119. In my judgment, it was open to the Commissioner to reach the conclusions she did in relation to both substitution and integration as there was evidence she was entitled to accept to support her conclusions and, applying the principles in Ó Culachain, neither the High Court nor this court ought therefore to overturn her decisions in respect of these two issues.

120. The findings on substitution and integration are not determinative of the status of the drivers as the want of mutuality of obligation precludes them from being employees of the appellant.

121. Haughton J. in a concurring judgment has indicated that he also would allow the appeal. Whelan J. in a dissenting judgment has indicated that she would not allow the appeal. Accordingly, the court will allow the appeal and set aside the judgment and order of the High Court and the decision of the Appeal Commissioner. It will make a declaration that pizza delivery drivers engaged by the appellant who worked during 2010 and 2011 did so under contracts for services as self employed independent contractors. As the appellant has been successful on the appeal, the provisional view of the court is that costs should follow the event and the appellant should be entitled to the costs of the appeal and of the High Court. If any party wishes to contend that the court should make a different order it may within ten days of the issuing of this judgment request the office of the Court of Appeal to arrange a short hearing in relation to the form of the order and/or the costs of the appeal. If the hearing does not result in an alteration of the indicative order, the party requesting the hearing may be required to pay the additional costs thereby incurred.

THE REVENUE COMMISSIONERS

RESPONDENT

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Haughton delivered on the 31st day of May, 2022

Introduction

1. This is an appeal by the appellant ("Karshan") from the judgment and order of O'Connor J. in the High Court on the Case Stated by the Tax Appeals Commissioner ("the Commissioner") concerning whether Karshan's pizza delivery drivers worked under contracts of service subject to PAYE and PRSI in accordance with s.112 of the Taxes Consolidation Act, 1997 (as amended) ("TCA 1997"), or whether they were self-employed independent contractors chargeable to tax under Case 1 Schedule D in respect of income of a trade. The appeal before the Commissioner concerns assessments in respect of 2010 and 2011, and the arrangements in place between Karshan and its drivers in those tax years.

2. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgments to be delivered by my colleagues Whelan J. and Costello J.

3. I am in broad agreement with the judgment of Costello J., and I too would allow this appeal.

4. In her judgment Costello J. sets out the background facts, including the relevant clauses of the written agreement entered into by each driver with Karshan, and two additional documents, one headed "Social Welfare and Tax Considerations", and the other entitled "Promotional Clothing Agreement". She also sets out the "Material findings of fact" as found by the Commissioner at para. 38 a – i of her Determination, after hearing evidence from witnesses. It is not necessary to repeat these materials here, although I will refer to certain elements later in this judgment.

Mutuality of obligation

5. Key to the issue is whether there is 'mutuality of obligation' in the relationship between the parties because this is a sine qua non of the employment relationship. As Edwards J. put it in Minister for Agriculture v. Barry [2009] 1 I.R. 215 at page 230 –

"The requirement of mutuality of obligation is the requirement that there must be mutual obligations on the employer to provide work for the employee and on the employee to perform work for the employer. If such mutuality is not present, then there is no contract at all or whatever contract there is must be a contract for services, or something else, but not a contract of service….".

6. Edwards J. went on to agree with the characterisation of the requirement as "one sine qua non which can firmly be identified as an essential of the existence of a contract of service"[1] and "that irreducible minimum of mutual obligation necessary to create a contract of service."[2]

7. That this was the appropriate 'gateway' test was accepted by the parties in argument before us, and has been approved and applied in a number of High Court decisions[3]. However the test appears to be evolving in England particularly arising from recent appeals from the Upper Tribunal (Tax and Chancery) and Court of Appeal, a subject to which I will return briefly towards the end of this judgment.

8. In Weightwatchers (UK) Ltd and ors v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2011] UKIT 433 (TCC), Briggs J. (as he then was), in a decision to which I shall refer in more detail, held at para. 31 that in cases where there is an overarching contract for discontinuous work, with discrete contracts for periods of work, it is necessary to show that "the requisite irreducible minimum of mutual work-related obligation subsists throughout each relevant discrete contract, not merely during the potentially shorter period when the contracted work is actually being done".

This was a House of Lords decision that affirmed the decision of the Industrial Tribunal that occasional work as tour guides of Blyth Power Station worked under contracts of services, and the case for employment "founders on the rock of absence of mutuality". Irvine L.J. observed in relation to the correspondence offering casual employment:

> "10….In substance [the tribunal] held that the documents did no more than provide a framework for a series of successive ad hoc contracts of service for services which the parties might subsequently make; and that when they were not working as guides they were not in any contractual relationship with the C.E.G.B. The parties incurred no obligations to provide or accept work but at best assumed moral obligations of loyalty ibn a context where both recognised that the best interests of each lay in being accommodating to the other."

9. In the present case there is an overarching written agreement, or general agreement ("the Agreement") between Karshan and each deliverer, the terms of which are agreed facts. As appears from the recital, the scope of the Agreement is " the delivery of pizzas" and "the promotion of the brand logo" which are "services" which the Contractor "is willing to provide…to the company", and clause 1 provides that "The Contractor shall be retained by the Company as an 'independent contractor' within the meaning of and for all the purposes of the said expression".

10. The respondent accepted, rightly in my view in light of certain terms to which I refer to later in this judgment, that the Agreement of itself does not satisfy the requirement of mutuality of obligation, and that the periods between rosters (as opposed to between shifts on one roster) when the Agreement was still in force were periods when the drivers were not to be treated as employees for the purposes of Schedule E. However this view is expressed obiter because whether the Agreement on its own meets the requirement of mutuality is a distinct legal issue which the Commissioner did not consider it necessary to determine, and it is not a question posed in the Case Stated.

11. Beneath the umbrella of this Agreement are a series of discrete contracts which arise either, as the respondent contends, at the time when a driver is placed on a roster for work on one or more shifts, typically for one week, or, as Karshan contends, only when the driver actually commences a work shift. The Case Stated concerns the Commissioner's determination in relation to these discrete contracts. If there is mutuality of obligation then, depending on the application of tests such as the degree of control over the worker, the level of integration of the work undertaken, and the opportunity to profit, these discrete contracts may be contracts of service/employment, or contracts for services. If there is not mutuality of obligation then the appeal succeeds and it is not necessary to consider the application of the further criterion of an employment relationship.

12. It is clear therefore that it was appropriate and necessary for the Commissioner, as she did, to receive and assess evidence looking beyond the Agreement in order to ascertain what occurred in practice in the series of engagements undertaken by deliverers, described by the Commissioner as "multiple individual contracts for assignments of work", and to make appropriate findings of fact, in order to determine the issue of law and for the purposes of the Case Stated.[4]

13. At the heart of the issue is whether an individual contract with mutual obligations comes into being after a driver indicates availability for work and at the time Karshan places the driver on a roster of shifts, as contended for by the respondent. This was what was determined by the Commissioner, with whom the High Court agreed on the Case Stated.

14. However, in my view she fell into error, as did the trial judge, in their analysis of the terms of the Agreement and their effect on the issue of mutuality of obligation when considering the discrete contracts. This error was not so much that the terms of Agreement were not considered – they were, in some detail - but rather that inadequate weight was given to the plain meaning of contractually agreed written terms that were incorporated into each of the individual contracts of engagement, and as a consequence in my view her material findings of fact in relation to practice were not considered properly in context. I am also of the view that both the Commissioner and the trial judge erred in their application of the reasoning of Briggs J. in Weightwatchers to the facts of the present case. In these respects I also respectfully disagree with the analysis in the judgment of Whelan J.

15. It hardly needs stating that parties to a work arrangement enjoy freedom to contract, and the starting point must be consideration of the terms of the formal contract actually agreed between the parties and executed by them, which the parties intend are to be incorporated into and govern the relationship between them in each individual engagement of the deliverer under which he/she provides services.

16. In saying this it must be accepted that this is a standard format agreement, prepared by Karshan's lawyers for execution by both Karshan and the putative deliverer in the presence of witnesses, and one which the deliverer is required to sign if he/she wants delivery work. In this sense there is inequality of bargaining power, and Karshan dictates the terms – Whelan J. describes it as the "asymmetrical nature of the overarching agreement."

17. However, I respectfully differ from Whelan J. insofar as she suggests in her draft judgment that giving effect to the terms of the Agreement may amount to an unduly rigid application of commercial principles governing the construction of contracts. While it is, from the putative deliverer's perspective, a 'take it or leave it' contract, it clearly has attractions to drivers. It is easy to see the appeal of such a contract to a person with their own car, motorbike or bicycle, and availability to work evenings or weekends. In particular, and as we will see, key terms give deliverers flexibility and control in relation to choosing the shifts that they wish to work, making it attractive to students, or others working during the day and seeking to supplement their income, but not necessarily wishing to be tied to regular shifts, and having the freedom not to work e.g. in the run up to or during exams, or when taking holidays. On the other side, it has clear advantages for Karshan, apart from considerations of taxation and employee rights; it can enter into Agreements with more drivers than it could provide delivery work for, and in that way ensure that it is never short of deliverers, and at little or no additional cost to its enterprise. As Whelan J. herself observes, it is not the function of the court to re-cast a party's bargain.

18. It must also be accepted that it is a well-established principle[5] that the expression of intention in contract documentation, and how the parties themselves describe their relationship, will not be accepted as decisive or conclusive in law. The Supreme Court applied this principle to an employment context in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd v Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 IR 34.

19. Nevertheless the law must accord appropriate deference to what the parties have actually agreed in a written document. As Geoghegan J. stated in Castleisland Cattle Breeding Society Ltd v Minister for Social and Family Affairs [2004] 4 IR 150, at p.161 in a passage quoted in part in the Commissioner's Determination:

> "…There is nothing unlawful or necessarily ineffective about a company deciding to engage people on an independent contractor basis rather than on a 'servant' basis but as this court pointed out in Henry Denny …and other cases, in determining whether the new contract is one of service or for services the decider must look at how the contract is worked out in practice as mere wording cannot determine its nature. Nevertheless the wording of a written contract still remains of great importance. It can, however, emerge in evidence that in practice the working arrangements between the parties are consistent only with a different kind of contract or at least are inconsistent with the expressed categorisation of the contract. In this case, apart from matters of minor detail, the written contract seems to have been the contract that was actually worked."

20. Paying close attention to the agreed written terms is particularly important where, as here, the individual engagements by drivers appear for the most part to be carried out in accordance with those written terms, albeit that the Commissioner found some differences in practice. This is a subject to which I will return later, but in essence I am of the view that the differences found by the Commissioner do not impact on the issue of mutuality of obligation.

21. Turning to the Agreement, there are provisions that are very clearly aimed at characterising the deliverers as "independent contractors", including an express term to that effect in clauses 1 and 17, the description of the deliverer as "the Contractor", the reference to the "subcontract [out of] delivery of pizzas, and the description of deliverers as "self-employed individuals".

22. These characterisations are clearly intended by the parties to avoid creating a contract of service. While they cannot be determinative of the question, it would be wrong to ignore them entirely. It is appropriate to take into account the express provisions that each deliverer is to "operate his/her own accounting system" (clause 9) and that Karshan "has no responsibility or liability whatsoever for deducting and/or paying PRSI or tax on any monies I may receive under this agreement". These clearly set out for the deliverer what is expected of him/her in terms of their tax affairs as an independent contractor in the event that they sign the agreement and undertake work. They are supplemented and confirmed in a second document that drivers were required to sign titled "Social Welfare and Tax Considerations". It will also be readily apparent to any driver entering in the Agreement that it will not entitle them to benefits such as holiday entitlement or sick pay that are characteristics of employment.

23. Of greater importance are other terms that demonstrate an intent to create an ongoing relationship which is not intended to have mutuality of obligation, and that in my view signify an intent not to import such mutuality into the series of engagements of the deliverer arising under the umbrella of the Agreement. Of central importance in my view are the following provisions:

> "9. The Company points out that in keeping with all self-employed individuals the financial risks and or rewards associated with providing the services as outlined in this contract are strictly under the control of the Contractor, and the Company bears no responsibility whatsoever for same. In particular, the Company does not warrant a minimum number of deliveries.
> "11. The Company accepts the Contractors right to engage in a similar contract delivery type service for other companies at the same time as this contract is in force."
> "12. The Company accepts the Contractor's right to engage a substitute delivery person should the Contractor be unavailable at short notice. Such person must be capable of performing the Contractor's contractual obligations in all respects.
> "14. The Company does not warrant or represent that it will utilise the Contractor's services at all; and if it does, the Contractor may invoice the company at agree rates. The Company, furthermore, recognises the Contractor's right to make himself available on only certain days and certain times of his own choosing. The Contractor, in turn, agrees to notify the Company in advance of his unavailability to undertake a previously agreed delivery service.
> "15. The Company reserves to itself the right to terminate this Agreement forthwith…"

I have underlined certain phrases because these were highlighted by the Commissioner in her reasoning, to which reference is made below.

24. Read together, and having regard to the Agreement as a whole, in my view these provisions mean that a Contractor 'signs up', but has no obligation to make himself or herself 'available' for work. They mean that Karshan may choose not to roster him/her for, or allocate, any delivery work at all – and the contractor has no remedy in law. In my view the plain and ordinary meaning of clause 14 goes further – even if a Contractor is rostered and turns up for work, Karshan is under no obligation to avail of his/her services – whether for delivery work or wearing company branded clothing. It means that the Contractor has the right to make himself available for work, and equally the right not to offer his/her name for any roster – this is a matter "of his own choosing", without obligation other than that of notification "in advance of his unavailability". I agree with Costello J. that, taken at its height, this could be construed as an obligation to give advance notice of a driver's unavailability, but it does not become an obligation to perform work with the meaning of the jurisprudence on mutuality of obligation. It also means that even if a driver puts his/her name down as available, and is rostered for work, there is no obligation to turn up for the rostered work. It is notable (but not determinative) that if that happens there is no sanction available to Karshan, nor is there any sanction for failing to notify Karshan in advance of unavailability The only consequence of absenteeism and/or failure to notify of unavailability would seem to be that a contractor might not be rostered again, or Karshan might terminate the Agreement – although neither of these consequences necessarily follows and no evidence or findings touched on this. Further the plain and ordinary meaning of the wording in clause 12 is that the Contractor has a right to engage a substitute if unavailable at short notice, but cannot be compelled to engage one. It is also expressly clear that a driver can do similar contract delivery work for other operators.

25. These were in substance the arguments pursued by Karshan before the Commissioner[6], in the High Court and in submissions to this court. The Commissioner disagreed and found that there was mutuality of obligation, on reasoning that found favour with the High Court.

26. One question that exercised this court during oral submissions was what might amount to repudiation or repudiatory conduct on the part of a driver, and specifically whether, if a driver failed to turn up for a shift for no reason (or for no good reason), this would be a repudiatory breach of contract. Counsel for the respondent accepted that a driver could fail to turn up for a shift for no reason, and that there would be no sanction, and a new contract would come into existence with the substitute driver. He also accepted that the umbrella Agreement could only be terminated in accordance with clause 15, in which Karshan reserved to itself the right to terminate "forthwith".

Where the Commissioner fell into error

27. At this point it is necessary to refer to parts of the Commissioner's Determination to identify where, in my view, she fell into error. The Commissioner made the following key finding of fact (upon which there can be no dispute):

> "a. I find as a material fact that, practice was that drivers would fill out an 'availability sheet' approximately one week prior to a roster being drawn up indicating their availability for work and that the roster would be drawn up by a store manager based on the availability sheets."

28. The Commissioner then considers "Was mutuality present?" from para.57 onwards. In that paragraph she observes that "The authorities are clear on the fact that while an individual is working, there is a contract in existence in which mutuality of obligation is present and both parties to the appeal agreed that this was the case."[7]

29. This proposition is not controversial and was not disputed by Karshan. It is not disputed that once the work is undertaken there is an obligation to pay for the work that is done – but that is a mutuality that applies equally to a contract for services, and is not the mutuality of obligation under consideration, which concerns the obligation to provide work, and the mutual obligation to perform work.

30. The Commissioner then states:

> "59. For a contract to exist the mutuality of obligation requirement must be satisfied in respect of the entirety of each contract. In other words, mutuality must be present for the period of the existence of the contract alleged to amount to a contract of employment and not just in respect of the period of time when the work is being carried out by the drivers."

31. This follows the approach taken by Briggs J. in Weight Watchers and is not a proposition that is disputed.

32. She then records in para. 61 the submission on behalf of Karshan that mutuality was absent because there was no obligation "on the driver to provide work[8]", and if the driver didn't show up for work no sanction could be imposed by the Karshan, and equally Karshan had no obligation to provide work to the drivers.

33. The Commissioner then accepted certain submissions of the Respondent:

> "64. The Respondent submitted that each individual contract commenced once the Appellant accepted notification by the driver of his availability for work in respect of

[7] The Commissioner at para.58 quotes from Elias J. in Stephenson v Delphi Diesel Systems [2003] 1 ICR 471 at para.13.

[8] As Karshan provided the work, the reference here is infelicitous and the Commissioner either intended to say there was no obligation on the driver to undertake work or that there was no obligation on Karshan to provide work, but the overall sense of the paragraph is clear enough.

a specific shift (or a series of shifts) and placed his name on the roster in respect thereof. The Respondent submitted that this agreement was the basis of the resulting contract and I accept this submission on behalf of the Respondent.

65. The Respondent submitted that the fact that a driver could exercise a choice in respect of the shifts for which he was available did not alter the fact that the relationship between the driver and the Appellant was and is governed by contract and contains mutual obligations to perform personal service. The Respondent submitted that mutuality was present for the entire duration of such contracts and I accept this submission on behalf of the Respondent."

34. The Commissioner then draws on the decision of Briggs J. in Weight Watchers[9]. There "Leaders" were engaged by Weight Watchers which promoted meetings of those wishing to lose weight. Leaders were required to arrange and conduct the meetings. Weight Watchers appealed the determinations that the leaders were subject to PAYE and a contribution similar to PRSI. There was an umbrella contract between Weight Watchers and each Leader, supplemented by multiple individual contracts in respect of each assignment of work, with each assignment involving one or more shifts of work.

35. The Commissioner in the present appeal considered clause 12 (the right to engage a substitute if unavailable at short notice) was comparable to condition 10 in Weight Watchers which provided:

"If the leader does not propose to take any particular meetings on any particular occasion and is unable to find a suitably qualified replacement, Weight Watchers (UK) Ltd will if so requested by the Leader, attempt to find such replacement and for this purpose the Leader will give the Area Service Manager as much prior notice as possible."

[9] Op cit.

36. Briggs J held that this condition might entitle a Leader to -

> "…propose not to take a particular meeting due to circumstances falling short of inability, such as a family wedding or funeral, in which the Leader is for good reason unwilling to take that particular meeting. But such a proposal by no means leaves the Leader free of any work-related obligation to WWUK, either in relation to that meeting or the series of meetings which she has agreed to take."

37. He considered that the Leader was by implication obliged first to try to find a suitably qualified replacement, and secondly, if that failed, to request assistance from the WWUK Area Service Manager with as much notice as possible – and only when a replacement was found or, in default the meeting cancelled, did the original leader's work-related obligation in relation to that meeting entirely cease.

38. Briggs J also held, in para. 90 that Condition 10 meant that "…where, as usual, a series of meetings has been agreed, a proposal by a Leader not to take a particular meeting leaves her obligation to take the remainder of the series intact."

39. The Commissioner then emphasises certain wording in clauses 12 and 14 of the Agreement, which I have underlined above, and finds – > "76. The Appellant contended that the drivers had no obligations whatsoever as they could choose not to turn up for any shift, safe in the knowledge that no sanction would be imposed. However, the contract envisages cancellation "should the Contractor be unavailable at short notice", together with a requirement of advance notification in accordance with clause 14. Thus the contract aims to some extent, to regulate the circumstances of cancellation by a driver. In this regard I note the condition 10 in the Weight Watchers (UK) Ltd case similarly provided for advance notification in relation to cancellations".

40. The Commissioner then refers to two UK Supreme Court cases of Pimlico Plumbers Ltd & anor v Smith [2018] UKSC 29 and Autoclenz ltd v Belcher & others [2011] UKSC 41. While acknowledging that they differ factually from the case before her, she found them of assistance as not supporting the proposition that mutuality of obligation is absent where there is a clause providing that the provider of work has no obligation to offer work, and the putative recipient has not obligation to accept the work. She reached her conclusion that the requirement of mutuality was satisfied, stating:

> "82. In this appeal, the right of a driver to cancel a shift was qualified by the requirement to engage a substitute, to provide advance notification to the Appellant and to work out the remainder of the shifts in the series which had been agreed.
> 83. I agree with the reasoning of Briggs J. in Weight Watchers (UK) Ltd and I conclude that a contract which provides drivers with the right to cancel shifts at short notice does not relieve a driver of work related obligations in the manner contended for by the Appellant."

41. I find this reasoning unconvincing. Firstly the Commissioner made no finding that Karshan was obliged to provide work to drivers, a key requirement of mutuality.

42. Secondly, on the terms of her primary finding of fact considered in the context of the Agreement, it was not open to the Commissioner to conclude that rostering created a contractual obligation to turn up and to render personal service. There is nothing remarkable about the Commissioner's finding of fact as to the practice of drivers indicating availability and then being rostered for certain shifts. Some form of communication between a driver and a Karshan manager was required in order for Karshan to sensibly roster drivers from the panel of drivers who signed Agreements. As counsel for Karshan argued, this merely implements the Agreement, it doesn't modify it. I do not consider that it necessarily follows that the moment a driver is rostered by the manager a discrete contract comes into being and the driver then has a legal obligation to work any shift, still less all of the shifts, for which they have been rostered, or that Karshan has the corresponding legal obligation to give them work on such shifts. Such an inference in my view flies in in the face of the express wording in the Agreement, and the freedom that the contracting parties clearly intended to be conferred on drivers to work or not to work, and on Karshan to provide or not to provide work. In this respect I differ slightly from Costello J. and incline to the view that no reasonable Commissioner would have concluded on the basis of her finding on rostering that a contract with mutual obligation came into being at the moment the driver's name was placed on the roster. In my view the combination of indicating availability and resultant rostering created no legal obligation on either party, and to borrow the words of Irvine L.J. in Carmichael & anor v National Power Plc [1999] 1 WLR 2042, Karshan and the drivers "at best assumed moral obligations of loyalty in a context where both recognised that the best interests of each lay in being accommodating to the other."

43. Thirdly, it is not correct to say that a driver cancelling a shift was subject to any requirement to engage a substitute. This was a misconstruction of Clause 12. The learned High Court judge also erred in finding that the right to cancel a shift at short notice "imposed obligations to engage a substitute and to work out the remainder of the shifts in the series." The Commissioner's finding of fact in respect of Clause 12 was that it –

> "permitted drivers to substitute another of the appellant's drivers when they were unavailable and that the substituted driver would be paid by the appellant in respect of this shift of work. The substitute could also be arranged by the appellant, if required." [Emphasis added]

The Commissioner adds, in para. 50 of her Determination, that "This arrangement was akin to the swapping of shifts between drivers."

44. Clause 12 confers a contractual right on the driver to engage a substitute, but places no obligation on them to do so, even where the driver is not available at short notice. It is, as the finding states, permissive of substitution/swapping. I cannot see how clause 12, or the Commissioner's findings in relation to its operation in practice, can have the effect of creating discrete contracts with mutuality of obligation at the moment of rostering. The originally rostered driver remained free not to turn up for work.

45. This is also an important point of distinction from the facts in Weight Watchers where the wording of clause 10 placed, as Briggs J. found, an implied obligation in the first instance on a Leader who did "not propose to take any particular meetings on any particular occasions" to try and find a suitably qualified replacement – Weight Watchers UK Limited having a fall back duty to "attempt to find a replacement" if so requested. I therefore cannot agree with Whelan J. that the implied obligation found by Briggs J. pursuant to clause 10 with is analogous to clause 12 in the instant appeal.

46. Each case must of course be decided on its own facts, and I consider the analogy with Weight Watchers unhelpful on a broader basis. That case concerned a very different form of work, where trained Leaders were required to set up meetings - Briggs J. found this to be the effect of Condition 6 – and the agreement and conditions in that case contained no provision equivalent to Clause 14 of the Agreement in the instant appeal. Moreover if the Leader did not turn up to lead the session the customers would (absent a replacement) be left disappointed. By comparison the failure of a driver to turn up for a rostered shift has the consequence that Karshan may (or may not) be short one driver, with little or no consequence beyond some delay in delivery time for Karshan's customers. It is easier to understand why the Briggs J. was more inclined to view a proposal by a Leader not to take a session as not leaving the Leader without any work-related obligation in relation to that meeting, and it is notable that on the plain language of Condition 10 he found that a proposal by a Leader not to take one session did not relieve the Leader from the obligation to take the remainder of the series of meetings. I agree with Costello J. that there are no equivalent terms in the contractual arrangements under consideration here.

47. I therefore agree with Costello J. that the Commissioner, and by extension the High Court, misapplied Weight Watchers. In the present case the mutuality of obligation only applied when work was actually being undertaken – it did not apply during the extended period covered by the rosters. I also agree that the trial judge erred in para.50 where he stated that he "….is not persuaded that mutuality of obligations always requires an obligation to provide work and to complete that work on an ongoing basis as contended for by the appellant. 'Ongoing' does not necessarily connote immediate continuation or a defined period of ongoing…".

48. In the High Court the trial judge considered that in relying on Weight Watchers the Commissioner "did not go against Irish law but rather recognised the necessity to adapt to modern means of engaging workers." Like Costello J. I also consider that the English cases need to be approached with caution given the statutory intervention in that jurisdiction. It is preferable that if there is to be significant change in this jurisdiction that it should be undertaken by the Oireachtas rather than by incremental adaption by the courts based on developments in the English caselaw.

The findings of difference between the Agreement and day to day operations

49. In para. 39 of the Case Stated the Commissioner found as material facts three differences between the Agreement terms and the day to day operations. I do not consider that these material differences assist the respondent.

50. The first was that there were in fact no company vehicles available for rent, despite clause 4 which provided that "…If the contractor does not have his own vehicle he 'may apply to rent a company delivery vehicle' from Karshan ". This provision contemplates the possibility of application for such rental, but the fact that no vehicles were in fact available is a deviation from the Agreement that does not in my view have any bearing on the question of mutuality of obligation.

51. The second finding was that not all drivers prepared invoices for submission to Karshan, despite clause 9 which required the Contractor "to provide a weekly invoice". The first difficulty with this finding is that it implies that some drivers actually did submit invoices. That aside in my view it also has little or no bearing on the question of mutuality of obligation in relation to work.

52. The third finding was that "some drivers were asked to perform work which was not stipulated in the contract i.e, the assembly of boxes in store, while waiting for a delivery". Again this finding is qualified – only "some" drivers were asked to do this, which implies others were not. It is not therefore a finding that supports mutuality of obligation in relation the contractual arrangement between Karshan and drivers in general.

53. Accordingly to the extent that the Commissioner makes these findings that the Agreement was operated somewhat differently in practice to the written terms, in my view none of these differences or variations impact on the question of mutuality of obligation.

Evolution of the test of mutuality of obligation in UK caselaw

54. I said I would return briefly to the test of mutuality of obligation. It should be recalled that before this court both parties accepted that the 'gateway' test was as enunciated by Edwards J., in Barry at page 230 i.e. –

> "The requirement of mutuality of obligation is the requirement that there must be mutual obligations on the employer to provide work for the employee and on the employee to perform work for the employer".

55. The test of mutuality of obligation appears to have undergone some refinement in the tribunals and courts of England and Wales, and this emerges from the recent judgment of Laing L.J. in in the Court of Appeal in Commissioners for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs v Professional Game Match Officials Limited [2021] EWCA Civ 1370, That is a decision which postdates the hearing of this appeal.

56. However the changes in approach, or perhaps a more nuanced approach that than enunciated by Edwards J. in Barry, were not argued by the respondents. In their written Submission at para. 34 the respondent expressly agrees that mutuality of obligations is the sine qua non of an employment relationship "and this principle is well recognised in the authorities set out by the Appellant at paragraphs 23 to 28 of its Submissions". Those paragraphs refer to and quote passages of the judgment of Edwards J. In Barry, of Lavan J. in Mansoor, Gilligan J. in Brightwater, and Ní Raifeartaigh J. in McKayed, the Irish caselaw that was also central to Karshan's oral submissions to this court.

57. While the respondents adopt the reliance placed by the Commissioner and the High Court on Weight Watchers, and in his judgment Briggs J. does refer to certain authorities later relied on by Laing J. in her judgment in Professional Game, and also relied on by Whelan J. in her judgment – including the judgments of Waite L.J. in McMeechan [1997] IRLR 353, Sir Christopher Slade in Clark v. Oxfordshire Health Authority (1997) 41 BMLR 18, [1998] IRLR 125, and Cornwall County Council v Prater [2006] IRLR 362– this was not the focus of argument by the respondent.

58. Accordingly I am of the view that it is not for this court to decide this appeal on principles of 'mutuality of obligation' as they have evolved in UK caselaw and legal texts, including (but not limited to) the Court of Appeal decision in Professional Game delivered since this appeal was argued, on the basis of arguments which were not pursued before the High Court, or before this court. These arguments may well arise for consideration in a future case.

Conclusion

59. In light of my agreement with Costello J. that the requirement of mutuality of obligation is absent from the arrangements/discrete contracts under which drivers undertake delivery shift work, it is not necessary to consider whether the further indicia of a contract of employment are satisfied. The Commissioner upon the facts proven or admitted was not correct in law in her interpretation and application of the concept of mutuality of obligation. I would therefore allow this appeal, and answer the first question posed in the Case Stated "No".

Master and Servant — Wrongful Dismissal — Usage — Custom as to Notice—Chief Sub-Editor and Night Editor—Daily Newspaper—Journalist Profession—Usage of six months' notice—Not established—Reasonable Notice—Six months.

The Court, in this case, held that the plaintiff, Chief Sub-Editor and Night Editor of a Daily Newspaper, failed to prove a usage or custom entitling him as Chief Sub-Editor to six months' notice, but held that he was, as Chief Sub-Editor and Night Editor, entitled to six months' notice as reasonable notice.

Maguire, P.

The plaintiff in this action claims damages for wrongful dismissal from his post as Chief Sub-Editor and Night Editor of the “Irish Press,” a well-known daily newspaper. Happily, I am not concerned with the reasons which led to his dismissal. The only issue I have to try is whether he was entitled to receive more than three months' notice to terminate his services with the defendants. The amount of damages to which he is entitled will be determined by the length of notice which I decide he is entitled to receive less by such sum as I hold he could reasonably have earned since his dismissal

The plaintiff, in his evidence, gave me the history of his journalistic career. It is of little help in the case, for although prior to his joining the “Irish Press” he twice held, and lost, the position of Chief Sub-Editor in a newspaper office, the circumstances under which he left were such that the question of length of notice did not arise. His first post of this kind was with a newspaper in Cork which went out of existence. After its disappearance the plaintiff left Cork and apparently did not worry about his rights as regards the length of notice to which he was entitled. The next occasion on which he held a post of this kind was when he was with the “Evening Herald.” From this post he was dismissed for dereliction of duty, and in any event his experience as regards length of notice to be given would have been of little help in this case, as I understand that the term of his contract relating to the length of notice he was to receive or give was embodied in a written agreement. He has experienced many changes since then. Moving freely from place to place seems to be accepted as part of the lot of a journalist. They are the unusual type of rolling stones which gather moss.

Having filled a variety of positions on different newspapers he joined the “Irish Press” in the year 1931. He was informed of his appointment by letter from Mr. Frank Gallagher, dated the 21st July, 1931. The relevant part of this letter is as follows:—“You know with what pleasure I send you this formal letter of appointment to our sub-editing staff at a weekly salary of £8 8s. 0d.”

In the month of January, 1932, the plaintiff was promoted to be Night Editor and his salary was increased to £10 10s 0d. a week. He was later appointed Chief Sub-Editor and thenceforward filled the positions of Chief Sub-Editor and Night Editor, with, however, no further increase of salary. He remained on that basis down to the 20th July, 1936, when he was dismissed from his post. With the grounds on which he was dismissed I am not concerned. The proprietors of the “Irish Press” thought proper to dismiss him, giving him three months' notice and informing him that he would receive his salary each week as it became due until the three months expired. To this the plaintiff objected. He contended that he was entitled to six months' notice. So the matter stands when it comes before me. As regards his right to receive six months' notice, the plaintiff relies on what he claims to be the established custom or usage of the *194 journalist profession. In his statement of claim he alleged that usage entitled him to twelve months' notice. That claim, has, however, been modified at the bar to a claim that he was entitled to six months' notice, or the equivalent salary.

As was said by Mr. Martin Maguire, a custom or usage of any kind is a difficult thing to establish. Before a usage such as is contended for here can be held to be established it must be proved by persons whose position in the world of journalism entitles them to speak with certainty and knowledge of its existence. I have to be satisfied that it is so notorious, well known and acquiesced in that in the absence of agreement in writing it is to be taken as one of the terms of the contract between the parties.

I am satisfied that I would be entitled on the evidence of Mr. Frank Gallagher, Mr. Quilty, Mr. O'Sullivan, and other witnesses, if their evidence stood alone, to hold that there is a usage which, in the absence of agreement in writing, requires six months' notice on either side to terminate the contract and employment of a Chief Sub-Editor. Mr. Gallagher said that this was universally known and acknowledged and that he would be surprised if a Chief Sub-Editor ever got less than six months' notice Mr. Quilty, formerly Editor of the “Independent,” gave evidence on similar lines. Mr. O'Sullivan, and Mr. Anderson, of the “Evening Mail,” supported this and said six months was the recognised period of notice. Other witnesses connected with well known newspapers gave evidence to the same effect. The only actual instance of which evidence was given where the question of length of notice is said to have come in question was the case of a man named Hugh Doyle, now deceased. Mr Doyle, a brother of Hugh Doyle, stated that his brother, a Chief Sub-Editor on a Dublin newspaper many years ago had contested an effort to dismiss him on three months' notice but he claimed to be entitled to six months' notice and finally gained his point. The evidence, however, was not very clear or satisfactory. Mr. Quilty, who has been employed on the same paper, had not heard of the case and said that he could not deny or support what was said by Mr Doyle

There was, however, equally positive testimony by other witnesses against the existence of such a custom. Mr Herlihy, Editor of the “Irish Press,” who has been in journalism for a long number of years, says he never heard of six months' notice being required or given. He must have been unaware of any such usage as is claimed by the plaintiff when he advised or allowed his present employers to give only three months' notice in this case. Mr. Smyllie, Editor of the “Irish Times,” says that he never heard of any custom in relation to the length of notice to be given to a Chief Sub-Editor.

All the witnesses impressed me very favourably. They told the truth, and there was no attempt to dress up the evidence in any way.

The absence of evidence of actual instances to show the length of notice given to or by Chief Sub-Editors does not surprise me. Having regard to the relatively small number of such posts it was natural that instances of dismissal or resignation of Chief Sub-Editors should be exceedingly rare. A Chief Sub-Editor generally goes higher and seldom goes down or out. This appears to be one explanation why there are no decided cases on this point and no instance in actual practice except the doubtful one already referred to.

The absence of actual instances of the usage in practice would not, however, preclude me from holding that the usage existed if I were satisfied that it was well known and universally recognised.

As I have already stated, it is necessary in order to establish a custom of the kind claimed that it be shown that it was so generally known that anyone concerned should have known of it, or could easily have become aware of it.

With some hesitation and considerable regret I must hold that the evidence before me has not established such notoriety or general acquiescence for the usage as to enable me to hold it established. I say “with considerable regret” because I would be glad to decide the case on usage. Apparently a usage with regard to dismissal of sub-editors and editors can be established As regards Chief Sub-Editors, notwithstanding the fact that several witnesses knew of the existence of a usage in certain circles governing the length of notice to be given I have come to the conclusion that there was not that universality of acceptance of the usage in the newspaper world in general that is required to establish it as a usage. Accordingly, I must turn to deal with the other side of the case, namely, what is reasonable notice. This question gives me considerable difficulty.

The position of Chief Sub-Editor apparently is a very responsible one. The evi *195 dence as to the duties of a Chief Sub-Editor satisfies me that the success or failure of a newspaper, as a newspaper proper, depends to a great extent upon the competence, judgment, and taste of the Chief Sub-Editor. The reason why there had been so few instances of the dismissal of Chief Sub-Editors is that most newspaper managers take extraordinary care to see that they get for this post men who were tried, experienced, and gifted with the qualities which would ensure success. In deciding the functions of a Sub-Editor much help cannot be got from evidence as to the functions of an Editor. The title “Editor” seems to have taken on a special meaning. It is a position of dominance and control of general attitude of a paper towards all important problems and questions of the day. The work of a Sub-Editor is different. As I understand from the various witnesses, the Chief Sub-Editor is in control of the news side of the paper, excepting the financial and sports news He is subject to the general direction of the Editor He “tastes” the news, as Mr Quilty graphically put it; he is the architect of the paper. He has, perhaps, fifteen or more Sub-Editors under him, to whom he allots different columns for the following day's paper. His work is to see that the news is presented in a striking and attractive manner. He supervises the work of the Sub-Editors in regard to sub-titles and spacing. He must know and appreciate the general policy of the paper and must guide the actions of the sub-editorial staff accordingly. He must also keep the Editor informed of important items of news to which it may be necessary to refer in the leading articles. His work, therefore, differs from that of the Editor, who has to guide the general policy of the paper and must watch that his paper does not take a different line one day from what it took the previous day. Although his work is different it is clear that it is of great importance to the successful running of the paper that it should be well done.

In this case, in addition to being Chief Sub-Editor, the plaintiff was Night Editor He had, however, only to do with the executive side of the paper. As Mr Gallagher put it, “when the Editor was away, Mr O'Reilly took over charge of the floor.” The amount of responsibility placed on him seems to justify a distinction as to the length of the notice he was entitled to receive being made between him and an ordinary Chief Sub-Editor, and more so between him and an ordinary Sub-Editor. Having taken into account all these matters and weighing them as best I can, I think that the plaintiff was entitled to six months' notice. I estimate £25 as the amount he should have earned since he became unemployed. He is entitled to damages estimated at the amount of six months' salary—that is £273. He is further entitled to the £10 10s. 0d. for the week of his employment during which he was dismissed Against this the above sum of £25 must be allowed. I give judgment for £258 10s. 0d.

On the application of Mr. Mooney, under Section 12 of the Courts of Justice Act, 1936, his Lordship granted a certificate allowing costs on the High Court Scale.

[2014 No. 34 CA]

BETWEEN

THE GOVERNOR AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF IRELAND

PLAINTIFF

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Noonan delivered the 17th day of April, 2015

Introduction

1. In these proceedings, the defendant ("Mr. Reilly") alleges that he was unfairly dismissed by the plaintiff ("the bank") from his employment and has brought a claim pursuant to the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (as amended) ("the Act"). The claim originally came before the Employment Appeals Tribunal ("the EAT"), where it was seven days at hearing over a period of about a year. An appeal was brought from the decision of the EAT to the Circuit Court, which took eight days and in turn, the order of the Circuit Court was appealed to this court when the matter was at hearing for ten days. This is without taking account of an initial investigation, a two stage disciplinary process and two internal appeals.

2. By my reckoning, Mr. Reilly has given oral evidence on some eight occasions over a six year period in relation to this matter. Enormous costs have been incurred that Mr. Reilly at least can ill afford. This must be viewed as oppressive to say the least and calls into question the State's obligations under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights regarding the right to a fair and expeditious trial. Not for the first time has this court been critical of this unacceptable situation – see the remarks of Charleton J. in JVC Europe Limited v Panisi [2011] IEHC 299. Although as a matter of law an appeal lies from the Circuit Court to the High Court under the Act of 1977, a general reading of the Act appears to suggest an underlying assumption that the Circuit Court should be the final tribunal of appeal. It appears to me that it is well past time that this issue was addressed.

Background Facts

3. Mr. Reilly, who is now 33 years of age, is from Blanchardstown, County Dublin. After leaving school, he commenced employment with the bank on the 23rd of April, 2001 as an entry grade bank official. He rose through the ranks quickly. Within a year, he had won a customer service award for the north Dublin region. By 2004, he was promoted to senior bank official at the age of 22, which was a significant achievement. His ability, particularly in the field of consumer lending, was recognised outside the bank. He was approached by Ulster Bank in 2005 offering the position of sales manager and Halifax offered him the position of branch manager. In 2006, he was placed in an acting sales manager role which was formalised in September, 2007, when he was appointed as a sales manager at the age of 25. This would be equivalent in rank to what would formerly have been described as an assistant branch manager. Mr Reilly's achievement in this regard was extremely unusual if not unique.

4. Most of the facts in this case are not in dispute but in particular, the fact that Mr. Reilly was an excellent employee with an exemplary record who was diligent and hard working.

5. From in or around 2002, Mr. Reilly had his own email address at the bank. His use of that address was subject to the bank's code of conduct and other policy documents to which I shall refer further.

6. In early February, 2009, a chain email captioned "Hangover Brilliance" was forwarded to an individual in the bank who forwarded it in turn to four members of staff in the bank including Mr. Reilly. One of those staff members sent the email on to persons both inside and outside the bank and it ultimately made its way into the ESB group email system, where it was detected by an IT security manager.

7. On the 5th of February, 2009, the ESB security manager alerted the bank's head of IT security, Mr. Brian Leahy, of an email abuse in the following terms:

> "Brian,
> I note from the email below that two Bank of Ireland people were involved in forwarding this around the town. We are tackling the ESB names."

8. As a result of this communication, Mr. Leahy immediately contacted the bank's Group Industrial Relations Department ("GIR") and spoke to Mr. Brian Kelly of that department. In fact, Mr. Kelly was employed within a subset of GIR, namely the Employment Advisory Service ("EAS"). On receiving this information, Mr. Kelly instructed Mr. Leahy to "lift" the mail boxes of the two bank employees who had forwarded the hangover brilliance email. This did not include Mr. Reilly.

9. Lifting a mail box is a term for making a forensic copy of the entirety of the mailbox in question so that the content is of that moment "fingerprinted" and frozen in time. It cannot thereafter be interfered with. The process can be, and was in fact, undertaken without the knowledge of the mailbox user. Recognising that this is a significant invasion of the privacy of the individual concerned and something not to be undertaken lightly, lifting a mailbox cannot take place until it is expressly authorised in writing by three different individuals. A form must be completed which is known as an SDAR and for the authorisation to be complete, the form must be signed by a member of bank IT security, a member of GIR and also a member of HP security, Hewlett Packard being the custodians of the bank's email system.

10. When the two mailboxes in question were lifted, a colleague of Mr. Kelly's in EAS, Ms. Margaret Keogh, since deceased, went to view these two mailboxes at the bank's IT headquarters in Cabinteely, County Dublin. Arising out of Ms. Keogh's viewing of the two mailboxes, Mr. Kelly then requested that a further three mailboxes be lifted, one of which was that of Mr. Reilly.

11. The SDAR in respect of the latter three mailboxes was signed off on the 17th February, 2009 and on the same date, the mailboxes were lifted and viewed by Ms. Keogh. When she did so, Ms. Keogh discovered a number of inappropriate emails with attached images in Mr. Reilly's mailbox. Ms. Keogh took what he felt was a representative sample of six of these emails.

12. Evidently, Ms. Keogh had some discussion about these emails with her immediate superior, Mr. Graham Fagan and he or she in turn with Mr. Gerry Mitchell, the head of GIR, as later the same day, or possibly early the next day, the 18th of February, 2009, Mr. Mitchell telephoned Mr. Cyril Macken, who was at that time the head of the bank's 21 North Dublin branches, which included Blanchardstown. Following that contact, Mr. Macken telephoned Mr. David Donnelly, the Blanchardstown branch manager, and instructed him to put Mr. Reilly on special paid leave with immediate effect. Later that afternoon, Mr. Reilly was summoned by Mr. Donnelly to his office where Ms. Breda Byrne, the customer service manager was also present.

13. Mr. Donnelly told Mr. Reilly that on the instructions of Head Office, he was obliged to suspend him with immediate effect and asked him to hand over his keys of the branch. He said that an issue had arisen in relation to emails but he didn't know anything about it.

14. The next day, the 19th of February, 2009, Mr. Reilly contacted his union, the Irish Bank Officials Association ("IBOA") and was put in touch with Mr. Ciaran Mahon for advice and representation. Mr. Mahon was also a Bank of Ireland employee and part-time union official.

15. At the same time, Mr. Macken appointed another bank official, Mr. Paddy Lonergan, to investigate the matter on his behalf.

16. When the mailboxes referred to were lifted, in addition to Mr. Reilly's mailbox, the mailboxes of four other members of staff at Blanchardstown were also found to contain inappropriate material. Of those five members of staff, three, including Mr. Reilly, were suspended. Mr. Lonergan was charged by Mr. Macken with investigating all five cases.

17. On the 27th of February, 2009, Mr. Mahon met with Mr. Kelly to discuss Mr. Reilly's case and that of another bank employee's that he was representing. Mr. Kelly showed Mr. Mahon the offending email images and told him that the bank was viewing the matter as serious as this was a rising trend. Also, on the 27th of February, 2009, Mr. Kelly wrote to Mr. Reilly to advise him that the investigation meeting with Mr. Lonergan would take place on the 12th of February, 2009. Mr. Lonergan began his investigation and appears to have been assisted throughout, where necessary, by Mr. Kelly.

18. The investigation meeting with Mr. Lonergan took place on the 12th of March, 2009. Present were Mr. Reilly, Mr. Lonergan, Mr. Mahon, and Mr. Kelly. In the course of the meeting, Mr. Lonergan put the relevant images to Mr. Reilly for his comments. Mr. Reilly did not deny sending them although he had no particular recollection in relation to some of them. He said he was aware of the email policy but didn't read it. He said he was gay although he tried to mask this fact by sending some of the emails concerned. He suggested that other senior people in the branch had been sending such emails also.

19. Subsequent to the investigation meeting, on the 18th of March, 2009, Mr. Lonergan travelled to the IT department in Cabinteely to view the entirety of Mr. Reilly's mailbox. He says he did so in order to satisfy himself that the sample that had been selected by Ms. Keogh was representative. In the course of this inspection, Mr. Lonergan selected one additional email with an attached image to be included in the sample.

20. In his report, Mr. Lonergan found that the bank's email policy had been breached by Mr. Reilly and that the content of the relevant emails could reasonably be regarded as pornographic, indecent, obscene, offensive, rude and generally distasteful. He considered that they had the potential to reflect unfavourably on the bank. Mr. Lonergan's report was submitted to Mr. Macken, who, on the 2nd of April, 2009, wrote to Mr. Reilly requesting him to attend a first disciplinary meeting to be held under stage one of the relevant disciplinary procedures. The stage one meeting took place on the 23rd of April, 2009. At this meeting, Mr. Reilly said that emails of this nature were going around everywhere and he described the volume that he would delete off his system as phenomenal. He said there was a huge circle of people sending the emails and he might have sent some on so as to cover up his orientation. He described them in terms of being "banter" between colleagues.

21. Mr. Macken conveyed his decision to Mr. Reilly by letter of the 5th of May, 2009, in which he said that he viewed his behaviour in sending the emails as gross misconduct and an extremely serious breach of the bank's email policy which warranted the potential disciplinary sanction of dismissal. Before making his final decision, he invited Mr. Reilly to a further meeting known as a stage two meeting.

The purpose of this meeting was to facilitate Mr. Reilly in making any representations he wished in relation to the potential sanction of dismissal. The stage two meeting took place on the 13th of May, 2009, when similar issues were raised and discussed, including Mr. Reilly's excellent work record.

22. Following that meeting, Mr. Macken conveyed his final decision to Mr. Reilly by letter of the 26th of May, 2009, which was to dismiss him with immediate effect. The disciplinary procedure provided for an appeal from this decision to the chief executive of the bank or his nominee. Mr. Gerry Reeves was nominated to hear the appeal, which he did on the 20th of August, 2009. A number of points were made on behalf of Mr. Reilly at the appeal which included a suggestion that the bank had not treated Mr. Reilly in a manner consistent with other comparable cases and the sanction imposed was unduly severe and harsh. Mr. Reilly's exemplary record was again stressed as was the devastating impact dismissal would have on his life. This appeal was unsuccessful, as was a further final external appeal to Mr. Ray McGee, an independent third party and former deputy chairman of the Labour Court. That appeal was heard on the 13th of January, 2010.

23. It is worthy of some comment that before the appeal to Mr. Reeves was heard, Mr. Reilly wanted an opportunity to view his mailbox in IT headquarters accompanied by Mr. Mahon to assist him in analysing the contents. Mr. Mahon was refused permission to attend and was even refused the customary time off for attending to his union duties on that occasion. Mr. Reilly therefore had to attend on his own to view the mailbox under the supervision of Mr. Leahy and Ms. Keogh. To say the least, this must have been a very awkward and uncomfortable experience for him without Mr. Mahon's moral support and it is hardly surprising that he left before his allotted time expired. It is difficult to understand what loss would have been on the bank to allow Mr. Mahon attend also and why it was felt necessary to adopt such a rigid approach.

The Employment Documents

24. It was common case that Mr. Reilly was bound by his contract of employment to observance of the bank's group code of conduct and in particular of a document entitled "Group Information Security Email Usage", dated the 12th of February, 2008. This document provided (at p. 2):

> "Group email systems are provided for in the conduct of group business...
>
> - In email communications, users must not engage in any activity, which is illegal, offensive, disruptive or likely to have negative repercussions for the Group...
> The Group reserves the right to monitor and give reasonable grounds for investigation, intercept, access and disclose messages created, received, stored or sent over the group email systems at any time without notice. You agree that the Group may undertake such monitoring and may use such methods and equipment as it considers necessary or appropriate."

25. The document continues (at p. 5):

> "Your usage of the Group email systems should not involve you in any activity that is illegal, offensive or likely to have negative repercussions for the group. Particularly, you must not use, retain, distribute or disseminate any images, text, materials or software that:
> - Are or might be considered to be indecent or obscene.
> - Are or might be offensive or abusive in that their content is or can be considered to be a personal attack, rude, sexist, racist, pornographic or generally distasteful...

- Adversely impact on the image of the Group."

26. Finally (at p. 7):

"9: Policy violation.

If you fail to comply with the requirements of this policy, and/or otherwise misuse and/or abuse the Group email systems, you may be liable to disciplinary action up to and including dismissal. The Group will treat any breach of this policy in a serious manner. At the same time, your conduct and/or actions may be illegal and you may be personally liable for the consequences."

27. The bank also relied on a further document entitled "Disciplinary Procedures" which included the following provision:

"Gross misconduct.

In cases of gross misconduct, an employee may be dismissed without recourse to the earlier steps in the disciplinary procedures. In a situation which may be potentially deemed as gross misconduct, a full investigation will be carried out. An employee may be placed on special paid leave during such an investigation.

Full investigation and careful consideration of the facts will be carried out without undue delay and this may include consultation with any witnesses and the preparation of written statements as appropriate. If the employee's manager is a witness or the only witness to an alleged case of misconduct, that manager will not conduct the investigation or play a part in the disciplinary decision making process.

If an employee has been found to have committed gross misconduct, there may be mitigating factors which mean that a less serious sanction than dismissal is appropriate. Mitigating factors will be considered bearing in mind the principles of fairness and consistency which underline these disciplinary procedures.

Among the matters which may be described as gross misconduct which may be a cause for dismissal are:-...

4. Breach of Group code of conduct or policies (e.g. group email policy, harassment and bullying policy, etc.)."

28. Although not a contractual document, the bank also placed reliance on a notice by the IBOA, dated the 14th of November, 2006 and addressed to all IBOA members in the Bank of Ireland group. This stated the following:

"Re: use of internet/email and company mobile phones.

Members should be aware that there has been a significant increase in the number of staff being disciplined by the bank for breaches of its email/mobile phone policy. The disciplinary sanctions imposed on staff range from written warnings up to dismissal depending on the severity of the incident.

Members should be aware that the company email and mobile phones are for work related use and should not be used to send material which is not work related.

IBOA are instructing members to familiarise themselves with the bank's internet/email policy and to ensure that their use of the bank's computers/mobile phones comply with this policy."

29. Mr. Reilly, however, disputed that he had ever actually seen this document.

The Emails

30. Mr. Reilly's mailbox was analysed for a two-year period between February, 2007 and February, 2009. His sent or outbox contained 1139 documents of which 29 were considered to be inappropriate. Ms. Keogh extracted the original sample of six emails from the outbox and one further was selected by Mr Lonergan. As previously stated, the Hangover Brilliance email which led to Mr. Reilly's mailbox being examined was received by him but not forwarded. In the order they were presented to the court, the first email was captioned "Tsunami". Attached to it were several images of naked women posing on a beach. The EAT, in its determination, described these as being in the nature of soft pornography of a type that might be found in some tabloid newspapers. Mr. Reilly's evidence was that, given his personal orientation, he had no interest in these images.

31. The second email is captioned "Anything to Declare?" The single image attached depicts a man holding a shopping bag with the head of a small Asian child superimposed so that the child appears to be in the bag. On its face, whilst the image is somewhat bizarre, it could not be seen as pornographic, obscene or indecent. It is only when one is made aware that the subject is a former celebrity and notorious paedophile that its intended meaning becomes evident.

32. Mr. Lonergan considered that this image was the most serious of all the images. He described it as being in a category of its own, different from all the others. For reasons which have never been adequately explained, the distribution list for this image was separated from it leaving only the image. This meant that when it was put to Mr. Reilly at the various investigation and disciplinary meetings, it was not possible to detect the source of this email. It was only after Mr. Reilly was dismissed and had commenced proceedings that the distribution list eventually became available. This showed that the email had originated in the bank's Head Office in Baggot Street, from where it had been forwarded to another bank official who was known to Mr. Reilly. That official forwarded the email to a number of others within the bank and it was forwarded by at least three further bank personnel before it reached Mr. Reilly. There was no evidence that the official in question was ever investigated and in fact, he was subsequently promoted to the level of branch manager.

33. The third email is captioned "Adult Funnies" and includes various images which are vulgar, crude and tasteless. They all purport to be humorous although the humour is of a somewhat juvenile nature.

34. The fourth email is captioned "Mastercard Moments" and has attached to it two images of people in public situations inadvertently exposing themselves. The images include text which purports to be humorous comment. The fifth item is an email with an attached image which shows a group of obese people engaging in sexual activity. The original caption on this email when sent to Mr. Reilly was "What Really Happens at Weight Watchers Meetings!" Mr. Reilly forwarded this email to three male colleagues in the Blanchardstown bank including one with the initials I.W. Before doing so, Mr. Reilly altered the subject line so that it then read "I. in his first brothel". I.W. was a junior colleague of Mr. Reilly and a friend of his. Mr. Lonergan was particularly concerned about this email, which he felt might be considered as bullying by Mr. Reilly of his junior colleague. However, that view was not apparently shared by Mr. Macken.

35. The sixth email had an attached image of two naked men sitting on a couch. This appears to have been sent by Mr. Reilly from his mobile phone to his bank email address and was then forwarded on by him to his personal email address. It was not circulated to anybody else. Mr. Reilly explained this by saying that he accidentally forwarded the email to his bank address when he intended it to go to his private address.

36. The seventh and final email which was the additional item selected by Mr. Lonergan had attached an image of an extremely large naked woman. Mr. Reilly forwarded this to another colleague in the branch but amended the subject caption so that it read "Put I's head on this and send it on". This was a further reference to I.W.

Legislation

37. Insofar as relevant to these proceedings, the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (as amended) provides as follows:

> "6.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an unfair dismissal unless, having regard to all the circumstances, there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal…
> (4) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, not to be an unfair dismissal, if it results wholly or mainly from one or more of the following:…
> (b) the conduct of the employee,…
> (6) In determining for the purposes of this Act whether the dismissal of an employee was an unfair dismissal or not, it shall be for the employer to show that the dismissal resulted wholly or mainly from one or more of the matters specified in subsection (4) of this section or that there were other substantial grounds justifying the dismissal.
> (7) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, in determining if a dismissal is an unfair dismissal, regard may be had, if the rights commissioner, the Tribunal or the Circuit Court, as the case may be, considers it appropriate to do so—
> (a) to the reasonableness or otherwise of the conduct (whether by act or omission) of the employer in relation to the dismissal,…

7.—(1) Where an employee is dismissed and the dismissal is an unfair dismissal, the employee shall be entitled to redress consisting of whichever of the following the rights commissioner, the Tribunal or the Circuit Court, as the case may be, considers appropriate having regard to all the circumstances:

(a) re-instatement by the employer of the employee in the position which he held immediately before his dismissal on the terms and conditions on which he was employed immediately before his dismissal together with a term that the re-instatement shall be deemed to have commenced on the day of the dismissal, or

(b) re-engagement by the employer of the employee either in the position which he held immediately before his dismissal or in a different position which would be reasonably suitable for him on such terms and conditions as are reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, or

(c) (i) If the employee incurred any financial loss attributable to the dismissal, payment to him by the employer of such compensation in respect of the loss (not exceeding in amount 104 weeks remuneration in respect of the employment from which he was dismissed calculated in accordance with regulations under s. 17 of this Act) as is just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances, ...

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, in determining the amount of compensation payable under that subsection regard shall be had to—

(a) the extent (if any) to which the financial loss referred to in that subsection was attributable to an act, omission or conduct by or on behalf of the employer,

(b) the extent (if any) to which the said financial loss was attributable to an action, omission or conduct by or on behalf of the employee,

(c) the measures (if any) adopted by the employee or, as the case may be, his failure to adopt measures, to mitigate the loss aforesaid,...

(f) the extent (if any) to which the conduct of the employee (whether by act or omission) contributed to the dismissal."

38. It is thus clear that the onus is on the employer to establish that there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal and that it resulted wholly or mainly from one of the matters specified in s. 6(4), which includes the conduct of the employee or that there were other substantial grounds justifying the dismissal. Section 6(7) makes clear that the court may have regard to the reasonableness of the employer's conduct in relation to the dismissal. That is however not to say that the court or other relevant body may substitute its own judgment as to whether the dismissal was reasonable for that of the employer. The question rather is whether the decision to dismiss is within the range of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer to the conduct concerned – see Royal Bank of Scotland v. Lindsay UKEAT/0506/09/DM.

39. I respectfully agree with the views expressed by Judge Linnane in Allied Irish Banks v. Purcell [2012] 23 ELR 189, where she commented (at p. 4):

"Reference is made to the decision of the Court of Appeal in British Leyland UK Ltd v. Swift [1981] IRLR 91 and the following statement of Lord Denning MR at page 93:

> 'The correct test is: was it reasonable for the employers to dismiss him? If no reasonable employer would have dismissed him, then the dismissal was unfair. But if a reasonable employer might reasonably have dismissed him, then the dismissal was fair. It must be remembered that in all these cases there is a band of reasonableness, within which one employer might reasonably take one view, another quite reasonably take a different view.'

It is clear that it is not for the EAT or this court to ask whether it would dismiss in the circumstances or substitute its view for the employers view but to ask was it reasonably open to the respondent to make the decision it made rather than necessarily the one the EAT or the court would have taken."

The Decision to Suspend Mr. Reilly

40. The suspension of an employee, whether paid or unpaid, is an extremely serious measure which can cause irreparable damage to his or her reputation and standing. It is potentially capable of constituting a significant blemish on the employee's employment record with consequences for his or her future career. As noted by Kearns J. (as he then was) in Morgan v. Trinity College Dublin [2003] 3 I.R. 157, there are two types of suspension, holding and punitive. However, even a holding suspension can have consequences of the kind mentioned. Inevitably, speculation will arise as to the reasons for the suspension on the premise of there being no smoke without fire. In Mr. Reilly's case, his evidence was that rumours and reports circulated about him ranging from possibly being involved in fraud to participation in a tiger kidnapping.

41. Thus, even a holding suspension ought not be undertaken lightly and only after full consideration of the necessity for it pending a full investigation of the conduct in question. It will normally be justified if seen as necessary to prevent a repetition of the conduct complained of, interference with evidence or perhaps to protect persons at risk from such conduct. It may perhaps be necessary to protect the employer's own business and reputation where the conduct in issue is known by those doing business with the employer. In general, however, it ought to be seen as a measure designed to facilitate the proper conduct of the investigation and any consequent disciplinary process. Indeed, this is explicitly recognised by the bank's own disciplinary procedures in force at the relevant time. The procedures provide, under the heading "Special Paid Leave", as follows:

> "An employee may be placed on special paid leave in order to facilitate the proper conduct of the disciplinary procedures."

42. The corollary presumably therefore is that an employee ought not be suspended where suspension is not necessary to facilitate these matters.

43. In the present case, the circumstances surrounding the decision to suspend Mr. Reilly are far from clear. As previously noted, three staff members including Mr. Reilly were suspended and two were not, where all five were being investigated for breach of the bank's email policy.

44. Mr. Kelly's evidence was that neither he, Ms. Keogh, their immediate superior Mr. Fagan, head of EAS, or his superior Mr. Mitchell, head of GIR, made the decision to suspend the three staff members. It would not be within their competence to do so. Mr. Kelly was adamant that all the relevant decisions were made by Mr. Macken, with whom he had no contact at that juncture. Neither Mr. Fagan or Mr. Mitchell was called to give evidence in this case. Mr. Kelly said in evidence that he had no involvement in the matter prior to Mr. Reilly being suspended on the 18th of February, 2009. He said Ms. Keogh was the person who had viewed the mailboxes in question and extracted the sample emails. Ms. Keogh was not called to give evidence at the EAT or Circuit Court although she was present at both.

45. When Mr. Macken gave evidence, he was asked in cross-examination when he first became involved in the matter and he said that it was when he got a call from Gerry Mitchell. In the course of that call, Mr. Macken established that there was a problem with misuse of the email system in the Blanchardstown branch and that it was serious. Following the call, Mr. Macken then contacted the branch manager, Mr. Donnelly, with instructions to immediately suspend three of the five staff members concerned.

46. When Mr. Donnelly summoned Mr. Reilly later that day, the only thing he was able to tell Mr. Reilly about the reason for the suspension was that it was to do with email usage. Mr. Reilly's evidence in that regard was uncontroverted, as neither Mr. Donnelly or Ms. Byrne, who was also present, were called to give evidence.

47. Later in his evidence, Mr. Macken confirmed that the first time he actually saw the material in issue upon which he decided to dismiss Mr. Reilly was when he received Mr. Lonergan's report some six weeks later. Consequently, when Mr. Macken made the decision to suspend Mr. Reilly, all he knew about the case was what Mr. Mitchell told him. Mr. Mitchell in turn presumably only knew what he had been told by Ms. Keogh either directly or through Mr. Fagan unless he viewed all the emails and images himself, although there is no evidence of that.

48. What seems all the more remarkable about Mr. Macken's decision, made in the absence of access to any of the relevant evidence, was that he felt able to come to the conclusion that where five people were being investigated in Blanchardstown for the same offence, i.e. breach of the email policy, three of them required to be suspended to facilitate that investigation and two did not. Furthermore, to my mind it has not been demonstrated by the bank how Mr. Reilly's suspension was necessary in order to facilitate the proper conduct of the disciplinary procedures. None of the factors I have identified above were present in his case. The mailbox with the offending emails was forensically frozen and could not be further interfered with by Mr. Reilly. Nobody had complained about Mr. Reilly's conduct and indeed it seems likely that nobody knew about it other than those in receipt of the relevant emails. None of those individuals were called to give evidence. It seems highly probable that the danger of repetition of the conduct complained of was to all intents and purposes nil once Mr. Reilly had been made aware of the issue. Mr. Reilly was evidently mystified, not to say shocked, by the suspension as was Mr. Mahon after him. Mr. Mahon is an extremely experienced bank official and union representative whose evidence impressed me. He was diligent and conscientious about his duties and was careful to keep a journal in relation to all relevant events in the cases he was handling. When I asked him about Mr. Reilly's suspension, he said:

> "So I just couldn't see what the logic was of sending people home to aid an investigation. It didn't aid an investigation."

49. Like Mr. Mahon, I can perceive no logic in the course adopted by Mr. Macken. No evidence has been adduced by the bank as to why it was necessary to suspend Mr. Reilly, less still justify the manner in which it was done. After an exemplary career in the bank, Mr. Reilly was summoned at a moment's notice by the manager to be told he was being suspended. Mr. Donnelly gave him virtually no information as to the reason other than saying he was acting on the instructions of Head Office and it was something to do with emails and without being afforded even the most basic opportunity to offer an explanation or defend himself, he was marched out the door never to return. Indeed, even if Mr. Reilly had a valid explanation, there was little point in him proffering it to Mr. Donnelly, who had been presented with a fait accompli by Head Office. I cannot accept the proposition advanced by counsel for the bank that Mr. Reilly had no entitlement to natural justice or fair procedures in any shape or form at this stage of the proceedings. Whilst of course it must be correct to say that the full panoply of fair procedures may not have been engaged at that stage, I cannot accept that basic fairness did not require at least a rudimentary explanation of the reason for the suspension which admitted of the possibility of some exculpatory response.

50. In the light of the foregoing, I cannot conceive how Mr. Macken could have independently arrived at the decision to suspend Mr. Reilly and two others whilst not suspending a further two staff members accused of the same misconduct. It seems to me that the conclusion is irresistible that either somebody else made the decision and directed Mr. Macken to implement it or alternatively it was suggested to him as the appropriate thing to do and he simply accepted that without further ado. Furthermore, the only possible explanation for selecting three out of the five employees concerned for suspension was that the view was taken that the contents of their mailboxes represented more serious misconduct than that of the two who were not suspended. If that is so, it must follow as a logical consequence that the suspensions were nothing to do with the pending investigation and disciplinary process but rather were an expression by the bank of its view of the seriousness of the matter and its resolve to punish those responsible accordingly.

51. That conclusion is supported by the evidence of Mr. Mahon and Mr. Kelly about their first meeting on the 27th February, 2009 about Mr. Reilly's case, when Mr. Kelly said that the bank was taking a serious view of the matter which was a rising trend. That comment, when seen against the background of the events of the previous ten days or so, suggests to me that the bank had already determined to make an example of Mr. Reilly.

Discussion

52. The bank's disciplinary procedures quoted above refer to the concept of gross misconduct which may include breach of the group email policy. Of course, every breach could not constitute gross misconduct, or perhaps misconduct at all, and it is a question of degree in each case. The evidence suggests that the bank took the view from the outset that gross misconduct was involved. Mr. Reilly was quite unaware of this and his evidence was that whilst the matters complained of might amount to misconduct, they were certainly not gross misconduct. Mr. Macken took a different view, concluding that Mr. Reilly's breach of the email policy did constitute gross misconduct of a degree which warranted dismissal. However, the first time that gross misconduct was mentioned to Mr. Reilly was in Mr. Macken's letter of the 5th of May, 2009, advising him that he would be dismissed unless he could persuade Mr. Macken otherwise at the stage two meeting. Whether the behaviour complained of was gross misconduct or simply misconduct is clearly a qualitative judgment in much the same way as is an assessment of the content of the emails. Whilst classifying the conduct as falling into a particular category may be viewed by the bank as relevant to the sanction it may impose within the framework of its own procedures, it is, in my view, of limited assistance in determining whether there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal. In coming to a view on that issue, it is necessary to examine the factual background against which the conduct in issue arose.

53. Mr. Reilly's evidence was that the practice of circulating these inappropriate emails was widespread. The evidence put before me certainly demonstrated significant evidence of the circulation of this type of material not only within the bank but throughout a large number of public companies and state and semi-state bodies. No evidence was led by the bank to contradict Mr. Reilly's evidence on this point, which I accept. Mr. Reilly struck me as an honest and truthful witness not given to exaggeration or hyperbole. I also believe that the bank was well aware of the practice. The bank itself relied on the IBOA circular of November, 2006 addressed to breaches of the email policy. I also accept Mr. Reilly's evidence that he was not aware of this circular although as I have said, the bank certainly was. Further Mr. Kelly's comment to Mr. Mahon that this was a rising trend indicates a degree of prior knowledge.

54. Despite this knowledge, there was no evidence of any significant attempt by the bank to address this issue. If it was a rising trend as Mr. Kelly said, it seems to me that steps could have been taken whether by way of circular notices, team briefings or whatever method to ensure that staff were left in no doubt as to the bank's attitude and the likely sanctions that might be imposed for a breach of the policy. In the absence of any such steps by the bank, its employees, whilst aware in general terms of the policy, might well have concluded that it was more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Mr. Mahon's uncontroverted evidence was that up to the time that Mr. Reilly was suspended, nobody had ever been either suspended or dismissed for breach of the email policy. Some dismissals did occur in the bank's subsidiary, the ICS and although events were unfolding at that time, the dismissals did not actually occur until post-February, 2009.

55. It seems to me that if a policy of zero tolerance was going to be adopted by the bank to breach of its email policy, its employees were entitled to some notice of this policy shift. This would not have been difficult to achieve. From Mr. Reilly's perspective, it clearly never occurred to him that in sending on chain emails, he was potentially exposing himself to dismissal. I have no doubt that had he known, he is very unlikely to have engaged in this conduct. He certainly had little reason to anticipate what occurred. His evidence, again undisputed, was that there was a pornographic calendar hanging in the men's bathroom at the Blanchardstown branch for years without any attempt by management to remove it. This smacks somewhat of a double standard within the bank.

56. In assessing the reasonableness of the employer's conduct in relation to the dismissal herein, it seems to me that such an assessment must have regard to the surrounding circumstances, including the impact of the conduct on the employer as against the impact of the dismissal on the employee to determine the proportionality of the employer's response.

57. There is no doubting the inappropriateness of the emails and even Mr. Reilly appears to accept that sending them constituted misconduct deserving of some sanction. It is ultimately a matter of opinion as to whether some or all of the images were pornographic, obscene and so forth but certainly the bank were entitled to come to a view on this. Whether it is a view shared by the court or anyone else is not material as the authorities suggest. The same considerations apply to whether they ought to be regarded as offensive and certainly to some, perhaps most, people that would undoubtedly be the case. However, the fact remains that there is no evidence that anybody was actually offended by any of these emails. Nobody complained. The bank did not call any recipient to give his or her opinion on them. The bank say that they had the potential to reflect unfavourably on it and perhaps even for it to be sued. That may well be so but none of this actually happened over a fairly long period, perhaps because those in receipt of the emails either wanted to receive them or acquiesced in receiving them. Indeed, as the evidence makes clear, it was by mere chance that Mr. Reilly's behaviour was even detected. In short, there is no evidence that the bank suffered any loss, damage or detriment whatsoever as a result of the conduct complained of.

58. It should also be borne in mind that none of the emails in question originated with Mr. Reilly, with the sole exception of the one he accidentally sent to his bank email and forwarded only to himself. The number of emails was relatively small – 29 over a two year period out of a total outbox of 1139. I think it is also of some significance that there is at least some evidence that Mr. Reilly was not treated on a like footing to others in the bank similarly implicated. Thus, with regard to the "Anything to Declare" email, regarded as the most serious by Mr. Lonergan, despite clear evidence that this originated in Head Office and was sent on by an official subsequently promoted, no steps appear to have been taken by the bank to even investigate the other employees concerned. Furthermore, it seems that the bank went to considerable lengths to conceal the provenance of this email.

59. As against all this, the effect of the dismissal on Mr. Reilly must be considered. At the time of his dismissal, the country had just been plunged into the worst economic catastrophe in its history, brought about in no small measure it must be said, by the activities of our banks. Mr. Reilly's prospects of re-employment were extremely poor, as turned out to be the case, and as the bank well knew before it dismissed him. He had in the recent past purchased a house close to his parents in Blanchardstown with the benefit of a mortgage from the bank which he now found himself unable to repay. It is clear from his evidence that these events had a catastrophic effect on him and as he says, destroyed his life and ruined his career. Indeed, this was one of the submissions made by Mr. Mahon to Mr. Macken but unfortunately it fell on deaf ears.

60. Having regard to all of the foregoing, I am satisfied that the conduct of the bank in relation to Mr. Reilly's dismissal and the events leading up to it could not by any objective standard be described as reasonable. The evidence has driven me to the conclusion that at a very early juncture, probably on the 17th of February, 2009, a decision was made within the hierarchy of the bank to make an example of Mr. Reilly in order to deter others from similar behaviour in the future. That decision may or may not have been made by GIR, but as a minimum was strongly influenced by it. Whilst lip service was paid to observance of procedures, it is clear that there was only ever going to be one outcome. The bank's response in this case was entirely disproportionate and could not in my view be regarded as falling within the range of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer to the conduct in issue.

61. Accordingly, I am satisfied that the bank has failed to discharge the onus of establishing that there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal in this case.

Remedy

62. Counsel for Mr. Reilly, Mr. Banim SC, submits that the only remedy which will do justice in this case is re-instatement, as ordered by the EAT. For the bank, Mr. Connaughton SC submits that such a remedy would be wholly inappropriate because Mr. Reilly, by his conduct, must be held to have substantially contributed to his dismissal. That contribution must be considered in determining the remedy and in that regard, the bank rely on the judgment of Carroll J. in Memorex World Trade Corporation v. Employment Appeals Tribunal [1990] 2 I.R. 184. That was a case in which the employer sought to judicially review a decision of the EAT on the grounds that it had failed to hear all the evidence and had decided the case effectively at the end of the employer's case. The court accepted that the hearing was unsatisfactory for these reasons but declined an order of certiorari on the basis that the EAT had erred within jurisdiction and in any event, the appeal procedure that was available was an adequate remedy. It seems therefore that the court considered that its discretion should not be exercised in favour of granting judicial review. In the course of her judgment, Carroll J., in commenting upon the conduct of the case before the EAT, said (at p. 188):

> "The Tribunal should hear all evidence available relating to the dismissal not only to determine whether there were substantial grounds but also because the extent to which an employee contributes to his dismissal is a matter which has to be taken into account in determining the appropriate remedy."

63. It is clear that these remarks by Carroll J. were obiter as they were not directed to the substantive issue in the case which she had already at that point in her judgment decided. Further, there is nothing from the Law Report to suggest that this point was argued before her in any depth or indeed at all as it did not form the basis for the arguments being advanced by either side.

64. In my view therefore, the court did not intend to lay down any rule of general application in making these remarks and in any event, for the reasons already explained, I do not believe I am bound by them.

65. It will be seen from the express wording of s. 7 that the concept of the conduct of the employee contributing to the dismissal is confined to situations where the court considers that compensation is the appropriate remedy. Thus, in McCabe v. Lisney (Unreported, High Court, 16th March, 1981) and Carney v. Balkan Tours [1997] 1 I.R. 153, the court was in each case concerned with a reduction in the award of compensation having regard to the extent of the employee's contribution to the dismissal. It would of course be unreal to suggest that the court could not have regard to the conduct of the employee in considering in a general sense whether the remedies of re-instatement or re-engagement were appropriate. However, in my view, it is equally true that the mere fact that the employee may have been guilty of some degree of misconduct, even if that were felt to have contributed to the dismissal, cannot of itself preclude the possibility of those remedies being invoked. At the end of the day, the court has to grant the remedy which will do justice between the parties.

66. I have already concluded that the bank's conduct in this case was unreasonable and disproportionate. I would add to that by saying that the manner in which it predetermined and manipulated the entire process from the outset reflects little credit on it and visited a very grave injustice on Mr. Reilly.

67. In my view, an award of compensation would fall far short of providing adequate redress in this case and the only appropriate remedy is re-instatement.

THE HIGH COURT

[2013 No. 311 MCA]

ANDRIUS STASAITIS

APPELLANT

NOONAN SERVICES GROUP LTD

RESPONDENT

AND

THE LABOUR COURT

NOTICE PARTY

JUDGMENT of Kearns P. delivered on the 11th day of April, 2014.

INTRODUCTION

In these proceedings the appellant seeks an order pursuant to s.28 of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 and O.84C of the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986, as amended, declaring that the Labour Court erred in law in its written decision dated the 6th December, 2013, when it determined that the respondent had complied with the requirements of s.12 of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 and was entitled to rely upon the exemptions set out in the Organisation of Working Time (General Exemptions) Regulations, 1998 (S.I. No. 21 of 1998).

Should it be necessary, the appellant also seeks an order remitting his claim against the respondent to the Labour Court for reconsideration.

BACKGROUND FACTS

The appellant is a Lithuanian national who was employed by the respondents as a security officer at the premises of DHL Logistics at Airport Park in Dublin, from the 3rd September, 2009, until the 14th September, 2012. The site where the appellant worked is a warehouse facility where trucks, vans and other vehicles enter and leave the premises. The appellant's function was to monitor this traffic and for that purpose he worked from a security hut at the entrance. It is common case that he worked in eight hour shifts and that during those shifts he was not permitted to leave the security hut except for the purpose of checking vehicles entering and leaving the premises. He worked alone in performing these duties. It is also common case that his employers did not schedule any specific breaks for the appellant over the course of his shift, but rather left it to the appellant to take breaks during periods of inactivity which occurred during the shift.

The appellant was provided with kitchen facilities in the security hut and, while no specific breaks were provided for during his working shift, the respondents assert that there were significant periods of inactivity during the day during which he could take breaks. It is not in dispute but that the appellant availed of such breaks during the time in which he worked for the respondent, but he contends that, in failing to provide for specific break periods, the respondents were in breach of their statutory obligations.

The appellant brought a case before the Rights Commissioner, which was heard on the 11th February, 2003. The Rights Commissioner having rejected the appellant's claim, the appellant brought an appeal to the Labour Court which heard his case on the 23rd August, 2013.

On the 6th September, 2013, the Labour Court determined as follows:-

> "The court notes that the claimant worked for the respondent for three years during which time he made no complaint in relation to the matter now before the court. The court is satisfied as a matter of probability that the claimant was told that he could take breaks during periods of inactivity during the course of his shift. The court is further satisfied that the presence of cooking facilities in the security hut must have made it clear to the claimant (if he was ever in any doubt) that he could avail of breaks while at work. It is not denied that the claimant did in fact take breaks.
> In these circumstances the court is satisfied that Regulation 5 of the Regulations was complied with in relation to the claimant. The Court is further satisfied that the Regulation 3 of the Regulations was operative in this case and that the claimant's employment came within the exemption provided by that Regulation."

Having concluded that the appellant's complaint was "not well founded", the Labour Court disallowed the appeal and affirmed the decision of the Rights Commissioner. The matter comes before this Court by way of appeal from that decision.

RELEVANT STATUTORY PROVISIONS

The preamble to the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997 states that it is:-

"An Act to provide for the implementation of Directive 93/104/EC of 23rd November, 1993 of the Council of the European Communities concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time, to make provision otherwise in relation to the conditions of employment of employees and the protection of the health and safety of employees."

The word "break" is not defined in the Act, but "rest period" is defined as "any time that is not working time". In turn, "working time" means:-

"Any time that the employee is –

(a) at his or her place of work or at his or her employer's disposal, and

(b) carrying on or performing the activities or duties of his or her work, and "work" shall be construed accordingly."

Section 12 of the Act provides:-

"(1) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 4 hours and 30 minutes without allowing him or her a break of at least 15 minutes.

(2) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 6 hours without allowing him or her a break of at least 30 minutes; such a break may include the break referred to in subsection (1)

(3) The Minister may by regulations provide, as respects a specified class or classes or employee, that the minimum duration of the break to be allowed to such an employee under subsection (2) shall be more than 30 minutes (but not more than 1 hour).

(4) A break allowed to an employee at the end of the working day shall not be regarded as satisfying the requirement contained in subsection (1) or (2)."

However, it was provided by s.4 of the Act that the Minister could by regulation exempt from the application of s.12 any specified class or classes and by S.I. No. 21 of 1998 (Organisation of Working Time (General Exemptions) Regulations, 1998) the Minister did exempt from the application of s.12:-

"An activity of a security or surveillance nature the purpose of which is to protect persons or property and which requires the continuous presence of the employee at a particular place or places, and, in particular, the activities of a security guard, caretaker or security firm."

The Regulations also provide (at Article 3) that:-

"3. The exemption shall not apply, as respects a particular employee, if and for so long as the employer does not comply with Regulation 5 of these Regulations in relation to him or her."

The Regulations goes on to provide as follows:-

"4. If an employee is not entitled, by reason of the exemption, to the rest period and break referred to in sections 11, 12 and 13 of the Act, the employer shall ensure that the employee has available to himself or herself a rest period and break that, in all the circumstances, can reasonably be regarded as equivalent to the first mentioned rest period and break.

5. (1) An employer shall not require an employee to whom the exemption applies to work during a shift or other period of work (being a shift or other such period that is of more than 6 hours duration) without allowing him or her a break of such duration as the employer determines.

(2) In determining the duration of a break referred to in paragraph (1) of this Regulation, the employer shall have due regard to the need to protect and secure the health, safety and comfort of the employee and to the general principle concerning the prevention and avoidance of risk in the workplace."

SUBMISSIONS

On behalf of the appellant it was submitted that the time during which the appellant was required by the respondent to be present in the security hut can only be classified as "working time" both within the relevant domestic legislation and within the meaning of the Working Time Directive. "Rest periods", as defined in the legislation, are defined in opposition to working time, and an employee cannot be considered to be working and at the same time to be enjoying the benefit of a rest period.

While the present appeal was limited in its scope to a point of law, it was submitted that it was also open to the High Court to intervene if it found that the Labour Court had based its decision on an unsustainable finding of fact. In the instant case the Labour Court had erred in determining that the respondent fulfilled the requirements of Regulations

4 and 5 by awarding purported compensatory rest breaks, when at no material time was the applicant engaged in anything other than "working time" as defined by the Act. Alternatively, the findings of fact made by the Labour Court were erroneous. The periods of inactivity experienced by the appellant in the course of his duties were neither a rest period nor a break. The inferences drawn by the Labour Court from the presence of cooking equipment in the security hut were and are unsustainable having regard to the fact that the appellant was, at all times he was in the hut, required to be available to discharge work duties as they might arise. The fact that those duties may only have arisen intermittently does not alter the fact that the appellant was required to be available for the discharge of such duties and therefore could not have been on a rest period or break.

The right to a rest break during the course of work is guaranteed by Article 4 of the Working Time Directive and is an essential social right to which all workers in the EU are entitled. As such, any derogation from that right must be construed strictly. That had not happened in the instant case. The Act of 1997 and the Regulations made thereunder specifically provide that the exemption shall not apply unless the provisions of Regulation 5 are complied with. Regulation 5 had not been complied with because the employer had failed to determine the duration of any break to which the appellant was entitled and had failed also to have regard to the additional requirement to consider the "comfort of the employee" as required also by the same article of the Regulation.

In summary, given that the appellant was clearly required to be available for work and was working within the meaning of the Act of 1997 during the entirety of his eight hour shift in the security hut, he could not therefore be said to have had any rest break, whether compensatory or otherwise, for any of that period of time. It followed therefore that the appellant was afforded no breaks pursuant to Regulation 4 or 5 of the Regulations of 1998. The respondent was therefore not entitled to rely upon the exemption set out in Regulation 3 which must be strictly construed as a derogation from a European law right.

On behalf of the respondents, it was submitted that it was not in dispute that the appellant was provided with his daily rest period of at least eleven hours between shifts and his weekly rest period. The dispute between the parties focussed exclusively on breaks at work which are set out in s.12 of the Act of 1997. While s.4 (3) of the Act provides that the Minister may by regulations exempt certain activities from the application of s.12, s.6 contains certain safeguards in respect of such exemptions and maintains the distinction between rest periods and breaks as follows:-

"6-(1) Any regulations, collective agreement, registered employment agreement or employment regulation order referred to in section 4 that exempt any activity from the application of sections 11, 12 or 13 or provide that any of these sections shall not apply in relation to an employee shall include a provision requiring the employer concerned to ensure that the employee concerned has available to himself or herself such rest period or break as the provision specifies to be equivalent to the rest period or break as the case may be, provided for by section 11, 12 or 13.

(2) Where by reason of the operation of subsection (1) or (2) of section 4, or section 5 an employee is not entitled to the rest period or break referred to in section 11, 12, or 13 the employer concerned shall-

(a) ensure that the employee has available to himself or herself a rest period or break, as the case may be, that in all the circumstances, can reasonably be regarded as equivalent to the first mentioned rest period or break, or

(b) if for reasons that can be objectively justified, it is not possible for the employer to ensure that the employee has available to himself or herself such an equivalent rest period or break, otherwise make such arrangements as respects the employee's conditions of employment as will compensate the employee in consequence of the operation of subsection (1) or (2) of section 4, or section 5."

Regulation 4 of S.I. No. 21 of 1998 also provides as follows:-

"4. If an employee is not entitled, by reason of the exemption, to the rest period and break referred to in section 11, 12 and 13 of the Act, the employer shall ensure that the employee has available to himself or herself a rest period and break that, in all the circumstances, can reasonably be regarded as equivalent to the first mentioned rest period and break."

It was submitted there had been no error of law in circumstances where arrangements for a break for the appellant had been put in place which were, at the very least, equivalent to the breaks referred to in the Act. In fact, it was submitted, the arrangements put in place by the respondents provided for more rest for the employee than did those provided for by the Act.

It was further submitted that there was no error of law in the instant case and no unsustainable findings of fact. The Labour Court had correctly determined that the respondent was entitled to rely on the exemption contained in Regulation 3 of the Regulations of 1998, subject to compliance with Regulation 5 and there was no error of law on the part of the Labour Court. The Labour Court had found as a fact that the appellant was allowed to take breaks during periods of inactivity and was thus perfectly entitled to determine that the respondent had complied with the provisions of Regulation 5.

It was further submitted that the facts of the instant case were identical with those considered by the Employment Appeals Tribunal and the Court of Appeal in the case of Hughes v. Corp. of Commissionaires Management Ltd. [2011] I.R.L.R. 100 (Eat), [2011] I.R.L.R. (C.A.). In that case the Court of Appeal had stated:-

> "We would accept that if a period is properly to be described as an equivalent period of compensatory rest, it must have the characteristics of a rest in the sense of a break from work. Furthermore, it must so far as possible ensure that the period which is free from work is at least 20 minutes. If the break does not display those characteristics then we do not think it would meet the criteria of equivalence and compensation. In this case the arrangements plainly did meet those criteria, as the EAT found. Indeed, since the rest break begins again following any interruption, many would say that this was more beneficial than a Regulation 12 'Gallagher' break would be."

In Gallagher & Ors. v. Alpha Catering Services Ltd. [2004] EWCA Civ.1559 the court examined equivalence and compensation as regards a rest period and a rest break where the employees complained that they were not entitled to rest breaks under Regulation 12 of the Regulations of 1998. Gallagher can be distinguished from the instant case as in Gallagher the company was not entitled to rely on a derogation and so the issue of compensatory rest did not apply. The decision in Hughes referred to Gallagher and examined what was meant by a '"Gallagher rest break" at para. 38:-

> "In a special case, such as the present one, the worker is not entitled to a 'Gallagher' rest break. The employer is, however, obliged 'wherever possible' to allow the worker to take 'an equivalent period of compensatory rest'. It is plain that this is not the same as a 'Gallagher' rest break. Certainly, the objective is to provide the worker with some break from his duties but the language of equivalence and compensation shows that it is something which is not identical to a 'Gallagher' break. It can denote something which makes up for the fact that the worker does not receive such a break, by providing a break that is as near in character, quality, and value to a 'Gallagher' rest break as possible. The precise elements of that equivalent period of compensatory rest will obviously vary according to the facts and circumstances of the individual case. In some cases, it may be possible for the employer to provide a break that very nearly meets the 'Gallagher' criteria – circumstances where the worker is technically 'on call' during the 20 minute break, but is, in practice, never called on, for example. In others, it may be that less freedom is able to be afforded to the worker during his break but he does get one or it > may be that no break at all can possibly be given during the shift of each cycle, but that is compensated for by the worker being given a double break of 40 minutes in the second shift he works in the cycle. There are, no doubt, many other possible scenarios."

It was further submitted that Directive 93/104 must be construed in such a manner as to limit the scope of derogation to what is necessary. Exemptions under Regulation 3 of the Regulations of 1998 and the requirement to allow a break under Regulation 5 must be construed in a manner consistent with the requirement for the appellant to be continuously present in the security hut, which is the relevant exempted activity. It was submitted that having regard to the nature of the exempted activity and the health, safety and comfort of the employee, the rest breaks available to the appellant comply with the requirements of Regulation 5. The Directive in its recitals recorded:-

> "It is necessary to provide that certain provisions may be subject to derogations implemented, according to the case, by the Member States or the two sides of industry. As a general rule, in the event of a derogation, the workers concerned must be given equivalent compensatory rest periods."

The Directive thus acknowledges that it may not be possible to guarantee uninterrupted rest breaks for workers engaged in certain activities and Article 4 of the Directive sets out a pragmatic requirement in respect of rest breaks where the working day is longer than six hours with a margin of appreciation being afforded to national legislation. The appellant in this case was undoubtedly afforded adequate rest by the respondent.

In reply counsel further stressed that the particular requirements of Irish law were such that the employer must fix the duration of any break. That had not occurred in the instant case and, for that reason, the appellant was entitled to succeed.

DISCUSSION

The Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 gave effect to Directive 93/104/EC (the "Working Time Directive") in Irish law. The Directive provides for rest periods and breaks (Articles 3-5) and, of course, it is not in dispute in this case that the appellant was provided with his daily rest period and his weekly rest period. The entire controversy between the parties herein concerns breaks at work and whether the arrangements put in hand for this appellant by his employers come within the terms of permissible derogations, both under the Directive and under the Act of 1997.

Both sides in the case before the Court were in agreement that principles of strict construction must be extended to any derogation which, as in this case, operates to exempt the employer from strict statutory obligations. That requirement of "strict construction" can only mean in this particular context that an interpretation is adopted which most effectively secures the rights of an employee as envisaged by both the Directive and the legislation. Thus, the Court is satisfied that any arrangements put in place must satisfy the criteria of equivalence and compensation.

