . . .
> "(4) A woman is to be regarded as employed on like work with men if, but only if, her work and theirs is of the same or a broadly similar nature, and the differences (if any) between the things she does and the things they G do are not of practical importance in relation to terms and conditions of employment; and accordingly in comparing her work with theirs regard shall be had to the frequency or otherwise with which any such differences occur in practice as well as to the nature and extent of the differences."

H Section 1(2) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 provides:

> "In any circumstances relevant for the purposes of a provision to which this subsection applies, a person discriminates against a woman if—(a) on the ground of her sex, he treats her less favourably than he treats or would treat a man . . ."

Section 5(3) provides:

"A comparison of the cases of persons of different sex or marital status under section 1(1) or (2) . . . must be such that the relevant circumstances in the one case are the same, or not materially different, in the other."

13 The said section 1(2)(a) of the 1975 Act applies to discrimination in the employment field, and by section 6:

" . . . (2) It is unlawful for a person, in the case of a woman employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against her . . . (b) by dismissing her, or subjecting her to any other detriment . . . (6) Subsection (2) does not apply to benefits consisting of the payment of money when the provision of those benefits is regulated by the woman's contract of employment."

Section 63A provides:

"(1) This section applies to any complaint presented under section 63 to an employment tribunal.

"(2) Where, on the hearing of the complaint, the complainant proves facts from which the tribunal could, apart from this section, conclude in the absence of an adequate explanation that the respondent—(a) has committed an act of discrimination against the complainant which is unlawful by virtue of Part 2 . . . the tribunal shall uphold the complaint unless the respondent proves that he did not commit, or, as the case may be, is not to be treated as having committed, that act."

14 Section 56A provides for the procedure for the Equal Opportunities Commission to issue codes of practice for certain purposes including the elimination of discrimination in the field of employment and the promotion of equality of opportunity in that field between men and women. These codes, once prepared by the Commission, have to obtain approval of the relevant Secretary of State and both Houses of Parliament. Section 56A(10) provides:

"A failure on the part of any person to observe any provision of a code of practice shall not of itself render him liable to any proceedings; but in any proceedings under this Act or the Equal Pay Act 1970 before an employment tribunal any code of practice issued under this section shall be admissible in evidence, and if any provision of such a code appears to the tribunal to be relevant to any question arising in the proceedings it shall be taken into account in determining that question."

15 The Equal Opportunities Commission Code of Practice on Equal Pay was issued on 26 March 1997 and was brought into force on that date.

16 Under the heading "Transparency" the code provides:

"19. It is important that the pay system is clear and easy to understand; this has become known as transparency. A transparent pay system is one where employees understand not only their rate of pay but also the components of their individual pay packets and how each component contributes to total earnings in any pay period. Transparency is an

A advantage to the employer as it will avoid uncertainty and perceptions of unfairness and reduce the possibility of individual claims.

"20. The European Court of Justice has held that where the organisation concerned applies a system of pay which is wholly lacking in transparency and which appears to operate to the substantial disadvantage of one sex, then the onus is on the employer to show that the B pay differential is not in fact discriminatory. An employer should therefore ensure that any elements of a pay system which could contribute to pay differences between employees are readily understood and free of sex bias."

Paragraphs 25 onwards in the code set out a suggested review of pay systems for sex bias and in paragraph 29 bonuses are highlighted as an area of C potential difficulty. Finally, paragraph 39 provides:

"It is good employment practice for employees to understand how their rate of pay is determined. Information about priorities and proposed action could be communicated to employees as part of the process of informing them about how the pay systems affect them individually. This will serve to assure employees that any sex bias in the D payment system is being addressed."

Section 74 of the 1975 Act sets out a questionnaire procedure and allows the Secretary of State to prescribe:

"(1) . . . (a) forms by which the person aggrieved may question the respondent on his reasons for doing any relevant act, or on any other E matter which is or may be relevant; (b) forms by which the respondent may if he so wishes reply to any questions."

Subsection (2) provides:

"Where the person aggrieved questions the respondent (whether in accordance with an order under subsection (1) or not)—(a) the question, and any reply by the respondent (whether in accordance with such an F order or not) shall, subject to the following provisions of this section, be admissible as evidence in the proceedings; (b) if it appears to the court or tribunal that the respondent deliberately, and without reasonable excuse, omitted to reply within a reasonable period or that his reply is evasive or equivocal, the court or tribunal may draw any inference from that fact that it considers it just and equitable to draw, including an inference that G he committed an unlawful act."

Proof of discrimination—burden of proof

17 The courts have always acknowledged that it was rare for an applicant complaining of discrimination to have evidence of overtly discriminatory words or actions, therefore the affirmative evidence of H discrimination will normally consist of inferences to be drawn from the primary facts. Having established those inferences, a concept of a shifting burden began to be developed whereby the employer was then called upon to give an explanation so as to negative those inferences. In Khanna [2543] v Ministry of Defence [1981] ICR 653, 658–659, the Employment Appeal

Tribunal (Browne-Wilkinson J presiding) dealt with these evidential problems in the following way:

> "In the future, we think industrial tribunals may find it easier to forget about the rather nebulous concept of the 'shift in the evidential burden' . . . In this case, the industrial tribunal would, we suspect, have found the case rather more straightforward if, looking at all the evidence as a whole, they had simply decided whether the complaint had been established. No useful purpose is served by stopping to reach a conclusion on half the evidence. The right course in this case was for the industrial tribunal to take into account the fact that direct evidence of discrimination is seldom going to be available and that, accordingly, in these cases the affirmative evidence of discrimination will normally consist of inferences to be drawn from the primary facts. If the primary facts indicate that there has been discrimination of some kind, the employer is called on to give an explanation and, failing clear and specific explanation being given by the employer to the satisfaction of the industrial tribunal, an inference of unlawful discrimination from the primary facts will mean the complaint succeeds . . ."

18 Later in the same year, in Chattopadhyay v Headmaster of Holloway School [1982] ICR 132, 137, Browne-Wilkinson J repeated the concept that he had outlined in Khanna:

> "It is for this reason that the law has been established that if an applicant shows that he has been treated less favourably than others in circumstances which are consistent with that treatment being based on racial grounds, the industrial tribunal should draw an inference that such treatment was on racial grounds, unless the respondent can satisfy the industrial tribunal that there is an innocent explanation . . ."

In two subsequent cases in the Court of Appeal May LJ expressed a degree of dissatisfaction with the passages in Khanna : see Morris v London Iron and Steel Company Ltd [1987] ICR 855 and North West Thames Regional Health Authority v Noone [1988] ICR 813. Eventually, clarification was sought and obtained from the Court of Appeal in King v Great Britain-China Centre [1992] ICR 516, 528–529 and the frequently quoted passage of Neill LJ:

> "From these several authorities it is possible, I think, to extract the following principles and guidance. (1) It is for the applicant who complains of racial discrimination to make out his or her case. Thus if the applicant does not prove the case on the balance of probabilities he or she will fail. (2) It is important to bear in mind that it is unusual to find direct evidence of racial discrimination. Few employers will be prepared to admit such discrimination even to themselves. In some cases the discrimination will not be ill-intentioned but merely based on the assumption that 'he or she would not have fitted in'. (3) The outcome of the case will therefore usually depend on what inferences it is proper to draw from the primary facts found by the tribunal. These inferences can include, in appropriate cases, any inferences that it is just and equitable to draw in accordance with section 65(2)(b) of the [Race Relations Act

A 1976] from an evasive or equivocal reply to a questionnaire. (4) Though there will be some cases where, for example, the non-selection of the applicant for a post or for promotion is clearly not on racial grounds, a finding of discrimination and a finding of a difference in race will often point to the possibility of racial discrimination. In such circumstances the tribunal will look to the employer for an explanation. If no explanation is B then put forward or if the tribunal considers the explanation to be inadequate or unsatisfactory it will be legitimate for the tribunal to infer that the discrimination was on racial grounds. This is not a matter of law but, as May LJ put it in North West Thames Regional Health Authority v Noone [1988] ICR 813, 822, 'almost common sense.' (5) It is unnecessary and unhelpful to introduce the concept of a shifting evidential burden of proof. At the conclusion of all the evidence the C tribunal should make findings as to the primary facts and draw such inferences as they consider proper from those facts. They should then reach a conclusion on the balance of probabilities, bearing in mind both the difficulties which face a person who complains of unlawful discrimination and the fact that it is for the complainant to prove his or her case."