On a purely factual basis, it is difficult to see how it could possibly be argued that the appellant in this case is less well off by virtue of the arrangements put in place for compensatory rest in his case. It is common case that, when not required to operate the barrier or check vehicles in or out of the premises, the appellant could move to an area in the security hut where he had available to him kitchen and other facilities, although, of course, he was not at liberty to move away from the security hut. It is not in dispute but that these were the arrangements for breaks and that the appellant availed of them.

There is thus something of a paradox inherent in this case. The appellant is arguing for an interpretation of the relevant statutory provisions whereby he would be entitled to specific breaks of fixed duration during his working shift. If successful, such an outcome to the proceedings could in real terms have the effect of significantly reducing the appellant's periods of actual rest. Equally, in arguing the case for the employer, a result could occur whereby an employee could spend more time resting – and perhaps significantly more – than the time spent in the actual discharge of his security functions. It seems to the Court that the parties to this appeal have both been driven to adopt positions which seem to be actually inimical to their own wider interests.

Both parties made detailed submissions as to the role of the Court in an appeal of this nature. The Court is satisfied that the jurisdiction of the High Court in this regard was comprehensively addressed by Hedigan J. in the case of An Post v. Monaghan (Unreported, High Court, Hedigan J., 26th August, 2013) [2013] IEHC 404, where he stated (at p. 14):-

> "This is an appeal on a point of law from a decision of the Labour Court. I will deal first with the role of the court in such an appeal. It is plainly a limited role. The court may only intervene where it finds that the Tribunal based its decision on an identifiable error of law or an unsustainable finding of fact. The court should be slow to interfere with the decisions of the Labour Court because it is an expert administrative tribunal. See Henry Denny & Sons v. The Minister for Social Welfare [1998] I.R. 539. Unless a claim of irrationality is sustained, the court cannot weigh the strengths or weaknesses of the arguments or evaluate its determination thereon. See Wilton v. Steel Company of Ireland [1999] E.L.R. 1 (O'Sullivan J., at p.5). The Court may, however, examine the basis upon which the Labour Court found certain facts. It can consider whether certain matters ought or ought not to have been considered or taken into account by the Labour Court in determining the facts. See N.U.I. Cork v. Ahern [2005] IESC 40 (McCracken J.)."

I am quite satisfied in this case that there was no unsustainable finding of fact by the tribunal. It was perfectly entitled to hold that the arrangements put in place whereby the appellant could obtain rest during periods of inactivity at work provided a sound factual basis for its findings. The court was entitled to find that the arrangements either met the statutory requirements or satisfied a test that they complied with requirements of equivalence and compensation in lieu thereof.

The Court is therefore satisfied that the single issue which it must determine is whether the Labour Court fell into error in its interpretation and construction of the relevant statutory provisions.

DECISION

Under the requirements of the Organisation of Working Time (General Exemptions) Regulations 1998 the appellant is entitled to compensatory rest breaks and the respondent relies on Regulation 3 to claim that no breach of the appellant's rights has occurred. What falls to be determined is the classification of the terms "working time", "rest periods" and "breaks". As set out above all are defined under the Directive except for the term "break". The terminology of domestic legislation must be determined in light of the wording and purpose of the Directive as per the European Court of Justice (E.C.J.) in Marleasing SA v. La Comercial Internacionale de Alimentation SA (Case C-106/89) [1990] E.C.R. I-4135. It is submitted on behalf of the appellant that the definition of the term "rest period" as referred to in Sindicato de Medicos de Asistencia Publica (SIMAP) v. Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valanciana (Case C-303/98) [2000] E.C.R. I-7997 and Landeshauptstadt Kiel v Jaeger (Case C-151/02) [2003] E.C.R. I-8415 (cases where the issue of rest periods for doctors was considered) ought be differentiated from working time to mean that an employee cannot be both working and enjoying a break. The E.C.J. in that context held that in the case of a doctor, time "on call" was to be construed as working time. This however cannot be deemed to be analogous to the case presently before the court. The "rest period" is the time between shifts as opposed to a break which occurs within the working day. Although there is no set definition of "break" it must be interpreted in the particular circumstances of this case to mean that the employer must ensure that the employee is afforded the compensatory breaks as per the derogations under the Regulation. The Court must then move to the examination of the compensatory breaks afforded under national legislation.

In relation to s.6 of the Act of 1997 the appellant states that the employee was not provided with a compensatory or equivalent rest period or break in circumstances where the employee was not entitled to the "ordinary" rest period or break under ss.11, 12 or 13. Under s.6 (2) (b) the employer has an obligation to make "such arrangements as respects the employee's conditions of employment as will compensate the employee". These arrangements must compensate the employee for the derogation under ss.11, 12 or 13. As per s.6 (3) the compensatory arrangements can not be monetary or of any material benefit. However the requirement under s.6 (2) may be met where the employee is provided with better physical conditions or amenities or services whilst at work as per s.6 (3) (b). In this instance the employee was provided with kitchen facilities and an area within which to take breaks during periods of inactivity. The employee in this case was permitted to take such breaks as he wanted during periods of inactivity and was provided with amenities and facilities to do so. Therefore the requirement to provide compensatory rest periods in relation to the derogation from the statutory rest periods and or breaks must be deemed to have been complied with.

Further, the decision in the Court of Appeal in the case of Hughes v. Corp. of Commissionaires Management Ltd. [2011] I.R.L.R. 100 (Eat), [2011] I.R.L.R. (C.A.) fortifies the view of this Court in finding that the criteria of equivalence and compensation for breaks were met by the arrangements put in place by the employer. The view of the Court of Appeal in the Hughes case was that, since the rest breaks in fact begin again following any interruption, this type of break may be regarded as even more beneficial than the statutorily defined breaks.

I would dismiss the appeal.

THE HIGH COURT

[2009 No. 223 J.R.]

COUNTY LOUTH VOCATIONAL EDUCATIONAL COMMITTEE

APPLICANT

THE EQUALITY TRIBUNAL

RESPONDENT

AND

PEARSE BRANNIGAN

NOTICE PARTY

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Brian McGovern delivered on the 24th day of July 2009

1. Reliefs sought

1.1 Leave was granted by this Court (O'Neill J.) on 27th February, 2009, to the applicant to seek the following reliefs by way of judicial review proceedings:-

> 1. A declaration that the respondent has acted ultra vires in purporting to conduct an investigation of alleged discriminatory acts (within the meaning of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2004) against the notice party which fall outside the terms of complaint made by the notice party received by the respondent on 4th August, 2006.

2. A declaration that in her investigation of alleged discriminatory acts (within the meaning of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2004) against the notice party the subject of his complaint received by the respondent on 4th August, 2006, the officer of the respondent is required to confine her investigation to the two matters the subject of the said complaint.

3. A declaration that the respondent lacks jurisdiction to investigate any alleged complaint of the notice party to the provisions of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2004 save the complaint received by the respondent on 4th August, 2006.

4. A declaration that the respondent is limited to investigating complaints of discrimination made by the notice party which have been lawfully referred to it and which occurred within a period of six months from 4th August, 2006.

5. An injunction by way of judicial review staying the investigation currently being conducted by the respondent into alleged discriminatory acts (within the meaning of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2004) against the notice party save insofar as the said investigation is confined to the two allegations contained in the complaint received from the notice party by the respondent on 4th August, 2006.

6. A declaration that in the absence of the applicant being on notice of all the details of the allegations being pursued by the notice party before the hearing being conducted by the respondent, the respondent has acted in breach of natural justice and fair procedures in failing to permit the attendance of employees of the applicant who themselves are the subject of the allegations.

7. In the alternative a declaration that the respondent's refusal to permit the applicant's employees access to the hearing amounts to a denial of natural justice in circumstances where the notice party has been at liberty to make allegations and give evidence of matters of which the applicant has had no or sufficient prior notice.

8. In the alternative an injunction restraining the respondent from continuing its investigation until such time as the notice party is required by the respondent to provide full details of the nature of the allegations against the applicant, its servants or agents.

2. The facts

2.1 The notice party to these proceedings is a retired teacher. He was employed at two schools run by the applicant from 1981 until September 2007, when he was granted early retirement on the grounds of ill health pursuant to a scheme of the Department of Education and Science. Between 1981 and 2003, he worked at St. Laurence's Community College, Drogheda and from 2003 until 2007, he worked at Drogheda Institute of Further Education.

2.2 On the 4th August, 2006, the respondent received a completed "Form EE1" from the notice party. Such a form is a standard administrative form, without any statutory basis, which is used by the respondent for dealing with complaints of discrimination relating to employment. In his form the notice party alleged that he had been discriminated against by the applicant on the grounds of his gender and on the grounds of his sexual orientation, which he indicted to be homosexual in part 3 of the form. As to the "description of the claim", in part 4 of the form, the notice party indicated that he had experienced discriminatory treatment in "promotion/re-grading", "conditions of employment", "harassment" and "victimisation". In part 5 of the form the notice party named Patrick Branigan & Co. Solicitors, as his "representative" and provided their contact details. In the section headed "Part 8: Details of complaint", the notice party stated that the date of the first occurrence of the discriminatory act alleged was 16th December, 2005, and that the date of the occurrence of the most recent discriminatory act alleged was 10th March, 2006. The place at which the discriminatory acts took place was stated to be at Drogheda Institute of Further Education. In the same section a "brief outline of complaint" was requested. The notice party wrote as follows:-

"On Dec 16th a colleague tried to assault me with his fist to my face. Another colleague prevented actual contact by jumping between us. This was reported to the principal, who did nothing about it. On March 10 2006 another colleague placed a banana, half-peeled encased in a condom in my mail box in the staff room. I reported this to the principal whose reply was 'what do you want me to do about it'? He eventally [sic.] said he would make an announcement to the staff about this that morning. He didn't bother to do this. I had to ask him on the following Monday why he didn't make the announcement. His reply was 'I got waylaid'. This was said in a dismissive tone. On that day (March 10) I went to my doctor and went on sick leave."

2.3 Personal injury proceedings were instituted by the notice party in this Court against the applicant on 4th July, 2007, in which he seeks damages. The notice party claims that from 1997 onwards he was bullied, harassed, assaulted and undermined to the point where he had no option but to leave his employment. The applicant is defending these proceedings.

2.4 On 29th August, 2008, the Director of the respondent appointed Ms. Valerie Murtagh, Equality Officer, to investigate the notice party's claim in accordance with the provisions of the Employment Equality Acts 2000-2008. The respondent requested further details of the complaint from the notice party by way of written submissions, which were duly lodged with the respondent and are dated 19th September, 2007. Reference was made by the notice party in those submissions to alleged incidents of discrimination dating back to 1997. A copy of his submissions was furnished to the applicant. The respondent requested a response to the content of those submissions by 31st January, 2008. No such response was received. The deadline for receipt of a response was extended by Ms. Murtagh to 7th November, 2008. However, the replying submissions were not made available until 21st January, 2009, the eve of the hearing date.

2.5 The hearing into the notice party's complaint commenced on 22nd January, 2009. The parties, their legal representatives and seven witnesses for the applicant, who were employees of the applicant, were present. Ms. Murtagh explained to the parties that it was practice in certain cases not to have all witnesses present at the hearing and she ruled that the applicant's witnesses be excluded from the hearing, with the exception of the Principal and Vice Principal of the school in which the applicant last worked. She indicated that she would give time to the parties for discussion prior to the hearing of evidence. The reasons for taking this course were outlined in the following terms by Ms. Murtagh at para. 17 of her affidavit sworn on 7th April, 2009:-

> "I say that pursuant to the Employment Equality Acts I am not permitted to administer oaths during a hearing. The Acts also mandate that the hearing shall be in private. I say and have been advised that I have discretion as to how the hearing is to proceed, so long as it is conducted fairly. I say that I am concerned that fairness and privacy is observed in the hearing process. For that reason I do not permit all witnesses to attend the hearing in general other than witnesses that are central to the case. I say that to permit a host of witnesses may lead to overcrowding in the hearing room and create discomfort for all parties. In this case, as in others, the parties and their advisors were present in the hearing room while the other witnesses remained outside until it was their turn to present their evidence."

2.6 A joint application for an adjournment of the hearing was then made to afford each side an opportunity to consider their various positions in respect of the two sets of proceedings in being and to explore whether a settlement could be reached. An adjournment was granted to 12th February, 2009. The notice party's legal representative indicated that further submissions would be delivered on behalf of her client addressing the legal issues discussed by the applicants in their submissions of the previous day. Those further submissions are dated 9th February, 2009. They claimed that the notice party was a victim of continuing discrimination on the grounds of his sexual orientation which impacted adversely on him for many years and submit that the respondent should not be confined the terms of the complaint as set out in the notice party's Form EE1 in its investigation into the matter.

2.7 At the resumed hearing on 12th February, 2009, the applicant raised two preliminary matters. Firstly, it applied for a stay of the hearing pending the determination of the personal injury proceedings. Ms. Murtagh decided, however, that she had a statutory function to exercise and that the hearing would proceed on the basis that the two claims - the equality claim and the personal injuries claim - were separate. Secondly, the applicant requested a ruling to be made in respect of the nature of the evidence which the notice party would be permitted to rely on at the hearing. The applicant contended that the notice party should not be allowed to give evidence in respect of the events prior to 16th December 2005, the date of the first alleged discriminatory act, as per the Form EE1. The notice party made the case that the discriminatory acts were continuing acts, capable of being investigated. Ms. Murtagh concluded that she should hear all of the evidence before making any decision in fact or in law. She stated that she had yet made a decision as to the lawful ambit of her investigation and would do so at the end of hearing the evidence.

2.8 Following the rulings in these two preliminary matters the hearing commenced, with the notice party first to give evidence. At the hearing of these judicial review proceedings, the applicant pointed to new issues which emerged during the course of the applicant's testimony on 12th February, 2009, in respect of which it objects and in respect of which it claims not to have had any notice. Those issues are identified by Mr. Eugene Winters, then Acting Chief Executive Officer at County

Louth VEC at paragraphs 25 -26 of his affidavit sworn on 27th February, 2009. Those paragraphs state as follows:-

> "25. ... Mr. Brannigan gave evidence that in early 1999 he found himself supervising students every morning and lunch time and received his first break at 2.05pm after starting work at 9.00am. Mr. Brannigan contended that this was discrimination on grounds of his sexual orientation and further when he spoke to the then Principal of the school (a Mr. O'Dowd) about this matter he was informed 'I am changing fucking nothing until I am told to." Mr. Brannigan's evidence was that this situation continued for one year.
>
> 26. The Notice Party also informed the Respondent's Officer that Ms. Breda Nugent, a teacher in the school, had first hand experience of the discrimination which he had suffered. He gave evidence to the effect that in 1999 a rock was thrown into his class room and he complained about this incident directly to Ms. Nugent. His evidence was that he asked Ms. Nugent to go to the Principal about this matter. He further stated that he handed Ms. Nugent the rock and asked her to go and show it to the Principal and to go through the appropriate channels and tell the Principal that a rock had been thrown at him. Mr. Brannigan's evidence continued to the effect that Ms. Nugent went to the Principal and returned to Mr. Brannigan and indicated that she had been to see the Principal of the school, Mr. Dowd who had simply shrugged his shoulders at her."

2.9 Mr. Winters then went on to describe the nature of the applicant's difficulty with the above testimony being given, which was conveyed to Ms. Murtagh:-

"27. At this point in the hearing, when it became clear the Officer of the Respondent was prepared to let the Notice Party rely on matters which had allegedly occurred over the previous ten or twelve years and of which the Applicant had absolutely no notice, and which had not been referred to previously the Notice Party, I, and my legal advisers, became even more concerned. Counsel thereupon objected to the evidence being given by the Notice Party. It was pointed out that the evidence directly concerned members of the Applicant's staff who were not present in the room and who, in the absence of any details having been supplied prior to the hearing regarding the matters being advanced on behalf of the Notice Party, could not provide the Applicant's advisers with instructions in order to challenge the veracity of the Notice Party's account of events or the alleged import of his evidence."

2.10 The applicant applied for an adjournment. While the Equality Officer indicated she did not want any further delays in the conduct of the hearing, she made it clear that the applicant would be given the opportunity to bring witnesses to respond to any allegations made against them.

2.11 After lunch Ms. Nugent attended the hearing but was asked to leave by Ms. Murtagh. The applicant makes the case that the exclusion of its witnesses from the hearing room is a breach of fair procedures. At the conclusion of proceedings on that day it was agreed by both sides that the matter should be adjourned for a further two hearing days. A date could not be agreed.

2.12 Correspondence was exchanged between the applicant and the respondent in respect of suitable dates. The applicant's solicitors pointed out to the respondent that the dates of 23rd and 24th February, 2009, proposed by the Equality Officer, were not suitable as it would not be possible to provide cover for teachers who would have to attend. The Equality Officer said she would defer the hearing for one week and resume the proceedings on Monday 2nd March, 2009, and continue into the following day if necessary.

2.13 These proceedings were instituted on the 27th February, 2009.

3. The law

3.1 The respondent was established under the Employment Equality Act 1998, as amended ("the Act") to hear and determine complaints of discrimination in employment on prohibited grounds of gender, marital status, family status, sexual orientation, religion, age, disability, race and membership of the Traveller community. Section 75 of the Act establishes the position of the Director of the Equality Tribunal. Section 75(4) provides:-

> "(4) From among the Director's staff the Director may-
>
> (a) appoint persons to be equality officers, and
> (b) appoint persons, including equality officers, to be equality mediation officers."

A claim of discrimination may be delegated to an Equality Officer pursuant to s.75 (4B) of the Act which provides:-

> "(4B) The Director may delegate to an equality officer or an equality mediation officer any function conferred on him or her under this Act or any other enactment."

3.2 It is clear that it is a function of the Director to deal with claims in respect of discrimination or victimisation from the terms of s.77 (1) of the Act which provides:-

> "(1) A person who claims-
>
> (a) to have been discriminated against or subjected to victimisation,
>

may, subject to subsections (3) to (9), seek redress by referring the case to the Director."

The following time limit is prescribed in s.77 (5)(a):-

"(5) (a) Subject to paragraph (b), a claim for redress in respect of discrimination or victimisation may not be referred under this section after the end of the period of 6 months from the date of occurrence of the discrimination or victimisation to which the case relates or, as the case may be, the date of its most recent occurrence.

Section 77 6(A) of the Act goes on to provide:-

"(6A) For the purposes of this section-
(a) discrimination or victimisation occurs-
(i) if the act constituting it extends over a period, at the end of the period.

This provision envisages a case of continuing discrimination with the time limit referable to the point at which the discrimination ended.

3.3 The Equality Officer can deal with the complaint by way of mediation pursuant to s.78 or by way of investigation pursuant to s.79, as happened in this case. Section 79 sets out the procedure for the investigation process. It states:-

"79. - (1) Where a case which has been referred to the Director under section 77-

(a) does not fall to be dealt with by way of mediation under section 78, or

(b) falls to be dealt with under this section by virtue of section 78(7), the Director shall investigate the case and hear all persons appearing to the Director to be interested and desiring to be heard.

(1A)(a) Claims to have been discriminated against on more than one of the discriminatory grounds shall be investigated as a single case, and

(b) claims both to have been discriminated against on one or more than one of such grounds and to have been penalised in circumstances amounting to victimisation may, in an appropriate case, be so investigated, but a decision shall be made on each of the claims.

(2) An investigation under this section shall be in private.

(3A) If, in a case which is referred to the Director under section 77, a question arises relates to the entitlement of any party to bring or contest proceedings under that section, including:

(a) whether the complainant has complied with the statutory requirements relating to such referrals,

(b) whether the discrimination or victimisation concerned occurred on or after 18 October 1999,

(c) whether the complainant is an employee, or

(d) any other related question of law or fact, the Director may direct that the question be investigated as a preliminary issue and shall proceed accordingly.

(4) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), the Minister may by regulations specify-

(a) procedures to be followed by the Director in carrying out investigations (or any description of investigations) under this section, and

(b) time limits applicable to such investigations, including procedures for extending those limits in certain circumstances, but, before making any such regulations, the Minister shall consult the Authority and the Director.

(6) At the conclusion of an investigation under this section (including an investigation of a preliminary issue under subsection (3) or (3A), the Director shall make a decision and, if the decision is in favour of the complainant –

(a) it shall provide for redress in accordance with section 82, or

(b) in the case of a decision on a preliminary issue under subsection (3) it shall be followed by an investigation of the substantive issue.

3.4 Section 82 provides for the redress that may be awarded on foot of a decision under s.79. In respect of an equal treatment claim a maximum of two years pay may be awarded, which in the notice party's case would amount to approximately €140,000. Section 83(1) provides that not later than 42 days after a decision of the Equality Tribunal, it may be appealed to the Labour Court. Section 90(1) provides that a decision of the Labour Court may be appealed to the High Court on a point of law.

4. The issues

4.1 Two principal issues arise for determination in these proceedings. The first is whether the respondent has jurisdiction to hear evidence at the hearing of the notice party's allegations going back over ten years which were not contained in the Form EE1? Is the jurisdiction of the respondent to investigate a complaint limited to a consideration the incidents occurring on the two dates specified in the form only? The second issue is whether the exclusion of the applicant's witnesses from the hearing room constituted a breach of fair procedures.

5. Jurisdiction of the Equality Tribunal

The applicant's submissions

5.1 Mr. McDonagh S.C. submitted that the object of these proceedings was not to stop the investigation into notice party's complaint but to seek to put parameters on the investigation into it. He contended that the allegations made by the notice party during the hearing were outside the terms of the original complaint in the Form EE1 and introduced new issues, of which the applicant had no notice and could not be lawfully be investigated by the respondent as it was outside of its jurisdiction. He further submitted that the written submissions of the notice party dated 19th September, 2007, though put on notice to the applicant in advance of the hearing, strayed considerably outside the ambit of the terms of complaint referred by the notice party to the respondent and were lodged more than twelve months after the applicant retired. The alleged discriminatory acts of which the notice party complained of in the Form EE1 related to the period between 16th December, 2005 and 10th March, 2006. What the respondent was seeking to do, Mr. McDonagh argued, was to squeeze several allegations going back over a decade into the complaint in its original form. It was submitted that it was the Form EE1 that conferred jurisdiction on the Tribunal and was a condition precedent to the Tribunal's jurisdiction to investigate into the matters alleged.

5.2 The applicant accepted that s.77(6A) allowed for the respondent to investigate matters which allegedly occurred more than six months prior to the date upon which a particular claim was submitted to it but this was only in circumstances where a complaint was lawfully made to it in respect of such matters. It submitted that the notice party had not indicated that there was continuing discrimination against him over many years on the form and that as a result allegations pertaining to those previous years could not be investigated. In addition, it contended that as the further allegations in the written submissions were made over twelve months after the notice party had retired, they were outside the six month time limit prescribed by s.77(5)(a).

5.3 The applicant relied on the case of Bank of Scotland (Ireland) v. Employment Appeals Tribunal (Unreported, High Court, Ó Caoimh J. 15th July, 2002) in support of its contention that the presentation of a potential claim to a Tribunal within the requisite time frame was a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. It sought to distinguish the case of Aer Lingus v. The Labour Court (Unreported, High Court, 26th February, 1988, Carroll J.) (Unreported, Supreme Court, 20th March, 1990), upon which the respondent relied, on the basis that the Labour Court was concerned not with a time limit but with whether claims of unlawful discrimination could be based on events which occurred prior to the Employment Equality Act 1977.

5.4 The applicant denied that it was acting in a premature fashion by instituting judicial review proceedings at this juncture. It argued that if it was to wait until the end of an appeal to the Labour Court before bringing a judicial review that it would not be efficient or cost effective, in that the whole matter may ultimately have to be re-investigated.

The respondent's submissions

5.5 Mr. Durcan S.C., for the respondent, noted at the outset of his oral submissions the "broad church" of complainants who came before the respondent, some of whom were legally represented and some of whom were not. He warned of the dangers of introducing unnecessarily formal or complex procedures in respect of such a wide group. He submitted that ss.77 (1) and 79 conferred jurisdiction on the respondent to investigate complaints. Part of the investigation process would, in his submission, be taken up with an investigation into whether there had been compliance with the statutory conditions or not. The respondent argued that there is a discretion on the part of the Director of the respondent or the Equality Officer, if carrying out an investigation, to deal with this matter by way of a preliminary issue or not. If it was decided not to deal with it by way of a preliminary issue, it formed part of the substantive hearing. Counsel for the respondent noted that no application was made for a preliminary hearing in this case. He cited Aer Lingus v. The Labour Court (Unreported, High Court, 26th February, 1988, Carroll J.) (Unreported, Supreme Court, 20th March, 1990) in support of his argument that the holding of a preliminary hearing was not necessary to deem a complaint receivable and that it was permissible to consider the compliance with the statutory conditions of the case as part of the substantive hearing.

5.6 The respondent contended that the Form EE1 was only intended to set out the generality of the complaint and its basic details. It submitted that to limit a complainant to the matters set out in the referral form would be to unjustly and unlawfully fetter the manner in which the Oireachtas intended the investigation to proceed as set out in the Act. The complaint form should not, it argued, be converted into a rigid pleading, which could not be developed or amended. In this regard, counsel for the respondent drew an analogy with a High Court writ, which clearly can be amended in appropriate circumstances. It would be extraordinary, he contended, that in a tribunal setting a claim could never be expanded out, especially given that the form itself requires "brief details" of the complaint and where it is conceivable that a form may be filled out without legal advice. In addition, he noted that the Act provided for a situation where a continuous act of discrimination is alleged to have occurred.

5.7 The fact that the Equality Officer in this case had decided to hear all the evidence was, in his submission, in accordance with s. 79(1A). He argued that as she had not yet made a decision as to the temporal limit of the complaint that these proceedings were premature. In addition he submitted that it would be untenable for the respondent not to be permitted to inquire into historical evidence given that the Act envisages continuous acts of discrimination.

The notice party's submissions

5.8 Mr. Kenneally S.C., for the notice party, submitted that the applicant was on full notice of the allegations the notice party was making against it. The Form EE1 was, in his submission, to be read in conjunction with the detailed submission of 19th September, 1997, where the ambit of his complaint was broadened temporally. It was noteworthy, he stated, that though that submission was delivered to the applicant some one year and three months prior to the hearing, that the applicant had not delivered its response to it until the day before the hearing commenced.

6. Conclusion

6.1 In my view, the case of Bank of Scotland (Ireland) v. Employment Appeals Tribunal (Unreported, High Court, Ó Caoimh J. 15th July, 2002) does not assist the applicant, as it is clear, on the facts, that the claim by the notice party was made within time and in that way it differs from this case. The Aer Lingus Teoranta v. Labour Court (Unreported, High Court, 26th February, 1988, Carroll J.) (Unreported, Supreme Court, 20th March, 1990) case supports the argument of counsel for the respondent who said that the holding of a preliminary hearing was not necessary to deem the complaint receivable and that it was permissible for the respondent to consider the compliance with the statutory conditions of the case as part of the substantive hearing.

6.2 I accept the submission on behalf of the respondent that the Form EE1 was only intended to set out, in broad outline, the nature of the complaint. If it is permissible in court proceedings to amend pleadings where the justice of the case requires it, then a fortiori, it should be permissible to amend a claim as set out in a form such as the EE1, so long as the general nature of the complaint (in this case, discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation) remains the same. What is in issue here is the furnishing of further and better particulars, although, it must be said, in the context of an expanded period of time. But, under the legislation it is clear that the complaints which are made within that expanded period are not time-barred. That is not to say that complaints going back over a very lengthy period would have to be considered as an issue of prejudice might arise. But this is something that would fall to be dealt with in the course of the hearing in any particular case.

6.3 Of course, it is necessary that insofar as the nature of the claim is expanded, the respondent in the claim must be given a reasonable opportunity to deal with these complaints and the procedures adopted by the Equality Officer must be fair and reasonable and in compliance with the principles of natural and constitutional justice.

6.4 It is clear that on 19th September, 2007, details of the notice party's claim were given to the applicant. These details went beyond the information contained in the EE1 form but were part of the same complaint, namely, discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. The replying submissions were not made available until 21st January, 2009, which was the date before the hearing. I am satisfied that the applicant had ample notice of the claim being made against his employees and should have been in a position to deal with them at the hearing before the Equality Officer. The applicant could argue that there was one matter on which it did not have notice in advance of the hearing, namely, the incident of the rock being thrown into the classroom in 1999, and the complaint made to Ms. Nugent. On the other hand, there is a reference in the statement to the Tribunal made on 19th

September, 2007, in which the notice party refers to the fact that stones were thrown at him in the classroom. It is clear, however, that Ms. Nugent attended the hearing. Indeed, one of the issues arising in this application was whether or not it was fair that she was asked to leave the room while the notice party was giving evidence. It seems to me that she would have been in a position to deal with the evidence on this point once she was informed of what the notice party had said and she could give her account of the event.

6.5 I am satisfied, therefore, that the applicant was in a position to deal with the claims made by the respondent, even if they went beyond the ambit of what is contained in the Form EE1.

6.6 Apart from the issue concerning Ms. Nugent referred to above, the applicant was concerned that its witnesses remain outside the room while the notice party gave his evidence. This forms part of the complaint in this application. The Equality Officer was entitled to run the hearing of the complaint as she saw fit, so long as it complied with the principles of natural and constitutional justice. It is quite easy to understand why an Equality Officer might regard this as a reasonable procedure because complainants, in that particular forum, might feel intimidated if the employees against whom they are complaining were all present in the same room. What is essential, however, is that the employees complained against, know the case being made against them and that they either present themselves or are represented at the hearing so that they can confront the accuser and cross-examine him. It appears that there was a representative of the applicant present who was in a position to cross-examine the notice party on his evidence, and the relevant witnesses for the applicant were available to give their own account of events and, where necessary, to instruct the applicant as to the accuracy of the notice party's account.

6.7 It is important to emphasise that the hearing before the Equality Tribunal is not a hearing in a court of law with all the attendant formality that would exist in such a forum.

6.8 Having considered the evidence in this matter and the submissions of counsel, I have reached the conclusion that the applicant is not entitled to the reliefs sought for two reasons:

(i) the respondent had not made a final determination on the issue of the temporal limit of the complaint;

(ii) the procedures which were adopted by the respondent were not unfair or contrary to natural or constitutional justice.

(ON CIRCUIT)

SOUTHERN EASTERN CIRCUIT

COUNTY WEXFORD

UNFAIR DISMISSALS ACT, 1977, SECTION 10(4)

BETWEEN

SAMUEL J. FRIZELLE

AND

NEW ROSS CREDIT UNION LIMITED

DEFENDANT

Judgment of Mr. Justice Feargus M. Flood delivered the 30th day of July, 1997.

THE LEGAL PRINCIPLES

Where a question of unfair dismissal is in issue, there are certain premises which must be established to support the decision to terminate employment for misconduct.

1. The complaint must be a bona fide complaint unrelated to any other agenda of the Complainant.

2. Where the Complainant is a person or body of intermediate authority, it should state the complaint, factually, clearly and fairly without any innuendo or hidden inference or conclusion.

3. The employee should be interviewed and his version noted and furnished to the deciding authority contemporaneously with the complaint and again without comment.

4. The decision of the deciding authority should be based on the balance of probabilities flowing from the factual evidence and in the light of the explanation offered.

5. The actual decision, as to whether a dismissal should follow, should be a decision proportionate to the gravity of the complaint, and of the gravity and effect of dismissal on the employee.

Put very simply, principles of natural justice must be unequivocally applied.

RELEVANT FACTS

This is a claim for relief for unfair dismissal by the Plaintiff against the Defendant in which the said principles are germain.

In 1974 the Plaintiff was employed as a Manager of the Defendant Credit Union.

The Defendant Credit Union were a participant in a block fidelity and indemnity bond which had been negotiated by the Irish League of Credit Unions with an American Insurance Company called "Cumis". The Plaintiff as such Manager was bonded under the said policy.

The Plaintiff has held the said post since 1974 and was, inter alia, a loans officer appointed by the Defendant. As such loans officer he worked under the supervision of the Credit Committee and had delegated to him the power to approve loans that are fully secured by shares or other adequate collateral or loans which qualify as emergency loans within the definition and limitation as to amounts and terms of repayment and security required by such loans. As such loans officer he could approve or refuse, secured loans up to the sum of £3,000 and, unsecured to the sum of £1,000. He was obliged to furnish the Credit Committee with a record of each such loan approved or not approved by him within seven days of the application therefore. The said Credit Committee was obliged to report in writing to the Board of Directors at least once in every month in relation to the functions delegated to it by the Board of Directors.

The Plaintiff remained in the Defendant's employment until his employment was terminated on August 20th, 1993, in manner hereinafter appearing.

The Plaintiff had obtained a mortgage from the Defendants to purchase his dwelling house in or about 1988. The said loan was duly secured. In 1992 the Plaintiff decided to change his house and bought another one. Again appropriate mortgage facilities were arranged with the Defendants. Unfortunately the sale of his original house failed as the purchaser withdrew from the contract. The necessity for bridging finance therefore arose and it was agreed by the Defendants on November 2nd, 1992 that such facility would be afforded to him. Repayment to be paid by weekly instalments of both capital and interest in the sum of £269 per week. It should be noted that this was in fact the first occasion on which the Defendants had granted such a facility, though arrangements for the granting of such facilities had been put in train.

In January, 1993 the Plaintiff's first house having remained unsold, he found he could not keep up the said weekly payments. On January 7th, 1993 the Plaintiff "re-phased" repayments of his account on the computer down to £165 per week. This prevented his account appearing "delinquent" on the computer. This action he took, without informing anyone on either the Credit Committee or the Chairman or any members of the Board. The said sum of £165 paid all interest accruing due and reduced the principal sum by £70 per week. While the Plaintiff undoubtedly had certain discretionary authority in relation to the issue of secured and unsecured loans and in practice in relation to limited defaults this action by him was a non-authorised action. It did not of course in any way affect or reduce his financial liability to the Defendants. It had the effect of reducing the capital repayments which would be made before the loan was redeemed on the sale of his house.

The Credit Committee on January, 8th 1993 on a random check from the accounts on the computer found out the said re-phasing. Five of the six members of the said Committee thereupon advised the Supervisory Committee and also the Chairman of the Board and requested a meeting of the Board.

In evidence Mr. Lyons, a member of the said Committee stated that the Committee felt that it was their duty to bring this irregularity to the attention of the Irish League of Credit Unions.

In my opinion they had no such duty to acquaint the Irish League of Credit Unions. Their duty was to bring the matter before the Board and to abide the decision of the Board.

A meeting of the Board was arranged for January, 18th 1993. A written memorandum was prepared by five members of the Finance Committee dealing with three topics.

(a) The first of the said topics was in relation to the conduct of the Chairman of the Board at an earlier meeting in relation to two loan applications of Messrs. Keogh and Ryan. The Chairman's conduct was criticised as also was that of the treasurer. It is quite clear from the first paragraph of the said memorandum that the Chairman and some members of the Board were at odds with some members of the Credit Committee.

(b) The second paragraph of the said memorandum refers to being:-

"very unhappy at the current state of the Manager's bridging finance arrangements. The loan arrangements and the fact that payments were rescheduled without consultation with the Credit Committee."

(c) The final paragraph of the said memorandum is a complaint about the Plaintiff's conduct in relation to his approval of loans "not fully secured by shares or other adequate collateral".

Before the said Board Meeting the Credit Committee did not ask the Plaintiff for any explanation and at the said Board Meeting the Plaintiff was excluded from participation. The Board Meeting became manifestly acrimonious and the said five members of the Credit Committee resigned. The Board proceeded to pass a resolution of confidence in the Plaintiff as their Manager.

As a result of the said meeting, the said memorandum became part of the minutes of the meeting. At or about the same date or at the same meeting, it is not quite clear which, a representative of the Irish League of Credit Unions, a Mr. Tony Burke was making a regular inspection of the Defendants. He noted in the minutes the reference to unauthorised changes by the Plaintiff to his account. He considered that he should report this to the American Insurers, "Cumis".. As a result of that report Cumis removed bonding from the Plaintiff by endorsement of writing dated the 8th March, 1993.

In subsequent correspondence it emerges that the basis upon which the decision by "Cumis" was made was "it is clear that this is a case of pre-meditated dishonesty and Cumis are not willing to bond Mr. Frizelle".

In the hearing before me which is a full plenary hearing there was not one scintilla of evidence to justify anyone coming to the conclusion that there was any dishonest intent by the Plaintiff in rescheduling or re-phasing on his repayments. In fact the loan was repaid on or about February, 10th, 1993. And the Defendants did not suffer one penny of a loss nor was it ever the intention of the Plaintiff to cause them loss or to obtain any financial benefit whatsoever. He was undoubtedly guilty but acting ultra vires his powers in re-phasing his loan repayments. The decision of the Cumis meant that any action taken by the Plaintiff as a member of the staff of the Defendants would not be bonded and any loss resulting therefrom would not be covered. Thus the Defendants would be exposed and without indemnity of any kind.

This meant that the Plaintiff could no longer remain in the employment of the Defendants and as stated in the letter to him of June 25th, it was with regret that his employment had to be terminated.

That termination arose from the conduct of the five members of the Credit Committee. It is clear from the evidence of Mr. Lyons, who was one of the five that they considered that there was dishonesty involved and that that is were the concept of dishonesty comes from in the decision of the American Insurance Company. In my view it was not their function to make any decision or to draw any inference. Their function was to report to the Board of Directors. Further it was their function and their duty to ask the Plaintiff before they reported to the Board of Directors for his explanation and to report that explanation to the Board of Directors. This they did not do. Further in my view, their complaints to the Board of Directors about the Plaintiff was part and parcel of a much wider agenda and was tainted as a result. Finally at the point at which they were making their complaint, they were party to excluding the Plaintiff from the meeting and at the point at which their complaints became part and parcel of the record of that meeting, the Plaintiff had had no opportunity giving his version to the Board and accordingly when the record was inspected and reported to Cumis by Mr. Burke no such explanation was present, though in fact Mr. Burke did get a verbal explanation from the Plaintiff ex post facto.

In my opinion the whole procedure is so tainted with irregularity, impropriety, and other agendas, that this dismissal must be considered an unfair dismissal. In my view, having regard to all the circumstances, there was no substantial ground to justify dismissal.

Under the provisions of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, the Court has power to order the re-instatement of an employee who has been unfairly dismissed. In this case to take that action would be unreal. This Court has no means by which it can compel Cumis, the American Insurance Company, to grant bonding to the Plaintiff. Without bonding it would be inequitable to require the Defendants to reinstate the Plaintiff. Accordingly, I am compelled to turn to the alternative statutory power of awarding the Plaintiff compensation in the form of a payment equalling 104 weeks of his remuneration at the date of dismissal. I also award him the costs of the proceedings in the Circuit Court and in this Court together with such other costs before the Employment Appeals Tribunal as he may be entitled to under statute. I certify for Senior Counsel in this Court.

THE HIGH COURT

[2013 No. 334 MCA]

IN THE MATTER OF AN APPEAL PURSUANT TO

SECTION 7(4)(B) OF THE PAYMENT OF WAGES ACT 1991

HEALTH SERVICE EXECUTIVE

APPELLANT

AND

JOHN McDERMOTT

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Hogan delivered on 19th June, 2014

1. The respondent, Mr. McDermott, is a medical consultant attached to Connolly Hospital, Blanchardstown, Dublin. He is employed pursuant to the 2008 Consultant Contract, on a Type B contract. Clause 23 of the Contract provided for a particular salary scale, with certain additional payments due on particular dates from 2007 onwards. It is not in dispute but that the salary increases due from 1st June, 2009, onwards were not paid by his employer, the Health Service Executive.

2. The reasons why these payments were not sanctioned or paid are fairly clear. By June, 2009 it was plain that the State was facing a very significant financial crisis which, among many other painful things, called for an immediate reduction in the public sector pay bill.

3. By notice of complaint dated 16th June, 2011, the respondent referred a claim to the Rights Commissioner under the Payment of Wages Act 1991 ("the 1991 Act"). In that complaint the respondent maintained that his pay had been unlawfully deducted between 1st January, 2011, and 30th June, 2011. At a hearing before the Rights Commissioner the HSE argued that the complaint was time-barred because it contended that the cause of action emanated from a decision of the then Minister for Health and Children (Deputy M. Harney T.D.) in either June, 2009 or (at the very latest) August, 2009 not to sanction the increase which had been otherwise scheduled under the contract. Section 22(4) of the Health Act 2004 requires that terms of conditions of remuneration of all employees working in the health service must be approved by the Minister and, indeed, the consent of the Minister for Finance. Absent such ministerial consent the HSE could not, as a matter of public law, lawfully make the payment. Whether this failure gives an employee such as Mr. McDermott other remedies – whether a claim under the 1991 Act or an action for damages for breach of contract – is not a matter which I need presently consider.

4. The time-barring argument was rejected by the Rights Commissioner in a decision dated 7th January, 2012, who decided that he had jurisdiction to hear the complaint in respect of alleged contraventions falling within the six months period commencing 30th December, 2010, and ending on 29th June, 2011. The Commissioner then proceeded to consider the substance of the complaint and in that respect found against Mr. McDermott.

5. Mr. McDermott then appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal ("EAT") where the time point arose as a preliminary issue. The EAT rejected the argument that the complainant must lodge the complaint within six months from the date of the first deduction or non-payment. It rather took the view that a cause of action arises with each and every contravention and that an employee has six months from every such contravention to make a claim against the employer.

6. The HSE now appeals to this Court on a point of law pursuant to s. 7(4)(b) of the 1991 Act against the correctness of that decision.

Background to the 1991 Act

7. The 1991 Act was a modernising item of legislation designed to replace and repeal the former Truck Acts, 1831 to 1896. The Truck Acts were themselves designed to address the social problem whereby in the 18th and 19th centuries many employers sought to pay their employees by means of benefits in kind, rather than coin or cash. These benefits in kind often took the form of credits to be exchanged for consumer staples – such as clothing and food – in the shops and premises often run by the employer. The object of the Truck Acts was to prevent this particular form of exploitation of employees, by limiting the type of deductions which might be made by employers but also by requiring certain types of employees to be paid by coin or cash.

8. The 1991 Act sought to modernise that old law and, in particular, sought to facilitate the payment of wages otherwise than in cash. Yet, in some respects at least, the spirit of the Truck Acts lives on in that s. 5 of the 1991 Act seeks to limit the type of deductions which can be made at source in respect of an employee's wages. Thus, for example, subject to some specific exceptions, s. 5(2)(b) of the 1991 Act prohibits an employer from making a deduction from the wages of an employee in respect of "goods or services supplied to or provided by the employee the supply or provision of which is necessary to the employment."

9. Section 6 of the 1991 Act creates a new mechanism whereby these rights can be enforced. Accordingly, complaints under the 1991 Act can be submitted to the Rights Commissioner at first instance, although the claim can also be pursued before the courts as an alternative: see s. 6(3)(a) and s. 6(3)(b). Section 6(4) introduces a time limit for claims before the Rights Commissioner:

> "A Rights Commissioner shall not entertain a complaint under this section unless it is presented to him within the period of 6 months beginning on the date of the contravention to which the complaint relates or (in a case where the Rights Commissioner is satisfied that exceptional circumstances prevented the presentation of the complaint within the period aforesaid) such further period not exceeding 6 months as the Rights Commissioner considers reasonable."

10. As we shall presently see, it is the construction of these provisions – and, specifically, the meaning of the words "on the date of the contravention to which the complaint relates" - which is at issue in the present appeal.

11. Section 7 makes provision for an appeal from decisions of the Rights Commissioner to the EAT and s. 7(2) provides that such appeals must be brought within a six week period from the date it was communicated to the parties. It is accepted that such an appeal was lodged within the six week period. The EAT, however, decided the preliminary time point in a manner adverse to the HSE and it is from that decision that the present appeal is taken.

The construction of s. 6(4) of the 1991 Act

12. It is at this point that we can return to the construction of the relevant language of s. 6(4), namely, "within the period of 6 months beginning on the date of the contravention to which the complaint relates". The first thing to note is that no special meaning has been ascribed to the word "contravention" by the 1991 Act, so that it must be given its ordinary, natural meaning.

13. We may next observe that the actual language of the sub-section is clear, because it is the words "contravention to which the complaint relates" which are critical. It may be accepted that every distinct and separate breach of the 1991 Act amounts to a "contravention" of that Act. If, for example, an employee is paid monthly and the employer makes unlawful deduction X in respect of salary for every month in a two year period it might be said in the abstract that there have been 24 separate "contraventions" of the 1991 Act during that period.

14. Yet the relevant statutory language takes us somewhat further, because the key question is the "date of the contravention to which the complaint relates." In other words, time runs for the purposes of the Act not from the date of any particular contravention or even the date of the first contravention, but rather from the date of the contravention "to which the complaint relates." As the EAT pointed out in its ruling on the matter, had the Oireachtas intended that time was to run from the date of the first contravention, it could easily have so provided.

15. For the purposes of this limitation period, everything turns, accordingly, on the manner in which the complaint is framed by the employee. If, for example, the employer has been unlawfully making deductions for a three year period, then provided that the complaint which has been presented relates to a period of six months beginning "on the date of the contravention to which the complaint relates", the complaint will nonetheless be in time.

16. It follows, therefore, that if an employer has been making deduction X from the monthly salary of the employee since January 2010, a complaint which relates to deductions made from January, 2014 onwards and which is presented to the Rights Commissioner in June, 2014 will still be in time for the purposes of s. 6(4). If, on the other hand, the complaint were to have been framed in a different manner, such that it related to the period from January, 2010 onwards, it would then have been out of time.

17. It may be that when enacting s. 6(4) the Oireachtas did not fully appreciate that everything might turn for the purposes of time on the actual manner in which the particular complaint was actually framed by the employee, but the language of the sub-section really admits of no other conclusion. Nor can it be said that such a conclusion is absurd in any way.

18. In these circumstances the Supreme Court has indicated that it is not necessary or even appropriate for a court to go further on questions of statutory interpretation. As Denham J. said in Board of St. Malóga National School v. Minister for Education [2010] IESC 57, [2011] 1 I.R. 363:

> "As the words of s.29 [of the Education Act 1998] are clear, with a plain meaning, they should be so construed. The literal meaning is clear, unambiguous and not absurd. There is no necessity, indeed it would be wrong, to use other canons of construction to interpret sections of a statute which are clear. The Oireachtas has legislated in a clear fashion and that is the statutory law."

19. Counsel for the HSE, Mr. McDonald SC, urged a different approach, contending that this construction of the Act would lead to an absurd situation where there was, in effect, no time limit, depriving s. 6(4) of all meaning. For my part, I fail to see how such a construction would lead to a state of affairs which was either absurd or which would produce the results which Mr. McDonald SC feared. Depending, of course, on the manner in which the complaint is framed, only complaints which "relate" to the last six months (or, if the Rights Commissioner is satisfied that there are "exceptional circumstances" which prevented the bringing of the complaint, twelve months) prior to the presentation of the complaint to the Rights Commissioner will not be time-barred.

20. This state of affairs – with a rolling time limit - is by no means unusual in the law. If, for example, a commercial tenant is obliged to pay a monthly rent of €5,000, but has actually only paid €4,500 per month for the last eight years, then having regard to the provisions of the Statute of Limitations, in a breach of contract action the landlord will be able to claim only in respect of the underpayments for the last six years. No one would suggest in that situation that the entire action was statute-barred on the basis that the cause of action first arose eight years ago with the first underpayment, because each separate underpayment would be regarded as a separate cause of action. A very similar analysis applies by analogy to the claim in the present case.

21. If, moreover, any different interpretation were to be adopted it itself could quickly lead to some anomalous and even absurd results, as the following series of examples show.

First example

22. Suppose, for example, an employer made deduction X from his employees monthly salary from January 2010, but no complaint was made by the employees. Possibly emboldened by their passivity, the employer then commences to make deduction Y in March, 2014. An employee thereafter presents a complaint to the Rights Commissioner in June, 2014 to the effect that unlawful deductions X and Y have been made from his salary from March 2014 onwards. Is to be said that the Rights Commissioner cannot entertain any claim in relation to deduction X from March, 2014 because the evidence is that these deductions commenced in January, 2010?

Second example

23. Suppose, for example, an employer hires a young employee with little English and who perhaps has little familiarity with Irish labour rights legislation. The employer makes a series of unlawful deductions from the employee's wages and this state of affairs continues for many years due to the employee's vulnerability and lack of awareness of his statutory entitlements. Is to be said that in those circumstances the employer should be permitted to continue to make these unlawful deductions every month, more or less in perpetuity, even though this result would be precisely the logical consequence of the argument now advanced by the HSE?

The decision in Moran v. Employment Appeals Tribunal

24. It remains only to consider the decision of Keane J. in Moran v. Employment Appeals Tribunal [2014] IEHC 154. In that case the parties also canvassed many of the arguments which featured in the present appeal, but in the event Keane J. did not find it necessary to rule on those arguments. This was because the complaint as formulated by the claimant in that case related to a time period of alleged contraventions which was plainly time-barred.

25. This point was clearly explained by Keane J. in the following terms:

> "I do not believe that it is necessary or appropriate for the Court to address, much less resolve, the issue of statutory construction presented by the appellant in order to dispose of this appeal. The uncontroverted evidence presented to the rights commissioner, the Tribunal and to the Court establishes that the appellant did not, as a matter of fact, present a complaint to the rights commissioner relating to a contravention of the 1991 Act alleged to have occurred on any specific date or dates within 6 months of the 17th May 2010. The appellant himself identified the contravention to which his complaint relates as an "application ... for payment of a 5% wage increase awarded by Government to [HSNs] in the [HSE] with effect from 14 September 2007."
> The issue of how this Court should construe the provisions of section 6(4) of the 1991 Act for the purpose of applying it to a complaint that there has been an impermissible deduction from the wages of the appellant in each of the 6 months immediately prior to the presentation by him of that complaint (specifically, a deduction in the form of a refusal to include in that payment an increase to which the complainant claims to have become entitled some years previously) is a hypothetical issue as far as the complaint actually presented by the appellant in this case is concerned.

As Carroll J. confirmed in the case of Mhic Mhathuna v. Ireland [1989]1 I.R. 504 (at 510), the Court cannot take into account arguments based on assumptions or hypotheses outside the facts and circumstances of the action or, in this instance, the appeal - before the Court.

If the appellant is correct in his contention concerning the proper construction of section 6(4) of the 1991 Act, then it is open to him to present a complaint to a rights commissioner relating to any alleged deduction in the wages paid to him on any specified date (or dates) within the period of 6 months beginning on the date of the first such payment. If he is incorrect in that contention, any such complaint will fail. But it would be wrong for the Court to seek to anticipate the outcome of such a complaint before the rights commissioner or the Tribunal for the purpose of the present appeal, just as it would be wrong for this Court to conduct this appeal as though the applicant had actually presented such a complaint to the rights commissioner or to the Tribunal in this case."

26. It is accordingly clear that, just as in the present case, the decision in Moran turned entirely on the manner in which the complaint had been formulated in that case. The claim was accordingly held to be time-barred precisely because the complaint "related" to a time period well beyond the six months statutory period. Indeed, in that final paragraph which I have just quoted, Keane J. clearly hinted that he would have arrived at a different conclusion had the complaint been formulated differently, so that it "related" to a different time period which was not statute-barred.

Conclusions

27. It follows, accordingly, that for the reasons which I have just stated, the EAT was correct in concluding that the claim in the present case was not time-barred by reason of the operation of s. 6(4) of the 1991 Act. Critically, the complaint in the present case related to a period of time (January, 2011 to June, 2011) which was presented to the Rights Commissioner on 16th June, 2011, within the six months time limit in respect of this particular complaint.

28. Accordingly, therefore, I propose to dismiss the appeal by the HSE on the preliminary time issue and to return the matter to the Tribunal so that it can now proceed to consider the merits of the complaint.

High Court 7th July, 2008

Employment – Contract for services – Contract of service – Nature of work relationship – Mutuality of obligation – Enterprise test – Control – Integration – Whether employees or independent contractors – Whether tribunal erred in law – Whether tribunal applied incorrect test – Appeal from Employment Appeals Tribunal – Point of law – Jurisdiction of court to review – Principles which apply – Whether any definitive test.

The Employment Appeals Tribunal, on a preliminary application as to whether the respondents were employed under a contract of service or a contract for services, ruled that the respondents, temporary veterinary surgeons, were employed under a contract of service for the appellant and, accordingly, were entitled to payments pursuant to the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2003 and under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 to 2001.

The appellant appealed that determination to the High Court on the basis that the Employment Appeals Tribunal misdirected itself as to the applicable law or alternatively failed to correctly apply the law to the facts before it.

The appellant argued, inter alia, that there was no evidence before the Employment Appeals Tribunal upon which it could conclude that any implied agreement had been reached between the appellant and the respondents to carry out inspection and certification of meat on the appellant's behalf on an ongoing basis, and that there was significant and uncontested evidence to the contrary before the tribunal to the effect that the appellant had no control over the level of work that was available for the respondents.

The appellant further argued that the Employment Appeals Tribunal applied an incorrect test to establish the existence of a contract of service grounded on a misconstruction of the judgment of Keane J. in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34.

Held by the High Court (Edwards J.), in allowing the appeal and remitting the matter to the Employment Appeals Tribunal, 1, that it was an incorrect interpretation of the ratio decidendi of Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 to regard it as a formulation of a single composite test either for determining the nature of the work relationship between two parties, or for determining whether a particular employment was to be regarded as governed by a contract for services or a contract of service.

ary, 2006), Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173 and Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 considered.

2. That, in endeavouring to determine the nature of the contractual arrangements between parties or whether a particular employment was to be regarded as a contract for services or of service, every case had to be considered in the light of its particular facts by reference to the general principles which the courts have developed. It was simply not possible to arrive at the correct result by testing the facts of the case in a rigid formulaic way. The same question, as an aid to appreciating the facts, would not necessarily be crucial or fundamental in every case. It was for a court or tribunal to identify those aids of greatest potential assistance to them in the circumstances of the particular case.

Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 followed. Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 considered.

3. That, in the context of trying to correctly characterise the nature of a work relationship between two parties, it was unhelpful to speak of "tests" as no one test could constitute a measure or yardstick of universal application that could be relied upon to deliver a definitive result.

Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34, Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173 and Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 considered.

4. That the so called enterprise test, which involved looking at the contract as a whole and asking was the person in business on his or her own account, could not in the circumstances be determinative. Whilst in certain circumstances it could be legitimately applied as an aid to the drawing of appropriate inferences, it was incorrect to apply it in a formulaic way. It was also incorrect to assert that questions of control and integration were to be regarded merely as elements to be taken into account.

Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34, Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173 and Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 considered.

5. That all potential aids to the drawing of the appropriate inferences stood in their own stead. The general principles from the case law such as enterprise, control and integration did not represent an exhaustive list. Depending on the circumstances of the particular case, some aids proved more helpful or more useful than others. There was no exhaustive list of the criteria which should be adopted or the considerations which were relevant in considering whether, a particular employment was to be regarded as a contract for services or a contract of service, nor could strict rules be laid down as to the relative weight which the various considerations should carry in particular cases.

Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34, Tierney v. An Post [2000] 1 I.R. 536, Electricity Supply Board v. Minister for Social Welfare [2006] IEHC 59, (Unreported, High Court, Gilligan J., 21st February, 2006), Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173 and Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 considered.

6. That the Employment Appeals Tribunal erred in formulating the preliminary question as to whether the respondents were employed under a contract of service or a contract for services. In doing so, the tribunal failed to have regard to all the possibilities in determining the nature of the work relationship between the parties. The correct approach would have been for the Employment Appeals Tribunal to ask whether the relationship between each respondent and the appellant was subject to just one contract, or more than one contract. The second question involved the scope of each contract and the third question involved the nature of each contract.

Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 considered.

7. That the finding of mutuality of obligation by the Employment Appeals Tribunal was made on a flawed and untenable basis as the tribunal's ruling on the issue was predicated on the finding that there was an implied agreement reached with the respondents and the applicants to carry out inspection and certification of meat on an ongoing basis. There was nothing in the evidence before the Employment Appeals Tribunal so as to justify the implication of that term on the basis of the presumed intention of the parties; neither could implication of the term be regarded as necessary to give business efficacy to the agreement.

The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64 and Shirlaw v Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd. [1939] 2 K.B. 206 followed.

8. That the requirement of mutuality of obligation had to be satisfied if a contract of service was to exist: there must be mutual obligations on the employer to provide work for the employee and on the employee to perform work for the employer. If such mutuality was not present, then either there was no contract at all or whatever contract there was must be a contract for services or something else, but not a contract of service.

Special summons

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of Edwards J., infra.

On the 12th March, 2007, the Employment Appeals Tribunal, on a preliminary application, ruled that the respondents were employed under a contract of service and, accordingly, were entitled to payments from the appellant pursuant to the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2003 and under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 to 2001. The appellant instituted an appeal on a point of law to the High Court by way of special summons dated the 23rd April, 2007.

The appeal was heard by the High Court (Edwards J.) on the 14th and 15th February, 2008.

Anthony M. Collins S.C. (with him Cathy Smith) for the appellant.

Roderick Horan S.C. (with him Lucy Walsh) for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

Edwards J. 7th July, 2008

[1] The respondents are veterinary surgeons who worked for the appellant as temporary veterinary inspectors at the Galtee Meats plant at Mitchelstown, Co. Cork. Following the closure of that plant in October, 2004, the respondents claimed entitlement to payments from the appellant pursuant to the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2003 and under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 to 2001. However, any entitlement to the payments claimed was contingent on them having been employees who were employed at all material times by the appellant under a contract of service. The appellant contended that they had not been employees employed under a contract of service and in each case refused to make the payments claimed. Each of the respondents respectively brought an appeal against the refusal in their case to the Employment Appeals Tribunal. The Employment Appeals Tribunal decided to consider on a conjoined basis a preliminary point in each appeal, namely whether the respondents as temporary veterinary inspectors were employed under a contract of service or a contract for services by the appellant. By a determination dated the 12th March, 2007, the Employment Appeals Tribunal ruled that the respondents were employed under a contract of service, and therefore they were employees.

[2] This appeal is brought pursuant to s. 40 of the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2003 and s. 11(2) of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 to 2001, which each provide for an appeal on a question of law against a decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal. The appellant contends that the Employment Appeals Tribunal misdirected itself as to the applicable law, or alternatively that it failed to correctly apply the law to the facts before it. Specifically, it is alleged that the Employment Appeals Tribunal failed to apply the correct test as to whether the respondents had been employed on a contract of service or a contract for services and/or failed to correctly apply that test to the facts before it.

The court's jurisdiction to review: appeal on a question of law

[3] In Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34, Hamilton C.J. cautioned at pp. 37 and 38:-

> "… the courts should be slow to interfere with the decisions of expert administrative tribunals. Where conclusions are based upon an identifiable error of law or an unsustainable finding of fact by a tribunal such conclusions must be corrected. Otherwise it should be recognised that tribunals which have been given statutory tasks to perform and exercise their functions, as is now usually the case, with a high degree of expertise and provide coherent and balanced judgments on the evidence and arguments heard by them it should not be necessary for the courts to review their decisions by way of appeal or judicial review."

[4] This begs the question whether a determination by the Employment Appeals Tribunal of the nature of a work relationship between two parties is properly to be characterised as a matter of law, as a matter of fact or as a mixed question of law and fact. Some assistance is provided by National University of Ireland Cork v. Ahern [2005] IESC 40, [2005] 2 I.R. 577, cited by the appellant. In that case the Supreme Court considered what is meant by a "question of law" in the context of an appeal from the Labour Court under s. 8(3) of the Anti-Discrimination Pay Act 1974. McCracken J., with whom the other members of the court agreed, stated at p. 580:-

> "The respondents submit that the matters determined by the Labour Court were largely questions of fact and that matters of fact as found by the Labour Court must be accepted by the High Court in any appeal from its findings. As a statement of principle, this is certainly correct. However, this is not to say that the High Court or this court cannot examine the basis upon which the Labour Court found certain facts. The relevance, or indeed admissibility, of the matters relied on by the Labour Court in determining the facts is a question of law. In particular, the question of whether certain matters ought or ought not to have been considered by the Labour Court and ought or ought not to have been taken into account by it in determining the facts, is clearly a question of law and can be considered on an appeal under s. 8(3)."

[5] I find the judgment of Sir John Donaldson M.R. in the English case of O'Kelly v. Trusthouse Forte plc. [1983] I.C.R 728 also provides me with considerable assistance on this question. The then Master of the Rolls stated at pp. 760 to 761:-

> "The judgment of the appeal tribunal in this case suggests that there is a difference of judicial view as to whether the question 'Is a contract a contract of employment or a contract for services?' is a mixed question of fact and law or a question of law, but I do rather doubt whether the triple categorisation of issues as 'fact', 'law' and 'mixed fact and law' is very helpful in the context of the jurisdiction of the appeal tribunal.
> The appeal tribunal is a court with a statutory jurisdiction. So far as is material, that jurisdiction is limited to hearing appeals on questions of law arising from any decision of, or arising in any proceedings before, an industrial tribunal: s. 136(1) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978. If it is to vary or reverse a decision of an industrial tribunal it has to be satisfied that the tribunal has erred on a question of law.
> Whilst it may be convenient for some purposes to refer to questions of 'pure' law as contrasted with 'mixed' questions of fact and law, the fact is that the appeal tribunal has no jurisdiction to consider any question of mixed fact and law until it has purified or distilled the mixture and extracted a question of pure law.

The purification methods are well known. In the last analysis all courts have to direct themselves as to the law and then apply those directions in finding the facts (in relation to admissibility and relevance) and to the facts as so found. When reviewing such a decision, the only problem is to divine the direction on law which the lower court gave to itself. Sometimes it will have been expressed in its reasons, but more often it has to be inferred. This is the point of temptation for the appellate court. It may well have a shrewd suspicion, or gut reaction, that it would have reached a different decision, but it must never forget that this may be because it thinks that it would have found or weighed the facts differently. Unpalatable though it may be on occasion, it must loyally accept the conclusions of fact with which it is presented and, accepting those conclusions, it must be satisfied that there must have been a misdirection on a question of law before it can intervene. Unless the direction on law has been expressed it can only be so satisfied if, in its opinion, no reasonable tribunal, properly directing itself on the relevant questions of law, could have reached the conclusion under appeal. This is a heavy burden on an appellant. I would have thought that all this was trite law, but if it is not, it is set out with the greatest possible clarity in Edwards v. Bairstow [1956] A.C. 14."

"There is no doubt that there are pure questions of law which throw a court back to questions of fact. The most obvious example is what length of notice is required to terminate a contract which does not expressly make provision for termination. This is a pure question of law and the answer is 'Such time as is reasonable in all the circumstances.' Applying that direction to facts whose nature, quality and degree are known with complete precision will no doubt always produce the same answer. But this is not real life. In reality every tribunal of fact will find and assess the factual circumstances in ways which differ to a greater or lesser extent and so can give rise to different conclusions, each of which is unassailable on appeal. In this sense, but in this sense alone, their conclusions are conclusions of fact. More accurately they are conclusions of law which are wholly dependent upon conclusions of fact.

The test to be applied in identifying whether a contract is one of employment or for services is a pure question of law and so is its application to the facts. But it is for the tribunal of fact not only to find those facts but to assess them qualitatively and within limits, which are indefinable in the abstract; those findings and that assessment will dictate the correct legal answer. In the familiar phrase 'it is all a question of fact and degree'."

The primary facts

[7] The Employment Appeals Tribunal heard evidence in the matter over four days in 2006. The respondents in the present appeal were the moving parties before the tribunal. Each of them testified in their own behalf, and evidence was also adduced on behalf of all of them from the chief executive of Veterinary Ireland. The appellant in the present appeal was the respondent before the tribunal and adduced evidence from an official in its salaries section, from an assistant principal officer in its personnel division, and from a former permanent veterinary inspector at the Galtee Meats plant. The court has been provided with a transcript of the evidence and it is fair to say that it was largely uncontroversial. Though I am sure it would have been possible to produce one, the court has not been presented with an agreed summary of the evidence. Rather both sides, in their respective legal submissions, have sought independently to distil from the evidence a summary of the primary facts. While both summaries appear to the court to be fair and succinct, I propose for the purposes of this judgment to adopt the summary presented by the respondents, simply because it contains rather more detail than that presented by the appellant.

Factual background

[8] The claims have been instituted pursuant to the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2007 and pursuant to the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 to 2001. All five of the respondents are qualified veterinary surgeons and all of them worked as temporary veterinary inspectors for the appellant, in the Galtee meat processing plant, in Mitchelstown, Co. Cork, which plant closed in October, 2004 resulting in the termination of the respondents' employment with the appellant.

[9] The respondents lodged claims with the Employment Appeals Tribunal on the 21st April, 2005. It is the contention of the respondents that they worked under a "contract of service" for the appellant, and they are entitled to redundancy payments, as well as payments pursuant to the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts 1973 to 2001. The appellant entered an appearance on the 3rd June, 2005. The appellant contends that the five respondents, who worked as temporary veterinary inspectors, were engaged by the appellant at meat plants on a "contract for services" basis (i.e. contractors) to assist the appellant's full time veterinary staff at the plants as an integral part of the appellant's meat inspection service.

[10] The appellant has asserted that this was reflected in the fact that the temporary veterinary inspectors were private veterinary practitioners who were also in business on their own account, and that they could and did continue in private practice alongside undertaking temporary veterinary inspector work for the appellant. It is accepted that four out of the five respondents worked as veterinary surgeons in private practices. The appellant has accepted that the remuneration which was paid to the respondents was paid on an hourly fee basis at rates which were fixed at intervals between the appellant and the respondents' union, namely Veterinary Ireland. Veterinary Ireland is a trade union affiliated to the Irish Congress of Trade Unions ("ICTU"). The appellant was the only potential employer of temporary veterinary inspectors as the appellant is the only body with the requirement of the services of temporary veterinary inspectors in Ireland.

[12] The general lack of clear legal definitions on employment status for many years led to considerable confusion. The situation, however, was regularised in 2001 with the publication of a code of practice, arising from the report of the Employment Status Group established under the Programme for Prosperity and Fairness ("PPF"). Represented on this group were the Department of Finance, IBEC, ICTU, the Department of Social and Family Affairs and the Revenue Commissioners.

[13] This report sets out an extensive check list of criteria to be used in determining whether an individual is an employee. As was presented in evidence to the Employment Appeals Tribunal, analysis of the criteria established by this key Employment Status Group indicated clearly that temporary veterinary inspectors fit into the "employee" category under each and every relevant heading.

The approval procedure

[14] The appellant and the Irish Veterinary Union (an earlier name for Veterinary Ireland) negotiated and provided the respondents, and all temporary veterinary inspectors nationwide, with written conditions in respect of the operation of temporary veterinary inspector panels in January, 1999. On appointment by the appellant, each temporary veterinary inspector was provided with "conditions of engagement of part time temporary veterinary inspectors" (the "conditions"), which were subsequently updated at various times up to June, 2004.

[15] All of the respondents were temporary veterinary inspectors. In order to become a temporary veterinary inspector, each respondent had to apply for approval from the appellant. Once departmental approval had been granted, each respondent had to then complete a two week training course in meat inspection at his or her own expense. He/she then applied in writing to the appellant's personnel division for inclusion in a temporary veterinary inspector panel or panels at one or more of the meat factories. It was predetermined that a temporary veterinary inspector could not be listed on more than four panels at any one time, and that the temporary veterinary inspector could only hold one regular shift.

Rostering onto panels

[16] The appellant directed that the respondents could have their names placed on a maximum of four panels, (i.e. four meat plants), but must hold only one regular shift. They defined "regular" as attendance on more than 50% of "kill days" in the previous three months. The appellant directed that the respondents would not be allowed to work two shifts on the same day at one or more meat plants, unless it was a last resort to enable meat plants to continue when no other temporary veterinary inspector was available. The panels operated on the basis of seniority, availability and suitability.

[17] In the conditions, the appellant set out that they would make every effort to facilitate the respondents working in the meat plant of their choice, although the conditions stated that this would not always be possible.

[18] The conditions provided that the appellant's full time veterinary inspector, in consultation with the factory management, would determine the inspection points and the temporary veterinary inspector manning levels of each meat plant and would also determine in advance how the roster periods were required, based on anticipated slaughter numbers for the period in question.

Functions of temporary veterinary inspectors

[19] The conditions set out the functions of a temporary veterinary inspector as follows:-

> "The functions of the temporary veterinary inspectors are to assist the permanent veterinary staff at meat plants. The temporary veterinary inspectors will be assigned to and perform these functions by direction of the full time veterinary inspector at the meat plant. The veterinary inspector has overall responsibility for setting the manning levels (i.e. the number of temporary veterinary inspectors required (1) to cover the inspection points in the slaughter hall and (2) to be engaged during the day for ante-mortem duties), for the control and monitoring of meat inspection operations and ensuring that temporary veterinary inspectors perform their allocated duties satisfactorily."

Reporting structure

[20] The appellant's veterinary inspector at the meat plant rostered the respondents and it was he/she who had overall responsibility for setting the manning levels required. The function of each of the respondents was to assist the veterinary inspector at the meat plant in the meat inspection service. A temporary veterinary inspector was assigned to and performed those functions at the direction of the veterinary inspector. The veterinary inspector set the inspection points on the line, and checked the temporary veterinary inspectors work on a regular basis. The veterinary inspector ensured that meat was inspected in accordance with the relevant legislation.

[21] The conditions provided that where a temporary veterinary inspector was not performing his/her duties as required by the veterinary inspector, or was persistently late in attending his/her rostered shifts, the veterinary inspector would notify him/her accordingly. After three such notifications the veterinary inspector reserved the right, in consultation with the personnel division, to remove that temporary veterinary inspector from his or her position of seniority on the panel or, as a final measure, to remove him/her from the panel altogether.

Personal protective equipment and materials – investment in the enterprise

[22] Each respondent was provided with all of the required personal protective clothing by the appellant, and all of the equipment necessary for the respondents' duties was available and was provided by the appellant at the meat plant.

[23] The conditions further provided that the respondents engaged must use/wear the personal protective equipment provided by the appellant and the veterinary inspector had to ensure compliance with this requirement.

[24] All of the knives, scabbards, wellingtons and white coats used by the respondents for their work were provided by the appellant, and were kept by the appellant at the meat plant.

Hours of work

[25] The conditions of engagement provided that in respect of remuneration it was to be the rates, negotiated from time to time by the appellant and Veterinary Ireland, which would be paid. The hours of attendance were also as agreed between the appellant and Veterinary Ireland from time to time. They further set out that "actual times of attendance and departure must be entered in the daily attendance sheets by all temporary veterinary inspectors". The veterinary inspector had an attendance book in his office, and the respondents were required to "sign in" and "sign out".

[26] The conditions of engagement further provided that the minimum roster period in the morning was determined to be either two, two and a quarter, two and a half or three hours and the minimum roster period in the afternoon was two and a quarter to a maximum of four hours, with an additional half an hour in exceptional circumstances.

[27] If a respondent was unavailable to attend a specific shift, he/she had to notify the veterinary inspector who would then appoint the next most senior temporary veterinary inspector on the panel to perform the shift.

[28] The respondents were not allowed to employ assistants to carry out their work. They had to carry out the work personally. They could not subcontract the work, and they could not supply a substitute vet from their private practice to carry out the work.

[29] The respondents were provided with flexible working conditions, in keeping with those of the full time staff employed by the appellant.

[30] The respondents had occasionally swapped shifts, which was worked out as between the respondents. The respondents asserted that this practice had ceased.

Payment and insurance

[31] The respondents were paid an hourly rate. The respondents had previously been paid a shift rate, which was then changed to a rate of pay per hour by agreement with the respondents' trade union, following a ballot of union members. P.A.Y.E. and P.R.S.I. was deducted by the appellant from the hourly rate of pay. The appellant deducted the employee status P.A.Y.E., and an employer's P.R.S.I. contribution of 10.75% was paid by the appellant in respect of each respondent. The respondents were insurable for all purposes under P.R.S.I. The respondents were not obliged to maintain their own professional indemnity insurance. The appellant accepted that the Department of Finance delegated sanction to the appellant by way of letter dated the 22nd June, 1973, to link temporary veterinary inspector rates to the minimum of the full time veterinary inspector scale.

[32] Each of the respondents was issued annually with a P60 from the appellant, which named the appellant as the "employer" and each of the respondents as the "employee". The appellant deducted the respondents' union subscriptions from the respondents' salaries when asked in writing to do so by the respondents and their union.

[33] The respondents did not charge V.A.T., and were not paid V.A.T. V.A.T. was chargeable on T.B. testing, which was carried out by some of the respondents for the appellant as a separate matter in their own private practices.

Training

[34] Once a temporary veterinary inspector was approved, the appellant required that the temporary veterinary inspector would undergo a course in meat inspection at his or her own expense.

[35] The appellant provided additional training for the respondents, in respect of their role in the slaughter plants, which was carried out in 2000/2001 by a full time superintendent veterinary inspector of the appellant. The training seminars were facilitated by Veterinary Ireland.

[36] If changes in procedure arose, the veterinary inspector would inform the respondents and would distribute any new circulars from the appellant in relation to changes in legislation. The veterinary inspector held a meeting in a hotel with the respondents and other temporary veterinary inspectors in order to bring about uniformity in the meat inspection service. The legislative requirements were enforced by the veterinary inspector, who supervised and was responsible for the respondents.

Absence from panel – disciplinary action

[37] The conditions, provided that inability to attend would not give rise to disciplinary action in the following cases:-

(a) where called in under 24 hours;
(b) occasional inability to attend for practice reasons (in such cases notice must be given to the veterinary inspector at the meat plant);

(c) annual leave – five "shift" weeks i.e. a week in which a minimum of one shift normally falls;
(d) sick leave subject to medical certification;
(e) maternity leave (the third named respondent took two maternity leaves, and returned to the same position on the panel on both occasions);
(f) leave of absence for reasons other than private practice:-
    (i) academic studies (verification required) and
    (ii) charitable or development work outside Ireland.

[38] The conditions provided that in relation to such leave of absence, written confirmation had to be received in advance from the veterinary inspector that the temporary veterinary inspectors seniority on the panel in question would not be affected.

[39] The conditions also provided for circumstances where disciplinary action would arise. In particular, where a temporary veterinary inspector had regular shifts at a meat plant and was persistently turning down a percentage of such shifts, this would then result in a loss of seniority. The guideline as to what constituted persistent was 16% of shifts within any three month period. A record of non-availability was to be maintained by the veterinary inspector who was required to consult the appellant's personnel division in advance of any decision being taken in relation to a loss of seniority. The conditions of engagement provided veterinary inspectors had to keep a written record of the non-availability of temporary veterinary inspectors.

[40] The conditions further set out that the veterinary inspectors would have to consult with the appellant's personnel division in the department in advance of any proposed changes to temporary veterinary inspector panels, and that no change could be implemented without the written approval of the personnel division. In that regard, any such changes would have to comply with temporary veterinary inspectors' conditions of engagement and the appellant set out that temporary veterinary inspectors could not therefore be placed on, promoted, demoted or removed from panels by veterinary inspectors unless written approval was obtained in advance from the personnel division.

[41] The respondents were entitled to annual leave in the amount of five shift weeks.

The issues

[42] Clearly the work relationship between each of the respondents and the appellant was a very unusual one, and one which it is not easy to classify. The court is somewhat surprised that the Employment Appeals Tribunal decided to deal with the matter by hearing a preliminary point as to "whether the temporary veterinary inspectors were employed under a contract of service or a contract for services by the Department of Agriculture and Food" (my emphasis), because posing the question in that way immediately limited the possibilities to just two. It is not clear why this was done. It is possible that the Employment Appeals Tribunal decided of its own motion to adopt this approach, and there was no demurral by the parties, or it may be that this approach was suggested by the parties and agreed to by the tribunal. However, even if was the case that the parties themselves were of the view that it was a straight choice between a single contract of service and a single contract for services, that would not have been decisive of the matter or binding on the tribunal. It seems to this court that there were a much wider range of possibilities, and it was unjustifiable to limit the possibilities to just two.

[43] In each instance it was incumbent on the tribunal to ask three questions. The first question was whether the relationship between each respondent and the appellant was subject to just one contract, or more than one contract. The second question involved the scope of each contract. The third question involved the nature of each contract.

[44] As I have stated, there were various possibilities. It was, of course, possible that each of the respondents, respectively, was employed under a single contract which, upon a thorough examination of the circumstances, might fall to be classified as either a contract of service or a contract for services. However, another possibility was that on each occasion that the temporary veterinary inspectors worked they entered a new contract, and these contracts, depending on the circumstances, might fall to be classified as contracts of service or contracts for services. A third possibility is that on each occasion that the temporary veterinary inspectors worked they entered a separate contract governing that particular engagement, which might be either a contract of service or a contract for service, but by virtue of a course of dealing over a lengthy period of time that course of dealing became hardened or refined into an enforceable contract, a kind of overarching master or umbrella contract, if you like, to offer and accept employment, which master or umbrella contract might conceivably be either a contract of service or a contract for services or perhaps a different type of contract altogether. This notion of an umbrella contract, though controversial, has featured in several English cases involving particular classes of workers, such as outworkers, casual workers, and piece workers: see, for example, Airfix Footwear Ltd. v. Cope [1978] I.C.R. 1210 and Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612.

The complaint that the Employment Appeals Tribunal misdirected itself as to the applicable law

[45] The Employment Appeals Tribunal adopted a two stage process in reaching its decision as to the nature of the relationship between the parties. In the first instance the tribunal applied a mutuality of obligation test, and thereafter it applied the so called enterprise test. The appellants have no difficulty with the fact that the mutuality of obligation test was applied but they vehemently dispute the purported finding of mutuality of obligation on the evidence that was before the tribunal. They also say that the Employment Appeals Tribunal was incorrect to apply the so called enterprise test as it is not determinative of the issue, and the Employment Appeals Tribunal's belief to the contrary is grounded in a misconstruction of Keane J.'s judgment in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34.

[46] Although it has been conceded by the appellants that the Employment Appeals Tribunal correctly identified that the requirement of mutuality of obligation has to be satisfied if a contract of service is to exist, I think that it is appropriate nonetheless to elaborate just a little on what this test involves, having regard to the fact that the purported finding of mutuality of obligation is disputed.

[47] The requirement of mutuality of obligation is the requirement that there must be mutual obligations on the employer to provide work for the employee and on the employee to perform work for the employer. If such mutuality is not present, then either there is no contract at all or whatever contract there is must be a contract for services or something else, but not a contract of service. It was characterised in Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R. 612 at p. 632 as the "one sine qua non which can firmly be identified as an essential of the existence of a contract of service." Moreover, in Carmichael v. National Power plc. [1999] I.C.R. 1226 at p.1230 it was referred to as "that irreducible minimum of mutual obligation necessary to create a contract of service". Accordingly the mutuality of obligation test provides an important filter. Where one party to a work relationship contends that that relationship amounts to a contract of service, it is appropriate that the court or tribunal seized of that issue should in the first instance examine the relationship in question to determine if mutuality of obligation is a feature of it. If there is no mutuality of obligation it is not necessary to go further: whatever the relationship is, it cannot amount to a contract of service. However, if mutuality of obligation is found to exist, the mere fact of its existence is not, of itself, determinative of the nature of the relationship and it is necessary to examine the relationship further.

[48] The Employment Appeals Tribunal's ruling on the issue of mutuality of obligation was in the following terms:-

> "… in the case herein the five temporary veterinary inspectors have an implied agreement reached with the Department of Agriculture and Food and the temporary veterinary inspectors to carry out inspection of meat and certification of same on behalf of the Department of Agriculture and Food on an ongoing basis, hence the majority finds there is mutuality of obligation."

[49] The appellant contends that there was no evidence before the Employment Appeals Tribunal upon which it could conclude that any "implied agreement" had been reached between the appellant and the respondents to carry out inspection of meat and certification of same on the appellant's behalf on an ongoing basis. Nothing in the arrangements that existed as between the parties, which had been reduced to writing, indicates that this was in fact the case. Moreover they say there was significant and uncontested evidence to the contrary before the Employment Appeals Tribunal which it inexplicably chose to overlook. This was to the effect that the appellant had no control over the level of work that was available for temporary veterinary inspectors, as this was a matter entirely within the control of the processing plants. The appellant was thus unable to give, and did not give, a commitment to the respondents at any stage as to the level of work available to them, and the respondents were at all times well aware of this. Furthermore, the uncontested evidence concerning the arrangements entered into between the appellant and the respondents was that the latter were entitled to decline to work at the very least 16% of the shifts offered to them without that refusal having any consequences for their contracts.

[50] In the court's view these points are well made. Moreover, the tribunal's belief as to the nature of the contractual arrangements between the parties is wholly unclear. The determination speaks not of the implication of a term into a clearly indentified contract (whether that contract be one of service or for services), but rather of "an implied agreement" which could either connote such a contract or, alternatively, an overarching umbrella contract. O'Kelly v. Trusthouse Forte plc. [1983] I.C.R. 728 provides an example of where the latter type of contract was contended for. In that case the banqueting department of a hotel company kept a list of some 100 casual catering staff who were known as "regulars" because they could be relied upon to offer their services regularly and in return were assured of preference in the allocation of available work. These workers claimed to be entitled to unfair dismissal compensation on the basis that they had been employees employed under a contract of service, but the hotel disputed this and contended that they were independent contractors supplying services and not employees. The issue went before an industrial tribunal and the claimants lost on the basis that the important ingredient of mutuality of obligation was missing. The claimants appealed successfully to an appeals tribunal. The appeals tribunal's decision was in turn appealed to the Court of Appeal. In the course of his judgment Sir John Donaldson M.R. said at p. 763:-

> "Although I, like the appeal tribunal, am content to accept the industrial tribunal's conclusion that there was no overall or umbrella contract, I think that there is a shorter answer. It is that giving the applicants' evidence its fullest possible weight, all that could emerge was an umbrella or master contract for, not of, employment, It would be a contract to offer and accept individual contracts of employment and, as such, outside the scope of the unfair dismissal provisions."

[51] Even if the court were certain (which it is not) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal considered that a single contract existed, said to be a contract of service, and that a term was to be implied into that contract committing the appellant to offer, and the respondents to accept, work on an ongoing basis, one would have to query the basis for implying such a term. The classical situation wherein a term may be implied at common law was identified in the well known case, The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64 as being one in which a term not expressly agreed upon by the parties is to be inferred on the basis of the presumed intention of the parties. The proposition received a somewhat wider formulation in Shirlaw v. Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd [1939] 2 K.B. 206 wherein MacKinnon J. said at p. 227:-

[52] The Irish courts have approved the so called "officious bystander test" many times and MacKinnon J.'s formulation has been interpreted so that a term may be implied if it is necessary to give business efficacy to the contract. However, there was nothing in the evidence before the Employment Appeals Tribunal that would have entitled it to presume an intention on the part of the parties that the appellant should be obliged to offer, and the respondents should be obliged to accept, work on an ongoing basis, so as to justify the implication of the term contended for on the basis of the presumed intention of the parties. Neither would implication of the term be regarded as necessary to give business efficacy to the agreement. In the circumstances I cannot see how the term contended for might legitimately have been implied.

[53] Moreover, if, as is possible, the Employment Appeals Tribunal's ruling was to be interpreted as supporting the implication of an overarching umbrella agreement in a situation where individual contracts, either of service or for services, also existed, it is difficult to see how in any case the tribunal could ultimately reach a conclusion other than that arrived at by Sir John Donaldson M.R. in O'Kelly v. Trusthouse Forte plc. [1983] I.C.R. 728.

[54] In all the circumstances I regard the Employment Appeals Tribunal's finding that there was an implied agreement reached between the appellant and the respondents to carry out inspection of meat and certification of same on an ongoing basis to be untenable. Its finding of mutuality of obligation was predicated on the existence of this implied agreement and, accordingly, must be regarded as flawed.

The so called enterprise test

[55] Having decided that there was mutuality of obligation, the tribunal proceeded to what it characterised as "the second stage in the process" and stated:-

> "The second stage of the test in the process requires a determination as to whether the contract binding the parties is one of service or one for services. The fundamental test for determining this question was set down in the English decision of Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173. Here it was held that the court should consider if the person was performing the service as a person in business on his own account. If the answer to that question is yes, then the contract is one for services. If the answer is no, then the contract is one of service.
> This approach was adopted in this jurisdiction by the Supreme Court in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34."

[56] At a later stage in its ruling the tribunal further stated:-

> "Following the decision of the Supreme Court in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 and Tierney v. An Post [2000] 1 I.R. 536, there is now a single composite test for determining if a person is engaged on a contract of service or a contract for services. It involves looking at the contract as a whole and asking, 'Is the person in business on his or her own account?'. If the answer is yes, then the contract is one for services. If the answer is no, then the contract is one of service.

The questions of control and integration should no longer be regarded as conclusive tests in themselves but as elements to be taken into account in applying the enterprise test."

[57] It is clear from a consideration of the case law cited to the court by the parties that the summary statement of principle, as formulated in the latter quotation, did not originate with the tribunal, but rather was borrowed without attribution from an earlier determination of the Labour Court in Western People Newspaper v. A worker (Unreported, Labour Court, 24th May, 2004, EDA047) and reproduced verbatim by the Employment Appeals Tribunal.

[58] The appellant contends that the Employment Appeals Tribunal misconstrued Keane J.'s judgment in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34. It is therefore necessary to scrutinise that judgment with great care with a view to identifying precisely what is the ratio decidendi of it. It may also be of assistance in that regard to examine how it was applied by the Supreme Court in Tierney v. An Post [2000] 1 I.R. 536 and in Castleisland Cattle Breeding v. Minister for Social Welfare [2004] IESC 40, [2004] 4 I.R. 150, and also most recently in Electricity Supply Board v Minister for Social Welfare [2006] IEHC 59, (Unreported, High Court, Gilligan J., 21st February, 2006).

[59] The principal judgment in the Supreme Court appeal in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 was delivered by Keane J., with whom Hamilton C.J. and Murphy J. agreed. The ratio decidendi of the case (about which I will say more in a moment) is to be found in the following passages from that judgment at p. 49:-

"The criteria which should be adopted in considering whether a particular employment, in the context of legislation such as the Act of 1981, is to be regarded as a contract 'for service' or a contract 'of services' have been the subject of a number of decisions in Ireland and England. In some of the cases, different terminology is used and the distinction is stated as being between a 'servant' and 'independent contractor'. However, there is a consensus to be found in the authorities that each case must be considered in the light of its particular facts and of the general principles which the courts have developed: see the observations of Barr J. in McAuliffe v. Minister for Social Welfare [1995] 2 I.R. 238.

At one stage, the extent and degree of the control which was exercised by one party over the other in the performance of the work was regarded as decisive. However, as later authorities demonstrate, that test does not always provide satisfactory guidance. In Cassidy v. Ministry of Health [1951] 2 K.B. 343, it was pointed out that, although the master of a ship is clearly employed under a contract of service, the owners are not entitled to tell him how he should navigate the vessel. Conversely, the fact that one party reserves the right to exercise full control over the method of doing the work may be consistent with the other party being an independent contractor: see Queensland Stations Property Ltd. v. Federal Comissioner of Taxation (1945) 70 C.L.R. 539.

In the English decision of Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, Cooke J., at p. 184 having referred to these authorities said:-

> 'The observations of Lord Wright, of Denning L.J. and of the judges of the Supreme Court suggest that the fundamental test to be applied is this: "Is the person who has engaged himself to perform these services performing them as a person in business on his own account?". If the answer to that question is 'yes', then the contract is a contract for services. If the answer is 'no', then the contract is a contract of service. No exhaustive list has been compiled and perhaps no exhaustive list can be compiled of considerations which are relevant in determining that question, nor can strict rules be laid down as to the relative weight which the various considerations should carry in particular cases. The most that can be said is that control will no doubt always have to be considered, although it can no longer be regarded as the sole determining factor; and that factors which may be of importance are such matters as whether the man performing the services provides his own equipment, whether he hires his own helpers, what degree of financial risk he takes, what degree of responsibility for investment and management he has, and whether and how far he has an opportunity of profiting from sound management in the performance of his task.'

It should also be noted that the Supreme Court of the Irish Free State in Graham v. Minister for Industry and Commerce and Molloy [1933] I.R. 156, had also made it clear that the essential test was whether the person alleged to be a 'servant' was in fact working for himself or for another person.

It is, accordingly, clear that, while each case must be determined in the light of its particular facts and circumstances, in general a person will be regarded as providing his or her services under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor where he or she is performing those services for another person and not for himself or herself. The degree of control exercised over how the work is to be performed, although a factor to be taken into account, is not decisive. The inference that the person is engaged in business on his or her own account can be more readily drawn where he or she provides the necessary premises or equipment or some other form of investment, where he or she employs others to assist in the business and where the profit which he or she derives from the business is dependent on the efficiency with which it is conducted by him or her."

"… at what it described as the second stage of the process, the Employment Appeals Tribunal applied an incorrect test to establish the existence of a contract of service/contract for services.

Contrary to what is expressly stated in its decision, the so called enterprise test is not determinative of the issue. That conclusion appears to be grounded in a misconstruction of the passages from the judgment of Keane J. in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34. Moreover it is incorrect to assert that questions of control and integration are to be regarded merely as elements to be taken into account in applying the enterprise test.

Far from relying principally upon what the Employment Appeals Tribunal describes as 'the enterprise test', that described by Keane J. contains the following four elements at least:-

- 'each case must be determined in the light of its particular facts and circumstances';
- … 'in general a person will be regarded as providing his or her services under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor where he or she is performing those services for another person and not for himself or herself';
- 'the degree of control exercised over how the work is to be performed, although a factor to be taken into account, is not decisive';
- 'the inference that the person is engaged in business on his or her own account can be more readily drawn where he or she provides the necessary premises or equipment or some other form of investment, where he or she employs others to assist in the business and where the profit which he or she derives from the business is dependent on the efficiency with which it is conducted by him or her.'"

[61] In their submissions, counsel for the respondents did not engage directly with the appellant's contention that the Employment Appeals Tribunal was incorrect to apply the so called enterprise test as it is not determinative of the issue, and that the Employment Appeals Tribunal's belief to the contrary is grounded in a misconstruction of Keane J.'s judgment in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34. Rather, their written submissions are primarily addressed to the merits of the substantive issue as to whether the respondents were employed under contracts of service or contracts for services. In so far as they seek to address at all the issue as to what precisely is the state of the law post Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd., they rely on recently published views of the eminent solicitor, Dr. Mary Redmond, a renowned employment law specialist. They state:-

> "Redmond, in her book, Dismissal Law in Ireland (2nd ed., 2007) sets out at p. 35 that 'in Ireland the criterion traditionally applied by the civil courts to determine the relationship of employee was that of control, whereby the subordinate nature of the relationship is regarded as central to the contract of employment: Roche v. P. Kelly & Co. Ltd. [1969] I.R. 100'.
> Redmond sets out that the 'control test' then gave way to the so called 'integration test' which asked, 'Did the servant form part of the alleged master's organisation?'. She sets out that, likewise, this failed to provide a clear answer and a 'mixed test' was then developed. Redmond sets out that 'This is applied in two stages. The first question to ask is whether there is control. This is a necessary but not a sufficient test. It must then be determined whether the provisions of the contract are consistent with it's being a contract of service. There may be indications, for example, that a worker is an entrepreneur rather than an employee. In this event the fundamental test to be applied is whether the person who has engaged himself to perform particular services is in business on his own account'. Having reviewed the case law, Redmond concludes at p. 40 that 'each case must depend on its own facts'."

[62] The ratio decidendi in any particular case consists of the general reasons given for the decision or the general grounds upon which it is based, detached or abstracted from the specific peculiarities of the particular case which gives rise to the decision. I have considered with great care the judgments in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 and I consider the ratio decidendi of it to be encapsulated in the statement of Keane J. that in considering whether a particular employment is to be regarded as a contract "for services" or "of service" … "each case must be considered in the light of its particular facts and of the general principles which the courts have developed". I believe that the general principles referred to are those which have been identified as potentially being of assistance to a court or tribunal in the drawing of appropriate inferences.

[63] In the course of his judgment in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 Keane J. sought to elucidate some of the general principles that the courts have developed of particular relevance to the case then before him. It was in the course of him doing so that the oft quoted passage (which for identification purposes bears reiteration) appears. He said at p. 50:-

> "It is, accordingly, clear that, while each case must be determined in the light of its particular facts and circumstances, in general a person will be regarded as providing his or her services under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor where he or she is performing those services for another person and not for himself or herself. The degree of control exercised over how the work is to be performed, although a factor to be taken into account, is not decisive. The inference that the person is engaged in business on his or her own account can be more readily drawn where he or she provides the necessary premises or equipment or some other form of investment, where he or she employs others to assist in the business and where the profit which he or she derives from the business is dependent on the efficiency with which it is conducted by him or her."

[64] This particular passage was subsequently quoted, and relied upon, in the judgments in Tierney v. An Post [2000] 1 I.R. 536, Castleisland Cattle Breeding v. Minister for Social Welfare [2004] IESC 40, [2004] 4 I.R. 150 and Electricity Supply Board v. Minister for Social Welfare [2006] IEHC 59, (Unreported, High Court, Gilligan J., 21st February, 2006). However, although it represents an important summary of some of general principles that the courts have developed, it cannot be said to fully encapsulate the ratio decidendi of Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34. It does not do so because it omits one very important general principle developed by the courts which assumed a significant importance in that case and also, coincidentally, in Tierney v. An Post, Castleisland Cattle Breeding v. Minister for Social Welfare and Electricity Supply Board v. Minister for Social Welfare respectively. A very important "particular fact" common to those cases, respectively, was that in all of those cases there existed a contractual document which purported to contain the expression of an agreed intention of the parties that their relationship should be governed by a contract for services. The existence of that particular fact brought into play the "general principle" that a characterisation or description as to the status of a party contained in a contract intended to govern a work relationship is not to be regarded as decisive or conclusive of the matter. That principle was uncontroversial in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34, having been accepted by the parties from the outset. Although it was referred to by Keane J. elsewhere in his judgment, it is not referred to in the passage under consideration. It is in fact dealt with in greater detail in the judgment of Murphy J. who points out that the principle in question was first enunciated in the judgment of Carroll J. in In re Sunday Tribune Ltd. [1984] I.R. 505. Accordingly, the celebrated passage from the judgment of Keane J. contains only part of the ratio for the court's decision. However, the earlier statement that "each case must be considered in the light of its particular facts and of the general principles which the courts have developed" can be regarded as the true ratio, though admittedly it lacks specificity with respect to identification of the general principles referred to.

[65] Contrary to a misapprehension held in some quarters, I do not believe that it is a correct interpretation of the passage in question to regard it as the formulation by Keane J. of "a single composite test", either for determining the nature of the work relationship between two parties, or even for determining whether a particular employment is to be regarded as governed by a contract for services or a contract of service which is a somewhat narrower issue. To the extent that this passage from his judgment has given rise to a degree of confusion, I believe that this confusion derives primarily from misguided attempts to divine in the judgment the formulation of a definitive, "one size fits all", test in circumstances where the judge was not attempting to formulate any such test. In relation to the rush to discern a test, and to label it, it seems to this court that this is a classic example of the type of situation where a particular approach that has been advocated is subsequently labelled conveniently, but mischaracteristically, as the "such and such test", a step that is taken with the intention that it should be helpful, but which proves to be ultimately unhelpful, because the so called test turns out to be insufficiently discriminating. Put simply, such loose labelling can often create more problems than it solves. In the context of trying to correctly characterise the nature of a work relationship between two parties, I think it can sometimes be unhelpful to speak of a "control test", or of an "integration test", or of an "enterprise test", or of a "mixed test", or of a "fundamental test" or of an "essential test", or of a "single composite test" because, in truth, none of the approaches so labelled constitutes a "test", in the generally understood sense of that term, namely, that it constitutes a measure or yardstick of universal application that can be relied upon to deliver a definitive result.

[66] Although it is true that various courts, both here and in England, have from time to time characterised as "tests" a variety of approaches to be employed as aids to discerning the nature of the work relationship between two parties, there has in recent years been a move away from this. It is, I think, telling that Keane J. did not at any stage seek to characterise any of the general principles identified by him as tests. However, the seeds of confusion may well have been sown by the reference to "the fundamental test" in the passage from the judgment of Cooke J in Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, cited by Keane J., and then watered by his subsequent reference to the judgment of the Supreme Court of the Irish Free State in Graham v. Minister for Industry and Commerce and Molloy [1933] I.R. 156, wherein that court spoke of what it characterised as "the essential test".

[67] In Market Investigations v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, Cooke J. advocated, applying what he characterised as "the fundamental test" by posing the question, "Is the person who has engaged himself to perform these services performing them as a person in business on his own account?" He contended that if the answer to that question is "yes", then the contract is a contract for services. If the answer is "no", then the contract is a contract of service. (This is in fact the so called enterprise test, although Cooke J. did not use that label.) The characterisation of this approach as "the fundamental test" was subsequently criticised by Stephenson L.J in the Court of Appeal in Nethermere (St Neots) Ltd. v. Gardiner [1984] I.C.R 612. In that case the Court of Appeal was involved in reviewing the decision of an appeal tribunal that had, in turn, upheld the earlier decision of an industrial tribunal that certain home workers were employed by the appellant company under contracts of service. Referring to the conclusion reached by the industrial tribunal, Stephenson L.J. said at p. 619:-

> "This conclusion is open to criticism. It adopts what Cooke J. in Market Investigations Ltd. v. Minister of Social Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, 184G, had called 'the fundamental test'. Megaw and Browne L.JJ. had found that test 'very helpful' in Ferguson v. John Dawson & Partners (Contractors) Ltd. [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1213. In Young & Woods Ltd. v. West [1980] I.R.L.R. 210, I adopted it and Ackner L.J., at p. 208, obtained much assistance from it. But to accept it as the 'fundamental' test is I think misleading, for it is no more than a useful test. Furthermore, it can only be applicable at all where there is nothing but a choice between the two kinds of contract, of service or for services. Here the form of the preliminary issue made the test apposite, though not fundamental; but, as I have indicated, it ruled out the question whether on the evidence there was a third kind of contract or even no contract at all, which would be as effective to deprive the industrial tribunal of jurisdiction as a contract for services."

"I do, however, for my part, find the use of the word 'fundamental' somewhat misleading. In some cases, as for instance, with a jobbing gardener or a carpenter or a music teacher, who is found to be carrying on the activities in question for several customers or clients as part of his or her own business, the test may be very helpful indeed, but in many other cases the answer to the question whether the person concerned is carrying on business on his or her own account can only come as the corollary of the answer to the question whether he or she was employed under a contract of service. I note that in Market Investigations Ltd. v. Minister of Social Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, 184, Cooke J. had referred to a statement by Lord Wright in Montreal v. Montreal Locomotive Works Ltd [1947] 1 D.L.R. 161, 169:

'it is in some cases possible to decide the issue by raising as the crucial question whose business is it, or in other words by asking whether the party is carrying on the business, in the sense of carrying it on for himself or on his own behalf and not merely for a superior.'

It is important to have in mind that each case must depend on its facts, and the same question, as an aid to appreciating the facts, will not necessarily be crucial or fundamental in every case."

[69] This court finds itself in complete agreement with the criticisms articulated by Stephenson and Dillon L.JJ. respectively. Moreover, I am satisfied that it was not Keane J.'s intention in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 to endorse Cooke J.'s approach as being "the fundamental test". That is quite clear from his statement at p. 50 that:-

"…, while each case must be determined in the light of its particular facts and circumstances, in general a person will be regarded as providing his or her services under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor where he or she is performing those services for another person and not for himself or herself" (my emphasis).

[70] The words "in general" constitute a caveat that the approach in question is not one of universal application. By definition they contemplate the possibility of exceptions to what is generally true, even when the issue for determination is the narrower one represented by a choice between a contract of service and a contract for services. Quite apart from that, the approach advocated cannot be treated as being of universal application where the issue for determination involves the broader question as to what is the nature of a particular work relationship between two parties, because in certain cases a work relationship is not capable of being defined in terms of a simple choice as to whether it is governed by a contract of service or a contract for services, for example in the case of a statutory office holder.

As Stephenson L.J. has correctly pointed out, the relationship may be governed by a third kind of contract or even by no contract at all.

[71] Having said all of that, once it is recognised that the approach advocated by Cooke J. in Market Investigation v. Min. of Soc. Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173 does not represent a fundamental or definitive test, it may be considered apposite to use it in the circumstances of a particular case as an aid to drawing the correct inferences. In that situation a court or tribunal should not be criticised for doing so. As Stephenson L.J. said, that approach has been found helpful and useful in many cases. It is likely to be particularly helpful and useful in most cases that come down to a choice between a contract of service and a contract for services. The important thing to remember, however, is that every case must be considered in the light of its particular facts and it is for the court or tribunal considering those facts to draw the appropriate inferences from them by applying the general principles which the courts have developed. That requires the exercise of judgment and analytical skill. In my view it is simply not possible to arrive at the correct result by "testing" the facts of the case in some rigid formulaic way, and I do not believe that the Supreme Court ever envisaged, or intended to suggest, that it could be.

[72] In the circumstances, I find myself in agreement with the appellant that the tribunal misdirected itself on the law in the following respects:-

1. it was incorrect in its belief that the Supreme Court in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 approved "a single composite test";
2. it was incorrect in regarding the so called enterprise test as determinative of the issue. It was not necessarily going to be determinative of the issue, and it was wrong in proceeding on the assumption that it would be. In the circumstances of the case it might legitimately have been applied as an aid to the drawing of appropriate inferences, and it was likely to be useful in that regard, but it was incorrect to apply it in a formulaic way for the purpose of determining the issue;
3. it was incorrect to assert that questions of control and integration are to be regarded merely as elements to be taken into account in applying the enterprise test. They are not. Like the question of enterprise, questions of control and integration may also provide a court or tribunal with valuable assistance in drawing the appropriate inferences. All potential aids to the drawing of the appropriate inferences from the primary facts as found stand in their own stead, and no one is subsumed by another. Moreover, those mentioned do not represent an exhaustive list. There could be other factors that might also assist. However, depending on the circumstances of the particular case, some aids may prove more helpful or more useful than others. In the words of Dillon L.J., "the same question, as an aid to appreciating the facts, will not necessarily be crucial or fundamental in every case". It is for a court or tribunal seized of the issue to identify those aids of greatest potential assistance to them in the circumstances of the particular case and to use those aids appropriately.

Conclusion

[73] In my view the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into error from the very outset in formulating the preliminary question in the way that it did and in failing to have regard to all possibilities in determining the nature of the work relationship between the parties. That initial error was compounded by a finding of mutuality of obligation on a flawed and untenable basis. Further, the Employment Appeals Tribunal misdirected itself in law in the manner outlined at some length above, based upon a misinterpretation of Keane J.'s judgment in Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34. In all the circumstances I must allow the appeals under s. 40 of the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2003 and s. 11(2) of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973 to 2001, respectively. I will hear submissions as to what orders may be appropriate in the circumstances.

THE MINISTER FOR AGRICULTURE & FOOD

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Hedigan delivered on the 9th day of February 2011.

1. This appeal is brought pursuant to section 39 (14) and section 40 of the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967-2003 and section 11(2) of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973-2001, which each provide for an appeal on a question of law against a decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal.

2. The appellants in these proceedings are Veterinary Surgeons who worked for the respondent as Temporary Veterinary Inspectors at the Galtee Meats Plant in Mitchelstown, Co Cork. The respondent is a Minister of the Government and has his principal offices at Agriculture House, Kildare St. Dublin 2.

3. The appellants appeal against a determination made by the Employment Appeals Tribunal dated the 31st July, 2009, in which the Tribunal held the appellants were engaged under a contract for services with the Respondent. They seek the following:-

i) An Order that that the Tribunal erred in law in reversing their previous determination of 12th March, 2007, having found that on the balance of probability, by a majority decision, that the appellants and respondent were engaged in a working relationship that carried sufficient mutuality of obligation to allow them to be classified as employees.

ii) An Order that, having considered the various other tests associated with determining whether the appellants were employed under a contract of or for services and in finding that that their Determination from March 2007 applied, the Tribunal erred in law in thereafter reversing their determination of the 12th March 2007, and then finding that all the appellants were engaged under a contract for service with the respondent.

iii) An Order that the EAT erred in law in their interpretation of the judgment of the High Court, in determining that the High Court instructed the EAT to change its original determination due to its many errors in law in reaching that original determination.

iv) An Order that the EAT erred in law in finding that the High Court directed the EAT to change its original Determination due to its many errors in law in reaching that determination, when the jurisdiction to make such a determination, is a statutory jurisdiction, exclusive to the EAT.

v) An Order that the EAT erred in law, in failing to consider, that having heard new evidence, at the renewed hearing in Cork in January 2009, to which the respondent had not objected, that they were entitled to apply the legal principles as enunciated by the High Court, and to make their own determination having regard to the totality of the evidence, and that the EAT erred in law, in finding that they were bound to reverse their decision made on the 12th of March 2007, irrespective of their new findings.

vi) An Order that the EAT erred in law in failing to consider that the additional given evidence given in January 2009, whereby the appellant gave evidence that at times they were paid for being rostered even when no work was made available, was new evidence, together with evidence as already given, upon which a finding of mutuality of obligation would be found, which thereby entitled the EAT to make a new finding such that they were not bound to reverse the determination of the 12th of March 2007.

vii) An Order that the EAT erred in law, in failing to find that it had jurisdiction to find that the appellants were employed by the respondent under a contract of services, having regard to the totality of the evidence and in particular the additional evidence heard in January 2009.

viii) An Order that the EAT erred in law, in failing to find that it had jurisdiction to, and could properly find that mutuality of obligation was present in the relationship between the appellants and the respondent.

ix) An Order that the EAT erred in law in determining that the appellants were engaged under a contract for services with the respondent.

x) An Order that the claim of the Appellants pursuant to the Redundancy Payments Acts, 1967 to 2003 and pursuant to the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employments Acts, 1973 to 2001, be returned to the EAT.

xi) In the alternative to (ix) above, an Order upholding the determination of the EAT that each of the appellants were employed under a contract of service.

4. Following the closure in October 2004 of the Galtee Meats Plant at Mitchelstown Co. Cork, the appellants claimed entitlement to payments under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967-2003 and under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973-2001. Entitlement to the payments claimed however depended on the appellants having been employees who were employed by the respondent under a contract of service. The respondent claimed they were not employed under a contract of service and refused to make the payments claimed. Arising from this the appellant's submitted claims to the Employment Appeals Tribunal on the 20th of April, 2005. The Tribunal issued its determination on the 12th of March, 2007, finding the appellants were employed under a contract of service and were therefore employees.

The respondent appealed the determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal to the High Court on a point of law. On the 7th July, 2008, judgment was delivered by Edwards

J. who found that there was insufficient evidence before the Tribunal from which it could properly find that the appellants were employed by the respondent under a contract of service. Edwards J. found that the Tribunal erred in law in finding that there was mutuality of obligation based on an obligation on the part of the appellants alone with no obligation on the part of the respondent. The Tribunal also erred in failing to consider evidence that the respondent was not obliged to provide work for the appellants, and in failing to attach no weight to evidence that the appellants were entitled to refuse up to 16% of shifts before action would be taken by the respondent. The Tribunal was also found to have incorrectly distinguished relevant and binding authorities from the facts of the case before it.

The claim of the appellants was returned to the Tribunal who heard additional evidence from both parties. On the 31st July, 2009, the Tribunal delivered it's determination, at p.41 it held:-

> "On the balance of probability, by a majority decision that the appellants and the respondent were engaged in a working relationship that carried sufficient mutuality of obligation to allow them to be classified as possible employees. This allowed the Tribunal to consider the various other tests associated with determining whether they were employed under a contract of or for services. In that consideration their determination from March 2007 applies... However, a ruling from the High Court on this case issued in July 2008. The Judge on that case issued eight declarations concluding that the case be returned to the Tribunal. Two contrasting interpretations emerge from the totality of those declarations. One was that the Judge was in effect instructing the Tribunal to change its original determination due to its many errors in law in reaching that determination. Another interpretation was that this ruling was silent on the Tribunal's original determination but critical of its reasoning and flawed approach in law as to how it reached that decision. Following further consultations of this division of the Tribunal and notwithstanding the majority view expressed above, and the relevant legislation, the Tribunal feels bound to accept the former interpretation. Accordingly, the Tribunal reverses its Determination of 12th March 2007, and now finds that all the appellants were engaged under a contract for services with the respondent. It therefore follows that the Tribunal finds that it has no jurisdiction to proceed with substantive hearings on these cases under the Redundancy Payments Acts, 1967-2007 and the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employments Act, 1973 to 2005".

The appellants now appeal this finding by the Employment Appeals Tribunal.

5.1 In its determination made on the 31st of July, 2009, the Tribunal found at p.41 that:-

"...the judge was in effect instructing the Tribunal to change its original determination due to its many errors in law in reaching that determination...Accordingly, the Tribunal reverses its determination of 12th March 2007, and now finds that all the Appellants were engaged under a contract for services with the Respondent"

The appellants submit that the High Court remitted the proceedings simpliciter, without any direction that the Tribunal must reverse its finding. It is submitted that the Tribunal erred in law in finding that it had no jurisdiction to make a determination as to fact, following the High Court's determination on a point of law.

5.2 The appellants referred the court to the case of Henry Denny and Sons v Minister for Social Welfare [1998] I I.R. 34 is very instructive to the present case. The appellant Ms Mc Mahon worked as a shop demonstrator for Denny she received a daily rate of pay and her contract described her as an independent contractor. The demonstrations were not carried out under supervision and materials were provided by the company. The question arose as to whether Ms. McMahon was employed under a contract of service or a contract for services. The Supreme Court held that in deciding whether a person is employed under a contact of service or a contract for services, each case must be determined in light of its particular facts. In general, a person will be regarded as being employed under a contract of service and not as an independent contractor (a contract for service's) where he or she is performing service for another person and not for himself or herself. In the present case the veterinary surgeons provided no equipment, they took directions as to what work to do, it is submitted that under the test laid down in Denny they are employees. It is further submitted that they have a stronger case than Ms. McMahon as she only received travelling expenses if a supermarket could not offer her work whereas the applicants were paid even if there was no work for them to do.

5.3 In his judgment Edwards J. held that there was insufficient evidence before the Employment Appeals Tribunal, on which the Tribunal could properly find that the appellants were employed under a contract of service. It was agreed between the parties that additional evidence would be given by the first named appellant Mr Barry on behalf of all of the appellant's. Mr Barry gave evidence that he worked 52 weeks in the year 2003 and 44 weeks in 2004 and that his conditions of work complied with each of the nineteen criteria on whether an individual is an employee as set out in the "Code of Practice for Determining Employment of Self-Employment Status of Individuals" a document prepared by the Employment Status Group. Evidence was given that the appellants had to turn up for 84% of shifts within every three-month period. This was to ensure they did not miss a significant number of shifts in the busy lambing period during the spring when they would be attending to their other private clients needs. It was claimed by the appellants that failure to comply with the rule could result in loss of seniority which was important because the more senior you were the more regularly you would be offered work.

5.4 In hearing the first appeal the High Court necessarily had to address itself to the issue of its jurisdiction to hear an appeal on a point of law. The entitlement to bring an appeal is governed by Section 39 (14) and section 40 of the Redundancy Payments Acts, 1967 to 2007, and Section 11(2) of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts, 1973 to 2001, which each provide for an appeal on a question of law against the decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal. Edwards J. identified the issue as being whether a determination by the Employment Appeals Tribunal, of the nature of a work relationship between the two parties ought properly to be characterised as a matter of law, as a matter of fact or as a mixed question of law and fact. He drew some assistance from the case O'Kelly & Others v Trusthouse Forte Plc. [1983] 3 All ER 456, at 477 Sir John

Donaldson M.R. addressed the role of an appellate Court in reviewing a decision of a lower Court:-

> "When reviewing such a decision, the only problem is to divine the direction on law which the lower court gave itself. Sometimes it will have been expressed in its reasons, but more often it has to be inferred. This is the point of temptation for the appellate court. It may well have a shrewd suspicion or a gut reaction that it would have reached a different decision, but it must never forget this may be because it thinks that it would have found or weighed facts differently. Unpalatable though it may be on occasion, it must loyally accept the conclusions of fact with which it is presented and, accepting those conclusions, it must be satisfied that there must have been misdirection on a question of law before it can intervene. Unless the direction on law has been expressed it can only be satisfied if, in its opinion, no reasonable tribunal, properly directing itself on the relevant questions of law, could have reached the conclusion under appeal. This is a heavy burden on the appellant."

If as the appellants submit there has been an error of law the court must intervene and either uphold the original finding of the Tribunal or remit the matter back to the Tribunal.

The appellants argue that when a matter is remitted the Tribunal is then obliged to make its own decision in light of the findings of the Higher Court. In the case of National University of Ireland Cork (Appellant) v Alan Ahern & Others (Respondents) [2005] 2 I.R. 577. The Labour Court held that there had been discrimination in relation to pay. In the Supreme Court, Mc Cracken J. allowed the appellant's appeal, and remitted the matter back to the Labour Court, finding at 548 that:-

" a determination that discrimination was not on grounds other than sex, may be a determination of fact, nevertheless, I am quite satisfied that such a finding was not based on the proper consideration of the surrounding circumstances or of the underlying facts. To this degree, I am satisfied that there was an error of law."

The matter was remitted back to the Labour Court for reconsideration in light of the findings made by the Supreme Court. The Labour Court heard additional evidence and addressed the points made by the Supreme Court. Further, the Labour Court stated that it was bound by the findings of the Supreme Court and must make its own decisions in light of those findings. It is submitted that the Tribunal in this case was obliged to make its own decisions in light of the findings made in the High Court.

5.5 Where a case is heard by way of appeal, and is then remitted to the administrative tribunal, it is for that administrative tribunal to apply the law as enunciated by the Appellate Court. The Employment Appeals Tribunal has heard additional evidence and it cannot and should not divest itself of its statutory authority to make the determination in the remitted proceedings. The finding of the High Court, that there was insufficient evidence before the Tribunal on which they could find that the appellants were employed by the respondent under a contract of service was addressed by the additional evidence given, as was the finding that mutuality of obligation was not present.

Edwards J. found that the Tribunal erred in law in failing to consider evidence that the respondent was not obliged to provide work to the appellants and that the appellants did not have an expectation of a particular level of work. It is submitted that these issues were addressed by the additional evidence that the appellants turned up for work because they expected the work to be provided and even when there was no work available they were paid when rostered on. Edwards J. found that the Tribunal erred in law in attaching no weight to the evidence that the appellants were entitled to refuse up to 16% of the shifts before action would be taken by the respondent. It is submitted that this has been addressed by the evidence that the appellants had to accept 84% of the work proffered to them to avoid the risk of sanction i.e. demotion on the panel- an effective loss of their job.

It is submitted by the appellants that the Tribunal correctly finds the essence of "mutuality of obligation" in accordance with the judgment of Edwards J. The Tribunal then correctly directed itself as to the law, i.e. that a finding of mutuality of obligation is not of itself necessarily determinative of the nature of the relationship. The Tribunal then examined the nature of the relationship and found the appellants were employed under a contract of service. It is submitted that the Tribunal then misdirected itself as to the law, in finding that notwithstanding their majority view, they felt bound to accept the interpretation of the judgment of Edwards J. that the judge was in effect instructing the Tribunal to change the original determination. It is submitted that the Tribunal erred in law in ultimately determining that the appellants were employed under a contract for services and it is submitted that their initial finding, by a majority, that each of the appellants were employed under a contract of service should be upheld or the matter should be returned to the Tribunal.

Respondent's Submissions

6.1 The respondent submits that it is incorrect to contend that the finding on the part of the Employment Appeals Tribunal took no account of the additional evidence and submissions that were before it on the 8th January, 2009, and there was nothing in the determination of the 31st July, 2009, to support this. The respondent claims that the High Court had invited the appellants to advance an alternative proposition as to the nature of the working relationship between the parties, and that the appellants failed to do so. Further, it is submitted that the evidence in relation to the arrangements between the appellants and the respondent in relation to declining shifts was not substantively added to by the witnesses who gave evidence before the Tribunal on the 8th January, 2009. The respondent submits that the determination of the Tribunal correctly interpreted the decision of Edwards J. and that the Tribunal was both entitled to, and required to, proceed on that basis. The Tribunal concluded that it was required to change its earlier determination of 12th of March, 2007.

6.2 The first-named appellant gave additional evidence of the specific number of hours and weeks worked. The respondents however submit that this evidence was derived from documentation that had already been submitted to the Tribunal. It cannot be described as having the character of new or additional material capable of undermining the High Courts findings. In the alternative, the respondents argue that evidence in relation to the numbers of hours or weeks worked is not in itself capable of bearing on the existence of mutuality.

6.3 The appellant has sought to rely on the 'Code of Practice for Determining Employment of Self-Employment Status of Individuals' which was prepared by the Employment Status Group. The first named appellant gave evidence that his circumstances meet the criteria on whether an individual is an employee as set out in the code. The respondent submits that cannot be determinative of the issue, the Code is not a binding statement of law on the point. The respondent argues that the finding of the High Court contains sufficient guidance on the law so as to enable the Tribunal to perform its duties in accordance with the law. The respondent claims that, firstly, the code makes no reference to the requirement of mutuality of obligation which the High Court has held is necessary to establish the existence of a contract of service and, secondly, the relevant test is whether the person performing work, does so as a person in business on their own account. Edwards J. held that every case must be considered in light of its particular facts. In light of this, the respondent submits that the appellants reliance upon the criteria contained in the Code does not advance the issue as to the existence of mutuality of obligation or, indeed, the existence of a contract of service.

6.4 As regards the evidence given concerning the 16% Rule, Edwards J. held at 231 that:-

> "... the uncontested evidence concerning the arrangements entered into between the [respondents] and the [appellant] was that the latter were entitled to decline at the very least 16% of the shifts offered to them without that refusal having any consequences for their contracts."

The 'appellant' referred to by the High Court is the respondent in the within proceedings and the 'respondent' referred to by the High Court is the appellants in the within proceedings. The respondent submits that the "uncontested evidence" was not added to in any substantive fashion by the witness evidence before the Tribunal. At the hearing of the 8th January, 2009, a witness called by the respondent gave evidence of his view that in practice a Temporary Veterinary Inspector would not be required to work 84% of the shifts offered. The respondent argues that there was no evidence adduced which suggests that the appellants were at risk of not being hired or being put at the back of the list of regular Temporary Veterinary Inspector's if they did not turn up for 84% of their shifts.

6.5 The respondent submits that the question as to whether this appeal involves a question of law has already been answered by the High Court. The judgment of Edwards J. at 221 quoted as follows from the judgment of Donaldson MR in O'Kelly & Others v Trusthouse Forte Plc [1983] I.C.R 728 at 478

> "The test to be applied in identifying whether a contract is one of employment or for services is a pure question of law and so is its application to the facts."

In this regard the respondent submits that the determination by the Tribunal on 31st July, 2009, that the appellants were employed on a contract for services is a pure question of law such that this Honourable Court has jurisdiction to adjudicate upon this appeal.

6.6 The respondent relies on the following extract from the decision of Donaldson MR in O'Kelly & Others v Trusthouse Forte Plc [1983] I.C.R 728, as cited in the decision of the High Court at 221:-

> "Unpalatable though it may be on occasion, [the appellate court] must loyally accept the conclusions of fact with which it is presented and, accepting those conclusions, it must be satisfied that there must have been a misdirection on a question of law before it can intervene. Unless the direction in law has been expressed, it can only be so satisfied if in its opinion, no reasonable tribunal, properly directing itself on the relevant questions of law could have reached the conclusion under appeal. This is a heavy burden on an appellant."

It is submitted that the appellants have not discharged the "heavy burden" on them to demonstrate that no reasonable tribunal could have reached the determination that they seek to appeal here.

6.7 The appellants contend that the Tribunal confirmed that a contract of service prevailed. What the Tribunal in fact said is that the appellants and respondent were engaged in a working relationship that carried sufficient mutuality of obligation to allow them to be classified as possible employees. This is very different from confirming that a contract for service prevailed. The appellant also contends that the Tribunal erred in law in finding that it had no jurisdiction to make a determination as to fact. The respondent submits that such a finding is to be found nowhere in the Tribunal's determination.

6.8 The respondent argues that the evidence adduced before the EAT on 8th January, 2009, did not advance matters as regards any of the issues before it. It is submitted that the evidence was incapable of grounding any finding that there existed a mutuality of obligation, such as to create a contract of service, in the arrangement between the respondent and appellants. In particular, the respondent submits that there was nothing in the evidence to demonstrate that the respondent was under any obligation to give work to the appellants. It is claimed that the appellants are attempting to imply such a term into the relationship, even though the High Court has made it clear that there is no basis on which to imply such a term.

7. Decision of the Court

7.1 The appellants have claimed entitlement to payments under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967-2003 and under the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973-2001, following the closure of their place of employment in October 2004. Entitlement to the payments claimed depends on the appellants having been employees who were employed by the respondent under a contract of service. The respondent claimed they were not employed under a contract of service and refused to make the payments claimed. Arising from this, the appellant's submitted claims to the Employment Appeals Tribunal. The entitlement of the appellants to bring an appeal is governed by section 39 of the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967-2003 which provides that :-

> "The decision of the Tribunal on any question referred to it under this Section shall be final and conclusive, save that any person dissatisfied with the decision may appeal therefrom to the High Court on a question of law."

Section 11(2) of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973-2001, also provides for an appeal on a question of law against a decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal.

The question as to whether this appeal involves a question of law has already been answered in the affirmative by Edwards J. who quoted as follows from the judgment of Donaldson MR in O'Kelly & Others v Trusthouse Forte Plc [1983] I.C.R 728 at 478

"The test to be applied in identifying whether a contract is one of employment or for services is a pure question of law and so is its application to the facts."

The determination by the Tribunal on 31st of July, 2009 that the appellants were employed on a contract for services raises a pure question of law therefore this Court has jurisdiction to adjudicate upon this appeal.

7.2 The appellants complain that the Tribunal failed to take account of new evidence and erred in law in finding that the High Court directed it to change its original determination. The onus is on the appellant's to prove that that no reasonable tribunal would have reached the decision that is under appeal. In O'Kelly & Others v Trusthouse Forte Plc [1983] I.C.R 728, Donaldson MR held at 221:-

"Unpalatable though it may be on occasion, [the appellate court] must loyally accept the conclusions of fact with which it is presented and, accepting those conclusions, it must be satisfied that there must have been a misdirection on a question of law before it can intervene. Unless the direction in law has been expressed, it can only be so satisfied if in its opinion, no reasonable tribunal, properly directing itself on the relevant questions of law could have reached the conclusion under appeal. This is a heavy burden on an appellant."

It is understandable that the appellants are dissatisfied with the process and reasoning adopted by the Tribunal in making the determination which they now seek to impugn. This determination might have been better phrased. However the real question here is whether in light of the additional evidence given, the appellants have discharged the burden on them to demonstrate that no reasonable Tribunal could have found against the appellants.

7.3 Edwards J. found there was insufficient evidence before the Employment Appeals Tribunal from which it could properly find that the appellants were employed by the respondent under a contract of service. In particular Edwards J. found that the Tribunal erred in law in finding that there was mutuality of obligation as the respondent was not obliged to provide work for the applicants, and in failing to attach no weight to evidence that the appellants were entitled to refuse up to 16% of shifts before action would be taken by the respondent.

7.4 The appellant attempted to respond to these findings by adducing additional evidence before the tribunal at the hearing of the 8th of January, 2009. With regard to mutuality of obligation; additional information concerning the number of weeks worked was provided by Mr. Barry who gave evidence that he worked 52 weeks in the year 2002 and 44 weeks in 2003. However this evidence was taken from documentation that had already been submitted to the tribunal. Furthermore the fact that a person may do a lot of work is not of itself proof of the existence of mutual obligations on the employer to provide work for the employee and on the employee to perform work for the employer.

7.5 Evidence was given concerning the appellants entitlement to refuse up to 16% of shifts before action would be taken by the respondent. The appellants gave evidence that failure to accept 84% of work could result in demotion. However at the hearing of 8th

January, 2009, this evidence was contested by one Mr. Mackessy who stated at p.78/9 of the Transcript of evidence:-

> "to say that a TVI in a senior position must attend for 84% of the time in my view would be completely--- it would be an inaccurate assumption to say that... in practice on the ground it doesn't work out that way... The Department wasn't in the business of insisting that someone would attend for 84% of the time and if they didn't there would be sanctions."

While the appellants contend that if they did not turn up for at least 84% of their shifts they might no longer be hired, it is noteworthy that no evidence was produced to show that these particular appellants were at risk of not being hired or even being put at the end of the list of regular TVI's offering services to the panel. No evidence was adduced of the existence of any system of monitoring by the respondent to secure compliance with the 16% rule. Mr. Mackessy gave evidence recorded at p. 78/9 of the transcript, to the effect that a rotational policy operated at the Mitchelstown plant and the respondent did not insist that any one individual attend for 84% of shifts and there were no complaints in relation to the operation of the 16% rule at the plant.

7.6 The appellants sought to rely on the "Code of Practice for Determining Employment or Self-Employment Status of Individuals" a document prepared by the Employment Status Group. Mr Barry gave evidence that his circumstances complied with each of the nineteen criteria on whether an individual is an employee as set out in the code. The code however is not a binding statement of law therefore such compliance is not determinative of the issue. The code does not refer to mutuality of obligation which the High Court has held is necessary to establish the existence of a contract of service.

7.7 There was nothing in the additional evidence adduced by the applicants which was of such crucial importance that having heard it no reasonable tribunal would be entitled to conclude that the applicants were employed other than under a contract for service. The heavy onus of proof which the applicants bear has not been borne. I am obliged therefore to refuse the relief sought by the appellants to have their claim returned to the Employment Appeals Tribunal. It is therefore not necessary for me to consider the issue of express directions to the Tribunal as to the correct application of the law to the facts in this case.

7.9 For all the above mentioned reasons, I must disallow the appeal under section 39 (14) and section 40 of the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967-2003 and section 11(2) of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973-2001, respectively.

[2010] No. 125CA

DUBLIN CIRCUIT

COUNTY OF THE CITY OF DUBLIN

JVC EUROPE LIMITED

PLAINTIFF/APPELLANT

JEROME PANISI

DEFENDANT/RESPONDENT

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Charleton delivered on the 27th day of July 2011

1. Redundancy can be a devastating blow. Where economic conditions are difficult, or where the employee who is let go has aged or is experiencing health difficulties, finding alternative employment may be impossible. Years of devotion to an employer count for nothing where technology overtakes the workforce, rendering the labour of those displaced unnecessary; where new methods of work are demanded from those who do not have the skills to respond; or where a product is rendered obsolete. All these are examples of genuine redundancy. As ordinarily understood, redundancy means that a worker is no longer needed. The legal definition, as stated in the legislation which I quote later, mirrors common comprehension. Because redundancy is inevitable if there is no work for workers to do and the workers cease to be needed, it is also lawful. The Redundancy Payments Act 1967, as amended, establishes a floor of rights in compensation for redundancy; circumscribes the use to which dismissal by reason of redundancy can be put; and provides for minimum payments for qualified employees who are subject to this misfortune. In circumstances of insolvency those payments can be met from the public purse.

2. A contract of employment can involve both personal and impersonal interaction between employer and employee. Redundancy is not, however, a personal choice. It is, in essence, the external or internal economic or technological reorienting of an enterprise whereby the work of employees needs to be shed or to be carried out in an entirely different manner. As such, redundancy is entirely impersonal. Dismissal, on the other hand, is a decision targeted at an individual. Under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, as amended ("the Act of 1977"), the dismissal of an employee may only take place for substantial reasons that are fair. In effect, the contract of employment is protected in law and it may only be repudiated by the employer for reasons which do not amount to an unfair dismissal. This requires the employer to show substantial grounds which justify the dismissal. The burden of proof, in that regard, is squarely placed upon the employer. Sections 6(1) and (2) of that Act, in their amended form, provide:-

> "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an unfair dismissal unless, having regard to all the circumstances, there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal.
> (2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an unfair dismissal if it results wholly or mainly from one or more of the following:

(a) the employee's membership, or proposal that he or another person become a member, of, or his engaging in activities on behalf of, a trade union or excepted body under the Trade Union Acts, 1941 and 1971, where the times at which he engages in such activities are outside his hours of work or are times during his hours of work in which he is permitted pursuant to the contract of employment between him and his employer so to engage,

(b) the religious or political opinions of the employee,

(c) civil proceedings whether actual, threatened or proposed against the employer to which the employee is or will be a party or in which the employee was or is likely to be a witness,

(d) criminal proceedings against the employer, whether actual, threatened or proposed, in relation to which the employee has made, proposed or threatened to make a complaint or statement to the prosecuting authority or to any other authority connected with or involved in the prosecution of the proceedings or in which the employee was or is likely to be a witness,

(dd) the exercise or proposed exercise by the employee of the right to parental leave, force majeure leave under and in accordance with the Parental Leave Act, 1998, or carer's leave under and in accordance with the Carer's Leave Act, 2001,

(e) the race, colour or sexual orientation of the employee,

(ee) the age of the employee,

(eee) the employee's membership of the travelling community,

(f) the employee's pregnancy, attendance at ante-natal classes, giving birth or breastfeeding or any matters connected therewith,

(g) the exercise or proposed exercise by the employee of the right under the Maternity Protection Act 1994 to any form of protective leave or natal care absence, within the meaning of Part IV of that Act, or to time off from work to attend ante-natal classes in accordance with section 15A (inserted by section 8 of the Maternity Protection (Amendment) Act 2004), or to time off from work or a reduction of working hours for breastfeeding in accordance with section 15B (inserted by section 9 of the Maternity Protection (Amendment) Act 2004), of the first-mentioned Act,]

(h) the exercise or contemplated exercise by an adoptive parent of the parent's right under the Adoptive Leave Acts 1995 and 2005 to adoptive leave or additional adoptive leave or a period of time off to attend certain pre-adoption classes or meetings."

3. To condense this and attempt a summary: a dismissal is automatically unfair under s.6 (2) of the Act of 1977 if it results from trade union activity; religious or political opinions; actual or proposed civil or criminal proceedings; bigotry; ageism; or reasons connected with maternity or parental leave due to childbirth or adoption. An employer may nonetheless dismiss an employee, but only if a reason outside of that set of proscribed reasons is the motivation and the reason for dismissal is fair.

4. A dismissal is fair, however, only if it results from a reason within the statute. The lawful reasons for dismissal are precisely set out. Section 6(4) of the Act of 1977 provides:-

> "Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, not to be an unfair dismissal, if it results wholly or mainly from one or more of the following:
>
> (a) the capability, competence or qualifications of the employee for performing work of the kind which he was employed by the employer to do,
>
> (b) the conduct of the employee,
>
> (c) the redundancy of the employee, and
> (d) the employee being unable to work or continue to work in the position which he held without contravention (by him or by his employer) of a duty or restriction imposed by or under any statute or instrument made under statute."

5. Explanation is hardly necessary of these clear terms. Most unfair dismissal cases revolve around alleged misconduct by an employee. The issue for the tribunal deciding the matter will be whether the circumstances proven to found the dismissal were such that a reasonable employer would have concluded that there was misconduct and that such misconduct constituted substantial grounds to justify the dismissal. An employee may also be dismissed where, by reason of a change in primary or secondary legislation, it becomes unlawful for that employee to continue to work. For instance, in a pharmacy, only a qualified person may dispense controlled medication. Were legislation to provide that a large number of over-the-counter medications are to be restricted to dispensation by pharmaceutical chemists, work will disappear for unqualified assistants. An employee may be discovered not to have the capability, competence or qualifications to do the work for which he or she was employed. Such reasons for ending employment are all personal to the employee, to his or her conduct, to his or her competence or qualifications. It is made abundantly clear by that legislation that redundancy, while it is dismissal, is not unfair. A dismissal, however, can be disguised as redundancy; that is not lawful. Upon dismissal an employer can simply say that the employee was not dismissed for a reason specific to that person but that, instead, his or her services were no longer required, pointing to apparently genuine reasons for dispensing with the services of the employee. In all cases of dismissal, whether by reason of redundancy or for substantial grounds justifying dismissal, the burden of proof rests on the employer to demonstrate that the termination of employment came within a lawful reason. In cases of misconduct, a fair procedure must be followed whereby an employee is given an entitlement to explain what otherwise might amount to a finding of real seriousness against his or her character. In an unfair dismissal claim, where the answer is asserted to be redundancy, the employer bears the burden of establishing redundancy and of showing which kind of redundancy is apposite. Without that requirement, vagueness would replace the precision necessary to ensure the upholding of employee rights. Redundancy is impersonal. Instead, it must result from, as s.7(2) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1967, as amended, provides, "reasons not related to the employee concerned." Redundancy, cannot, therefore be used as cloak for the weeding out of those employees who are regarded as less competent than others or who appear to have health or age related issues. If that is the reason for letting an employee go, then it is not a redundancy, but a dismissal.

6. Section 7(2) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1967, as amended by s. 4 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1971 and s.5 of the Redundancy Payments Act 2003, provides:-

> "(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), an employee who is dismissed shall be taken to be dismissed by reason of redundancy if for one or more reasons not related to the employee concerned the dismissal is attributable wholly or mainly to-
> (a) the fact that his employer has ceased, or intends to cease, to carry on the business for the purposes of which the employee was employed by him, or has ceased or intends to cease, to carry on that business in the place where the employee was so employed, or
> (b) the fact that the requirements of that business for employees to carry out work of a particular kind in the place where he was so employed have ceased or diminished or are expected to cease or diminish, or
> (c) the fact that his employer has decided to carry on the business with fewer or no employees, whether by requiring the work for which the employee had been employed (or had been doing before his dismissal) to be done by other employees or otherwise, or
> (d) the fact that his employer has decided that the work for which the employee had been employed (or had been doing before his dismissal) should henceforward be done in a different manner for which the employee is not sufficiently qualified or trained, or
> (e) the fact that his employer has decided that the work for which the employee had been employed (or had been doing before his dismissal) should henceforward be done by a person who is also capable of doing other work for which the employee is not sufficiently qualified or trained."

7. Exceptions are provided for redundancy as a defence to a claim of unfair dismissal in s.2A of the Act of 1967. These are not relevant to this case, but encompass the protections that legislation has required in the case of collective redundancies, compulsory redundancy and dismissal for the purpose of re-engagement on less advantageous conditions. The comment on the nature of redundancy made in St. Leger v. Frontline Distributors Ireland Ltd., [1995] E.L.R. 160 at 161 to 162 by Dermot MacCarthy S.C., as chairman of the Employment Appeals Tribunal, is apposite:-

> "Impersonality runs throughout the five definitions in the Act. Redundancy impacts on the job and only as a consequence of the redundancy does the person involved lose his job. It is worthy of note that the E.C. Directive on Collective Redundancies uses a shorter and simpler definition: 'one or more reasons not related to the individual workers concerned'.
> Change also runs through all five definitions. This means change in the workplace. The most dramatic change of all is a complete close down. Change may also mean a reduction in needs for employees, or a reduction in numbers. Definition (d) and (e) involve change in the way the work is done or some other form of change in the nature of the job. Under these two definitions change in the job must mean qualitative change. Definition (e) must involve, partly at least, work of a different kind, and that is the only meaning we can put on the words 'other work'. More work or less work of the same kind does not mean 'other work' and is only quantitative change."

8. It may be prudent, and a mark of a genuine redundancy, that alternatives to letting an employee go should be examined. However, that does not arise for decision in this case. Similarly, a fair selection procedure may indicate an honest approach to redundancy by an employer, but I do not wish to comment on matters which are outside the competence of the decision to be made in this case: see Stewart and Dunleavy, Compensation on Dismissal – Employment Law and Practice, (Dublin, 2007) at paragraph. 19.8.6. As a matter of contract, where selection procedures for redundancy, or a consultation process to seek to discover alternatives to redundancy, are laid down in the conditions of employment of an employee, whether by collective agreement or individual employment contract, these should be followed. Following what is on the surface a fair procedure does not necessarily demonstrate that the decision maker is taking an honest approach to a decision. As with much else, an apparently fair procedure can be used as a cloak for deceptive conduct. It may be followed in form only so as to mask an ulterior motive or with no intention of fulfilling its purpose, even should the best of reasons for not proceeding to redundancy arise during its course.

9. The contractual entitlement to a defined procedure is declared in s. 6 of the Act of 1977. This provides at s. 6(3):-

> "Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, if an employee was dismissed due to redundancy but the circumstances constituting the redundancy applied equally to one or more other employees in similar employment with the same employer who have not been dismissed, and either—
> (a) the selection of that employee for dismissal resulted wholly or mainly from one or more of the matters specified in subsection (2) of this section or another matter that would not be a ground justifying dismissal, or
> (b) he was selected for dismissal in contravention of a procedure (being a procedure that has been agreed upon by or on behalf of the employer and by the employee or a trade union, or an excepted body under the Trade Union Acts, 1941 and 1971, representing him or has been established by the custom and practice of the employment concerned) relating to redundancy and there were no special reasons justifying a departure from that procedure."

Issues

10. The issues which arise for determination in this case depend upon the general analysis of the law set forth above. These issues are whether Jerome Panisi, as employee, was selected for apparent redundancy by his employer, JVC Europe Limited:

(i) on the basis of a dismissal disguised as a redundancy; or

(ii) pursuant to procedures which were followed in form, but not in substance.

The quantum of damages also arises for decision in the event that the answer to either question is in the affirmative.

Access to justice

11. This is the third full hearing on oral evidence of this case. Under the relevant legislation a claim for unfair dismissal may first be brought before the statutory Rights Commissioner. The determination of the Rights Commissioner may then be appealed by either employer or employee to the Employment Appeals Tribunal. The appeal is therefore from a single individual, as decision-maker, to a panel of three: a barrister or solicitor, as chairman, and one representative nominated from each of the employer's and employee's groups. The Rights Commissioner can be bypassed in favour of an initial hearing before the Employment Appeals Tribunal. Both the Rights Commissioner and the Employment Appeals Tribunal apply fair procedures equivalent to those required in a civil trial. Witnesses are heard and there is cross-examination and opening and closing submissions. Since no transcript is kept, the written decision of the Rights Commissioner may be appealed to the Employment Appeals Tribunal and the determination at that level, in turn, may be appealed to the Circuit Court. No transcript is kept in that Court. Thence, it may be appealed, as was this case, to the High Court. All of these steps involve re-hearing all of the evidence. None of the appeals are appeals on a point of law. An employee seeking the vindication of employment rights may be required by a determined employer to proceed through four full oral hearings. The costs in terms of the engagement of legal representation may be very large. Whereas the Rights Commissioner and the Employment Appeals Tribunal may not award costs to a successful applicant, the Circuit Court and High Court are obliged to award costs in accordance with the resolution of the litigation. The entire procedure may take some years. It is also a situation where the resources of an employer may militate against fairness in the disposal of proceedings brought by an impecunious employee. After all, the point of such a case is whether the employee was unfairly dismissed; consequently he or she often has no job. The costs of legal hearings has a human rights implication: see Campbell v. MGN Limited [2004] UKHL 22; and in the European Court of Human Rights as MGN Limited. v. The United Kingdom, application number 39401/04. I am satisfied that the employee in this particular dispute was so worried about the potential costs that the sum which he received in apparent redundancy from his employer has been kept untouched by him in a bank account. The timescale involved in this case is not untypical of others. The employee filled in a T1A form seeking redress for unfair dismissal and a failure to comply with the period of notice of termination of employment required by statute on the 20th August 2008. His case was heard before the Employment Appeals Tribunal on the 8th December 2008. That tribunal issued a decision on the 24th April 2009. On the 14th July 2009, that decision was appealed by the employer. It was heard by the Circuit Court on the 2nd and 3rd June 2010, and a decision was given immediately by Judge Linnane. On the 14th June 2010 the matter was then appealed to the High Court. This Court heard the case over the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th of July 2011. Judgment is now being given after a gap of about two weeks. The entire process has taken three years and three full oral hearings.

12. This procedure is cumbersome and redolent with the potential for unfairness. Many proposals have been mooted with a view to changing it. There are compelling reasons why change might be considered. No appeal in any court proceeding under the Constitution is ever more than a hearing and a re-hearing. Often it is less. From District Court to Circuit Court there is a full oral re-hearing in a civil or criminal case. The process is then complete. In a civil case, a Circuit Court judgment may be appealed to the High Court by a full oral re-hearing. The process is then complete. Circuit Court criminal decisions and High Court civil and criminal decisions can be appealed to the Court of Criminal Appeal or the Supreme Court on a point of law argued on the basis of a transcript. The process is then complete, barring a rare criminal appeal on a point of law of exceptional public importance from the Court of Criminal Appeal to the Supreme Court. In criminal cases the process is usually funded at public expense.

Facts

13. Jerome Panisi was employed from the 30th September 1991 as general manager of JVC in Ireland. His functions as general manager are set out in his written contract of that date. Having analysed that contract, and having heard the evidence of Jerome Panisi, I am satisfied that 90% of his work involved sales. He was not a technical person, versed in electrical engineering, but instead maintained a strong public face in Ireland on behalf of his employer as a salesman. The results of his work were impressive. In due course the employer by whom he was engaged, JVC (U.K.) Limited, became JVC Europe Limited. Nothing turns on that and I will call the employer 'JVC'.

14. The employer argues that the Court should accept that throughout the years 2000 to 2008 JVC faced a very serious situation in terms of turnover. Apparently, the company had not invested early enough in flat screen television technology. In consequence, many of its competitors overtook it in terms of sales. Tube televisions were fast disappearing and being replaced in many homes by modern slimline televisions. The television market is, in terms of sales of consumer electronics, in or around 80% of the market. For any firm in that line of commerce, a fall in sales of televisions is very serious. That is not only because of the revenue which television sales represent, but also because the brand name thereby becomes less visible and so less established in the marketplace and in the home. Whereas there has been some variation in the figures, it seems to me to be clear that turnover in the Irish and British market for JVC fell by around 50% over that time period, and for the reasons stated. The number of people operating in Ireland in sales and administration has decreased from a high point that exceeded twelve employees down to the two that are currently employed as of the date of writing this judgment in the summer of 2011.

15. On the 4th March 2008, a meeting was arranged with Jerome Panisi in Dublin and it was attended by him, by David Diamond, the human resources manager for the company, and by Kevin Crossland, the sales director. Mr. Panisi was handed a letter which told him that there would no longer be a requirement for his position, for the post of mobile entertainment in the U.K. or for the national independent sales manager in the U.K. While these three posts were disappearing, for reasons which were not at all apparent during the hearing, three new posts were being created. These would be: sales manager of key accounts and independent firms, a London position; in Ireland, sales manager for Ireland; and lastly a post of area sales manager in the U.K. Appended to the letter were two job descriptions but, curiously, the job description for sales manager in Ireland was not forwarded until a week later. I have read the job description for that post. In terms of the actual work to be undertaken it very closely mirrors the job then being done by Jerome Panisi. It is possible to describe it in different terms but, in reality, the work to be undertaken by the individual taking that post would be virtually the same.

16. Approximately a year before this development a new key account manager had been appointed in Ireland. This individual was highly competent but lived too far away from Dublin to be effective. As a recruitment brief for this post, an outside agency prepared a document on behalf of JVC. A curious passage occurred therein:-

> "JVC are a progressive company and are looking to attract a talented individual with potential to progress their career to General Management level as the current General Manager (Ireland) is due to retire in two years, ambition, drive and delivery focus is essential to the successful candidate."

17. Jerome Panisi was not due to retire within that timescale, and would not, in fact, have retired until October 2011, had matters taken their course without the intervention of what is claimed to be a redundancy.

18. At some point in the process of consultation before redundancy, provided for under the JVC employee-employer contract, Jerome Panisi became suspicious as to what was happening and began to record telephone conversations and meetings. While this is undesirable, I do not regard it as undermining his character or the integrity of his testimony.

19. The process for redundancy pursuant to the contract between Jerome Panisi and JVC, and as established as engaging rights under s. 6 of the Act of 1977, provided for a period of consultation within which the employee targeted for redundancy could put forward different ways in which the company might proceed without losing that worker. On the 26th March 2008, Jerome Panisi replied to the employer on the proposal to make him redundant. He pointed out that sales had yielded a high net profit in Ireland from 2000 to 2004. He further pointed out that the post of national account manager would be lost to the local organisation under the proposed arrangements. He referred to the peculiarities of the Irish market, whereby under the new structure of reporting proposed in the reorganisation, he would be reporting, were he to be selected as sales manager Ireland, directly to London. His first and primary reason, however, was that the duties of the new position of sales manager Ireland were practically the same as those currently assigned to him. In the result of the reorganisation for the apparent purpose of redundancy, the national account manager in Dublin, who used to report to Mr. Panisi as general manager in Ireland, would be lost and instead there would be a sales manager in Ireland.

20. The issue which thus comes into sharp focus is whether there was a plan, implemented through an apparent redundancy, for the new post of sales manager Ireland to be filled by the existing national account manager.

21. Thomas Dillon was then the national account manager in Ireland. He was recruited in August 2007 and reported to Jerome Panisi. He worked in that position, and then subsequently as sales manager Ireland when Jerome Panisi departed, up to the 16th April 2010. He then left in order to better himself by joining another consumer electronics firm. His evidence was that on the 10th April 2008 he was on holiday abroad when he received a telephone call from Kevin Crossland, the sales director, who was then the vice president of JVC for sales in Ireland and the U.K. He was informed by Mr. Crossland that an email had been sent to all staff advertising the position of sales manager Ireland. Mr. Dillon asked whether selection for the new post would be a long process, to which he received the reply, "I am now speaking to the sales manager Ireland". Mr. Dillon then sent in his C.V., but on the understanding that he had already been appointed as sales manager. As he understood the situation, it was possible that another person had also applied. It seemed to him, however, that the process was just for show. This incident provides a strong indication that the apparent plan of redundancy was a process of removing Jerome Panisi as general manager and replacing him with Thomas Dillon under a different designation. Prior to sending in his C.V., Mr. Dillon checked with Mr. Panisi as to whether, as a friend, he approved of his action in applying for the job and Mr. Panisi indicated that he had no objection.

22. It has been stated in evidence that had Jerome Panisi applied for the position of sales manager Ireland, he would have been given the position. That evidence is difficult to accept at face value. Had Jerome Panisi been made redundant, then he would have been, had procedures been followed, in open competition with a younger man, and probably with others, had there been no pre-selection for that post. It is also difficult to see him accepting a diminution in status after seventeen years, and pay and conditions which were not advertised but which would be, as is often said, negotiable.

23. The crux of the issue as to whether the manner of dismissal of Jerome Panisi as general manager of JVC in Ireland was a genuine redundancy through a genuine process, or a disguised dismissal, hinges on a meeting which took place in London on the 10th March 2010. This was a weekly management meeting. Jerome Panisi would come from Ireland perhaps once a month and report to that meeting. He was not present on this occasion. In 2008 John Welbourne was general manger of sales for JVC. He was later made redundant. He said in evidence that he was not involved in the creation of the role of general manager of sales. He said that he was not involved in Thomas Dillon moving into the new role in Ireland and nor was he involved in the restructuring. He denied that he was recruiting Simon Hedges for one of the new positions. His view was that the new position in Ireland would involve simply sales, whereas Jerome Panisi had been "responsible for everything". In addition to this evidence, I have heard testimony from David Diamond, the human resources manager, and Meishi Tsuya, who held a very senior post in JVC at the time. Meishi Tsuya struck me as being a loyal person. He is also, however, a company man and highly motivated on behalf of his employer. David Diamond presented in the witness box as a clearly decent individual. It is obvious to me that he at all times did his best on behalf of employees, notwithstanding difficult and unpleasant duties. The person indicating most strongly that the dismissal of Jerome Panisi was a disguised redundancy was Dermot O'Rourke. His clear testimony stands in contrast to the infirmity in recollection and the qualified testimony of opposing witnesses. Dermot O'Rourke clearly had a much better recollection of the incident in question than the other persons present at that meeting.

24. On the 7th March 2008, Jerome Panisi had told Dermot O'Rourke about an indication in conversation over the phone which made him suspicious as to whether the process of redundancy was genuine. I am satisfied that, notwithstanding the sharing of suspicions, Mr. O'Rourke kept an open mind. At the meeting on the 10th March, approximately ten people were present, and Mr. Crossland was absent. At the very end of the meeting, one final item was announced by Mr. Welbourne which was stated not to be minuted. This was because, as was announced by him, the people concerned had not been told. A debate arose during the testimony as to whether previous management meetings had an off-the-record element to them. I am satisfied that they did. Further, I am satisfied that such discussions did not simply extend to things like the meals of employees, or the number of free beverages that were available at work, but encompassed important issues such as matters concerning employment. I am thus satisfied that Mr. Welbourne said that there was an item which was not to be minuted because people had not been told. The item, he said, was to be announced at the JVC sales conference, which takes place on an annual basis, and which was to be held in London some short time later. The announcement was to the effect that there was to be a restructuring across sales prior to this annual conference. Mr. Welbourne said there would be a new structure at the top of sales with two new positions. A named individual was to become the area sales manager in the U.K., another named individual was to take over in the other new post and "Thomas Dillon will report to him" from Ireland.

25. Whereas other witnesses described this announcement as unlikely, I am satisfied that it was made. The accumulation of evidence proves as a probability that the dismissal of Jerome Panisi from his job as general manager of JVC in Ireland was not a genuine redundancy. Even were that evidence to be absent, the indications in the evidence in favour of a genuine process, the burden of proof being on the employer in this regard, are not strong. I do not accept that the assignment brief prepared independently for the key account manager in Ireland could so badly misdescribe the future of Jerome Panisi, given that the person to be recruited was to be directly reporting to him. Rather, it is clear that the systems were required by someone in management to be bypassed, through no fault of the human resources manager, in favour of employing Mr. Dillon, who had neither sought nor played any part in this scheme. I do not know and nor am I obliged to make a finding as to where the responsibility within management for this situation lies.

Damages

26. Redress for unfair dismissal is provided for in s. 7 of the Act of 1977, which provides:-

"(1) Where an employee is dismissed and the dismissal is an unfair dismissal, the employee shall be entitled to redress consisting of whichever of the following the rights commissioner, the Tribunal or the Circuit Court, as the case may be, considers appropriate having regard to all the circumstances:

(a) re-instatement by the employer of the employee in the position which he held immediately before his dismissal on the terms and conditions on which he was employed immediately before his dismissal together with a term that the re-instatement shall be deemed to have commenced on the day of the dismissal, or

(b) re-engagement by the employer of the employee either in the position which he held immediately before his dismissal or in a different position which would be reasonably suitable for him on such terms and conditions as are reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, or

(i) if the employee incurred any financial loss attributable to the dismissal, payment to him by the employer of such compensation in respect of the loss (not exceeding in amount 104 weeks remuneration in respect of the employment from which he was dismissed calculated in accordance with regulations under section 17 of this Act) as is just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances, or

(ii) if the employee incurred no such financial loss, payment to the employee by the employer of such compensation (if any, but not exceeding in amount 4 weeks remuneration in respect of the employment from which he was dismissed calculated as aforesaid) as is just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances, and the reference in the foregoing paragraphs to an employer shall be construed, in a case where the ownership of the business of the employer changes after the dismissal, as references to the person who, by virtue of the change, becomes entitled to such ownership.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, in determining the amount of compensation payable under that subsection regard shall be had to-

(a) the extent (if any) to which the financial loss referred to in that subsection was attributable to an act, omission or conduct by or on behalf of the employer,

(b) the extent (if any) to which the said financial loss attributable to an action, omission or conduct by or on behalf of the employee,

(c) the measures (if any) adopted by the employee or, as the case may be, his failure to adopt measures, to mitigate the loss aforesaid,

(d) the extent (if any) of the compliance or failure to comply by the employer, in relation to the employee, with the procedure referred to in subsection (1) of section 14 of this Act or with the provisions of any code of practice relating to procedures regarding dismissal approved of by the Minister,

(e) the extent (if any) of the compliance or failure to comply by the employer, in relation to the employee, with the said section 14, and

(f) the extent (if any) to which the conduct of the employee (whether by act or omission) contributed to the dismissal..

(2A) In calculating financial loss for the purposes of subsection (1), payments to the employee

(a) under the Social Welfare Acts, 1981 to 1993, in respect of any period following the dismissal concerned, or

(b) under the Income Tax Acts arising by reason of the dismissal, shall be disregarded.

(3) In this section -

"financial loss", in relation to the dismissal of an employee, includes any actual loss and any estimated prospective loss of income attributable to the dismissal and the value of any loss or diminution, attributable to the dismissal, of the rights of the employee under the Redundancy Payments Acts 1967 to 2007, or in relation to superannuation;

"remuneration" includes allowances in the nature of pay and benefits in lieu of or in addition to pay."

27. This section clarifies the consideration that is to be given to compensation for unfair dismissal. Payments under social welfare and income tax legislation are to be disregarded. In assessing compensation, the court should have regard to the implications for dismissal. My task is to assess the financial damage which the dismissal has brought about and then to place the measure of that damage against the maximum amount of compensation that is available. In the event that the compensation that is available, amounting to 104 weeks remuneration, is less than that sum, then that is the measure of damages. Where the quantum of damage is more, then the jurisdiction is limited to that maximum and the amount of damages must thus be reduced to that maximum sum. Where the measure of damages on dismissal is more than the maximum but contributory fault is found in respect of the dismissal against the employee, the reduction is on the totality of those damages, and not on the maximum award. If the result is to reduce compensation within the maximum award, that sum is appropriate. Where the reduction in total damages for contributory fault puts the damages above the maximum award, then the maximum award is the correct measure of compensation for unfair dismissal.

28. My reasoning on this matter is that it is likely, had Jerome Panisi not been dismissed, that he would have worked within JVC for approximately the same length of time as Thomas Dillon. Redundancy in a situation where employee numbers were diminishing could not have been avoided all the way to his retirement at age 65 in October 2011. During the two years lost, however, he would have achieved full remuneration and would have been topping up his pension entitlement. This would have provided for his retirement. This has otherwise proved to be impossible. He has sought many jobs since his dismissal. Those efforts have been genuine. His actual loss and prospective loss of pension therefore exceeds the maximum of 104 weeks of remuneration. One hundred and four weeks of remuneration is €298,000. On redundancy Mr. Panisi was paid the sum of €101,000. Of this, €19,800 was a redundancy payment; €18,312 was statutory notice; €9,156 was four weeks extra notice; and €51,315 was an ex gratia payment. As there was no redundancy, but as there was a dismissal, Mr. Panisi has now no entitlement to the redundancy money or the ex gratia payment. In addition, it is highly unlikely that he would have been given an extra four weeks notice by way of wages, notwithstanding his long service to the company. After submissions of counsel as to the correct figures, it is agreed that the total award of €298,000 should be reduced. Since Mr. Panisi has already been paid the sum of €101,000, the damages due are €197,000.

Result

29. In the result, there will be a decree in the sum of €197,000 against JVC in favour of Jerome Panisi.

in the case of applications to the Circuit Court under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Acts. Again in the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986 similar provisions providing for the issue of proceedings to be the commencement of the appeal are set out in Orders 105, 106 and 112. Each of these Orders which deal respectively with appeals from the Employment Appeals Tribunal, appeals from the Labour Court and appeals under the Housing (Private Rented Dwellings) (Amendment) Act 1983 provides that the summons commencing the appeal shall be issued within a specific time limit.

In my view, the essence of an appeal under section 10(4) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 is not the issue or service of a notice of appeal as such, but the invoking of the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court. This is done by the issue of the originating document, usually a Civil Bill, but in the present case a notice of application to the Court in the form prescribed by Order 63 of the Circuit Court Rules 1950. In my view as with the Statute of Limitations time ceases to run when the proceedings are issued and not when they are served.

In the circumstances I am satisfied that the appropriate step to be taken within the six week time limit is the issue of the notice of application to the Court. The respodent's contention accordingly fails.

Bolger v Showerings (Ireland) Ltd: High Court (Lardner J) (ex tempore) 24 April 1990

Issue – Employer and Employee – Absenteeism – Ill-health of employee – Dismissal on ground of incapacity – Whether dismissal reasonable in all the circumstances

Legislation – Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (No. 10)

Facts The appellant had employed Mr Bolger as a fork lift truck driver. He had a long history of absenteeism through ill-health since 1978 when he had suffered a back injury at work. A lengthy correspondence took place between the parties concerning his absence, in which the appellant requested that Mr Bolger supply his likely return to work date, having consulted his doctor. The appellant warned Mr Bolger that failure to comply would result in his dismissal on grounds of incapacity. Eventually a doctor acting as locum for Mr Bolger's G.P. sent a note to the appellant stating that Mr Bolger himself felt unable to undertake his previous job at any time in the future and that Mr Bolger was due to be admitted to hospital for tests on his back injury. The appellant dismissed Mr Bolger. Surgery following the hospital tests corrected Mr Bolger's condition but the appellant refused to review its decision. Mr Bolger's claim of unfair dismissal was dismissed by the Employment Appeals Tribunal. He appealed successfully to the Circuit Court where it was held that the company had acted precipitately in not awaiting the outcome of the hospital tests. The company appealed.

Held by Lardner J in allowing the appeal:

(1) For a dismissal on grounds of incapacity to be deemed fair the onus is on the employer to show that

(i) it was the incapacity which was the reason for the dismissal;

(ii) the reason was substantial;

(iii) the employee received fair notice that the question of his dismissal for incapacity was being considered and;

(iv) the employee was afforded an opportunity of being heard.

(2) Where there is no dispute between employer and employee as to the incapacity of the employee because of ill-health it is not necessary for the employer to await the results of medical tests before deciding to dismiss the employee.

(3) In this case, the appellant had substantial grounds for the dismissal and the dismissal had been reasonable in all the circumstances.

Patrick McCarthy for the appellant
Frederick Morris SC and Michael Counihan for the respondent

LARDNER J delivered his judgment on 24 April 1990 saying: The Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 lays down the statutory right of an employee not to be unfairly dismissed by setting statutory requirements which oblige an employer to show good cause and by imposing an overall test of reasonableness. (Section 6 of the Unfair Dismissals Act and in particular subs. (1) and (4).)

Statute weight the scales in favour of the employee by providing that a dismissal shall be deemed unfair unless an employer can show substantial grounds justifying the dismissal. The onus is therefore upon the employer to show that the dismissal was not unfair. One of the grounds set out in section 6(4) is the capacity of the employee to carry out the work for which he was employed. In this case it was the ill-health of the plaintiff which the company claimed rendered him incapable of performing his duties as a forklift driver.

For the employer to show that the dismissal was fair, he must show that:

(1) It was the ill-health which was the reason for his dismissal;

(2) That this was substantial reason;

(3) That the employer received fair notices that the question of his dismissal for incapacity was being considered and

(4) That the employee was afforded an opportunity of being heard.

Having regard to the facts in this case, the question arose whether the dismissal was for a substantial reason of a kind within section 6(4) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 and whether it was reasonable in all the circumstances.

The plaintiff was entitled to be told of the concerns which the company had concerning him, which could and did eventually lead to his dismissal. Mr Bolger had been clearly informed of the company's concerns in the correspondence between the parties. This is a case which must turn upon its particular facts. On three occasions, the plaintiff had been asked to provide his doctor's opinion as to his likely return to work date. In reply all that had been received by the company was a letter from Dr. O'Regan, acting as locum for Mr Bolger's G.P., setting out what was in fact Mr Bolger's own view that he would never be able to return to work and that at some time in the near future he would be admitted to Cork Regional Hospital. At no stage was a likely return to work date furnished.

The question arose whether the company was under an obligation to await the results from Cork Regional Hospital. The company was not so obliged in the circumstances of this case. If this had been the first or one of a very few instances of absence, a different view might be taken, but in the light of the case history, the company was entitled to say that Mr Bolger himself thought he was unfit to return to work. Different considerations might well apply if the company and Mr Bolger were at odds over his fitness for work. In that case, it might well have been appropriate for the company to await the results of the medical tests. However, in this case there were substantial grounds for the dismissal and the dismissal had been reasonable in all the circumstances.

An employer is entitled to expect that as part of the contract of employment, and employee would be capable of carrying out the tasks for which he had been employed.

THE HIGH COURT

DONAL O'DONNELL AND CATHERINE O'DONNELL

PLAINTIFFS

Judgment of Mr. Justice Costello delivered the 17th day of July 1990.

Mr. O'Donnell, the first named Plaintiff, is a retired Civil Servant. He lives with his wife, the second named Plaintiff, and their two daughters in their home at Blackrock which is in the administrative area of the Dun Laoghaire Corporation, the Defendant herein. Their action concerns, firstly, Mr. O'Donnell's liability to pay water charges imposed on him by the Corporation in respect of the years 1983, 1984, 1985, and 1988 and, secondly, their claim for damages arising from what is claimed to have been a wrongful disconnection of the supply of water to their home in November 1988. I decided I would determine as a preliminary point of law the validity of the County Manager's Orders made in the years 1983, 1984 and 1985 and the resolution of the Corporation's elected members which imposed water charges for the year 1988 as the Plaintiffs' claims would fail if these Orders and the resolution were valid.

The issues now to be considered are net ones. A power to raise water charges was conferred on the Corporation (and other local authorities) by Act of the Oireachtas enacted in 1962, a power subsequently amended by a further statute enacted in 1983 (see Section 7 of the Local Government (Sanitary Services) Act 1962 and Section 8 of the Local Government (Sanitary Services) Act 1983 which inserted and then amended a new section, Section 65A, in the Public Health (Ireland) Act 1878). The section, as amended, did not come into operation until the 12th of July 1983, when the amending 1983 Act came into force - a significant and important fact to which I will refer in a moment.

Section 65A (as amended), provided that a "sanitary authority" may make charges for water supplied by it. The Corporation of Dun Laoghaire is the "sanitary authority" for the area in which the Plaintiffs reside and its Section 65A powers were exercised by Orders of the County Manager in the years 1983, 1984 and 1985, no water charges being raised for the years 1986 and 1987. But by Ministerial Order No. S.I. No. 341 of 1985 entitled "County Management (Reserved Functions) Order 1985" which came into operation on the 1st of January 1986 the power to make charges for services in respect of domestic premises became exercisable by the elected members of the Dun Laoghaire Corporation.

The important part of Section 65A for the purposes of this case is subsection (7) which reads as follows

> "A charge under this section for water supplied otherwise than by measure shall be payable in advance by equal half-yearly instalments on the 1st day of April and the 1st day of October or by such other instalments as the sanitary authority to whom the charge is payable shall determine, and, in default of being paid within two months after becoming payable shall be recoverable as a simple contract debt in any court of competent jurisdiction" (emphasis added).

The effect of this subsection is perfectly clear; when a charge is made under the section by a sanitary authority it becomes payable in advance by half yearly instalments on the dates specified, but the sanitary authority may determine that the charge it has raised be paid by instalments other than those specified in subsection (7).

The Supreme Court considered subsection (7) in Dublin Corporation .v. Ashley and anor (1986) I.R. 781. The Dublin

City Manager had made two Orders imposing water charges, one for the year 1983 and one for the year 1984. The charges for the year 1983 were made by an Order of the 25th of October 1983. The Order fixed a water charge for the period to the 31st of December of that year and specified that the charge was payable "on demand". The Chief Justice (expressing the unanimous opinion of the Court) pointed out that subsection (7) did not permit the fixing of a charge payable in one single amount and because this was the effect of the Order of the 25th of October 1983 it was outside the powers of the sanitary authority to make it. The 1984 Order was made on the 25th of May of that year. By that Order a water charge was fixed for the period to the 31st December 1984. Instead of providing that the charge was to be payable "on demand" the Order provided that the charge was "payable either in full or in two equal instalments, the first payable not later than the 1st of August and the second not later than the 1st of October". The Court held that this, too, was invalid "either on the basis that it is truly to be interpreted as being an Order for the payment in one sum only, or on the basis that it is uncertain and ambiguous and fails clearly to comply with the limits of the statutory power of Dublin Corporation as a sanitary authority" (p. 787).

I was also referred to an Order of the High Court of the 2nd of February 1988 made in an appeal by way of Case Stated in the Kilkenny County Council .v. Brennan (1987 No. 638 S.S.). In that case the Plaintiff Council had sued the Defendant in the District Court for water and sewage charges. Its claim had been dismissed but on appeal the High Court decided that the District Justice had erred in doing so. Unfortunately the Judgment of the High Court is not available. However, it is of interest to note that the County Manager's Orders on which the proceedings had been based, having set out the rate at which water charges were to be paid, went on to provide that they were to be collected "in instalments as appropriate". It appears from paragraph 5 of the Case Stated that the District Justice was of the opinion (erroneously, as the High Court found) that the County Council had failed to determine the instalments required by subsection (7) and that this was the reason why he had dismissed the claim.

I come now to consider the three Orders of the County Manager which are impugned in these proceedings.

(1) Order of the 14th of September 1983

It will be recalled that the Amending Act of 1983 did not come into operation until the 12th of July of that year and presumably this is the reason why water charges were not raised prior to the 14th of September. The County Manager's Order of that day began by reciting Section 65A to which I have already referred and then went on to Order that > "The following charges in respect of the supply of water to domestic dwellings are to be made for the period ending the 31st of December 1983" and to provide a sliding scale of charges based on rateable valuation. The charge in respect of dwellings with a valuation over £35 (which is the charge applicable in this case) was fixed at £70.

It will be noted

(a) that unlike the 1983 Dublin Corporation Order in the Ashley case this Order does not provide that the charges are to be paid "on demand" and

(b) it does not specify that the charges are to be paid by instalments or the dates on which the charges are to be paid.

After the Order was made a demand was issued by the Defendant Corporation claiming payment for the whole sum of £75 and making no reference to its payment by instalments.

It was argued on the Plaintiffs' behalf that I should construe this Order as fixing a charge payable in one single amount and that I should condemn it on the authority of the Ashley case. It was submitted on the Defendant's behalf that the Order (unlike the Order in Ashley's case) makes no reference to the way the charges are to be paid - it merely sets out the amount to be paid. It was urged that the method of payment is to to be found in the statute, namely in subsection (7) of Section 65A, and that as I was concerned with the legality of the Order of the 14th of September the demand note (which apparently required payment of the full sum) could be ignored. I agree with this submission. The Order in this case did not specify that the charge was to be paid on demand and I cannot construe it as so providing. The Order provided that a sum was to be paid; the method of payment is to be found in the statute. But this does not save the Order because of the very provisions of the statute on which the Defendant relies in suggesting that I should ignore the lump sum claimed in the 1983 Demand Note. Subsection (7) of Section 65A has the effect of providing that payment of charges fixed by a Manager's Order are to be paid on the two dates specified in the subsection (that is the 1st of April and the 1st of October) unless other dates have been fixed by him. Once the Order of the 14th of September 1983 failed to provide that the charges it fixed were to be paid by instalments they then became payable on the statutory dates. But this was a legal impossibility as the first statutory date had passed. In my opinion the statute did not empower the County Manager to make an Order which resulted in an obligation to pay charges in a manner which could not legally be performed and so I think, by failing to specify the dates on which instalment payments were to be made the Order of the 14th of September 1983 was ultra vires.

(2) Order of 10th July 1984

The County Manager made an Order on the 10th of July 1984 in respect of water charges for the year ending the 31st of December 1984 and fixed the same rate of charge which, in the Plaintiffs' case, again amounted to £70 for the year. The Order was in the same terms as those contained in the 1983 Order - that is, it did not provide that the charges were to be paid on demand and failed to specify the instalments in which the charges were to be paid. As the Order was made after the 1st of April it suffers from the same infirmity as that which invalidated the 1983 Order. There was the usual demand note issued in respect of these charges but this differed in a significant way to that issued in 1983. Its date of issue was given as the 18th of June 1984 (that is before the County Manager in fact made his Order). It required Mr. O'Donnell to pay £70 arrears and £70 current charges. It stated that the current charge "may be paid in two equal instalments, the first forthwith and the second by the 31st of August 1984". But this demand note, in my opinion, could not have cured the defect in the Manager's Order (and indeed so to argue would be contrary to the submissions advanced in support of the 1983 Order) because subsection (7) requires the "sanitary authority" to determine the instalments in which charges are to be paid if those provided by the statute are not to operate. This provision can only be complied with by an Order of the County Manager and not by an administrative decision taken by an official of the Council before, or, indeed after the County Manager's Order had been made. The defective Order was not, therefore, cured by the demand note.

(3) Order of the 17th of June 1985

Water charges were again raised by the County Manager in 1985 by an Order made on the 17th of June. This is invalid for the same reasons which applied to the earlier two Orders. The final demand note made on Mr. O'Donnell contains no reference to payment of the 1985 charges by instalments and I have not seen the first demand note. But even assuming that the first demand made provision for the payment of charges by instalments such a provision would not have saved the Manager's Order for the reasons which I have given in relation to the 1984 Order.

As pointed out already no water charges were raised in 1986 and 1987 and that from the 1st of January 1986 the power to raise charges became a reserved function exercisable by the elected members of the Dun Laoghaire Corporation. By a resolution adopted on the 7th of December 1987 the elected members exercised their powers under this section and fixed water charges for the year 1988. Their resolution, after reciting Section 65A went on:

> "We hereby determine that the charges for water supplied for domestic purposes for the period ending the 31st of December, 1988 shall be fixed by reference to the rateable valuation of the premises supplied in accordance with Schedule I hereunder and shall be payable in two equal instalments namely on 15th of March 1988 and the 15th day of July 1988 ..."

The Schedule provided that dwellings with a valuation of £30 and over would be liable to pay £125 so that if this resolution was valid Mr. O'Donnell was required to pay water charges by instalments on the 15th of March and the 15th of July 1988.

In my view this resolution was a valid exercise by the elected members of the powers conferred on them by Section 65A. Unlike the previous Managerial Orders the resolution made a determination of the instalments in which the charges were to be paid and so complied with subsection (7). It has been argued on behalf of the Plaintiffs that only four months separated the dates on which instalments were to be paid and that this determination was ultra vires because, it was claimed, the section only authorized the determination of instalments which would not impose a greater burden on the houseowner than the burden imposed by six monthly instalments as set out in the subsection. I cannot agree that the subsection should be so construed. It seems to me that the subsection gives to the sanitary authority a discretion as to how instalments are to be determined and that it was well within the statutory powers of the Corporation to fix the instalments specified in its December 1987 resolution.

I should add that it had originally been urged on the Plaintiffs' behalf that the resolution was invalid because, it was suggested, it permitted the proceeds of the water charge to be dispersed for purposes other than water services. But the evidence shows that the revenue from the water charges was in fact lower than the cost of the water services provided and this point was not pursued.

It follows from the conclusions I have just announced that Mr. O'Donnell is not liable to pay the water charges for the years 1983, 1984, and 1985, amounting in all to a sum of £210 but that he is liable to pay the water charges for the year 1988, namely the sum of £125.

Subsection (9) of Section 65A empowered the Corporation to disconnect the Plaintiffs' water supply. The Corporation exercised this power in 1988 and since November of that year the Plaintiffs' home has been without water. In the light of the conclusions I have just announced it becomes necessary to consider the validity of the Defendant's actions and I will hear any evidence the parties wish to adduce on this point and Counsels' submissions on it. As I think it is desirable that all issues should be determined in these proceedings I will allow, as requested, the Defendant to amend its defence so as to plead that the Plaintiffs' delay constitutes a bar to the relief claimed and I will allow both parties to adduce evidence on this point as they think fit. I will also hear evidence on the Plaintiffs' claim for damages and I will then be in a position finally to determine all the issues in the case.

PLAINTIFFS

Judgment of Mr. Justice Costello delivered the 5th day of September 1990

Having concluded, for the reasons given in my judgment of the 17th July, 1990, that the managerial orders which fixed water charges in 1983, 1984 and 1985 were ultra vires but that the resolution of the elected members fixing charges for the year 1988 was valid, I resumed the hearing of this case and heard evidence on the remaining issues. These were:-

(i) Whether the Corporation's 1988 decisions to disconnect the plaintiffs' water supply were ultra vires;

(ii) Whether the plaintiff, Mr. O'Donnell, was barred from claiming declaratory relief;

(iii) Whether the plaintiffs, or either of them, are entitled to damages.

(i) THE DECISIONS TO DISCONNECT

The Corporation's decision to introduce water charges in 1983 met with widespread, determined and organised opposition - opposition which in numerous cases took the form of a refusal to pay them. The Dun Laoghaire Corporation, like other local authorities similarily placed, had no alternative but to institute legal proceedings and in the following years many hundreds of civil processes were issued against recalcitrant householders. For a number of reasons proceedings by means of District Court action proved a slow and cumbersome process and the Corporation was faced not only with a fall in its revenue but also with the grievance of whose householders who having paid water charges watched others escape liability, apparently with impunity. As a result when water charges were once again imposed in 1988 it decided to activate the power conferred by Section 65A of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878 (inserted by Section 7 of the Local Government (Sanitary Services) Act 1962) which provided by sub-section (9) that a water authority could disconnect a supply of water "in respect of which a charge under this section remains unpaid after the expiration of two months after the charge has become payable" and further authorised the authority to impose fees to cover the cost of disconnection and subsequent re-connection.

On the 15th June 1988 the Corporation wrote to the plaintiff, Mr. O'Donnell, a letter headed "Notice re disconnection of water supply". This letter referred to the arrears of charges which it was claimed were owed by Mr. O'Donnell, namely those payable in 1983, 1984, and 1985 amounting to £210 and the first instalment for the year 1988 amounting to £62.50., and went on:-

> "Until recently this Corporation has concentrated on legal proceedings to obtain payment of arrears outstanding. However, in the last few months a number of householders have been proceeded against by disconnecting their water supply. It is now proposed to step up substantially the disconnection of supply. Accordingly, the Corporation hereby gives you notice that if the amount outstanding is not paid within the next 7 days your water supply will be disconnected without further notice."

It concluded by warning the plaintiff that disconnection and further re-connections would involve him in further substantial costs.

I draw attention to the following matters:-

(a) The decision to operate its Section 65A powers was taken by the Corporation for the purpose of enforcing payment of the sums it believed to be due for water rates. It was taken bona fide by the Corporation for the purpose of securing compliance with the law.

(b) In the case of Mr. O'Donnell the June decision to disconnect his water supply was taken to enforce payment of the sum of £272.50 which it was claimed he then owed. In fact, because the 1983, 1984 and 1985 orders were invalid Mr. O'Donnell did not owe the sum of £210 in respect of the charges for those years. Because the 1988 charges were valid and the first instalment had fallen due on the 15th March there was at that time only a sum of £62.50 due by him to the Corporation.

The Corporation disconnected the plaintiff's water supply and wrote to him on 12 July to tell him they had done so and required payment of £60 re-connection fee along with payment of the arrears. With the knowledge and consent of Mr. O'Donnell persons who have not been named illegally re-connected his supply. The Corporation disconnected it again on 3rd August but once again it was illegally re-connected.

On the 15th July the second instalment of the 1988 charges became payable. On the 10th October the Corporation wrote again to Mr. O'Donnell. It claimed arrears amounting to £335 (that is the 1983, 1984 and 1985 charges and the whole of the 1988 charges) and warned again that unless payment was made his water supply would be cut off. This warning went unheeded and the water was cut off at the beginning of November. On 3rd November a claim was made for the arrears (£335) and disconnection and re-connection fees of £430. Again Mr. O'Donnell took the law into his own hands and with his consent some persons without the Corporation's authority re-connected the supply. On the 9th November it was once again disconnected by the Corporation, this time using methods which effectively prevented unauthorised re-connection.

I draw attention to the following matters:

(a) The October decision to disconnect was taken to enforce payment of the sum of £335. In fact the only amount properly owing at that time was £125 (the 1988 charges).

(b) When disconnection took place in November 1988 the 1988 charges were in arrears for more than two months.

(c) Since November 1988 the Corporation has claimed payment of £430 disconnection and re-connection fees by virtue of Section 65A. But if the June decision to disconnect was invalid and if the October decision to disconnect was invalid then this claim is not sustainable because the fees are then claimed for work performed under an unauthorised decision.

It was a pre-condition of the exercise by the Corporation of its Section 65A powers of disconnection that water charges were in arrears for two months when the power was exercised. If no charges were in arrears at the time of disconnections then the Corporation would have lacked statutory authority for its decision to disconnect and it and the actions taken subsequently to implement it would have been ultra vires. In fact, when the June decision was taken the first instalment of the 1988 charges was two months in arrears and when the October decision was taken all the 1988 charges were two months in arrears. But it does not follow that these decisions were intra vires because it is open to the plaintiffs to claim, as they have done, that although the statutory power to decide to disconnect may have existed in June and again in October 1988 the excercise of that power was invalid because it was exercised ultra vires. I think this submission is correct. The power to disconnect was a discretionary one to be exercised in accordance with the statute and even though the statutory pre-condition to its exercise is shown to have existed it is still possible that its dscretionary powers were exercised in an ultra vires manner. And I think that is what happened both in June and October, 1988. The Corporation was fully entitled to operate Section 65A for the purpose of enforcing payment of water charges which were lawfully due, but, both in June and October, it decided to exercise the power to enforce payment of sums which were not lawfully due (namely, the 1983, 1984 and 1985 charges). As I think the section did not empower the Corporation to utilise the section for such a purpose it follows that these two decisions were ultra vires.

It also follows from these conclusions, and from those which were contained in my judgment of the 17th July last, that unless some legal bar exists (a subject to be considered in a moment) then Mr. O'Donnell is entitled to a declaration (a) that the 1983, 1984, and 1985 managerial orders were ultra vires and invalid, (b) that the June and October 1988 decisions to disconnect were ultra vires and invalid, (c) that he is not indebted to the Corporation for the sum of £210 (being the 1983, 1984 and 1985 charges), and (d) that he is not indebted to the Corporation in the sum of £410, being the disconnection and re-connection fees.

(ii) BARS TO RELIEF

The main relief claimed by Mr. O'Donnell is declaratory relief by which the court is asked to make the declarations on the matters to which I have just referred. A declaratory judgment is one which declares the rights of the parties and because defendants, and in particular public bodies, respect and obey such judgments they have the same legal consequences as if the court were to make orders quashing the impugned orders and decisions. The Chancery (Ireland) Act, 1867 conferred, by Section 155, jurisdiction on the courts to make declaratory orders by providing that no action would be open to the objection that a merely declaratory decree or order was sought and rules of court have since been made with similar provision. The 1905 rules provided (by Order XXV Rule 5) that no objection could be taken to a claim merely because declaratory relief was claimed by a plaintiff and an identical provision is to be found in the current rules (Order 19, rule 29). But a declaratory judgment is a discretionary remedy and the defendants have advanced four separate grounds as to why I should refuse the relief claimed.

Firstly, it is urged that the plaintiff could have obtained relief by way of orders of certiorari and his failure to apply for this relief disentitles him to a declaratory judgment. In support of this submission reliance is placed on the judgment of Gavan Duffy, J. in O'Doherty v. The Attorney General (1941) I.R. 659. That was a case in which the plaintiff claimed entitlement to a military service pension under the provisions of the Military Service Pensions Act, 1934. His application to the Minister was referred to a Referee who by notice informed the plaintiff that he was not a person to whom the Act applied, but that additional evidence could be submitted to him. The plaintiff instituted proceedings claiming a declaration that he was a person to whom the Act applied. The court held that although it had jurisdiction to make the declaration claimed in the exercise of its discretion it would decline to do so being of the opinion that an order of mandamus was the more convenient, beneficial and effectual remedy for the misconstruction of his statutory duty by the Referree, pointing out that it was not the practice to make a declaration where there was an appropriate remedy to which the plaintiff ought to have resorted, and that the courts have shown a strong reluctance to depart from this rule, unless, for example there was doubt as to the availibility of the alternative remedy (p 583).