D That passage was approved by the House of Lords in Glasgow City Council v Zafar [1998] ICR 120.

19 The importance of the tribunal's fact-finding rôle in these cases was emphasised in Anya v University of Oxford [2001] ICR 847, 855D–E, para 10, where Sedley LJ referred to the "ubiquitous need to make the findings of primary fact without which it is impossible to consider the E drawing of relevant inferences".

20 The European Community Treaty, in article 2, set out the need for the Community to develop policies to promote "equality between men and women". The Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers (COM (89) 248 final), adopted by the European Council in Strasbourg in 1989, spoke in its preamble of the aims to combat F discrimination on the grounds of sex and to implement equal pay for men and women for equal work. Paragraph 16 provides:

> "Equal treatment for men and women must be assured. Equal opportunities for men and women must be developed. To this end, action should be intensified wherever necessary to ensure the implementation of the principle of equality between men and women as regards in particular G access to employment, remuneration, working conditions, social protection, education, vocational training and career development."

Council Directive 97/80/EC on the burden of proof in cases of discrimination based on sex (OJ 1998 L14, p 6) dealt with the burden of proof in cases of discrimination based on sex. The preamble to the Directive provides:

H "Whereas plaintiffs could be deprived of any effective means of enforcing the principle of equal treatment before the national courts if the effect of introducing evidence of an apparent discrimination were not to impose upon the respondent the burden of proving that his practice is not in fact discriminatory;

"Whereas the Court of Justice of the European Communities has therefore held that the rules on the burden of proof must be adapted when there is a prima facie case of discrimination and that, for the principle of equal treatment to be applied effectively, the burden of proof must shift back to the respondent when evidence of such discrimination is brought."

Article 2(1) provides: "For the purposes of this Directive, the principle of equal treatment shall mean that there shall be no discrimination whatsoever based on sex . . ." Article 4(1), under the heading "Burden of Proof", provides:

"Member states should take such measures as are necessary, in accordance with their national judicial systems, to ensure that, when persons who consider themselves wronged because the principle of equal treatment has not been applied to them establish, before a court or other competent authority, facts from which it may be presumed that there has been direct or indirect discrimination, it shall be for the respondent to prove that there has been no breach of the principle of equal treatment."

Thus section 63A of the 1975 Act was introduced as a result of that Directive and was inserted by the Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001. The commencement date of 12 October 2001 was in relation to any proceedings under section 63 in an employment tribunal whenever instituted, except proceedings which were determined before that date.

21 Mr Allen argues that the new section clearly introduces a new approach to sex discrimination cases, requiring, effectively, an amendment to the guidelines in King v Great Britain-China Centre [1992] ICR 516 and he highlights the words "could . . . conclude in the absence of an adequate explanation". Thus he submits that the first stage of the procedure is for the tribunal to consider primary facts proved by the applicant to see what inferences of secondary fact could be drawn from them from which they could conclude that an act of sexual discrimination had been committed absent any explanation from the employer. He submits further that these inferences could include, in appropriate cases, inferences that it is just and equitable to draw in accordance with section 74, e g from an evasive or equivocal reply to a questionnaire, and also any inferences that it is proper to draw from a failure to comply with any relevant code of practice under section 56A. He submits that at this stage the tribunal does not have to reach a definitive determination that such facts would lead it to the conclusion that there was an act of unlawful discrimination, but only that the facts could lead to that conclusion.

22 In those circumstances he submits that the burden of proof will then move to the employer to prove that he did not commit, or as the case may be, is not to be treated as having committed that act. To discharge that burden, it would be necessary for the employer to prove on the balance of probabilities that the treatment in question was in no sense whatsoever on the grounds of sex, since he argues "no discrimination whatsoever" is compatible with the Equal Treatment Directive 76/207 or the Burden of Proof Directive 97/80. In other words, the burden of proof is upon the

A employer to show that sex was not any part of the reasons for the treatment in question.