But judicial attitudes have changed since 1941. By 1965 the Suprme Court had made it clear (Transport Salaried Staffs' Association v. C.I.E.) (1965) I.R. 180) that there was no requirement that an applicant should establish an inability to obtain a state-side order before the court would grant declaratory relief, holding that a declaratory order would be made if there were good reasons for making it. The use of declaratory orders has become widespread both in this country and in England as a public law remedy and such orders are made even in cases where even the court had jurisdiction to make orders of certiorari quashing impugned administrative decisions (Pyx Granite Co. Ltd v. Minister of Housing and Local Government (1960) A.C. 260, 290). Mr. O'Donnell's failure to apply for such orders is not in itself a ground for refusing him the declaratory orders he now seeks.

The second argument advanced is that since the adoption of the 1986 rules of court it is now an abuse of process to claim declaratory relief in a plenary action when relief in an application for judicial review is available and so the relief claimed should be refused.

The 1986 procedural reforms followed closely those adopted in England. The English Law Commission considered the question of public law remedies and recommended the enactment of legislation to introduce a new remedy and new procedures for applications for what was called "judicial review" of administrative acts and decisions. Initially rules of court were adopted in 1977 and then amended in 1980 to give effect to these recommendations. Later, by the Supreme Court Act, 1981 they were enacted in legislative form. The Irish Law Reform Commission made proposals for reform on lines similar to those proposed by the Law Commission in England and it too recommended that its proposals be enacted by legislation. This has not been done. Instead they have been incorporated in the new 1986 rules, Order 84 of which following closely Order 53 of the English rules as amended in 1980.

The defendants have relied on a recent decision of the House of Lords in O'Reilly v. Mackamn (1983) 2 A.C. 237 in support of their submission. That was a case in which four plaintiffs, prisoners in Hull prison, were charged with disciplinary offences before the Board of Visitors. Three proceeded by writs issued in July 1980 in respect of adjudications made by the Visitors at the end of 1976, the fourth by originating summons issued in September 1980 in respect of an adjudication made in May 1979. They all alleged that they were not given the opportunity to call witnesses in their defence and that the Board of Visitors had acted in breach of natural justice and each claimed declarations that the adjudications were nullities. The defendants (the members of the board and the Home Office) moved by summons in each action for orders striking out each of the four proceedings on the ground that they were an abuse of the process of the court. The application failed in the High Court. Peter Pain, J. held (a) that it was not an abuse to bring the proceedings by way of writ and originating summons instead of applying under R.S.C. Order 53 for a judicial review and (b) that it was not correct that the appropriate remedy was to apply for an order of certiorari to quash the adjudications and that it was open to the plaintiffs to apply for declaratory orders in plenary actions. The Court of Appeal held otherwise. But it is of relevance to note that there was a divergence of opinion on the issues involved. The majority (Ackner, L.J. and O'Connor, L.J.) held that the appropriate remedy (if any) was an order of certiorari and not a declaratory order and so the claims in the plenary actions should be dismissed, whilst Lord Denning, M.R. allowing the appeal for a different reason construed Section 31 of the Supreme Court Act, 1981 as meaning that it would be an abuse of process where good and appropriate remedies had been given by parliament (judicial review proceedings) to use other procedures to claim relief so as to avoid the safeguards against abuse contained in the new remedies. The plaintiffs appealed. In a unanimous judgment (delivered by Lord Diplock) the House of Lords agreed with Lord Denning. It was pointed out that neither Order 53 nor Section 31 of the Supreme Court Act, 1981 expressly provided that procedures by way of application for judicial review were to be exclusive remedies but nonetheless it would "as a general rule be contrary to public policy, and as such an abuse of the process of the court, to permit a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights to which he was entitled to protection under public law to proceed by way of ordinary action and by this means to evade the provisions of Order 53 for the protection of such authorities" (p. 285).

The defendants in this action did not apply to have it dismissed as an abuse of process nor indeed did they plead that it amounted to an abuse of process. What is urged is that the new 1986 rules, like the English rules, contain provisions for judicial review which incorporate safeguards in the public interest in favour of public authorities and that, for the reasons given in O'Reilly, even if the court considers that the impugned orders and decisions are ultra vires declarations should not be made because to claim relief in a plenary action instead of by application for judicial review amounts to an abuse of process.

I am of course not bound to follow the decision of the House of Lords but judgments given by that court on rules of court or legislative provisions similar to ours rightly carry in our courts considerable weight. In that connection it is of some relevance to point out that in its journey to the House of Lords three judges disagreed with the view adopted by the Master of Rolls and the House of Lords and that academic comment has not been unanimously supportive of their conclusions (see: Wade, "Procedures and Prerogative in Public Law", 1985 L.Q.R. 180) so that the point at issue is clearly one on which reasonable persons can reasonably hold divergent views.

I find myself siding with the minority view of the English judges. Firstly, as a matter of construction, I cannot construe the new rules as meaning that in matters of public law Order 84 provides an exclusive remedy in cases where an aggrieved person wishes to obtain a declaratory order and that such a person abuses the courts processes by applying for such an order by plenary action. Secondly, I do not think that the court is at liberty to apply policy considerations and conclude that the public interest requires that the court should construe its juridiction granted by the new rules in the restrictive way suggested, (a) because the jurisdiction it is exercising is one conferred by statute (the 1867 Act) and it is not for the courts to decide that as a matter of public policy litigants who ask the court to exercise this jurisdiction abuse the courts processes, and (b) because it is not necessary to call in aid the doctrine of public policy to avoid the mischief which would otherwise result.

I should develop this latter point a little more fully.

Order 84 contains significant safeguards in favour of public authorities. Leave to bring an application for judicial review must first be obtained (Rule 20 (1)); leave will not be granted unless the applicant can show sufficient interest (Rule 20 (4)); the application must be brought promptly and in any event within three months, subject to a power to have this time extended (Order 21 (1)).

But, as Ackner L.J. pointed out in O'Reilly (at p. 265) on a motion to try a preliminary issue in a plenary action the court could determine whether an application was so frivolous or vexatious or so devoid of merit that leave to issue it under O. 84 r. 20 (1) would never have been granted and so stay the plenary action, or it could conclude on such a motion that the plaintiff had no standing and dismiss it as it would have done under rule 20 (4) had an application for judicial review been brought.

A declaratory order is a discretionary order arising from the wording of statute which conferred jurisdiction on the courts to make such orders (see Wade "Administrative Law" 5 ed. p. 523) and it is well established that a plaintiff's delay in instituting plenary proceedings may, in the opinion of the court, disentitle the plaintiff to relief. It seems to me that in considering the effects of delay in a plenary action there are now persuasive reasons for adopting the principles enshrined in Order 84 rule 21 relating to delay in applications for judicial review, so that if the plenary action is not brought within three months from the date on which the cause of action arose the court would normally refuse relief unless it is satisfied that had the claim been brought under Order 84 time would have been extended. The rules committee considered that there were good reasons why public authorities should be protected in the manner afforded by Order 84 rule 21 when claims for declaratory relief were made in applications for judicial review and I think exactly the same considerations apply when the same form of relief is sought in a plenary action. Furthermore, it is not desirable that the form of action should not determine the relief to be granted and this might well be the result in a significant number of cases if one set of principles on the question of delay was applied in applications for judicial review and another in plenary actions claiming the same remedy. And in plenary actions the effect of delay can in many cases be determined on the trial of a preliminary issue and as speedily as if the issue fell to be determined in an application for judicial review.

For these reasons it seems to me that the apprehended use of plenary actions as a device to defeat the protections given by Order 84 is not a real danger and does not justify the court in concluding that proceedings by plenary action for declaratory relief against public authorities must be an abuse of process.

I must hold therefore that the plaintiff is not barred from obtaining the relief now claimed merely because he failed to challenge the impunged orders and decisions by applications for judicial review under O. 84.

The third ground relied on by the defendants is the plaintiffs' delay. These proceedings were not instituted until the 21st July 1989. The managerial orders challenged are dated 14th September 1983, 10th July 1984 and 17th June 1985. If the plaintiff's delay disentitles him to declaratory relief then the challenges to the later adminstrative decisions to cut off the water supply will also fail. These were made in June and October 1988. But if the court can properly declare the managerial orders to have been ultra vires the effect of delay in challenging the validity of the 1988 administrative decisions will then arise for determination.

exercise my discretionary powers in relation to the plaintiffs' delay by applying by analogy the rules and principles contained in O. 84 r. 21. I should therefore refuse to grant the plaintiff relief unless I am satisfied that had the application been one for judicial review I would have concluded that there were good reasons for extending the time for allowing the application notwithstanding the expiration of three months' time limit contained in the rule.

The phrase "good reasons" is one of wide import which it would be futile to attempt to define precisely. However, in considering whether or not there are good reasons for extending the time I think it is clear that the test must be an objective one and the court should not extend the time merely because an aggrieved plaintiff believed that he or she was justified in delaying the institution of proceedings. What the plaintiff has to show (and I think the onus under O. 84 r. 21 is on the plaintiff) is that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford a justifiable excuse for the delay. There may be cases, for example where third parties had acquired rights under an administrative decision which is later challenged in a delayed action. Although the aggrieved plainitff may be able to establish a reasonable explanation for the delay the court might well conclude that this explanation did not afford a good reason for extending the time because to do so would interfere unfairly with the acquired rights. (The State (Cussen) v Brennan 1981 I.R. 181).

Or again, the delay may unfairly prejudice the rights and interests of the public authority which had made the ultra vires decision in which event there would not be a good reason for extending the time, or a plaintiff may acquiesce in the situation arising from the ultra vires decision he later challenges or the delay may have amounted to a waiver of his right to challenge it and so the court could not conclude that there were good reasons for excusing the delay in instituting the proceedings.

I will turn now to consider the delay in challenging the managerial orders of 1983, 1984, and 1985.

Originally the plaintiff failed to pay the 1983, 1984 and 1985 water charges not becuse he thought that they were illegally imposed but, like many other householders in the Borough of Dun Laoghaire, and elsewhere, he thought they were unfair. It was only later and after reading in the newspapers the Supreme Court decision in the Ashley case that he considered that the orders might be invalid. He then approached a public representative and through him obtained copies of the managerial orders. Mr. O'Donnell was not a lawyer but by 1987 he had come to the conclusion that the managerial orders were invalid and this strengthened his resolve not to pay the charges they imposed. But he took no steps to challenge them. He was, however, a member of a residents' association which was actively campaigning against the charges and from his membership and from the newspaper reports he was aware that proceedings had been taken by the Corporation against many defaulting householders and he assumed that he too would be sued by the Corporation. In fact this assumption was correct. In April 1987 proceedings against him were issued but service by registered post could not be effected (and there was, I am satisfied, no effort to evade service by Mr. O'Donnell or his wife) and no further steps to effect service were taken. I am satisfied therefore that he did not undertake the burden of instituting proceedings because he believed that the legality issue could be adjudicated upon in proceedings instituted by the Corporation either against him or against other householders who, he was aware, had raised the validity of the orders in other proceedings. Up to June 1988, therefore, there were good reasons why the plaintiff had failed to institute proceedings. Had he then applied for judicial review I am satisfied the court would have been justified in extending the time for doing so.

In June of 1988 the situation changed and for the worst as far as the plaintiffs were concerned. When the Corporation threatened to turn off the water supply it then became obvious that the legality of the managerial orders would not be determined in proceedings instituted against the plaintiff. The plaintiffs took two different actions in the new situation. When the supply was cut off they re-connected, or permitted the re-connection, of the supply. If this was the only action they had taken I do not think that they could have relied on it as a "good reason" justifying the delay in instituting proceedings because the re-connection was an illegial act which the court could not condone. But in addition Mrs. O'Donnell in June 1988 went to a public representative with a view to seeing if he could have the supply re-connected. This approach failed. When the supply was cut off finally and effectively in November Mr. O'Donnell went to another representative and through him put settlement proposals to the Corporation - he would pay the 1988 charges but not the earlier ones or the costs of disconnecting and re-connecting the supply. This offer was turned down. He then tried to have his supply re-connected by the adoption of a motion to this effect by the elected representatives, but this approach also failed, early in December 1988.

The following February one of the householders who had refused payment suceeded on an appeal to the Circuit Court in having a decree for water charges dismissed. This case got wide publicity and Mr. O'Donnell hoped that this would strengthen his hand in negotiating a settlement with the help of his public representative. Some time after this he visited another public representative in Leinster House. As a result of advice he was given he then for the first time sought legal advice. His solicitor got counsel's opinion and he then wrote on 18th July 1989 making the claim that the managerial orders were ultra vires and that the decisions to cut off the water supply may also have been invalid. Shortly afterwards these proceedings were instituted.

The evidence, then, clearly establishes that Mr. O'Donnell was from June 1988 contesting his liability to pay water charges not through the courts but with the assistance of three different public representatives. Is the course of conduct a "good reason" within the meaning of O. 84, r. 21 which would have justified the court in extending the time for applying for a judicial review of the orders? Assistance in answering this question is to be found in The State (Furey) .v. The Minister for Defence (Supreme Court, 2nd March 1984). There the applicant had been a member of the defence forces. He was discharged on 7th August 1974. He instituted proceedings four years later for an order of certiorari to quash his discharge. He was successful in the High Court and the Minister appealed. One of the grounds of appeal was that the application should have been refused on the grounds of delay. This was rejected by a majority decision. The evidence of the plaintiff was to the effect that he did not realise that he could pursue his complaint throught the court, that he could not afford legal advice, that over a four year period he had written many letters to the Department, to local members of parliament and to successive Ministers for Defence. On these facts it was concluded that the applicant had not disentitled himself by his delay to the remedy he sought.

The facts of this case are not identical with those in Furey. But they are close enough. Mr. O'Donnell, like Mr. Furey, tried to get redress through political pressure. When he was advised to do so, he went to a solicitor. It is true that he has not sworn that he did not get legal advice before this because he had not the means to do so but I think I am entitled to take into account the notorious fact that current levels of legal fees are perceived by most people to be very high and that this fact constitutes a powerful disincentive to legal action by persons like Mr. O'Donnell who are in receipt of a public service pension and who live in a home which could be seized and sold to pay costs should his action fail. I think therefore that his efforts to settle the dispute through the intervention of public representatives establish that there is a reasonable explanation as to why between June 1988 and July 1989 he did not institute these proceedings.

No third parties have acquired rights which it would be unjust to injure by making the declaratory order the plaintiff seeks. Whilst it is true that declaratory order may cause the defendant administrative and perhaps financial problems I do not think that they are such as to justify the court refusing the plaintiff relief to which otherwise he would be entitled. I am fortified in this view by the fact that the Supreme Court was not inhibited in declaring water charges imposed by the Dublin Corporation for the years 1983 and 1984 to be invalid (Dublin Corporation v Ashley (1986) I.R. 781). But if the situation was sufficiently serious remedial action by retrospective legislation is quite possible. This of course would be troublesome for the authorities involved but again this is not a factor which should deprive an injured plaintiff of the relief to which otherwise he would be entitled.

I must hold therefore that the plaintiff's delay does not disentitle him to the declaratory orders he seeks relating to the managerial orders in 1983, 1984, and 1985.

The same factors which I have just outlined afford a reasonable explanation for the delay in challenging the administrative decisions of June and October 1988 by which the plaintiffs water supply was cut off. For the reasons already given I think that this explanation affords a good reason why the delay should not bar him from obtaining the relief to which he is entitled.

The fourth argument is that it would be contrary to the public interest to do so because orders declaring the water charges imposed in 1983, 1984 and 1985 to be invalid would be detrimental to the good administration of the Corporation's administrative area. In support of this argument the defendants rely on Caswell v. Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal (1990) 2 All ER 434, case relating to an application by dairy farmers in Wales to fix a milk quota under the relevant dairy produce quota regulations. Two years after the Tribunal's decision (which was adverse to them) they applied for judicial review of the decision. The trial judge held that the Tribunal had misconstrued the 1984 Regulations and should have increased the applicants' quota but in the exercise of his discretion under the Section 31 (6) of the Supreme Court Act, 1981 he refused relief. His decision was upheld in the Court of Appeal and by the House of Lords.

It is important to note that this decision was based on statutory provisions which do not exist in this country. A somewhat confused situation has arisen in England arising from the discrepancy between rules of court and the statutory provisions of the 1981 Act which are referred to on pages 437 and 438 of the report and which I need not delay in analysing. It will be sufficient if I refer to Section 31 (6) of the 1981 Act which provides that: -

> "Where the High Court considers that there has been undue delay in making an application for judicial review, the court may refuse to grant - (a) leave for the making of the application; or (b) any relief sought on the application, if it considers that the granting of the relief sought would be likely to cause substantial hardship to, or substantially prejudice the rights of, any person or would be detrimental to good administration".

Applying these statutory provisions the House of Lords concluded (a) that there had been "undue" delay and (b) that it should refuse the plaintiff relief because it would be detrimental to good administration for relief to be granted.

We have nothing equivalent to this Section. As already indicated, in the exercise of its discretion where a plaintiff has delayed in challenging an administrative act the court may take into account the prejudice thereby suffered to a defendant public authority. But that is a different point and one I have already considered. There is, in my view, no principle of administrative law which, apart from questions of delay, would justify me in refusing relief in the public interest because of the administrative problems which a declaratory order would produce. This ground of defence, therefore, also fails.

I conclude therefore that there are no bars to the declaratory relief to which the plaintiff is entitled. Accordingly, I will

(a) make an order declaring that the orders of the County Manager of 14 September 1983, 10 July 1984 and 17 June 1985 fixing charges in respect of the supply of water to dwellings were ultra vires and invalid and that Mr. O'Donnell is not liable to pay the charges imposed on him pursuant to those orders for the years 1983, 1984 and 1985, namely, £210

(b) make an order declaring that the decisions of the Dun Laoghaire Corporation to disconnect the plaintiffs' water supply taken in June 1988 and November 1988 were ultra vires and invalid and that Mr. O'Donnell is not liable to pay the charges claimed by the defendants (namely £430) for disconnection and re-connection.

(iii) DAMAGES

The last point in the case is whether in addition to the declaratory relief to which Mr. O'Donnell is entitled he and Mrs. O'Donnell are entitled to an award of damages. As already noted the water supply to the plaintiffs' home was cut off in June 1988 but it was shortly afterwards re-connected and damages are only claimed from November 1988, when the supply was effectively terminated. In July of this year the supply was re-connected.

There is no doubt that both the plaintiffs suffered considerable inconvenience and indeed hardship arising from the defendants' ultra vires decisions but that is not sufficient to ground an award of damages; the plaintiffs have to establish a legal basis for their claim that they are entitled to be compensated for what they have suffered.

This they cannot do. Their claim is not for damages for breach of statutory duty, or breach of a common law duty of care which the defendants might have owed to them; their claim is for damages arising from the ultra vires decision taken in October 1988 and the actions taken pursuant to it. The principles on which damages will be awarded in such circumstances have been summarised by Wade "Administrative Law" 5th Ed. p. 673, a summary approved of by the Supreme Court in Pine Valley Developments Ltd v. Minister for the Environment (1987) ILRM 747, as follows. An administrative action which is ultra vires but which is not actionable merely as a breach of duty will found an action for damages

(1) If it involves the commission of a recognised tort, such as trespass, false imprisonment or negligence,

(2) If it is actuated by malice, e.g. personal spite or a desire to injure for improper motives,

(3) If the authority making the administrative act knows that it does not possess the powers which it purports to exercise.

In this case the Dun Laoghaire Corporation committed no tort when it cut off the water supply to the plaintiffs' home; it was not actuated by malice towards the plaintiff but was carrying out its difficult responsibilities in an impartial and unbiased manner, satisfied that it possessed the statutory power to cut off defaulting householders, like the plaintiff, who failed to pay the charges which it believed had been validly imposed. The Corporation is not liable therefore to pay damages to either of the plaintiffs.

APPROVED TEXT

THE HIGH COURT

[2013 No. 21 MCA]

IN THE MATTER OF AN APPEAL PURSUANT TO SECTION 90(1) OF THE EMPLOYMENT EQUALITY ACTS 1998 – 2011

ELEANOR O'HIGGINS

APPELLANT

THE LABOUR COURT AND UNIVERSITY COLLEGE DUBLIN

RESPONDENTS

1. This is an appeal brought by Dr. O'Higgins against a Determination of the Labour Court made on 11th January, 2013, on her claim under the above Acts that a 2007 decision by her employer, the second named respondent ("the University"), not to promote her to the status of professor was unlawful in that it was vitiated by discrimination on grounds of her sex contrary to the provisions of the Employment Equality legislation. The Labour Court has been named as a respondent in the proceedings but has taken no part, the opposition having been undertaken by the University.

2. The appellant was previously the holder of a tenured post as a Senior Lecturer in what is now the School of Business and Law in the University, her duties being discharged in what was formerly the Commerce Faculty of the University College and are thus on the business side of the now consolidated school. She has since retired from her tenured post but continues to teach under a fixed term contract.

3. It is important to underline at the outset that the issues which arise in this appeal concern an application for promotion to the grade or rank of professor within the University under a scheme which was not competitive with other applicants as might be the case under a procedure for the appointment of an single candidate to a particular professorship or for a selection of candidates to fulfil a limited number of posts. It was essentially a promotional exercise by reference to a number of defined and objective criteria and there was no limit upon the number of applicants that might receive promotion.

4. It appears that in the University there were two "pathways" to such promotions. In the one which is involved in this appeal, a scheme exists under which promotion rounds are held periodically in which senior academics can apply to be promoted to the rank of professor. That scheme is outlined in a document called "Promotion to Professor Internal Promotions Pathway 4B". The second pathway is one called "Competitive Retention Pathway" under which senior academics who are effectively threatening to move to another institution can be promoted to a professorship with a view to retaining their services.

5. The procedures and decisions under these schemes are in the hands of the University Committee for Academic Appointments, Tenure and Promotions which has been referred to by the first named respondent as the "UCAATP", but which will be described in this judgment as "the Committee". This body is comprised of members who are partly elected within the University and partly appointed by the President of the University. The President and the Registrar are ex-officio members. For the purposes of the 2007 promotions round under the scheme in which the appellant's application was made, the Committee was comprised of twelve men and one woman.

6. Although not immediately relevant to the legal issues now before this Court, the background to the hearing before the Labour Court included the fact that she had previously been an applicant for promotion to professorship in 2006 but had been refused as ineligible because at that time it was a pre-condition that an applicant had held the position of associate professor for at least five years. She had subsequently applied for associate professor status but was unsuccessful. This pre-condition had been abolished for the round of promotions held in 2007.

7. In her application for the 2007 round, the applicant was supported by the recommendation from her own School of Business and Law and her own referee. As the Labour Court's impugned Determination records, external assessors appointed by the University to review her application "also reported favourably on her eligibility for promotion". The Determination also records that, in accordance with standard practice, those assessors were asked to indicate if, in their opinion, the appellant would be eligible to the promotion to professorship grade in their own university and each had given an affirmative reply.

8. There were nineteen applicants for promotion in the 2007 round of which four were women and fifteen were men. In the result, eight promotions were granted of which two were women and six were men.

9. The conditions or criteria by reference to which the Committee conducted the promotion procedure were set out in the "Pathway 4B" document referred to above as follows:-

> "Applicants for promotion to professor are expected to have an international reputation. Professors will have achieved an internationally recognised leadership position in their disciplines from pioneering inquiry into important issues in that discipline, evidenced through sustained high-level activity. Assessment of promotion will be based primarily on the research and scholarship and academic leadership criteria. In exceptional circumstances, promotion may be based on the teaching and learning criterion reflecting internationally recognised peer-reviewed achievement in the applicant's scholarship of teaching and learning and/or pedagogical innovation within the discipline."

10. Following the refusal of her application, the appellant was given the following reasons as set out in the report of the Committee:-

- Lack of evidence of a substantial volume of publications in high-impact, high-quality referred research publications;
- Limited PhD supervision;
- Limited funding;
- Limited evidence of academic leadership within UCD;
- Limited evidence of contribution to the management or direction of the University through active engagement in internal committees or other activities that fostered the development of the University as a community.

11. The appellant requested and was given what is called a "feedback session" in which she met with two members of the Committee to answer her queries as to why her application had been unsuccessful. Not satisfied with that explanation, the Appellant initiated her claim before the Equality Tribunal.

12. The appellant's claim under the Act was first heard by an Equality Officer who dismissed the claim upon the basis that a prima facie case of discrimination had not been made out. It was an appeal against this decision which brought the matter before the Labour Court.

The Labour Court Determination.

13. The Determination of the Labour Court contains some thirteen pages which set out the background to the claim and appeal; summarise the arguments of the appellant and the University; provide a detailed exposé of the law which the Labour Court is required to apply; lead to the substantive analysis under the heading "Discussion" and conclude with two paragraphs headed "Determination".

14. The summary of the evidence given by the appellant to the Labour Court concludes with that court's assessment of its effect in these terms:-

> "The import of the Complainant's evidence was that in respect of each of the published criterion (sic) against which the application was to be considered her qualifications was (sic) equal to, or greater than, those of her nominated comparators who were promoted. The Complainant told the Court that, like her, comparator D had not attained the grade of Associate Professor. She acknowledged that comparator D was promoted to the Competitive Retention Pathway Scheme. She pointed out, however, that the criteria for promotion under the scheme were the same as that (sic) in the main scheme. On the evidence adduced the complainant contends that the most likely reason for the impugned decision of the (Committee) was related to her gender. .... In advancing that contention the Complainant placed particular reliance on the following:-

- The absence of gender balance within the [Committee]
- That she in fact met all of the published criteria for promotion;
- That her qualification against those criteria equalled or exceeded those of her male comparators, who were promoted;
- The positive recommendations which her application received from the College Committee and her external referree and the assessors appointed by the Respondent;
- The absence of any transfer on the basis for the [Committee's] decision."

15. The Determination then sets out a summary of the evidence given on behalf of the respondent by Professor Scott, Dean of the School of Business and Law and a member of the Committee who had participated in the promotion exercise and the deliberations. He described how the Committee went about its deliberations and said that it normally "concentrates on the cumulative influence of the candidates' achievements to determine if they have reached the required standard of academic leadership in their particular field. In that process some criteria are weighted higher than others. Publications by the candidate in peer reviewed journals are considered particularly important as is the extent of the impact rate of their publications". He said that all candidates were expected to reach the same standard of achievement but there could be what he described as "a different intensity depending on the discipline" from which an applicant came.

16. In relation to the appellant's case, Professor Scott had given evidence that the Committee had not been satisfied "that the cumulative influence of the Complainant's achievements were sufficient to enable her to progress to the level of Professor". He maintained that the decision had been reached solely on the basis of the information provided in her application and denied that gender was a consideration in the process. He accepted that the only record of the deliberations of the Committee was the written statement of the results. No record was maintained of the discussion which lasted approximately one hour for each candidate and there was no marking system in place. The appellant had been represented by counsel who cross-examined Professor Scott.

17. The Determination then contains an extensive exposé of the legal principles which the Labour Court considered to govern the analysis it was required to undertake in such a case. Having quoted extensively from case law, the court listed eight relevant principles which it derived from that jurisprudence.

The Prima Facie Case Finding.

18. The Labour Court then sets out its analysis of the issues under the section headed "Discussion". This effectively comprises two parts in which the court first asked itself whether the complainant had established a prima facie case. On this it reaches a conclusion in the appellant's favour. It then in a second part considers the evidence offered by the University in rebuttal of the inference raised by the prima facie case.

19. In taking this approach the Labour Court was clearly influenced by the fact that the Equality Officer had dismissed the claim by concluding that not even a prima facie case of gender discrimination had been made out. That was therefore the first hurdle the appellant needed to overcome in the appeal.

20. In answering the question it thus posed itself, the Labour Court identified three factors. First, it noted that there was independent evidence that she did meet the required standards set by the scheme's criteria. She was recommended for promotion by her own College and the independent assessors nominated by the University supported her eligibility. It also noted that Professor Scott had said that the Committee placed considerable reliance on the report of the College Committee when making the assessment. The Determination then comments:-

> "These facts are at least suggestive of a degree of irrationality in the results of the selection process."

21. The second factor was the "gender composition" of the Committee which gave "rise to considerable disquiet". The fact that the Committee was comprised of twelve men and one woman was considered "inherently inimical to the achievement of full gender equality in access to senior appointments" within the University. The third factor was the absence of any minutes or notes of the content of the deliberations of the Committee in arriving at its decision.

22. The Determination then concludes on the question of a prima facie case as follows:-

> "While none of these considerations are (sic) determinative of the case, their cumulative effect must be sufficient to constitute facts from which discrimination can be inferred. The Equality Officer found that the Complainant had failed to make out a prima facie case of discrimination. On the evidence adduced in the course of the appeal the Court must respectfully disagree with that conclusion."

23. The court then introduced the second stage of its analysis by saying that as the complainant "has established facts from which discrimination may be inferred, in accordance with s. 85A of the Act the onus of proving the absence of discrimination shifts to the respondent. The Court must, therefore, carefully evaluate the evidence tendered by the Respondent to explain its decision not to promote the Complainant". It then asks itself the question: "Has the respondent rebutted the presumption of discrimination?"

24. Understandably, in presenting the appeal, counsel for the appellant acknowledged that there could be no quarrel with the approach adopted by the Labour Court up to this part of the Determination and submitted that the court had been entirely correct in deciding that the three factors raised an inference which had the effect of placing on the University the onus of explaining how the promotion decision had been reached without gender bias. As explained more fully below, counsel identified the point of law which constituted the basis of the present appeal as the Labour Court's acknowledgement that its role required a careful evaluation of the evidence tendered by the University to explain its decision not to promote the appellant. The Labour Court, he submitted, erred in law in failing to do exactly that.

25. Counsel for the University on the other hand relies strongly upon the fact that the present appeal is explicitly limited to one on a point of law in accordance with s. 90(1) of the Act of 1998 (as amended). She submits that the present appeal does not raise any point of law but is, in effect, a disguised attempt to reopen issues of fact with a view to obtaining a rehearing of the matter before the Labour Court. Before addressing the legal arguments which have been made, it is necessary to set out in more detail the manner in which the Labour Court analysed the issues and then answered the question it posed for itself namely, whether the evidence given and the explanation offered by the University rebutted the inference that the decision not to promote the appellant was tainted by gender discrimination.

26. The Determination first refers to case law indicating that:-

(a) Cogent evidence of "a non-discriminatory taint" is to be required – by which this Court understands, cogent evidence of the absence of a taint of discrimination;

(b) The court must be alert to the possibility of unconscious or inadvertent discrimination so that mere denials of discrimination in the absence of corroboration must be approached with caution; and

(c) That the decision to reject the complainant's application must be shown not to have been influenced to any degree beyond the mere trivial by considerations relating to her gender.

27. The Determination then outlines its assessment of the evidence given by Professor Scott. This assessment on pp. 13 and 14 of the Determination must, in the view of this Court, be read in conjunction with the summary of the testimony he gave before the Labour Court as set out at pp. 6 and 7 of the Determination.

28. The Labour Court described Professor Scott's evidence as having been "undoubtedly honest" and explicitly accepted its veracity. It describes the evidence he gave as being "comprehensive evidence concerning the process followed by the [Committee] and the underlying rationale for its decisions". He had explained that "in order to attain the standard required for promotion, candidates must demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the [Committee] that they have attained the highest standard of excellence and international academic leadership in their particular discipline". He said that "candidates are judged against predetermined objective criteria solely on the basis of the evidence disclosed in their application". As already stated, this assessment must, in the view of the Court, be read in conjunction with the more extended summary of the evidence as to how the deliberations were conducted. Professor Scott had said that the discussion on each application lasts for approximately one hour and is normally led by the external members. The Committee "normally concentrates on the cumulative influence of the candidate's achievements to determine if they have reached the required standard of academic leadership in their particular field".

29. On p. 13 the Labour Court then gave its assessment of the effect of the evidence:-

> "The import of that evidence was that the Complainant's application was decided upon solely by reference to the published criteria and that the members of the [Committee] came to the conclusion that she did not meet the standard necessary to warrant promotion."

30. Contrary to what might be inferred from some of the arguments on the part of the appellant, this constitutes, in the judgment of the Court, a clear finding of fact on the part of the Labour Court as to the basis upon which the Committee arrived at its decision. It must be borne in mind that the question under consideration by the Labour Court at that point was: how had the deliberations of the Committee been conducted so as to arrive at a result which appeared, on the face of it, to be inconsistent with the prima facie indication that she was considered to have met the required standards by both her own college, her referee, and the external assessors? In effect, the Labour Court in finding that an inference of possible gender discrimination had been raised was concerned to know what had actually happened that enabled a group comprised of twelve men and one woman to arrive at their decision without there being element of gender discrimination given that there was no first-hand minute or note of the deliberations.

31. The Labour Court did not, however, confine itself to relying upon the veracity and honesty of Professor Scott's description of the deliberations in concluding that the inference had been rebutted. It was explicitly conscious of the inadequacy of relying solely upon a declared denial of bias on the part of the decision-maker. It takes account of the fact that of the nineteen applicants, fifteen were men and four were women; while of the eight successful applicants, six were men and two were women. "This result is inconsistent with the conclusion that the [Committee] was subconsciously disposed to appoint men in preference to women. Moreover, in examining the results of the earlier promotion round in 2006, no evidence can be found of a discriminatory disposition on gender grounds on the part of the decision-makers".

32. In the judgment of this Court, what the Labour Court is there saying is that even if, notwithstanding the honesty and truthfulness of Professor Scott's description of the deliberations, the procedure had been tainted by some subconscious or inadvertent gender-based bias, the Labour Court would expect to see it manifested in some imbalance in the outcome of the procedure. The actual result, on the other hand, it finds is inconsistent with any subconscious disposition on the part of the Committee to promote men in preference to women; nor can such a tendency or pattern be discerned when the results are taken in conjunction with the results reached in the 2006 round.

33. It is on that basis, accordingly, that the Labour Court answers in the affirmative its question as to whether it is more probable than not that the appellant's gender had nothing to do with her failure to be promoted. The overall conclusion is then summarised and given in the final paragraph:-

> "For the reasons referred to herein the Court is satisfied that while the Complainant has made out a prima facie case of discrimination that the respondent discharged the onus which it bears and that it is more probable than not that the Complainant's gender was not a factor which influenced the decision not to appoint her to the post of Professor."

Grounds of Appeal.

34. As already indicated, notwithstanding the fact that, on the face of it, the Labour Court has based that final conclusion upon its assessment of the evidence of fact as to how the deliberations of the Committee were conducted and the basis upon which the rejection of the application was decided, it is submitted on behalf of the appellant that the Labour Court has erred in law. The specific grounds raised in the notice of appeal are expressed as follows:-

(a) The Labour Court erred in law in determining that having made out a prima facie case of discrimination that the appellant's gender was not a factor which influenced the decision not to appoint her to the post of Professor;

(b) The Labour Court failed to carry out any or any adequate probative analysis of the decision of the respondent to refuse to appoint the plaintiff to professorial status. In particular, the Labour Court failed to test the decision not to promote by reference to the evidence adduced as to the plaintiff's suitability by reference to the stipulated criteria. The Labour Court's statement that it would not substitute its decision for the UCAATP did not discharge its obligation to carry out a proper and thorough evaluation of the evidence;

(c) The Labour Court erred in law in failing to have or any proper regard to the weight of evidence adduced on behalf of the appellant;

(d) Having found that the appellant had raised a prima facie case of discrimination and having set out the reasons for that finding, the Labour Court failed to then examine each of the grounds to determine that there was no gender bias in the decision;

(e) Further, the Labour Court relied on limited statistical evidence in coming to its decision that there was not gender discrimination. The Labour Court failed to engage in a proper analysis of details and statistical information relevant to its determination to permit a proper evaluation as to whether there was indirect discrimination.

(f) The Labour Court misdirected itself on the limited statistical evidence adduced;

(g) The Labour Court failed to carry out any form/ any adequate form of comparative analysis as between the different candidates in respect of the contribution to academic journals and the other stipulated criteria;

(h) The Labour Court failed to have any adequate regard for the undisputed evidence of gender imbalance in the make up of the UCAATP."

35. While the basis of the appeal has been articulated in those grounds, the central thrust of the argument made by counsel for the appellant was essentially that once the Labour Court accepted that there was a prima facie case that discrimination had tainted the decision, it had an obligation in law to embark upon a more detailed assessment of the actual material which had been before the Committee and to make specific findings of fact by reference to that evidence. As he put it, the Labour Court was obliged to "roll up its sleeves" and "engage with" the statistical and other evidence which the appellant had put before it and against that material to test the evidence of Professor Scott. By failing to do so, the Labour Court had erred in its approach to the evaluation of evidence and thereby committed an error of law.

36. While recognising with some reluctance that the express terms of the conclusions reached in the Determination were based upon Professor Scott's factual evidence as to how the deliberations of the Committee were conducted, counsel for the appellant sought to characterise the issue as one of law by reference to a passage in the judgment of McCracken J. in the Supreme Court in National University of Ireland Cork .v Ahern & Ors [2005] 2 I.R. 577. The relevant passage is this:-

must be accepted by the High Court in any appeal from its findings. As a statement of principle, this is certainly correct. However, this is not to say that the High Court or this Court cannot examine the basis upon which the Labour Court found certain facts. The relevance, or indeed admissibility, of the matters relied on by the Labour Court in determining the facts is a question of law. In particular, the question of whether certain matters ought or ought not to have been considered the labour Court or ought or ought not to have been taken into account by it in determining the facts, is clearly a question of law and can be considered on an appeal under s. 8(3)." (This last reference is to the definition of "like work" in the Anti-Discrimination (Pay) Act 1974 since repealed and replaced by a corresponding provision in the 1998 Act.)

37. Counsel also called in aid an observation or admonition which appears in another judgment of the Supreme Court, that of Finlay C.J. in North Western Health Board v. Martyn [1987] I.R. 565 at 579:-

"If a party appealing the ruling or recommendations of an equality officer to the Labour Court seeks to put in issue any of the facts so found, they should unequivocally do so in their notice of appeal and, in turn, the Labour Court, upon the conclusion of its hearing, should in an unambiguous fashion state the facts which it has found and the evidence upon which it has found them."

38. Counsel for the appellant relies upon these authorities in submitting that the Labour Court in this instance has failed adequately to set out the facts upon which it relied in reaching its conclusion and has also erred in failing to take into account and to determine issues of fact that arose out of the conflict between the evidence and submissions made by the appellant before the Labour Court on the one hand and the evidence relied upon by the University on the other.

39. As counsel for the respondent correctly pointed out, it is important to bear in mind the context in which the statement by McCracken J. in the NUI Cork case was made. That case concerned a number of male security service employees of UCC who claimed discrimination upon the grounds that they were performing "like work" to that of female telephone switchboard operators employed in the college but were receiving lower rates of pay. The Labour Court, having compared the work done by the two sets of employees determined that there was "like work" and that the differences in rates of pay were not justified on grounds other than sex. In allowing the appeal and remitting the matter to the Labour Court the Supreme Court held that the Labour Court had failed to take into account all of the facts relevant to the comparison made between the duties of the male security operatives and the particular group of switchboard telephonists which had been put forward as comparators in the claim. The actual rates of pay received by the group in question were the same as those received by other fulltime telephonists, but the comparator group had had their duties reduced by the introduction of job sharing arrangements without any reduction in pay rates. It was on that basis that the Supreme Court held that there had been an error of law on the part of the Labour Court in failing to take into consideration all of the elements relevant to the issue as to whether the difference in remuneration was based on grounds of sex. At p. 584 McCracken J. explains:-

> "Clearly that difference in remuneration was not based on grounds of sex but on grounds of a policy of facilitating the family obligations of the comparators. This being so, the Labour Court ought then to have considered the question whether the difference in remuneration between the respondents and the comparators might have the same basis. The Labour Court failed to give any consideration whatever to the fact that the comparators worked shorter hours and lesser duties than their fulltime colleagues."

40. In the judgment of the Court the position in relation to the present appeal is materially different. As already pointed out above, the issue before the Labour Court in the second part of its assessment of the appeal was effectively this. Given the apparent imbalance in the composition of the Committee and the absence of any first-hand record of its deliberations, did the actual evidence given of those deliberations suffice to rebut the inference that otherwise arose? Answering that question did not, in the view of the Court, involve or require any necessary adjudication on the merits of the judgments made by the Committee on the appellant's promotion application. It was not the function of the Labour Court to decide whether the applicant's academic achievements and publications were at the level of excellence she maintained nor whether they were superior or inferior to those of other applicants. The judgments as to the degree to which the applicants met or exceeded the standard required by each of the designated criteria were qualitative judgments delegated exclusively to the specialised appraisal of the members of the Committee. Having, as it were, had its doubts raised by the apparent imbalance in the composition of the Committee and the absence of records of the deliberations, the Labour Court's concern was to be satisfied that the deliberations had not in fact been tainted by gender discrimination. It declared itself satisfied on that point by accepting as comprehensive, truthful and honest Professor Scott's account of the conduct of the deliberations combined with the absence of any contrary indication or pattern in the outcome of the 2007 round as well as in the preceding round of 2006.

41. In her appeal submissions before the Labour Court, the appellant had submitted that the Committee had "violated the principles of equality by applying the promotion procedure in a way that was deliberately prejudicial to her". This was based upon a number of grounds identified as: Competence, Bona Fides, Composition and Balance and an alleged Arbitrary, Non-transparent Application of the Criteria.

42. Under the heading of "Competence" the appellant had argued that the Committee was unbalanced in its composition not only because it had only one woman but because it lacked the expertise to evaluate her particular achievements in the area of business ethics. Of the thirteen members, only one was a business academic while nine members were drawn from the Colleges of Life Sciences and Engineering. These colleges are, she claimed, heavily male dominated especially at the senior level so that the composition misrepresented UCD's "staff community" and this was particularly prejudiced against the School of Business which did not have a single member on the Committee. The one business academic was an extern but his role is criticised by the appellant because "he was not an expert in Business Ethics/CSR/Social Issues in Management" so that the membership of the Committee was not competent to assess her application or to properly appreciate the recommendations of the external assessors or the referee and the report of the college committee.

43. Under the heading of "Bona Fides" the appellant referred to the flawed decision of the 2006 round and maintained that the unblocking of a backlog of promotions by the removal of the five year associate professorship condition had produced a result that the Committee was imposing an additional de facto condition on her application by requiring applicants for promotion to go from one level to the next without skipping a level. Thus, "previous discrimination against the complainant in promotion to associate professor prevented her from fulfilling this condition and thus constituted a discriminatory criterion". On that basis she claimed that the Committee had not approached her application with an objective and open attitude and in good faith.

44. In the judgment of the Court, the points raised under these headings did not give rise to any obligation on the part of the Labour Court to "delve into" the facts relied upon for the purpose of testing them against the evidence of Prof. Scott to any extent greater than that which appears in the text of the Determination. The arguments are, in effect, an attack upon the integrity of the individual members of the Committee and on their willingness to exercise their professional judgments objectively and in good faith. The fact that senior levels in the College of Life Sciences and Engineering may be "heavily male dominated" was not one that was in dispute but of itself it did not prove that the particular composition of this Committee was incapable of reaching an unbiased judgment upon the application. If the appellant had any justiciable grievances in respect of the academic competence of the Committee or the non-gender aspects of its composition or the alleged disguised continuation of the associate professor pre-condition, her remedy in law lay elsewhere and not in an appeal to the Equality Tribunal.

45. Under the heading of "Composition and Balance" the appellant made the more important and obvious argument based upon the fact that of the members of the particular Committee there was only one woman out of thirteen members. This, it was argued, constituted a "gross contravention of nationally prescribed guidelines designed specifically to prevent the kind of discrimination exhibited by UCD". This, of course, is the very point which the Labour Court accepted in reversing the decision of the Equality Officer. As indicated above, the Labour Court correctly treated the fact of that imbalance not as determinative of the case as a whole but of raising an inference which the University was then required to rebut.

46. Under the heading of "Arbitrary, Non Transparent Application of the Criteria" the appellant advanced a broad challenge to the Committee's conclusion that she did not meet the required standard of the five promotion criteria (see para. 10 above). The essential submission made was this:

> "It is submitted that in each of the five alleged shortcomings, the Committee failed to accept the evidence available to it on the Complainant's achievements. It is further submitted that the failure to do so can only be explained by the fact that [the Committee] does to sufficiently understand the complainant's area of expertise and her achievements and it was biased against her because of her gender".

47. Clearly, the appellant strongly disagreed with the consensus apparently reached by the Committee as to the level and quality of her academic accomplishments and standing. On a number of grounds she impugned their ability to reach a judgment on her career inconsistent with her own assessment and with the recommendations supportive of her application. For example, she identifies one of the external assessors as coming from an institution where one of the other applicants for promotion had worked and with whom the other applicant had co-authored a chapter in a book. This gave rise she alleged to a conflict of interest and the external assessor ought not to have been used for the assessment of that candidate's application. Whatever merit that criticism of the assessment of another candidate's application may have, it had no bearing upon the Committee's assessment of the appellant's application. The various applicants for promotion were not competing with one another and there was no limit on the number of promotions that might be granted. Even it could be said that the appellant's various criticisms of the competence of individual committee members; of their lack of appropriate academic background and of the defects alleged in the University's procedures for establishing membership of the Committee, had some merit or justification, it does not follow that the Committee so constituted was either in fact or in law incapable of determining the individual applications without gender bias. That was the issue which the Labour Court was required to determine on the appeal and not whether the appellant merited promotion in accordance with the designated criteria. In effect, the appellant assumed that because of the particular composition of the Committee and because she professed not to understand how it failed to accept her own evidence of meeting the designated criteria, that this constituted proof that the rejection of her application must necessarily be attributable to gender discrimination. The Labour Court was not concerned to determine as a matter of fact whether, for example, the Committee "did not understand sufficiently the Complainant's area of expertise". It was solely concerned to satisfy itself that the basis upon which the rejection had been decided by the Committee was untainted by gender bias.

48. Unlike the NUI Cork case, therefore, this is not an instance in which it has been demonstrated that the Labour Court wrongly ignored some factor or a piece of evidence relevant to the application of a statutory criterion or condition in the Act of 1998 (as amended). On the contrary, it is clear from the exposé of the evidence and material put before it by both sides that the Labour Court took account of all material considerations. It was argued that once the Committee had found that there was a prima facie case the Court was obliged to "engage with the evidence of Professor Scot" and "identify why there was no discrimination". In the judgment of the Court that is exactly what has been done in the Court's explicit finding based on its acceptance of that evidence as comprehensive, truthful and honest that the application had been decided "solely by reference to the published criteria" and that the appellant had been found not to "meet the standard necessary to warrant promotion".

49. In the terms of the Employment Equality legislation and of the well established practice and procedures of the Authority and the Labour Court in determining claims, the Court was effectively put on enquiry as to the possible presence of gender discrimination by the imbalance in the composition of the Committee combined with the absence of minutes of its deliberations. Nevertheless, in the particular circumstances of this non-competitive promotion scheme, the Labour Court was correctly concerned only to satisfy itself that the specific decision by this particular group of 12 men and one woman had not in fact been tainted by gender discrimination whether overt or subconscious. It did so by considering and appraising the first hand evidence given to it of what had actually taken place and by excluding the possibility that there existed some inconsistency in a pattern of results which would make a conclusion as to the presence of some institutional bias inescapable and thereby render the Committee's decision unlawful.

50. In the judgment of the Court no error of law has been made out and no point of law for appeal has been identified. In reality the arguments advanced amount to an assertion that the Labour Court should have come to a different conclusion on the factual evidence before it. In the absence of some element equivalent to that of the NUI-Cork case that does not constitute a point of law. That assessment is not altered by the use of a vague neologism to characterise the alleged flaw as a "failure to engage with the evidence".

51. For these reasons the appeal is rejected.

APPROVED TEXT

In the matter of the Employment Equality Act 1977: The Minister for Finance, Appellant v. The Civil and Public Service Union, The Public Service Executive Union and The Irish Municipal Public & Civil Trade Union, Respondents (No. 1) [2006] IEHC 14, [2004 No. 336 SP]

High Court 20th January, 2006

Practice and procedure – Res judicata – Estoppel – Jurisdiction issue raised in previous related proceedings between same parties – Whether issue res judicata between parties – Whether respondents estopped from raising plea based on jurisdiction.

Employment – Labour Court – Whether decision of Labour Court on preliminary issue constituted "determination of a dispute" – Whether Labour Court decision on preliminary issue capable of being appealed to High Court – Application of principles of statutory interpretation – Intention of Oireachtas – Employment Equality Act 1977 (No. 16), ss. 19(5) and 21(4) – Interpretation Act 2005 (No. 23), s. 5.

Section 19(5) of the Employment Equality Act 1977 provides that, save only where a reasonable cause can be shown, a reference to the Labour Court is to be lodged not later than six months from the date of the first occurrence of the alleged discrimination. Section 21(4) of the Act of 1977 states that a party to a dispute determined by the Labour Court may appeal to the High Court on a point of law.

The claimants lodged a reference to the Labour Court claiming that each of them had been unlawfully discriminated against by the appellant in relation to promotion. The issue of the delay in lodging complaints was dealt with as a preliminary issue by the Labour Court.

In January, 2002 the Labour Court ruled that reasonable cause had been shown for the delay. The appellant appealed to the High Court on a point of law under s. 21(4) of the Act of 1977. The respondents unsuccessfully argued, as a preliminary issue, that the High Court did not have jurisdiction, pursuant to s. 21(4) of the Act of 1977, to hear the appeal. By consent order of the High Court (Kelly J.) of the 13th December, 2002, the appeal in those proceedings was allowed and the matter remitted to the Labour Court.

In July, 2004 the matter having been remitted by the High Court, the Labour Court again found that the respondents had shown reasonable cause for the delay. The appellant lodged a fresh appeal in separate proceedings to the High Court against that decision. At the hearing, the respondent contended that the High Court did not have jurisdiction, pursuant to s. 21(4) of the Act of 1977, to hear the appeal on the basis that the decision of the Labour Court, the subject of the appeal, did not constitute the determination of a dispute within the meaning of that section. The appellant contended that the jurisdiction issue was res judicata having been determined by the High Court in the earlier proceedings between the parties arising out of the same claim.

Held by the High Court (Laffoy J.), in finding that the High Court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal, 1, that, where a party had accepted a decision in earlier proceedings on the issue of jurisdiction and had not exercised its right of appeal to the Supreme Court, it would be unfair to allow it to re-open that point in subsequent proceedings involving the same parties, in circumstances where the earlier and subsequent proceedings were to be regarded as a continuum. The jurisdiction issue was res judicata between the parties.

Kildare County Council v. Keogh [1971] I.R. 330 considered.

2. That, while technically there were two sets of proceedings, the instant proceedings and the earlier proceedings between the same parties did not in substance constitute separate litigation and were to be regarded as a continuum.

3. That, in any event, taking a purposive approach to the construction of s. 21(4) of the 1977 Act, as the court was now mandated to do by virtue of s. 5 of the Interpretation Act 2005, it was reasonable to assume that the Oireachtas envisaged that the Labour Court would manage its caseload in a sensible manner and that where a decision on a net issue might resolve a dispute that it would deal with that net issue as a preliminary point.

4. That it was also reasonable to assume that the Oireachtas had envisaged that where the Labour Court had dealt with such a net issue as a preliminary point, its decision would be appealable on a point of law without having to bring the reference to a final decision on the claim. Any other reading of s. 21(4) of the 1977 Act would seem to go against the clear intention of the Oireachtas that references in relation to discrimination issues should be dealt with in an expeditious and efficient manner.

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of Laffoy J., infra.

By special summons dated the 18th February, 2002, (2002 No. 80 SP), the appellant appealed pursuant to s. 21(4) of the Employment Equality Act 1977 against a decision of the Labour Court dated the 14th January, 2002. By notice of motion dated the 19th November, 2002, the respondents raised a preliminary issue in those proceedings as to whether the High Court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal. By order of the High Court (Kelly J.) of the 13th December, 2002, the respondents' motion was dismissed, the appeal was allowed by consent of the parties and the matter remitted to the Labour Court.

By decision of the 29th July, 2004, the Labour Court found in favour of the respondents. By special summons dated the 18th August, 2004, the appellant appealed to the High Court against that decision.

The appeal was heard by the High Court (Laffoy J.) on the 20th and 24th January, 2006. The respondents raised a preliminary issue as to whether the High Court had jurisdiction, pursuant to s. 21(4) of the Act of 1977, to hear the appeal.

Laffoy J. 20th January, 2006

1 I will rule now on the points raised before lunch. Although the special summons invokes s. 8(3) of the Anti-Discrimination (Pay) Act 1974, as I understand it, it is common case that this appeal is being prosecuted under s. 21(4) of the Employment Equality Act 1977 (the Act of 1977). That subsection provides as follows:-

> "A party to a dispute determined by the Court under subsection (2) or, in the case of such a determination in a matter referred under section 20, the Minister or a person concerned may appeal to the High Court on a point of law."

"The Court" in subs. (4) means the Labour Court. The respondents contend that this court does not have jurisdiction to hear this appeal under s. 21(4), because, it is contended, the decision of the Labour Court, the subject of these proceedings, was not the determination of a dispute within the meaning of s. 21(4).

2 The appellant contends that this court does have jurisdiction on two grounds. First, that the jurisdiction point has already been decided by Kelly J. in earlier proceedings between the parties arising out of the same claim. Those proceedings had Record No. 2002, No. 80 SP and the decision of Kelly J. was dated the 13th December, 2002.

3 That appellant contends that the jurisdiction issue is res judicata between the parties or, alternatively, that it would be unfair, inequitable and unjust to allow the respondents to reopen the jurisdiction issue which was decided by Kelly J. against the respondents.

4 Secondly, the appellant contends that, in any event, the decision of Kelly J. was correct and that the decision of the Labour Court of the 29th

July, 2004, the subject of these proceedings, was the determination of a dispute within the meaning of s. 21(4).

5 The decision of the Labour Court, which the appellant appeals against in these proceedings, was that the claimants, represented by the respondents, had shown reasonable cause under s. 19(5) of the Act of 1977 for not lodging their reference under s. 19 within six months from the date of the first occurrence of the act alleged to constitute discrimination.

6 The reference which relates to an allegation of discrimination by job sharers in the public service was brought following the decision of the European Court of Justice in Gerster v. Freistaat Bayern (Case C-1/95) [1997] E.C.R. I-5253 and has been before the Labour Court since 1998. The manner in which the reference was to be managed was the subject of a letter dated the 10th June, 1998, from the then Chairman of the Labour Court, Evelyn Owens. As I understand it, it was agreed by the parties that the issue of the time limit in s. 19(5), and, in particular, whether the clarification of the law in Gerster v. Freistaat Bayern constituted reasonable cause, would be dealt with as a preliminary issue by the Labour Court. This was done in a decision of the Labour Court of the 14th January, 2002.

6 That decision was the subject of the appeal which was before Kelly J. on the 13th December, 2002. On that appeal the respondents sought a preliminary ruling on a motion in terms recited in the order of Kelly J. as follows, referring to the notice of motion:-

> "… notice of motion on behalf of the respondents dated the 19th day of November, 2002, for a preliminary ruling on a point of law and for, inter alia, a declaration that the appellant's appeal is premature and that this court does not have jurisdiction to hear the said appeal and for the dismissal of the appeal."

That is the manner in which the issue was recited in the order.

8 Kelly J. heard the application and he dismissed the motion. When the appeal proceeded, at the suggestion of Kelly J., the parties considered whether the matter needed to be remitted to the Labour Court to establish a factual matrix for the issue as to reasonable cause. By consent, the appeal was allowed and the matter was remitted to the Labour Court. The first proceedings were then spent.

9 The matter was remitted for determination of the issue which was set out in the order of Kelly J. as follows:-

> "Whether or not in the light of the factual position as agreed or determined by the Labour Court in respect of all or any of the ten claimants, the decision of the European Court of Justice in Gerster v. Freistaat Bayern (Case C-1/95) [1997] E.C.R. I-5253 constituted reasonable cause to extend time within the meaning of s. 19(5) of the Employment Equality Act 1977."

It is the decision of the Labour Court on that issue which is the subject of this appeal.

10 I am of the view that the submission that the jurisdiction point is res judicata is well taken. This court is, of course, bound by the decision of the Supreme Court in Kildare County Council v. Keogh [1971] I.R. 330. The essence of the decision of the Supreme Court on the *res judicata/*estoppel issue in that case is stated as follows by Walsh J. at p. 342:-

> "If in litigation between parties in a court of competent jurisdiction a decision based upon a particular interpretation of an Act is given in favour of one of the parties, can that be the basis of an estoppel by judgment or otherwise in further and separate litigation between the same parties at a later stage in another court of competent jurisdiction so as to prevent the party who unsuccessfully contended in the first litigation for a particular construction of the Act from seeking to set up that construction again? In my view, the answer is 'No'."

I accept the submission of counsel for the appellant that this appeal and the earlier appeal should be regarded as a continuum and that, while technically that are two sets of proceedings, this appeal in substance is not separate litigation from the earlier appeal as being correct. In effect the respondents accepted the decision of Kelly J. They could have appealed to the Supreme Court against that decision, but they did not. They embarked on the process provided for in the order of Kelly J., which led to the decision of the 29th July, 2004 and to this appeal. It would, in my view, be unfair to allow them to re-open the jurisdiction point.

11 Apart from that, in any event, I am of the same view as Kelly J. on the issue as to whether the court has jurisdiction to hear the appeal. Section 21(4) provides for an appeal on a point of law and only on a point of law.

12 Taking a purposive approach to the construction of s. 21(4), which the court is now mandated to do by virtue of s. 5 of the Interpretation Act 2005, I think it is reasonable to assume that the Oireachtas envisaged that the Labour Court would manage its caseload in a sensible manner and that where a decision on a net issue might resolve the dispute that it would deal with the net issue as a preliminary point and decide it. I also think it is reasonable to assume that the Oireachtas envisaged that where the Labour Court adopted that approach its decision would be appealable on a point of law without having to bring the reference to a final decision on the claim. Any other reading of s. 21(4) would seem to go against the clear intention of the Oireachtas that references in relation to discrimination issues should be dealt with in an expeditious and efficient manner.

12 Therefore I rule that the court has jurisdiction.

THE HIGH COURT

[2006 No. 4124P]

P. ELLIOTT & COMPANY LIMITED

BUILDING AND ALLIED TRADES UNION

AND BY ORDER OF THE COURT

BRENDAN O'SULLIVAN, TONY O'FARRELL, ANDY SMITH, PAUL McCLOSKEY AND TOMMY LARKIN

DEFENDANTS

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Clarke delivered 20th October, 2006.

1. Introduction

1.1 The circumstances giving rise to an industrial dispute between the first named defendant ("BATU") and the plaintiff ("Elliott") are fully set out in a separate judgment which I have already delivered today, which judgment sets out in detail the reasons why I refused to make the interlocutory order sought by Elliott, but instead made a limited form of order.

1.2 For the reasons set out in that judgment I was not persuaded that Elliott had made out a case for an interlocutory injunction to restrain picketing generally. However, I was persuaded, again for the reasons set out in that judgment, that it was appropriate to grant a number of limited orders as to the manner of picketing. One of those orders concerns the composition of the picket. Nothing now turns on that aspect of the order.

1.3 The second order was in the following terms:-

"IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the defendants its servants or agents and all persons to whom knowledge or notice of this order might come be restrained pending the trial of this action from picketing in a manner that is not peaceful and/or that prevents any person from having reasonable access to the premises of the plaintiff company".

1.4 It is now contended that there have been breaches of that order which amount to a contempt. In addition it is said that the actions of BATU, and indeed the individual defendants, are such as would now justify granting the order originally refused which would be to the effect of restraining picketing altogether.

2.1 Elliott contends that acts of contempt took place on various dates between 15th and 19th September, 2006. As a result of those allegations an application for the abridgement of time for service of this application was made on 20th September, 2006.

2.2 That application was granted and the motion was directed by this court (Abbott J.) to be returnable for 22nd September, 2006. On that occasion Abbott J. made an order joining the second to sixth named defendants ("the personal defendants") to the proceedings and adjourned the application in relation to contempt to Monday 25th September. On that occasion the defendants sought time to file affidavits in reply to those filed in support of the motion, and an arrangement was entered into between the parties that all pickets would be lifted, on a without prejudice basis, pending the hearing of the matter which was then listed to go on before me on Thursday 28th September. On that date it became clear that there were significant disputes on the facts between the parties which, at least on one view, had to be resolved in order that the issue of contempt could be properly decided. For those reasons it was necessary to conduct an oral hearing which took place on 5th October.

2.3 This judgment is, therefore, concerned with dealing with the issues which arose on the contempt application and also with the question of whether it is now appropriate to grant a wider injunction that that originally decided on. I propose dealing with the contempt issue first as a resolution of some of the matters which arise in that contempt issue is of significance in relation to the injunction question. I turn first to the legal principles applicable to this aspect of the case.

3. Contempt/Legal Principles

3.1 Happily there is no significant dispute between counsel as to the appropriate legal principles which should be applied. Firstly it is accepted that the facts alleged to constitute contempt of the court's order must be established beyond reasonable doubt. Reference was made to National Irish Bank v. Graham [1994] 1 I.R. 215 where the dicta of Lord Denning MR in Re Bramblevale Limited [1970] 1 Ch. 128 was approved. The same principle is also clear from Bridgewater v. Jemma Allan and Robert Walters Limited (Unreported, High Court, Laffoy J., 12th May, 2005).

3.2 Counsel for Elliott submitted that the required intention to commit a contempt of a civil order is established where it is shown that the defendant concerned knowingly (but not necessarily wilfully) disregarded the court's order. Therefore, it is said, there will be contempt of an order where the person concerned deliberately does an act and knows of the court order even if they are not aware that the act concerned is in breach of the court order. Reliance in that regard was placed on Director General of Fair Trading v. Smiths Concrete [1991] 4 All E.R. 150.

3.3 In the course of debating the issue with counsel it was agreed on both sides, and I agree, that there is one refinement to that position that needs to be noted. Courts strive to ensure that orders made are clear in their terms. It is particularly important in cases where a party may be exposed to the risk of severe sanction for breach of an order that it be clear to that party what they can, cannot or must do. However despite the best efforts of all concerned it does remain the case that on certain occasions it may not be absolutely clear as to what is or is not within the scope of a binding order of the court. In those circumstances I am satisfied that, having regard to the penal nature of the contempt jurisdiction, a party could not be said to be in contempt of a court order where, objectively speaking, there was reasonable doubt as to whether the actions complained of came within or without the scope of the order concerned. I should emphasise that, in my view, the relevant test is an objective one. Would a reasonable and informed person, having had sight of the court order, come to the view that the acts complained of were legitimate having regard to that order.

3.4 On the facts of this case there is no dispute but that BATU, as a party represented at the hearing which gave rise to the order, was aware of the contents of the order. Furthermore none of the personal defendants allege that they were unaware of the terms of the order. Therefore on the facts of this case, the contempt issue must be approached on the basis that each of the defendants were aware of the terms of the order.

3.5 Elliott also alleges, relying on Howitt Transport Limited and Another v. Transport and General Workers Union (1973) IRLR 25 (a decision of the then United Kingdom, National Industrial Relations Court), that a trade union is under an obligation to ensure compliance by its members with the terms of an order made against it. In general terms I accept that that proposition represents the law in this jurisdiction. It should, of course, be subject to a reasonableness test. It is not open to the officers and managing bodies of a trade union (anymore than other body) to guarantee that each and every member of an organisation will act in a particular way. Trade unions should not, therefore, be seen as a guarantor of its members actions. However it does seem to me that a trade union which is subject to a court order, is bound to take all reasonable steps to ensure that not only it and its officers but also its members, where possible, comply with the terms of the order.

Against those legal principles it is necessary to turn to the specific issues of contempt alleged in this case.

4. The Alleged Contempt

4.1 In general terms Elliott puts forward two contentions which, it says, establish a breach of the order. They are:-

(a) it is said that persons have been prevented from having reasonable access to Elliott's premises at its site at Clare Hall, Malahide, Co. Dublin; and

(b) it is said that in certain respects the conduct of each of the defendants has been such that it amounts to intimidation and, therefore, that the picketing is not peaceful.

4.2 By way of background to a consideration of those allegations it should be noted that it appears to be common case that a decision was taken by BATU to confine picketing to the Clare Hall site. The stated reason, given in evidence by the second named defendant ("Mr. O'Sullivan"), who is assistant General Secretary of BATU, was that it was considered desirable to confine picketing to one site so that there would, at all times, be at least one senior official of the union present so as to ensure that the picketing was carried out in a proper fashion. I accept Mr. O'Sullivan's evidence in that regard.

4.3 It should also be noted that the allegations relate to both the general method of picketing employed and to certain specific occasions. There is a material conflict in the evidence concerning both those general and specific allegations. However a certain amount of the facts are not in dispute. It would appear that in the early days of the strike action (and extending for a number of days after the court order was made) quite significant numbers appeared on the picket lines. In general terms the method adopted was that the picketers moved in a circle in or around the entrance to Elliott's premises. When persons or vehicles were stopped, they were spoken to (normally by a paid official of the union) and if the person concerned indicated a desire to go on to the premises they were not, ultimately, prevented from so doing. It also appears to be the case that on most occasions the person concerned was also spoken to by a representative of Elliott who sought to persuade them to pass the picket.

4.4 The areas of factual dispute which arise relate to the extent to which the picketing, in effect, prevented persons from going on to the premises without having to stop and be spoken to by BATU officials. In addition, it is said that, while no person who indicated a willingness was, ultimately, prevented from so doing, there was considerable delay in facilitating entry to those who indicated such a desire. Those issues are the subject of dispute to which I will have to return.

4.5 The specific instances which I have mentioned concern an incident involving a vehicle owned by Limestone Construction and a number of separate incidents involving vehicles owned by Goode Concrete. I will return to the question of the Goode Concrete allegations in due course as additional issues arise in respect of that company. However, on the preponderance of the evidence, I am satisfied that what occurred in respect of the Limestone Construction vehicle was that it stopped at the picket line at which stage the driver (who was a non-national with at least some difficulty with English) was invited not to pass the picket. There is nothing in the evidence to suggest that the driver was spoken to in anything other than a normal and peaceful manner. The driver sought an opportunity to consult with his superiors and made a phone call in that regard. It would appear that, as a result of that phone call, the driver was instructed not to pass the picket and departed. There is nothing in the evidence which, in my view, would lead to the view that the manner in which the Limestone Construction vehicle was stopped was any different from the normal practice adopted at the picket line. That general issue falls, in my view, therefore, to be considered along with the rest of the evidence concerning the manner in which the picket was conducted.

4.6 In relation to that general evidence I have paid particular regard to the testimony of Darren Kelly who is employed by Elliott as a foreman at the site. Mr. Kelly impressed me as a competent and fair witness. While it is true to state that Mr. Kelly was not present in the early days of the strike (and indeed for a couple of days immediately after the court order) the account which he gave of the manner in which picketing was conducted leads me to the conclusion that while the picketers were moving at most times the way in which the picket was organised was such that vehicles approaching the site did not really have any option but to stop and converse with union officials prior to entering the site. I also accept Mr. Kelly's evidence concerning what typically happened after the driver of a vehicle had indicated an intention to enter onto the site. I am satisfied that there was a slow retreat by those involved on the pickets so as to permit vehicles concerned to enter onto the site.

4.7 I am not satisfied that this latter aspect of the case amounts to a breach of the order. While it would, undoubtedly, be preferable if the entrance was clear or if there was a relatively speedy clearing of the entrance as soon as any person gave an indication that he or she wished to enter, I am not satisfied (and most certainly not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt) that anything occurred which amounted to a significant impairment of the ability of persons to enter the site very soon after they had indicated a wish so to do. The fact remains that no person who gave such an indication, actually failed to get onto the site. Insofar as it is possible to tell from the evidence it would not seem that anyone was delayed by much more than a minute to 90 seconds. I could not, in those circumstances, conclude that that aspect of the procedure adopted amounted to a breach of the order.

4.8 Before leaving that aspect of the case I should note (and this is an issue to which I will return) that a new method of mounting the picket was adopted, when pickets were re-imposed after the brief removal of pickets while a replying affidavit was being filed. There can be little doubt but that that new method is far preferable to that which was being adopted in the past. In that context I should note that the evidence made clear that BATU did not have any guidelines or recommendations in place to govern the method of picketing either generally or in this case. Given the obligation to use best endeavours to ensure compliance with a court order it would be desirable if such a document were produced. While the decision to confine picketing to one location where there would always be a union official present was sensible, and is to be commended, it would be a useful additional safeguard if those having control on the ground of a picket had clear instructions as to the manner in which the picket should be conducted in accordance with law. In that regard those advising on the contents of such guidance might usefully refer to Broome v. DPP [1974] AC 587.

4.9 That leads to the question of the way in which vehicles were stopped so as to enable representations to be made to the driver concerned. I have come to the view that that method, as it generally operated, and as given in evidence by Mr. Kelly, does amount to a breach of the order. Persons on a picket line are obviously entitled to seek to communicate with those who might wish to enter the site for the purposes of attempting to persuade them not to pass the picket. Equally those persons, whether they arrive on foot or in a vehicle, are entitled to pass the picket and are equally entitled not to listen any representations if they do not wish to do so. I am satisfied that the way in which the picket was organised created a situation where those arriving by vehicle were effectively stopped from entering until such time as union officials had an opportunity to speak to them.

4.10 It was accepted by counsel for BATU that such a practice was not permissible. Broome is, indeed, ~~indeed~~ authority for such a proposition. That concession was, of course, made in the context of their being evidence presented on behalf of BATU which suggested that no such obstruction had taken place.

4.11 In addition to that evidence there was also testimony tendered on behalf of Elliott by Mr. Michael O'Dwyer which would have suggested that the level of obstruction went beyond that described by Mr. Kelly. I am not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that any obstruction went as far as Mr. O'Dwyer contended. I am, however, satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the method of picketing was generally as described by Mr. Kelly. On that basis I am satisfied that there was a breach of the order. I am also satisfied that a reasonable, informed, and objective interpretation of the order makes clear that any form of obstruction which would prevent persons, who did not wish to be addressed by union officials, from entering the premises until they had being subject of an attempt to persuade them not to enter, is in breach of the "reasonable access" requirement in the order. I am therefore satisfied that the necessary ingredients for a contempt of the order have been made out in that limited respect.

4.12 Before going on to the other aspects of contempt contended for, I should say that it seems to me that the contempt which I have found under this heading is at the lower end of the scale. In that context I have also had regard to evidence to the effect that on a number of occasions the Gardaí were called, but that no issue seems to have been taken by the Gardaí with the manner in which the picket was being conducted other than to request the moving of some vehicles. While it is, of course, the case that the Gardaí are concerned with the implementation of the public law rather than the precise parameters of a court order, it is clear, on the evidence, that the Gardaí read the court order and had no concerns. It would be surprising if it were the case that the picket was being conducted in a manner which could be described as intimidatory, abusive, or significantly obstructive, that some Garda action might not have been at least contemplated.

4.13 Under the second heading it is alleged that the picketing was not peaceful in two respects. The first allegation concerns issues which arose in the context of Goode Concrete to which I have already referred. It would appear that the first vehicle which arrived from Goode Concrete was also driven by a non-national who had limited English. That person was stopped in the ordinary way and it does not seem to me that the circumstances surrounding him being stopped differ from the general circumstances which I have already concluded amounted to a contempt. A similar situation applies to the later arrivals of Goode Concrete vehicles. However the driver of the first vehicle contacted his employers for instructions. What is different about this instance is that it would appear that a series of phone calls were made both by Mr. O'Sullivan and by the fourth named defendant ("Mr. Smith") (who is also a full-time union official) to Goode Concrete which, at a minimum, suggested that Goode Concrete employees should not pass the picket. There is, however, a serious conflict of evidence as to whether threats were issued in the course of those phone calls to the effect that an attempt would be made to black Goode Concrete on any other sites where BATU members were employed, if Goode Concrete instructed its drivers to pass the picket.

4.14 I am not satisfied that, even if true, the matters contended for could, objectively speaking, be regarded as a breach of the court order. It may well be that the phone calls concerned happened to be made from the vicinity of the picket line. The calls may also have related to the question of whether the picket should be passed. However the calls were not part of the picketing itself. Even if I am wrong in that view it seems to me that the order is not sufficiently clear as to prohibiting inappropriate third party contact as could reasonably lead me to conclude that there was a contempt by breach of the order in respect of these issues even if the factual allegation made by Elliott were found to be true. In the circumstances it seems to me that it would be inappropriate to reach a conclusion (which would have to be reached beyond reasonable doubt) on these factual issues which may, on one view, arise on another occasion and may require to be dealt with on the balance of probabilities. I, therefore, express no view as to the competing factual accounts. However the plaintiff's evidence in respect of these matters is a factor that I should properly take into account while considering whether to extend the nature of the injunction in place.

4.15 The second aspect of the allegation that picketing was other than peaceful concerns an incident which, on the evidence, involved a car being driven by a person who was not associated with BATU or the strike. In the circumstances it does not seem to me that those facts could amount to a contempt on any view. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether, after the car concerned had gone close to injuring Mr. O'Dwyer, Mr. O'Sullivan may have made an unfortunate comment. Even if he made such a comment it would not, it seems to me, amount to a contempt of the court order and it is, therefore, unnecessary to determine whether he made the comment concerned.

5. Conclusions on Contempt

For those reasons I am satisfied that a contempt of my previous order has been made out but only in the limited respect identified relating to the way in which vehicles were prevented from gaining access without first speaking to union officials. For the reasons which I have also set out above, it seems to me that the contempt concerned is on the lesser end of the scale. I had indicated, at the close of the hearing, that in any event I had come to the view that committal for contempt would not be warranted on foot of any aspects of the case where I regarded it as possible that I might reach a conclusion, after consideration, that a contempt had occurred. I will, however, hear counsel and, in particular counsel for BATU and the personal defendants, further as to the precise course of action I should take in the light of the above finding.

6. The Injunction

6.1 It was accepted by counsel for Elliott that in considering whether a wider injunction (including a complete prohibition on picketing) should now be put in place, I should have regard, not just to the views which I formed as to the events which gave rise to the contempt hearing, but that I must also have regard to whether there was a reasonable fear that further breaches would occur which necessitated the court adopting a different view in relation to the order which should be in place. While, in the ordinary way, a court should not restrain picketing where that picketing is legally justified, simply because there have been instances of an abuse of the right to picket – in those cases the court should lean towards restraining only the unlawful activity while permitting the lawful picketing to continue – there may be cases where the manner in which picketing is conducted is so far from that which can be said to come within legal bounds that the only reasonable remedy which the court could impose would be to prohibit the picketing altogether.

6.2 Looked at another way if, notwithstanding that there is a right to picket on an occasion in question, those who have that right so abuse it by the manner in which picketing is conducted, it may be that it is open to the court to prohibit picketing completely, as the only effective means by which compliance with the law can be insured. It is clear, however, that counsel for Elliott is correct when he conceded that, in order for a court to come to such a view, it would be necessary that the court would be satisfied that there were reasonable grounds for fearing that significant breaches of the manner in which picketing should properly be conducted would be likely to occur into the future. An injunction is not a punishment for past wrong - it is designed to prevent future illegality.

6.3 For two reasons I am not satisfied that it is not the case here that there is an established risk of future general illegal picketing. Firstly the level of breach which I have found is, for the reasons indicated, on the lower end of the scale. Secondly, as I pointed out, the picketing which is currently occurring seems to be entirely unobjectionable. Provided picketing continues in that way, and there is no evidence from which I could reasonably conclude that it will not, it would not be unlawful. Imposing a complete prohibition on picketing would, therefore, in my view, be a disproportionate response to the breach which I have found.

6.4 However, in one respect it does seem to me that there are at least arguable grounds for suggesting that there have been wider breaches of BATU's obligations than were apparent at the time of the interlocutory hearing. If the evidence given by witnesses tendered on behalf of BATU in respect of the Goode Concrete incident had been before me on the occasion when the interlocutory injunction was heard (and of course the relevant incidents had not occurred at that time) I would have been persuaded to extend the injunction to one which limited BATU, or any one having notice of the order, from communicating with third party employers in relation to the industrial action. I am therefore prepared to grant a further limited injunction in that regard. However I have not, as yet, had the opportunity of hearing the views of counsel as to the precise form of any such injunction and I will hear counsel further as to an appropriate formulation.

ASILO COMMERCIAL LIMITED

TRADING AS ELY HQ

DEFENDANT

JUDGMENT DELIVERED BY MR. JUSTICE MC GOVERN

ON FRIDAY, 5TH DECEMBER 2008

JUDGMENT WAS DELIVERED AS FOLLOWS ON FRIDAY, 5TH DECEMBER 2008

REGISTRAR: Tom Doyle V. Asilo Commercial Limited. 10:41

MR. JUSTICE McGOVERN: This is an application for an Interlocutory Injunction in which the Plaintiff claims the following reliefs:

1. An injunction restraining the Defendant, its servants or agents from dismissing the Plaintiff from his employment with the Defendant pending the trial of this action or until further order. 10:41

2. ~~Two~~ An injunction restraining the Defendant, its servants or agents from the giving effect to the purported dismissal of the Plaintiff and from stopping the payment of his salary and benefits. 10:41

3. An injunction restraining the Defendant, its servants or agents from taking any steps to fill the position in which the Plaintiff has been employed, namely that of Head Chef in Ely HQ, Hanover Quay in Dublin 2. 10:41

4. An injunction restraining the Defendant, its servants or agents from announcing or publishing in any way the purported termination of the employment of the Plaintiff

5. An injunction restraining the Defendant, its servants or agents from treating the Plaintiff other than as continuing to be employed by the Defendant pending the trial of this action or until further order. 10:42

6. An injunction directing the Defendant to pay to the Plaintiff his salary, expenses, bonuses, perquisites and all emoluments connected with his employment. And then further or other relief. 10:42

The Defendant company operates a restaurant premises know as "Ely HQ" at Hanover Quay in Dublin. The Defendant has some related companies which own other restaurants under the brand name of "Ely" elsewhere in the City. The Plaintiff was employed by the Defendant in September 2006 as Head Chef. He was initially employed at a salary of €40,000 on a one year contract. When that contract expired he was then retained on a salary of €55,000 per annum. A contract was drawn up but the Plaintiff never signed it. The Plaintiff does not dispute the fact that the contract exhibited by the Defendant in an affidavit is in the same terms as that which was offered to him after his initial one year contract had expired. He says, however, that he did not accept that contract and that he continued to work under the original contract. The Defendant disputes this. 10:42 10:43 10:43

In the summer of 2007, all the chefs employed by the Defendant and their related companies in other restaurants were asked to submit recipes for a cookery book contemplated by the Defendant. The Plaintiff submitted between 25 and 30 recipes for that book and says that approximately 5 had already appeared on the Ely HQ menu. The Plaintiff says that on several occasions he made informal inquiries concerning royalties and copyright entitlement but never received an answer. The Defendants say that he never raised such an issue, other than in an e-mail of 27th November 2008, in the course of which he said: 10:43 10:44 10:44

> "I genuinely presumed that there would be an appropriate acknowledgment for my input in the book, both in terms of accreditation and financial."

I should point out that in the commencement of the book, which was ultimately published, the Plaintiff and other chefs who had contributed were given mention. 10:44

The parties agree that the second contract was offered to the Plaintiff in or around September 2007. While the Plaintiff does not accept that he was bound by that agreement because he never signed it he did continue to work for the Defendant at an increased salary of €55,000 per annum. He says that he refused to sign the second contract because it included a clause which sought to remove his entitlement to any copyright in 10:45 menus composed by him and used outside his employment. It can be inferred from this that he had read the second contract.

> "Copyright: All written material, whether held on paper, electronically or magnetically, which is made or acquired by you during the course of your employment with us is our property and our copyright. At the time of termination of your employment with us or at any other time upon demand you 10:46 shall return to us any such material in your possession."

The Plaintiff's affidavit clearly states that he refused to sign the contract, but it is not clear whether he made his objections known to the Defendant. 10:46 He says that he did and the Defendant denies this.

In connection with the publication of the cook book, the Defendant furnished chefs in their employment with an employee release form, which was intended to protect 10:46 the Defendant from any future claims made by any of their chefs in connection with recipes that were published in the book or photographs of them in the book. Each form contained the name of the employee and other details and then contained the clause: 10:46

> "I hereby give authorisation and grant my consent to the use of content and recipes written by myself, along with photographs featuring myself for inclusion in the above named for the usage/time period and media specified above by Ely and its agents or representatives."

And then there was some other material which isn't relevant and then it went on to say:

> "I understand that I have no interest in the copyright nor any moral rights in the photograph. I am over 18 years of age."

The Plaintiff was requested on a number of occasions to sign this document but refused to do so. Having refused to do so after a number of requests he was dismissed. 10:47

The exhibits to the affidavits indicate that there were other issues which also gave rise to his dismissal, such as an unwillingness to follow the Defendant's policy on the direction that the menu needed to be taken in order for the business to survive and issues concerning his lack of attendance at key times of business and an allegation of a general lack of interest and his failure to fulfil his role as Head Chef. 10:47 10:48

What emerges from the minutes of meetings held in November 2008 is that strains were developing between the Plaintiff and the Defendant over these various issues and this was taking place against a background of difficult trading conditions for the Defendant. 10:48

The Defendant accepts that it dismissed the Plaintiff for gross misconduct. It says that the gross misconduct was the continuing refusal to carry out legitimate instructions.

The Defendant has produced a number of authorities which suggest that where a work is made by an employee in the course of employment, the employer is the first owner of any copyright in the work, subject to an agreement to the contrary. The Plaintiff has not produced any authority which satisfies me that he had a legal right to copyright in the recipes produced by him for the cookery book.

The principles applicable to the granting of an interlocutory injunction have been crystallised in a number of decisions, namely the American Cyanamid Company V. Ethicon Limited case, 1975 Appeal Cases 396, and in this jurisdiction in Campus Oil Limited V. Minister For Industry and Energy (No. 2) [1983] IR 88. I have been referred to the case of Mahalingam V. Health Service Executive, the unreported Supreme Court judgment of 4th October, 2005, in which Fennelly J. dealt with the issue of injunctions of the type sought by the Plaintiff in this case. In this case the Plaintiff claims that the dismissal was null and void and that he should have been reinstated. He has already been dismissed and in substance what he is seeking here is a mandatory injunction reinstating him pending the determination of the dispute. A letter of dismissal for gross misconduct was a furnished to the Defendant. Now, it is not clear when this was furnished and the evidence suggests that it may only actually have come to his attention in the course of hearing in this Court over the past two days. But it does refer to the fact that the Plaintiff has a right of appeal against the decision if he wishes to appeal it and that he should write to Mr. Eric Robinson and Ms. Michelle Robinson within five days, giving full reasons as to why he believes the disciplinary action was either inappropriate or too severe. 10:50 10:51

For all practical purposes, the Plaintiff has appealed by bringing these proceedings to the Court so the issue of any right of appeal which exists in that letter is somewhat moot in view of the fact that he has brought this application where he is challenging in the courts his dismissal. 10:51

In the Mahalingam case Fennelly J. stated: 10:51

> "The implication of an application of the present sort is that in substance what the Plaintiff appellant is seeking is a mandatory interlocutory injunction and it is well established that the ordinary test of a fair case to be tried is not sufficient to meet the first leg of the test for the grant of an interlocutory injunction where the injunction sought is in effect mandatory. In such a case, it is necessary for the applicant to show, at least, that he has a strong case that he is likely to succeed at the hearing of the action. So, it is not 10:51 > sufficient for him simply to show a prima facie case and, in particular, the courts have been slow to grant interlocutory injunctions to enforce Contracts of Employment. None of this is to deny that there have been developments in the law in recent years."

I should point out that in the case before me the Plaintiff is effectively seeking a mandatory injunction because he has already been dismissed.

In the case of Bergin V. Galway Clinic, a judgment of Mr. Justice Clarke delivered on 2nd November, 2007, the Judge said: 10:52

> "There have been a significant number of decisions over the last number of years, both of this court and to a lesser extent of the Supreme Court, in relation to what might loosely be called employment injunctions. I think it is fair to state that this area of jurisprudence of the courts is in a state of evolution and the precise current state of that jurisprudence is far from clear." 10:53

He went on to state that the reason for the lack of clarity is because so many cases settle before the hearing of the substantive issues. But I accept that the law relating to the enforcement of Contracts of Employment has broadened somewhat in recent years and that in cases of summary dismissal the employer has to apply fair procedures and the old regime, where the courts were very slow to entertain injunction applications relating to Contracts of Employment, has certainly broadened and moved on. 10:53 10:53

I have to stress that in dealing with this application I am not dealing with the substantive issues raised in the case but I am only dealing with the motion for an interlocutory injunction. 10:54

It seems to me that when some of the meetings took place in November of this year that by that time the Plaintiff had the benefit of legal advice because he did say that he would attend a disciplinary meeting under protest even though he was told he could not have his solicitor present, although he was entitled to have a fellow employee with him. 10:54

The Plaintiff has not produced authority at this interlocutory hearing that he was entitled to copyright in the recipes which he prepared and allowed to be used in the book. In my view, if he is not entitled to copyright then prima facie the employer was acting reasonably in requiring him to sign the employee release form. 10:54 10:55

On the Plaintiff's own case, he had taken a position of opposition to doing so for many months prior to the commencement of these proceedings. It is the Plaintiff who asserted the legal right of copyright, or at least raised the issue in a manner which the suggested he was doing so, and the burden of proving that he had copyright rests with him. There is a dispute between 10:55

the Plaintiff and the Defendant as to when he first raised this issue. What is clear and beyond dispute is that around the time of the publication of the book he was making the case that he was entitled to refuse to sign the release form and was also maintaining that he was entitled to some financial reward for his input. The Defendant says that the Plaintiff had ample time to make this case and assert a legal entitlement before he took these proceedings but that he failed to do so until the last minute before publication of the book. It seems to me that this is a reasonable point. 10:55 10:56

The evidence suggests that there has been an irretrievable break down in the relationship between the Plaintiff and the Defendant and, in those circumstances, the courts should be slow to impose a Contract of Employment on the Defendant. Since these proceedings commenced the Defendant has offered the Plaintiff the statutory period of two weeks notice, in an open letter which was designed to resolve this matter and to save costs. The Plaintiff has repudiated that offer, and he was entitled to do so. In my view, this is something which will go to the issue of costs when the matter is finally determined. 10:56 10:56

The Defendant argues that the Plaintiff is in reality trying to run a case in the High Court which is more appropriate to the Employment Appeals Tribunal and that what he is claiming is that his dismissal was unfair.

There is ample authority for the proposition that under employment law a Contract of Employment may be terminated by an employer on the giving of reasonable notice to the employee. The employer is entitled to give that notice so long as he complies with the contractual obligation of reasonable notice, whatever his reasons for giving the notice. It is not the function of the courts to substitute itself for the employer and to make its own decision on the merits of employer's decision to dismiss. As Mummery LJ stated in Foley V. The Post Office [2000] ICR 1283 at page 1295:

> "The employer, not the Tribunal is the proper person to conduct the investigation into alleged misconduct. The function of the tribunal is to decide whether that investigation is reasonable in the circumstances and whether the decision to dismiss, in the light of the results of that investigation, is a reasonable response."

10:58

In this case, it seems to me that damages are an adequate remedy for the Plaintiff. On the issue of balance of convenience and balance of hardship, I cannot ignore the fact that there has been an irretrievable breakdown of trust between the Plaintiff and the Defendant and that it would impose an undue burden on the Defendant if it was obliged to reinstate the Plaintiff pending the determination of this dispute. I emphasise again that I am not determining the dispute between the parties at that stage.

However, for the reasons set out above I refuse the application for interlocutory relief.

END OF JUDGMENT

MR. DOWLING: I apply for my costs.

MR. QUINN: Judge, i would ask you to reserve the costs of the trial. Obviously, as the Court has indicated, there are issues that can only be fully determined at the 10:59 plenary hearing and in those circumstances, I think, in the particular circumstances of this interlocutory application it would be appropriate to reserve the costs.

MR. JUSTICE McGOVERN: Yes, I will reserve the 10:59 costs in this case. I am going to hand back the papers in the matter, including the cook book.

MR. QUINN: I am tempted to keep that. I wonder would it be 10:59 appropriate to seek directions in relation to an early trial? Obviously, there is an urgency now for the Plaintiff that he paid his salary.

MR. JUSTICE McGOVERN: Yes. I think there should be an early trial, 10:59 obviously.

MR. DOWLING: I think that is sensible. So, if my friend wants to deliver a Statement of Claim.

MR. JUSTICE McGOVERN: I don't know when the next chancery list of fixed dates is. Does anybody know that?

MR. QUINN: I think it may be next week, Judge. Next Wednesday, Judge. 11:00

MR. JUSTICE McGOVERN: What I will do is I will direct that the matter be listed with priority in the next chancery list of fixed dates, with a view to getting an early trial. 11:00

MR. QUINN: I would certainly deliver my Statement of Claim within a week.

MR. DOWLING: Well, if it going to be in the chancery list to fix dates without completely rushing things. There has been a fairly substantive expedition of these issues. If Mr. Quinn delivers his Statement of Claim by Monday I will have mine, my Defence, to him by close of business on Tuesday. I think the judge will be very slow to list it next Wednesday. 11:00

MR. JUSTICE McGOVERN: I think so, yes. If you have your Statement of Claim delivered by close of business on Monday. And you say you can have your defence delivered by close of business on Tuesday? 11:00

MR. DOWLING: Close of business on Tuesday.

MR. JUSTICE McGOVERN: And any notices for particulars arising out of those pleadings can take place then in due course.

MR. DOWLING: I think that can be done by Wednesday.