23 Mr Lemon, for the employer, argues that the new section does not have such a dramatic effect as contended for by the applicant. He referred us to the most recent authority in this area Shamoon v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary [2003] ICR 337, a decision given on 27 February
B 2003, only a few days before the hearing of this appeal. The appeal raised an issue concerning identification of the appropriate comparator and the assumption made by their Lordships that the appropriate comparator was a hypothetical comparator rather than the two male chief inspectors who had originally been put forward as comparators by the applicant. Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead states, at p 342, para 12:

C "The most convenient and appropriate way to tackle the issues arising on any discrimination application must always depend upon the nature of the issues and all the circumstances of the case. There will be cases where it is convenient to decide the less favourable treatment issue first. But, for the reasons set out above, when formulating their decisions employment tribunals may find it helpful to consider whether they should postpone determining the less favourable treatment issue until after they have
D decided why the treatment was afforded to the claimant. Adopting this course would have simplified the issues, and assisted in their resolution, in the present case."

Mr Allen submits that Shamoon's case is of little assistance to us because: (a) there was an actual comparator in our case, and (b) the tribunal decided
E the case prior to the implementation of section 63A, which was not considered at all by their Lordships. We agree with his submissions.

24 Mr Lemon, however, contends that the tribunals should not use too rigid and prescriptive an approach to these issues. The tribunal is seeking an answer to a single question: did the employee, on a prescribed ground, receive less favourable treatment than others; which question is to be answered on the balance of probabilities. He submits that if the tribunal,
F having considered all the evidence, is unable to decide where the balance of probabilities lies, and the employee has proved facts from which the tribunal could conclude that the employer had committed an act of unlawful discrimination, it would then uphold the complaint, unless the employer proves that it did not commit, or is not to be treated as having committed, the act of discrimination. We cannot agree with this submission, which does
G not appear to accord with the proper approach, as set out in both the Council Directives and section 63A of the 1975 Act.

25 We therefore consider it necessary to set out fresh guidance in the light of the statutory changes:

(1) Pursuant to section 63A of the 1975 Act, it is for the applicant who complains of sex discrimination to prove on the balance of probabilities facts from which the tribunal could conclude, in the absence of an adequate
H explanation, that the employer has committed an act of discrimination against the applicant which is unlawful by virtue of Part 2, or which, by virtue of section 41 or 42 of the 1975 Act, is to be treated as having been committed against the applicant. These are referred to below as "such facts".

(2) If the applicant does not prove such facts he or she will fail.

(3) It is important to bear in mind in deciding whether the applicant has proved such facts that it is unusual to find direct evidence of sex discrimination. Few employers would be prepared to admit such discrimination, even to themselves. In some cases the discrimination will not be an intention but merely based on the assumption that "he or she would not have fitted in".

(4) In deciding whether the applicant has proved such facts, it is important to remember that the outcome at this stage of the analysis by the tribunal will therefore usually depend on what inferences it is proper to draw from the primary facts found by the tribunal.

(5) It is important to note the word is "could". At this stage the tribunal does not have to reach a definitive determination that such facts would lead it to the conclusion that there was an act of unlawful discrimination. At this stage a tribunal is looking at the primary facts proved by the applicant to see what inferences of secondary fact could be drawn from them.

(6) These inferences can include, in appropriate cases, any inferences that it is just and equitable to draw in accordance with section 74(2)(b) of the 1975 Act from an evasive or equivocal reply to a questionnaire or any other questions that fall within section 74(2): see Hinks v Riva Systems Ltd (unreported) 22 November 1996.

(7) Likewise, the tribunal must decide whether any provision of any relevant code of practice is relevant, and if so take it into account in determining such facts pursuant to section 56A(10) of the 1975 Act. This means that inferences may also be drawn from any failure to comply with any relevant code of practice.

(8) Where the applicant has proved facts from which inferences could be drawn that the employer has treated the applicant less favourably on the grounds of sex, then the burden of proof moves to the employer.

(9) It is then for the employer to prove that he did not commit, or, as the case may be, is not to be treated as having committed, that act.

(10) To discharge that burden it is necessary for the employer to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that the treatment was in no sense whatsoever on the grounds of sex, since "no discrimination whatsoever" is compatible with the Burden of Proof Directive 97/80.

(11) That requires a tribunal to assess not merely whether the employer has proved an explanation for the facts from which such inferences can be drawn, but further that it is adequate to discharge the burden of proof on the balance of probabilities that sex was not any part of the reasons for the treatment in question.