MR. JUSTICE McGOVERN: Very good. 11:00

2008 Record No.3521 P

MARTIN DONNELLAN

THE MINISTER FOR JUSTICE, EQUALITY AND LAW REFORM,

THE COMMISSIONER OF AN GARDA SÍOCHÁNA,

IRELAND AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

DEFENDANTS

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice William M. McKechnie delivered on the 25th day of July 2008

Background:

1. This case raises an important point for the management and senior ranks of An Garda Síochána. On the 7th June 2008, the plaintiff, who then held the commission rank of Assistant Commissioner in An Garda Síochána, was retired from the force by reason of having reached his 60th birthday. In these proceedings he challenges the underlying statutory basis, which makes provision for this compulsory retirement, on age grounds. He does so by asserting, firstly, that the governing statutory instrument, namely the Garda Síochána (Retirement) Regulations 1996 (S.I. No. 16/1996), is ultra vires the Police Forces Amalgamation Act 1925, which is the parent Act, and secondly, that its provisions are incompatible with Council Directive 2000/78/EC, of 27th November 2000, 'establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation'.

2. The plaintiff is a married man with a family and up to the date last mentioned had spent 40 years with the force. His ultimate superior was the Commissioner who is the second named defendant herein. The Minster for Justice, Equality and Law Reform ("The Minister") is sued as being the person ultimately responsible for An Garda Síochána and also as the "corporation sole" who made the relevant statutory provisions specifying the retirement age for members of the force. Ireland and the Attorney General are joined as being vicariously liable for any "wrongs" that may have been committed by the other defendants named herein.

3. In these proceedings, which were commenced by way of a Plenary Summons, the plaintiff seeks a variety of declarations to the effect (i) that S.I. No. 16/1996 ("the 1996 Regulations") firstly is ultra vires the powers contained in s. 14 of the Police Forces Amalgamation Act 1925 ("the 1925 Act" or "the Act of 1925") (see paras. 6 and 19 infra.), and secondly is incompatible with Council Directive 2000/78/EC, ("the Directive") and (ii) that if successful he is entitled to serve as an Assistant Commissioner until age 65 as originally provided for by S.I. No. 335/1951. In this regard, although included in the Statement of Claim, he does not now formally seek either injunctive relief or damages.

4. Accordingly there are two issues in this case, namely the ultra vires or administrative law issue and the directive issue. In this context and before I deal with the grounds of challenge, it is worth noting that no relief is sought on the basis of any alleged breach of employment contract or on the basis of legitimate expectation. Moreover, whilst the plaintiff has lodged a claim with the Equality Tribunal under the Employment Equality Act 1998, as amended by the Equality Act 2004, that in itself has no direct bearing on this case. Furthermore no question turns on locus standi or on the issue of acquiescence by the plaintiff.

5. The defendants in their defence assert that the 1996 Regulations are intra vires s. 14 of the 1925 Act, that the plaintiff's terms of employment, provided, inter alia, that his retirement age could be changed by Statutory Instrument and that when appointed Assistant Commissioner, he knew that 60 years of age was the appropriate retirement age for that rank. In addition they plead that as a matter of administrative law and also for the purposes of the framework Directive, the making of the 1996 Regulations was objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate legislative aim, namely the maintenance of an effective and efficient police force, with the means being proportionate to that aim. In the premise, they say that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief claimed or any relief.

Domestic Legislative Provisions:

6. As the challenge in this case is focused exclusively on the validity of the 1996 Regulations it would be useful at the outset to outline the relevant provisions thereof to include the provisions dealing with other members of the force. As this will show, the Minister, from time to time, has exercised the powers contained in s. 14(1)(b) of the Act of 1925, allowing him/her to make regulations relating to "the promotion, retirement, degradation, dismissal and punishment of members of the amalgamated forces". The following such Regulations are of relevance to this case:-

(1) Garda Síochána (Retirement)(No.2) Regulations 1951 – S.I. No. 335/1951 ("The 1951 Regulations"):

Regulation 6

"The following provisions shall apply to future members of An Garda Síochána in lieu of the existing provisions:

(a) subject to subparagraph (b) of this para., every such member shall retire from the Garda Síochána on attaining the age which is applicable to the rank in the Garda Síochána for the time being held by such member, that is to say:

(i) in the case of a member holding any rank higher than the rank of Chief Superintendent – on attaining the age of sixty-five years, and

(ii) in the case of a member holding the rank of Chief Superintendent or of Superintendent – on attaining the age of sixty years, and

(iii) in the case of a member below the rank of Superintendent – on attaining the age of fifty-seven years.

(b) Notwithstanding subparagraph (a) of this paragraph, if, but only if, the Commissioner is satisfied that it is in the interests of the efficiency of the Garda Síochána that the age at which any such member would retire under the said subparagraph should be extended because of the possession by that member of some special qualification or experience, the Commissioner may, with the consent of the Minister, extend that age in the case of that member by such period, not exceeding five years, as the Commissioner shall determine."

(2) Garda Síochána (Retirement) Regulations 1990 – S.I. No. 318/1990 ("The 1990 Regulation"):

"Notwithstanding anything in the Garda Síochána (Retirement) Regulations..., as amended, a member of the Garda Síochána appointed to the rank of Commissioner after the commencement of these regulations shall retire-

(a) on completion of 7 years service in that rank, or

(b) on attaining the age of 60 years,

whichever is the earlier:

Provided however that if the member is aged 55 years or more on such commencement, he shall retire –

(a) on completion of 5 years service in that rank, or

(b) on attaining the age of 65 years,

whichever is the earlier"

(3) Garda Síochána (Retirement) Regulations 1996 – S.I. No. 16/1996 ("The 1996 Regulation"):

Regulation 3

"Notwithstanding anything in the Garda Síochána (Retirement) Regulations..., as amended... a member of the Garda Síochána appointed to the rank of Assistant Commissioner or Deputy Commissioner after the commencement of these regulations shall retire on attaining the age of 60.

These regulations shall not apply to a member of the Garda Síochána appointed to the rank of Deputy Commissioner who at the time of coming into operation of these Regulations holds the rank of Assistant Commissioner."

(4) An Garda Síochána (Retirement) (No.2) Regulations 2006 – S.I. No. 686/2006 ("The 2006 (No. 2) Regulations"):

Regulation 2

"Paragraph 6(a)(iii) of the Garda Síochána (Retirement) (No.2) Regulations 1951... is amended by the substitution of 'sixty years' for 'fifty seven years'"

(5) An Garda Síochána (Reserve Members) Regulations 2006 – S.I. No. 413/2006 – ("The 2006 (Reserve Members) Regulations"):

Regulation 10

"(1) A reserve member's service shall end when he or she reaches the age of 65."

In addition to these general regulations the Minister has occasionally also made comparable regulations relative to particular persons or their circumstances or classes of persons or their circumstances. However, as these were particular in application they are not relevant to this case.

7. As can therefore be seen, the retiring position of members of the force can be summarised as follows:-

(1) Re: Commissioner: By virtue of the 1951 Regulations the retiring age of an appointee to this rank was sixty five. That was changed in 1990, when the Commissioner was obliged to retire, on completing a period of seven years in that rank, or on attaining the age of sixty whichever was the earlier. An exception was made for those who were aged 55 in 1990, but that has no application to the facts of this case. This remains the current situation.

(2) Re: Deputy Commissioners/Assistant Commissioners: The retiring age of sixty five, specified in the 1951 Regulations for the holders of these ranks, was reduced to sixty by the 1996 Regulations, the subject matter of these proceedings. This remains the current situation.

(3) Re: Chief Superintendents/Superintendents: The 1951 Regulations continue to apply with the relevant retiring age being sixty.

(4) Re: All ranks below that of Superintendent: The retiring age of fifty seven, which had been set by the 1951 Regulations, was increased for such members to age sixty, by the 2006 (No. 2) Regulations.

(5) Re: Garda Reserve: The retiring age of such members was fixed, in the 2006 Garda Reserve Regulations, at sixty-five.

The above summary represents the immediate statutory position in which the following events and circumstances should be viewed.

The Plaintiff's Case:

8. Since joining the force in March 1968, the plaintiff has held the following ranks and posts within the service:-

(a) Between July 1968 and December 1973, he was stationed at Chapelizod/Ballyfermot Garda Station.

(b) In December 1973, he was appointed to the Detective Branch Crime Ordinary, Central Detective Unit, Dublin Castle.

(c) In June 1981, he was promoted to Detective Sergeant assigned to the Bridewell Garda Station.

(d) In April 1990, he was promoted to Inspector and appointed as Detective Inspector to Donnybrook Garda Station.

(e) In 1996, he was promoted to Detective Superintendent and assigned to Letterkenny Garda Station.

(f) In May 2000, he was promoted to Detective Chief Superintendent in charge of the Garda National Immigration Bureau.

(g) In April 2004, he was transferred, with that rank, to the National Bureau of Criminal Investigation.

(h) On the 31st August 2005, he was promoted to Assistant Commissioner.

(i) In May 2007, with that rank, he was transferred to the National Support Services and from that date to his retirement he was in charge of the following eight national garda units:-

(i) National Drugs Units,

(ii) National Bureau of Fraud Investigation,

(iii) National Bureau of Criminal Investigation,

(iv) Garda National Immigration Bureau,

(v) Criminal Assets Bureau,

(vi) Garda Technical Bureau and Forensic Science Department including Fingerprints, Ballistics and Handwriting sections,

(vii) Garda Reserve Unit,

(viii) Operational Support Unit including Helicopter, Water and Horse Units.

9. As can therefore be seen, by June of this year the plaintiff had completed 40 years service in An Garda Síochána and during that time he was awarded the Scott Medal for valour, he received special commendations for outstanding bravery and professionalism and at no stage was he ever the subject of any disciplinary inquiry or proceedings. His professionalism and level of commitment have always been of the highest level. None of these facts have been put in issue by the defendants. His general health, both physical and mental, is good and he is both anxious and capable of continuing in his present post. To that end, by letter dated the 28th February 2008 he requested an extension of his tenure under Regulation 6(b) of the 1951 Regulations. The Commissioner declined to invoke this provision, and accordingly his request was refused. He was therefore compulsorily retired, by operation of law, on the 7th June 2008, with an entitlement to a tax free lump sum of €210,332 (being 1½ times his retiring salary) and an annual pension of €70,110, which is linked to salary scales of serving members into the future.

Composition/Structure of An Garda Síochána:

10. The force of which the plaintiff was a member has an unusual structure to it, in that the number of members within the Commissioner ranks equal 15 to include one vacancy which has yet to be filled. At Chief Superintendent and Superintendent level there are 239 posts, all out of a total force of 13,874. This funnel or narrowing effect at the top and its consequences are matters relied upon by the defendants in their justification of the 1996 Regulations. Whilst no breakdown is available for that year, the following would appear to be the current position:

Rank	Number	Proportion %
Commissioner	1	<0.01

Deputy Commissioner	1	<0.01
Assistant Commissioner	12	0.09

12. In a memo dated the 18th of April 2007, Assistant Commissioner Clancy, gives some statistics regarding Chief Superintendents:

- Average age on promotion to that rank: 51.9, with the youngest being 42 and the oldest 58 years of age.
- Average length of service before reaching that rank: 30.51 years, with the shortest being 22 and the longest 38 years.
- Average length of service at that rank: 8.81 years, with the shortest being 2 and the longest 18 years.

13. With regards to Assistant and Deputy Commissioners, it would appear that under the 1996 Regulations there have been 19 appointments to these ranks, to date. Within this period the youngest age of appointment was 47 years and 10 months with the oldest being 57 years and 8 months. The average age of appointment was 53.26 and the average duration of service 6.74 years. These figures do not take into account the three appointments of Noreen O'Sullivan (at age 47), Derek Byrne (at age 47) and Louis Harkins (at age 56). In the last five years (2003-2007) 10 have retired at age 60, with no early retirements in this category. In the next 5 years, 2 will have reached retiring age in 2008, 3 in 2009, 2 in 2010, with none in 2011 or in 2012. Over the 12 year period since 1996 there have been 22 appointments (including the three named in this paragraph), with no increase in the number of posts. Thus, assuming all incumbents would stay until retirement age, a further 7 would be appointed over the next 4 years.

14. Had the retiring age been 65 instead of 60 for the Commissioner ranks, the average length of service since 1996 would have been 12.58 years. The number of persons who would have retired in the last five years would have been 1. In the next five years; there would be no retirements in 2008 or 2009, there would be 5 in 2010, 1 in 2011 and none in 2012. Over the 12 year period since 1996 there would have been 14 appointments and with no increase in posts, but assuming all incumbents would have stayed until retirement, a further 6 would be appointed over the next 4 years.

15. The information, outlined and tabulated above, is not seriously in dispute between the parties, but some controversy exists about an observation in a report produced by the Organisational Development Unit (ODU) of An Garda Síochána, headed "Review of Retirement Age for Officers in An Garda Síochána" (February 2007). On p. 10 it is stated that for the six year period up to September 2006, 72% of Chief Superintendents and 68% of Superintendents served until their mandatory retirement age of 60. This means that on average 30% of those holding such ranks left the force before the due date. Whether these figures are entirely accurate is not quite clear, but in any event, they are not as critical as those within the Commissioner ranks. This is partly because of the numbers involved (52 Chief Superintendents and 187 Superintendents) and partly because of the importance of having a competitive pool of Assistant/Deputy Commissioners who might ordinarily be first considered for the post of Commissioner. In addition, in the context of early retirement, what is of particular relevance is the age at which such members leave the force. In the Chief Superintendent rank, it can be seen (para. 11(3) supra.) that out of the 7 who retired early, 5 served until at least age 58, with only one retiring much earlier at age 51. At Superintendent level (para 11(4) supra.) the figures are more mixed, but out of 30 early retirees in this category, 17 served at least until aged 57.

16. There is one other observation in the ODU report which should be referred to, and it is one which the plaintiff takes strong issue with. It is that if the retirement age of all officers (from Superintendent to Assistant Commissioner level) should be increased from 60 to 63, and assuming that all such persons would serve until reaching that age, such an adjustment would result in 49 officers remaining in the organisation in the period 2007 and 2009, who otherwise would not so remain if the existing status quo was maintained.

17. Finally, for the sake of completeness I should mention the representative structures of the Gardaí which are provided for by statute and regulated by statutory instrument; these are as follows:-

(1) The Police Forces Amalgamation Act 1925 provided for the establishment of representative bodies for all or any one of the ranks of the Garda Síochána.

(2) The Garda Síochána (Representative Bodies) Regulations 1927 (Unnumbered, 29th December 1927) established the Representative Body for Gardaí (RBG), the Representative Body for Inspectors, Station Sergeants and Sergeants (RBISS) and the Representative Body for Chief Superintendents and Superintendents (RBCSS).

(3) The Garda Síochána (Associations) Regulations 1978, S.I. No. 135/1978, provided for the establishment of the Garda Representative Association (GRA) and the Association of Garda Sergeants and Inspectors (AGSI).

(4) The Garda Síochána (Associations) (Superintendents and Chief Superintendent) Regulations 1987, S.I. No. 200 of 1987, provided for the establishment of the Association of Garda Superintendents and the Association of Chief Superintendents.

Issue No. 1 – The Ultra Vires / Administrative Law Issue:

18. It is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that the 1996 Regulations (S.I. No. 16/1996) are ultra vires s. 14 of the Police Forces Amalgamation Act 1925, as being irrational, unreasonable, unjustified and, almost as a discreet point, that the same were made without engaging in any due consultative process. This ground of challenge is made by reference to the time period at which the Regulations were made. It is also claimed that in light of the changed circumstances which have occurred in the intervening period, a similar evaluation should be made as of today's date. These circumstances relate to life expectancy, changes in An Garda Síochána, changes in legislation and the emerging trends across some European States, wherein retirement at a specific age is not applied. or if it is, the specified age is much later than 60. Therefore the Court is invited to examine the legality of these Regulations both as of 1996 and as of 2008.

19. At the outset, it should be understood that the phrase "ultra vires" is not used in its narrow, traditional or historic sense as indicating that the maker of the statutory instrument exceeded express powers conferred by the parent legislation. It is conceded, as it had to be, that by the plain and unambiguous wording of s. 14(1)(b) of the 1925 Act, (see para. 6 supra.) the Minister had the statutory power to make such Regulations. Therefore the "principles and policies" line of authority (Cityview Press v. An Chomhairle Oilúna [1980] IR 381), has no reference to this case. Rather the term is used to found a submission that the Minister, when making the S.I. exceeded her implied obligation or duty to act both reasonably and rationally. It is in this sense that the phrase ultra vires is relied upon.

20. There is no dispute about the general principles of law which govern challenges of this nature. These have been set down by the Supreme Court in Cassidy v. Minister for Industry and Commerce [1978] IR 297. Henchy J., at pp. 310 – 311, said:-

> "The general rule of law is that where Parliament has by statute delegated a power of subordinate legislation, the power must be exercised within the limitations of that power as they are expressed or necessarily implied in the statutory delegation. Otherwise it will be held to have been invalidly exercised for being ultra vires. And it is a necessary implication in such a statutory delegation that the power to issue subordinate legislation should be exercised reasonably. Diplock L.J. has stated in Mixnam's Properties Limited v. Chertsey Urban District Council, at p. 237 of the report:-
> > 'Thus, the kind of unreasonableness which invalids a bye-law [or, I would add, any other form of subordinate legislation] [sic.] is not the antonym of 'reasonableness' in the sense of which that expression is used in the common law, but such manifest arbitrariness, injustice or partiality that a court would say 'Parliament never intended to give authority to make such rules'; they are unreasonable and ultra vires'.
> I consider that this to be the correct test." (Emphasis added)

Cassidy was a case where a maximum prices order made no distinction between prices charged in public bars and lounge bars (notwithstanding obvious differences in costs etc.), with the result that, by reference to the legal principles outlined, the court was compelled to conclude:

> "...that Parliament could not have intended that licences of lounge bars should be treated so oppressively and unfairly by the maximum-price orders." (Henchy J. at 311).

21. Nothing of substance has been added to these principles by cases such as State (Kenny) v. Minister for Social Welfare [1986] 1 IR 693, Philips v. The Medical Council [1991] 2 IR 115, and Purcell v. A.G. [1995] 3 IR 287. There is however a brief observation from the judgment of McCarthy J. in McHugh v. Minister for Social Welfare [1994] 2 IR 139 which I wish to quote, where the learned judge at 156 said:-

> "...If a regulation is demonstrably lacking in logic and unfair it cannot be sustainable within the framework of the scheme; it cannot be a proper application of the statutory power to make regulations."

From the above I would therefore summarise the position as follows:-

(a) Delegated legislation must be made within and for the purposes authorised by the parent Act.

(b) This means (i) that the legislation must strictly comply with the express and implied limitations of the conferring provision and (ii) that the exerciser of the power must act reasonably.

(c) This requirement can be tested by asking whether the instrument made suffers from arbitrariness, injustice, unfairness or whether it is manifestly illogical: because if it is,

(d) The affected legislation is tainted and therefore unlawful, as the Oireachtas could never have intended such results.

Accordingly, it can be said that the test is one of manifest arbitrariness, or demonstrable illogicality, or gross unfairness or injustice.

22. Quite frequently one finds that when a challenge is based on unreasonableness, submissions are made which inextricably link what was said in Cassidy to what the Supreme Court decided in the State (Keegan) v. Stardust Victims Compensation Tribunal [1986] 1 IR 642, a case involving a judicial review challenge to an administrative decision. Having considered the "Wednesbury" principles (from Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 KB 223), and having rejected the logic or moral standing test as propounded by Lord Diplock in Council of Civil Service Union v. Minister for the Civil Service [1985] AC 374 at 410, Henchy J. said at 658:

> "I would myself consider the test of unreasonableness or irrationality in judicial review lies in considering whether or not the impugned decision plainly and unambiguously flies in the face of fundamental reason and common sense."

In other passages contained in the judgment the learned judge used slightly different language in describing when a court could intervene. He gave examples, including, when the decision was:

(a) fundamentally at variance with reason and common sense,

(b) indefensible for being in the teeth of plain reason and common sense, and

(c) made in flagrant disregard of fundamental reason or common sense.

It has long been accepted that these different methods of expression have like meaning and all are conveniently captured in the direct quote from his judgment. It is also interesting to note that even though he had given the judgment in Cassidy, Henchy J. made no reference to that case in the State (Keegan); neither did O'Higgins C.J.

23. In deciding that the issue under review in O'Keeffe v. An Bord Pleanala [1993] 1 IR 39, fell "to be decided in accordance with the principles laid down" in the State (Keegan) (ibid. at 70). Finlay C.J., having quoted extensively from the judgment of Henchy J. in that case, and having rejected court intervention (i) simply because different inferences or conclusions could be reached, or (ii) because the case against the decision was stronger than the case for it, continued:

> "I am satisfied that in order for an applicant for judicial review to satisfy a court that the decision-making authority has acted irrationally in the sense which I have outlined above so that the court can intervene and quash its decision, it is necessary that the applicant should establish to the satisfaction of the court that the decision-making authority had before it no relevant materials which would support its decision." (ibid. at 72)

In Aer Rianta v. Commission for Aviation Regulation (Unreported, High Court, 16th January 2003), O'Sullivan J., on first reading, appears to set an even higher threshold and an even more restrictive test, than the Chief Justice did in O'Keeffe. However, when viewed as a whole, his judgment, which was heavily influenced by court deference to specialised bodies, is less daunting than at first sight. Furthermore, at a time when O'Keeffe was under active, if not intense, scrutiny it is unlikely that the learned judge intended to raise the threshold even higher than the one propounded in that case. In any event, there has been a tendency for some time towards the virtual free interchange of the Cassidy principles with the Keegan principles.

24. In my view unless a high level of awareness accompanies such an approach, confusion is bound to follow. There are obvious and significant differences between the court's jurisdiction when testing the validity of delegated legislation and when determining a judicial review application. Evidently judicial review is not concerned with the decision, but rather with the process of decision making. Secondly, in cases such as the State (Keegan), O'Keeffe, and indeed others to include Aer Rianta, the decisions under review were administrative ones which by their nature are quite dissimilar from the exercise of legislative function. Thirdly the circumstances in which a court can intervene in judicial review are "limited and rare" (O'Keeffe). Fourthly, the principle of "curial deference" applies; so that courts afford considerable respect and latitude to the skill. competence and experience which underlay the establishment and functioning of specialised bodies; this concept has no standing with secondary legislation. Fifthly, there can be no question of the court's power, when dealing with the validity of secondary legislation, being in any way bound by the principle established in O'Keeffe. namely, that no intervention will occur unless there is "no relevant material" before the decision making body. Other points of distinction also exist. I can therefore see a very clear distinction between unreasonableness in the context of this case and unreasonableness as a ground for judicial review.

The Factual Basis of Challenge: The Evidence:

25. The evidence tendered on the administrative law point was based partly on affidavit, partly on oral evidence and partly on a number of documents, which I will firstly refer to. Perhaps almost unique to a challenge at this time remove, there are available three documents created by the Minister for Justice, or her Department, which outline the reasons for the making of the 1996 Regulations. These were obtained by the plaintiff through voluntary discovery and, without objection, have been produced and used by both parties in this case.

26. The documents consist of a "Note for Minister's Information", the author of which was a Mr. Folan, secondly, a document headed "Memorandum for The Government" dated the 15th January 1996, and thirdly a note by the then Minister for Justice, Ms. Nora Owens T.D., to the then Taoiseach, Mr. John Bruton T.D., dated the 17th January 1996. All of these documents dealt in a contextual way with the reasons for the then proposal to make the 1996 Regulations and can be summarised as follows:-

(i) In 1990 the Government took a decision to place the Commissioner's tenure of office on the same footing as a Secretary to a Government department which had been changed in 1987. It was essential to retain this new retiring age (60) so as to keep parity with these office holders, and also because it was "imperative to the maintenance of motivation within the senior ranks of the force". To revert to a retiring age of 65 would mean that potential incumbents could be in situ for 10 or 15 years. This could de-motivate the lower Commissioner ranks and could also negatively impact on the dynamism required to lead the force.

(ii) That being so, if one had a situation of Deputy/Assistant Commissioners retiring at age 65, whilst the Commissioner retired at age 60, this would render a great number from within the Deputy/Assistant Commissioner ranks ineligible for appointment to lead the force on the grounds of age; this would heavily impact on the following two appointments.

(iii) The most effective solution therefore would be to reduce the retiring age from 65 to 60 for all Commissioner ranks and thus bring them in line with Superintendents and Chief Superintendents. This would have the effect of creating a competitive pool of candidates who would be available for Government consideration in the appointment of any future Commissioner. It would also avoid potential blockage at the lower Commissioner rank levels; whereas, with a retiring age of 65, persons could serve for ten or more years. Such a change would have a positive motivating effect on relevant members who could then have more realistic prospects of promotion. Otherwise, if the status quo was retained, motivation and dynamism within the force would be seriously affected.

(iv) The implementation of a new regional command structure would see a switch to greater operational focus in terms of garda leadership. Once again, to make this significant change effective, a high degree of dynamism and motivation was required.

(v) Therefore, accordingly, the Regulation should be made.

27. This summary is taken from Mr. Folan's note but it is also largely reflective of the Memorandum for Government as well as the Minister's note to An Taoiseach. There were, however, three further points raised in the latter documents which should be mentioned. In the Memorandum, it is stated, at para. 3, that:

"[T]he Garda Commissioner has recently raised a concern that a situation could develop where all members of the Assistant and Deputy Commissioner ranks could be aged 60 and above when the post of Garda Commissioner fell to be filled. In such a situation all of the Assistant and Deputy Commissioners would be precluded on age grounds from being appointed Commissioner of An Garda Síochána."

Secondly, the memo also pointed out that members who had 30 years service and reached age 50 could retire on full pension. And thirdly, in the briefing document to An Taoiseach, the Minister, having noted that the age profile of Chief Superintendents who were then being considered for appointment to Assistant Commissioner rank, "presents a serious problem", stated:-

"The most serious aspect of the matter, however, is that the people promoted this time could 'block' Assistant Commissioner posts for ten years of more (instead of 5 years) which would mean that no younger members of the force, however suitable for the top job, could become an Assistant Commissioner (and gain experience at that level), thus restricting considerably the Government's option, later on, when it comes to appointments to the top job."

The Minister concluded by recording, that the Department of Finance did not have any objections and that she did not "expect garda opposition either".

28. The plaintiff in his oral evidence complained about the irrationality of the 1996 Regulations, on several grounds; these included:-

(i) Given the depth of skill, knowledge and experience which he had acquired in over 40 years of service, it makes no sense for this to be lost to the force and forever wasted.

(ii) The role of Assistant Commissioner involves almost exclusively managerial and executive tasks, rather than any front line involvement in operational matters. Accordingly, the physical demands involved are minimal.

(iii) Given the ever-increasing sophisticated methods of dealing with crime, it seems strange, that whereas in 1951 a member of the commission ranks could hold office for eight years longer than an ordinary member, the current position is that all members must now retire at age 60.

(iv) Given advancements in medical care and treatment, the life expectancy of persons has increased dramatically over the years.

(v) Apart from eye testing for the purposes of being a patrol driver, no member of An Garda Síochána is compulsorily obliged to undergo any regular or routine health checks.

(vi) Throughout his 40 years in the force, he had never considered promotional prospects to be a motivating factor: from his perspective the most effective motivation for any member, stemmed from having a force well organised, skilfully prepared and driven by committed leadership.

(vii) It would be quite wrong to believe that the Assistant Commissioner rank exists only for the purpose of creating a pool from which a future Commissioner could be appointed; Assistant Commissioners have vital tasks to perform in their own right.

(viii) The blockage concerns are overstated and indeed are inconsistently viewed by Garda management. Within the rank of Superintendent and Chief Superintendent there is high natural wastage through early retirement. Moreover the authorities are inconsistent in their views on blockage. Quite frequently Sergeants and Inspectors hold their respective ranks for periods well in excess of 10 to 15 years, and yet this practice seems to attract no Garda agitation; and finally

(xi) It should be noted that there is nothing preventing the Government from appointing a Commissioner from a rank lower than that of Assistant Commissioner.

29. The reference to life expectancy was expanded upon by reference to the following information extracted from the C.S.I. Office in its Irish Life Tables No 14:

	1950	2006	Percentage Increase
Life expectancy of Male	64.5	76.1	18%
Life expectancy of Female	67.1	81.1	21%
Life expectancy of male aged 60	5.49	20.9	29.80%
Life expectancy of female	16.8	23.6	40.70%

30. Evidence was also given on behalf of the plaintiff by Mr. Thomas Monaghan, who retired in May 2005, after being a Chief Superintendent for twelve years. During this time he became Chairman of the Chief Superintendent's Association, whose function was to raise with management matters of welfare and efficiency on behalf of its members. This facility was provided for by the Garda Síochána Conciliation and Arbitration Scheme. In October 1990, a joint claim by this Association and a similar Association representing Superintendents, was placed before the negotiating forum at which an increase in the mandatory retiring age from 60 to 63 was sought. That claim was still in being when, in December 1995, the then Commissioner invited applications for the post of Assistant Commissioner, four of which were then available. This circular made no mention of the impending 1996 Regulations which only became public knowledge when the Commissioner re-advertised these posts in January 1996. According to the witness there had been no consultation with his organisation, either in the lead up to, or at the time of, the making of these Regulations.

31. This claim for an increase in the retirement age was re-agitated in 2004, when the Associations made a further submission to the then Minister on the issue. At that time the Associations also disputed the proffered "justification" underlying the 1996 Regulations. Despite presenting its case forcibly, the Minister was not receptive to making the changes sought, or any such change. Finally, Mr. Monaghan explained the inactivity of the Associations between 1996 and 2004 as being referable to the ongoing review of An Garda Síochána as ordered by the then Taoiseach. That review did not finalise until 2004.

32. The defendants called a number of witnesses, including Mr. Pat Folan (see paras. 26 – 27 supra.), who joined the Department of Justice in 1981. In September 1994 he moved to the Garda Division, as Principal Officer, where he remained until July 1997. That division was responsible for the garda budget, garda resources and garda policy, inter alia, in relation to promotion, retirement, resources etc. In July 1997 he moved to a new posting and since then has held a variety of other positions, mostly at Deputy Secretary level in the latter years. As a result of these postings, and in particular that occupied by him from 1994 to 1997, he was very familiar with the background circumstances leading up to the 1996 Regulations.

33. According to his evidence, the context in which these Regulations were conceived arose from two interconnected set of circumstances, namely the retirement of the first Commissioner appointed under the 1990 regime, and secondly the approval by the Government of the regionalisation of the force. In 1995 or early 1996, when the appointment of a successor to that Commissioner was being looked at, it became clear that significant numbers of those holding the rank of Assistant Commissioner, would be aged 60 or over when the next and follow-on appointments fell to be made. These individuals would be ineligible on age grounds, even for consideration. Side by side with this, the Government in late 1995 had approved a plan for the creation of a regional structure for An Garda Síochána, and as part of this move had also approved the appointment of three further Assistant Commissioners. In fact, coincidentally, a further such post became free at that time and accordingly there were four vacancies. In considering the potential candidates to fill these positions it became clear that if the retiring age of Assistant Commissioners remained at 65, this would significantly diminish the competitive pool available to the Government in its consideration of the new Commissioner. Secondly, those so appointed to the Assistant rank could hold their posts for anywhere between 10 to 15 years. Accordingly, to provide a choice for the Government and to avoid entrenchment through blockage for long periods, as well as facilitating a sense of renewal, dynamism and refreshment of thought, it was considered that the retirement age for Assistant/Deputy Commissioners should be reduced from 65 to 60. In addition, this change would impact positively on motivation within the force, and would facilitate greater movement and turnover at the highest level; those in the lower ranks would thus have a more realistic possibility of promotion. This was particularly critical given the very narrow pyramid or funnel effect at the top of the organisation. The other major consideration stemmed from the consequences of the regionalisation programme which was designed to have in place a strong operational focus within the regional structure. Once more that required a serious level of dynamism and motivation within the senior ranks. It was therefore essential that the change take place.

34. Deputy Commissioner Martin Callinan, who was appointed to his post in 2007, outlined some of the significant changes which have taken place within An Garda Síochána in the past number of years. In particular, there has been an ongoing process of efficiency review and modernisation which was formally recognised in the 2007 Policing Plan (see s. 22 of the Garda Síochána Act 2005). This plan was drawn up by reference to internal reviews; it was also influenced by external bodies such as the Garda Inspectorate (which was set up under the 2005 Act), which reported in August 2007, and an advisory group, which made a final report headed "Final Report to the Garda Commissioner: From the Advisory Group on Garda Management and Leadership Development" in May 2007 (the Hayes Report). In this plan there are six strategic imperatives set out, all of which are designed to modernise the force by way of training, development and motivation. This witness also described An Garda Síochána as a "very flat organisation" with about 1.35% of its members being Superintendents, 0.38% being Chief Superintendents and only 0.09% at the level of Assistant Commissioner. At Deputy Commissioner level it is less than 0.01%. Given these figures it was his opinion that if the age of retirement for Assistant Commissioner was increased to 65, this opportunity would benefit eight Assistant Commissioners who could potentially remain on in the force for another five years. That of course would have the effect of either depriving or deferring a similar number of Chief Superintendents of promotion, and likewise with Superintendents and so on. This because any increase in age would have a domino effect within the organisation. As of now, the average age of appointment to Superintendent is 46 and on average three and a half years are served at that level. In his opinion any such alteration would create a serious potential for "exodus" amongst officers who otherwise might expect promotion in the near future. Moreover, if the plaintiff was successful in this case, it would most likely be that the Association of Superintendents and the Association of Chief Superintendents would also benefit from such judgment. This could have serious complications. At present almost 2,400 Gardaí have passed the Sergeant's promotion exams and almost 650 Sergeants have passed the Inspector's promotion exams. There are ten Inspectors and six Superintendents on their respective promotion lists, who have yet to be appointed. In summary, a return to the retiring age of 65 would have a serious detrimental effect on the force including the 2,000 odd members with third level qualifications who have joined An Garda Síochána since 2003.

Submissions:

35. In both their opening and closing submissions, counsel on behalf of the plaintiff advanced the ultra vires point on a number of grounds. At the commencement it was said, by way of general observation, that the identification of 60 as a compulsory retiring age was illogical and had no rational connection to any fixed or determinate event or circumstance. Secondly, it was emphasised that this case was not about raising the retirement age, to whatever that might be; rather it was based on the principled objection to any age being assigned for compulsory retirement. It was said that some other threshold or test must be found for this purpose, such as, for example, competency. Moving to the particular, counsel submitted that the effect of the 1996 Regulations was to create the wholly irrational situation whereby, as of the 7th June 2008, the acknowledged skill, expertise, professionalism and competence which the plaintiff has accumulated in over 40 years of service must be entirely disregarded. Such a wasteful consequence could easily be remedied at virtually no financial cost; the net difference of allowing the Plaintiff to remain on, instead of getting his lump sum and pension entitlements, being only about €41,000 per year.

36. It was further claimed by the plaintiff that:-

(a) It is inappropriate to link the retiring age of an Assistant Commissioner to that of the Commissioner, as the latter, who is comparable to the Secretary General of a Government department, holds office for a fixed tenure;

(b) The long standing difference between the ranks of Chief Superintendent/Superintendent and Commissioner, should be maintained; and,

(c) The equally long standing practice of retiring senior management later than those of the more junior ranks (including the Garda Reserve), such likewise be retained.

37. Reference was made to the documentation summarised above (see paras. 26 – 27 supra.). As well as criticising its content, it was also claimed that no reports or surveys, external or internal, were commissioned in order to independently verify its contents. For example, in the Minister's note to An Taoiseach, it is recited that the age profile of Chief Superintendents, currently available for promotion, "presents a serious problem". There is no evidence to support such a view. Likewise in the Memorandum for Government it is claimed that the Garda Commissioner had raised concerns about the matters which the memorandum speaks of. Once again there is no record of any such communications by him. Likewise there is no mention of the joint claim lodged in 1990 by the Associations of Superintendents and Chief Superintendents seeking an increase in their members retiring age to 63. The documentation is thus critically incomplete in several respects. Insofar as one can identify some rationale for the then proposed change, it can be observed that if motivation and morale within the organisation were of concern to the Government, then surely some consultative process with those directly affected should have been engaged in. Furthermore, the true motivating force within An Garda Síochána was leadership, in a structured and expert way, and it was never common practice to seek dynamism or drive commitment, through affording opportunity for promotion. In addition there were several ways of dealing with any concerns about blockage, including expanding the pool from which a Commissioner could be appointed and by offering fixed term contracts to the occupants of certain posts. So, taken either individually or cumulatively, the underlying justification for this statutory instrument, as outlined in the documentation as well as in the evidence of Mr. Folan, falls foul of the test enunciated in the State (Keegan) (see para. 22 et seq. supra.).

38. The submissions made on behalf of the defendants were detailed in nature and traversed all of the points raised on behalf of Mr. Donnellan. Many of the more central ones are evident from what next appears in this judgment.

Decision: The Ultra Vires Issue:

39. As set out previously in this judgment, the test which I must apply is to decide whether the statutory instrument is manifestly arbitrary or unjust, or whether it demonstrably lacks logic; so that the Oireachtas could never have intended the consequences which now result from this S.I.; so that such an exercise of vested power could never have been envisaged. Thus, I must ask, was the decision of the Minister in 1996, to change the age of retirement for Assistant and Deputy Commissioners, irrational in the sense indicated? If the decision was rational, was it arrived at in a reasoned and logical way, having regard to the factors taken account of.

40. As stated above, (para. 19 supra.), Section 14(1)(b) of the 1925 Act, empowers the Minister, by its express wording, to make Regulations, inter alia, dealing with the promotion, retirement, degradation, dismissal, and punishment of members of the amalgamated forces. It is therefore beyond argument that under this section the Minister could regulate the retirement of members. This he did not once, but repeatedly so throughout the years. It was entirely within his competence to so do.

41. In meeting this, which is the first challenge to the Regulations, the Defendants deny that the same lack reason or logic and plead justification. Although set out in an earlier part of this judgment, the justification so offered was, firstly, to create a pool of suitable candidates at the Assistant / Deputy Commissioner level, from which follow-on Commissioners would be predominantly chosen; secondly, that people would serve within the higher ranks for shorter periods than previously, thus allowing appointment at an earlier age; this would facilitate a greater turnover of people, thereby preventing "blockage"; thirdly, that such changes would increase motivation and dynamism within all ranks of the force; fourthly, that the same would preserve the alignment previously established between the Commissioner and the Assistant/Deputy Commissioner rank and finally, that such would assist in the implementation and success of the new regional command structure.

42. As above outlined, three documents were presented to the Court, in which the Minister advanced reasons for her decision, namely the "Note for Minister's Information", the "Memorandum for The Government" dated the 15th January 1996, and the note by the Minister to the Taoiseach, dated the 17th January 1996 (paras. 26 and 27 supra.). From these, as well as from the evidence (paras. 32 – 34 supra.), a number of concerns were identified, which have been previously mentioned and which are further dealt with herein.

43. After 1990, the Commissioner's tenure was changed and aligned to that of a Secretary General of a Government Department. Thereafter, he held office for seven years or until he reached the age of 60, whichever first occurred. A particular exception was made relative to special circumstances, but that has no application to this case. Whilst it is a matter for Government as to whom it may appoint as a Commissioner, it seems that, as a matter of policy, it wanted to create and have in place, a pool of viable candidates, who predominantly would be the contenders for the next appointment. Such candidates would be expected to have some experience in the most senior ranks and, therefore, subject to limited disruption, would seamlessly fill the top spot. In any hierarchical structure it would be normal firstly to consider those closest in rank or service to the post requiring an appointee; without of course disregarding or ignoring 'outstanding candidates' at other levels. Moreover, those next in rank, to include Assistant/Deputy Commissioners, would have a real expectation of being in the frame for consideration. Some, even most, but perhaps not all at this rank, would feel that such a position is not in itself an end destination. That being so, it would be seriously debilitating, for both Government and such candidates if, as a result of some structural defect, this group was ineligible for the highest position at next appointment. This applies also to 'outstanding candidates', in the sense that I have mentioned; who would or should have been identified earlier via the promotional process. Therefore the Government should have a choice and such persons should, at least, have the prospect of promotion. To seek this objective must surely be legitimate.

44. With a retirement age of 65, there was, after the 1990 change, a very real risk that many of the Assistant Commissioners would be too old for appointment to the post of Commissioner. This problem first arose when a successor for the second seven year period was being considered. Therefore some remedial steps were necessary if a pool of younger Assistant Commissioners was to be established. It seems, according to the Memorandum for Government (see para. 27 supra.) that the Commissioner himself raised concerns about the limited nature of the pool of Assistant/Deputy Commissioners who might be available for future promotion. That the Commissioner held this view has been questioned: it being said that if he did, it is, therefore, surprising that in his letter of invitation to the Chief Superintendent rank, issued in December 1995, he made no mention of his concerns in this regard. Whatever may be the explanation for this, the evidence so given verifies the position as asserted. In addition to the memorandum, this Court was given oral evidence outlining the regular discussions had between the Commissioner and the Minister and the almost daily contact between the former and the Secretary General of the department. Whilst it was not suggested that all of these communications dealt solely with the issue at hand, nevertheless I am satisfied that the problem was the subject of discussion, comment and even debate between the office holders herein mentioned.

45. In any event, if the Minister was within her power in refusing to alter the Commissioner's retiring age from the 1990 position of 60, as I believe she was, I cannot see how the above aim of establishing a competitive pool could be satisfied without affecting some change at Commissioner rank level: this simply because those supposedly within the pool would be ineligible because of age. Whilst perhaps some more innovative changes may have been considered, and I confess I cannot think what these might be, nevertheless I believe that the aim, indeed necessity of making this most significant post as meaningful as possible, inter alia, by having access to the most senior quota of people available, was a legitimate one for the Minister to have, and to pursue by way of regulation change.

46. Issue was taken with the suggestion that the change in retirement age would prevent blockage at the Assistant Commissioner level: such assertions are not entirely determinative. Reducing the retirement age alone would not permanently increase the movement, since it would have the effect of temporarily decapitating the organisation, allowing people to be brought up sooner than they would have been. However, after this initial movement, the situation would merely, or largely, revert to the previous situation. The change in retirement age would not, therefore have lasting effect. However it would have short/medium term effect which could not entirely be discounted. In 1996, with a retirement age of 65, some incumbents at the Commissioner Rank, could have held office for ten or fifteen years. As of now if a court declaration issued from this case, the default age would return to 65. Eight Assistant Commissioners could benefit. These are significant numbers out of such a small pool. Therefore an age change would inevitably have consequences, and would affect all ranks, but in particular those with limited numbers.

47. In the Note refereed to (para. 26 supra.), it was said that "it is imperative to the maintenance of motivation within the senior ranks" to have the changes effected. Criticism was made of such conclusion, it being pointed out that those with first hand knowledge, namely the Associations of Superintends/Chief Superintends were never consulted. It is thus said that the problem as identified was not borne out by the facts. Whilst it is true to say that no dialogue was exchanged between these parties, and in that way the opportunity for information gathering was missed, nonetheless it cannot be disputed or even challenged that motivation, energy, vigour and focus renewal, are all essential efficiency drivers for any organisation and also for those who both lead and serve that organisation. This is particularly so for a body of such societal importance as An Garda Siochána. In this respect I cannot agree with what the plaintiff has said. Whilst not all persons are motivated by the prospect of promotion, many are and critically many of those, previously promoted several times, might well be suitable for the ultimate position .

48. Perhaps the real complaint is the lack of hard objective evidence to underpin this particular matter. In my view it was well within the competence of the Minister to have regard to such an obvious point, which incidentally would have a ripple downward effect within the entire organisation. Moreover it is to be doubted if engaging with those directly involved would have progressed matters further. Furthermore it is impossible to entirely separate this point from the 'pool' point. Therefore it could not be said that the motivation/dynamic driver point, was devoid of support or denuded of purpose at the relevant time. In addition it should noted that these objectives, do not relate solely to candidates who aspire to a No. 1 position; these are also critically important to those who held other positions, within the force. Consequently such matters are both relevant and valid.

49. Another step, taken by the Government at the time, was the significant structural change in having a strong operational force at regional level. This lead to three Assistant Commissioner posts being created, and with a further one vacant, four new appointments were required. As part of this innovative re-organisation, not just at personal level but also at operational level, it was imperative, for its initial success and thereafter for its continuation, to incentivise those within the senior ranks. A sense of renewal, of expectation, of ambition, all to a greater or lesser extent, was required. Of course other factors were also in play, but the importance of making this chance a major success cannot be underestimated.

50. Furthermore, critically looking at the structure of the force it becomes clear that it is indeed quite a "flat" organisation. As previously outlined, there are almost 13,900 members. The Commissioner himself represents 0.01% of that total, whereas at Garda rank the numbers represent 80.29%. There are two Deputy Commissioners, although one position is currently vacant, and there are 12 Assistant Commissioners. Thus when taken as a whole, the Commissioner ranks, in total 15 people, account for little more than 0.1% of the Force. If one adds those at Chief Superintendent level, being additional 52 persons, this increases the percentage by 0.38%. In total, even including those all those at Superintendent and Commissioner rank, the total is only about 1.8% of the total Force. As can therefore be seen, there is an extremely narrow funnel at the top of the organisation; with those in managerial roles constituting an extremely small percentage and being very confined in numbers. There is no suggestion that this structure is or will likely be changed in the future. Therefore it is obvious that those performing management roles in what has been described as a "flat organisation" are critical to the well being and efficiency of the Force. This is therefore a unique situation. This fact also weighs heavily when considering the justification required under Article 6.

51. A good deal of debate took place in this case towards identifying infirmities that might have existed in the documentation prepared in contemplation of the passing of the S.I. under consideration. For example, as previously indicated, it was asserted that no external reports from consultants were obtained and that no internal investigation, of any quality, was undertaken which would justify the impugned change. Moreover, it was said that there was no empirical evidence to justify concerns regarding the reference to age profile. Changes in the police force were ignored as were the increase in live expectancy and the proposal made by the Joint Association of Superintendents and Chief Superintendents to increase the retiring age of their members from 60 to 63. In essence, the 1996 proposal to change was ad hoc and ill thought out, with its consequences either not appreciated or ignored. In my opinion this type of forensic, historical examination is of little value. It is not necessary, although fortuitous as it is to have the material available, that such documentation should be thoroughly discursive, or shaped in the form of a reasoned opinion or supported by international data or practice. Its content does not have to pass the judgment bar of anxious scrutiny or forensic audit. It seems to me that if, on analysis, there are set forth the broad reasons which prompted the Minister into making an S.I., as I am satisfied there are here, that in my opinion is sufficient to prevent a plaintiff being successful in challenging the instrument on the grounds of reasonableness or unreasonableness, as the case may be, unless patently irrational or illogical.

52. A number of reports were also handed up during the course of the hearing. The Hayes Report, from May 2007, noted that a systematic approach is needed to "succession planning" to prevent too many senior officers retiring at the same time, and in order to ensure that, through training and development, there is a sufficient pool of able and experienced officers to provide continuity in management and direction, and competition for promotion. Succession did not simply involve the identification of a person for a particular post, but rather it should be structured; related to training and development. A Garda Inspectorate report, "Policing in Ireland: Looking Forward", dated August 2007 similarly reviewed the operational structure of the Force, noting and agreeing with the conclusions of the Hayes report.

53. Regardless of the justifications put forward by the Defendants, there are still questions as to the way in which the decision was reached, in the sense that it followed fair procedures (e.g. as enunciated in Burke v. Minister for Labour [1979] IR 354). The Plaintiff argued that the Minister, as a matter of law, was obliged to consult with those directly affected at the time, namely the Associations of Superintendents and Chief Superintendents, but had failed to do so. Whilst it may have been preferable or even desirable or, in the context of industrial relations, even helpful to so do, nonetheless, I cannot see anything in the 1925 Act, or in the Regulations providing for the establishment of the Associations, (para. 17 supra.), and I am not aware of any provision of general law, which obliges the maker of an S.I. to consult with members of the organisation which may be affected thereby or even with a certain cohort of those members. Accordingly there cannot be any invalidity resulting from a partial or even total lack of communication in this regard.

54. As noted by Carney J. in Gorman v. Minister for the Environment [2001] 2 IR 414 at 436 – 437:

> "Whilst there can be no doubt as to the existence of a constitutionally protected right under Article 40.3 to fair procedures in decision-making, it has been recognised in the case-law that the principles of constitutional justice do not apply with equal force in every situation and indeed in some circumstances where decisions are taken by public bodies, such as a decision to enact a particular piece of legislation by the Oireachtas, the audi alteram partem rule or the duty to consult and hear submissions does not arise at all".

Whether and to what extend, if at all, this is or is not an absolute position, in the absence of express provision does not arise in this case. See also Cassidy v. Minister for Industry [1978] IR 297 at 304 where the Court found that there was no duty to consult with the Vintner's Association before bringing into effect a statutory instrument fixing maximum process for the sale of intoxicating liquor. It is therefore clear that in the enactment of secondary or delegated legislation, there is no general requirement for consultation with the affected class. Such is necessary, for example under the Waste Management Acts / Regulations, where there is a requirement for consultation by the Council where, inter alia, there is a proposed change to a Waste Management Plan; that situation is entirely different: the duty is explicitly provided by law, which is not the situation here.

55. If any one or more of the above aims could be said to constitute the dominant or principal motive in the passing of these Regulations, then I would hold that the plaintiff's challenge to them must fall. As Henchy J. pointed out in Cassidy, if there is a legitimate aim for the making of an S.I., it being a dominant and purposeful aim, then even though there may also be secondary aims which may not be justified by the parent legislation, nonetheless once the former exists, the S.I. in question will not be declared invalid.

56. In any event, I do not think it is necessary to rely on that passage from his judgment: this in light of the justifying aims identified above, supported as they were by way of evidence, not only the documentary evidence which was current at the time, but also the evidence of Mr. Gavin who was, in fact, directly involved. I am satisfied that these were justifiable concerns which the Minister could have and were the influencing factors in her decision to change the retiring age which was then applicable to the rank of Assistant Commissioner in 1996. I, therefore, believe that the plaintiff's challenge on the ultra vires or the administrative law point fails.

57. Consequently, I am satisfied that the aims as specified and the justifications as offered by the Minister through the evidence adduced in this case, were such as could not possibly attract to the 1996 S.I., the invalidity principles as identified in Cassidy through the judgment of Henchy J. It could not be said that the actual decision on its face was necessarily unreasonable. Nor could the decision be said to be one which the Oireachtas could not have ever intended or foreseen under the 1925 Act. I thus feel that this justification passes the general test.

58. Another submission suggested that the S.I. should be reviewed as of today's date; in this context, not by reference to the Council Directive, but by reference to purely domestic law. In my opinion even if this were possible, the net question would be whether or not by applying the appropriate administrative law principles, the S.I. was or was not valid in 1996. In my view, there was no principle of law in existence, at that time, like that as later contained in the Directive, which means that the 1996 Regulations could not be measured against the principle to test for discrimination in employment and occupation on age grounds. The change in this regard was the most significant feature which has occurred in the previous twelve years but, it would be quite wrong to try and retrospectively apply that Directive or its provisions in a theoretical sense to the validity of the S.I. at the appropriate date, which is 1996. I, therefore, reject this submission of the plaintiff.

59. Finally, in this regard. I do not believe that the passage of either the Directive or the enactment of the 2004 Act, could in any way reflect unreasonableness in the thinking of the Minister at the time of the 1996 S.I.. Therefore, the challenge on the ultra vires point fails.

Issue No. 2: The Directive Challenge:

60. The second major issue in this case arises from Council Directive 2000/78/EC of the 27th November 2000, 'establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation'. This Directive was incorporated into domestic law by the Equality Act 2004. In short, it is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that the 1996 Regulations are inherently incompatible with the Directive, a form of "per se" inconsistency, and accordingly cannot be relied upon to terminate his employment on his 60th birthday. In this context, though in precisely what way remains unclear, reference has also been made to the said Act of 2004 as being in itself an Act against which the Regulation should be measured. I will return to the point later in this judgment.

61. This Directive, adopted on the basis of Article 13 of the EC Treaty, contains the following recitals which should be outlined:-

> "(4) The right of all persons to equality before the law and protection against discrimination constitutes a [recognised] universal right ...
>
> (9) Employment and occupation are key elements in guaranteeing equal opportunities for all and contribute strongly to the full participation of citizens in economic, cultural and social life and to realising their potential. ...
> (11) Discrimination based on religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation may undermine the achievement of the objectives of the EC Treaty, in particular the attainment of a high level of employment and social protection, raising the standard of living and the quality of life, economic and social cohesion and solidarity, and the free movement of persons.

(12) To this end, any direct or indirect discrimination based on religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation as regards the areas covered by this Directive should be prohibited throughout the Community...

(14) This Directive shall be without prejudice to national provisions laying down retirement ages. ...

(18) This Directive does not require, in particular, the armed forces and the police, prison or emergency services to recruit or maintain in employment persons who do not have the required capacity to carry out the range of functions that they may be called upon to perform with regard to the legitimate objective of preserving the operational capacity of those services.

(23) In very limited circumstances, a difference of treatment may be justified where a characteristic related to religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement, when the objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate...

(25) The prohibition of age discrimination is an essential part of meeting the aims set out in the Employment Guidelines and encouraging diversity in the workforce. However, differences in treatment in connection with age may be justified under certain circumstances and therefore require specific provisions which may vary in accordance with the situation in Member States. It is therefore essential to distinguish between differences in treatment which are justified, in particular by legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and discrimination which must be prohibited."

62. The following Articles of the Directive must also be referred to:

i) Article 1 of the Directive states that its purpose is "to lay down a general framework for combating discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation as regards employment and occupation, with a view to putting into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment."

ii) Article 2, headed "Concept of Discrimination", provides:

"1. For the purposes of this Directive, the 'principle of equal treatment' shall mean that there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination whatsoever on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1.

2. For the purposes of paragraph 1:

(a) direct discrimination shall be taken to occur where one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation, on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1;

(b) indirect discrimination shall be taken to occur where an apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice would put persons having a particular religion or belief, a particular disability, a particular age, or a particular sexual orientation at a particular disadvantage compared with other persons unless... that provision, criterion or practice is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary..." (Emphasis added)

iii) Article 3, delineating the scope of the Directive, states that it "shall apply to all persons, as regards both the public and private sectors, including public bodies, in relation to... (c) employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay..."

iv) Article 6, which is headed "Justification of differences of treatment on grounds of age", at sub-article (1), reads:

> "Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that differences of treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination, if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary." (Emphasis added)

63. The Directive, by virtue of Article 20, became directly applicable in this jurisdiction on 2nd December 2003.

64. Before dealing substantively with the instrument, a preliminary issue which arises thereunder, must be resolved. As will be considered more thoroughly in the next part of the judgment, Recital 14 of the Directive reads "this Directive shall be without prejudice to national provisions laying down retirement ages". It is the plaintiff's case that, notwithstanding this recital, any relevant provision of national law must still be compatible with the Directive. On the other hand the defendants argue that by its plain meaning, once there is in existence such a national measure, it is immune from Directive compatibility.

65. In Félix Palacios de la Villa v. Cortefiel Servicios SA, (Case C-411/05) [2007] ECR I-08531 (16th October 2007), the European Court of Justice expressed a view on this Recital. In that case Spanish law, under certain conditions, permitted freely negotiated collective agreements between workers and employers to contain provisos dealing with compulsory retiring ages. On a challenge to the provisions contained within one such agreement, the Court at para. 44 of its judgment had this to say on Recital 14:

> "It is true that, according to recital 14 in its preamble, Directive 2000/78 is to be without prejudice to national provisions laying down retirement ages. However, that Recital merely states that the Directive does not affect the competence of the member states to determine retiring age and does not in any way preclude the application of that Directive to national measures governing the conditions for termination of employment contracts where the retirement age, thus established, has been reached."

66. The defendants seek to distinguish that decision by pointing out that the retirement age was not "laid down" by any domestic law, and therefore there was no direct establishment on the part of the national authority. In addition, a lengthy passage from the opinion of Advocate General Mazak, delivered on 15th February 2007, was opened in which, at paras. 64 and 65, he opines that Recital 14 should be read in a manner which immunised from Directive scrutiny national measures containing retirement ages. It was thus urged upon this Court that effect should be given to the primacy of the plain and unambiguous language of Recital 14.

67. I am afraid that I cannot agree with this submission; even, if uninfluenced by case law, I would hold, relying upon first principles, that such a construction would be inherently incompatible with the whole purpose, thrust and tenor of the Directive. Given the significance of furthering the principle of equality and noting the steps taken at community level to implement this, it would seem almost self-defeating, to allow member states to disregard the Directive, by such simple means as fixing compulsory retiring ages. It would matter not at what particular age the threshold was set, or whether there was any or any legitimate justification therefor. Once on the statute books the effect would be to bypass the Directive. I could not hold that this was either the intention of the Directive or indeed its effect.

68. In addition, I entirely disagree that the Palacios decision can be distinguished in such a manner so as to neutralise the effect of para. 44 of the Court's judgment. In my view the real challenge in the case was to a compulsory retiring age which was both recognised and enforceable in the domestic laws of that state. The fact that its foundation lay directly within the collective agreement does not in any way take from the primacy of the point. I therefore believe that Palacios is a direct authority on Recital 14 and, since it accords with my own interpretation as to the placement of that Recital, I would respectfully follow it. Therefore, having regard also to the next succeeding paragraph, I am satisfied that the Directive applies to the Regulations under review in this action.

69. There can be no doubt in my view but that members of An Garda Síochána serving within that force are covered by the Directive (and the 2004 Act). That the Directive applies is, in my opinion, self-evident from the Employment Equality Act 1998, as amended by the 2004 Act; this because of the definitions given to "employee", and "contract of service", and because of the express provisions of s. 2(3) which specifically deem a member of An Garda Síochána to be an employee of the State under a contract of service. In addition it is significant to note that in its original form s. 37(4) of the 1998 Act applied its provisions to members of the Defence Forces, An Garda Síochána and the Prison Service. In its amended form, by virtue of s. 25 thereof, application of the Act is continued only in respect of members of the Defence Forces. These circumstances, as well as the provisions of s. 37(3) and (4), as amended, make it inescapably clear that the provisions of the Directive apply to the plaintiff in this case.

70. That being so, it inevitably must follow that the provision of the 1996 Regulations, which had the effect of terminating the plaintiff's employment at age 60, constitutes direct discrimination within the meaning of Article 2 of the Directive; in that the plaintiff is treated less favourably than another Assistant Commissioner who has not reached the age of 60. Therefore it falls squarely within the prohibition on direct discrimination. This conclusion of course equally applies to the Equality Act 2004. Consequently it is incumbent upon the member state to justify this difference of treatment on the grounds of age. It can do so under the provisions of Article 6 if it can establish that, within the context of national law, the differences in such treatment are "objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour, market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary" (see paras. 61 – 62 supra. for the relevant Directive provisions).

71. The effect of the Directive, in these circumstances, can thus be summarised:-

i) In pursuit of its purpose to implement the principle of equal treatment in employment and occupation, it prohibits direct and indirect discrimination on any of the discriminatory grounds which include age.

ii) "Direct discrimination" for this purpose occurs where by reason of age one person is treated less favourably than another in a comparable situation (Article 2).

iii) If a national law provides for differences in treatment between comparable persons on the grounds of age, such inequality will not necessarily be prohibited if the differences are objectively and reasonably justified, by reference to a legitimate aim such as legitimate employment policy, labour markets and vocational training objectives, and if the means used are appropriate and necessary (article 6).

iv) Member States have a broad discretion in their choice of identifying the aim(s) to be pursued and the means or measures to implement such (Recital 25). These can be identified by reference to political, economic, social, demographic and budgetary considerations, provided overall the effect of the Directive is not put in peril: Mangold [2005] ECR I-9981.

v) Member States shall, without prejudice to the Directive, have the power to fix retiring ages (Recital 14).

vi) Member States are not obliged under the provisions of the Directive to recruit, or maintain in employment, persons in the police, prison or emergency services who lack the capacity to perform the required service: this derogation supports the legitimate objective which a Member State may have in preserving the operational capacity of these services (Recital 18).

72. Having come to the conclusion that the Directive is applicable to the current situation, it must still be determined if and how the national laws relating to the compulsory retirement of Assistant Commissioners at age 60, fall foul of the Directive.

73. It is settled in the case law that in order to avail of the Directive's protection the complainant must show that he is being treated differently to someone who is in the same position as him, or that someone who is in a different position is being treated the same as him (see Article 2(2)(a)). This person, hypothetical or otherwise, is referred to as the "comparator".

74. In the context of age, it has been recognised that this comparator requirement may be difficult to define with specificity. Unlike other areas such as sex discrimination, where it can be readily apparent that two comparable people are being treated differently on that basis (as in Lindorfer v. Council of the European Union Case C-277/04: re: Community pension regulations, where in calculating pension amounts, account was taken of a person's sex on the basis that women lived longer: this was illegally discriminatory), age presents a particular problem. The European Commission paper on Employment & Social Affairs entitled "Age Discrimination and European Law", (Colm O'Cinneide, 2005), (hereinafter "the Commission paper") notes that the fluid nature of a person's age, and the uncertain and shifting nature of "age groups", as well as the changing expectations which accompany changes in age, even between persons of similar ages, made the application of the comparator test difficult in this context.

75. Reference was made to the decision of the Irish Equality Tribunal in Perry v. Garda Commissioner DEC-E2001-029. In that case the Equality Officer found that provisions governing voluntary retirement were discriminatory, since if the retirement scheme was considered by reference to two hypothetical employees, one aged 60 plus 1 day old, and another aged 60 minus 1 day, the result leads to a disparity between the resulting gratuity payments. This could not be explained with reference to "clear actuarial or other evidence ... presented by the respondent which would make such discrimination permissible in the context of the [Employment Equality Act 1998]." However, the applicant ultimately lost because of transitional measures allowing for age-related pay to continue for three years after the entry into force of the Employment Equality Act 1998.

76. The difficulty of finding a suitable comparator in relation to age discrimination was also highlighted in the Opinion of the Advocate General in Palacios, where Advocate General Mazák felt that:

> "So far as non-discrimination on grounds of age, especially, is concerned, it should be borne in mind that that prohibition is of a specific nature in that age as a criterion is a point on a scale and that, therefore, age discrimination may be graduated. It is therefore a much more difficult task to determine the existence of discrimination on grounds of age than for example in the case of discrimination on grounds of sex, where the comparators are more clearly defined."

77. Once a difference in treatment is shown to exist with a relevant comparator, it is then necessary to show that such is due to age; or put another way, that age is a "material factor". Such discrimination may be obvious on its face, as was seemingly the case in Perry, or else it may be more covert; referring to factors that are essentially "age proxies", for example if an employee was dismissed for "being around too long" or was denied a promotion for being "overqualified", when the decision was essentially based on age. As the Commission paper states, such "age proxies" constitute direct discrimination "as age will actually be a 'material factor' in the decision-making process."

78. It is worth noting that under Article 10(1) of the Directive, if a claimant can establish a prima facie case that age was a material causal factor in the decision, then the burden of proof shifts to the respondent to show that age was not such a factor, or else that it was justified. The fact that one candidate is preferred over another of a different age will clearly not be enough to shift the burden. However, if, for example, a job was granted to a younger person who was less qualified than an older applicant then this could indicate the presence of age bias. The Commission Paper, p. 24, refers to a Slovakian District Court case (2003 No. 7C 190/02-309) where the court found discrimination on the basis that a research worker with more than 20 years experience, had been excluded from the position of coordinator (even though she had been involved in developing, and had been mentioned in, an initial project proposal), in favour of a younger less qualified researcher, where no justification could be established.

79. Nonetheless, as I have previously said, it is clear that the imposition of mandatory retirement age is discriminatory, per se, under the Directive, in that it places one person at a disadvantage to another, who would otherwise be in the same situation, on the grounds of age alone.

80. It must thus be determined whether such discrimination is saved by one or more of the justifications under the Directive. As enunciated, these justifications include:

i) That the measure is a "genuine and determining occupational requirement" ("GOR");

ii) That the measure is aimed at "preserving the operational capacity" of the Gardaí;

iii) That the measure is justified by a legitimate aim, in this case employment policy; or,

iv) That the measure is "objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary" – the proportionality requirement.

81. Turning to the first potential justification, namely that of a GOR. Article 4 permits discrimination where age is "a genuine and determining occupational requirement for the position in question, and it is proportionate to apply this requirement in the particular circumstances." This Article only applies where the characteristic of age itself, goes towards an applicant's ability to perform a particular job. The Commission paper states that "it is difficult to see many circumstances where such a blunt characteristic such as age would be required as a 'genuine occupational requirement'" and notes that the UK government's consultation paper on implementation of the Directive suggests that there will be "very few cases where age is genuinely a requirement." But there will be some, however few, such as acting, or modelling clothes aimed at a particular age group. As stated earlier, there may be cases where characteristics acting as proxies to age might be employed in relation to a genuine occupational requirement. The Commission however has serious reservations about the practical application of the saver, noting that age should not be used as a proxy for characteristics such as incapacity, ill-health or immaturity, since:

This would be so even if age could be statistically linked to trends in those characteristics. Nonetheless there may be circumstances where the assessment of individual work is impossible or excessively onerous, and where age can in some way be linked to the possession of a GOR. In those circumstances age discrimination may be a "necessary shorthand" to differentiate between different groups of works. However, in the opinion of the Commission:

> "[T]he use of such age limits will have to be shown clearly necessary: even a pressing legitimate aim such as public safety cannot justify the sweeping use of age limits where individual assessment is possible."

82. From the Canadian case of Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) [1989] 1 SCR 143 and the Australian case of Qantas v. Christie (1998) 152 ALR 1295 two questions can generally be asked in this context:

> "a) are the characteristics that are cited to justify the act of discrimination legitimate and justifiable grounds for distinguishing between two people, b) is age an effective and reliable proxy for the relevant characteristics or a necessary differentiating tool for determining whether an individual possesses those characteristics."

83. This test, which was applied in another Canadian case of MacDonald v. Regional Administrative School Unit No. 1 (1992) 16 CHRR D/409, lead to the conclusion that a state-wide mandatory retirement age of 65 for school bus drivers was justifiable, given the number of drivers involved. In relation to protecting public safety, the Commission paper cites "the US Supreme Court case decision in Western Airlines v. Criswell No.83-1545, where the Court emphasised that employers would have to demonstrate that the use of an age limit was 'necessary' and individual assessment was not possible, even where public safety was an issue."

84. Recital 18 of the Directive which allows, in relation to the armed forces and the police, prison or emergency services, discrimination "with regard to the legitimate objective of preserving the operational capacity of that service" should be read in light of the exemption for genuine occupational requirements. Age in the context of such services would seem to be a form of genuine occupational requirement, since it is obvious that such services require a great degree of physicality and that the age of the people "on the ground", so to speak, would indeed inhibit their efficiency. However, where such a restriction is in place in relation to the armed forces or police services, there would still be a requirement that such is for the purpose of preserving the operational capacity of the force, and/or, as a genuine occupational requirement; any such measure should also be proportionate. Although in this regard the perils of using age as a proxy for other characteristics should of course be borne in mind.

85. What constitutes "preserving the operational capacity" of the Gardaí? One can readily understand why such a saver was placed in the Directive. Were this provision not in place, it would be open to a member of a police force, army or other such service, to claim that it was an illegitimate discrimination to have different retirement ages as between what one might call the "troops on the ground", or "bobbies on the beat", and those members of a force who have a more administrative, managerial or operational role. In the case of the Gardaí this was the situation until the most recent regulations which now bring in line the retirement ages of all members (excluding the Garda Reserves), irrespective of rank to aged 60. Prior to this there was a difference as between the lower ranks, who could be seen to be doing the more physical work, and the higher ranks, including the Commissioner ranks, who had a more operational role. That such a distinction should be allowed may well be justified, since it is obvious that a Garda on the beat will need to be more physically able than one behind a desk. Nevertheless, were the aforementioned saver not included, such discrimination might be open to challenge given that the correlation between age and physical fitness for duty is not a given, and will inevitably vary as between individual members.

86. In any event I am satisfied that the Regulations under consideration herein, could not be said to be aimed at "preserving the operational capacity" of the force. Nor could it be said that the age of the Assistant Commissioner formed part of the "occupational requirement", of that position as it could be of a job like child modelling. There is nothing inherent about the age used in the Regulations which would mean that a person of a certain age was required for the job.

87. The above two potential justifications thus seem aimed at very specific circumstances which would otherwise be discriminatory. The following two are wider in their potential application and seek to regulate the use of age discrimination where it is required for broader social purposes and where it is proportionate.

88. An issue which arose during the trial was the question of whether, in looking at the reasons and justification offered, one should do so by reference to the context in which the Regulation was made, or in the context of changed circumstances since that time. Given my conclusions on this particular matter, it should be noted that the following comments strictly speaking are obiter. If I was deciding this matter solely on administrative law grounds I would feel bound, in general, only to consider the justification question in light of the situation at that time. It is at this time when the "reasonableness" of a decision should be tested. To otherwise review such matters would be to look towards the merits of the decision in light of changing circumstances; in the presenting situation this is not the purpose of judicial review. The question in judicial review is whether there was an error in the way in which a decision was arrived at. This question is fixed in time; either the matter was properly decided at the time, or it was not. Changing circumstances do not render a prior decision improper merely because, under new conditions, the legitimate justifications of the decision-maker no longer hold true.

89. However, in circumstances where the Court is reviewing a matter not purely as to the "reasonableness" of a decision, but in relation to whether its continued existence is in compliance with a Directive (especially in circumstances where the Directive post-dates the Regulation), I am satisfied that the Court may also inquire as to whether at the current date the Regulations in questions can be justified. This makes sense given that some measures may be temporally or circumstantially justified, but once the reason for their original inception has passed, they would clearly no longer be so. For example if movement restrictions were put in place to curb the spread of an infectious disease which had long since ceased, or if restrictions were placed on certain organisations because of their composition or aims, which had long since changed. In both situations the justifying purpose no longer exists and so the once legitimate aims were now moot, thereby no longer justifying their purported compliance with the Directive.

90. Much evidence was led by the Defendants in attempting to justify the 1996 Regulations. Such justifications, as outlined herein, it was contended, were as relevant today as when the Regulations were introduced. I would agree with this proposition, insofar as I agree that the particular justifications advanced by the Defendants, if they were legitimate at all, would be so regardless of whether they were judged at the time of the making of the 1996 Regulations or today. It is therefore unnecessary, and I do not propose, to distinguish between whether the justifications were or still are relevant. That is not to say that justifications may not cease to be legitimate with the passage of time, but in the present circumstances I can see no real difference as between then and now with regards to their legitimacy.

91. The next proposition to deal with is thus whether the justifications advanced by the Defendants relate to a "legitimate aim", in particular a "legitimate employment policy" or like aim; the list of examples given in the Directive is not an exhaustive one, given the use of the word "including"; nor should it be taken that where a justification falls under one of the headings in Article 6(1) that it will not be scrutinised as to whether the distinction in question is objectively justified. Such an interpretation is supported by the Opinion of Advocate General Sharpton in Birgit Bartsch v. Bosch und Siemens Hausgeräte (BSH) Altersfürsorge GmbH (delivered on 22nd May 2008), para. 110. She states at para. 112 of her Opinion that:

> "The only logical conclusion to be drawn is that Directive 2000/78 expressly permits particular kinds of differential treatment based directly on grounds of age, provided that they are 'objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim ... and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary'. This analysis of the text is borne out by the Court's judgment in Palacios de la Villa..."

92. In Palacios the ECJ considered whether the national law in that case had a "legitimate aim". The Court held, at para. 62, that:

"[P]laced in its context, the ... provision was aimed at regulating the national labour market, in particular, for the purposes of checking unemployment."

The respondents argued in the circumstances that the legislation, which allowed for compulsory retirement ages in accordance with collective agreements, had the legitimate aim of "regulating the national labour market, in particular, for the purposes of checking unemployment". The court accepted this as a legitimate aim, stating that:

"64. The legitimacy of such an aim of public interest cannot reasonably be called into question, since unemployment policy and labour market trends are among the objectives expressly laid down in the first subparagraph of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 and, in accordance with the first indent of the first paragraph of Article 2 EU and Article 2 EC, the promotion of a high level of employment is one of the ends pursued both by the European Union and the European Community.

65. Furthermore, the Court has already held that encouragement of recruitment undoubtedly constitutes a legitimate aim of social policy (see, in particular, Case C-208/05 [2007] ECR I-181, paragraph 39) and that assessment must evidently apply to instruments of national employment policy designed to improve opportunities for entering the labour market for certain categories of workers."

93. The Commission paper, in considering what constitute legitimate aims, noted that concern had been expressed by Eurolink Age and other NGOs that the very broad and vague wording of the examples might encourage a loose approach. However, the Commission paper states that the examples should only be seen as broad guidelines; it then cites examples of legitimate aims considered in a UK Department of Trade and Industry Consultation Paper, "Equality and Diversity: Age Matters" (London: DTI, 2003). These included:

"a. health, welfare and safety – for example, for the protection of younger workers;

b. facilitation of employment planning – for example, where a business has a number of people approaching retirement age at the same time;

c. the particular training requirements of the post in question – for example, air traffic controllers...

d. encouraging and rewarding loyalty;

e. the need for a reasonable period of employment before retirement – for example, an employer who has exceptionally justified a retirement age of 65 might decline to employ someone a few months short of 65 if ... the applicant would not be sufficiently productive in that time."

94. In the context of considering the legitimate aims advanced, the paper further notes that it is obviously necessary for the person advancing that aim to have a subjective belief as to its validity. Furthermore:

> "[T]he less pressing and immediate the legitimate aim concerned, the greater may be the degree of scrutiny of the objective justification of an age distinction: a discriminatory scheme justified on public safety grounds will generally require less clear-cut justification than one based on economic reasons."

95. In this case the relevant justifications would be that the alteration in the retirement ages was required to:

i) maintain motivation within the force and senior ranks, by preventing the blocking of the Commissioner ranks;

ii) bring the retirement age of the Assistant / Deputy Commissioners in line with that of the Commissioner and the Superintendents ranks;

iii) create a competitive pool of candidates from which the Commissioner might be chosen;

iv) implement the new regional command structure, with a greater operational focus.

96. Before continuing I would note that it is firmly established that where justification is sought, and multiple reasons are given, it will be enough that one or more of the justifications advanced. amount to a legitimate aim.

97. The efficient and effective running of the Gardaí is certainly an "aim of public interest", as put in Palacios. It is likely that such an aim would fall under the heading of "employment policy". However the required extent that such a policy would need to become one of the inclusive examples under Article 6(1) is unclear. Nonetheless, I am content to conclude that the justifications advanced in this case constitute a prima facie legitimate aim, namely "employment policy" within the Gardaí.

98. As noted above, even where a measure is shown to have been enacted with a legitimate aim it must still show itself to be appropriate and necessary. This is the test of proportionality; the measure must go no further than is required to reach the legitimate aim and must do so in the least restrictive way.

99. The ECJ considered Article 6(1) in Werner Mangold v. Rüdiger Helm [2005] ECR I-9981. That case concerned a German law which permitted employers to conclude, without restriction, fixed-term contracts of employment with workers over the age of 52. The Court noted the purpose of the legislation as being to promote the vocational integration of unemployed older workers, insofar as they encounter considerable difficulty in finding work. Such public interest objectives could not be doubted; it was an objective and reasonable justification for different treatment on the ground of age. Nonetheless, it still fell to be considered whether the means to achieve that legitimate objective were appropriate and necessary, noting that Member States enjoy a broad discretion in this regard. The Court, taking a pragmatic view, stated that in reality the provision had lead to a situation in which all workers who had reached the age of 52, "without distinction, whether they were employed before the contract concluded and whatever the duration of any period of unemployment" would be offered fixed-term contracts, which could be renewed indefinitely. This meant that a significant body of workers, determined solely on the basis of age, were in danger of being excluded from the benefit of stable employment. The Court thus concluded that:

"In so far as such legislation takes the age of the worker concerned as the only criterion for the application of a fixed-term contract of employment, when it has not been shown that fixing an age threshold, as such, regardless of any other consideration linked to the structure of the labour market in question or the personal situation of the person concerned, is objectively necessary to the attainment of the objective ... it must be considered to go beyond what is appropriate and necessary in order to attain the objective pursued. Observance of the principle of proportionality requires every derogation from an individual right to reconcile, so far as is possible, the requirements of the principle of equal treatment with those of the aim pursued (see, to that effect, Case C-476/99 Lommers [2002] ECR I-2891, paragraph 39). Such national legislation cannot, therefore, be justified under Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78."

100. The question of whether a measure which was objectively justified was nevertheless implemented by means which were appropriate and necessary, that is proportionate, under Article 6(1), was also considered in a decision of the U.K. Employment Tribunal: Hampton v. Lord Chancellor and Ministry of Justice (Case No.: 2300835/2007). It that case the claimant held the judicial office of Recorder. Service as a Recorder is generally regarded as a prerequisite for appointment to a salaried position on the Circuit or High Court bench. In 1998 the retirement age for Recorders was reduced from 70 to 65. In 2000 a standard retirement age was introduced for all new judicial appointments, however in 2002 this was reversed and the age was increased back to 70 for all fee paid judicial office holders, except for Recorders and Deputy District and High Court Judges, since the lower retirement age had affected the operational viability of certain Tribunals. The applicant complained that the different retirement ages between Recorders and other judicial office holders was discriminatory, although he accepted that some retirement age needed to be set so as to ensure judicial independence. The Ministry having conceded that the applicant had been subjected to less favourable treatment on the ground of age, the sole issue was thus whether the policy of retiring all Recorders at 65 could be objectively justified.

101. The Ministry argued that the retention of Recorders from age 65 to 70, who would not be in the pool for appointment to full-time judicial office, prevented the recruitment of younger recorder who would be in such a pool. Furthermore it argued that the presence of Recorders over the age of 65 would reduce the availability of more challenging cases, and thus necessary experience, for those who would be in the pool for next appointment. The Tribunal, however, rejected these arguments. It found that there was no evidence to support the assumption that all Recorders over the age of 65 would remain in the post until 70. Nor did it consider that the reduction in the number of younger Recorders, which would result from increasing the retirement age to 70, would have any effect on the production of suitable candidates for judicial appointment. It also felt that, contrary to the submissions of the Ministry, a reduction in the number of vacancies would increase competition and in fact lead to an increase in the quality of those appointed. Further, it noted that steps could be taken to ensure that those who had the potential to be promoted to a judicial post were allocated the right types of cases so as to gain the appropriate experience. For these reasons, the Tribunal did not accept that the policy of retiring Records at 65 was a proportionate means of achieving the admittedly legitimate aim of ensuring a reasonable flow of new appointments into the judiciary.

102. Both Mangold and Hampton in my view are clearly distinguishable from the present case. In Mangold the provisions in question had a wide ranging reach, affecting every person over the age of 52. It was clear that in practice this was causing indirect discrimination against this age group. In contrast the provisions here are of a specific and defined character. Hampton, similarly, is distinguishable. It was clear in Hampton that there was a very large pool of Recorders, well over a thousand, from whom Judges could be appointed. The Tribunal thus felt that there was no real evidence that keeping the age at 65 could be justified on this ground. Nor could it be proportionate where, in the circumstances, all of the problems identified by the State could have been overcome by much less invasive methods than having a compulsory retirement age. Again in the instant case there are but a dozen persons in the Assistant and Deputy Commissioner ranks from whom a Commissioner might be chosen. Even if it was to be accepted, as was advanced by the Plaintiff, that a Commissioner could be appointed from the Chief Superintendent ranks, the pool would still not be anywhere near the size of the one considered in Hampton. These two cases are therefore readily distinguishable from the present situation. Finally I should say that the possibility of an appointment from the Chief Superintendent rank does not in any way diminish the importance of having a quota available at the higher rank. It is having a choice from the most senior group that is the point.

103. The means in this case were the introduction of a Regulation which reduced the age of retirement for Assistant Commissioners from 65 to 60. However this reduction is still subject to regulation 6(b) of the 1951 Regulations which allows the extension of a member's service for a period of up to five years where the Commissioner is satisfied that, because of some special qualification or experience, it is in the interests of the efficiency of An Garda Síochána to do so. Mr. Donnellan did in fact make such a request to the Commissioner for such an extension, but this in fact was refused.

104. The fact that individual assessment is possible is an important consideration. Where there are a large number of people involved and it would be impractical to test every person then it may be proportional to use some form of age-proxy. Conversely, where there are few people to assess and such could be done relatively easily it would not be proportionate to use blanket proxies so as to determine personal characteristics. As stated in the Commission paper:

> "A person's health, maturity, ability to learn, experience, skill, willingness to work may often be ascertained by normal vetting procedures, individual assessments and good job specifications. A 50-year old secretary, for example, could be assumed to have certain types of experience not held by a 20-year old, but this alone should not justify automatic selection for the older applicant without an assessment of the merit of the 20-year old. The use of maximum entry ages for the police in many member states may for example be very questionable. In a Dutch case, a number of referees successfully challenged the age limits of 47 and 49 used by the Royal Dutch Football Association (KNVB) on the basis that individual assessment of each referee's capability for the job of referee was entirely possible, and it was a breach of proportionality to set a fixed age limit.
> [Further,] [a]ge limits may be necessary in particular industries to ensure a 'turnover' of workers and to encourage recruits into a profession: the Dutch Supreme Court has upheld the imposition of a compulsory retirement age upon airline pilots for this reason... [H]owever, the use of age limits that intended to simply shift the age profile of the company or which unreasonably narrow the age spread of new recruits may face great difficulties in showing objective justification."

105. The Dutch Supreme Court case referred to as 16 pilots v. Martinaur Holland NV and the Association of Dutch Pilots, Hoge Raad [Dutch Supreme Court] (8th October 2004 – Nr. C03/077HR) should be noted. That case was taken by 16 pilots against Martinair Holland NV and the VNV (Dutch Airlines Association). A compulsory retirement age of 56 had been set for pilots. The court noted that in the 1970s the original justification for this would have related to traffic safety and health, since in the past flying could take a high physical toll on pilots. However, nowadays the primary purpose of the measure was to facilitate and to enhance a regular and predictable flow of pilots within the corps. Both the Cantonal and Supreme Court ruled that this rationale formed an objective justification. It should be observed that this conclusion was influenced by the fact that a pilot's career was structured in such a manner that it was possible to reach the highest seniority before retirement.

International Jurisprudence:

106. Some flavour of the international jurisprudence relative to the special position of age as a ground for discrimination was also offered.

107. Attention was drawn by the Supreme Court of the U.S. in Massachusetts Board of Retirement et al. v. Murgia 427 U.S. 307 (1975) to the fact that:

"While the treatment of the aged in this Nation has not been wholly free of discrimination, such persons, unlike, say, those who have been discriminated against on the basis of race or national origin, have not experienced a 'history of unequal treatment' or been subjected to unique disabilities on the basis of stereotyped characteristics not truly indicative of their abilities."

Thus the U.S. Supreme Court felt that the aged did not constitute a "suspect class" for the purposes of equal protection. Nor did they constitute a:

"'discrete and insular' group... in need of 'extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process.' Instead, it marks a stage that each of us will reach if we live out our normal span."

108. The court, in that case, went on to consider the rational-basis of a mandatory retirement age of 50 for uniformed state police officers, whose functions were to protect persons and property and to maintain law and order. They were in effect the operational face of the force. The court felt that the mandatory retirement of officers rationally sought to protect the public by assuring "physical preparedness" of its uniformed officers. However, Marshall J. dissented from this position strongly criticising the "two-tier" test for equal protection which looked at law with "strict scrutiny and mere rationality" since it did not realistically represent the way the court did or should go about the consideration of equal protection. He contended that the use of "strict scrutiny" in relation to "suspect classes" results in almost all statutes subject to such scrutiny being struck down, and thus leads to a great reluctance on the part of the court to extend the categories of "suspect classes". However, he says, this results in too much legislation being dropped to the bottom tier and being measured by mere rationality, which leads to the opposite result of almost all legislation being upheld. He strongly dissented to the court's conclusion in the above case stating:

"There is simply no reason why a statute that tells able-bodied police officers, ready and willing to work, that they no longer have the right to earn a living in their chosen profession merely because they are 50 years old should be judged on the same minimal standards of rationality that we use to test economic legislation that discriminates against business interests."

109. The U.S. jurisprudence on issues of equality is, I feel, of limited persuasiveness. The courts in the U.S. are very slow to interfere with legislative intent. Further, their considerations are based on far broader, amorphous considerations of a general right to equality before the law, whereas in this case we are looking at a positive piece of law, Directive 2000/78/EC, which lays out specifically what is required of legislation which purports to treat specific groups of people in different ways; it must be objectively justified and proportionate. Such a proportionality argument is peculiarly European; no such consideration is given to the idea that legislation might achieve a similar objective in a different and less restrictive way in the U.S. case law.

110. In the more recent case of Kimel et al. v. Florida Board of Regents et al. 528 U.S. 62 (2000) the court held that:

"States may discriminate on the basis of age without offending the Federal Constitution's Fourteenth Amendment if the age classification in question is rationally related to a legitimate state interest; the rationality commanded by the Amendment's equal protection clause does not require states to match age distinctions and the legitimate interests they serve with razorlike precision; under the Amendment, a state may rely on age as a proxy for other qualities, abilities, or characteristics that are relevant to the state's legitimate interest, as (1) the Constitution does not preclude reliance on such generalisations, and (2) that age proves to be an inaccurate proxy in any individual case is irrelevant..."

111. As discussed above, this is wholly inconsistent with the line taken by the ECJ. Reliance on age-proxies must be proportionate, and even where there are legitimate aims for differences in treatment, such aims must still be necessary and appropriate.

112. The U.S. treatment of legitimate aims would also not be sufficient under the Directive. The Court in Kimel also held that:

> "When conducting rational basis review under the equal protection clause the Federal Constitution's Fourteenth Amendment, the United States Supreme Court will not overturn government actions unless the varying treatment of different groups or persons is so unrelated to the achievement of any combination of legitimate purposes that the court can only conclude that the actions were irrational; in contrast, when a state discriminates on the basis of race or gender, the court requires a tighter fit between the discriminatory means and the legitimate ends they serve; because an age classification is presumptively rational, the individual challenging its constitutionality bears the burden of proving that the facts on which the classification is apparently based could not reasonably be conceived to be true by the governmental decision-maker."

113. Under the Directive, the burden of proof, once a prima facie case of direct discrimination is made out, is borne by the respondent who must justify the distinction. This burden equally applies to age discrimination as it does to race, gender and disability. Although there is a difference between different types of discrimination, such will go towards the justifiability of the discrimination; where it will be easier to justify differences in treatment on grounds of age, since these are inherently more likely to have a rational basis, compared, for example, to race. The Directive in no way states that discrimination on the ground of age is presumptively rational.

114. Although not as extreme as the U.S. case law, the jurisprudence from Canada and Australia are equally distinguishable on the ground that they are considering constitutional rights, rather than specific legislative protection, and thus the question of discrimination on the grounds of age is considered in a more generalised way.

115. Notwithstanding this however, it is worth noting in the Canadian context that s. 32(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms confines the Charter's operation to government actions. The Canadian Supreme Court in McKinney v. University of Guelph [1990] 3 SCR 229 found that it is deliberately so confined, and its purpose is as a check against government powers over the individual, and not as a tool to be used against private individuals. This is not the case with equal treatment under the Directive; the private sector is specifically included under Article 3(1).

116. There are two decisions from the U.K. which should also be mentioned: R (Carson) v. Work and Pensions Secretary and R (Reynolds) v. Work and Pensions Secretary, both reported at [2006] 1 AC 173. The facts of Carson were that the applicant was a pensioner living in South Africa. She had paid all the necessary contributions, continuing to make voluntary payments after emigration. When she turned sixty, she started to receive the same pension she would have received if she had been living in the United Kingdom. On 9th April 2001 the basic pension for United Kingdom pensioners was increased to reflect the rise in the United Kingdom cost of living. However pensioners ordinarily resident abroad are not entitled to these annual increases. The applicant thus continued to receive the basic pension. Nonetheless, despite acknowledging that she was being treated in a different way to those ordinarily resident, the Court found that she was in a "materially and relevantly" different position to a person resident in the UK. Once such a difference was apparent Parliament were entitled to treat such a person differently; indeed the Court noted it could have legitimately refused to pay her any pension at all. This particular case is, however, of limited relevance. It is clear that Ms. Carson was not being discriminated against on the ground of age, rather because of her status as a non-resident, or expatriate.

117. The Second case is more on point. The applicant, Ms. Reynolds, complained that because she was under the age of 25, she was paid jobseeker's allowance and then income support at the reduced rate of £41.35 a week instead of the full rate of £52.20. She argued that Article 14 of the ECHR entitles her to be treated equally with people over the age of 25. Once again the Court found that since there were material differences between older and younger persons, in particular the expenses of older people were necessarily higher, that was sufficient to justify the difference in treatment.

118. In any event, the cases in Carson and Reynolds were not considered under the Directive, but under the UK Human Rights Act 1998. They are thus of limited persuasiveness. Before leaving them, however, I would like to comment on the following passages from the speech of Lord Walker. At p. 193 of the report he said:

> "Age is a personal characteristic, but it is different in kind from other personal characteristics. Every human being starts life as a tiny infant, and none of us can do anything to stop the passage of the years. As the High Court of Australia said (in a different context) in Stingel v. The Queen (1990) 171 CLR 312, 330: 'the process of development from childhood to maturity is something which, being common to us all, is an aspect of ordinariness.'"

This continues;

"There is nothing intrinsically demeaning about age. It may be disheartening for a man to be told that he cannot continue in his chosen job after 50 and it is certainly demeaning for a woman, air hostess, to be told that she cannot continue as a cabin crew member after the age of 40."

119. There is no doubt but that age has been treated in a way different from other discriminatory grounds. This has been acknowledged in several Commission papers, as it has been in many judicial decisions. However I would be hesitant to come to the view that age, as a matter of policy or common acceptability, should be relegated to a form of doubtful importance within the overall family of discriminatory grounds. Whilst I acknowledge that the contrary view has strong support, nonetheless I think that context is critical when evaluating this issue. By context I mean the type of discrimination involved, the broad and historical societal background in which it takes place, the cultural and ethnic history of the relevant area, the protective provisions of, and access to, the legal system etc. As appears from para. 7 of the Massachusetts case, the reasons why certain discriminatory ground have been elevated into a suspect class are because they were:

"Saddled with such disabilities or subjected to such a history of purposeful, unequal treatment or relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the political process."