(12) Since the facts necessary to prove an explanation would normally be in the possession of the employer, a tribunal would normally expect cogent evidence to discharge that burden of proof. In particular, the tribunal will need to examine carefully explanations for failure to deal with the questionnaire procedure and/or code of practice.

26 We now deal with two matters of law raised in relation to the 1970 Act. The tribunal set out in paragraph 60 of their reasons the test to be satisfied to establish the material factor defence, as set out in Brunnhofer v Bank der Österreichischen Postparkasse AG (Case C-381/99) [2001] ECR I-4961 and Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz (Case 170/84) [1987]

ICR 110. Mr Allen submits, therefore, that the burden was on the employer to prove: (1) that there were objective reasons for the difference; (2) unrelated to sex; (3) corresponding to a real need on the part of the undertaking; (4) appropriate to achieving the objective pursued; (5) that it was necessary to that end; (6) that the difference conformed to the principle of proportionality; (7) that such was the case throughout the period during which the differential existed.

27 Mr Lemon submits that no requirement for objective justification arises and cites in support a decision of this court, Tyldesley v TML Plastics Ltd [1996] ICR 356, 362:

> "In the absence of evidence or a suggestion that the factor relied on to explain the differential was itself tainted by gender, because indirectly discriminatory or because it adversely impacted on women as a group in the sense indicated in Enderby v Frenchay Health Authority (Case C-127/92) [1994] ICR 112, no requirement of objective justification arises . . . It was sufficient in law that the explanation itself caused the difference or was a sufficient influence to be significant and relevant, whether or not that explanation was objectively justified."

Mr Allen now argues that that authority cannot apply in this case because, on the facts of this particular case, the discrimination was both tainted by sex and involved a lack of transparency. He relies on dicta of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Strathclyde Regional Council v Wallace [1998] ICR 205, 214D:

> "if the factor explaining the disparity in pay is tainted by sex discrimination (whether direct or indirect) that will be fatal to a defence under subsection (3) unless such discrimination can be objectively justified . . ."

We agree with his submissions on this point as to the seven factors correctly identified by the tribunal.

28 A further issue arises as to whether it is appropriate to draw adverse inferences under section 74(2) of the 1975 Act in relation to the equal pay claim. Mr Allen first submits that, since the 1970 Act was amended and completely re-enacted and set out in Schedule 1 to the 1975 Act, as a matter of construction, where section 74 refers to "this Act", it should be taken to include the 1970 Act. We cannot agree with that submission. When one considers other sections within the Act e g sections 4, 53, 71 and 73, they refer to the 1970 Act as well as sections of the 1975 Act. Mr Allen further argues that, by inference, there should be no less favourable treatment in the 1970 Act to combat discrimination than there is in the 1975 Act, and accordingly that the questionnaire procedure should apply. Whilst we did not hear lengthy submissions on this area, we are not persuaded that section 74 should be incorporated into the 1970 Act on this basis; indeed we understand that in April 2003 a questionnaire procedure will be introduced into the Equal Pay Act legislation. However, both parties do agree that under normal common law rules of evidence inferences against the employer which can be drawn under section 74, particularly if they fail to deal with questions in relation to aspects of contractual pay, could be used against the employer in the 1970 Act proceedings.

29 Having attempted to determine the difficult issues of law that arise in this case, how do our decisions impact on the tribunal's findings? In relation to the claim under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, the applicant contends that the facts established in relation to both the lack of transparency and the failure of the employer to deal properly, or at all, with the questionnaire, must have invoked the operation of section 63A, thus requiring, first, an indication in the decision of the tribunal that it had reversed the burden of proof and, secondly, consideration of the adequacy or otherwise of the employer's explanation. The applicant further submits that, whilst the tribunal had made reference to the relevant statutory provisions, including section 63A, it did not carry out the two-stage process and, indeed, in the final paragraph of its decision, had effectively sought to roll up the two stages by looking for the "effective and predominant cause" without undertaking the precise task imposed by section 63A. As we have already indicated, Mr Lemon submits that on the facts of this particular case the tribunal, having considered both the lack of transparency and the deficiencies in the questionnaire process, had accepted the employer's reasons for the differences in bonus between the applicant and Mr Savage, being unrelated to sex without having to invoke section 63A.

30 Dealing with transparency, the applicant's substantial complaint was in relation to certain paragraphs of the decision, in particular paragraphs 38, 39 and 88, wherein the tribunal found and appeared to condone, in part relying on their "industrial knowledge", that the City "bonus culture" was one of secrecy and lack of transparency. The employment tribunal's alleged "industrial knowledge" of this culture certainly conflicted with the lay members of this appeal tribunal, who had experience of many large institutions operating transparent bonus systems, including formal end of year appraisals, followed by a properly documented bonus setting procedure. This tribunal would certainly wish to make it clear that no tribunal should be seen to condone a City bonus culture, involving secrecy and/or lack of transparency because of the potentially large amounts involved, as a reason for avoiding equal pay obligations. Mr Allen highlighted the tribunal's findings in relation to "the backdrop of an unwritten, non-transparent bonus policy in an organisation, without an appraisal system, without an equal opportunities policy", coupled with the tribunal's findings that they were not satisfied that the employer had given all discovery possible on the topic. The employer had not produced any documents relating to the process of determination of the bonuses; there was no documentation as to the determination of the salary increase and long-term incentive payment increases for Mr Horsman, or the basis upon which the amount of those increases had been determined. The tribunal had observed, concerning Mr Crosthwaite's evidence: "He was not forthcoming, either in the conduct of the litigation or in the course of evidence, as to pay differentials and reasons for them." The employer had refused to give any details of bonuses for anyone other than the applicant and her two comparators and, indeed, the process to obtain information about both the bonuses and salary packages of Mr Horsman and Mr Savage was extremely protracted. The agreed history placed before this court showed that the basic pay of Mr Savage was not disclosed until 18 September 2001; the salary for Mr Horsman and his long-term incentive payments, together with

A those for Mr Savage, and their bonuses, were not completely disclosed until 18 December 2001, and Mr Horsman's share options were not disclosed until 28 February 2002.

31 This history leads into the second major area of complaint from the applicant, which concerns the tribunal's failure to draw proper inferences from the employer's failure to deal with the litigation process, and, in B particular, the questionnaire process. Both counsel in the hearing before us spent some time taking us through the questionnaire and the replies, in an effort to satisfy us that there had been serious default on the part of the employer, and more particularly Mr Crosthwaite, in dealing with these matters. The tribunal dealt with these issues firstly in paragraphs 47–52, under the heading "Litigation Process". In dealing with the alleged failure to provide details of Mr Savage's bonus and long-term incentive payment, the C tribunal found that "there was a consistent avoidance of providing these details until an order was made by the tribunal for their disclosure in December". The tribunal also refers to an answer in the questionnaire which denied that Mr Savage was intended to be the head of the media team, although the tribunal in paragraph 33 had found that there was an intention that Mr Savage should lead the team. The tribunal also pointed out that it D took until April 2002 for final details of all payments made to Mr Horsman to be disclosed. The tribunal also found that behavioural issues against the applicant were not expressed to be a significant component in the bonus calculation until the amended IT3 was lodged on 29 January 2002. Again, in paragraph 81, the tribunal referred to the "questions in relation to the history of the litigation in this case, the avoidance of disclosure of E information and the changing of the [employer's] case over time". Mr Allen, in both his written and oral submissions, referred to certain other inconsistencies, some of which Mr Lemon has sought to answer. We do not find it necessary to go into each and every allegation. The tribunal's findings, albeit somewhat brief, coupled with the agreed history of this case make it clear that there were a number of serious matters, arising out of the failure of the employer to deal properly with the questionnaire procedure F and/or to give clear and consistent replies, that should have required the tribunal to draw adverse inferences.

32 We are, therefore, quite satisfied that there was an abundance of primary fact material from which the tribunal could, and indeed should, have drawn inferences, in the absence of an adequate explanation from the employer, such that they could conclude that an act of discrimination had G been committed, and that therefore the burden of proof was placed upon the employer to prove that sex was not a reason for the less favourable treatment in relation to the bonus setting.