If one was asked to provide a comparable context in this jurisdiction, I firmly believe that in respect of most if not all of the recognised discriminatory grounds, the resulting product in its composition would be very different to that which I have just quoted. So for my part, I would not be an enthusiast of compartmentalising grounds of discrimination, some of which may attract greater scrutiny than others. For all individuals who suffer discrimination, a thorough evaluation and, if necessary, a clear vindication, by appropriate measures is required.

120. Thus, for the above reasons, the international case law on age discrimination is of limited persuasiveness or application in the context of age discrimination in employment under the Directive.

Conclusions: The Directive:

121. With regards to compliance with Directive 2000/78/EC, firstly although the Regulation, by setting up a system of mandatory retirement, is prima facie direct discrimination, it can be said that the overall aim of the scheme is a legitimate one. In particular, given the peculiar structure of An Garda Síochána (paras. 34, 50 and others supra.), the aims of ensuring motivation and dynamism through increased prospect of promotion, the creation of the most useful pool of candidates possible for appointment to the position of Commissioner, are both rational and legitimate. These rationales were considered and outlined in more detail in relation to reasonableness, but my comments in relation thereto apply equally to this aspect of the challenge, being whether or not they are rational and legitimate in the context of the Directive. I thus note that the justifications advanced are sufficient to overcome the rationality challenge.

122. Secondly, nonetheless, in the context of the Directive these aims must be proportionate. As stated an important consideration in considering whether a measure will be proportionate is whether individual assessment would be possible in a given case, such that using an age-proxy would not be legitimate. In this regard I would place particular emphasis on the ability of, inter alia, the Assistant Commissioner to request an extension of his tenure in office. Such a request under Regulation 6(b) of the 1951 Regulations must I feel be viewed as a form of individual assessment. It must be presumed that when considering such a request the Minister will take into account the individual circumstances of the petitioner, for example his/her service record and skill set, as well as the needs of the force as a whole. The retirement age of 60, set by the 1996 Regulations, may therefore be seen as an activator for such a request, and consequently this type of individual assessment; at age 60, a person may apply to the Commissioner for a continuance, and the Commissioner should consider each application on an individual and case-by-case basis. In effect, despite the Plaintiff's accumulated skill, his desire to continue and his grievance at the force losing his 40 years experience, the Commissioner did not consider these to be sufficient to ground an extension. Although a continuation was refused in this case, the procedure under Regulation 6(b) of the 1951 regulation serves to temper the severity of what would otherwise be an absolute retirement age; thereby rendering it, in my opinion, proportionate. It cannot therefore be entirely equated with a blanket policy type position.

123. Furthermore the structure of a Garda's career is such that he can attain the highest office within his term of service and hold that position for a reasonable period. Moreover, and I know of no other employment position where this is possible, a member can retire after 30 years of service with a full pension at age 50. Thus, in addition to the financial package, which in this case is significant (see para. 9 supra.), a member's age of retirement is such that the prospect of a second career is very much open.

124. Counsel for the Plaintiff put forward the suggestion that a fixed term contract might serve better for the rank of Assistant Commissioner, and that this would alleviate the problem of "blocking", caused by Assistant Commissioners holding their position for upwards of ten years. Although this might be a more preferable option it is not for this Court to determine the employment policy of the Government in this regard, and as such it is a matter for the Minister and An Garda Síochána to decide. I thus do not propose to otherwise comment in this regard. I have thus come to the conclusion that the 1996 Regulations are proportionate.

125. I should also say that although much reference was made to the position of the Equality Act 2004 and it was suggested, albeit somewhat indirectly or even opaquely, that that Act in itself should be a yardstick against which the Regulation should be measured, this point was never fully explored and its correct place in contextual terms was never finalised. I therefore do not intend to deal with this matter individually. Instead I would merely note that any conclusions in relation to the Directive apply mutatis mutandis to any question of whether the 1996 Regulations are also compatible with the 2004 Act.

126. Before finishing, I must say that comments as to the legitimacy of the measures utilised in this case, as is usual, turn wholly on the specific facts of the case and such comments should not be taken as supporting the general legitimacy of all mandatory retirement or appointment ages. As noted, national measures relating to compulsory retirement ages are not excluded from consideration under Directive 2000/78/EC. Any discrimination with regards to age must, as put by that Directive, serve a legitimate aim or purpose, and the means taken to achieve that purpose must be appropriate and should go no further than is necessary, i.e. they should be proportionate.

127. For the above-cited reasons I therefore dismiss the Plaintiff's case.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

[2016 No. 708 J.R.]

MICHAEL LYONS

APPLICANT

LONGFORD WESMEATH EDUCATION AND TRAINING BOARD

RESPONDENT

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Eagar delivered on the 5th day of May, 2017

1. On the 9th September, 2016 Baker J. gave leave to the applicant to apply for judicial review and granted an order that the proceedings be stayed until the determination of the application for judicial review.

Facts

2. In May, 2015 the applicant was notified that a complaint of bullying had been made against him by his colleague, a teacher called Ms. Michelle Spence. This complaint cited a number of alleged incidents, some of which dated back to 2008. Notwithstanding the fact that the applicant's principal had been aware of the 2008 allegations for some years, the applicant first learned of their existence in 2015.

3. An investigation into the complaint was launched in accordance with the "Bullying Prevention Policy – Complaint Procedure for Education Training Board Staff". This procedure is specifically described as an industrial relations procedure and is not a legal procedure.

4. The respondent engaged a private limited company called Graphite Recruitment HRM Limited to carry out the investigation. The applicant was asked by the two investigators to submit his written response, to attend various meetings and interviews, with which he duly complied. On or about the 4th April, 2016 the applicant was furnished with a copy of the report of Graphite Recruitment HRM dated 24th March, 2016. As was apparent from the report, the two investigators of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. had "upheld" the allegations of bullying against the applicant insofar as it related to four specific instances (only) alleged to have occurred between January and April 2015 as follows:

(i) the applicant's alleged failure to include Ms. Spence's in the transition year Art Plan in January, 2015;

(ii) the applicant's failure to "acknowledge" Ms. Spence at a staff meeting in April, 2015;

(iii) the applicant's alleged failure to include Ms. Spence in a community arts project in April/May 2015; and

(iv) a dispute between the applicant and the respondent in relation to the use of a camera for school photographs from September 2014 to June 2015.

None of the other allegations were upheld. At no stage was the applicant permitted to cross-examine his accuser.

5. On the 21st April, 2016 the applicant received a letter from the respondent dated the 20th April, 2016 advising that the report of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. was to be adopted by the respondent. The applicant was advised that he had fifteen working days to make a limited appeal to the decision. He appealed but his appeal was rejected.

6. By letter dated 30th August, 2016 written by the Chief Executive of Longford Westmeath Education and Training Board, Christy Duffy, the applicant was advised that as his appeal had not been upheld that the investigation report "stands" together with the "findings" against him. The applicant was advised as follows: -

> "Bullying behaviour in an ETB workplace is unacceptable misconduct which properly falls to be addressed under the appropriate provisions of Circular Letter 71/2014 Disciplinary Procedures for Teachers Employed in Education and Training Boards. (herein "ETB")
> In the light of findings/conclusions of the investigation report (copy enclosed) you are required to attend a Stage 4 Disciplinary Meeting to be convened for the purpose of determining the disciplinary action if any, which may arise from the finding of the investigation referred to above."

The applicant was further advised that the meeting was scheduled to take place at 11:00am on Thursday the 15th September, 2016.

7. It was within this context that the applicant applied ex parte by way of application seeking a number of reliefs as set out below, to be presented before Baker J. on the 9th September, 2016.

Submissions on behalf of the Applicant

8. Counsel for the applicant indicated that the applicant was the Deputy Principal at Lanesboro Community College and that in or about May 2015 the applicant was notified that a complaint of bullying had been made against him by his colleague, a teacher called Michelle Spence. This complaint cited a number of alleged instances, some of which dated back to 2008. The applicant first learned of their existence in 2015. Notwithstanding this, the applicant's principal had been aware of the 2008 allegations for some years.

9. An investigation into the complaint was launched in accordance with the 'Bullying Prevention Policy – Complaint Procedure for ETB Staff' dated the 1st September, 2013. This procedure does not have any status under the Education Act 1998 (as amended by section 6 of the Education (Amendment) Act 2012) as it is not a disciplinary procedure and does not afford the subject of any investigation the safeguards provided for in Circular 71/2014. It is specifically described as an 'Industrial Relations Procedure' and not a legal procedure. Section 1.1 states:-

> "Agreed procedure is an industrial relations procedure and not a legal procedure. It will be conducted within the norms of industrial relations custom, practice and procedure and as such is not a judicial process. In circumstances where legal action is evoked, the policy will be suspended and the operation of law will take precedence." (this Court's emphasis).

10. The respondent engaged a private limited company called Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. to carry out the "investigation".

11. The applicant was asked by members of staff of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. to submit his written response by the 21st May, 2015. He complied with this request. He was also requested to attend various meetings and interviews and he duly complied. The procedures designed and adopted by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. did not permit the applicant to confront his accuser or challenge by way of cross examination the allegations against him. According to the agreed policy document it was expected that this investigation would take five to six weeks. The process eventually concluded on the 4th March, 2016 having been in existence for forty-three weeks (this Court's emphasis).

12. On or about 4th April, 2016 the applicant was furnished with a copy of the report of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. dated 24th March, 2016. As was apparent from the report, the two employees of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. had "upheld" the allegations of bullying against the applicant insofar as it related to four specific instances alleged to have occurred between January and April 2015. None of the other allegations were upheld. On the 21st April, 2016 the applicant received a letter from the respondent dated 20th April, 2016 advising that the report of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. was to be adopted by the respondent. Such "adoption" has no and can have no legal implications for the processes provided in Circular 71 of 2014. The applicant was advised that he had fifteen working days to take a limited procedural appeal to the decision and his appeal was rejected.

13. By letter dated 30th August, 2016 from the Chief Executive of Longford Westmeath Education and Training Board, Mr. Christy Duffy, the applicant was advised that as his appeal had not been upheld and that the investigation report "stands" together with the "findings" against him. As set out above, the applicant was required to attend a "Stage 4 Disciplinary meeting".

This was the first indication of any disciplinary process.

14. By letter dated 31st August, 2016 the applicant's solicitors wrote objecting to the course of action proposed and followed this letter with a further letter of the 2nd September, 2016 outlining the detailed basis for the applicant's objections to the respondents proposed course of action. The applicant requested assurances that any steps that the respondent proposed to take in respect of the as yet unspecified allegations against him would be taken entirely in accordance with Circular 71/2014 and by letter dated the 6th September, 2016 the respondent solicitor responded that the applicant concerns were unfounded and that the disciplinary meeting would proceed.

Legislation

15. By virtue of the provisions of the Vocational Educational Act 1930, the respondents' predecessor in title was established to perform the functions conferred on it by the Act.

16. By virtue of the Education and Training Boards Act 2013 the existing Vocational Educational Committees were dissolved and replaced by a number of ETB's including the respondent.

17. Section 24 of the Education Act 1998 as amended by s. 6 of the Education (Amendment) Act 2012 provided:-

> (11) The board of a recognised school may, in accordance with procedures determined from time to time by the Minister following consultation with bodies representative of patrons, recognised school management organisations and with recognised trade unions and staff associations representing teachers or other staff as appropriate, appoint, suspend or dismiss any or all of the principal, teachers and other staff of a school, who are remunerated or who are to be remunerated out of monies provided by the Oireachtas."
> (12) Where the employer of the principal, teachers and other staff of a recognised school is a person other than the board of the school concerned, a reference in this section to a board shall be construed and have effect as if the said person were substituted for the said reference wherever it occurs.

vocational education committee, the board of the recognised school concerned shall comply with the provisions of the Vocational Education Committee Acts 1930 to 2006 in relation to suspension and dismissal."

18. Counsel submitted that the respondent is required to carry out its functions in accordance with the provisions of Education Act 1998 as amended that "procedures determined from time to time by the Minister" and the requirements of natural and constitutional justice and fair procedures. In particular, the respondent is bound to invoke any disciplinary process against a teacher strictly in accordance with the procedures set out in Circular 71 of 2014, which has been issued by the Minister in accordance with the above provisions of the Education Act 1998 as amended. The applicant submitted that separately, outside the scope of s. 24 of the Education Act 1998 as amended and without departmental approval or sanction, the respondent has adopted a "non-legal" industrial relations procedure – a bullying prevention policy or complaint procedure for ETB staff. The document in question or the processes outlined therein do not constitute substitution for the procedures contained in Circular 71 of 2014 issued by the Minister pursuant to s. 24 of the Act of 1998.

The Essential Aspects of Fair Procedure

19. Counsel for the applicant stated that it was one thing for a preliminary investigation to ascertain the background to an allegation, or to assemble competing contentions in respect of disputed issues of fact. Such a process can facilitate a disciplinary process being conducted in an efficient and manageable way, still observing fair procedures. It is quite another thing for an investigation not in compliance with mandated procedure, or on a more basic level, not in compliance with fair procedures, to form the factual basis of an investigation on which disciplinary sanctions can be imposed. He quoted Millick v. Irish Casing Co. Ltd. [2007] 18 ELR 229 where Clarke J. discussed the difference between investigations that do not involve any findings of fact (to which all rules and natural justice need not apply) and inquiries which can make formal findings (to which rules of justice do apply). He also quoted Marie Fuller v. the Minister for Justice [2005] 1 I.R. 529 in which McGuinness J. commented obiter dictum in relation to the differences between statutory powers applicable when disciplining civil servants and industrial relations procedures of the State:

> "in my view ss. 13 to 16 of the Act of 1956 were intended by the Oireachtas to deal with matters of discipline concerning individual civil servants. The Oireachtas has two other legislations provided a framework for the resolution of industrial disputes and has established bodies such as the Labour Relations Commission, the Labour Court and other specialist negotiation and arbitration bodies to this end. These means are available to the applicants and respondents as the means of resolving their dispute."

The Bullying Prevention Policy

20. While this document is described as "nationally agreed", it is evident from the terms of the document itself that it is in no sense a "national agreement". It is simply an agreement between the relevant Trade Unions and the ETBs. It covers both teachers and non-teaching staff. The document has no capacity in law to impact upon the terms of Circular 71/2014. The two documents are entirely different and distinguishable. At page 14 of the bullying prevention policy, it is indicated that breaches of the policy "will be regarded as misconduct and maybe subject to disciplinary action under the disciplinary procedure relevant for the staff member concerned". This merely indicates that an alleged breach of the policy may form a disciplinary charge under the disciplinary procedures and no more. Where a complaint of bullying is "upheld, it is clear that disciplinary action will be taken in accordance with the appropriate stage of the ETB Disciplinary Policy for Staff". It is clear as a matter of law that if the disciplinary proceedings are indeed to be taken, these must be under, and have as their legal basis, Circular 71 of 2014. The Bullying Prevention Policy cannot affect or render otiose any provision of Circular 71/2014.

21. The bullying prevention policy outlines an informal process. Under the heading "Failure by a Staff Member to attend Meetings under the Formal Stages of the Procedure", it is clear that the only sanction for a staff member who fails to cooperate with the procedures is that the procedure continues in their absence.

22. There is mention of the ETB nominating two investigators from a panel of "approved investigators".

23. Counsel on behalf of the applicant submitted that the "investigation" which is to be subcontracted is to be conducted in accordance with the terms of reference and protocol provided for in Appendix II. It is evident from a consideration of the protocol that the requirements of natural justice have not been incorporated into the protocol. It would be essential for natural justice to be complied with, if reliance were to be placed on "findings" for the purposes of dismissing an employee.

24. The following is provided by Counsel for the applicant by way of example of how the protocol lacks compliance with fair procedures. Individual witnesses are invited to a "meeting". A draft minute of the interview conducted will then be prepared and provided to the witness. The witness can apparently can review the draft minute and suggest changes, this even in respect of matters on which they have given evidence. The investigator then makes a "determination" on the amendments suggested.

25. The witness is entitled to attend at an interview accompanied by a work colleague or trade union representative (but not a legal representative). The following is set out in the protocol:

> "conflicting witness accounts - where the investigators are presented with conflicting accounts of an incident and where no additional witnesses are available or where evidence is not persuasive, the case rests upon which version of the events the investigator considers the more credible, but a rationale must be provided".

26. Counsel for the applicant submitted that it was far from clear where this understanding of 'fair procedures' had come from - it does not obtain any support from principle nor from the case law of the High Court to Supreme Court in the past half century. Counsel further submitted that the final investigation report must include "an assessment of credibility for each party in witness" along with the investigators "findings of fact". He said that the subject of an allegation, such as the applicant would not be entitled to challenge including by way of cross-examination the evidence against him.

Case Law relating to Fair Procedures

27. Counsel for the applicant submitted that the law in respect of fair procedures was clear, particularly where an individual is liable to be dismissed from his or her employment. When a Stage 4 process under Circular 71 to 2014 is invoked, it follows that a teacher may be dismissed.

28. He submitted that cross-examination is clearly necessary in bodies which are administering justice. The entitlement to cross-examine allegations is not confined to a court body administering justice. In Borges v. Fitness to Practice Committee [2004] 1 I.R. 103 Keane C.J. stated:-

> "It is beyond argument that, where a tribunal such as the first respondent is inquiring into an allegation of conduct which reflects on a person's good name or reputation, basic fairness of procedure requires that he or she should be allowed to cross-examine, by counsel, his accuser or accusers. That has been the law since the decision of this court In re Haughey [1971] I.R. 217 and the importance of observing that requirement is manifestly all the greater where, as here, the consequence of the tribunal's finding may not simply reflect on his reputation but may also prevent him from practising as a doctor, either for a specified period or indefinitely."

Keane C.J. continues:-

> "The applicant cannot be deprived of his right to fair procedures, which necessitates the giving of evidence by his accusers and their being cross-examined, by the extension of the exceptions to the rule against hearsay to a case in which they are unwilling to testify in person."

29. Counsel also cited the comments of Hardiman J. Maguire v. Ardagh [2002] 1 I.R. 385 who also quoted from Ó Dálaigh C.J. in Re Haughey [1971] I.R. 217 wherein Ó Dálaigh C.J. said:-

> "In proceedings before any tribunal where a party to the proceedings is on risk of having his good name, or his person or property, or any of his personal rights jeopardised, the proceedings may be correctly classed as proceedings which may affect his rights and in compliance with the Constitution the State, either by its enactments or through the courts, must outlaw any procedures which will restrict or prevent the party concerned from vindicating these rights."

30. He also quoted a recent case of E.E. v. Child and Family Agency [2016] IEHC 777 a decision of the 14th November, 2016 where Humphreys J. summarised the matter as follows:-

"To require, as a matter of mandatory constitutional law, a right to cross-examine politicians and businesspeople in a tribunal or mere inquiry whose findings are 'legally sterile', but to refuse to accept such a right at the suit of a 'man of no property' such as this applicant, where there are huge and fundamental issues of human, natural, constitutional and ECHR family rights at issue, would be an egregious form of judicial doublethink and an abdication of the judicial function to vindicate the rights of the individual."

31. Counsel for the applicant submitted that it was evident therefore that where a deputy principal of a school in the management of the ETB is notified that he is to be subjected to a disciplinary procedure under Circular 71/2014, whether at Stage 4 or at any of the formal stages, fair procedures manifestly indicate that he will have the right to confront and cross-examine the individual who has made the allegations against him.

32. He said that Circular 71 of 2014 expressly provides for the entitlement of a person in the position of the applicant to challenge any evidence which is to be relied upon at a Stage 4 hearing - this is a mandatory requirement of Circular 71/2014. He submitted that it was clear as a matter of law and as a matter of fair procedures, an individual whose job was at stake and against whom allegations were to be made would be entitled to challenge and cross-examine the evidence to be relied upon in the case against him. He then quoted Circular 71 which this Court will deal with in more detail.

33. He submitted in particular in relation to Stage 4, the following appears to be the essential aspects:

(1) If the conduct is of a "serious nature", a comprehensive report on the facts of the case will be prepared by the principal and forwarded to the chief executive. A copy will be given to the teacher.

(i) It does not appear that any such report is being prepared, and no such report has been given to the applicant in this case.

(ii) Following the provisions of the comprehensive report prepared by the principal there are a number of essential procedural steps that must be taken.

(iii) If the chief executive decides to proceed to a disciplinary process, the teacher will be provided with an opportunity to attend at a meeting with the chief executive accompanied by his or her trade union representatives or a colleague subjected to an overall maximum of two. It is clear at this stage that there is no question of the chief executive proceeding to a disciplinary sanction but rather to a disciplinary process as provided for in Circular 71/2014.

(iv) It is entirely possible that upon receipt of a comprehensive report and the practice of the case which will have been forwarded in the interim to the teacher, the chief executive will decide not to proceed to a disciplinary process.

However, the chief executive in his affidavit states:

> "I say that the fact of the matter is that a sufficient number of allegations against him where upheld as led to the investigation concluding that there had been repeated inappropriate behaviour."

Following the hearing, the chief executive formulates "his/her judgment". The chief executive will take into account the report from the principal, any other evidence and the teacher's representation if any thereon.

Counsel made the submission that there was no report from the principal.

34. Counsel for the applicant also said that from an analysis of the correspondence and the documentation generated by the respondent, it would appear to be the case that the chief executive has formed the view that the process conducted by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. had made findings of fact, upon which he could rely. The fact that this process itself did not allow for the applicant to challenge evidence by way of cross-examination and to confront his accuser appears to have been regarded by the chief executive as irrelevant.

Bias

35. The issue which counsel for the applicant brought to the court's attention was the issue of objective bias resulting from the chief executive having already "adopted" findings, flowing from the process conducted by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd.

Irrationality – Proportionality

36. Counsel for the applicant stated that no consideration was given to invoking the disciplinary process at the informal stages of Stages 1, 2 and 3. Linked to this is the failure to consider what is factually accurate within the allegations already made. Whatever about process and findings lacking in fair procedure, looked at objectively, counsel for the applicant submits that the allegations made are manifestly insufficient in severity or in frequency to constitute "bullying. He cited a decision of Kearns P. in Glynn v. The Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform, Ireland and the Attorney General [2014] IEHC 133, where the President dismissed the plaintiff's claim, holding that for an allegation of bullying to be actionable, the first question the court must answer is whether the behaviour complained of, by reference to an objective test, imports that degree of calibrated inappropriateness and repetition (this Court's emphasis) which differentiates bullying from workplace stress or occupational stress.

37. In conclusion, counsel for the applicant reiterated the following points:

(1) The respondent had displayed objective bias towards the applicant;

(2) Circular 71/2014 envisages that if the disciplinary procedures provided for therein are to be implemented this will involve a number of stages moving from informal stages to formal stages, and that the respondent in its letter of the 30th August, 2016 and the chief executive's letter of the 30th August, 2013 failed to indicate upon what basis such significant stages are apparently not to be adopted.

38. No rational basis or reason had been advanced for the decision not to avail of Stage 1, Stage 2 or Stage 3 of the procedures and the respondent has not acted in accordance with the procedural safeguards contained in Circular 71/2014.

Submissions on behalf of the Respondent

39. Counsel for the respondent set out the legal framework, and stated that section 24 of the Education Act 1998 was replaced by the substitution of a new section inserted by s. 6 of the Education (Amendment) Act 2012 (the Act of 2012). At that time, the Vocational Educational Committees were still in existence and special provision was made in ss. (13) for the Application of the Provision of the EEC Acts. In addition, ss. (12) provided that the phrase "Board" would in certain circumstances mean the employer. Section 65 of the Education Training Boards Act 2013 contains a provision deleting the aforementioned subs. 13, therefore with the establishment of the ETBs, ss. 12 came to apply to them.

40. The ETBs maintain schools through the provision by it of teaching staff and a host of other services. As the employer of staff, it then performs all the staff functions provided for by section 24 of the Act of 1998 as replaced, that is an ETB can appoint, suspend and dismiss staff. The performance of these functions of appointments, suspension and removal are not reserved functions but are executive functions that fall to be performed by the chief executive.

41. Counsel for the respondent accepted that Circular 71 of 2014 refers to procedures approved by the Department of Education and Skills, the interpretation application of this Circular.

42. The Bullying Prevention Policy exists because of the legal obligation on the ETB to address its obligations under section 60 of the Safety, Health and Welfare at Work Act 2005.

43. He submitted that in 2006 the Vocational Education Committees in consultation with the trade unions adopted policies and procedures for this educational section to prevent workplace bullying, harassment and sexual harassment. Over time these policies were amended to take account of legislative and other changes within the sector, culminating for the present purposes with a version of the bullying prevention policy which issued for implementation on the 1st of September, 2013 following the enactment of the Education and Training Boards Act 2013. The policy was later amended from the 1st of March, 2015 and again in 2016 and he said that in part what is before the court is the interplay between the two lawfully adopted policies.

44. Counsel for the respondent submitted that there was only one decision that was the subject of the judicial review and that is the decision of the chief executive to summon the applicant to a meeting. He submitted that what was not the subject of challenge was the following:

(a) the decision to invoke the bullying policy on the foot of a complaint of the 1st of May, 2013;

(b) any issue of compliance with the bullying policy;

(c) the procedures adopted during the investigation;

(d) the report of the investigation that issued on the 20th of March, 2016;

(e) the adoption by the chief executive of the findings of the report on the 28th of April, 2016;

(f) the rejection of the applicant's procedural appeal against the chief executive's adoption of the report by the Workplace Relations Commission;

He also said that it was important to note that the chief executive in adopting the report, adopted it in total, including those findings favourable to the applicant.

45. He suggested that the applicant now wants to urge the court that:-

(a) he can now retrospectively seek to undermine the Investigation Report that is being adopted by including the fairness of the procedures of the investigation on foot of which was prepared;

(b) the applicant seeks to stop the holding of a preliminary meeting on the basis that notwithstanding the conclusion of the bullying investigation that a Stage 4 disciplinary process cannot proceed on two discrete grounds:

(i) That the decision of the stage to invoke s. 4 is disproportionate and irrational;

(ii) It is a precondition of Stage 4 that the process should be grounded on a report prepared by the principal of the school. On the basis that there is no such report, the applicant seeks to exclude the chief executive from any involvement in the disciplinary processes on the basis of alleged objective bias.

46. Counsel for the respondent submitted that Circular 71 of 2014 contains two sections. One section deals with competency issues and the other deals generally disciplinary measures. Further separate routes are set out for dealing with teachers and principals. He also submitted that Circular 0071 of 2014 is in part commentary, in part advisory in tone, and in part formal. Section 1 headed "background" and s. 2 "general principles" apply to all sections of the circular. Section 3 concerns professional competence and what appears to be s. 4 (the sections are not numbered) relates to work and conduct issues. The introduction to the relevant section states:-

> "Although disciplinary action will normally follow the progressive stages the procedure may be commenced by the school at any stage of the process if the alleged misconduct warrants such approach."

Circular 71 however does not address the manner in which complaints that are not dealt with by the principal of the school enter the process as set out.

47. He submitted that this is a classic case where the policy does not address precisely the circumstances in this case, in that for good and fair reasons: the policy covers circumstances where (a) the complaint is not investigated by the principal and

(b) the comprehensive report on the facts of the case is not prepared by the principal. He said that it could not be the case that the employer is left in a lacuna, where no disciplinary procedure can be invoked. He said that if the applicant's logic is followed - the only process allowing a bullying investigation was one in which the chief executive had to note a report made by the school principal. Otherwise, the chief executive would have to deal with the investigation informally with no sanction.

48. The Bullying Prevention Policy provides that:

(1) Every employee has a right to make a formal complaint pursuant to the policy and there is no requirement to commence a complaint at the informal stage.

(2) Where a formal complaint is made, not to the school principal but to the Head of Human Resources in the ETB head office, this removes the matter from the realm of the local school entirely.

(3) A formal investigation is then carried out by approved persons unassociated with the employer and such investigation must conclude in findings being made.

(4) Once such findings are made the matter is then passed to the chief executive who must, in the first instance, determine to either adopt or reject the report. No other option is available to the chief executive.

(5) The aforementioned determination of the chief executive may be appealed by the complainant or the person subject of the complaint to the Workplace Relation Commission by way of procedural challenge.

(6) There is a provision for invoking the disciplinary proceeding at an appropriate stage.

Right to Cross-Examine

49. Counsel for the respondent submitted that the applicant's rights to natural justice were respected and this is clear from the material before the court and in particular from the full exchanges, statements and invitations to reply. He said that the applicant now raises a question of an entitlement to cross-examine witnesses. Neither before entering upon the investigation or at any stage during the investigation did the applicant request a facility to cross-examine any witness. At no stage was the applicant denied that facility and in his procedural appeal to the Workplace Relations Commission he did not identify this as a matter of concern.

50. He submitted that the investigation dealt fairly and evenly with both the applicant and the complainant and in doing so meet the requirements of natural justice as set out by Henchy J. in Kiely v. the Minister for Social Welfare [1977] I.R. 267:-

> "It would be contrary to natural justice if one side were allowed to shelter behind his controverted documentary evidence while the other side had to bring his witnesses to the hearing, where they might be required to give their evidence on oath and to be subject to cross-examination. The lack of mutuality and the potential for an unjust determination inherent in such a procedure would put it in conflict with the rule of audi alteram partem."

He said further:-

> "This Court has held, in cases such as In re Haughey that Article 40, s. 3, of the Constitution implies a guarantee to the citizen of basic fairness of procedures. The rules of natural justice must be construed accordingly. Tribunals exercising quasi-judicial functions are frequently allowed to act informally — to receive unsworn evidence, to act on hearsay, to depart from the rules of evidence, to ignore courtroom procedures, and the like — but they may not act in such a way as to imperil a fair hearing or a fair result."

51. In relation to the report of the bullying investigation counsel submitted that the applicant does not identify in respect of any of the adverse findings made against him any factual evidence with which he disagrees to which the case might be made that a failure to allow for cross-examination was material.

52. He submitted that the chief executive is entitled to continue with the disciplinary process, with the bullying report and the background materials properly before him as evidence. The principles of natural justice do not require that matters which have independently been investigated in a fair and balanced process be heard "de novo" in a further stage of a disciplinary process. In this instance, at all times it was known that the bullying policy was not purely an 'evidence gathering exercise' but also the policy implies that the investigators required to make findings. What has to be considered is how the principles of natural justice have applied in section 4 in that the Circular refers to a teacher's right to challenge the evidence that is being relied upon. In that regard, it is open at all times to the applicant to take issue with the characterisation of his conduct as bullying, to highlight any conclusions that are not supported by evidence, and the applicant can seek to introduce additional evidence.

The Absence of a Report from the Principal

53. Counsel for the respondent submitted that it was self-evident that the matter proceeded without a report from the school principal, and in that respect it does not accord with its specified procedure. He raises the question: is the absence of the report from the principal fatal? He said the court may take the view that the lack of formal compliance does not justify relief by way of judicial review. He referred to administrative law in Ireland by Hogan 4th Ed. and the judicial remedies in public law by Lewis 3rd Ed. and he quoted from Laffoy J. in McGlinchey v. Ryan [2010] IEHC 536:-

> "It is well settled, as a matter of constitutional law and of contract law, that an employee who is involved in a disciplinary process in the course of his employment is entitled to be afforded fair procedures, although what constitutes fair procedures may vary from case to case. In this case, the inquiry was to be governed in accordance with the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant embodied in the Terms of Settlement and in accordance with Annex 1 thereto. The conduct of the inquiry was subject to the express terms agreed between the parties and the ruling of the adjudicator falls to be considered against those terms."

54. Counsel for the respondent submitted that it was clear in this case that all the parties concerned knew well from the outset that the process was going to be conducted within the framework of the Bullying Prevention Policy which, in turn, contains explicit and specific provisions for referral to the circular letter and the disciplinary procedure. It is immediately clear from a perusal of the extensive account given by the investigators of the manner in which they conducted their work that they paid close attention to all matter and procedural fairness and natural justice.

55. The underlining fact is that the applicant participated fully in that process without even once raising the issue of either where or to whom the report of the investigation was going to be sent. He did not raise the possibility of cross-examining throughout the process. In such a circumstances he submitted that an estoppel arises, as to his right to cross-examine presently. The applicant's participation in the process throughout highlights the lack of importance the applicant attached to the absence of the principal's report. The absence of the principal's report may therefore be considered by the Court as not fatal to the process.

Objective Bias

56. Counsel for the respondent states that objective bias is complained of solely on the basis that the chief executive has adopted the investigation report which follows the disciplinary report. Whereas it is apparent that the chief executive had no hand, act or part in the findings of the investigation report, and that his role in adopting the investigation report was administrative, his role in determining to proceed to Stage 4 hearing was equally consistent with what would happen if it had been the case that a report on this or any other matter was to come to him from a school principal.

The Statutory Framework

57. The Vocational Education Act 1930 provided for vocational education committees. By virtue of the Education and Training Boards Act 2013 the existing vocational educational committees were dissolved and were replaced by a number of ETBs. Section 15 of the 2013 Act provides the following:

> 15(1) A chief executive of an education and training board shall perform the executive functions of the board.

58. Sections 23 and 24 of the Education Act 1998 were substituted by s. 6 of the Education Act (Amendment) Act 2012. Section 23 provides:

> "In addition to the functions conferred on a Principal by section 22, the Principal of a recognised school shall—
> (a) be responsible for the day-to-day management of the school, including guidance and direction of the teachers and other staff of the school, and be accountable to the board of the school for that management,

(b) provide leadership to the teachers and other staff and the students of the school,

(c) be responsible, together with the board, parents of students and the teachers, for the creation in the school of an environment which is supportive of learning among the students and which promotes the professional development of the teachers,

(d) under the direction of the board, and in consultation with the teachers, the parents and, to the extent appropriate to their age and experience, the students, set objectives for the school and monitor the achievement of those objectives, and

(e) encourage the involvement of parents of students in the school in the education of those students and in the achievement of the objectives of the school.

(2) For the purpose of carrying out his or her functions under this Act, a Principal of a recognised school shall have all such powers as are necessary or expedient in that regard, and shall carry out his or her functions in accordance with—

(a) such policies as may be determined from time to time by the board of the school, and

(b) regulations made under section 33.

(3) The Principal of a recognised school shall be entitled to be a member of any and every committee appointed by the board of the school.

(4) Wherever practicable, the Principal of a recognised school shall, in exercising his or her functions under this section, consult with teachers and other staff of the school.

(5) Where the employer of the Principal, teachers and other staff of a recognised school is a person other than the board of the school concerned, a reference in this section to a board shall be construed and have effect as if the said person were substituted for the said reference wherever it occurs."

59. Section 24 states:

"(1) Subject to this section, the board of a recognised school—

(a) shall, if not already appointed, appoint a person to be Principal of the school, and

(b) may appoint such and so many persons as teachers and other staff of the school as the board from time to time considers necessary for the performance of its powers and functions under this Act.

(12) Where the employer of the Principal, teachers and other staff of a recognised school is a person other than the board of the school concerned, a reference in this section to a board shall be construed and have effect as if the said person were substituted for the said reference wherever it occurs.

(13) In applying subsection (11) to the Principal, a teacher or other member of staff of a recognised school which is established or maintained by a vocational education committee, the board of the recognised school concerned shall comply with the provisions of the Vocational Education Committee Acts 1930 to 2006 in relation to suspension and dismissal."

Circular 0071 of 2014

60. Circular 0071 of 2014 was sent to Chief Executives of ETBs and provided for the revised procedures on the suspension and dismissal of teachers and principals. Previous circulars were superseded by Circular 0071 of 2014.

61. The background to the revised procedures provided:

"(1) Background

Under the terms of Towards 2016 the parties undertook to review and revise existing procedures for the suspension and dismissal of teachers comprehended by Section 24(3) of the Education Act 1998. Since the parties noted that the provisions of Section 24 of the Education Act 1998 did not apply to teachers in schools operated by vocational education committees (VECs) further discussions ensued involving the Department of Education and Science, the IVEA, the TUI and the ASTI in order to adapt the provisions agreed in relation to other teachers to accommodate the specific management structures and processes operating in VEC schools. These discussions concluded in procedures for the suspension and dismissal of teachers in VEC schools being agreed between the parties.

The following procedures have now been issued in that context.

ETBs and Principals have a responsibility for the quality and effectiveness of education and the management of staff in a school as set out in the Education Act 1998.

While no procedures can be definitive about the range of circumstances which might give rise to the initiation of disciplinary procedures in general these are likely to be related to misconduct, a threat to the health and safety of students and/or sustained failure to perform adequately the professional duties and responsibilities expected of a teacher.

(2) General Principles underpinning these procedures

Apart from considerations of equity and justice (this Court's emphasis), the maintenance of a good industrial relations atmosphere at workplace level requires that acceptable procedures be in place and be observed. Disciplinary procedures are necessary to ensure both that discipline is maintained in the workplace and that disciplinary measures can be applied in a fair and consistent manner.

Such procedures serve a dual purpose in that they provide a framework which enables management to maintain satisfactory standards and employees to have access to procedures whereby alleged failures to comply with these standards may be fairly and sensitively addressed.

The essential elements of any procedures for dealing with disciplinary issues are that they be rational and fair, that the basis for disciplinary action is clear, that the range of penalties that can be imposed is well-defined and that an internal appeal mechanism is available."

The general principles continue as follows:

"These procedures are intended to comply with the general principles of natural justice (this Court's emphasis) and provide:

- that there will be a presumption of innocence. No decision regarding disciplinary action can be made until a formal disciplinary meeting has been convened and the employee has been afforded the opportunity to respond to the allegations raised (this Court's emphasis)
- that the employee will be advised in writing in advance of a disciplinary meeting of the precise nature of the matters concerned and will be given copies of all relevant documentation. In the case of a complaint, this detail will include the source and text of the complaint as received. A complaint should be in writing.
- that details of the allegations, complaints or issues of professional competence be put to the teacher concerned
- that the right of a teacher concerned to have access to and to view his/her personnel file (to include all records in relation to the teacher in hardcopy or electronic format, held by the school/ETB) will be fully respected
- that the teacher concerned is given the opportunity to avail of representation by a work colleague or trade union representative/s
- that the teacher concerned be given the opportunity to respond fully to any such allegations, complaints or issues of professional competence (this Court's emphasis)

- that the teacher concerned has the right to examine and challenge all evidence available and to call witnesses or persons providing such evidence for questioning (this Courts emphasis)
- that the teacher concerned has the right to a fair and impartial examination of the issues being investigated, taking into account the allegations or complaints themselves, the response of the teacher concerned to them, any representations made by or on behalf of the teacher concerned and any other relevant or appropriate evidence, factors or circumstances
- that the ETB, as employer, has a duty to act reasonably and fairly in all interactions with staff and to deal with issues relating to conduct or professional competence in a confidential manner which protects the dignity of the teacher
- that all matters relating to the disciplinary procedure are strictly confidential to the parties and their representatives
- that it will be considered a disciplinary offence for any person to intimidate or exert inappropriate pressure on any person who may be required to attend as a witness
- that where a decision is taken to impose a disciplinary sanction, the sanction imposed will be in proportion to the nature of the conduct/behaviour/performance that has resulted in the sanction being imposed
- that these procedures are without prejudice to the right of a teacher to have recourse to the law to protect his/her employment."

62. Circular 0071 of 2014 provides for the disciplinary procedures for teachers employed in ETBs. The procedure was developed following the discussions between the Department of Education and Skills, School Managerial Bodies and recognised Teacher Unions. It takes account of employment legislation and the Labour Relations Commission's Code of Practice on Disciplinary Procedures. This procedure superseded all existing local and national disciplinary procedures.

63. The document states:-

> "This procedure relates to work and conduct issues and matters other than professional competence and applies to all teachers other than those serving in a probationary capacity."

64. The Court notes that allegations in respect of child abuse as defined in Child Protection Guidelines for Primary and Post-Primary schools are dealt with in the first instance under these guidelines.

65. It appears to this Court that allegations of bullying should also be dealt with in the first instance under these guidelines. However, the Court will revert to this in due course.

> "Informal Stage
> It is intended that problems relating to work and conduct are resolved, where possible, through informal means (this Court's emphasis). To this end the Principal will discuss any unsatisfactory conduct with the teacher concerned and inform him/her of the required improvements. The teacher will be given an opportunity to offer explanation and comment. Where an improvement might be effected without recourse to disciplinary action, guidance will be provided as appropriate and due attention will be given to whether the shortcoming is due to personal, health or domestic circumstances. In such cases help and advice will be given where possible. The teacher will also be informed that unless the necessary improvement is made the matter may proceed to the formal disciplinary procedure.

Stage 1: Verbal Warning

A formal disciplinary meeting with the teacher will be convened by the Principal. The teacher will be given at least five school days' written notice of the meeting. The notice should state the purpose of the meeting and the specific nature of the complaint together with any supporting documentation. The teacher concerned may be accompanied at any such meeting by his/her trade union representative or a work colleague."

66. The Court notes that there is no entitlement for a teacher to have a legal representative with him and the Court will revert to this in due course.

"At the meeting the teacher will be given an opportunity to respond and state his/her case fully and to challenge any evidence that is being relied upon for a decision. Having considered the response, the Principal will decide on the appropriate action to be taken. Where it is decided that no action is warranted the teacher will be so informed in writing within five school days. Where it is decided that disciplinary action at this stage is warranted the Principal will inform the teacher that he/she is being given a verbal warning. Where a verbal warning is given it should state clearly the improvement required and the timescale for improvement. The warning should inform the teacher that further disciplinary action may be considered if there is no sustained satisfactory improvement. The teacher will be advised of his/her right to appeal against the disciplinary action being taken and the appeal process."

67. The court notes that the processes at Stages 1 to 3 were not taken by the defendant in this matter.

> "Stage 2: Written Warning
> If, having received a verbal warning, the teacher's conduct is perceived by the Principal to be less than satisfactory in relation to that required at Stage 1 a meeting will be arranged between the teacher and the Principal and another officer delegated by the Chief Executive. The teacher will be given at least seven school days' written notice of the meeting. The notice should state the purpose of the meeting and the specific nature of the complaint together with any supporting documentation. The teacher concerned may be accompanied at any such meeting by his/her trade union representative/s or a colleague/s subject to an overall maximum of two."

68. Again the Court notes that the procedures for the suspension and dismissal of teachers and principals exclude the possibility of a teacher being represented by a legal representative.

> "At the meeting the teacher should be given a clear statement of the area/s where his or her conduct is perceived as unsatisfactory. The teacher will be given an opportunity to respond and state his/her case fully and to challenge any evidence that is being relied upon for a decision and be given an opportunity to respond. Having considered the response, the Principal and the other officer delegated by the Chief Executive, will decide on the appropriate action to be taken. Where it is decided that no action is warranted the teacher will be so informed in writing within five school days. Where it is decided that disciplinary action at this stage is warranted the teacher will be informed that he/she is being given a written warning. Where a written warning is given it should state clearly the improvement required and the timescale for improvement. The written warning should inform the teacher that further disciplinary action may be considered if there is no sustained satisfactory improvement. The teacher will be advised of his/her right to appeal against the disciplinary action being taken and the appeal process.

Stage 3: Final Written Warning

If having received a written warning, the Principal perceives that the teacher's conduct remains less than satisfactory or there is an occurrence of a more serious offence, a meeting will be arranged between the teacher, the Principal and another officer delegated by the Chief Executive. The teacher should be given at least seven school days' written notice of the meeting. The notice should state the purpose of the meeting and the specific nature of the complaint together with any supporting documentation. The teacher concerned may be accompanied at any such meeting by his/her trade union representative/s or a colleague/s subject to a maximum of two.

At the meeting the teacher should be given a clear statement of the area/s where his or her conduct is perceived as unsatisfactory. The teacher will be given an opportunity to respond and state his/her case fully and to challenge any evidence that is being relied upon for a decision and be given an opportunity to respond. Having considered the response, the Principal and the other officer delegated by the Chief Executive will decide on the appropriate action to be taken. Where it is decided that no action is warranted, the teacher will be so informed in writing within five school days. Where it is decided that disciplinary action at this stage is warranted, the teacher will be informed that he/she is being given a final written warning. Where a final written warning is given it should state clearly the improvement required and the timescale for improvement. The final written warning should inform the teacher that further disciplinary action may be considered if there is no sustained satisfactory improvement. The teacher will be advised of his/her right to appeal against the disciplinary action being taken and the appeal process.

The final written warning will be active for a period not exceeding 12 months and subject to satisfactory service will cease to have effect following the expiry of the 12 month period.

Stage 4:

If it is perceived that the work or conduct has continued after the final written warning has issued or the work or conduct issue is of a serious nature a comprehensive report on the facts of the case will be prepared by the Principal and forwarded to the Chief Executive. A copy will be given to the teacher.

In accordance with the provisions of the Education and Training Boards Act, 2013, employment matters including the suspension and dismissal of staff are executive functions. Consequently, the following procedures will apply.

4.1 If the Chief Executive decides to proceed to a disciplinary process, the teacher will be provided with an opportunity to attend at a meeting with the Chief Executive accompanied by his/her trade union representative/s or a colleague subject to an overall maximum of two. (The court notes again that there is no provision for a legal representative even though issues relating to suspension and dismissal of staff are at issue).

The teacher will be given at least 7 school days' notice of the meeting. The notice should state the purpose of the hearing and the fact that disciplinary action may be considered.

At the meeting the teacher will be given an opportunity to make his/her case in full and to challenge any evidence that is being relied upon for a decision.

Following the hearing the Chief Executive shall make his/her judgement on the matter. In formulating his/her judgement the Chief Executive will take account of the report from the Principal, any other evidence and the teacher's representation (if any) thereon.

The Chief Executive shall notify the teacher of his/her decision and any intended disciplinary action if that be the outcome of his/her deliberations. If it is decided to take disciplinary action, the Chief Executive may avail of any of the following range of sanctions.

(a) Final written censure

(b) Deferral of an increment

(c) Withdrawal of an increment or increments

(d) Demotion (loss of post of responsibility)

(e) Other disciplinary action short of suspension or dismissal

(f) Suspension (for a limited period and/or specific purpose) with pay

(g) Suspension (for a limited period and/or specific purpose) without pay

(h) Dismissal

Where disciplinary action short of dismissal is proposed, the case will be reviewed by the Chief Executive within a specified time period to consider whether further disciplinary action, if any, is required.

The Chief Executive will act reasonably in all cases when deciding on the appropriate disciplinary action. The nature of the disciplinary action should be proportionate to the work or conduct issue that has resulted in the sanction being imposed."

69. The next section is headed "Gross Misconduct":-

"In cases of serious misconduct at work or a threat to health and safety to children or other personnel in the school the stages outlined above do not normally apply and a teacher may be dismissed without recourse to the previous stages.

The following are some examples of gross misconduct for which any or each of Stages 1 to 3 of the disciplinary procedure may not apply depending on the gravity of the alleged offence:

- Theft
- Deliberate damage to school property
- Fraud or deliberate falsification of documents
- Gross negligence or dereliction of duties
- Refusal to comply with legitimate instructions resulting in serious consequences

- Serious or persistent incapacity to perform duties due to being under the influence of alcohol, unprescribed drugs or misuse of prescribed medication
- Serious breach of health & safety rules
- Serious abuse/misuse of the school property/equipment
- Serious breaches of confidentiality
- Serious bullying, inappropriate behaviour, sexual harassment or harassment against an employee or customer, including students
- Violent/disruptive behaviour
- Downloading/disseminating pornographic material from the internet
- Circulation of offensive, obscene or indecent e-mails or text messages.

The above list is not exhaustive.

If there is an allegation of serious misconduct the teacher may be suspended on full pay pending an investigation and the conclusion of any appeal process.

In the course of investigation, the teacher concerned has the right to have the allegations brought to his/her attention and he/she has the right to respond to all allegations. If the investigation upholds a case of serious misconduct the normal consequence will be dismissal.

Stage 5: Appeals

It will be open to the teacher to appeal against the proposed disciplinary action. In the case of sanctions being imposed at Stages 1, 2 and 3 the appeal will be to an officer delegated by the Chief Executive who has not had a previous involvement with the matter and who is of an equal or higher grade to the officer who imposed the sanction for example, the Principal, APO, PO, EO or CE. In the case of serious misconduct being imposed under stage 4 of the procedure an appeal will be to a disciplinary appeal panel appointed by the Chief Executive as set out in Appendix A. The procedures for appealing are as set out in Appendix A.

Appendix A: Appeal Process

A teacher may seek a review of disciplinary proceedings by the panel on one or more of the following grounds:

(1) the provisions of the procedures were not adhered to

(2) all the relevant facts were not ascertained

(3) all the relevant facts were not considered or not considered in a reasonable manner

(4) the teacher concerned was not afforded a reasonable opportunity to answer the allegation

(5) the teacher concerned could not be reasonably be expected to have understood that the behaviour alleged would attract disciplinary action

(6) the sanction recommended is disproportionate to the underperformance or misconduct alleged."

70. The applicant was informed by letter dated 7th May, 2015 that Rose McCormack, the HR Section, Longford Office was in receipt of a formal complaint of alleged bullying from Ms. Michelle Spence. The applicant was requested to respond, giving complete details. The letter continued "the complaint will be investigated in accordance with the provisions of the formal procedure documented in Bullying Prevention Policy and Complaint Procedure for ETB staff" and the letter continues that "the applicant had a right to be accompanied" and he was referred to:

(1) the Bullying Prevention Policy and Complaint Procedures for ETB staff;

(2) that he had the right to avail of employee assistance service at any point during the investigation;

(3) that the agreed procedure is an industrial relation procedure and not a legal procedure (this Courts emphasis).

71. It was stated that the procedure will be conducted within the norms of industrial relations custom, practice and procedure and as such is not a judicial process. In circumstances where a legal action is involved the policy will be suspended and the operation of law will take precedent. A series of documentation was enclosed. Finally, the letter states that the Head of HR will appoint an investigation team comprising two persons, a panel of approved organisations which can be drawn upon to undertake the investigation (under a contract for service) as approved in Appendix 1 of the Bullying Prevention Policy and Complaint Procedure for ETB staff. There was no provision for either party to a complaint, to reject a nominated investigator save in very exceptional circumstances where an investigator so nominated is related to, or a personal friend of either the complainant or alleged respondent in the complaint.

Bullying Prevention Policy

72. This Court now turns to the Bullying Prevention Policy.Therein it is stated that the new policy and procedure complies with the recommendations of the Government Task Force Report on bullying in the workplace and the following codes:

(1) Health and Safety Authorities Code of Practice on the prevention of workplace bullying

(2) The Labour Relations Commission Code of Practice detailing procedures for addressing bullying in the workplace.

Under the General Principles attaching to the Bullying Policy provides:

"All persons invoking or engaging in, the formal procedural stages of the policy are advised that

(1.1) The agreed procedures in industrial relations procedure and not a legal procedure (this Court's emphasis). It would be conducted within the norms of industrial relations custom, practice and procedure and as such is not a judicial process. In circumstances where legal action is invoked the policy will be suspended and the operation of law will take precedent.

(1.2) Any individual invoking the policy to a procedure at the Formal stage must provide written agreement to proceeding through the formal procedural stages in accordance with 1.1.

(2) The right to be accompanied at all stages of this procedure is recognised. Reference in the policy to representative includes

(i) a work colleague of the staff member's choice or

(ii) representation by an authorised trade union but not any other person or body unconnected with the particular ETB

The nature of the meetings is such that legal representation is not required."

The Court notes this legal representation is not excluded, it is just not required – however this is a matter of some considerable debate in this case.

"The following principles shall apply:

- All formal complaints shall be in writing
- Details of any complaints shall be put to the respondent staff member concerned
- Both parties to the complaint shall be given the opportunity to avail of representation during the procedure by a work colleague or by an authorised trade union but not any other person or body unconnected with the particular ETB.
- Parties to the complaint have the right to a fair and impartial determination of the issues concerned taking into account any representations made by or on behalf of the staff member and any other relevant or appropriate evidence, factors or circumstances.
- No allegations which have previously been investigated can be entered as part of the current investigation.
- Access to personal information held by an ETB shall be facilitated in accordance with the ETBs Data Protection Policy (specifically with respect to the ETBs Access Procedure) and with the principles and requirements of the Data Protection Acts 1998 – 2003. When the proceedings have been completed the Investigation Board and all associated documentation concerned to the Board will be filed, on a strictly confidential basis with the Head of HR in the ETB.
- That all matters relating to the complaint are strictly confidential to the parties and their representatives."

73. There then proceeds a definition of bullying at work:

"Repeated inappropriate behaviour, direct or indirect, whether verbal, physical or otherwise, conducted by one or more persons against another or others at the place of work and/or in the course of employment, which could reasonably be regarded as undermining the individual's right to dignity at work. An isolated incident of behaviour in this definition may be an affront to dignity but as a once off incident it is not considered to be bullying".

74. This Court notes that complaints of bullying can often be resolved on an informal basis and no further action may be required. Mediation is a process where an independent and neutral mediator assists the parties to come to agreement through a collaborative process. However, it is a decision for the complainant in the first instance which approach to adopt. In most cases, adopting an informal approach or engaging in mediation is the preferred approach of the ETB and unions representing staff in the sector. The engagement of a mediator is a matter for the Head of HR to decide, upon receiving a request from a staff member who believes s/he is being bullied or a staff member who is a respondent to a complaint of bullying.

75. The next procedure detailed in the bullying prevention policy is the formal procedure. This is for when "attempts to resolve the alleged complaint through informal means have not succeeded or where the complainant elects to invoke the formal procedure as a matter of first instance." It continues: "an investigation will be carried out by the ETB. All complaints will be treated seriously and in confidence". (this Court's emphasis).

"Stage 1 investigation:

1. The complainant writes in confidence to the Head of Human Resources to request that an investigation under the Formal Procedure be undertaken. This letter shall include the written statement of complaint which must be signed and dated by the complainant. A formal complaint should inter alia contain: clear specific allegations against named individual(s), dates and times of incident(s), a list of witnesses if any, direct quotes if they can be recalled, a brief description of the context of each incidence, a brief description of the impact/effect each incidence had on the complainant, any other relevant documentary evidence except for mediation details of previous approaches made to the respondent (if any) and the outcome of same.

2. Upon receipt of a written complaint the Head of HR or his/her nominee will formally acknowledge within 5 working days' receipt the complaint and advise of the right to be accompanied.

3. The respondent to the complaint will be furnished with a copy of the complaint and all accompanying documentation within the same 5 working days' and informed of his/her right to be accompanied.

4. The respondent to the complaint shall be given an additional 10 working days from the date of issue by the ETB of the complaint details and documentation to respond in writing to the complaint details. The response should be sent to the Head of HR. Any counter complaint if raised by the respondent will be processed as part of the respondent's response to the complaint under the remit of the same investigation [...]

5. The Head of HR will contact Education and Training Boards Ireland to have an investigation team nominated comprising two persons from the panel of approved investigators. The panel of improved investigators can be drawn upon to undertake the investigation (under a contract for service) [...]"

The policy document suggests that the investigation should commence no later than the expiration of 30 working days from the date of receipt by HR of the written complaint, and the official Investigation Board must issue to the Head of HR no later than 40 working days from the date of receipt by the Investigators of the complaint the documentation originally supplied by the Head of HR.

Lastly, the Court notes that the policy sets out that the final investigation report will be referred to the CE of the ETB for consideration and a determination.

This Court quotes further from the policy:

> "Stage 2:Decision by the ETB as employer takes circular to reject the findings of the Investigation Report.
> 2.1 The Chief Executive having undertaken evaluation of the report will decide as to whether or not the Investigation Report should be adopted. The decision of the Chief Executive will be communicated to the parties to the complaint within a total of 15 days of the date of issue by the Head of HR of the final investigation report to the parties to the complaint. Such covering correspondence will advise a right of appeal to an independent third party [...]
>
> 2.2 Importantly in arriving at a decision the Chief Executive:
>
> (a) Is not to be regarded as making any assessment as to the merits or otherwise of the complaints made by the complainant against the respondent
>
> (b) Shall meet with the Investigation Team by way of informing/satisfying his/her self that the terms of reference for the investigation have been adhered to
> 2.3 In circumstances where the Chief Executive decides to adopt the findings of the investigation report s/he shall have due regard to the procedures undertaken over the course of the investigation and the discharge of the terms of reference by the Investigation Team. Where the Chief Executive elects to adopt the Report particular regard should be had to be able to respond to the potential for a procedural appeal under the specified appeal grounds. [...]"

Section 3 of the policy sets out the following under the heading "provision for appeal" - "it is open to either party to complaint of bullying to appeal the decision of the Chief Executive of the ETB to the agreed Appeal Officer nominated by the LRC and nationally agreed between ETB and unions consultative forum."

76. The next section of the policy document deals with the following:

"Disciplinary Action Arising

Breaches of the Bullying Prevention Policy will not be tolerated by the ETB. Breaches of the Policy shall be regarded as misconduct (but not gross misconduct) and may be subject to disciplinary action under the Disciplinary Procedure relevant for the staff member concerned. Repeated policy breaches will be taken into consideration in determining the appropriate disciplinary sanction to be applied to the staff member concerned.

Where a complaint of bullying is upheld or a complaint is found to be vexatious/malicious, disciplinary action will be taken in accordance with the appropriate stage of the ETB Disciplinary Policy for staff [...]"

Discussion

77. There are a number of matters for the Court to consider in this case:

(1) The issues of fair procedures in the course of the investigation

(2) whether there was bias as a result of the respondent acting on foot of the investigation process conducted by the company retained by the respondent; and finally

(3) What is the relationship between Circular 71/2014 and the bullying policy.

Counsel for the respondent makes the point that the subject matter of the judicial review is an order of certiorari quashing the decision of the respondent dated the 30th of August, 2015, insofar as the respondent has purported to uphold or rely upon a finding of bullying against the applicant for the purpose of summoning the applicant to a Stage 4 disciplinary meeting on Thursday the 15th of September, 2016 as provided for in the Department of Education and Skills Circular letter 71/2014 entitled "Revised Procedures for Suspension and Dismissal of Teachers and Principals". It is a matter for the court to decide whether or not inter alia the procedures adopted during the investigation are contained in the grounds of the judicial review.

78. In May 2015, the applicant was notified that a complaint of bullying had been made against him by his colleague, a teacher called Ms. Michelle Spence. The complaint cited a number of incidents, some of which dated back to 2008. Ms. Spence had requested the head of human resources of the respondent to conduct a formal investigation into the alleged bullying. The allegation of bullying detailed over one hundred pages in respect of her complaint.

79. An investigation into the complaint was launched in accordance with the Bullying Prevention Policy – Complaint Procedure for ETB Staff. The respondent engaged a private limited company called Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. to carry out the said investigation. The applicant was asked by the investigation to submit his written response to various meetings and interviews and he duly complied. On the 4th of April, 2016 nearly one year after the complaint from Ms. Spence and the applicant was furnished with a copy of the report of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. which was dated the 24th of March, 2016.

80. The two investigators of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. were Ms. Louise McGonigle and Mr. Gordon Nolan. The Court has the statement of Michelle Spence which was taken by the defendant's investigator on the 4th of August, 2015. An interview with Mr. Michael Lyons held on the 22nd of September, 2015 at which he was accompanied by Brian Hyland from the Teachers Union of Ireland. A further interview was held with Ms. Michelle Spence on the 11th of January, 2016. A further interview was held with the applicant held on the 16th of February, 2016.

81. Emails were sent to Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. from Deirdre O'Brien. Further, a statement of Antoinette Higgins, Margaret Mullooney, and AnnMarie Keenan were taken by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. A number of letters were also received by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd.

82. By letter dated the 4th of March, 2016 Louise McGonagall, the senior HR consultant of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. indicated that they would now proceed to consider the information provided by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. to date and will issue a report of their findings to the HR manager of the respondent.

83. Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd.'s final report issued on the 24th of March, 2016 and among the findings were that:

> "The investigation concludes that Mr. Lyons has withheld information in relation to Ms. Spence on two occasions. Specifically, in relation to failing to inform her about a Community Arts Project and the non-inclusion of her TY plan at the Board of Management meeting. The investigation also finds that > Mr. Lyons undermined Ms. Spencer on two occasions. Specifically, in relation to failing to acknowledge her contribution at a staff meeting in addition to keeping possession of the school Arts camera".

The report also noted that the behaviour of Ms. Spence towards Mr. Lyons wife has been a contributory factor in this finding against Mr. Lyons. In addition, both parties have strong opinions on certain matters, which has lead to tensions between them. However as there has been repeated inappropriate behaviour directed towards Ms. Spence by Mr. Lyons during the course of his employment, this can be reasonably regarded as undermining her right to dignity at work as per the definition outlined in the ETB bullying policy.

84. The report does not deal with the complaints Ms Spence alleges took place from 2008, and the finding of the report is unhelpful in this light. It appears to the Court that an investigation which took a year, comprising of four interviews (two interviews with Ms. Spence and two interviews with Mr. Lyons) and a number of statements and letters from witnesses did not adequately deal with issues that predated the complaints. The report does not set out sufficiently the basis upon which the investigators concluded that Ms. Spence's right to dignity at work had been undermined.

85. On the 21st of April, 2016 the applicant received a letter from the respondent dated the 20th of April, 2016 advising that the report of Graphite Recruitment HRM was to be adopted by the respondent. The applicant was advised that he had fifteen working days to appeal the decision. The applicant duly appealed to the appeals officer whereupon his appeal was rejected. By letter dated the 30th of August, 2016 the applicant was advised that in circumstances where his appeal had not been upheld, the investigation report would be upheld, together with the findings against him as set out therein. The applicant is advised of the following:

> "Bullying behaviour in an ETB workplace is unacceptable misconduct which promptly falls to be addressed under the appropriate provisions of Circular 0071 of 2014 Disciplinary Procedures for Teachers Employed in Education and Training Boards. In the light of the findings/conclusions of the investigation report (copy enclosed) you are required to attend a Stage 4 disciplinary meeting to be convened for the purposes of determining the disciplinary action if any which may arise from the finding of the investigation report referred to above."

The applicant was further advised that the meeting was scheduled to take place at 11 am on Thursday the 15th of September, 2016.

86. In correspondence, Brian Carolan, solicitor on behalf of the applicant in his first letter to the Chief Executive of Longford Westmeath Education and Training Board Dr. Christy Duffy, sought certain assurances in relation to the applicant's right to fair procedures. He also submits in his letter dated 1st August, 2016:

> "Clearly any findings of the previous investigation report cannot be relied upon in any subsequent disciplinary process in circumstances where the applicable ETB policies and procedures do not permit this.
> Our client is anxious to have all of his rights to fair procedures including the right to challenge the evidence against him and in particular the right to cross-examine his accuser, his right to the presumption of innocence and his right to be advised in advanced in writing of the specific allegations against him that are proposed to be the subject matter of any disciplinary procedure."

87. Further in a letter dated the 2nd of September, 2016 to Dr. Duffy he stated:

> "The disciplinary process provided for Circular 71 of 2014 does not refer to or in any way impact upon the investigation you refer to and accordingly we are surprised of the suggestion in your recent letter that in some way the results of that investigation could have any relevance to the detailed procedures provided for in Circular 71 of 2014."

He relied upon the presumption of his client's innocence and the right of Mr. Lyons to challenge including by way of cross-examination all evidence which would be called at such a hearing. He further stated that his client is entitled to call witnesses. He also suggested that Mr. Lyons is entitled to a fair and impartial examination of the issues being investigated and that it did not appear to him that the Chief Executive was in a position to provide such a fair and impartial examination given his involvement in the procedures to date and most particularly in the light of his apparent acceptance of findings made against Mr. Lyons.

88. By letter dated the 6th of September, 2016 William Egan & Associates solicitors wrote to the applicant's solicitor stating the following:

> "A reading of these documents (the Bullying Prevention Policy and Circular letter 71 of 2014) makes it abundantly clear that there an inextricable and intended link between them. It is repeatedly stated there were employees found to have behaved in an inappropriate manner towards another employee. The defending conduct may be referred to the disciplinary procedures at an appropriate stage."

It further stated:

> "In the circumstances our client is now quite entitled to refer the matter to the disciplinary procedure at an appropriate stage to consider the appropriate conduct of your client and what disciplinary action, if any, may be appropriate to the circumstances.

Your client has participated in the process to date and has had access to representation and all the relevant documentation throughout that process. The now related suggestion that he is in some way a stranger to the details of the matter, that all the work to date should now be set aside to commence a de novo process is entirely intangible and without foundation."

89. The Court is satisfied that a finding of bullying in contravention of the Bullying Prevention Policy does amount to conduct of a serious nature. Such a finding of course, could lead in certain cases to dismissal. It is not for the Court to make any decisions in this regard as it is clearly a matter for the Chief Executive to make a determination.

Fair Procedures in Relation to the Investigation by Graphite Recruitment HRM

90. The process set out in Bullying Prevention Policy and Circular 71/2014 excludes a legal representative from acting on behalf of a teacher against whom accusations are levelled. This is the case, even though the complaints may lead to dismissal. Investigative bodies, like Graphite Recruitment HRM are utilised by employers both in the public sector and in the private sector. Generally, the processes adopted by such bodies exclude:

(1) legal representatives from attending on behalf of their client;

(2) cross-examination.

91. Where investigative processes can lead to dismissal, cross-examination is a vital safeguard to ensure fair procedure. In Borges v. the Fitness to Practice Committee [2004] 1 I.R. 103, Keane C.J. states:

"It is beyond argument that, where a tribunal such as the first respondent is inquiring into an allegation of conduct which reflects on a person's good name or reputation, basic fairness of procedure requires that he or she should be allowed to cross-examine, by counsel, his accuser or accusers. That has been the law since the decision of this Court in In re Haughey [1971] I.R. 217 and the importance of observing that requirement is manifestly all the greater where, as here, the consequence of the tribunal's finding may not simply reflect on his reputation but may also prevent him from practicing as a doctor, either for a specified period or indefinitely."

92. Keane C.J. discusses conduct which reflects on a person's good name or reputation:-

"The applicant cannot be deprived of his right to fair procedures, which necessitate the giving of evidence by his accusers and their being cross-examined, by the extension of the exceptions to the rule against hearsay to a case in which they are unwilling to testify in person."

93. In Maguire v. Ardagh [2002] 1 I.R. 385 Hardiman J. stated:-

"where a person is accused on the basis of false statements of fact, or denied his civil or constitutional rights on the same basis, cross-examination of the perpetrators of these falsehoods is the great weapon available to him for his own vindication. Falsehoods may arise through deliberate calculated perjury."

94. Hardiman J. continued:-

"In re Haughey [1971] I.R. 217, it was said by Ó Dálaigh C.J. at p. 264:

"... in proceedings before any tribunal (this Courts emphasis) where a party to the proceedings is on risk of having his good name, or his person or property, or any of his personal rights jeopardized, the proceedings may be correctly classed as proceedings which may affect his rights, and in compliance with the Constitution the State, either by its enactments or through the courts, must outlaw any procedures which will restrict or prevent the party concerned from vindicating these rights."

Applying that general principle to the facts of that case, this Court found at p. 263 that a person against whom damaging allegations were made was entitled to the following "minimum protection":-

(a) that he should be furnished with a copy of the evidence which reflected on his good name;

(b) that he should be allowed to cross-examine, by counsel, his accuser or accusers;

(c) that he should be allowed to give rebutting evidence; and

(d) that he should be permitted to address, again by counsel, the Committee in his own defence.

Without these rights:-

"no accused - and I speak within the context of the terms of the inquiry - could hope to make any adequate defence of his good name. To deny such rights is, in an ancestral adage, a classic case of clocha ceangailte agus madraí scaoilte. Article 40, s. 3 of the Constitution is a guarantee to the citizen of basic fairness of procedures. The Constitution guarantees such fairness, and it is the duty of the court to underline that the words of Article 40, s. 3 are not political shibboleths but provide a positive protection for the citizen and his good name."

Accordingly, the right to cross-examine one's accusers is a constitutional right and not a concession. It applies, as In re Haughey [1971] I.R. 217 affirmatively demonstrates, in an Oireachtas committee or sub-committee as well as in any other forum in which a citizen may be accused. It is an essential, constitutionally guaranteed, aspect of fair procedures."

95. It is quite clear to this Court that the proceedings adopted by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. is in breach of Article 40(3)(1) and (2) of the Constitution of Ireland by the refusal to allow legal representatives to appear on behalf of the applicant. The processes adopted by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. failed to vindicate the good name of the applicant, in their refusal to hold an appropriate hearing, whereby the applicant through solicitor or counsel may have cross-examined the complainant..Equally, the complainant ought be entitled to then cross-examine the applicant.

96. Fair procedures manifestly indicate that the applicant has the right to confront and cross-examine the individual who has made allegations against him. It is unclear whether Stage 4 of the Disciplinary Procedure under Circular 71/2014 entitles the applicant to be accompanied by a solicitor. However, this Court finds that it is the it is the actual investigation that requires the rights to cross-examination and representation, that takes prior to the initiation of the disciplinary procedure under Circular 71/2014.

97. It appears to this Court that the Department of Education and Skills must be aware of the importance of fair procedures, and how fair procedures must be adopted under its Bullying Protection Policy, or its 'Disciplinary Procedures' under Circular 71/2014. It is clear that as a matter of law and as a matter of fair procedures an individual whose job is at stake and against whom allegations are made would be entitled to challenge and cross-examine evidence. The Court finds that the investigation carried out by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. failed to adopt fair procedures, in contradiction of the dicta of Supreme Court in the above cited decisions.

98. It is noted by the Court that this is the process adopted by many companies when dealing with complaints against employees. It is quite clear that the exclusion of solicitors and counsel, and the refusal to allow cross-examination under such policies is a breach of the Constitutional right to fair procedures.

99. It is clear to the Court that if there is a finding of bullying under an investigation that adopts constitutional fair procedures, this may amount to conduct of a serious nature. In a case such as this, such a finding would allow an employer to invoke Stage 4 of the procedures - but only if the investigation leading to such a finding had been conducted in line with fair procedure.

100. Such a finding could lead to dismissal, but it is not for the Court to make any decisions in this regard. This is a matter for the Chief Executive to determine, and the Court repeats, this is provided that the finding of bullying followed from a constitutionally sound investigative process.

101. The Court is clear that in circumstances where a complaint is made which could result in an individual's dismissal, or where it impinges on the individual's right to a good name, the individual is entitled to fair procedures, as outlined by the Supreme Court in the case law quoted above.

102. Counsel for the respondent makes the point that the order following from a judicial review case such as this is an order of certiorari. This would quash the decision of the respondent dated the 30th of August, 2015, insofar as the respondent upheld a finding of bullying against the applicant, for the purpose of summoning the applicant to a Stage 4 disciplinary meeting as provided for in the Department of Education and Skills Circular 71/2014.

103. However, the Chief Executive is relying on a flawed and constitutionally impermissible finding of bullying. In the Court's view, the investigative process comes foursquare within the remit and ambit of the judicial review sought by the applicant.

104. In summary, the Court holds as follows:

(1) The investigation by Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. was in breach of the constitutional right to fair procedures.

(2) If a constitutionally sound finding of bulling had been made, this could amount to conduct of a serious nature, and as such could be the subject matter of a disciplinary process at Stage 4 of the proceedings set out above. This would not necessitate the investigation being carried out under Stages 1 to 3 beforehand.

105. Finally, the Court will set aside the summoning of the applicant to a Stage 4 disciplinary meeting, on the basis that the findings of Graphite Recruitment HRM Ltd. are in breach of the fair procedures. The Chief Executive has no constitutionally sound basis to hold a disciplinary hearing in accordance with Circular 71/2014.

High Court 9th December, 2005

Employment – Appeal from Employment Appeals Tribunal – Point of law – Deduction of wages – Remuneration properly payable – Whether Employment Appeals Tribunal erred in law – Payment of Wages Act 1991 (No 25), s. 5(6).

Section 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991 prohibits an employer from making a deduction from the wages of an employee unless the deduction is authorised to be made by virtue of any statute or any instrument made under statute or is required or authorised to be made under the employee's contract of employment or the employee has consented to same.

Giving effect to a Labour Court recommendation, the appellant agreed to implement a long service increment for members MANDATE trade union with more than ten years service. In doing so the appellant replaced the previous system of weekly service pay payable to staff with more than ten years service with the long service increment. The respondents who were members of MANDATE trade union made a complaint to the rights commissioner pursuant to s. 6 of the Act of 1991 that, in failing to pay the long service increment and the weekly service pay, the appellant was in breach of s. 5 of the Act of 1991 in that it amounted to an unlawful deduction of wages. The rights commissioner made a recommendation in favour of the respondents. The appellant appealed to the Employment Appeals Tribunal where the recommendation of the rights commissioner was upheld. The appellant appealed the determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal to the High Court on a point of law. The appellant argued that the Employment Appeals Tribunal had erred in law in failing to address the question of what was the remuneration properly payable to the respondents. The respondents argued that there was evidence of an agreement on the part of the appellant to pay both the service pay and the long service increment to the respondents.

Held by the High Court (Finnegan P.), in allowing the appeal, that, the question of the remuneration properly payable to the respondents was essential to the making of a determination by the Employment Appeals Tribunal and accordingly, where there was no evidence of an agreement to make both payments, the tribunal erred in law in failing to address the remuneration properly payable.

There are no cases mentioned in this report.

Special summons

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of Finnegan P., infra.

On the 10th August, 2004, the Employment Appeals Tribunal upheld a recommendation of the rights commissioner dated the 1st December, 2003, holding that the appellants had made an unlawful deduction from the respondents' wages in breach of s. 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. The appellants instituted an appeal by way of special summons dated the 2nd September, 2004. The appeal was heard by the High Court (Finnegan P.) on the 2nd December, 2005.

Cur. adv. vult.

[2] Section 5 of the Act of 1991 prohibits an employer from making a deduction from the wages of an employee unless the deduction is authorised to be made by virtue of any statute or any instrument made under statute or is required or authorised to be made under the employee's contract of employment or the employee has consented to the same. Section 6 of the Act of 1991 provides that an employee may present a complaint in relation to a breach of the Act to a rights commissioner who shall hold a hearing. Section 7 provides for an appeal from a decision of the rights commissioner under s. 6 to the Employment Appeals Tribunal and in s. 7(4)(b) for an appeal from a determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal to the High Court on a point of law.

[3] Historically service pay has been a feature of wage scales for the appellant's employees. The first respondent at the time of the application to the rights commissioner was entitled to service pay of €3.81 per week and the second respondent to €3.17 per week. Relevant employees with over five years service were entitled to receive between 50 cent and €3.50 per week payment, being by way of staged increases up to 30 years service. In relation to Dublin based employees the payment was made pursuant to a Registered Employment Agreement but similar terms were applied to employees outside Dublin. In 1999 MANDATE the respondent's trade union sought the introduction of a long service increment for its members. The appellant refused and the matter was referred to the Labour Relations Commission but no agreement was reached there. The dispute was then referred to the Labour Court pursuant to s. 26(1) of the Industrial Relations Act 1990. In its recommendation dated the 26th October, 2001, the Labour Court recommended that a long service increment of £7.83 per hour (sic) effective from the date of the recommendation be introduced at ten years service. I assume that this should correctly refer to €7.83 per week but that is irrelevant to the issue I have to decide. Such a recommendation is not of binding effect. The appellant issued a memorandum dated the 18th September, 2002, designed to give effect to the Labour Court recommendation as understood by the appellant. This provides as follows:-

>
> In addition, long service increment of 0.23c per hour will be paid to all sales assistants with more than ten years service. This payment will not apply to canteen, cleaning, security or timepiece. This payment will be backdated to the 26th October, 2001. Therefore sales assistants with more than ten years service will actually be paid €10.47 per hour.
>
> The old system of weekly service pay for fulltimers is now being abolished for all staff with more than ten years service as of the 26th October, 2001. Any service pay received by fulltimers in the interim will be set against the back pay for the new service rates by the wages department. Again this payment will be made directly into staff bank accounts this Friday.
> However fulltimers with between five and ten years service will continue to receive their weekly service pay until they reach ten years service when this will be replaced by the hourly payment. Therefore on an ongoing basis staff who have over five years service will continue to receive weekly service pay until they have reached ten years service when their weekly pay will be replaced by hourly service pay."

[4] The effect of the memo is that staff with less than ten years service continue to receive service pay. Staff with ten years service no longer receive service pay but receive a higher sum described as a long service increment.

[5] MANDATE responded to the memorandum by letter dated the 23rd September, 2002, the relevant part of that letter reading as follows:-

> "Service Pay
> There is no agreement with MANDATE trade union or its members to abolish service pay after ten years. Dunnes Stores sought clarification from the court on this matter and was advised that the issue of service pay was not before the court. Therefore we are seeking the full restoration of service pay."

[6] The respondents complained to a rights commissioner pursuant to s. 6(1) of the Act of 1991, the complaint being that in discontinuing service pay for employees with ten years service but in substituting a higher payment by way of long service increment the appellant was in breach of s. 5 of the Act of 1991: in short the complaint was that such employees are entitled to both service pay and the long service increment. On the 1st December, 2003, the rights commissioner found in favour of the respondents holding that the cessation of service pay amounted to an unlawful deduction. The appellant appealed to the Employment Appeals Tribunal pursuant to s. 7 of the Act of 1991. On the 10th August, 2004, in its determination the Employment Appeals Tribunal upheld the recommendation of the rights commissioner.

[7] The appellant's case is this. Section 5(6) of the Act of 1991 provides as follows:-

>
> (a) the total amount of any wages that are paid on any occasion by an employer to an employee is less than the total amount of wages that is properly payable by him to the employee on that occasion (after making any deductions therefrom that fall to be made and are in accordance with this Act), or
>
> (b) none of the wages that are properly payable to an employee by an employer on any occasion (after making any such deductions as aforesaid) are paid to the employee,
> then, except in so far as the deficiency or non-payment is attributable to an error of computation, the amount of the deficiency or non-payment shall be treated as a deduction made by the employer from the wages of the employee on the occasion."

[8] For the appellant it was argued that regard must be had to the phrase "properly payable". The recommendation of the Labour Court is not binding upon the appellant. This is so whether remuneration is determined under the Registered Employment Agreement or an agreement simpliciter. Accordingly the appellant was not obliged to implement payment of a long service increment but nonetheless decided to do so and thereby increased the remuneration of the relevant employees. The Employment Appeals Tribunal in order to make a determination ought first properly to have had regard to the remuneration "properly payable" to the employee. In the case of the respondents the remuneration properly payable was their remuneration at the appropriate hourly rate together with service pay but increased in accordance with the memorandum of the 18th September, 2002. The terms "service pay" and "long service increment" are not terms of art but each refer to additional remuneration to employees with long service. The Employment Appeals Tribunal erred in law in failing to address the question of the remuneration properly payable to the respondents or in the alternative erred in implicitly finding that the remuneration properly payable as a result of an agreement reached between the appellant and MANDATE was the appropriate hourly rate, the service pay and the long service increment, there having been no agreement on the part of the appellant to make such payment.

[9] For the respondents it was argued that on construing the memorandum of the 18th September, 2002, the letter dated the 23rd September, 2002, from MANDATE to the appellant and the reply of the 21st October, 2002, from the appellant to MANDATE, together with the submissions by the appellant to the rights commissioner and the Employment Appeals Tribunal, there is evidence of agreement on the part of the appellant to pay both service pay and long service increment to the respondents. These documents should be considered as containing no denial by the appellant of an obligation to make such payment and so evidencing an agreement to make such payments: accordingly such payments are properly payable for the purposes of the Act of 1991.

Conclusion

[10] I am satisfied upon careful perusal of the documents relied upon by the respondents that the same cannot represent the agreement or an acknowledgement of the agreement contended for but rather contain a clear denial of the existence of any such agreement. No other evidence of an agreement was proffered. In these circumstances I am satisfied that the Employment Appeals Tribunal erred in law in failing to address the question of the remuneration properly payable to the respondents, such a determination being essential to the making by it of a determination. Insofar as a finding is implicit in the determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal that the appellant agreed to pay to the respondents service pay and a long service increment, then such finding was made without evidence and indeed in the face of the evidence: I am satisfied that there has been no deduction of pay from the respondents within the terms of the Act of 1991 but rather their remuneration has been unilaterally increased by the appellant making a payment which recognises their long service in excess of that which was payable prior to the 18th September, 2002. In either case there has been an error or law. Accordingly I allow the appeal.

In the matter of The Sunday Tribune Limited (in Liquidation)

High Court 26th September, 1984

Company – Winding up – Creditors – Classification – Preferential payments – Test applicable – Unpaid wages or salary of servants or employees – Whether employee engaged under a contract of service or a contract for services – Claimants in first category entitled to be paid as preferential creditors – Companies Act, 1963 (No. 33), s. 285.

On the 15th November, 1982, the High Court made an order directing that The Sunday Tribune Ltd. be wound up by the court, and appointing an official liquidator. During the winding up of the company, the official liquidator applied to the court for the determination of the proper classification of the debts proved by three creditors of the company in respect of wages or salary owed to each of them by the company for services rendered to the company by each of those creditors. The three creditors claimed that the sums so due to them were debts payable in the winding up in accordance with the priority specified in s. 285, sub-s. 2, of the Act of 1963. It is provided by sub-s. 2(b) of that section that, in the winding up of a company, there shall be paid in priority to all other debts all wages or salary (whether or not earned wholly or in part by way of commission) of "any clerk or servant" in respect of services rendered to the company during the four months before the relevant date.

The first claimant had been employed by the company on a shift basis as sub-editor of the newspaper published by the company. He was required to attend at the company's premises at a specified time and he had worked under the guidance of the chief sub-editor and to his instructions. The second claimant had been paid a fixed sum each week as a journalist for writing the material for a weekly column published in the company's newspaper; she was required to attend and participate at the company's editorial conferences. The third claimant had furnished regularly articles for the company's newspaper but each article had been commissioned separately by the company. The official liquidator had refused to enter the names of the three claimants in the list of preferential creditors because of the independent nature of their work and because income tax had not been deducted by the company from their remuneration in accordance with the PAYE system. At the hearing of the official liquidator's application it was Held by Carroll J., in determining the issues, 1, that the proper test to apply was to ascertain whether or not the services rendered to the company by each claimant had been rendered pursuant to a contract of service.

2. That the evidence established that the services so rendered to the company by each of the first two claimants had been rendered pursuant to contracts of service and that, accordingly, the debts proved by those two claimants qualified for the priority specified in s. 285, sub-s. 2, of the Act of 1963.

Beloff v. Pressdram Ltd. [1973] 1 All E.R. 241 and Stevenson, Jordan & Harrison Ltd. v. Macdonald [1952] 1 T.L.R. 101 considered.

3. That the services rendered to the company by the third claimant had not been rendered pursuant to a contract of service and, accordingly, the debt proved by that claimant did not qualify for such priority.

Motion on Notice.

On the 27th October, 1982 the High Court (Keane J.) appointed John McStay to be provisional liquidator of The Sunday Tribune Ltd. On the 15th November, 1982 the High Court (Carroll J.) appointed him to be official liquidator of the company, and directed that the company be wound up by the court. During the liquidation, the official liquidator applied to the High Court pursuant to order 55, r. 48, of the Rules of the Superior Courts, 1962, for the determination of certain issues specified in the Examiner's memorandum dated the 9th September, 1983, and described in the judgment of Carroll J., infra. Section 285, sub-s 2(b), of the Companies Act, 1963, provides— "In a winding up there shall be paid in priority to all other debts . . . (b)all wages or salary (whether or not earned wholly or in part by way of commission) of any clerk or servant in respect of services rendered to the company during the 4 months next before the relevant date."

The liquidator's application was heard by Carroll J. on the 14th and 21st November 1983 and the 28th May, and 5th July, 1984.

E.G. Stewart S.C. (with him I. Finlay) for the official liquidator.

B.M. McCracken S.C. (with him J. McMenamin) for the claimants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Carroll J. 26th September, 1984

The liquidator of The Sunday Tribune Ltd. has applied to the Court to determine if certain people who did work for the paper published by that company were employees of the company and were entitled, therefore, to claim priority in the winding up as preferential creditors. The liquidator was not prepared to enter them in the class of preferential creditors on the grounds that income tax had not been deducted from their remuneration in accordance with the PAYE system.

The Examiner's memorandum identifies the first claimant as "Patrick Woodworth, of a class for convenience described as 'shift workers', whose claim is as a part-time worker working under the same conditions, control and supervision as full-time employees, paid by the shift under a contract based on the house agreement applicable to all employees. This claimant worked two shifts per week." In a separate affidavit Patrick Woodworth said that he was employed on a shift basis and that, in the beginning, he did one shift per week as sub-editor. He was required to attend at a specified time and then worked under the guidance of the chief sub-editor and to his instructions until the shift was over. The period of the shift was fixed in advance. If any work had to be done beyond the end of the shift, overtime was paid. From March, 1983, he worked two shifts per week. He worked under the same general terms and conditions (of a house agreement between the company and the National Union of Journalists) as full-time employees.

The next claimant is described in the Examiner's memorandum as "Mary Holland, of a small class described as 'regular columnist.' Her contract agrees a fixed fee of £— per week as a journalist in relation to her weekly column, her attendance and participation in editorial conferences and whatever additional small news items came her way. For two weeks of the year, payment was to be honoured without having to supply copy. For two additional weeks, advance copy was to be accepted by the newspaper. The salary was separately negotiated and was not a minimum fixed by a trade union agreement." In her affidavit Mary Holland says she was paid that sum per week to include a regular weekly column, attendance and participation at editorial conferences, with such further news items or items of interest as she might be able to contribute. Six times a year the column was to be a major piece.

The next claimant is identified in the Examiner's memorandum as "Ronit Lentin, of a class described as 'regular contributors' who were paid for commissioned work not necessarily appearing weekly on a rate-per-word-basis. No reference was made to editorial control or attendance at the office." In her affidavit Ronit Lentin said that she had been a regular contributor. She visited the office of The Sunday Tribune approximately once each week and she would either suggest a topic for an article or be asked to contribute an article of a certain length on a specific topic. She was then commissioned and paid on the basis of the house agreement between the company and the National Union of Journalists. She said that in no case was the work embarked on without a firm commission from the editor.

Each of the three claimants filed an affidavit to say that he or she was registered with the Revenue Commissioners under Schedule D and, accordingly, paid tax on his or her aggregate annual income from journalism.

I am satisfied that the fact that income tax was not deducted in accordance with the PAYE system is not the determining factor in this case. The profession of journalism is such that a journalist may have an income from more than one source under a contract of service or a contract for services or both. It appears to have been a matter of convenience, permitted by the Revenue authorities at the time, to allow payments to be made without deduction of PAYE, notwithstanding the status of the worker. At the time she was working for The Sunday Tribune, Mary Holland was also working part-time for London Weekend Television and also for The New Statesman. Patrick Woodworth, who worked part-time on shift for The Sunday Tribune, also worked for The Irish Times, the Irish Press Group and the Irish Independent Group. He said that there was no difference in practice between the way in which those with certificates of exclusion (i.e., those from whose pay income tax was not deducted under the PAYE system) worked and the way in which those without such certificates worked.

The determining factor is whether the work which was done by each claimant was done on foot of a contract of service which created the relationship of employer and employee or whether it was done on foot of a contract for services which did not create that relationship. The Court must look at the realities of the situation in order to determine whether the relationship of employer and employee in fact exists, and it must do so regardless of how the parties describe themselves: see Ferguson v. John Dawson & Partners.[1] The simple test is whether the employer possessed the right not only to control what work the employee was to do but also the manner in which the work was to be done. However, that test is no longer of universal application. In the present day, when senior staff with professional qualifications are employed, the nature of their employment cannot be determined in such a simplistic way.

The question is dealt with extensively in Beloff v. Pressdram Ltd.[2] One of the issues to be determined in that case was whether copyright in a certain memorandum belonged to the journalist who wrote it or the newspaper which published it. If the work was written in the course of the author's employment by the newspaper under a contract of service, the newspaper was entitled to copyright in the work under s. 4, sub-s. 4, of the Copyright Act, 1956. It was not in issue that the memorandum was made in the course of employment but the court had to decide whether the employment was under a contract of service or a contract for services. Ungoed-Thomas J. reviewed the earlier law and quoted from pp. 549-50 of the judgment of Fletcher Moulton L.J. in Simmons v. Heath Laundry Company[3] as follows:–

> "The greater the amount of direct control exercised over the person rendering the services by the person contracting for them the stronger the grounds for holding it to be a contract of service, and similarly the greater the degree of independence of such control the greater the probability that the services rendered are of the nature of professional services and that the contract is not one of service. The place where the services are rendered, i.e., whether at the residence of the person rendering the services or not, will also be an element in deciding the case, but is not in my opinion decisive . . . "

Ungoed-Thomas J. goes on (at p. 248 of the report of the Beloff Case[2]) to say that nowadays professional and similarly skilled persons are widely engaged under what are recognised as contracts of service, and he reviews recent authorities in relation to particular cases which have been held to be (or not to be) contracts of service.

The test that Denning L.J. applied in Stevenson, Jordan & Harrison Ltd. v. Macdonald[4] is there stated (at p. 111) as follows:–

> "One feature which seems to run through the instances is that, under a contract of service, a man is employed as part of the business, and his work is done as an integral part of the business; whereas, under a contract for services, his work, although done for the business, is not integrated into it but is only accessory to it."

At the same page Denning L.J. also said:–

> "It is often easy to recognize a contract of service when you see it, but difficult to say wherein the difference lies. A ship's master, a chauffeur, and a reporter on the staff of a newspaper are all employed under a contract of service; but a ship's pilot, a taxi-man, and a newspaper contributor are employed under a contract for services."

Ungoed-Thomas J., having reviewed other cases as well, said at p. 250 of the report of the Beloff Case[2]:–

> "It thus appears, and rightly in my respectful view, that, the greater the skill required for an employee's work, the less significant is control in determining whether the employee is under a contract of service. Control is just one of many factors whose influence varies according to circumstances. In such highly skilled work as that of the plaintiff it seems of no substantial significance. The test which emerges from the authorities seems to me, as Denning L.J. said, whether on the one hand the employee is employed as part of the business and his work is an integral part of the business, or whether his work is not integrated into the business but is only accessory to it, or, as Cooke J. expressed it, the work is done by him in business on his own account."

The court went on to hold that the plaintiff, who was political and lobby correspondent of The Observer, was employed under a contract of service. The job of political and lobby correspondent was essential for and woven into its political coverage. The court held that the plaintiff's job was an integral part of the business of The Observer.

In Patrick Woodworth's case, his employment satisfies the simple test of control by the employer. He worked at specified times under the guidance of the chief sub-editor and to his instructions. The fact that he worked part-time does not change the nature of his employment. A person may be an employee even though employed part-time: Market Investigations v. Minister of Social Security.[5] In addition, a person may be employed by different employers: Jones v. Scullard.[6] Therefore, I am satisfied that Mr. Woodworth was employed by The Sunday Tribune under a contract of service.

In Mary Holland's case, I am of opinion that her employment was an integral part of the business of the newspaper. The column was to run for 50 of the 52 weeks of the year. She took part in editorial conferences. There was provision for the equivalent of holiday pay. Her case is not dissimilar to that of the plaintiff in Beloff v. Pressdram Ltd.[2] Therefore, I am satisfied that she was employed under a contract of service.

In Ronit Lentin's case, I am of opinion that her employment was not an integral part of the business of the newspaper. In my opinion, she was a freelance contributor who secured commissions in advance. She was under no obligation to contribute on a regular basis. Presumably, if she did not negotiate a commissioned article, the company's editor would get articles from some other source. Therefore, I am satisfied that she was not employed under a contract of service but was an independent contractor in respect of the articles she did provide.

Accordingly, Patrick Woodworth and Mary Holland were employees of the company for the purposes of s. 285 of the Companies Act, 1963, while Ronit Lentin was not such an employee.

High Court 8 January 2016

Employment – Contract – Payment of wages – Non-payment of bonus payments – Discretion to discontinue bonus scheme – Date of accrual of entitlement to bonus – Location allowance – Interpretation of contract of employment – Whether bonus scheme could be discontinued after accrual of entitlement – Whether location allowance expense or wages – Payment of Wages Act 1991 (No. 25), ss. 1 and 5.

Section 1 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991 provides, inter alia, as follows:-

"'wages', in relation to an employee, means any sums payable to the employee by the employer in connection with his employment, including—

(a) any fee, bonus or commission, or any holiday, sick or maternity pay, or any other emolument, referable to his employment, whether payable under his contract of employment or otherwise, and

Provided however that the following payments shall not be regarded as wages for the purposes of this definition:

(i) any payment in respect of expenses incurred by the employee in carrying out his employment …"

Section 5(1) of the 1991 Act provides as follows:-

"An employer shall not make a deduction from the wages of an employee (or receive any payment from an employee) unless—

(a) the deduction (or payment) is required or authorised to be made by virtue of any statute or any instrument made under statute,

(b) the deduction (or payment) is required or authorised to be made by virtue of a term of the employee's contract of employment included in the contract before, and in force at the time of, the deduction or payment, or

(c) in the case of a deduction, the employee has given his prior consent in writing to it."

The appellants were employees of the respondent company. The respondent operated a bonus scheme, payable twice annually, in June and November, for work carried out from August to January and from February to July, respectively. The respondent discontinued the bonus scheme in January 2012 and did not make the payments allegedly due in July 2012. The respondent also previously operated a so-called zone allowance whereby employees in Dublin stores received an additional hourly allowance in consideration of the higher cost of living there. The respondent removed that allowance as it contended that there was no longer a reason to pay it.

The appellants applied to the rights commissioner who found in their favour. The respondent appealed to the Employment Appeals Tribunal, which determined that the bonus scheme was discretionary and could be withdrawn at any time. The tribunal also determined that the zone allowance was separate and distinct from salary and that it was not paid as compensation for work carried out but was a form of compensation for working in a certain area, and thus was not wages under s. 1(1) of the 1991 Act. The appellants appealed to the High Court under s. 7(4)(b) of the 1991 Act against the finding of the tribunal.

Held by the High Court (McDermott J.), in allowing the appeal in respect of the bonus payment issue but refusing it in respect of the zone allowance issue, 1, that the payment of a bonus crystallised as a contractual obligation once it was earned in accordance with the terms of the bonus scheme under a contract of employment. Where such a bonus scheme was thereafter unilaterally withdrawn, the fact employees worked the relevant period pursuant to the scheme meant they accrued a bonus entitlement under the scheme despite the existence of a clause that all bonus schemes were discretionary and could be withdrawn at any time.

2. That the discretionary nature of a bonus scheme did not extend to a withholding of a bonus due. A bonus so accrued was a bonus properly payable as wages under s. 5(1) of the 1991 Act. The discretion to withdraw a bonus scheme at any time was intended to apply in futuro and attached to the conferring of bonuses, as yet unaccrued, under the terms of the scheme.

3. That the tribunal erred in regarding the use of the word "discretionary" in relation to the bonus scheme as being determinative. The use of the word "discretionary" was not always determinative of whether a contractual entitlement arose under a bonus scheme.

Small v. Boots Co. plc [2009] I.R.L.R. 328 considered.

4. That a discretion to withdraw a bonus scheme had to be exercised reasonably. A discretion exercised unreasonably would render the employer in breach of contract if no reasonable employer would have exercised the discretion in such a way. A high onus was imposed on an employee who claimed that such a discretion had been unreasonably exercised.

Lichters and Hass v. DEPFA Bank plc [2012] IEHC 10, [2012] E.L.R. 258 followed.

5. That an expense could be withdrawn or reduced in accordance with the terms of the contract of employment dealing with expenses, and was not properly the subject of a claim for relief under the 1991 Act as a deduction from wages. The 1991 Act had no application to issues arising from a reduction of an allowance properly classified as an expense because it was clearly not a deduction from wages.

London Borough of Southwark v. O'Brien [1996] I.R.L.R. 420 followed. McKenzie v. Minister for Finance [2010] IEHC 461, [2011] E.L.R. 109 considered.

6. That although findings of fact had to be accepted by the High Court on appeal, the court could still examine the basis upon which those facts were found. The relevance or admissibility of the matters relied on by the tribunal in determining the facts in the manner that it did might give rise to a matter of law.

Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 and National University of Ireland Cork v. Ahern [2005] IESC 40, [2005] 2 I.R. 577 applied.

Originating notice of motion

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of McDermott J., infra.

On 25 June 2014, the appellants issued an originating notice of motion pursuant to s. 7(4)(b) of the Payment of Wages Act 1991, appealing findings of the Employment Appeals Tribunal of 14 May 2014.

The appeal was heard by the High Court (McDermott J.) on 29 and 30 January and 4 February 2015.

Peter Ward S.C. (with him Claire Bruton) for the appellants.

Maurice G. Collins S.C. (with him Marcus Dowling) for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

McDermott J. 8 January 2016

Introduction/background

[1] The appellants are ten employees of the respondent who commenced their employment on different dates between the years 2001 and 2008 respectively in different retail premises operated by the respondent. The first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and tenth appellants claim an entitlement to be paid a winter/summer bonus under their respective contracts of employment. The bonus was normally paid twice annually and amounted to 6% per annum of gross salary: the first payment, amounting to 3% of gross salary, was paid in June of each year ("the summer bonus") for the work period August to January and the second, a further 3%, was payable in November for the work period of February to July ("the winter bonus"). Those commencing employment in 2009 did not benefit from this bonus scheme. The employer discontinued the bonus scheme applicable to the appellants in January 2012 but later indicated that it would take effect from 1 April 2012. The appellants claim that the summer bonus, payable in 2012, should nevertheless have been paid since it was earned and/or accrued during the previous August to January. It was also claimed that the withdrawal of the bonus was in itself unlawful and in breach of the provisions of the Payment of Wages Act 1991 ("the 1991 Act").

[2] The second element of the claim concerned the withdrawal of a "zone allowance" payable to staff at three Dublin outlets owned by the respondent at Liffey Valley, Tallaght and Swords, which is also said to be a breach of the appellants' entitlements under the 1991 Act.

[3] The appeal is pursuant to s. 7(4)(b) of the 1991 Act from a number of determinations made by the Employment Appeals Tribunal ("the Tribunal") on 14 May 2014 in respect of appeals against decisions of the rights commissioner ("the Commissioner") dated 5 and 20 November 2013 following complaints brought by the appellants. It is made by way of notice of motion dated 25 June 2014 grounded upon affidavits sworn by Mr. Jonathan Hogan, an industrial officer with the Mandate trade union. A replying affidavit of Louise Harrison, solicitor, verifying the statement of opposition was submitted on behalf of the respondent.

Reliefs sought

[4] The appellants seek orders pursuant to O. 84C of the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986 and s. 7(4)(b) of the 1991 Act:-

a. that the Tribunal erred in law in determining that the removal of a winter/summer bonus by the respondent was not in breach of s. 5 of the 1991 Act;
b. that the Tribunal erred in law in determining that the removal of a "zone allowance" by the respondent was not in breach of s. 5 of the 1991 Act;
c. that the Tribunal had erred in law in failing to award compensation to the appellants pursuant to s. 6 of the 1991 Act;
d. that the Tribunal erred in law in determining that the removal of the winter/summer bonus constituted a deduction in compliance with s. 5(1)(b) of the 1991 Act;
e. that the Tribunal erred in law in determining that the zone allowance was paid as an expense/compensation for working in a particular geographic area as defined and contemplated by s. 1(1)(i) of the 1991 Act;
f. that the Tribunal erred in law in classifying the non-payment of the zone allowance as a "reduction" rather than a deduction for the purposes of s. 5of the 1991 Act, and, if required;
g. an order remitting the matter back to the Tribunal for hearing.

[5] Three related declarations are also sought by the appellants that:-

a. the respondent made unlawful deductions from the appellant's wages contrary to s. 5 of the 1991 Act;
b. the winter/summer bonus and/or zone allowance are properly payable to the appellants within the meaning of the 1991 Act; and
c. the appellants are entitled to compensation pursuant to s. 6 of the 1991 Act for the unlawful deductions.

Procedural background

[6] The appellants challenged the decisions of the respondent not to pay the zone allowance (where applicable) and the winter/summer bonus payment as unlawful deductions of wages properly payable to them under the appropriate provisions of the 1991 Act. The claims were first brought to the Commissioner and were heard over four days in June, July and October 2013. The claims were upheld.

[7] The Commissioner's decisions were subsequently appealed by the respondent to the Tribunal. By determinations dated 14 May 2014, the Tribunal overturned the decisions reached by the Commissioner in respect of both points.

Preliminary points of objection

[8] The respondent submits that the originating notice of motion dated 25 June 2014 does not, as required under O. 84C, r. 2(3), set out the "point of law on which the appeal is made".

[9] It is also claimed that the appellants have failed to exhibit the transcript of the hearing as contemplated by O. 84C, r. 3(1)(e).

[10] These issues were raised as preliminary points of objection in the statement of opposition dated 21 July 2014. During the course of the hearing both sides sought to rely upon elements of the transcript in support of their respective arguments and I do not consider that this challenge to the admissibility of the transcript in evidence was seriously pursued.

[11] I am also satisfied that the grounds upon which the appeal is brought as set out in the notice of motion are sufficient to raise a number of points of law, as required under the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986 and s. 7 of the 1991 Act, which clearly arise from the pleadings, the affidavits submitted and the substance of the claims brought by the appellants under the relevant legislation.

The Tribunal's determination

[12] The Tribunal's decisions of 14 May 2014 dealt separately with the winter/summer bonus and the zone allowance payments.

Winter/summer bonus

[13] With regard to the winter/summer bonus payment, the Tribunal found that although the terms of the appellants' contracts of employment differed in a number of respects, each contained a common clause which was set out in the employee's handbook and provided that "all bonus schemes are discretionary and are subject to scheme rules. They may be reviewed or withdrawn at any time".

> "On 1 April 2012 the [appellants] were notified that 'with effect from 1 April 2012 you will no longer receive the summer/winter bonus traditionally paid in June and November of each year'. Each employee was asked to sign a letter 'to confirm receipt of the notification of the amendment'. It is clear from the letter that it is not a letter seeking consent to the amendment as was argued by the appellants. It merely seeks acknowledgement of receipt of the amendment to the terms and conditions of employment. From the evidence adduced it would seem that the contracts of employment differed slightly in relation to the point at issue. One set of contracts stated ' … may amend or vary your terms of employment from time to time and these variations or amendments will be posted on the staff notice board if the change is minor or in writing if the change is more substantial'. The other set of contracts stated '[d]etails of the other terms and conditions of employment are given in the employee handbook. Any changes to the above details will be notified to you directly'. There is one consistency between those two contracts and it is set out in the employee handbook, wherein it states in bold 'all bonus schemes are discretionary and are subject to scheme rules. They may be reviewed or withdrawn at any time'. That clause is clear, unequivocal and incapable of any other interpretation".

The Tribunal concluded that the non-payment of the winter/summer bonus complied with the provisions of s. 5(1)(b) of the 1991 Act and reversed the Commissioner's decision. It stated that:-

> "If [the employees] were not content with [the employer] retaining the power unilaterally to review or withdraw the allowance, they should not have entered into such a contract."

Winter/summer bonus payment – factual background

[15] All employees of the respondent who had served for at least six months with the respondent company received a winter/summer bonus payment on the basis of pay earned during certain periods of trade. The winter bonus was based on the basic pay earned in the previous February - July period of trade, with the summer bonus payment being derived from the basic pay earned in the previous August - January trading period. The employee handbook, provided by the respondent to its employees, states that the "scheme guarantees 6% of your basic pay earned salary (excluding commission and overtime) per annum subject to qualifying and accrual times being satisfied." In January 2012 the respondent announced the withdrawal of these two seasonal bonus payments with effect from 1 April 2012. In a letter dated 29 February 2012 the respondent informed its employees that even though they had an expectation that the summer bonus would be paid, this would not be forthcoming due to cost cutting measures by the respondent. It was accepted by the respondent, in meetings held in January 2012 between the respondent and employees, that the latter were eligible to receive a summer bonus, but that there was no prospect of payment due to the implementation of cost reducing policies. The decision was taken in the context of rapidly deteriorating trading conditions for the employer.

Winter/summer bonus payment – appellants' submissions

[16] The appellants' submit that the Tribunal's finding that the withdrawal of the winter/summer bonus was not contrary to the provisions of s. 5(1)(b) of the 1991 Act was wrong in law. They claim that s. 5(1)(b) only allows a financial deduction to be made when authorised by the contract of employment. The appellants argue that the Tribunal failed to consider the fact that their summer bonus – which was payable in June 2012 – was referable to a period which the appellants had already worked, i.e. August 2011 to January 2012 and could not be the subject of a retrospective withdrawal under the "bonus" clause. It failed to consider the fact that the respondent had accepted that the appellants had accrued the summer bonus payable in June 2012 at the time when the decision was made by the respondent to withdraw it. The employees had already provided consideration by their work over that period and had therefore earned the bonus which could not be retrospectively and unilaterally withdrawn.

[17] The appellants also submit that the Tribunal failed to examine whether their contracts of employment contained an express provision which permitted the withdrawal of the winter/summer bonus and, if so, whether their consent was required before the bonus could be withdrawn.

[18] In addition, the appellants contend that the withdrawal of a "declared" bonus could not occur on the exercise of the employer's discretion.

Winter/summer bonus payment – respondent's submissions

[19] The respondent submits that the bonus was not "declared" by the respondent to the appellants for the period commencing August 2011 and ending in January 2012 or any other period. The Tribunal reached the same conclusion on the evidence before it.

[20] The respondent pleads in its statement of opposition that it was open to the Tribunal, on the evidence, to make the findings set out in its determination dated 14 May 2014 in relation to the winter/summer bonus payment and that there is no basis for impugning such findings.

[21] The respondent submits that none of the material put before the court provides any basis for overturning Tribunal's findings. The contracts of employment were clear and unambiguous in respect of the discretionary nature of the bonus payment. In arguing that these terms ought to be construed within the context of their factual background, the appellants fail to provide an adequate rebuttal to the clear meaning of the words used in the clause that "all bonus schemes are discretionary and … may be reviewed or withdrawn at any time".

[22] Further, the respondent argues that the appellants' submission that the power to withdraw the winter/summer bonus should be subject to specific limitations has no legal or factual basis and is unfounded, as the Tribunal's determination of 14 May 2014 clearly states that it considered the evidence proffered in relation to the terms of the contract. The Tribunal found that there was a clear and unambiguous term in the contracts that gave the employer the right to review or withdraw the bonus scheme. Furthermore, such a review or withdrawal could be undertaken "at any time". This clause also clearly states that the bonus scheme is discretionary in nature.

[23] The respondent rejects the appellants' contention that the employer's discretion to withdraw the bonus is qualified in any respect. In that regard, the appellants contend that the discretionary nature of the bonus payment was removed because the period of time to which the bonus was referable had passed. Secondly, it is argued by the appellants that the contract falls to be interpreted in light of the "factual matrix" under which it was made and intended to operate. The respondent highlights that neither of these points were made before the Tribunal, and that being so, the court would be acting ultra vires if these arguments were allowed to be advanced on this appeal.

[24] The respondent claims that it is not clear what the appellants mean by describing the bonus as "declared", that there is no provision for the declaration of a bonus under the contract and that no announcement or process was identified by which the bonus was ever "declared" to its employees. On the contrary, it is submitted that the evidence before the Tribunal clearly stated that the bonus was under review as of January 2012.

[25] The respondent further argues that the Tribunal did not consider that the existence of the bonus scheme coupled with the passing of time was sufficient to give rise to the conclusion that the bonus was payable. Furthermore, the respondent contends that there is no legal precedent for such a finding.

[26] The respondent contends that the notice of motion, dated 25 June 2014 discloses no error of law by the Tribunal in reaching its determination on this issue.

Zone allowance

[27] With respect to the zone allowance, the Tribunal considered the definition of wages and expenses under s. 1(1)(i) of the 1991 Act that payments will not be regarded as wages for the purposes of the Act if they include "any payment in respect of expenses incurred by the employee in carrying out his employment".

[28] The Tribunal's determination further states:-

> "There can be no doubt that the allowance paid was a separate and distinct payment from that of the salary and had a separate and distinct purpose. Wages are paid in consideration of work carried out. Zone allowances were paid as a form of compensation for working in a particular area and therefore come under the umbrella of s. 1(1)(i) [of the 1991 Act]."

[29] The Tribunal also considered a letter of 29 January 2003 concerning the allowance which indicated that employees would receive "a 5% increase [in their] hourly earnings in the form of a zone allowance (41 cent per hour)". It concluded that this letter must have been amended and that there was no evidence that the 5% increase was ever maintained. The Tribunal was satisfied that the content of the letter did not form part of the contract of employment.

[30] The Tribunal also noted in its determination of 14 May 2014 that the removal of the zone allowance payment was made in good faith by the respondent in an attempt to save money. The Tribunal further highlighted that the respondent company was experiencing severe financial losses and that an examiner had been appointed in May 2013.

[31] It concluded that the case bore striking similarities to the facts of McKenzie v. Minister for Finance [2010] IEHC 461, [2011] E.L.R. 109. It found that the provisions of the 1991 Act had no application to the circumstances of this case. It held that "[the] removal of the allowance amounts to a reduction in the allowance, albeit a 100% reduction, and is not a deduction from the wages payable".

Zone allowance payment – factual background

[32] Prior to April 2012, those appellants who worked at the respondent's stores based in the "Dublin region" (i.e. stores at Swords, Tallaght and Liffey Valley) received a "zone allowance" of €0.41 per hour which was payable to those appellants who were eligible for such an allowance. The respondent introduced this zone allowance payment in January 2003. The zone allowance was conceived as a compensatory payment to those who worked in the Dublin stores, because the cost of living in Dublin was deemed to be higher than other regions of the country. The allowance was clearly calculated to attract candidates for employment and to offer terms of employment whereby they would be paid the allowance in consideration of their working for the employer in a "zone" in which it was recognised additional living expenses would be incurred.

[33] By letter dated 29 January 2003 the respondent informed its employees that the said zone allowance would "be reviewed but not removed or reduced". Nine years later, in January 2012, the respondent announced that the zone allowance would be removed from 1 April 2012 onwards. The affected employees consulted with the Mandate trade union expressing their concerns with the respondent's decision in relation to the removal of the allowance.

[34] At the time of the announcement in relation to the zone allowance payment, the respondent company was in a poor financial situation. These difficulties necessitated cost saving measures which, as argued by the respondent, were required to safeguard the future of the business and to protect jobs. It was accepted by the Tribunal that this factor does not alter the employer's contractual obligations to its employees.

[35] On 31 January 2013 the respondent was forced to petition the High Court for the appointment of an examiner under the provisions of the Companies (Amendment) Act 1990. That application was successful and on 23 May 2013 the High Court approved the scheme of arrangement proposed by the examiner.

[36] Though it engaged in correspondence with the Mandate trade union, the respondent reaffirmed its decision by letter dated 29 February 2012 to remove the zone allowance payment. In this letter the respondent offered an explanation for the decision to remove the said allowance as "there is no longer a valid reason to pay a higher rate of pay in the three Dublin stores".

[37] The respondent offered to "buy-out" the zone allowance. The appellants refused to accept this offer and the proposed "cushion payment" offered by the respondent. The zone allowance payment has not been paid to the appellants since 1 April 2012.

Zone allowance payment – appellants' submissions

[38] The appellants submit that the Tribunal failed to have proper regard to the contents of the letter of 29 January 2003, erred in law in concluding that the allowance did not fall within the meaning of "wages", and failed to engage in any appropriate analysis of the term "expenses" for the purposes of s. 1(1)(i) of the 1991 Act. The appellant submits in this regard that there was no evidence before the Tribunal from which it could be inferred that the zone allowance was an expense under s. 1(1)(i) of the 1991 Act. However, it is not submitted that an expense under the subsection only applies to vouched or vouchable items; rather, it is submitted that in these cases the zone allowance was an intrinsic part of the wages payable to employees contracted to work at the Dublin outlets.

[39] It is also argued that the Tribunal erred in law in holding that the contents of the letter dated 29 January 2003 did not form part of the contractual terms on which the appellants could rely.

[40] The appellants allege that the Tribunal's finding that the appellants' case mirrored that of the decision reached by Edwards J. in McKenzie v. Minister for Finance [2010] IEHC 461, [2011] E.L.R. 109 was a misinterpretation of that case, upon which the finding that the 1991 Act did not apply to the circumstances of the appellants' case was incorrectly based.

Zone allowance payment – respondent's submissions

[41] The respondent submits that the appellants must show that they had a contractual entitlement to be paid the zone allowance.

[42] The respondent states that it is accepted between the parties that the Tribunal's finding that the zone allowance was an "expense" within the meaning of s. 1(1)(i) of the 1991 Act cannot be disturbed unless there was an absence of evidence before the Tribunal upon which such a finding could reasonably be made.

[43] The respondent notes that the grounds of appeal identified in the originating notice of motion do not identify any error of law in the definition of an expense. The respondent submits that this argument is new and that the appellants should not be permitted to advance it in this appeal for the first time. The respondent argues that the appellants seek a fresh determination of fact on evidence adduced before the Tribunal which it was for the Tribunal to assess and is not a proper basis for an appeal on a point of law.

[44] The respondent also notes that the submission that the Tribunal erred in law in its interpretation of the decision of Edwards J. in McKenzie v. Minister for Finance [2010] IEHC 461, [2011] E.L.R. 109 was not relevant to the issues on this appeal because the appellants implicitly accept that if there was evidence before the Tribunal that the zone allowance was a payment in respect of expenses, then it automatically fell outside the scope of the 1991 Act.

The law

[45] The relevant statutory provisions are set out in the 1991 Act and the Payment of Wages (Appeals) Regulations 1991 (S.I. No. 351) (hereinafter "the 1991 Regulations"), and the provisions of O. 84C of the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986.

[46] Section 1 of the 1991 Act provides, inter alia, the definition of wages:-

> "'wages', in relation to an employee, means any sums payable to the employee by the employer in connection with his employment, including—
>
> (a) any fee, bonus or commission, or any holiday, sick or maternity pay, or any other emolument, referable to his employment, whether payable under his contract of employment or otherwise, and
> (b) any sum payable to the employee upon the termination by the employer of his contract of employment without his having given to the employee the appropriate prior notice of the termination, being a sum paid in lieu of the giving of such notice:
>
> Provided however that the following payments shall not be regarded as wages for the purposes of this definition:
> (i) any payment in respect of expenses incurred by the employee in carrying out his employment,
>
> (ii) any payment by way of a pension, allowance or gratuity in connection with the death, or the retirement or resignation from his employment, of the employee or as compensation for loss of office,
>
> (iii) any payment referable to the employee's redundancy,
>
> (iv) any payment to the employee otherwise than in his capacity as an employee,

(v) any payment in kind or benefit in kind."

[47] Section 5 is entitled the "Regulation of certain deductions made and payments received by employers". Subsection (1) of s. 5 is most relevant, and states:-

"An employer shall not make a deduction from the wages of an employee (or receive any payment from an employee) unless—

(a) the deduction (or payment) is required or authorised to be made by virtue of any statute or any instrument made under statute,

(b) the deduction (or payment) is required or authorised to be made by virtue of a term of the employee's contract of employment included in the contract before, and in force at the time of, the deduction or payment, or

(c) in the case of a deduction, the employee has given his prior consent in writing to it."

Subsection (5) of s. 5 provides, inter alia:-

"Nothing in this section applies to-

(d) a deduction made by an employer from the wages of an employee in pursuance of any arrangements—

(i) which are in accordance with a term of a contract made between the employer and the employee to whose inclusion in the contract the employee has given his prior consent in writing, or

(ii) to which the employee has otherwise given his prior consent in writing, and under which the employer deducts and pays to a third person amounts, being amounts in relation to which he has received a notice in writing from that person stating that they are amounts due to him from the employee, if the deduction is made in accordance with the notice and the amount thereof is paid to the third person not later than the date on which it is required by the notice to be so paid …"

[48] Section 5(6) of the 1991 Act provides that:-

"Where-

(a) the total amount of any wages that are paid on any occasion by an employer to an employee is less than the total amount of wages that is properly payable by him to the employee on that occasion (after making any deductions therefrom that fall to be made and are in accordance with this Act), or

(b) none of the wages that are properly payable to an employee by an employer on any occasion (after making any such deductions as aforesaid) are paid to the employee,

then, except in so far as the deficiency or non-payment is attributable to an error of computation, the amount of the deficiency or non-payment shall be treated as a deduction made by the employer from the wages of the employee on the occasion."

[49] This appeal is brought by way of s. 7(4)(b) of the 1991 Act which states that:-

"A party to proceedings before the Tribunal may appeal to the High Court from a determination of the Tribunal on a point of law and the determination of the High Court shall be final and conclusive."

[50] In Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd. v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34 the Supreme Court dealt with the circumstances in which the High Court will overturn a decision of a specialist tribunal such as the Employment Appeals Tribunal. Hamilton C.J. commented, at pp. 37 and 38, that:-

"… I believe it would be desirable to take this opportunity of expressing the view that the courts should be slow to interfere with the decisions of expert administrative tribunals. Where conclusions are based upon an identifiable error of law or an unsustainable finding of fact by a tribunal such conclusions must be corrected. Otherwise it should be recognised that tribunals which have been given statutory tasks to perform and exercise their functions, as is now usually the case, with a high degree of expertise and provide coherent and balanced judgments on the evidence and arguments heard by them it should not be necessary for the courts to review their decisions by way of appeal or judicial review."

[51] As was noted in the appellants' submissions, the High Court, in considering whether to overturn the Tribunal's determination, must first scrutinise whether the Tribunal based its determination upon an identifiable error of law or upon an unsustainable finding of fact. The Supreme Court in National University of Ireland Cork v. Ahern [2005] IESC 40, [2005] 2 I.R. 577 held that although findings of fact must be accepted by the High Court on appeal, that court could still examine the basis upon which those facts were found. The relevance or admissibility of the matters relied on by the Tribunal in determining the facts in the manner that it did may give rise to a matter of law.

The format of the appeal

[52] Regulation 3 of the 1991 Regulations, upon which the respondent relies in respect of the format and grounds of this appeal, states that:-

> "A notice under section 7(2) in relation to an appeal shall contain—> (a) the names, addresses and descriptions of the parties to the proceedings to which the appeal relates,
> (b) the date of the decision to which the appeal relates and the name of the rights commissioner who made the decision, and
> (c) a brief outline of the grounds of the appeal."

Rules of court

[53] Order 84C, r. 2(3) of the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986 as inserted by r. 1 of the Rules of the Superior Courts (Statutory Applications and Appeals) 2007 (S.I. No. 14) states:-

> "Where the relevant enactment provides only for appeal to the High Court on a point of law, the notice of motion shall state concisely the point of law on which the appeal is made."

[54] The correct format of an appeal on a point of law was considered by Hedigan J. in Blackrock College v. Browne [2013] IEHC 607, (Unreported, High Court, Hedigan J., 20 December 2013) in which the Labour Court made a determination which, the appellant argued, was based on an error of law. Section 17(6) of the Protection of Employees (Part-Time Work) Act 2001 provided specifically for an appeal on a point of law. It was held that where the Oireachtas provides for a particular and limited form of statutory appeal, the appellant was obliged to proceed in accordance with those provisions and adhere to the rules prescribed therein.

Decision on the winter/summer bonus

[55] The court is satisfied that the bonus at issue in this case was not declared by the employer at any stage and the Tribunal was not invited to and did not make any finding that a bonus had been declared. There was no announcement that a particular bonus was payable. The bonus scheme clearly operated on a basis that did not require such an announcement. It was payable at the rate of 3% in June 2012 for the period worked between August 2011 and January 2012. The attempt to categorise the bonus payable in respect of the period from August 2011 to January 2012 as a form of declared bonus is therefore misconceived.

[56] There is no doubt that the relevant appellants provided their labour during this period and had an expectation, having done so, that the 3% bonus would be paid. That expectation was based upon the terms of the bonus scheme which provided that an employee was entitled to the payment of the 3% if he/she had the requisite period of service to enable him/her to benefit from the scheme and had worked the relevant accrual period i.e. the six months to which it applied. It was unilaterally withdrawn from them. However, the employer contends that this was in accordance with the terms of the contract of employment and bonus scheme which provides that the bonus "may be reviewed or withdrawn at any time". The employer accepts that its employees' expectations were understandable, if not legally warranted, but submit that whether post or pre the summer or winter period covered in any particular year, it is entitled to withdraw the bonus. In the case of a period of the relevant year not yet worked, the withdrawal of the bonus simply means that the balance of the 3% cannot be earned because it cannot accrue. Therefore, it is not payable. Similarly, it is said that the bonus scheme, once withdrawn, means that it is no longer applicable to the first part of the year which has been worked and in respect of which the 3% bonus would otherwise have accrued: it simply need not and will not be paid. It is submitted that the clear and unambiguous terms of the bonus clause and scheme allow for this result and that the Tribunal was correct in so finding. I respectfully disagree.

[57] I am satisfied that the terms of the contract and bonus scheme must be interpreted in the overall context of the contract. The bonus scheme applied to each eligible employee during the course of his/her employment. To be eligible for the bonus payment employees had to have at least six months' service. The bonus was calculated at the rate of 6% per annum of the gross basic pay of the employee and was payable twice annually. The scheme provided that an eligible employee was to be paid a 3% bonus on the completion of the six month winter or summer period regardless of whether he/she remained in employment for the full year. The bonus was not contingent at that stage upon a satisfactory performance by the employee or upon any other specified conditions. It was not specifically linked to the profitability of the company. The withdrawal of the bonus was announced in January 2012, after the relevant six month period, to take effect from 1 April 2012. The worked six month period bonus was payable in June 2012. The respondent submits that notwithstanding these important elements of the contract and bonus scheme, the employer retained an absolute discretion to withdraw payment at any time.

[58] The financial reality with which the employer was faced led to a review of the bonus scheme. I accept that the employer had a wide discretion under the terms of the contract and scheme to withdraw the scheme which must be exercised reasonably. If the discretion is exercised unreasonably the employer will be in breach of contract if no reasonable employer would have exercised the discretion in that way. This imposes a very high onus on an employee who claims that the discretion was unreasonably exercised (per Hedigan J., in Lichters and Hass v. DEPFA Bank plc [2012] IEHC 10, [2012] E.L.R. 258). Having regard to the fact that the respondent was obliged to seek examinership and that it was clearly in a very difficult financial situation, the decision to withdraw the bonus could not be regarded as unreasonable. The respondent submits that this ground was not advanced to, or considered by, the Tribunal and should not be entertained. I am satisfied that this is so, but even if it had been advanced, it is clear that it could not have succeeded.

[59] If the employer had grounds upon which to exercise its discretion to withdraw the scheme, a further question arises: under the terms of the bonus scheme, was the employer, on a proper construction of the contract and scheme, entitled to withdraw it both prospectively and retrospectively? It seems to me that the employer was entitled to withdraw the bonus scheme prospectively. However, it is claimed that though the contract states it may be withdrawn "at any time" this should not be interpreted literally and applied retrospectively in the circumstances of this case. The phrase must be understood in the context of the other terms of the scheme as operated by the employer as set out above. In that regard, the Tribunal noted that a letter from the employer to each of the appellants on 1 April 2012 sought an acknowledgement of receipt of notice of its intention to discontinue the bonus as of that date, as an amendment to the terms and conditions of employment. The Tribunal's decision is rooted in the finding that the employee's handbook provides a consistent clause common to each contract to the effect that "all bonus schemes are discretionary and are subject to scheme rules. They may be reviewed or withdrawn at any time".

[60] Finnegan v. J & E Davy [2007] IEHC 18, [2007] E.L.R. 234 concerned the deferral of a quantified bonus for a period of two years which involved a change in the terms of employment unilaterally imposed upon the plaintiff by his employer. Smyth J. held that the plaintiff had a legitimate and reasonable expectation that if the firm thrived and his efforts were fruitful he would be awarded a bonus. This was discretionary in respect of each year's trading and dependent upon an annual personal assessment by the employer. Smyth J. was satisfied at p. 240 that:-

> "[The] plaintiff could reasonably expect as a matter of principle built up from a number of years of consistent conduct in the payment of bonuses and the matter of discretion never having been mentioned to him at any stage that some bonus would be payable – the amount only dependent on the trading activities of the firm and his own performance."

The parties did not have the benefit of a written contract. The case was decided on a consideration of the substance and effect of the deferral of the payment of the bonus. The court determined that the unilateral imposition of the deferral constituted a particularly onerous and unusual condition which was not made known to the plaintiff for a period of six years and operated as a restraint of trade (because the bonus would not be paid if the plaintiff took up employment with a rival). This is materially different from the more extensive discretion exercised under the contract in this case, the terms of which are said to be set out in the employee's handbook. In this case the amount of the bonus and the periods for which it would be payable to the appellants were clearly set out in advance and completely unrelated to performance by the employee, however, the bonus scheme could be withdrawn at any time. This case is therefore of little assistance in the interpretation of the terms of this bonus scheme save insofar as it acknowledges that a legitimate expectation of payment of a bonus may arise under a contract where it has been promised and quantified in respect of a defined work period.

[61] The literal interpretation adopted by the Tribunal suggests that if the employees were not content with the terms of the contract and the bonus scheme "they should not have entered into such a contract" and that the discretion retained by the employer to withdraw the scheme was absolute. However, the use of the word "discretionary" is not always determinative of whether a contractual entitlement arises under a bonus scheme.

[62] In Small v. Boots Co. plc [2009] I.R.L.R. 328 a number of warehousemen were in receipt of performance-related bonuses which were not given over a three year period. The employees brought an action for unlawful deduction of wages, claiming a contractual entitlement to the bonuses. Slade J. (delivering the judgment of the United Kingdom Employment Appeals Tribunal) considered the interpretation of the word

"discretionary" in bonus schemes as follows in a way which I regard as helpful and persuasive at p. 332:-

> "18. In my judgment, the extent of an employer's discretion in relation to a bonus scheme is relevant to the determination of the question of whether and, if so, to what extent the scheme has contractual content. The employment judge erred in failing to determine the meaning of the term 'discretionary' in the documentation on which he relied.
> 19. As is illustrated by the observation of Potter LJ in Horkulak [v. Cantor Fitzgerald International [2004] EWCA Civ 1287; [2004] I.R.L.R. 942 at p. 949], the use of the term discretionary in a bonus scheme may be attached to the decision whether to pay a bonus at all, its calculation or its amount. No doubt there are other factors to which discretion may be attached. In determining whether the reference to a discretionary bonus conferred any contractual entitlement, the employment judge should have decided to what aspect of the scheme the term discretionary was attached. In the context of this case, the possible interpretations include discretion attached to the provision of an overarching bonus scheme, to a decision each year to operate a bonus scheme, to the method of calculation of bonus or to the threshold which triggers a bonus or to whether and if so what percentage of salary will be paid."

Slade J. concluded that the employment judge had not engaged with the question of whether the employer's discretion had any contractual content, and if so what it was, and by regarding the use of the word "discretionary" in relation to the bonus scheme as determinative, I consider that the Tribunal in this case made a similar error.

[63] The employees worked the relevant period pursuant to the terms of the contract and scheme, thereby accruing a bonus entitlement under the scheme. I am not satisfied that the terms of the bonus scheme, properly interpreted, allow for the unilateral withholding of a bonus payment in respect of a period worked by the employee during which the workers had a legitimate expectation that the bonus was accruing and would be paid. I am satisfied that the bonus for August 2011 to January 2012 was properly payable in June 2012 notwithstanding the withdrawal of the scheme in January 2012. I am satisfied that in the circumstances of this case the overall discretionary nature of the bonus scheme does not extend to a withholding of the bonus due in respect of that period, in respect of which the bonus was quantified and payable under the scheme subject to compliance with the eligibility provisions. I am satisfied that the contract of employment and bonus scheme must be interpreted reasonably. The discretion to withdraw the bonus scheme at any time, in my view, was always intended to apply in futuro and attached to the conferring of bonuses, as yet unaccrued, under the terms of the scheme. The payment of the bonus crystallised as a contractual obligation once it was "earned" in accordance with the terms of the scheme as operated. I am satisfied that the Tribunal erred in law in interpreting the discretion vested in the employer to withdraw the bonus scheme at any time as being applicable or attaching to this period.

[64] I am therefore satisfied that notwithstanding the employer's difficult financial circumstances in this case, it bore a contractual obligation to pay the 3% bonus accrued to each employee during the relevant six month period and that this was a bonus properly payable as "wages" under s. 5(1) of the 1991 Act.

Decision on zone allowance

[65] Section 1(1)(i) provides that any payment "in respect of expenses incurred by the employee in carrying out his employment" is not to be regarded as "wages" under the 1991 Act. The zone allowance in this case is clearly not a payment in respect of expenditure by an employee in carrying out the duties of his or her employment which is then to be recouped from the employer nor did the employer ever claim that it was. It is claimed by the employer, and was so found by the Tribunal, that the zone allowance was paid separately from the amount paid for basic salary for the purpose of "compensation for working in a particular area" and is properly to be regarded as an expense based upon a wider definition than that of the more familiar "vouched" expense.

[66] In London Borough of Southwark v. O'Brien [1996] I.R.L.R. 420 Mummery J. considered the equivalent provision of English law contained in s. 7(2)(b) of the Wages Act 1986. At issue was the withdrawal of a mileage allowance payable to an employee which, he claimed, was an unlawful deduction of wages under the 1986 Act. The Industrial Tribunal determined that the allowance constituted wages because it provided benefit over and above an expense actually incurred. Mummery J., delivering the judgment of the United Kingdom Employment Appeal Tribunal overturning the decision, stated at p. 422:-

> "22 … when asking, 'Is the payment in respect of expenses incurred by the employee?', it is not necessary for the payer to show that what he has paid is precisely a reimbursement of the sum expended by the worker. 'In respect of' means 'referring to' or 'relating to' or concerning in a general way, whereas the expression used by the chairman in his decision, 'payment of expenses', would appear (wrongly, in our view) to equate the statutory provision with reimbursement of a precise amount."

The United Kingdom Employment Appeals Tribunal concluded that the mileage allowance was an expense under s. 7(2)(b) of the Wages Act 1986. I am satisfied to adopt the same approach to the interpretation of s. 1(1)(i) of the 1991 Act.

[67] There may be cases in which a payment designated by an employer as an expense may be properly regarded as part of the wage payable to an employee. For example in Mears Ltd. v. Salt (Unreported, United Kingdom Employment Appeals Tribunal, 1 June 2012) the United Kingdom Employment Appeals Tribunal held that a travel allowance paid as a daily allowance to employees, irrespective of whether travel expenses had been incurred, constituted wages rather than expenses because in fact no expense was incurred. It was accepted, at para. 15, that at first instance it was open to a decision-maker "as a matter of fact and degree, to conclude that, neither in its original form, for its original purpose, nor in the modern form, could it sensibly be said … to be a payment in respect of expenses". However, on this appeal, it is not open to the court to enter upon a hearing de novo of the facts of the case. I am satisfied that there was a sufficient evidential basis upon which the Tribunal was entitled to make its findings of fact in respect of whether the payment was an expense or not and it has not been established that these findings are unsustainable. The Tribunal heard extensive evidence on the matter. It adopted the correct interpretation of the nature and extent of expenses covered by s. 1(1)(i) of the 1991 Act which is similar to that applied by Mummery J. in London Borough of Southwark v. O'Brien [1996] I.R.L.R. 420. I do not consider that the Tribunal erred in law by so doing. I acknowledge that the nature and extent of the types of payment made to employees vary widely and the decision in this case, on this issue, has very limited value as a precedent: each case will be decided on its own facts. However, disputes of fact which arise in the course of determining whether any particular payment designated by an employer as an expense is in fact part of "wages" payable under the 1991 Act will undoubtedly fall to be considered in the future by the Commissioner and the Tribunal who have the expert knowledge in this area, with which the court will be slow to interfere.

[68] The court has also been referred to McKenzie v. Minister for Finance [2010] IEHC 461, [2011] E.L.R. 109 in which Edwards J. held, inter alia, at paras. 5.3 and 5.4, p. 135, that a cabinet decision to reduce the rates of expense allowances for motor travel and subsistence payable to public servants was taken in the public and urgent national interest, and that in the exceptional circumstances of the banking crisis, the government was entitled to act as it did. I am not satisfied that this decision is relevant to the issue in this case. If the zone allowance was payable as part of the appellants' wages pursuant to contract, the withdrawal of the allowance would clearly be an unlawful deduction under the 1991 Act. If it is an expense it may be withdrawn or reduced in accordance with the terms of the contract dealing with expenses, but is not properly the subject of a claim for relief under the 1991 Act as a deduction from wages.

[69] Edwards J. also indicated in McKenzie v. Minister for Finance [2010] IEHC 461, [2011] E.L.R. 109, obiter dictum, at para 5.8, p. 136, that the reduction of the motor travel allowances and subsistence payments in that case were not a "deduction" from wages for the purposes of the 1991 Act, which had no application to those reductions. I am satisfied that the 1991 Act has no application to issues arising from a reduction of an allowance properly classified as an expense because it is clearly not a deduction from "wages" and I do not consider that conclusion to be in conflict with that part of the judgment.

[70] I am not satisfied that the appellants are entitled to the relief claimed in respect of the zone allowance.

Conclusion

[71] I am satisfied that the Tribunal erred in law in holding that the withholding of the bonus payment for the period August 2011 to January 2012 was lawful and did not constitute a deduction from the wages of the relevant appellants. The bonus is payable to the employees up to the conclusion of that period. I am satisfied that the employer was entitled to terminate the bonus scheme from January 2012 and that it was lawfully withdrawn and was no longer payable from the six month work period commencing in February 2012.

[72] I am satisfied that in the circumstances of this case the Tribunal did not err in law in treating the zone allowance paid to the appellants as an expense under s. 1(1)(i) of the 1991 Act. Its withdrawal was therefore not a deduction from wages under the 1991 Act.

JUDGMENT OF MR JUSTICE T.C. SMYTH

DELIVERED THE 3RD DAY OF OCTOBER 2007

Appearances

For the Appellant:	Mr. Mark Connaughton SC Mr. Oisin Quinn BL
Instructed by:	Fanning & Kelly 2 Hatch Lane Hatch Street Dublin 2
For the Respondent:	Mr. Anthony Kerr BL
Instructed by:	James A. Connolly & Co. 13 St. Andrews Street Dublin 2

MR. JUSTICE T.C. SMYTH DELIVERED HIS JUDGMENT AS FOLLOWS

This appeal comes before the Court pursuant to Section 15(6) of the Protection of Employees (Fixed-Term Work) Act, 2003 ("the 2003 Act"), which provides:

> "A party to proceedings before the Labour Court under this section may appeal to the High Court from a determination of the Labour Court on a point of law and the determination of the High Court shall be final and conclusive.".

The background to the litigation is that on 25th October 2005 a Rights Commissioner heard complaints under the 2003 Act brought by the two Defendants ("the claimants"), both of whom are members of the Technical, Engineering and Electrical Union (T.E.E.U) ("the Union"). The Plaintiff company ("the company") submitted that both claimants had signed a severance agreement which, inter alia, stated as follows:-

"Lump Sum
This is in full and final settlement of any and all outstanding entitlements whether statutory or otherwise, e.g. Notice Pay, Collective Agreement Notice, Holidays, Statutory Redundancy, and any other discretionary payments/allowances. This is subject to the Parting Terms document."

"Acknowledgement
This agreement is based on any/all claims in relation to my employment with Sunday Newspapers Limited and/or Terenure Printers Limited, stated or as yet un-stated, being fully resolved (including, but not limited to all claims under the Unfair Dismissals Acts, the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Acts, the Protection of Employment Acts and the Redundancy Payments Acts and all or any employment legislation). I have read and understand the above agreement and by my signature below acknowledge and accept the terms in full and final settlement."

The Rights Commissioner having considered the submissions of the parties found that the claimants voluntarily, and with the benefit of the representation of their Union, accepted a severance package and signed a waiver that confirmed their acceptance of the terms "in full and final settlement" and accordingly, found against the claimants. That decision was appealed to the Labour Court pursuant to S.15 of the Act of 2003. The appeal was successful and it was determined that the complaints were well founded and that the claimants who had received €20,541.36 and €30,103.03 respectively on the signing in July 2006 "in full and final settlement of all claims and entitlements" were entitled to further monies of €27,752.08 and €40,483.85 respectively.

The decision of the Supreme Court in Bates v- Medel Bakery Ltd [1993]/IIR 359 in the context of an appeal from the Employment Appeals Tribunal under the Redundancy Payments Act, 1967 and of the High Court in Ashford Castle Ltd. V- Services Industrial Professional Technical Union [2006]/ ELR 201 in the context of an appeal from the Labour Court under the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act 2001 point to the desirability of the court expressly confining itself in its enquiries in an appeal on a point of law. These cases and C & D Food Ltd. V- Cunnion [1997] I.I.R, 147 and O'Leary v- Minister for Transport [1998] I.I.R, 558 and Costal Line Container Terminal Ltd. V- Siptu [2000] I.I.R 549 make it clear that it is not open to the High Court in its appelate function in the context of a determination on a point of law to seek to try anew or take into account facts put before the Court (in whatever procedural guise) which were not before the expert tribunal. However, the jurisdiction given to the Court by statute has been interpreted as including an entitlement to review the mixed questions of law and fact and in addition whether there was evidence to support any findings of fact made by the statutory body whose decision was under appeal (see Mara (Inspector of Taxes) v- Hummingbird Ltd [1982] 2 I.L.R.M 421 and Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Ltd v- Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1/1.R.34). In the course of his judgment in Denny's case Hamilton, C.J. said (at p.37/8) as follows:-

> "…the courts should be slow to interfere with the decisions of expert administrative tribunals. Where conclusions are based on an identifiable error of law or an unsustainable finding of fact by a tribunal such conclusions must be corrected.".

More recently Gilligan, J, in Electricity Supply Board v- Minister for Social, Community and Family Affairs (The High Court: Unreported 26th February, 2006) observed:

> "Inferences of fact should not be disturbed unless they are such that no reasonable tribunal could arrive at the inference drawn and further if the court is satisfied that the conclusion arrived at adopts the wrong view of the law, then this conclusion should be set aside."

Much learned argument was put before the Court by counsel for the parties under S. 6 and 12 of the 2003 Act. It is unnecessary to seek to resolve all the differences of interpretation of nice points of statute law. In the instant case there is as an undisputed fact, a written agreement signed by the parties on 13th July 2005. Section 12 of the 2003 Act provides:-

> "Save as expressly provided otherwise in this Act, a provision in an agreement (whether a contract of employment or not and whether made before or after the commencement of the provision concerned of this Act) shall be void insofar as it purports to exclude or limit the application of, or is inconsistent with, any provision of this Act."

The Labour Court noted that this provision is in similar terms in other employment rights statutes (e.g. S.13 of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977, S.11 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 and S.14 of the Protection of Employment (Part-time Work) Act, 2001. In Hurley v- Royal Yacht Club [1997] E.L.R. 225 Judge Buckley in the Circuit Court considered "under what circumstances can claims be legitimately compromised"? In the context of S.13 of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1997, and stated:

> "In several areas of the law the Supreme Court has held that any consent by a person to waive a legal right which that person has, must be an informed consent. This doctrine must surely apply to contracting out provisions and to section 13 in particular.".

> "I am satisfied that the applicant was entitled to be advised of his entitlements under the employment protection legislation and that any agreement or compromise should have listed the various Acts which were applicable, or at least made it clear that this had been taken into account by the employee. I am also satisfied that the applicant should have been advised in writing that he should take appropriate advice as to his rights, which presumably in his case, would have been legal advice. In the absence of such advice I find the agreement to be void."

Mr Kerr, B.L, for the claimants accepted that the important aspect of advice was that it be, as stated by the Circuit Judge "appropriate advice". It is not imperative that it be professional legal advice in writing. In the instant case it is undisputed that at all material times prior to 13th July 2005 an issue existed between the parties as to whether the claimants (fixed term employees or workers) were being treated in a less favourable manner than comparable permanent employees of the company. While the status and skill of the relevant trade union officials representing the claimants differed such was not an issue of moment in the Labour Court determination.

Even if, as determined by the Labour Court, the form of agreement was of a stereotype and even if as determined

> "The claimants were called into the office and presented with the waiver and asked to sign it so as to obtain the payment which they had been offered. As a result of the advice which the claimants had obtained from the Department of Enterprise Trade and Employment, and the subsequent advice from their Union, they believed that they could not contract out of their rights and that any document which they signed would not prevent them from pursuing a claim under the Protection of Employees (Fixed-Term Work) Act, 2003."

altogether from any question of an absence of good faith and straight dealing, if such was the belief of the claimants, there is in point of law the difficulty that the Labour Court in an earlier part of its determination held (referring to the Defendants) "They were advised as to the provisions of the Protection of Employees (Fixed-Term Work) Act, 2003". If the claimants believed as determined by the Labour Court they could not credibly or at all sign "in full and final settlement". If the claimants or either of them signed the Severance Agreement in the form in which they did with the intention of taking further action in the matter - they so deceived the company (Appellant employer), that makes a sham and a mockery of seeking to conclusively resolve an employment dispute. In my judgment the Labour Court erred in law in allowing the claimants to consider as void the Severance Agreement because they mistakenly believed they had been advised that S.12 of the 2003 Act meant that the severance agreements would not preclude them from bringing claims pursuant to the 2003 Act. The section does not preclude severance agreements, settlement agreements or other compromises of claims or potential claims pursuant to employment legislation (Talbot v- The Minister for Labour (The High Court, Barron, J. Unreported 12th December, 1984); PMPA Insurance Company Limited v- Keenan & Others [1985] ILRM 173; Minister for Labour v- O'Connor and Irish Dunlop Ltd. (The High Court, Kenny, J. Unreported 6th March 1973).

It was submitted on behalf of the Claimants that the Court should follow the decision of the Supreme Court in PMPA v- Keenan [1985] ILRM 173, but in my judgment that case is clearly distinguishable from the instant case. In Keenan's case there was no evidence that the Defendant's claim was included in the settlement which covered their claims. In the instant case the very claim made subsequent to the Severance Agreement was in fact made before the Severance Agreement was arrived at and signed and its all claims provision clearly states such to be in the context of severally enumerated Acts and "all or any employment legislation".

I accept the submissions of Mr Connaughton, S.C., on behalf of the company that the decided cases indicate that a party may enter into an agreement in relation to his or her statutory rights and the question of whether or not such rights have been compromised is a matter for the proper construction of the agreement itself. In the instant case the agreement is expressly stated to be in full and final settlement and that means what it says. It says so in express terms referable to enumerated Acts and all or any employment legislation in respect of any and all outstanding entitlements whether statutory or otherwise stated or as yet unstated.

In the instant case there was some meaningful discussion and negotiation (which is not to be equated with interminable talks, documents and meetings) and professional advice of an appropriate character before the agreement was signed. The fact that the written document proffered for signature was prepared by one party for signature by another after discussion and negotiation however one might view such "negotiation" - which is "to confer for the purposes of an arrangement or some matter by mutual agreement or to discuss a matter with a view to a settlement or compromise" per the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary) does not make the agreement void. In my judgment the instant case is clearly distinguishable from that of Fitzgerald v- Pat the Baker [1999] E.L.R 227 cited by Mr Kerr in support of his arguments under S.12 of the 2003 Act.

The submissions referable to S.6 of the 2003 Act may be summarised as follows:-

1. For the claimants

(a) They had been in full time employment with the company from about March 2003. The company acknowledged that the claimants had two years permanent service (in the document setting out the details of the company's severance package). The package made to permanent employees provides for a minimum payment of one year's salary.

(b) The 2003 Act provides that a fixed term employee should not, in respect of his conditions of employment, be treated in a less favourable manner to a comparable permanent employee.

(c) The severance agreement signed in July 2005 was signed under duress and without the benefit of legal advice and the claimants were denied natural justice.

2. For the company

(a) The claimants freely and voluntarily entered into the Severance agreement with appropriate advice after discussion or negotiation of the very issue subsequently raised before the Rights Commissioner, the Labour Court and this Court and no intimation was either conveyed to the Company or contained in the Severance Agreement of reservation of their position or without prejudice acceptance to bringing a further claim. The 'all claims' were clearly referable to the claimants claim made before (now pursued) post signature of the Severance Agreement and no other and the facts are wholly distinguishable from those adverted to by Carroll, J. In the case of PMPA V- Keenan. Mr Oisin Quinn, B.L., in making the final reply for the company correctly drew the Court's attention to the fact that the Labour Court expressed no concluded view on a number of points (including adequacy of consideration) and made no finding as to duress.

(b) The payments made to the claimants did not constitute remuneration within the meaning of the 2003 Act. The payments that were made (including the enhanced amount of €5,000) were made in consideration of both claimants entering into severance agreements. They were made separate from and in complete distinction from the severance packages given to permanent employees. The company took the view that the totality of the loss that would be claimed by either claimant was their earnings until the expiration of their fixed term contracts. In response to the claim being made by reference to the 2003 Act in the discussions or negotiations, it is not ad rem from whom the suggestion of the figure may have come.

(c) If there is a difference in the treatment between the claimants and the permanent employees not due to retire within a year, such is permissible pursuant to S.6 (2) of the 2003 Act. It is clear that before the Labour Court the ground relied upon by the company was not simply that the claimants were fixed term employees (although they were such) but rather that their entitlement to work with the company was due to expire in a period of less than a year from the date of the closure of the plant. It was on that basis that the argument rested that it would be manifestly unreasonable for the claimants to be paid a lump sum for a period in excess of that.

(d) There was no legal basis for the Labour Court concluding that if the claimants made a claim (that in fact was never made because the circumstance never arose) that on the conclusion of the fixed term contract upon which they were engaged it was "satisfied that there is a high probability that whether by operation of Section 9 of the Act or otherwise, the claimants could have become entitled to a contract if indefinite duration".

Determination:

1. In my judgment in law the "Parting Terms" document (being Appendix 1 in the Trade Union Submissions to the Labour Court) is not an acknowledgement that the claimants had two years permanent service. It is the whole or part of a stereotype document which was circulated to persons: The claimants did receive a copy of this document at some time. There is no sustainable credible evidence that those terms were offered to the claimants: What was offered to the claimants was that they would be retained in employment for the balance of their fixed-term contracts. The Parting Terms document contains a separate formula for permanent staff and another for casual staff. Each formula concludes as follows:-

> "In all cases, where the above formula, i.e. 1.1, 1.2 & 1.3 combined, does not amount to one year's gross basic salary only, a minimum all inclusive amount equivalent to one year's gross basic salary only will apply."

[Note the word "only" does not occur in the formula conclusion referable to casual staff].

The conditions attached to the Parting Terms document provided (inter alia) the following:-

"2.5 The combined gross amounts of clauses 1.1, 1.2 & 1.3 may not exceed, in any circumstances, the normal expected gross amount that otherwise may have been earned to age 65.

2.6 The company reserves the right to decide in all circumstances who may avail of parting terms, and at what time, regardless of offers, whether written or oral, being made to any individual.

2.7 The company reserves the right to withdraw or amend the parting terms without notice being given to any party."

As a matter of legal construction clause 2.5 is clearly designed to ensure ("in any circumstances") that a permanent employee who was due to retire in less than a year from the date of the announcement, would not 'earn' more as a result of the closure of the plant and the severance package being offered to permanent employees, than they would have earned had they simply continued to work in the plant until their normal retirement date.

It is this very approach that was taken by the company in its original separate and specific offers made to both claimants, i.e. that they would be offered an equivalent to pay that they would have earned had they continued until the expiry of their fixed term contracts.

In the decision of the Labour Court it is stated (in reference to clause 2.5) "manifestly this clause can have no application". "It is true that the clause is contained in the General Conditions and does not seek to address any specific category of employee it is a clause of general application and in my judgment as a matter of law includes all employees. There is no exclusion of any category of employee and therefore as a matter of law it does apply to the claimants. The provision limits the amount payable. It is not at all manifest to me on a true construction of the conditions that they can have no application to the claimants. The Labour Court was correct in stating "Patently the claimants are not seeking an amount in excess of their potential up to age 65". Sixty five was clearly the age at which permanent staff would cease to work with the company: for those on a fixed-term contract their ceasing to work with the company would occur by effluxion of time irrespective of their age at or before 65. The argument in decision by the Labour Court under S.6 (2) and 7 (1) of the 2003 Act is logical, on a point of law decision it is irrelevant as to whether factually I agree on what is stated. Regretfully on a mixed point of law and fact I am unable to agree with the conclusion drawn from the argument as correct. In my judgment there is "an unsustainable finding of fact" (as identified by Hamilton CJ in Denny's case) as to the requirements of the claimants.

2. In my judgment the claimants as fixed term employees were treated differently but in no less favourable a manner to a comparable employee. It was open to both the claimants and the company to put before the Labour Court such "comparables/comparators" as each wished that Court to consider it was then for that Court to consider and decide in the specific circumstances of the case which was the relevant genuine comparable. The Labour Court determined that -

"The claimants are entitled to the same minimum payments under the Respondent's parting terms as were guaranteed to comparable employees."

As the entitlement found is related to the company's Parting Terms which are referable to comparable employees of the company then the appropriate comparable is such person or persons as were doing the same or like work as permanent employees, in the absence of such person or persons then the appropriate comparable is the person or persons who were doing the same or like work who were not employees of the company.

In the specific circumstances of this case I hold that as a matter of law there is an error in the decision of the Labour Court, not that they considered the prime consideration was the nature of the work, but rather than the person or persons to be first considered as the appropriate comparable was to be first sought amongst the permanent employees failing such person, then only does one look elsewhere.

3. On the question of remuneration it was in my judgment open to the Labour Court as a matter of fact to construe the additional payment of €5,000 as remuneration relying on the judgment in Barber v- Guardian Exchange Assurance [1990] ECR [1889] paragraph 13, as a payment [not as contended for by the Company as enhanced consideration … on the claimants entering into severance agreements…]. By citing and relying on Barber's case the Labour Court accepted that the sum/sums…

> "… which is paid to him upon termination of the employment relationship, which makes it possible to facilitate his adjustment to the new > circumstances resulting from the loss of his employment and which provides him with a source of income during the period in which he is seeking new employment."

Yet, the court notwithstanding having doubts as to whether the claimants would have willingly compromised such rights as they, post signing the Severance Agreements, alleged under the 2003 Act which they did not reserve from the Severance Agreement would do so for €5,000, failed to reach any concluded view on the point.

4. In reaching its decision on the question of the waiver there is no evidence in the decision of the Labour Court that it had examined the course of negotiations between the parties so as to ascertain what was intended, yet concluded they were fully satisfied that the claimants did not enter into a binding and enforceable agreement to settle their claim under the 2003 Act. This is not a supportable position in point of law.

In its submission to the Labour Court the claimant's Union stated:

> "This Union made representations to the company at the highest level and expressed the view that these members in question [the claimants] had the protection of the Protection of Employees (Fixed-Term Work) Act, 2003 and therefore were entitled to a minimum of one years gross salary, as > contained in the Company's document entitled "Parting Terms" (Appendix 1). The company rebuked the Union on each occasion and stated that if we were unhappy with their decision we could take it elsewhere.

> In mid July 2005, each individual was asked to sign a document accepting what the company were offering, the alternative to signing was that they would not receive anything. Under duress, and without the benefit of legal advice, both members individually signed a severance agreement (Appendix 2 is a copy of one). This document, especially the section titled "acknowledgement" literally asks the individual to sign away all their rights under any employment legislation".

The inference drawn from primary facts but not the finding of facts themselves, may be, in point of law, disturbed on appeal. The issue that stalled the conclusion of the discussions was solely referable to their having fixed-term contracts and the rights they contended for under the 2003 Act. I accept as correct Mr. Connaughton's submission that the PMPA v Keenan case is wholly distinguishable and inapplicable to the instant case. The Severance Agreement was in respect of all claims "stated and unstated" if as appears to have been inferentially accepted by the Labour Court the claimants "signed the form with the intention of taking further action in the matter" the conflict between what is signed up to in the Severance Agreement and the details of the claimant's case as set out in the letters of 1st October 2005 (which goes to the credibility of the witnesses and the integrity of reliable fact) was not analysed or determined.

One can have considerable sympathy with the Labour Court who clearly went to very considerable research and trouble in their finding but I am nonetheless unable to accept as sustainable their conclusion for the reasons hereinbefore referred to. Accordingly I uphold the appeal of the company.

[2005 No. 198S]

SENAN HISTON

SHANNON FOYNES PORT COMPANY

DEFENDANT

Judgment of Ms. Justice Finlay Geoghegan delivered the 3rd day of October, 2006.

Present Application

This is an application by the plaintiff for liberty to enter final judgment in the sum of €376,458.57 as a debt due and owing by the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of salary period 22nd September, 2001, to the 16th December, 2004 and interest pursuant to the Courts Act, 1981.

The motion seeking liberty to enter final judgment was issued on the 19th April, 2005 and came on for hearing before MacMenamin J. in the High Court on the 17th February, 2006. It appears that on such application, counsel for the defendant characterised the defence sought to be made as one of contributory negligence and an issue arose as to whether a matter of law contributory negligence was capable of being a defence to the plaintiff's claim in the summary proceedings. MacMenamin J. directed the trial of that question as a preliminary issue. No formal order was drawn pursuant to the directions of MacMenamin J. on the 17th February, 2006. However a motion was then issued seeking a determination of the issues pursuant to the direction of MacMenamin J. which came on for hearing before me and I delivered a judgment on the preliminary issue on the 15th June, 2006. On the preliminary issue I determined:

> "Contributory negligence, as alleged in paragraphs 1 to 16 of the defendant's particulars dated the 26th April, 2006, is not, as a matter of law capable of being a defence to the plaintiff's claim."

A further motion was then issued by the plaintiff on the 22nd June, 2006, seeking directions regarding the further hearing of the plaintiff's motion for liberty to enter final judgment. On consent I made an order re-entering the motion seeking liberty to enter final judgment and on consent of the parties agreed to hear that motion on the 25th July, 2006. A further affidavit was filed on behalf of the defendant in the application for liberty to enter final judgment. The defendant now seeks to have the matter remitted to plenary hearing. It contends on the facts set out in the additional affidavit of Mr. Inverarity that it has a bona fide defence based on the following:

1. That the plaintiff did not work for the defendant during the period for which salary is claimed (22nd September, 2001 to 16th December, 2004), and that the plaintiff is not entitled to receive his salary in circumstances where he did not work.
2. That the plaintiff did not find alternative employment during the period in question and by not doing so failed to mitigate his alleged loss and therefore is not entitled to judgment for the debt alleged to be due and owing.

No objection is made on behalf of the plaintiff seeking to raise the above defences subsequent to the hearing of the motion before MacMenamin J. and the determination of the preliminary issue as directed by him. Rather, it is submitted on the plaintiff's behalf that neither potential defence is such as entitles the defendant to have the matter remitted to plenary hearing.

There is no dispute between the parties as to the principles to be applied by the court in determining whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment or whether the matter should be remitted for plenary hearing. This court must determine that issue in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court in Aer Rianta CPT v. Ryanair Limited [2001] 4 I.R. 607. In that case both McGuinness J. and Hardiman J. gave judgments with which Denham J. concurred. Both McGuinness J. and Hardiman J. approved of the earlier formulation of Murphy J. in First National Commercial Bank plc. v. Anglin [1996] 1 I.R. 75 where he cited with approval the test laid down in Banque de Paris v. de Naray [1984] 1 Lloyds Rep. 21 in the following terms:-

> "The mere assertion in an affidavit of a given situation which was to be the basis of a defence did not of itself provide leave to defend; the court had to look at the whole situation to see whether the defendant had satisfied the court that there was a fair or reasonable probability of the defendant's having a real or bona fide defence."

In the same decision, Hardiman J. considered that the above formulation was similar to a number of earlier formulations on applications for summary judgment. He referred amongst others to Sheppards, Crawford v. Gillmor (1891) L.R. Ir. 238 where Sir Peter O'Brien C.J. said at p. 245:-

> "I think, however, that final judgment should not be given on a motion for final judgment in any case where any serious conflict as to matter of fact or any real difficulty as to matter of law arises."

There are no relevant facts in dispute in this application. The background is more fully set out in the judgment I delivered on the preliminary application on the 15th June, 2006. The plaintiff is the former Harbour Master of the Foynes Port Company. He became the holder of an office in the employment of the defendant following the amalgamation of the former Harbours of Foynes Port Company and Shannon Estuary Port Company pursuant to the Harbours (Amendment) Act 2000. A dispute then ensued between the plaintiff and the Chief Executive of the defendant which culminated in the defendant purporting to dismiss the plaintiff on the 21st September, 2001. The plaintiff then commenced plenary proceedings against the defendant essentially challenging the validity of that purported dismissal and seeking declarations, injunctions and other consequential relief. In the High Court he was substantially unsuccessful and appealed that decision to the Supreme Court. In the Supreme Court, (Unreported, Supreme Court, 17th December, 2004) the appeal was allowed and so much of the judgment and order of the High Court as dismissed part of the plaintiff's claim was set aside and in lieu thereof the Supreme Court made a declaration:

> "That the plaintiff has not been validly removed from office in the employment of the defendant."

The basis of that decision as appears from the judgment of Geoghegan J. at p. 8 was that having regard to the interpretation of s. 39 of the Harbours Act 1996 by the Court, the plaintiff continued to have officer status in the employment of the defendant and could not be dismissed without the sanction of the Minister for Marine. That sanction was not obtained prior to the purported dismissal and accordingly Geoghegan J. stated at p.8:-

"It seems clear, therefore, that he had never been validly removed and is still in office."

On the present hearing before me it was common case that until the date of the purported dismissal on the 21st September, 2001, the plaintiff was paid a salary by the defendant in accordance with the amount claimed. Further it was common case that the defendant recommenced paying the plaintiff the said salary from the date of the Supreme Court judgment, the 17th December, 2004, and that in the subsequent period the plaintiff was not required to turn up for work with the defendant. There is no dispute between the parties that if the plaintiff is entitled to be paid a salary for the period between the 22nd September, 2001 and 16th December, 2004, that the salary due is in the amount claimed. Further, it is not disputed by the defendant that prior to the purported dismissal on the 21st September, 2001, the plaintiff was the holder of an office in the employment of the defendant in respect of which he was entitled to be paid a salary in the amount claimed.

The defendant in its approach to the payment of salary to the plaintiff subsequent to the Supreme Court decision has sought to distinguish the plaintiff's position prior to and subsequent to the judgment of the Court. Notwithstanding, no submission was made on behalf of the defendant, correctly in my view, that the decision of the Supreme Court in any way altered the legal relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant. The judgment and order of the Supreme Court of December, 2004, is simply declaratory of the plaintiff's position. The Supreme Court declared that the plaintiff had not been validly removed from office in the employment of the defendant. Accordingly at all material times between the 21st September, 2004 and the 16th December, 2004 and prior to and subsequent to the said period the plaintiff was in office in the employment of the defendant. Whilst it is relevant to note this position, it does not necessarily determine the present application.

Potential Defences

The first defence sought to be made is that as the claim made by the plaintiff is for a debt due in respect of arrears of unpaid salary, and whilst the defendant accepts that the plaintiff was at all material times the holder of an office to which the salary claimed was attributable, it is contended that the payment of salary connotes a reward for services rendered and that the corollary is that if full services are not rendered, then full payment is not due. Reliance was placed in particular upon the analysis of the House of Lords in Myles v. Wakefield Metropolitan District Council [1987] A.C. 539.

The plaintiff asserts that this potential defence is unstateable in law by reason of s. 5 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 which governs the obligations of the defendant in relation to the payment of salary to the plaintiff. Section 5 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 provides that "an employer shall not make a deduction from the wages of an employee" unless certain conditions set out in s. 5 are fulfilled. Counsel for the defendant did not submit that on the facts herein any of the conditions which would potentially justify a deduction under s. 5 applied. Rather it was submitted that s. 5 of the Act of 1991 did not apply to the present situation as the defendant was not making a deduction from salary but was rather failing to pay 100% of the salary.

The plaintiff is an employee as defined in s. 1 of the Act of 1991. The defendant is an employer as defined in the same section and the salary claimed are wages as defined in the same section. The purpose of s. 5 is to preclude an employer from making deductions from the wages of an employee unless certain specified conditions are met. Section 5(2) is expressly directed to a prohibition against an employer making any deduction from wages in respect of "any act or omission of the employee" unless certain specified conditions are met. As already indicated it is not suggested that any of such conditions were met by the defendant herein. It does not appear to me arguable that a failure to pay to the plaintiff any part of his salary is not a deduction from his salary within the meaning of s. 5 of the Act of 1991. It is a deduction of 100%. Further the 100% deduction is being made in respect of an alleged omission by the employee i.e. the failure to turn up for work. Such a deduction is expressly prohibited by s. 5(2) of the Act of 1991.

Insofar as the defendant sought to rely on the decision in Myles v. Wakefield Metropolitan District Council it appears to me that the reasoning in that case which applies to the common law position is not applicable by reason of the express statutory prohibition in s. 5 of the Act of 1991which applies to the obligations of the defendant to the plaintiff herein.

The second defence sought to be made is that notwithstanding the decision on the preliminary issue, there exists a duty on the plaintiff to mitigate the loss which the plaintiff alleges he suffered in his claim in these proceedings. The plaintiff in response asserts that the obligation on a plaintiff to mitigate his loss does not apply to a claim for a debt due regardless of whether the claim is a debt due pursuant to contract or a payment due under statute. If this is properly a payment due under statute (which is disputed by the defendant) then the plaintiff relies upon the statement in McGregor on Damages, 17th Ed. (2003) at p.216 (para 7-002):-

> "[t]he principal meaning of the term 'mitigation' ... concerns the avoiding of the consequence of a wrong, whether tort or breach of contract, and forms probably the only exact use of the term."

Those authors add at p.7 (para 1-010):-

> "Actions claiming money under statutes, where the claim is made independently of a wrong which is a tort or breach of contract, are not actions for damages. Actions in respect of benefits under the Social Security Acts provide an excellent illustration; further examples are provided in the sphere of employment by claims for unfair dismissal and claims for redundancy payments, both of which are now provided for under the Employment Rights Act, 1996"

The plaintiff also relies upon a further statement in the same edition of McGregor at para 1-005 in relation to the distinction between actions for a debt, such as the present claim and actions for damages:-

> "(1) Actions claiming money payable by the terms of a contract are for money which the defendant has promised by the contract to pay and therefore are not actions for damages. Illustrations are provided by actions for the price of goods sold and delivered, actions for salary or wages for services rendered, actions for rent, actions for freight and actions to recover moneys are payable under insurance policies. In tradition terminology the contrast is between actions of debt and actions for damages. Actions of debt are to be distinguished from actions for damages for breach of a contract and are outside the scope of this textbook."

I accept the distinction made by the plaintiff. It does not appear to me arguable that the principles applicable to a plaintiff's obligation to mitigate his or her loss are relevant to a claim for a debt due pursuant to contract or pursuant to statute. Those principles apply to claims for loss and damage suffered by reason of an alleged wrong (whether in contract or tort).

Accordingly I have concluded that the defendant has not satisfied the court that there is a fair or reasonable probability of the defendant having a real or bona fide defence to the plaintiff's claim herein. Accordingly I have concluded that the plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment as claimed in the summary summons herein.

THE HIGH COURT

[2017/ 81 MCA]

IN THE MATTER OF AN APPEAL PURSUANT TO SECTION 46 OF THE WORKPLACE RELATIONS COMMISSION ACT, 2015

TRINITY LEISURE HOLDINGS LIMITED TRADING AS TRINITY CITY HOTEL

APPELLANT

SOFIA KOLESNIK AND NATALIA ALFIMOVA

RESPONDENTS

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Binchy delivered on the 7th day of October, 2019

1. This is a judgment on an appeal brought by the appellant against a decision of the Labour Court of 17th January 2017. As prescribed by O. 84 (C) of the rules of the Superior Courts, the appeal is brought by way of an originating notice of motion, grounded on an affidavit sworn on behalf of the appellant by a Mr. Ronnie Neville, solicitor, of Mason Hayes and Curran, solicitors for the appellant. Provision for such appeals is made by s. 46 of the Workplace Relations Act 2015, on a point of law only.

2. The respondents advanced identical claims against the appellant alleging various breaches of employment law legislation, only one of which is relevant to this appeal, and that is the claim that the claimants were not paid a premium for working on Sundays. That claim is advanced pursuant to s. 14(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 ("the Act of 1997"). The appellant seeks, inter alia, the following orders: -

(i) An order declaring that the Labour Court erred in law in assuming jurisdiction under s. 14(1) of the Act of 1997, or in applying that section to the respondents in granting them relief pursuant to the same;

(ii) An order allowing the appeal on the ground that the Labour Court erred in law in awarding Sunday premium to the respondents;

(iii) A declaration that the Labour Court erred in law in determining that the appellant had to tender evidence in relation to what element of the respondent's hourly rate of pay was specifically referable to them having to work on Sundays;

(iv) A declaration that the Labour Court erred in law in failing to find the fact of the respondents having to work on Sundays had been taken into account in the determination of their pay.

3. A statement of opposition was delivered on behalf of the respondents in which they fu deny each ground of appeal relied upon by the appellant in its appeal/notice of motion. In summary, the repsondents plead that the decision of the Labour Court involves unappealable findings of fact, and that the appellant has failed to identify any errors of law on the part of the Labour Court in arriving at its decision.

4. The first named respondent originally entered into her contract of employment on 10th September 2007, and the second named respondent entered into her contract of employment on 11th September 2006. The respondents were not initially employed by the appellant and their respective employment contracts transferred to the appellant in September 2013 pursuant to the EC (Protection of Employment on Transfer of Undertakings) Regulations 2003, S.I. 131 of 2003. Their contracts made provision for payment of salary at an hourly rate, which, on the date on which their claims were made, was in each case €9.53 per hour. In each case, the contract having stated the hourly rate of pay, goes on to state: -

"This includes your Sunday premium based on you getting every third Sunday off (i.e. you work two Sundays out of three). Payment will be made weekly with one week in arrears and will be paid directly into your bank account [...]"

5. It was the respondent's contention before both the Labour Court and the Rights Commissioner that where a Sunday premium is included in an employee's rate of pay, then some element of the employees pay must be specifically referable to the obligation to work on Sundays. Since in this case the contract did not identify any element of the claimants' pay as being a premium for working on Sundays, then it follows that the fact of the employees having to work on Sundays has not been taken into account, and the employees are therefore entitled to be compensated in accordance with those provisions of s. 14(1) of the Act of 1997 that apply where the fact of an employee having to work on a Sunday has not been taken into account in the determination of his or her pay.

6. In response to this, it is the appellants' case that the determination of the employee's pay does take account of the fact that they are required to work on Sundays, because this is expressly stated to be so in the contracts, and there is no requirement that the contract should identify how much of the hourly rate of pay is specifically referable to Sunday work.

7. The Labour Court held against the appellant, in each case in identical terms, on the grounds that: -

"[...] the respondent failed to tender any evidence to the court in relation to what, if any, element of the complainant's hourly rate of pay was specifically referable to her contractual obligation to work on Sundays. It follows that the respondent's cross appeal in this regard fails. At first instance, the adjudication officer directed the respondent to pay the complainant 'a premium of 30% of the basic rate for all hours worked on Sundays falling within the period 25th September 2013 to 24th March 2014'. The court affirms that decision".

8. Section 14(1) of the Act of 1997 provides as follows: -

"14. — (1) An employee who is required to work on a Sunday (and the fact of his or her having to work on that day has not otherwise been taken account of in the determination of his or her pay) shall be compensated by his or her employer for being required so to work by the following means, namely—

(a) by the payment to the employee of an allowance of such an amount as is reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, or

(b) by otherwise increasing the employee's rate of pay by such an amount as is reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, or

(c) by granting the employee such paid time off from work as is reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, or

(d) by a combination of two or more of the means referred to in the preceding paragraphs."

9. In the event of a claim being advanced by an employee to a rights commissioner (now , since the Workplace Relations Act, 2015 , an adjudication officer) or the Labour Court, pursuant to the Act of 1997, subsections 14(3) – (6) provide a mechanism for determining reasonable compensation to employees in respect of Sunday work, by reference to collective agreements for comparable employees.

10. On this appeal, it is the respondents' case that the decision of the Labour Court is to the effect (although it is not actually stated in the decision) that the fact of the employees having to work on Sundays has not been taken into account in the determination of their pay. As is apparent from the extract from the decision of the Labour Court quoted above, the precise conclusion that that it arrived at, and the reason that it affirmed the decision of the Adjudication Officer, was that it found that the appellant had not tendered any evidence as to what, if any, element of the respondents' pay related to their obligation to work on Sundays. It is the respondents' case that this is a decision on a matter of fact, and not on a matter of law, and is not therefore amenable to appeal. This, it is submitted, is well established by a long line of authorities (to which I refer below). Furthermore, it is argued that if a Sunday premium is included in an employee's rate of pay, then some element of that rate of pay must be specifically referable to the obligation to work on Sundays, and it was a matter for the appellant to give evidence in this regard, and it failed to do so. It is submitted on behalf of the respondents that for this reason the Labour Court was correct to reject the appellant's appeal. The Labour Court made its decision based upon the evidence before it and it is unclear how it can be argued that it made an error of law in doing so. The respondents suggest that these proceedings are being used as yet another appeal on the same points, rather than on a meritorious point of law.

11. It is submitted that the Labour Court properly applied the express terms of the contract and, in accordance with the parole evidence rule, found that the appellant had failed to tender evidence in relation to what, if any, element of the hourly rate of pay was specifically referable to the contractual obligation to work on Sundays. Since the written contracts set out the hourly rate of pay without any ambiguity, they are not amenable to variation by parole evidence, even had such evidence been presented, which it was not. Specifically, the respondents argue that since the employment contracts make no reference to the minimum wage, this Court should not have any regard to whatever the minimum wage may have been at any point in time in considering whether or not the employment contracts of the respondents take into account the requirement to work on Sundays. This point is made in response to arguments made on behalf of the appellant both at the hearing of this appeal and before the Labour Court.

12. It is submitted on behalf of the appellant that the decision of the Labour Court is based on three clearly identifiable errors of law as follows: -

(1) The Labour Court incorrectly assumed jurisdiction to consider the respondents' claim to Sunday premium in circumstances where the employment contracts state that the requirement to work on Sundays had been taken into account in the determination of the respondents' pay.

(2) The Labour Court failed to give any consideration as to whether or not it had any jurisdiction to examine a claim for Sunday premium in circumstances where the first limb of s.14(1) of the Act of 1997 has been complied with i.e., where the contract states that the requirement to work on Sundays has been taken into account. Instead, the Labour Court proceeded directly to consider the claim of the respondents.

(3) Thirdly, if the Labour Court was entitled to find that the respondents were entitled to an additional Sunday premium (which is denied), it failed to consider afresh the appropriate premium to be awarded to the respondents, but rather simply endorsed the amounts awarded by the adjudication officer, without due consideration, including inviting submissions from the appellant, and having regard to the wording of s.14(2) of the Act of 1997.

13. Both parties made comprehensive submissions on the jurisdiction of this Court in appeals from the Labour Court. Both parties referred to the same passage from the decision of Hamilton C.J. in the case of Henry Denny & Sons (Ireland) Limited v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 IR 34, where he stated, at pp. 37-38: -

> "That the Court should be slow to interfere with the decisions of expert administrative tribunals. Where conclusions are based upon an identifiable error of law or an unsustainable finding of fact by a tribunal such conclusions must be corrected.

Otherwise it should be recognised that tribunals which have been given statutory tasks to perform and exercise their functions, as is now usually the case, with a high degree of expertise and provide coherent and balanced judgments on the evidence and arguments heard by them, it should not be necessary for the courts to review their decisions by way of appeal or judicial review."

14. Both parties also referred to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Mara (Inspector of Taxes) v. Hummingbird Limited [1982] ILRM 421, in which case Kenny J., in considering the approach to be taken where mixed questions of fact and law arise held: -

"If they are based on the interpretation of documents, the courts should reverse them if they are incorrect for it is in as good a position to determine the meaning of documents as is the Commissioner. If the conclusions drawn from the primary facts are ones which no reasonable Commissioner could draw, the court should set aside his findings on the ground that he must be assumed to have misdirected himself as to the law or made a mistake in reasoning. Finally, if his conclusions show that he had adopted a wrong view of the law, they should be set aside."

15. Both parties also referred to and relied upon the decision of Baker J. in Health Services Executive v. Sallam [2014] IEHC 298, a case which also considered an appeal from the determination of the Labour Court. In that case, Baker J. stated: -

"The power of the High Court in an appeal from a determination of the Labour Court was explained by McCracken J. in the Supreme Court in National University of Ireland Cork v. Ahern & Ors. [2005] IESC 40, [2005] 2 IR 577, where he stated as follows: - at para. 9: -

'The respondents submit that the matters determined by the Labour Court were largely questions of fact and that matters of fact as found by the Labour Court must be accepted by the High Court in any appeal from its findings. As a statement of principle, this is certainly correct. However, this is not to say that the High Court or this Court cannot examine the basis upon which the labour court found certain facts. The relevance, or indeed admissibility, of the matters relied upon by the Labour Court in determining the facts is a question of law. In particular, the question of whether certain matters ought or ought not to have been considered or taken into account by it in determining the facts.'

This Court, then, may on appeal consider whether the Labour Court wrongly took into account or ignored a fact or piece of evidence, incorrectly applied a legal test in coming to a conclusion, or erred in law in its interpretation of the law."

16. Counsel for the respondents in this case argue that cases such as Health Services Executive v. Sallam and National University of Ireland Cork v. Ahearn make it clear that in considering appeals from the Labour Court, this Court is obliged to afford the decision of the Labour Court a curial deference. In this regard the respondents also rely upon the decision of Gilligan J. in Electricity Supply Board v. The Minister for Social Community and Family Affairs [2016] IEHC 59 in which he stated in his conclusion: -

"I take the view that the approach of this Court to an appeal on a point of law is that findings of primary fact are not to be set aside by this Court unless there is no evidence whatsoever to support them. Inferences of fact should not be disturbed unless they are such that no reasonable tribunal could arrive at the inference drawn and further if the court is satisfied that the conclusion arrived at adopts a wrong view of the law, then this conclusion should be set aside. I take the view that this Court has to be mindful that its own view of the particular decision arrived at is irrelevant. The Court is not retrying the issue but merely considering the primary findings of fact and as to whether there was a basis for such findings and as to whether it was open to the appeals officer to arrive at the inferences drawn and adopting a reasonable and coherent view, to arrive at her ultimate decision."

17. The respondents submit that no error of law on the part of the Labour Court has been identified by the appellant. The employment contracts are clear and give rise to no ambiguity. They provide for an hourly rate of pay to the claimants. While that hourly rate of pay is stated to take account of the fact that the claimants are required to work on Sundays the contracts do not explain how this is so, and nor did the claimant present any evidence before the Labour Court to explain how the rate of pay takes into account the requirement of the claimants to work on Sundays. Moreover, the Labour Court would not have been entitled to hear such evidence, had it been tendered, if the effect of such evidence would be to vary the unambiguous contractual terms as set out in the written contracts of employment.

18. Counsel for the appellant also relies on the decision of Earagail Eisc Teoranta v. Doherty & Ors. [2015] IEHC 347, a case in which the appellant employer submitted that the Employment Appeals Tribunal had erroneously interpreted s. 5(1) of the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 (the "Act of 1991") and had incorrectly proceeded on the basis that the provisions at subs. (a)-(c) of that section were to be taken conjunctively. The court was satisfied that this argument concerned a point of law and concluded that there was a manifest error in the tribunals' interpretation of s. 5 of the 1991 Act. Kearns P. held at p. 26: -

"I have carefully considered the submissions of both sides and am satisfied that there is a manifest error of law in the tribunals' interpretation of s. 5 of the 1991 Act. The determination of the tribunal clearly indicates the tribunals' view that, pursuant to s. 5(1)(c) of the 1991 Act, the written consent of the employees was required before the appellant company could bring about any changes to salary levels. However, these exceptions listed at (a),(b) and (c) of s. 5(1) are clearly not to be taken conjunctively. The word "or" is expressly used in the provision and it is clear that each subsection concerns separate instances which might give rise to an exception to the rule that an employer shall not make a deduction from the wages of an employee. Sub-section (b) states that deductions are allowable where they are authorised by virtue of an employees' contract of employment, which is something the tribunal should have considered independently of sub-section (c). However, in treating ss. (a) – (c) as conjunctive, the tribunal erred in law."

19. Counsel for the appellant also referred me to a number of decisions of the Labour Court itself in which it considered claims advanced under s. 14 of the Act of 1997. In the case of Group 4 Securitas v. SIPTU [DWT 996] the Labour Court held that s. 14 of the Act of 1997 did not allow for a claim of enhancement of the premium paid to employees in the security industry in respect of Sunday working, the premium for which was IR£5, and had been set some thirteen years previously. The Labour Court in its decision stated: -

"Section 14(1) Of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997, clearly states that where an employee's pay has not taken account of the requirement to work on Sunday, he/she shall be compensated. In this case the employee is paid an allowance for working on Sunday and, therefore, does not have a case under the Act. The court does not consider that section 14, under which this claim has been brought, allows for a claim for enhancement of the rate."

20. In the case of Duesbury Limited, T/A Old Ground Hotel v. Mary Frost [DWT 1032], the claimant gave evidence that she had become employed by the respondent in that case in 1996, when it took over ownership of the hotel. She claimed that while employed by the previous owner, she was paid double time in respect of working on Sunday, but this was discontinued by the respondent when it took over the hotel. She claimed that the obligation to work on Sunday was not taken into account in her personal rate of pay.

21. The witness for the respondent gave evidence as to her belief that the claimant's rate of pay included consideration for working on Sundays, but she was not employed by the respondent when the claimant's rate of pay was fixed and had no involvement in fixing the same. Crucially, the evidence given on behalf of the respondent was unsupported by any documentary records or other corroborative evidence of any kind. In those circumstances, the Labour Court stated that it could not accept the evidence of the respondent as going far enough to rebut the direct evidence of the claimant. The court also stated in its decision that: -

> "It is clear from subsection (1)(b) of this section [i.e. s.14(1) of the Act of 1997] that the right to compensation for Sunday working can be satisfied where the requirement is taken into account in determining the employee's rate of pay. This suggests that some element of the employee's pay must be specifically referable to the obligation to work on Sundays."

22. The case of Duesbury was referred to in the decision of the Labour Court in this case, arising out of the fact that before the Labour Court , counsel for the appellant had referred to that decision for the purpose of distinguishing the facts in Duesbury from the facts in this case. The Labour Court thought that the appellant was relying on Duesbury in support of its arguments in this case, whereas on this appeal it was submitted that counsel for the appellant was referring to Duesbury to the intent of distinguishing the facts in that case from the facts in this case. In its decision the Labour Court stated: -

> "However, notwithstanding the respondent's purported reliance on the determination in Duesbury, the respondent failed to tender any evidence to the Court in relation to what, if any, element of the Complainant's hourly rate of pay was specifically referable to her contractual obligation to work on Sundays."

This gave rise to an additional ground of appeal on the part of the appellant in this appeal.

23. In the case of Matthew Scally and Aoife Lynch and Michelle Kelly, [DWT 13102] the Labour Court found in favour of the claimants in circumstances where the respondent was unable to say how the rate of pay of the claimants was computed. Moreover, the hourly rate paid to the claimants was directly in line with that prescribed by the then applicable employment regulation order, which rate was exclusive of Sunday premium. For this reason, the court was satisfied that the rate paid to the claimants did not contain any element of compensation for the purposes of s. 14 of the Act of 1997.