33 Mr Allen further submits that since the tribunal made no adequate findings in relation to why the employer failed to deal properly or at all with the questionnaire procedure, then it must follow that the employer has failed to discharge the burden of proof that was upon it, and that the applicant is H entitled to a finding of discrimination. Mr Lemon argues that the burden is upon the employer to prove that it did not commit the act of discrimination, and that even if it does not have a satisfactory answer to all aspects of the questionnaire procedure, providing that it can satisfy the tribunal that the difference in sex played no part in its less equal treatment, then it would have discharged the burden. We can see the force of Mr Lemon's submission, although since the applicant's case rested principally on the lack of transparency and/or the failure to deal with the questionnaire procedure, the tribunal would certainly need to satisfy itself about these matters and examine carefully the employer's explanations before coming to the conclusion that the employer had discharged the burden upon it, particularly in the light of the importance given to both these aspects by the Code of Practice and the section 74 procedure. However, since the tribunal clearly did not, in our view, deal with the matter in the required two-stage process as we have indicated, we would propose to remit the matter to a fresh tribunal for it to reconsider the matter.

34 In relation to the equal pay claim, Mr Allen criticises the tribunal's decision, particularly in relation to its alleged failure to deal with the Brunnhofer criteria (Brunnhofer v Bank der Österreichischen Postparkasse AG (Case C-381/99) [2001] ECR I-4961) that we have set out above. In particular, he makes the following submissions.

(a) In the employer's reply to the questionnaire, it advanced three reasons for a differential in salary, two of which were related to criticisms of the performance of the applicant; at the hearing, the only reason advanced for the difference was that Mr Horsman was being head-hunted.

(b) Mr Crosthwaite's evidence was only that he had been told by another person that Mr Horsman was being head-hunted and had not made any inquiries with him about this, or as to the incentives that he was being offered. Mr Allen therefore submits that there was no evidence upon which the tribunal could make findings of fact that there was a real need on the part of the employer to increase Mr Horsman's salary and linked benefits in the way that it did.

(c) Even if there was a need in 1999 to provide some additional benefit for Mr Horsman, there was no evidence before the tribunal that the increases in salary/long-term incentive payments/share options was proportionate to meet that need. The only evidence came from Mr Crosthwaite, who said that Mr Horsman's salary was just increased to the highest that they could. In particular, there was no reason why there should have been a differential of share option when the options were granted in December 1999.

35 It was necessary for the employer to show that the material difference had existed throughout the period where there had been a difference in salary up to the point where the applicant's salary had been increased to that of Mr Horsman's in April 2001. The applicant's long-term incentive payments had not then been increased to the same as those of Mr Horsman, and when asked for an explanation for this failure in cross-examination, Mr Crosthwaite's response was: "It did not occur to us." Mr Allen argues that there was therefore no evidence to support the genuine material difference in relation to long-term incentive payments after equality of salary was restored in April 2001, particularly as the letter accompanying the salary increase in April 2001 had referred to the applicant's improved performance prior to the increase in her salary.

36 Finally, Mr Allen argues that the inferences that could be drawn from the lack of transparency and/or the failure to deal with the section 74 procedure are equally applicable within the equal pay claim.

37 Mr Lemon argues that the tribunal clearly, in paragraphs 77 and 78, deals with the seven criteria the employer has to prove to establish the material factor defence emanating from the desire to prevent Mr Horsman being head-hunted, which he contends was a continuing threat through 2000 and 2001, and that, as the tribunal found in paragraph 78, the differences "conformed to the principle of proportionality in that they corresponded to a real need of the undertaking, were appropriate to achieve that objective and necessary to that end". However, we cannot agree with that approach. Bearing in mind the background to this case, to which we have already made reference, namely the lack of transparency and the serious failure to deal with the questionnaire process, these were important factors which the tribunal failed to take into account when assessing the material factor defence. In particular, the tribunal failed properly to deal with: (1) whether the employer had proved that there were objective reasons for the difference; (2) the issues of proportionality; and (3) whether there was a real need on the part of the business for those differences existing throughout the period of the difference, i e between 1999 and 2001, particularly in the light of the employer's willingness in April 2001, following a complaint from the applicant, to increase her salary level to that of Mr Horsman without his salary then being further increased. Accordingly, in relation to the equal pay claim, we propose to allow the appeal and direct a rehearing before a different tribunal.

Appeal allowed.
Case remitted.