24. Finally, I was referred to the case of Paul Fitzpatrick, t/a The Morgan Hotel and Jarmila Riecka [DWT 1523] which is probably the most relevant of these cases because the claimant's contract of employment expressly provided that her salary took account of the obligation to work on Sundays. Unfortunately, the precise wording of the contract of employment of the claimant in that case is not recorded in the decision of the Labour Court. However, the court held: -

> "On its plain and ordinary meaning, paras (a)-(d) of this subsection take effect only where the fact of the employee being required to work on Sunday is not otherwise taken into account in determining his or her pay. The court has reviewed the claimant's written contract of employment and it is satisfied that the fact of her having to work on Sundays was taken into account in determining her salary. It follows that the respondent did not contravene s. 14 of the Act in relation to the claimant."

Discussion and Decision

25. It is not in dispute that the claimants were required to work two out of three Sundays. The Labour Court found as a fact that this requirement had not been taken into account in the determination of the claimants' pay. The Labour Court arrived at this finding of fact on the basis that the appellant did not adduce any evidence at the hearing before the Labour Court to satisfy the Labour Court that the respondents' pay took into account their obligation to work on Sundays.

26. While submissions appear to have been made to the Labour Court to the effect that the minimum wage was at all relevant times less than the hourly rate paid to the respondents, and that this was how the pay of the respondents took into account their contractual obligation to work on Sundays, no oral evidence was given to the Labour Court to this effect, and nor is this stated in the contracts of employment of the respondents. There was therefore no evidence of any kind presented to the labour Court relating to this issue, to the intent of proving that the excess of the rate of pay over the minimum wage was the means by which the rate of pay took account of the obligation to work on Sundays.

27. However, it is not correct to say that there was no evidence at all before the Labour Court as regards the question as to whether or not the rate of pay of the respondents takes account of the requirement to work on Sundays. The Labour Court had before it written evidence, in the form of the contracts of employment of the respondents. The language used in the contracts is plain English and could not be more clear. The contracts state that the hourly rate of pay "includes your Sunday premium based on you getting every third Sunday off". The wording is not buried in small print somewhere in the middle of the contract, but appears on the front page thereof, in the third clause of the contract.

28. Section 14(1) of the Act of 1997 imposes an obligation on employers to pay a reasonable remuneration to employees in respect of Sunday work by reference to stated criteria set out in ss.14(1)(a)-(d), unless the requirement to work on Sundays is otherwise taken into account in the rate of pay of the employee. Here , in stating that the hourly rate of pay "includes your Sunday Premium" the contracts make it clear that the requirement to work on Sundays is included in the rate of pay of the respondents,or, in the words of the Act of 1997, is "taken into account in the rate of pay of the employee", and in executing the contracts, the respondents accept that to be the case.

29. Neither of the decisions of the adjudication officer or the Labour Court record any evidence having been given either by the appellant or the respondents in either forum on this question, although it is clear that submissions on the question were made. However, it hardly needs to be said that submissions are not evidence. The only evidence presented to either forum on the question was the contract of employment in each case, which contained a clear and unambiguous statement,i.e., that the rate of pay included the Sunday Premium, based upon the repondents having every third Sunday off.

30. It is the respondents' contention that the court ought to take account of the vulnerable position that employees such as the respondents are in when presented by an employer with such contracts, and that it is the duty of the employer to ensure that the contract clearly identifies the portion of the hourly rate of pay that relates to Sunday work. Having failed to so provide in the contract, or to give any evidence on the issue, the appellant, it is submitted, has failed to establish that the rate of pay of the respondents takes account of the requirement to work on a Sunday for the purposes of s.14(1) of the Act of 1997.

31. The difficulty with this line of argument is that it ignores not just the clear and unambiguous language of the contracts of employment, but also the fact that the respondents do not appear to have given any evidence on the question. If they did, it is not recorded either in the decision of the adjudication officer or the Labour Court, and nor were any submissions made to me as regards the evidence that they gave on the question.

32. While a statement in a contract that the rate of pay takes account of the requirement to work on Sundays may not always be conclusive , if an employee wishes to assert that the rate of pay does not do so then in my opinion he or she must advance some credible evidence to rebut the express provision of the employment contract, or at least so as to shift the onus of proof in the matter to the employer,although he or she will still have to overcome the parole evidence rule. However, it may be possible to do so. For example it might be that events have overtaken the contract, and that surrounding circumstances no longer reflect that which was originally agreed. For example, if the rate of pay provided for in the contract ,was at the time the contract was completed, greater than the statutory minimum wage, but is no longer so at the time the complaint is advanced , it is difficult to see how that rate of pay could still be said to reflect the requirement to work on a Sunday, since that is the minimum rate of pay which the employer must in any event pay. Whatever the reason, faced with written evidence of his or her own agreement that his/her hourly rate of pay takes into account an obligation to work on Sundays, an employee advancing a claim under s. 14(1) of the Act of 1997 must lead some evidence to explain why he/she claims that what is stated in the contract is not correct. In failing to do so, the employee leaves the contract unchallenged, and the employer is under no obligation to go into evidence on the issue

33. Upon receiving a complaint from an employee that his or her rate of pay does not take account of the requirement of Sunday work, it is obvious that the Labour Court must undertake an investigation as to whether or not this is so. Its conclusion on the issue constitutes a finding of fact, which, in the ordinary course, in accordance with the authorities referred to above, will not be disturbed by this Court. In this case however that finding of fact was arrived at by the Labour Court on the basis that the appellant "failed to tender any evidence to the court in relation to what, if any, element of the complainants' hourly rate of pay was specifically referable to [their] contractual obligation to work on Sundays". In the circumstances of the case, this was a conclusion on a matter of law, because in so deciding the Labour Court decided that a clear statement made in a contract of employment signed by both parties may not be relied upon ,and instead must be proven in a particular way. In drawing this conclusion the Labour Court in my view made an error of law.It did so firstly by ignoring the express statement in the contracts of employment of the respondents, that their hourly rate of pay includes their Sunday premium. Secondly it did so by interpreting the Act of 1997 in such a manner as to impose an obligation on an employer either to ensure that a contract of employment is drawn up in a particular way i.e., to explain by way of a breakdown any statement to the effect that an hourly rate takes into account the obligation to work on a Sunday, or, alternatively, to adduce oral testimony at the hearing of a complaint pursuant to s. 14 of the Act of 1997 in order to prove a statement agreed expressly to by an employee in his/her contract of employment.

34. Finally, I should address one other argument advanced on behalf of the respondents. It was argued that, pursuant to s. 3(1)(g) of the Terms of Employment (Information) Act, 1994 (the "Act of 1994"), there is an obligation on the employer to show the method of calculation of the employees' remuneration, and that it cannot be said that the appellant has done so in this case. The failure to comply with the provisions of the Act of 1994 is of course a separate complaint, and one which the respondents made in this case also, together with other complaints under the Act of 1994. The Labour Court determined those complaints in favour of the respondents, but considered that the breaches of the 1994 Act were technical and did not cause the respondent any detriment. However, the decision of the court does not record any specific breach of s. 3(g) of the Act of 1994. In the context of this appeal however, the respondents point to s. 3(1)(g) of the Act of 1994 to bolster their argument that there is an obligation on an employer to identify the element of the rate of pay of the respondents that is specifically referable to the contractual obligation to work on Sundays. However, this argument must also be rejected because it is clear that in providing simply that the respondents are to be paid a specific rate per hour worked, the appellant has met its statutory obligation to the respondents under s. 3(1)(g) of the Act of 1994.

35. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed, and the claim of the respondents under s. 14(1) of the Act of 1997 dismissed.

THE HIGH COURT

[2009 No. 8510 P ~~85HP~~]

MARIE CUNNINGHAM

PLAINTIFF

INTEL IRELAND LIMITED

Judgment of Mr. Justice Hedigan delivered on 15th day of May, 2013.

1. The defendant has issued this motion seeking to strike out the plaintiff's personal injury summons dated the 22nd September, 2009 as an abuse of process and/or a duplication of the plaintiff's equality claim against the defendant and/or for want of prosecution. The defendant relies upon s. 101(2)(a) of the Employment Equality Act 1998 – 2008 and upon the rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100, both of which are designed to prevent the duplication of proceedings.

2. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a senior manager. Having returned to work on the 11th August, 2008 following maternity leave, the plaintiff on the 3rd December, 2008 instituted a claim for discrimination against the defendant in relation to access to employment, promotion/regrading, conditions of employment and harassment.

3. The plaintiff's equality claim was heard in July and September 2011 but was rejected by the Equality Tribunal in a decision dated the 22nd February, 2012. The plaintiff appealed that decision to the Labour Court and the appeal is ongoing.

4. The plaintiff was a Grade 9 GER Workforce Mobility Manager. She was on a combination of maternity leave and sick leave from late June 2007 to the 11th August, 2008. The plaintiff's equality complaint as set out in her Form EE1 dated 3rd December, 2008 was that she had been discriminated against on the grounds of gender. The plaintiff's primary allegation was that the defendant failed to allow her to return to her original job following her maternity leave and/or failed to provide her with a job to match her grade level.

5. In her "brief outline of complaints" attached to Form EE1, the plaintiff claimed that the alleged discrimination significantly affected her "health and wellbeing". Her personal injury claim herein appears to relate to the same alleged damage to the plaintiff's "health and wellbeing".

6. The defendant claims that the same events caused the alleged personal injury claimed in the personal injury summons herein and objects to being required to meet the same claim in High Court proceedings and in the statutory proceedings. They claim that according to submissions filed in her claim to the Employment Equality Tribunal, the plaintiff alleged that she was discriminated against on grounds of her gender on the following basis:

(a) refusal of Intel to permit her to return to her position;

(b) the retention of her leave replacement in her position after her return from maternity leave;

(c) the failure of Intel to keep her informed of all changes within Intel during her maternity leave;

(d) the failure or refusal to deal with her complaints after her return;

(e) the failure of Intel to conform to the provisions of its own maternity leave policy.

In submissions dated 31st July, 2009 filed with the Equality Tribunal, the plaintiff claimed that the defendant caused her considerable health difficulties including stress, anxiety, depression and panic attacks. The submissions complained that from the time she announced she was pregnant, she was micro-managed. She claimed that she was treated aggressively, causing her considerable upset. The submissions and her oral evidence to the Equality Tribunal dealt with the entire period referred to in the personal injury summons. There appears to be no part of the claim in the personal injury summons that was not made to the Equality Tribunal.

7.Decision

Section 101 of the Employment Equality Act 1998 – 2008 at (2)(a) provides;

> "Where an individual has referred a case to the Director under section 77(1) and either a settlement has been reached by mediation or the Director has begun an investigation under section 79, the individual –
> (a) shall not be entitled to recover damages at common law in respect of the case, and . . .."

The rule in Henderson v. Henderson has been described by Lord Bingham in Johnson v. Gore Wood & Co. [2002] 2 AC 1;

> "Henderson v. Henderson abuse of process, as now understood, although separate and distinct from cause of action estoppel and issue estoppel, has much in common with them. The underlying public interest is the same: that there should be finality in litigation and that a party should not be twice vexed in the same matter. This public interest is reinforced by the current emphasis on efficiency and economy in the conduct of litigation, in the interests of the parties and the public as a whole. The bringing of a claim or the raising of a defence in later proceedings may, without more, amount to abuse if the court > is satisfied (the onus being on the party alleging abuse) that the claim or defence should have been raised in the earlier proceedings if it was to be raised at all. I would not accept that it is necessary, before abuse may be found, to identify any additional element such as a collateral attack on a previous decision or some dishonesty, but where those elements are present the later proceedings will be much more obviously abusive, and there will rarely be a finding of abuse unless the later proceeding involves what the court regards as unjust harassment of a party. It is, however, wrong to hold that because a matter could have been raised in earlier proceedings it should have been, so as to render the raising of it in later proceedings necessarily abusive. That is to adopt too dogmatic an approach to what should in my opinion be a broad, merits-based judgment which takes account of the public and private interests involved and also takes account of all the facts of the case, focusing attention on the crucial question whether, in all the circumstances, a party is misusing or abusing the process of the court by seeking to raise before it the issue which could have been raised before. As one cannot comprehensively list all possible forms of abuse, so one cannot formulate any hard and fast rule to determine whether, on given facts, abuse is to be found or not."

Further, in Woodhouse v. Consignia Plc [2002] 1 WLR 2558, Brooke L.J. referred to the public interest in the efficient conduct of litigation and stated (at p. 2575):

> "But at least as important is the general need, in the interests of justice, to protect the respondents to successive applications in such circumstances from oppression. The rationale for the rule in Henderson v Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100 that, in the absence of special circumstances, parties should bring their whole case before the court so that all aspects of it may be decided (subject to appeal) once and for all, is a rule of public policy based on the desirability, in the general interest as well as that of the parties themselves, that litigation should not drag on for ever, and that a defendant should not be oppressed by successive suits when one would do."

8. Thus all matters and issues arising from the same set of facts or circumstances must be litigated in the one set of proceedings save for special circumstances. This is a rule that is of benefit to both plaintiffs and defendants, to the courts themselves and thus to the public interest. Is this the case with the proceedings referred to herein ? Initially, Ms. Cunningham raised her complaints in her application to the Employment Equality Tribunal. Her complaint Form EE1 dated the 3rd December, 2008 states that the first act of discrimination of which she complains was on the 11th August, 2008. At page 1 of the form the grounds on which discrimination is claimed are specified as gender discrimination. On page 2 under description of claim, she included conditions of employment, other and harassment. In paragraph 2 of her submissions to the Equality Tribunal dated 31st July, 2009, she dates her complaints from when she announced she was expecting a baby. From that time, she stated, that her work was micro-managed, she was, she claims, harassed by her then manager. In the conclusions of these submissions, the plaintiff states again that she was bullied and harassed from March 2007 on. She sums up the effects of all her complaints as distress and humiliation, causing her considerable health difficulties, including stress, anxiety, depression and panic attacks. She stated she was then undergoing hypnotic and anti-depressant medication and psychotherapy.

9. When the particulars of bullying, harassment and psychological abuse set out in her personal injury summons are examined at paragraphs 7 – 15, it is clear that the claims set out there start with the announcement of her pregnancy and concerns the same conduct described in Form EE1 and submissions supporting the same. In the particulars of negligence at u, v and w, the claim in this personal injury summons goes on to deal with her post-return to work period, i.e. August 2008.

10. Thus, it is clear from her own pleadings and submissions in the two sets of proceedings that both her employment claim and her personal injury claim arise out of the same matters, i.e. alleged mistreatment in her working environment. This she alleges commenced on the announcement of her pregnancy, continued through her commencement of maternity leave, through that leave and culminated in her disatisfaction with the way she was treated on her return to work. The plaintiff in issuing these personal injury proceedings after her employment equality complaints, in my view, drew an artificial distinction which does not stand up to analysis.

11. In terms of the reliefs sought, the claim in the personal injury proceedings is for compensation for the stress and the health problems arising therefrom. It is clear that such a remedy may be awarded by the Labour Court in the employment equality proceedings. See Ntoko v. City Bank [2004] ELR 116. In doing this, the Labour Court may chose to consider a complainant's medical reports in assessing the compensation to be awarded. See McGinn v. Daughters of Charity EDA9/2003.

12. Thus the plaintiff is not precluded from recovering compensation in the Labour Court in respect of the personal injury she alleges she has suffered. Moreover, the defendant herein has stated unequivocally in open court in this application that they will not oppose the plaintiff bringing into her claim before the Labour Court her complaints dating from her announcement of her pregnancy.

13. When she chose to create this artificial distinction in the one essential complaint to pre and post-August 2008 by issuing these personal injury proceedings, the plaintiff, in my view, breached the provisions of s. 101(2)(a) of the Employment Equality Act 1998 – 2008 and breached the rule in Henderson v. Henderson. By confining her complaints in one set of proceedings these statutory and common law requirements do not in any way limit the plaintiff's right to a remedy for those complaints. The Labour Court had and still has at its disposal ample jurisdiction to do so. In particular, as a lay litigant, the plaintiff is far better off having all of her complaints dealt with in the one set of proceedings. Thus the application of the defendant to dismiss these proceedings must be allowed.

14. I would note finally that the practice here readily admitted of issuing proceedings and then leaving them lie for years until other proceedings are concluded is inconsistent with contemporary jurisprudence concerning the obligation of the courts to ensure the expeditious conduct of proceedings.

Injunction – Interlocutory – Employee – Suspension – Prejudice – Whether damages adequate remedy – Where balance of convenience lies.

The plaintiff was employed as a senior lecturer in the English Department of the first defendant. On the 7th October, 2002, he was suspended with pay with immediate effect on foot of a complaint made by a female colleague who alleged physical intimidation and harassment. The plaintiff applied, inter alia, for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from removing him from office and restraining them from embarking on a disciplinary inquiry.

The plaintiff contended that (a) there was a failure to comply with natural justice in that he did not have an opportunity to challenge his accusers during the investigation by the second defendant; (b) there was a failure on the part of the second defendant to comply with the time limits for referring the matter to the disciplinary panel; (c) his suspension was invalid, as it constituted a second suspension and should in any event be lifted at this stage by reason of its duration; and (d) the reference of additional complaints to the disciplinary panel was otherwise than in accordance with the disciplinary procedures.

The defendants submitted that the complaints made by the plaintiff were premature and should first have been referred to the disciplinary panel of the first defendant. Insofar as where the balance of convenience lay, the defendants contended that the first defendant, as an employer, had duties not only to a staff member accused of misconduct but to other staff who may be affected by such behaviour.

Held by the High Court (Kearns J.), in refusing the relief sought, 1, that, whether a suspension amounted to a sanction such as would invoke concepts of natural justice or give rise to an inference that the person concerned had been found guilty of significant misconduct, was, in every case, a question of fact and degree.

2. That, where a suspension constituted a disciplinary sanction, the person affected should have been afforded natural justice and fair procedures before the decision to suspend was taken. However, where a person was suspended so that an inquiry could be undertaken as to whether disciplinary action should be taken, the rules of natural justice might not apply.

Quirke v. Bord Luthchleas na hÉireann [1988] I.R. 83; Deegan v. The Minister for Finance [2000] E.L.R. 190 followed.

3. That the inevitable consequence of any suggestion that an employee who had been suspended was thereby, and without more, irredeemably prejudiced, and ipso facto could not then get of a fair hearing, would mean that there could never be a holding suspension as one of the steps in a disciplinary process.

Motion on notice.

The facts of the case have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of Kearns J., infra.

The action was commenced by plenary summons dated the 11th December, 2002. By notice of motion dated the 12th December, 2002, the plaintiff sought an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from removing him from office or embarking on disciplinary action against him. The matter came on for hearing before the High Court (Kearns J.) on the 13th May and the 5th June, 2003.

John MacMenamin S.C. (with him Roddy Horan) for the plaintiff.

Tom Mallon for the first and third defendants.

Senan Allen S.C. (with him Lyndon McCann S.C.) for the second defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Kearns J. 9th July, 2003

The plaintiff in these proceedings is a senior lecturer in old and medieval English in Trinity College Dublin. He joined the Department of English in 1968 as a junior lecturer, was subsequently appointed as senior lecturer and was elected a fellow of the college in 1993. He carries on his research and teaching on the campus of the college and is entitled to reside in rooms within the college itself and enjoy various other rights ancillary thereto.

On the 7th October, 2002, the plaintiff was suspended with pay with immediate effect on foot of a complaint made by Dr. Stephanie Newell, a member of staff and colleague in the Department of English, alleging physical intimidation and harassment. On Sunday, 6th October, 2002, the plaintiff had entered the Arts Building and there had entered the office of Dr. Newell in the English Department. He spent some ten minutes in that office in the presence of Dr. Newell during which time he engaged in invective against English people and the English middle classes. Dr. Newell is English and felt very intimidated and frightened by his behaviour which became increasingly angry. She moved to the departmental office to do some photocopying, but was followed by the plaintiff who became more and more angry. According to Dr. Newell, the harangue continued for some further time, at the conclusion of which the plaintiff grasped her hand, kissed her on the cheek and then left. Dr. Newell found this experience frightening and threatening and made a formal complaint in writing to the second defendant who is a senior dean of Trinity College. On the following day the second defendant wrote to the plaintiff advising that a formal complaint had been made against him which required to be investigated in accordance with procedures set out in sch. (iii), ch. (xii) of the college statutes. Also enclosed with the second defendant's letter was the letter of complaint from Dr. Newell and the formal record of an interview about the incident held on the 7th October, 2002, between the second defendant, the staff secretary and Dr. Newell. The plaintiff was advised by the said letter to attend an interview regarding the matter on Friday the 11th October, 2002, at which he could be accompanied by a colleague or other representative of his choice. This offer of interview was declined by the plaintiff.

In his letter dated the 7th October, 2002, the second defendant wrote as follows to the plaintiff:-

> "I have today received a complaint from Dr. Stephanie Newell concerning your behaviour towards her in the department of English on Sunday morning, the 6th October, 2002, between approx. 10.50 and 11.20 a.m.
> The college's policy document on preventing sexual harassment and bullying in the workplace states:-

> 'Any act or conduct by a perpetrator is considered to be harassment if it is unwelcome to the recipient and could reasonably be seen as offensive, humiliating or intimidating to the recipient.'
>
> The college's disciplinary procedures cite as examples of misconduct by a member of the academic staff (para. 12 sch. (iii), ch. (xii) of the statutes):-
>
> 'violence or threats of violence towards other members of the college community or persons having legitimate business with the college' and 'harassment on the college premises or in the course of employment'.
>
> On the basis of the verbal and written evidence presented to me by Dr. Newell, I deem the matter to be of such seriousness that I am invoking powers given to the senior dean under para. 12 of the aforementioned statutes that you be suspended with pay to take effect immediately. I shall be formally recommending this course of action in accordance with the statutes to the board of the college. This means that you should not be physically present in any part of the Arts Building of the college until further notice.
>
> I shall be taking steps to conduct a full and formal investigation of the complaint made by Dr. Stephanie Newell in accordance with the college's disciplinary procedures applicable to academic staff.
> Yours sincerely."

This event occurred in the aftermath of an investigation by the second defendant into other complaints made against the plaintiff by Professor John Scattergood, also from the Department of English, and by Professor Nicholas Grene, head of the Department of English, in respect of which a report dated the 30th September, 2002, had been made available to the plaintiff on the 4th October, 2002. That report had recommended to the board of the college that the plaintiff be suspended from his post as senior lecturer in the department of English for a period of three months without pay and further recommended that the plaintiff receive a formal warning that if the conduct, the subject matter of the reports, was to be repeated, the plaintiff might be subject to further disciplinary action including dismissal as a possible outcome.

This investigation and report arose out of complaints made against the plaintiff by Professor John Scattergood and Professor Nicholas Grene dated the 21st February, 2002.

These complaints arose out of letters written by the plaintiff on the 17th February, 2002 and the 19th February, 2002, to Professor Nicholas Grene and other named parties and a further letter of the 22nd February, 2002, written by the plaintiff to all members of the Department of English in the college.

Essentially, the plaintiff had complained in these letters that he had not been consulted in February, 2002, in connection with the appointment of a permanent lecturer in medieval English in the English Department, nor included in the nominating committee for selection. The plaintiff felt that, given his seniority and years of experience in old and medieval English in the college, he was being wrongfully excluded from the process.

In his letter dated the 17th February, 2002, the plaintiff made various specific allegations against Professor Scattergood and called into question his suitability to be on the nominating committee for the lectureship post. In particular, the plaintiff suggested that Professor Scattergood had no reputation as an old English scholar and no credibility as a defender of old English interests in the department. He further suggested that Professor Scattergood's judgment in the making of appointments in the Department of English had been consistently unsound.

In his letter dated the 19th February, 2002, the plaintiff further contended that Professor Scattergood had "blocked" the careers of Trinity-trained medievalists and claimed that in the course of an interview in 1999 for a position in the English Department, a candidate, Dr. Michelle Sweeney, had been "undermined by Professor Scattergood's open rudeness" in the course of her interview. These letters were circulated to all members of the English Department and to the other persons named at the foot or end of each letter. These letters further suggested that Professor Scattergood had undermined the autonomy of medieval and renaissance English in the department.

By his letter dated the 22nd February, 2002, which was also circulated to all members of the Department of English, the plaintiff again protested at his exclusion from the process of appointment of the permanent lecturer in medieval English. In his letter he complained of Professor Grene's attitude towards him, which he had found "high handed and patronising, but also (which is much worse) lacking in candour and straightforwardness. It has been so for many years". The letter went on to complain that the plaintiff was obliged to express publicly his present lack of confidence both in Professor Grene and in Professor Scattergood whom, he alleged, had not acted "in good faith either towards me or in the interests of old English".

For the purpose of preparing his report, which runs to some 37 pages, the second defendant held meetings with the plaintiff on the 14th March, 2002 and the 4th April, 2002. He also held meetings with other members of the English Department, including Professor Grene, Professor Scattergood, Professor Ní Chuilleanáin, Dr. Piesse and Professor Ross. Having regard to the breadth and scope of allegations raised by the plaintiff, the second defendant obtained and reviewed a large amount of documentation pertaining to the history of the Department of English over many years, consisting of correspondence, minutes of school meetings, committee reports and faculty plans. Further correspondence from the plaintiff to the senior lecturer, the senior dean and members of staff in the Department of English written between February, 2002 and April, 2002, which repeated or contained material relevant to the allegations raised by the plaintiff were also reviewed for the purposes of the report.

At the conclusion of his investigation and report, the second defendant found as follows:-

> "I find that the contents of the correspondence referred to in this report constitute malicious and false accusations on the academic integrity, character, reputation and impartiality of Professor John Scattergood. The college has an obligation to protect the complainant against such behaviour. The college also has a duty of care and protection towards all staff within the department and in college who are parties to receipt of copies of correspondence containing such accusations for the distress this may cause. Colleagues must not be expected to tolerate such abuse when the person's actions go beyond the bounds of acceptable academic behaviour. Such disruptive behaviour constitutes a form of bullying to undermine colleagues and cannot be allowed or excused."

Under the procedures pertaining to such matters, to which I shall presently refer, the second defendant then recommended the sanctions already outlined to the board of the college.

As far as the plaintiff is concerned, an academic dispute between members of the English Department had thereby been elevated into a disciplinary matter. He believes he is entitled to, but has been denied, fair procedures in and about the manner in which the disciplinary process has taken place. In his grounding affidavit sworn on the 11th December, 2002, he deposes to his belief that the referral by the second defendant of complaints to the third defendant has been embarked upon for the sole purpose of securing the termination of his tenure in the college.

The plaintiff further complains that in respect of the proposed hearing by the disciplinary panel, he was served with a book of evidence containing some 150 pages of documents as late as the 5th December, 2002, some three working days before the scheduled hearing. He further complains that the book of evidence contains a number of new allegations and complaints additional to those investigated by the second defendant in February, 2002. He complains that these new complaints have been referred simpliciter to the disciplinary panel although the statutes envisage a preliminary inquiry by the senior dean or the relevant head of department before any invocation of the college's disciplinary procedures.

The plaintiff secured an order on the 11th December, 2002, in the High Court (Smyth J.) restraining the third defendant until further order from convening or proceeding with the disciplinary inquiry.

The application now before the court seeks an interlocutory injunction restraining the third defendant from holding the disciplinary hearing, which was intended to be heard by a disciplinary panel to be chaired by the third defendant and which was originally scheduled to take place on the 11th December, 2002. The motion on notice also seeks to set aside the plaintiff's suspension and to restrain the defendants from taking any disciplinary steps against the plaintiff until the trial of the action.

The first defendant's disciplinary procedures

The first defendant's disciplinary procedures for academic staff are set out in sch. III of ch. XII of the Consolidated Statutes of Trinity College Dublin and of the University of Dublin.

Paragraph 2 of sch. III sets out examples of misconduct governed by the procedures and makes it clear that misconduct is not limited to the matters actually listed in para. 2. Amongst the examples of misconduct cited are "violence or threats of violence towards other members of the college community or persons having legitimate business with the college" and "abuse of the disciplinary code, including the making under it of a false and malicious accusation against a member of staff".

The regulations provide that where misconduct has been reported, the head of department shall make preliminary inquiries and attempt to deal with the matter on an informal basis. Where the allegations are serious, however, the matter may be referred to the senior dean. Paragraph 11 provides that the senior dean shall, where a case has been referred to him by a head of department or otherwise, carry out such inquiries as he deems appropriate. Unless he decides that no further action is justified, the senior dean must formally interview the member of staff giving him an outline of the allegations made against him and furnishing a copy of the college's disciplinary code and procedures.

Paragraph 12 provides that the senior dean may recommend to the board of the college that, pending investigation, the member of staff concerned should be suspended on pay from all or any part of his duties, together with any conditions that should apply to such suspension. It further provides that the senior dean may, in exceptional circumstances, order that the suspension should take effect immediately, pending the decision of the board.

In the instant case, the latter portion of para. 12 was relied upon by the second defendant to suspend the plaintiff on the 7th October, 2002 and the suspension was confirmed by the board on the 24th October, 2002.

Paragraph 13 provides:-

> "After completing his/her investigation, the Senior Dean may –
>
> (a) decide not to proceed where he determines that there is insufficient evidence or that the case is otherwise unfounded, or
>
> (b) with the prior written consent of the member of staff concerned, recommend to the Board of College an appropriate penalty/disposition, or
>
> (c) in every case in which dismissal is a possible outcome or where otherwise in the opinion of the Senior Dean the nature of the case justifies such action, refer the case for a hearing to the Disciplinary Panel.
> The Senior Dean shall make such determination as soon as possible and subject to the provisions of para. 16."

Paragraph 14 provides that where there has been a refusal or a failure by the member of staff to give consent under para. 13(b), the senior dean may refer the case to the disciplinary panel in accordance with para. 13(c).

This is the situation in the present case insofar as the dean's report in to the February matters is concerned. In these circumstances, the disciplinary panel "shall not be informed of the senior dean's recommendation and the case will be heard de novo".

Paragraph 15 minutes the penalties which may be recommended by the senior dean. The senior dean cannot recommend dismissal.

Paragraph 16 is in the following terms:-

> "A reference to a disciplinary panel by the senior dean under para. 13(c) shall be made by written notice to the Registrar, containing a brief specification of each charge against the member of the academic staff. Such notice must normally be received by the Registrar within 30 working days from the date on which the senior dean received original notification of the offence. In exceptional circumstances the senior dean may serve such notice after the expiry of this time limit. The decision of the senior dean to serve such notice after expiry of the normal time limit shall be reviewable by the disciplinary panel."

Paragraph 19 imposes a requirement on the senior dean to serve, at least three working days in advance of the hearing, on the member of the academic staff and on the chairperson of the disciplinary panel a statement of the charges, a list of witnesses whom the senior dean proposes to call, a summary in writing of the evidence that is purposed to be given and a list of exhibits if any.

Paragraph 23 provides that the disciplinary panel shall consist of the chairperson (who must be legally qualified) and four members of the academic staff drawn from a standing list of 30 persons on a random basis. The standing list is drawn up by the board with the agreement of the Academic Staff Association.

While the disciplinary panel is obliged to meet within 21 working days of the referral to it of a case by the senior dean in accordance with para. 13(c), the chairperson has a discretion to grant to a member of the academic staff a further period to prepare the case, if so requested.

There are detailed provisions for the conduct of such hearings. Paragraphs 33 to 35 provide:-

"33. The Chairperson shall conduct the hearing in accordance with the principles of natural justice and fair procedures. Having opened the proceedings, the Chairperson shall invite the senior dean and/or the representative of the senior dean to make the case to the panel, which case has to be established beyond all reasonable doubt. The member of academic staff and/or the representative of the member of academic staff shall then be heard. Where witnesses are called, they may be examined, cross-examined or re-examined by the parties and by members of the panel. When the presentation of evidence is complete, the chairperson shall invite the parties or their representatives to address concluding remarks to the panel. The chairperson shall then, in the presence of the parties, address the other members of the panel, summarising the evidence presented, giving directions as to the proper approach to evidence adduced and instructing them as to their functions.

34. Following the chairperson's address, the ordinary members of the panel shall retire to consider their decision in private and in the absence of the chairperson and the parties. A decision that the charges have been proved shall not be made unless at least three of the ordinary members are in agreement with such verdict. The ordinary members shall nominate from amongst themselves a spokesperson. When a decision has been reached the spokesperson shall, in the presence of the full panel and the parties announce the decision. Where the panel decides that the charges have been proven, the chairperson shall, following submissions from the parties, address the panel on factors relevant to the determination of an appropriate penalty. The ordinary members shall then again retire to consider an appropriate penalty. Their spokesperson shall, in the presence of the full panel and the parties, announce their decision. The chairperson may, if of the opinion that the proposed penalty is ultra vires or unreasonable ask the ordinary members to reconsider the matter. Where the four panellists are unable to decide (which decision may be made by simple majority) upon an appropriate penalty, the penalty shall be determined by the chairperson.

35. The chairperson shall, following announcement of the penalty, inform the member of academic staff of the right to appeal to the visitors in the event of the panel's decision being confirmed by the board."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the disciplinary process in the college is multi-tiered. Firstly, certain complaints may go no further than the head of department. Secondly, where a matter is, because of its seriousness, referred to the second defendant, he may decide, following inquiries and after completing his investigation, not to proceed further on the basis of insufficient evidence. Alternatively, he may, with the prior written consent of the member of staff concerned, recommend to the board of college an appropriate penalty. Where there is a refusal to give consent to the imposition of penalty by the member of staff, as in the instant case, the matter is then referred to the disciplinary panel for a complete de novo hearing. That hearing requires proof to the criminal standard of proof before an adverse finding can be made. Witnesses may be examined and cross-examined and the member of staff has the right to legal representation. He also has the further safeguard that the panel's decision must be confirmed by the board. Even then, there still remains a right of appeal to the college visitors.

It is difficult to imagine a more comprehensive set of procedures for the protection of academic staff. The essential question, however, is whether those procedures were fairly employed by the first and second defendants. No allegation of any sort is made against the third defendant, whose qualifications for the position of chairman are impeccable. By virtue of the injunction application brought by the plaintiff, the complement of lay personnel for the disciplinary panel has not yet been assigned.

Contentions of the parties

The arguments advanced on behalf of the plaintiff in support of his application for interlocutory relief may be summarised as follows:-

(a) there was a failure to comply with natural justice in that the plaintiff did not have an opportunity to challenge his "accusers" during the investigation by the second defendant;

(b) there was a failure on the part of the second defendant to comply with the time limits for referring the matter to the disciplinary panel;
(c) the suspension of the plaintiff was invalid, constituted a second suspension and should in any event be lifted at this stage by reason of its duration; and
(d) the reference of additional complaints to the disciplinary panel was otherwise than in accordance with the procedure.

It is further submitted that the plaintiff will suffer irreparable damage if the suspension is not lifted. Counsel for the plaintiff contends that damages could never be an adequate remedy in the particular context. Within the confines of an academic institution, a suspension to which was added the restriction that the plaintiff could not enter the Arts Building, was incredibly damaging to the plaintiff's reputation and standing within the college community, counsel argued. The plaintiff's whole way of life and professional standing was at stake in the context of the present application. The balance of convenience lay in favour of granting an interlocutory injunction.

The defendants submit that all of the complaints made by the plaintiff in these proceedings are premature. Any complaints of procedural defect could be made by the plaintiff to the disciplinary panel. The disciplinary panel is strictly governed and subject to the principles of natural justice and fair procedure. The defendants submit that all of the complaints now advanced by the plaintiff at this hearing could and indeed should have been advanced by him at first instance to the disciplinary panel. In the event of the disciplinary panel failing in its duties in respect of any complaint, it would at that stage have been open to the plaintiff either to appeal the decision of the panel to the visitors or apply to this court. It is submitted that there is not one iota of evidence that the panel has acted improperly or is likely to act improperly.

The early stage of the investigation was, it is argued, just that, investigatory. There was no right during that process to challenge "accusers" because there were none. While the second defendant does have a duty to investigate and a power to impose a penalty, that power is at all times subject to being exercised only with the prior written consent of the staff member which in the instant case had never been forthcoming. The mere forwarding of a complaint by the second defendant to the panel does not render the complainant an "accuser" until such time as the first defendant puts the staff member at risk of the imposition of a sanction in a hearing before the disciplinary panel.

On the allegation of delay, it is accepted that the second defendant did not refer the matter to the disciplinary panel within 30 working days.

However, it was submitted that the period of time taken by the second defendant to investigate this entire matter and ultimately refer to the disciplinary panel was reasonable. That issue is also reviewable by the disciplinary panel and can be resolved at that hearing. It had been necessary for the second defendant to examine a considerable volume of documentation relating to the department of English over many years. Furthermore, the plaintiff had in correspondence with the second defendant indicated his understanding of the delay and was making no complaint about it prior to the delivery of the report in October.

The defendants argue that there is no second suspension, nor was the single suspension imposed as a sanction. It was purely a holding operation, pending the hearing by the disciplinary panel. Furthermore, the suspension was one with pay and clearly was not open-ended in that it clearly would only last until the disciplinary panel convened and dealt with the entire matter of the complaints. The period from the 7th October until the 11th December, 2002, could not be regarded as excessive, not least because additional charges and complaints had arisen in respect of certain behaviour by the plaintiff following delivery to him of the second defendant's report on the 4th October, 2002.

Further, in circumstances where the disciplinary issue had already been referred to the disciplinary panel, there could be no complaint about the addition of further charges. The reference to the disciplinary panel was clearly in contemplation or in train at the time these additional acts of alleged misbehaviour had occurred and were thus properly within the purview and remit of the disciplinary panel to be determined by the panel in accordance with its own rules. It would be a nonsense for the senior dean to conduct further investigations in such circumstances.

Insofar as the balance of convenience went, it was submitted that the first defendant as an employer has duties not only to a staff member accused of misconduct but to other staff who may be affected by that behaviour. It had such a duty of care, not least because the plaintiff's complaints were being disseminated by the plaintiff to a wide audience within the first defendant, as his correspondence demonstrated.

Suspension: legal considerations

The power of suspension is expressly provided for in the first defendant's disciplinary procedures and the entitlement to suspend per se is thus not in issue. Whether, however, a suspension amounts to a sanction such as would invoke concepts of natural justice or give rise to an inference that the person concerned had been found guilty of significant misconduct is, in every case, a question of fact and degree.

A suspension may have different consequences and implications by reference to the particular occupation of the person affected. For example, a professional footballer might not regard a suspension, even a lengthy one, as being particularly detrimental or damaging to career or reputation. On the other hand, an allegation of misconduct against a senior medical consultant, or, as in the instant case, a senior academic and lecturer, may well be a more serious matter. It is a simple fact of life that suspension for a person in one of the latter categories may be seen as altogether more damaging. At the opposite end of the spectrum, the Supreme Court found in Murtagh v. Board of Management of St. Emer's National School [1991] 1 I.R. 482 that the three day suspension of a pupil either by the principal or by the board of management of a school did not amount to an adjudication on or determination of any rights, or the imposition of any liability.

Equally, the court will have to consider the manner and nature of the suspension. If the suspension is without pay and open-ended, it obviously has far more detrimental effects from the point of view of the person suspended and may more readily be seen as a punishment. Disciplinary procedures may also be found wanting if the person who is about to be suspended has not been fully informed as to the complaint against him and given an opportunity to respond to any proposed suspension. In the case of a second suspension, which is the situation contended for on behalf of the plaintiff in the instant case, the detrimental effects can only be seen as more marked, because such a suspension is more often than not likely to lead inexorably to the possibility of termination of employment, a factor I deemed to be of some importance in McNamara v. South Western Area Health Board [2001] E.L.R. 317.

In Quirke v. Bord Luthchleas na hÉireann [1988] I.R. 83, Barr J. emphasised the distinction between two types of suspension, punitive and holding, when stating as follows at p. 87:-

> "… the suspension of a member by a body such as B.L.E. or a trade union or professional association may take two different forms. On the one hand, it may be imposed as a holding operation pending the investigation of a complaint. Such a suspension does not imply that there has been a finding of any misbehaviour or breach of rules by the suspended person, but merely that an allegation of some such impropriety or misconduct has been made against the member in question. On the other hand, a suspension may be imposed not as a holding operation pending the outcome of an inquiry, but as a penalty by way of punishment of a member who has been found guilty of misconduct or breach of rules. The importance of the distinction is that where a suspension is imposed by way of punishment, it follows that the body in question has found its member guilty of significant misconduct or breach of rules."

It follows, obviously, that where suspension constitutes a disciplinary sanction, the person affected should be afforded natural justice and fair procedures before the decision to suspend him or her is taken. However, where a person is suspended so that an inquiry can be undertaken as to whether disciplinary action should be taken against the person concerned, the rules of natural justice may not apply.

These were the findings of the Supreme Court in Deegan v. The Minister for Finance [2000] E.L.R. 190, in which Keane C.J. stated as follows at pp. 198 to 199:-

"It is clear that the suspension of a person from their employment for a specified period because of irregularities or misconduct on his or her part can constitute a form of disciplinary action which would entitle the person affected to be afforded natural justice or fair procedures before the decision to suspend him or her is taken. The consequences of such suspension can be extremely serious for the person concerned, involving not merely their right to earn a livelihood but also their right to have their good name protected. In John v. Rees [1969] 2 All E.R. 274 at p. 305, McGarry J., in a passage cited by the learned High Court judge, said:-

'… in essence suspension is merely expulsion pro tanto. Each is penal, and each deprives the member concerned of the enjoyment of his rights of membership or office. Accordingly, in my judgment the rules of natural justice prima facie apply to any process of suspension in the same way that they apply to expulsion.'

However, that was not a case in which the suspension was being imposed so that an inquiry could be undertaken as to whether disciplinary action should be taken against the person concerned and, if so, the nature of such a sanction.

That distinction was emphasised by Lord Denning M.R. in Lewis v. Heffer [1978] 3 All E.R. 354 a decision to which the attention of the learned High Court Judge does not appear to have been drawn. Having cited the passage from the judgment of Megarry J., Lord Denning went on at p. 364:-

'These words apply, no doubt, to suspensions which are inflicted by way of punishment, as for instance when a member of the Bar is suspended from practice for six months, or when a solicitor is suspended from practice. But they do not apply to suspensions which are made, as a holding operation, pending enquiries.

> Very often irregularities are disclosed in a government department or in a business house; and a man may be suspended on full pay pending enquiries. Suspicion may rest on him; and so he is suspended until he is cleared of it. No one, so far as I know, has ever questioned such a suspension on the ground that it could not be done unless he is given notice of the charge and an opportunity of defending himself, and so forth. The suspension in such a case is merely done by way of good administration. A situation has arisen in which something must be done at once. The work of the department or the office is being affected by rumours and suspicions. The others will not trust the man. In order to get back to proper work, the man is suspended. At that stage the rules of natural justice do not apply: see Furnell v. Whangarei High Schools Board [1973] 1 All E.R. 400'."

Obviously a person who is being suspended must be informed of the reason for his suspension (Flynn v. An Post [1987] 1 I.R. 68). Flynn v. An Post is also an authority for the proposition that a power of suspension must be construed as permitting a suspension to continue only for the period of time during which it would not be reasonably practicable to hold a full hearing into the matter. An open-ended suspension, particularly one without pay, can only be seen as a form of punishment and a severe one at that. In contrast, a short period of suspension with pay against a clearly defined backdrop of consecutive steps to resolve the disciplinary issue is less likely to warrant the court's intervention on the basis that the procedures, or their application, are unfair to the person concerned.

The plaintiff in the instant case complains that his suspension is both unfair and prejudicial. In this context, "prejudicial" may be taken to include the plaintiff's reputation and standing in the college community and also, and perhaps more importantly from the point of view of this application, his right to a fair hearing. It is an inescapable fact that the plaintiff coming before the disciplinary panel will carry with him the taint or degree of prejudice which inevitably arises from the fact that he has been charged and that the second defendant believes that the procedure is justified. However, it seems to me that the inevitable consequence of any suggestion that an employee who has been suspended is thereby, and without more, irredeemably prejudiced, and ipso facto cannot then get of a fair hearing, would mean that there could never be a holding suspension as one of the steps in a disciplinary process. That in turn would mean that an employer, possibly faced with a situation where work colleagues are the complainants in a given case, would have to suffer the prejudice instead. There could then be no action the employer could take, short of ignoring complaints of a serious nature or proceeding at once to the termination stage with all the risks and liabilities that might attach thereto.

In Furnell v. Whangarei High School Board [1973] A.C. 660, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest stated at p. 679:-

> "It has often being pointed out that the conceptions which are indicated when natural justice is invoked or referred to are not comprised within and are not to be confined within certain hard and fast and rigid rules: see the speeches in Wiseman v. Borneman [1971] A.C. 297. Natural justice is but fairness writ large and juridically. It has been described as 'fair play in action'. Nor is it a leaven to be associated only with judicial or quasi-judicial occasions."

Bearing in mind, therefore, that fairness in action is the court's guiding principle, the essential questions seem to me to be as follows:-

Were the defendants' disciplinary procedures applied fairly having regard to:-

(i) the suspension and the manner of its imposition?
(ii) the delay, either in the preparation of the second defendant's report, or between its delivery in October, 2002 and the scheduled hearing by the disciplinary panel in December, 2002?
(iii) the possibility of prejudice to the plaintiff in any hearing before the disciplinary panel arising from the investigation or findings of the second defendant in his report?

Decision
The suspension

While counsel for the plaintiff has urged the court to find as a fact that there were two suspensions of the plaintiff, I am quite satisfied that the only suspension which was imposed was that of the 7th October, 2002, in respect of the incident involving Dr. Newell.

It is of course true to say that the second defendant had recommended suspension of the plaintiff in respect of the February complaints for a period of three months without pay, together with a warning as to future behaviour, to the board. However this was a sanction which could never have been imposed without the plaintiff's consent. The effective suspension, in the "exceptional circumstances" found to exist by the second defendant, was imposed on the 7th October and was confirmed and adopted by the board on the 24th October, 2002. What the board did on that occasion was effectively to endorse the steps taken by the second defendant under para. 12, sch. III, ch. XII of the college statutes on the 7th October, 2002.

It seems to me that the second defendant could reasonably form the view that the gravity of the behaviour complained of by Dr. Newell constituted "exceptional circumstances" within the meaning of para. 12, such as would justify immediate suspension. The plaintiff was well aware of the reason for the suspension, although it is true to say he was not provided with an opportunity of responding thereto because of the immediate nature of the suspension. However, within a very short period of time, the plaintiff declined to be interviewed about the incident and published for all to see within the college precincts a handwritten statement dated the 8th October, 2002, which further inflamed matters but wherein he did not dispute the essential facts giving rise to the complaint by Dr. Newell. If there was therefore any want of due process, it was a shortcoming of no real importance on the facts of this particular case.

The second defendant's letter of the 7th October, 2002, to the plaintiff made it clear that he thereafter intended taking steps to conduct a full and formal investigation of the complaint made by Dr. Newell in accordance with the college's disciplinary procedures applicable to academic staff. It was made clear, therefore, that the suspension was not an end in itself but rather a stage in a process. A parallel or converging process was also inevitable arising from the investigation and report into the February complaints and the plaintiff's refusal to accept or consent to the second defendant's recommendation as to sanction. From my review of the papers I find no evidence of malice or ill-will in any of the second defendant's behaviour towards the plaintiff. On the contrary he had clear duties and obligations under the college statutes. In referring the complaints to the disciplinary panel he at all times, in my view, behaved with total propriety.

Delay

The plaintiff's complaints in respect of delay are twofold. Firstly, he complains of the length of time the second defendant took to complete his report, which was only delivered to him on the 4th October, 2002.

A huge range of issues had been raised by the plaintiff in his complaints which essentially related to the administration of the English Department over a period of 25 years. I accept entirely the assertion by the second defendant that a huge amount of work was involved both in the investigation itself and thereafter in the preparation of a report. At the same time as performing these functions, the second defendant had his other duties within the Department of Microbiology to attend to, including the setting and marking of examinations in May, 2002. It was thus the end of July before he could complete his investigation and prepare a report. He was approached by the plaintiff in late July who asked when he could expect the report. The second defendant deposes at para. 19 of his original affidavit that he explained to the plaintiff that he hoped to have it finished shortly but that the draft would have to be read by the staff secretary before it could be finalised. The staff secretary was on holidays at the time and accordingly the draft was only completed in late August, following which the second defendant went on scheduled annual holiday. He returned in early September and went through the draft report with the staff secretary, making some necessary corrections and cross-referencing to appendices. On the 23rd September, 2002, the plaintiff wrote asking when the report would be ready. There followed an exchange of e-mails between the second defendant and the plaintiff. The plaintiff's e-mail stated:-

> "I well understand the claims on your time and also the work you have put into this report. I apologise if I have inadvertently caused more difficulty for you, but I had simply understood from our conversation in July that the report had already been submitted."

I accept the account furnished by the second defendant in his second affidavit that the plaintiff was in no way complaining about the length of time which the report took to complete, because he apparently believed he would be vindicated in it. It was only when he discovered that the report concluded that a case had indeed been made out against him that he began to dispute the procedures and timetables involved.

In any event, as has been pointed out by counsel on behalf of the defendants, there is a provision in the college statutes whereby the decision of the senior dean to serve notice of a reference to a disciplinary panel may be extended after the expiration of the 30 working days from the date on which the senior dean received original notification of the offence. The decision of the senior dean to serve such notice after the expiry of the normal time limit is also reviewable by the disciplinary panel. It seems to me that the plaintiff's position could not be better protected in respect of any complaints of delay under this heading.

Nor could the plaintiff have been under any illusion or belief that he was being subjected to an open-ended suspension. On the contrary, he had been made aware that the disciplinary process was being set in motion and that a hearing by a disciplinary panel would follow. Also, he was being suspended on full pay.

The hearing was scheduled to take place on the 11th December, 2002. While the book of evidence, which contained material relevant to the additional charges, was only served on the plaintiff some three days before the date of the proposed hearing, it is quite clear that the plaintiff would have secured an adjournment of the hearing had he so requested it. Instead of doing so, however, the plaintiff elected to bring injunction proceedings in the this court.

Having regard to the additional offences with which the plaintiff is charged arising out of his behaviour following his suspension, and having regard to the requirement to investigate these matters so as to provide a detailed book of evidence, it does not seem to me that the period of suspension between October and December, effectively two months, was excessive in the particular circumstances of this case, particularly when the plaintiff was and is on full pay throughout.

The second defendant's report

It is beyond dispute that the second defendant undertook a wide ranging investigation, both into complaints raised against the plaintiff and into complaints which the plaintiff himself raised about events going back over many years.

During the course of that investigation, the plaintiff was interviewed on two separate occasions, once while attended by a representative. He was fully aware of the matters under investigation and had every opportunity of presenting his account to the second defendant. Crucially, he retained the right of veto over any possible sanction which the second defendant might regard as appropriate. Nothing in his conclusion or recommendations therefore amounts to a sanction and I am satisfied that the panoply of rights identified in In re Haughey [1971] I.R. 217 do not arise in those particular circumstances.

Secondly, in respect of the plaintiff's complaint that the possibility of a fair hearing by the disciplinary panel has been prejudiced or prejudged is one which I completely reject.

When this matter goes before the disciplinary panel it will be a completely de novo hearing. Not merely will it be a de novo hearing, but the burden or onus of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt will fall on the second defendant. One of the functions of the third defendant will be to instruct the panel that they must act only on the evidence before them. If any member of the panel who survives the plaintiff's seven peremptory challenges and unlimited challenges for cause has heard anything of the plaintiff around the college, he will be instructed to put it out of his mind. A separate book of evidence constitutes the material which will form the basis of the case presented to the disciplinary panel. The disciplinary panel does not have regard to the report and findings of the second defendant. In the course of the hearing before the disciplinary panel, the plaintiff can, through counsel if he so desires, cross-examine witnesses, make submissions, give evidence himself and enjoy each and every right which the concept of natural justice requires in the context of any adjudication leading to possible sanction, particularly where proof beyond reasonable doubt is necessary.

I am therefore satisfied that all of the plaintiff's complaints of unfairness are unwarranted and without substance.

That being so, I am not satisfied that the plaintiff has made out an arguable case on the hearing of this application. I should also perhaps say something about where in my view the balance of convenience lies.

I believe that on this test the balance is firmly against granting an interlocutory injunction. The rights of the college in maintaining good order and the need of the college to protect the interests of the other staff members of the English Department must be placed in the balance along with the plaintiff's interests when considering this issue. The court has to take into account the fact that the plaintiff himself has widely disseminated his allegations against the head of the English Department and his colleague Professor Scattergood, in such a way and to such a degree as to arouse considerable indignation from working colleagues in the English Department, as is apparent from the material put before the court. It seems to me that a quite unsatisfactory working atmosphere could be created in the English Department, possibly leading to other difficulties, if this suspension were to be lifted prior to the completion of the investigation and disciplinary process. I would, accordingly, also refuse relief on consideration of the balance of convenience test.

I accept the defendants' case that the plaintiff's complaints in this instance are premature. It seems to me that all matters can be dealt with fully and adequately by the disciplinary panel who will come to this matter unfettered by the prior history with which this judgment is largely concerned. The college statutes and procedures are particularly well framed to ensure fairness at every stage.

Finally, and for the sake of completeness I should state that I do not believe that the defendants have caused the plaintiff "irreparable damage" as alleged. He has been suspended on full pay pending the completion of the disciplinary process. The plaintiff appears to contemplate as damage that which might be suffered by him in the event of the disciplinary panel giving him an unfair hearing. However, there is absolutely nothing in his affidavit to suggest there is any basis whatsoever for believing that such an unfair hearing would arise, and the plaintiff himself expressly eschews any criticism of the third defendant.

For all of these reasons I refuse to grant the interlocutory injunction sought in this case.

E.P. Ó Coindealbhain (Inspector of Taxes), Appellant, v. Thomas B. Mooney, Respondent [1988 No. 83R]

High Court 21st April, 1988

Revenue - Income tax - Employed person - Branch manager of employment office - Whether a contract of service or for services - Whether assessable for tax under Schedule D or Schedule E of the Income Tax Act, 1967 - Tests to be applied - Income Tax Act, 1967 (No. 6).

Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1967, provides at s. 52 that tax under that Schedule shall be charged in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or occurring, inter alia "to any person residing in the State from any trade, profession or employment whether carried on in the State or elsewhere." Schedule E of the said Act provides at s. 109 that tax under that Schedule shall be charged inter alia, in respect of the profits or gains arising or occurring to any person by virtue of "any office, employment or pension".

The respondent taxpayer was engaged by the Minister for Social Welfare as the manager of an employment office. The terms and conditions of his engagement were set out in a letter from the department dated the 20th March, 1978, which provided inter alia that the respondent would be responsible for the work of the employment office; that his remuneration would be made up of allowances and other payments related to the value of the work done; that he should provide and furnish office facilities and that he should employ a competent deputy and such clerical assistants as might be necessary. Both the accommodation and the assistants procured by the respondent were to be subject to the approval of the department. The respondent could not serve on any public body while holding office. His appointment was subject to three months notice of termination on either side.

The respondent was assessed to tax under Schedule E of the Income Tax Act, 1967, as an employed person and he appealed against this assessment to the Circuit Court, on the ground that he should be assessed to tax under Schedule D as a self-employed person. The Circuit Court allowed the appeal and, at the request of the appellant, stated a case for the opinion of the High Court to determine whether it was "correct in law in holding that the respondent is engaged under a contract for services and therefore self-employed and assessable under Schedule D."

Held by Blayney J., in answering the case stated in the affirmative, 1, that only the terms of the written contract between the parties could be considered in deciding what the terms and conditions of the respondent's employment were.

Narich Property Ltd. v. Commissioner of Pay Roll Tax [1984] I.C.R. 286 applied.

2. That in determining whether a contract was one of service or for services the extent and degree of control exercised by the employer and whether the employed person was in business on his own account were factors to be considered.

Roche v. P. Kelly & Co. [1969] I.R. 100, 108 and Market Investigations Ltd. v. Minister for Social Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173 considered. McDermott v. Loy (Unreported, High Court, Barron J., 29th July, 1982) applied.

3. That for the contract to be one of service the contracting party must have agreed to provide his own work or skill in the performance of some service.

Ready Mixed Concrete v. Minister for Pensions [1968] 2 Q.B. 497 approved.

4. That the right of the employer to terminate the employee's contract upon notice was not inconsistent with the contract being one for services.

Graham v. Minister for Industry & Commerce [1933] I.R. 156 approved.

5. That in the circumstances the respondent's contract was a contract for services and accordingly assessable to income tax under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts.

Case stated.

The respondent was assessed for income tax under Schedule E of the Income Tax Act, 1967, for the years 1978/79 to 1981/82 inclusive. He appealed against these assessments contending that he was employed under a contract for services; that accordingly he was an independent contractor and not an employee and should have been assessed under Schedule D, Case 1 as a self-employed person. The appeal was heard by the Circuit Court (His Honour Judge O'Malley) on the 2nd November, 1984, and the 26th April, 1985. The appeal was allowed and at the request of the appellant Judge O'Malley on the 9th January, 1988, stated a case pursuant to ss. 428 and 430 of the Income Tax Act, 1967, for the opinion of the High Court. The question in the case stated is set out in the headnote supra and the relevant facts stated are set out in the judgment of Blayney J., post.

The case stated was heard by the High Court (Blayney J.) on the 4th and 7th April, 1988.

Ercus Stewart S.C. (with him Carroll Moran) for the appellant.

Daniel O'Keeffe S.C. (with him Patrick Quinn) for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Blayney J. 21st April, 1988

This is a case stated for the opinion of the High Court by His Honour Judge Peter O'Malley pursuant to ss. 428 and 430 of the Income Tax Act, 1967. It raises a net issue which has frequently had to be considered by the courts, namely, whether a particular contract is a contract of service or a contract for services.

The contract in question is one entered into between the Minister for Social Welfare (to whom I shall refer as the Minister) and the respondent under which the respondent was appointed branch manager of the employment office, Tullamore, from the 24th April, 1978, upon the terms and conditions set out in a letter from the Department of Social Welfare dated the 20th March, 1978.

The appellant treated the contract as making the respondent a servant of the Minister and assessed him for income tax under Schedule E, and the department deducted tax under P.A.Y.E. from all emoluments paid to the respondent in the years 1978/79 to 1981/82 inclusive.

The respondent appealed against the assessments contending that his contract with the Minister was a contract for services; that accordingly he was an independent contractor and not an employee and should have been assessed under Schedule D, Case 1 as a self-employed person. The learned Circuit Court judge accepted this contention and at the request of the appellant he has stated this case for the opinion of the High Court. The question of law for the opinion of the court is whether the learned Circuit Court judge was correct in law in holding that "the respondent is engaged under a contract for services and therefore self-employed and assessable under Schedule D."

The contract between the respondent and the Minister is a written contract. It is contained in the letter of the 20th March, 1978, from the Department, to which I have already referred, and the form of acceptance dated the 28th March, 1978, signed by the respondent. In view of its being a written contract, it is not necessary to set out the case stated in full, as the court, in arriving at its decision, is confined to considering the terms of the contract. In Narich Property Ltd. v. Commissioner of Pay Roll Tax [1984] I.C.R. 286 (a decision of the Privy Council), where the issue was whether lecturers employed by the appellant were employed under a contract of service or were independent contractors, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, delivering the judgment of the court said at page 291:-

> "The judgment of the Judicial Committee in the A.M.P. case was delivered by Lord Fraser of Tullybelton and is authority for three principles of law applicable to a case of the present kind. The first principle is that, subject to one exception, where there is a written contract between the parties whose relationship is in issue, a court is confined, in determining the nature of that relationship, to a consideration of the terms, express or implied, of that contract in the light of the circumstances surrounding the making of it; and is not entitled to consider also the manner in which the parties subsequently acted in pursuance of such contract. The one exception to that rule is that, where the subsequent conduct of the parties can be shown to have amounted to an agreed addition to, or modification of, the original written contract, such conduct may be considered an taken into account by the court."

In my opinion that is a correct statement of the law. Where the agreement creating the relationship between the parties is expressed in writing, apart from circumstances giving rise to the exception referred to in the quotation (which are not present in this case), the entire agreement between the parties is to be found in the writing, so it is the unique source of their relationship; it follows that it is from its terms alone that the nature of the relationship can be determined.

The Department's letter of the 20th March, 1978, and the form of acceptance signed by the respondent are as follows:-

"20ú Marta 1978
Mr. Thomas B. Mooney
Ross Road,
Screggan,
Tullamore,
Co. Offaly

A Chara,
With reference to your application of 6th March, 1978, I am directed by the Minister for Social Welfare to offer you appointment as Branch Manager of the Employment Office, Tullamore from 24th April, 1978, upon the following terms and conditions:

(1) You will be paid:
  (a) a fixed allowance as Branch Manager of £3,055 a year in return for which you will be responsible for the work of the office while the numbers on the live register do not exceed an average of 100 per week in a four weekly period;
  (b) where the live register exceeds this figure an allowance for assistance by way of additional remuneration consisting of 14.4p per registrant for the first one thousand registrants in excess of the Branch Manager's quota of 400 in a four weekly period and 16.7p per registrant thereafter;
  (c) a premises allowance of £500 a year;
  (d) an annual leave allowance of £105 payable yearly in respect of a full year's service and pro rata in respect of shorter periods;
  (e) four pence for each unemployment benefit claim on the live register each week in respect of pay related benefit scheme;
  (f) five pence for each insurance card exchanged in excess of the first 200 cards each year.

  The remuneration attaching to the appointment is subject to review from time to time.

(2) The remuneration and allowances set out in preceding paragraphs will cover the provision by you of the following facilities and services which must be approved by the Department: viz.
  (a) Suitably furnished office accommodation of adequate size which must be fitted with counters and shelving and which forms no part of premises licensed for betting or for sale of intoxicants, the premises to be maintained in good order and condition both internally and externally;
  (b) the services of a competent deputy to be in regular attendance during the normal office hours as occasion may require, and
  (c) the provision of any clerical assistance which may be considered necessary for the efficient performance of the work of the Department.

(3) The appointment will be subject to three months written notice of termination given on either side without cause assigned, but in the event of your resignation without such notice or ceasing to perform your duties after such notice and before the expiration thereof, you will be liable for any expenses incurred by the Department in making alternative arrangements for the performance of your duties and without prejudice to any other remedy in respect of such expenses any sum due to you from the Department may be withheld towards meeting such expenses.

The Minister, however, reserves to himself the power to terminate without cause assigned the appointment either summarily or by such notice as he may think fit in any circumstances whatsoever which in his opinion, render this course expedient either by reason of the requirements or exigencies of the Public Service or otherwise in the public interest.

The Minister also reserves to himself the right to suspend from duty and pay without cause assigned the holder of the appointment in any circumstances whatsoever which, in his opinion, render this course expedient either by reason of the requirements or exigencies of the Public Service or otherwise in the public interest.

(4) Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing paragraphs, the Minister reserves to himself the power to reduce or vary at any time after due notice, the amount of remuneration payable.

(5) The duties will be as set out in the accompanying schedule subject to such variations as may be made by the Department from time to time and must be performed in accordance with the instructions of the Department.

(6) The office must be open from 10 a.m. to 12 noon and 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. on Mondays to Fridays inclusive. These hours are, however, liable to modification by the Department. The office must be available during the ordinary office hours as occasion may require for the use of an officer or officers of the Department in connection with any of his or their official duties.

(7) It is a condition of your appointment that:

(a) you will be responsible for the safe custody of any public monies with which you are entrusted and you must account for all such monies received and paid on behalf of the Department of Social Welfare and the Department of Labour in such manner as may from time to time be prescribed;

(b) you shall make arrangements for the lodgment with the Department of a fidelity guarantee bond in the sum of two hundred pounds (£200) effected with a company approved for this purpose. A specimen form of guarantee is attached;

(c) you shall not serve on or accept membership of any public body while holding office under this Department.

If you are willing to accept appointment on these terms as from the date mentioned you should complete the enclosed Form of Acceptance and send it to this section by return. Arrangements for your installation as Branch Manager on 24th April, 1978, at the premises provided by you will then be made.
Mise le meas,

Schedule of duties of branch managers

The Branch Manager will be required to act generally as the agent of the Department of Social Welfare in the District served by the Employment Office.
The duties of the office will be as follows:

(1) To issue insurance cards to persons insurable under the Social Welfare Acts and wet-time books to persons insurable under the Insurance (Intermittent Unemployment) Act, 1942, and to exchange insurance cards and wet-time books as required.
(2) To receive applications for qualification certificates under the Unemployment Assistance Acts.
(3) To receive claims for unemployment benefit, redundancy payments, applications for unemployment assistance and to take all necessary action thereon in accordance with instructions. To receive claims for pay related benefit and to take all necessary action thereon in accordance with instructions.
(4) To receive in the prescribed manner evidence of unemployment.
(5) To make payment of unemployment benefit, pay-related benefit, redundancy payments, and unemployment assistance in accordance with instructions.
(6) To register the requirements of employers desiring work people and work people desiring employment, to place the one in touch with the other, to exhibit particulars of vacancies and to keep such records as may be required by the Department.
(7) To account for all monies received and paid on behalf of the Department of Social Welfare and the Department of Labour in such manner as may from time to time be prescribed.
(8) To make all necessary arrangements for the safe custody of any public monies wherewith entrusted e.g., by securely locking up such monies in a safe or otherwise.
(9) To complete statistical returns, conduct correspondence, exhibit and distribute forms and notices and generally to perform such duties as may be required by the Department.

As the contract has to be considered in the light of the circumstances surrounding the making of it, it is relevant also to set out the following paragraph from the case stated which figured among the facts proved or admitted:

"2. (j) Branch Managers were first introduced to this country in or about 1911 under the 1909 Labour Exchange Act. They were appointed to pay out social insurance and after the 1933 Unemployment Assistance Act, to pay out unemployment assistance. There has been no major change in their functions since their introduction and to this day they carry out this function on behalf of the Minister. Various different schemes have been introduced down through the years, including fuel vouchers, butter vouchers, pay related benefit etc. but their basic function has remained unaltered viz. to pay out monies on behalf of either the Minister for Labour or the Minister for Social Welfare. The number of Branch Managers has remained remarkably constant except in 1933 when the numbers were increased because of the introduction of unemployment assistance. They were set up, in the main, in rural areas where it would have been too costly to set up a District Office of the parent Department staffed by Civil Servants."

What is the test or tests to be applied in determining whether a contract is one of service or for services? There was no real disagreement between counsel as to this. The dispute centred rather on the application of the law to the respondent's contract.

The first test is the extent and degree of control exercised by the employer. In Roche v. P. Kelly Limited [1969] I.R. 100 Walsh J. said in his judgment at page 108:-

> "While many ingredients may be present in the relationship of master and servant, it is undoubtedly true that the principal one, and almost invariably the determining one, is the fact of the master's right to direct the servant not merely as to what is to be done but as to how it is to be done. The fact that the master does not exercise that right, as distinct from possessing it, is of no weight if he has the right."

In Market Investigations Ltd. v. Minister for Social Security [1969] 2 Q.B. 173, a decision of the High Court in England, which was heavily relied upon by the appellant, Cooke J. said in his judgment at pp. 184 and 185:-

> "The observations of Lord Wright, of Denning L.J. and of the judges of the Supreme Court [in the U.S.A.] suggest that the fundamental test to be applied is this: 'Is the person who has engaged himself to perform these services performing them as a person in business on his own account?' If the answer to that question is 'yes', then the contract is a contract for services. If the answer is 'no', then the contract is a contract of service. No exhaustive list has been compiled and perhaps no exhaustive list can be compiled of the considerations which are relevant in determining that question, nor can strict rules be laid down as to the relative weight which the various considerations should carry in particular cases. The most that can be said is that control will no doubt always have to be considered, although it can no longer be regarded as the sole determining factor; and that factors which may be of importance are such matters as whether the man performing the services provides his own equipment, whether he hires his own helpers, what degree of financial risk he takes, what degree of responsibility for investment and management he has, and whether and how far he has an opportunity of profiting from sound management in the performance of his task.
> The application of the general test may be easier in a case where the person who engages himself to perform the services does so in the course of an already established business of his own; but this factor is not decisive, and a person who engages himself to perform services for another may well be an independent contractor even though he has not entered into the contract in the course of an existing business carried on by him."

In McDermott v. Loy (Unreported, High Court, Barron J., 29th July, 1982) this passage was cited to Barron J. and it was submitted that he should apply the test referred to in it. He commented on it as follows:-

> "It seems to me that the test really has not changed. When the question was asked, who decides what the work is to be and when and where it is to be done, it seems to me that the purpose was to determine whether the employee was working for someone else or for himself. This is the basis upon which Graham v. Minister for Industry and Commerce [1933] I.R. 156 was decided. The Court was satisfied with the evidence that the plaintiff had been working for himself as a building contractor."

I respectfully agree with Barron J.'s comments. It seems to me that to ask the question whether the person is engaged in business on his own account is to approach the issue from a different angle rather than to lay down a wholly new test.

A further test, which was referred to by the respondent, is also relevant on the facts of this case. It arises from the nature of a contract of service. In Ready Mixed Concrete v. Minister of Pensions [1968] 2 Q.B. 497, MacKenna J. at page 515 defined a contract of service as follows:-

> "A contract of service exists if these three conditions are fulfilled. (i) The servant agrees that in consideration of a wage or other remuneration he will provide his own work and skill in the performance of some service for his master. (ii) He agrees, expressly or impliedly, that in the performance of that service he will be subject to the other's control in a sufficient degree to make that other master. (iii) The other provisions of the contract are consistent with its being a contract of service."

It is to the first of these three conditions that I wish to draw attention. For the contract to be one of service, the contracting party must agree to provide his own work and skill in the performance of some service.

The next step is to apply these tests to the contract entered into between the respondent and the Minister but, before doing so, it is necessary to summarise its provisions and to see if, independently of these tests, any inferences can be drawn from them. In summarising the contract I will adhere closely to the terminology used in it as it seems to me to be of considerable importance in determining its effect.

Under the contract the respondent is appointed branch manager of the employment office, Tullamore, on the 24th April, 1978. His remuneration consists of certain allowances and certain fixed fees related to the volume of work to be performed and it may be reduced or varied from time to time by the Minister. He must provide and furnish his own premises and employ a competent deputy and such clerical assistance as may be necessary, both the premises and any employees having to be approved by the Department. His appointment is subject to three months' notice of termination on either side. His duties, which are subject to variation, are clearly defined. The days and hours during which the office must be open are stipulated. The manager is responsible for the safe custody of public monies and has to take out a fidelity guarantee bond in the sum of £200. He may not serve or accept membership of any public body while holding office.

In the context of the relationship it creates between the parties, the following appear to me to be the most important features of the contract:

1. The respondent is not obliged to perform any of the work personally.
2. He is required to provide and furnish the office premises and employ a competent deputy and any clerical assistance which may be necessary.

3. His remuneration is not described as wages or salary; it is made up of allowances together with other payments related to the volume of work to be done.
4. The remuneration may be varied without the agreement of the respondent.
5. Clause 2 of the terms and conditions refer expressly to the remuneration and allowances covering the "provision" by the respondent of certain "facilities and services", so part of the contract requires the provision of services by the respondent.

In my opinion these features are inconsistent with the contract being one of service - they all point rather to its being one for services, in particular the absence of any requirement to perform the work personally and the obligation to provide and furnish the premises in which the work is to be performed. Both these features suggest that the respondent is an independent contractor. So even before the accepted tests are applied it seems to me that a conclusion can be reached on a consideration of the terms of the contract alone.

And when the tests are applied, in my opinion this conclusion is confirmed. Firstly, the test as to the degree and extent of the control exercised by the Minister. While he clearly lays down in the contract what is to be done, he does not direct how it is to be done except in certain instances when things are to be done in accordance with instructions, nor does he direct when the work is to be done except that the office is to be open during specified hours from Monday to Friday inclusive. For example, one of the duties of the respondent is

> "To register the requirements of employers desiring work people and work people desiring employment, to place the one in touch with the other, to exhibit particulars of vacancies and to keep such records as may be required by the Department."

But it is nowhere stated how employers desiring work people and work people desiring employment are to be put in touch with one another - whether it is to be done by letter, by telephone, by personal introduction etc. This is left to the discretion of the respondent. Also the manner in which particulars of vacancies are to be exhibited. Another duty of the respondent is to keep certain records and prepare certain accounts, but there is no requirement as to when this work is to be done.

It was submitted on behalf of the appellant that the Minister exercised the necessary control by reason of the fact that the deputy employed by the respondent and any clerical assistance have to be approved by the Department. But the control given by the requirement to have the Department's approval is minimal. Once a deputy or a clerk has been approved, he is then in the employment of the respondent and under his control. It is he who decides what hours are to be worked in addition to the hours during which the office has to be kept open, and how any work is to be done in respect of which there are no express instructions from the Department. So the fact that the Department has to approve of their appointment is of little significance in regard to how or when they do their work.

It was also submitted by the appellant that the fact that the Minister can terminate the contract on three months' notice is inconsistant with its being a contract for services. I reject that submission. In Graham v. Minister for Industry and Commerce [1933] I.R. 156, Fitzgibbon J. rejected a similar submission. He said in his judgment at page 162:

"Now, it is true that the power of dismissal is inherent in the relationship of master and servant, but it is equally true that in many cases the person who has engaged a contractor to carry out a particular piece of work has power to determine the contract if the contractor is inefficient or negligent, and I cannot see that this power to determine the contract necessarily makes the contractor the servant of the person with whom he had made the contract."

The second test to be applied is whether the respondent is in business on his own account. In my opinion he is. I have no doubt that he is running a business, the nature of the business being to provide a particular service for the Minister. His profit is the amount by which his remuneration exceeds his expenses; the lower he can keep his expenses the greater his profit. If he employs no one other than a deputy, and does a substantial amount of the work himself, his profit will be much greater than if he does little of the work himself and employs another person to do it instead. Similarly, the amount of his profit will also depend on how much rent he has to pay for his premises, and how well he succeeds in keeping down his other expenses. All these matters require management decisions and in making them the respondent is working for himself and not for the Minister. So it seems to me that he is clearly in business on his own account as the profit he makes from the contract depends on how he decides to perform the work which has to be done.

Finally, there is the test from the definition of a contract of service, that one of the conditions to be satisfied is that the contracting party agrees to provide his own work and skill. In my opinion it is clear that the contract here does not satisfy that condition. There is no obligation on the respondent to carry out any of the work personally. It was submitted on behalf of the appellant that the respondent's job was a supervising regulatory one; that the responsibility for getting the work done was the job itself, and that the respondent undertook this personally. In my opinion this submission does not accord with the facts and in order to see this it is only necessary to refer to the schedule entitled "Schedule of Duties of Branch Manager" attached to the letter of the 20th March, 1978. It sets out in detail the "duties of the office", and it is clear that what it imposed on the respondent is the obligation to do these specific things, not simply the responsibility of seeing that they are done. In my opinion he has a contractual obligation to carry out these duties but he is not obliged to carry them out personally so the element of the respondent providing his own work and skill is absent and because of this the contract is not one of service.

I was referred by the respondent to Hitchcock v. Post Office [1980] I.C.R. 100 a decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal in England, in which it was decided that a sub postmaster was an independent contractor and not a servant. One of the features to which the Tribunal considered that great importance should be attached was that "the applicant provided the premises and a certain amount of the equipment at his own expense" (p. 108). This is also an important feature in the present case. The respondent is required to provide "suitable furnished office accommodation", which means that not only must he provide the premises, but he must also furnish them, and since what is being furnished is an office, the furniture would obviously include any typewriters, calculators, safes or other office equipment which might be necessary. The provision of the premises and of such equipment is in my opinion inconsistent with the contract being one of service.

In my opinion a consideration of the terms of the contract leads to a preliminary conclusion that it is a contract for services, and this conclusion is confirmed when its terms are considered in the light of the accepted tests. I am satisfied accordingly that the learned Circuit Court judge was correct in holding that "the respondent is engaged under a contract for services and therefore self-employed and assessable under Schedule D."

In the matter of the Equal Status Acts 2000 to 2011 and in the matter of G., Appellant v. The Department of Social Protection, Respondent [2015] IEHC 419, [2012 No. 150 CA]

High Court 7th July, 2015

Equality – Equal status – Discrimination – Social welfare payments – Entitlement – Surrogacy – Definition of mother – Refusal to allow mother of surrogate child non-statutory payment following birth of child – Gender discrimination – Less favourable treatment on one or more of statutory grounds – Statute – Interpretation – Remedial social statutes – Whether open to court to make finding of unlawfulness in one statute on basis of policy of another – Whether payment of allowance service within meaning of Act – Whether making non-statutory payments to women in appellant's position ultra vires – Whether Equal Status Act capable of filling lacuna in law regarding surrogacy – Equal Status Act 2000 (No. 8), ss. 2, 3, 4, 5, 14 and 28.

The appellant suffered from a disability as a result of which she was unable to support a pregnancy. She and her husband made an arrangement in a foreign jurisdiction with a surrogate mother, who carried the gametes of both, and subsequently gave birth. In accordance with the law of that state on surrogacy, the appellant and her husband were registered as parents of the child on the birth certificate. They did not seek to adopt the child in Ireland.

The respondent administered a range of social insurance and social assistance income support schemes. Following inquiries the respondent advised the appellant that she would have no entitlement to either maternity leave or maternity benefit under current legislation. The respondent refused to grant a discretionary payment comparable to that of a working adoptive mother, saying that to make a payment outside the statutory framework would have been ultra vires.

The appellant brought a claim of discrimination under the Equal Status Act 2000 to the Equality Tribunal. While accepting that she could not comply with the statutory regulations for maternity or adoptive benefit, she submitted that she was comparable to both a working natural mother and a working adoptive mother. The claim was dismissed by the Equality Tribunal and that decision was affirmed on appeal by the Circuit Court (Her Honour Judge Lindsay), which found that the appellant had not been treated less favourably within the meaning of the Act of 2000, and that any special provision made by the respondent would have been ultra vires its statutory powers.

On appeal on a point of law to the High Court the appellant argued that the trial judge erred in drawing the following conclusions: that her complaint fell outside the scope of the Act of 2000 because there was no legislative regulation of surrogacy in Ireland and because surrogacy had not been envisaged when the Act of 2000 became law; that she had not been less favourably treated within the meaning of the Act of 2000; and that making any special provision would be ultra vires the powers of the respondent.

Held by the High Court (O'Malley J.), in dismissing the appeal, 1, that two categories of mother were recognised under Irish law, mothers who had given birth and mothers who had adopted a child. Both categories were entitled to social welfare payments under qualification conditions that related directly to the legal status of motherhood. The appellant could not claim the status of mother under Irish law and could not, for the purposes of a claim of discrimination, choose to compare herself directly with those two categories.

M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60, [2014] 3 I.R. 533 applied.

2. That where a woman did not meet the statutory qualification conditions for maternity or adoptive benefit, a claim to be legally entitled to compensation for the refusal to grant an equivalent non-statutory payment necessarily involved a claim that she had been subjected to a legal wrong. In the particular circumstances, a legal wrong could only be established on the assumption that one statute was held to be legally deficient by reference to another.

3. That since social welfare legislation and the Act of 2000 both embodied policy choices made by the legislature, it was not open to a court to make a finding of unlawfulness in one on the basis of the policy of the other. Pending the introduction of legislation dealing with surrogacy, it was not for the courts to attempt to resolve the complex questions that needed to be addressed, nor could the Act of 2000 be used to fill the gap.

4. That the respondent provided a service within the meaning of the Act of 2000 comprised of the administration or operation of the statutory code of benefits and allowances provided for under the Social Welfare Acts, and other non-statutory payment schemes.

5. That as the Social Welfare Acts did not prohibit the making of non-statutory payments, a scheme to make provision for women in the appellant's position would not have been ultra vires the powers of the respondent, so long as such a scheme was consistent with appropriate public policy objectives and assessments.

6. That for a complainant to show, by reference to one or more of the statutory grounds upon which discrimination was prohibited under the Act of 2000, that he or she was treated less favourably than a person to whom those grounds did not apply, it was not necessary to prove actual intent to discriminate on that ground.

7. That the Act of 2000 was intended to cover a broad range of human life and activity; that its overall purpose was to reduce the social wrong of discrimination based on improper considerations. As a remedial statute, it had to be liberally construed and could have been relied upon in relation to novel factual situations, such as surrogacy arrangements, not familiar to the legislature at the time of enactment.

Obiter dictum: That since no man could qualify for either maternity leave or adoptive leave payments in any circumstances, a claim of gender discrimination by the appellant was not tenable.

Appeal from the Circuit Court

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of O'Malley J., infra.

The appellant appealed to the High Court on a point of law pursuant to s. 28 of the Act of 2000 from a decision of the Circuit Court made by Her Honour Judge Lindsay on the 5th July, 2012. The matter had come to the Circuit Court by way of appeal from a decision of the Equality Tribunal of the 18th November, 2011 (see DEC-S2011-0530).

The appeal was heard by the High Court (O'Malley J.) on the 5th and 6th December, 2013, and the 1st April, 2014.

Nuala Butler S.C. (with her Patrick Dillon-Malone S.C.) for the appellant.

Gerard Durcan S.C. (with him Cathy Smith) for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

O'Malley J. 7th July, 2015

Introduction

[1] This appeal concerns a claim of discrimination, on grounds of disability, gender and family status, in the context of the birth of a child by a surrogacy arrangement. The appellant in the case says that she is the genetic mother and primary carer of a child born as the result of a surrogacy arrangement necessitated by her medical condition. She did not qualify for either maternity benefit (not having been pregnant and given birth) or adoptive benefit (since, being the registered mother of the child on its birth certificate, she has not sought to adopt it). Her claim is that she has been discriminated against by virtue of the respondent's refusal to grant her a payment equivalent to those benefits. The case turns on the correct interpretation of the relevant anti-discrimination legislation.

[2] The appeal is against the order of the Circuit Court (Her Honour Judge Lindsay) made on the 5th July, 2012, upholding a decision of the Equality Tribunal that the complaint of the appellant fell outside the scope of the Equal Status Act 2000 as amended ("the Act of 2000").

Background facts

[3] In 2006, the appellant was diagnosed with cervical cancer while pregnant. She had to undergo a hysterectomy, as a result of which she is unable to support a pregnancy. It is common case that her condition is a disability within the meaning of s. 2 of the Act of 2000, which includes in the definition of disability "the total or partial absence of a person's bodily or mental functions, including the absence of a part of a person's body". The appellant is otherwise fertile as is her husband.

[4] The appellant and her husband subsequently entered into a surrogacy arrangement in a foreign jurisdiction. The arrangement complied with the law of that state, which provides for detailed regulation of surrogate pregnancies and births. The gametes of both the appellant and her husband were carried by the surrogate mother, who gave birth to a baby in January, 2011. The appellant and her husband are the registered parents of the child under the law of the state in question, while the surrogate mother is not identified on the child's birth certificate.

[5] Some months before the birth, the appellant made inquiries of the respondent as to the availability of maternity leave. She was informed that, under current legislation, she would have no statutory entitlement to maternity leave and, as a result, no entitlement to maternity benefit.

[6] An application to the appellant's employer for special leave from her employment (equivalent to that available for adoptive leave) after the birth of the child was successful insofar as the employer was happy to grant the leave, but it could not offer paid maternity leave and told her that she would have to seek payment for such leave from the respondent directly.

[7] On the 6th January, 2011, the Equality Authority wrote, on the appellant's behalf, to the respondent, requesting it to use its discretion to give a payment for leave comparable to that of a working adoptive mother. It was acknowledged that the type of leave being granted by the employer had no statutory basis such as that set out in either adoption or maternity protection legislation. The case made was that the appellant was entitled not to be discriminated against by virtue of the Employment Equality Act 1998 (in particular ss. 2, 6 and 8) and the Act of 2000. The payment was sought on the basis that it was available to every other working mother who had a child either naturally or by adoption.

[8] On the 20th January, 2011, the respondent replied, setting out the qualification conditions for adoptive benefit and maternity benefit. Adoptive benefit required, inter alia, proof of adoption by way of a certificate of placement or a declaration of suitability issued by An Bord Uchtála. Eligibility for maternity benefit required certification by a medical practitioner as to the confinement of the mother. In the circumstances, neither benefit was payable, and to make a payment outside the statutory framework would, according to the respondent, be ultra vires.

[9] On the 15th March, 2011, a notification was sent to the respondent, in the form prescribed by the Act of 2000, setting out the basis on which the appellant considered herself to be treated less favourably than others contrary to the Act of 2000. The appellant said that, as she had neither given birth to nor adopted her child, she could not comply with the statutory regulations for maternity or adoptive benefit. She was, however, a mother with a newborn child to care for and she submitted that she was comparable to both a working natural mother and a working adoptive mother.

[10] The notification invoked the rights of the appellant under Article 41 of the Constitution (the obligation of the State to protect the family, the importance of the life of women within the home and the obligation of the State to ensure that mothers are not obliged by economic necessity to work outside the home).

[11] On the 22nd March, 2011, the respondent replied, stating that its earlier correspondence did not constitute a formal disqualification for benefit, as no formal application had been received from the appellant for either maternity benefit or adoptive benefit. It was suggested that it was open to the appellant to lodge a late claim for these benefits. The letter also suggested that the appellant could contact her local community welfare officer and apply for supplementary welfare allowance.

[12] In response, it was pointed out that any application for either benefit would have to fail. The appellant had not been pregnant and did not give birth, and so could not obtain the requisite certificates from her employer and a medical practitioner. She and her husband had not adopted their child but were registered as its birth parents in accordance with the law of the state where the child was born. Nor was she eligible for supplementary welfare, since she was on leave from her employment. What she was seeking was a payment equivalent to the statutory benefits provided to natural and adoptive mothers.

[13] The respondent replied by letter dated the 11th May, 2011, reiterating that it could not act outside the legislation, and that a decision could not be made in the absence of any claim for a benefit or other payment.

[14] Separately, the appellant's employer informed the respondent on the 8th June, 2011, that it considered the application for maternity benefit to be the appropriate application and filled in this form without completing the section in relation to certification.

The statutory context

[16] Section 2(1) of the Act of 2000 defines the concept of a "service" as follows:-

> "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires –
>
> … 'service' means a service or facility of any nature which is available to the public generally or a section of the public, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing, includes –
>
> (a) access to and use of any place,
>
> (b) facilities for –
>
> i. banking, insurance, grants, loans, credit or financing,
>
> ii. entertainment, recreation or refreshment,
>
> iii. cultural activities, or

iv. transport or travel.

(c) a service or facility provided by a club …

(d) a professional or trade service, but does not include pension rights (within the meaning of the Employment Equality Act, 1998) or a service or facility in relation to which that Act applies."

[17] Section 3 (as amended by the Equality Act 2004) provides in relevant part as follows:-

"(1) For the purpose of this Act discrimination shall be taken to occur –

(a) where a person is treated less favourably than another person is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation on any of the grounds specified in subsection (2) (in this Act referred to as the 'discriminatory grounds') which –

(i) exists,

(ii) existed but no longer exists,

(iii) may exist in the future, or

(iv) is imputed to the person concerned …

(c) where an apparently neutral provision puts a person referred to in any paragraph of section 3(2) at a particular disadvantage compared with other persons, unless the provision is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary."

[18] Discrimination under s. 3(1)(a) is generally referred to as "direct discrimination", while s. 3(1)(c) is regarded as "indirect discrimination".

[19] "Provision" is defined in s. 2 (as amended) as meaning:-

"a term in a contract or a requirement, criterion, practice, regime, policy or condition affecting a person."

[20] The discriminatory grounds relied on in this case are set out in s. 3(2) and arise, as between any two persons, on the basis:-

(a) that one is male and the other is female (the "gender" ground), […]

(c) that one has family status and the other does not or has a different family status … (the "family status" ground) [and]

(g) that one is a person with a disability and the other either is not or is a person with a different disability (the "disability" ground).

[21] "Family status", for the purposes of this case, means being pregnant or having responsibility, as a parent or as a person in loco parentis, in relation to a person who has not attained the age of 18 years.

[22] Section 4(1) deals with the requirement to provide "reasonable accommodation" in the context of disability as follows:-

> "For the purposes of this Act discrimination includes a refusal or failure by the provider of a service to do all that is reasonable to accommodate the needs of a person with a disability by providing special treatment or facilities, if without such special treatment or facilities it would be impossible or unduly difficult for the person to avail himself or herself of the service."

[23] "Refusal" includes a deliberate omission. A refusal or a failure to provide the special treatment or facilities in question will not be deemed reasonable unless such provision would give rise to a cost, other than a nominal cost.

[24] Section 5(1) of the Act of 2000 prohibits discrimination in the following terms:-

> "A person shall not discriminate in disposing of goods to the public generally or a section of the public or in providing a service, whether the disposal or provision is for consideration or otherwise and whether the service provided can be availed of only by a section of the public."

[25] Section 14(1) provides that nothing in the Act of 2000 is to be construed as prohibiting, inter alia, the taking of any action required by or under any enactment (including measures under European Union law).

The complaint to the Equality Tribunal

[26] The appellant's complaint alleged unlawful discrimination on the grounds of disability (including a failure to provide reasonable accommodation), family status and gender, contrary to s. 5(1) of the Act of 2000.

[27] The case in relation to the appellant's disability was based on the fact that, by reason of her medical condition, she could not have a family by natural means. In relation to family status, she argued (without prejudice to her contention that, as a matter of law, she was the mother of the child) that she was at least in the position of being in loco parentis, but was being treated differently from other women responsible for newborn children. On the gender issue, it was submitted that her situation was such as could only arise in respect of a woman.

[28] It was submitted that because of the manner of the child's birth, the appellant was unable to fulfil the strict conditions of the statutory regime. In respect of the maternity benefit, the appellant was unable to obtain a medical certificate of pregnancy because she was not, and could not become, pregnant. In respect of adoptive leave, the appellant could not obtain evidence of adoption because she did not adopt her child. It was stressed that:-

a. she was the biological and genetic mother of the child and, like natural and adoptive mothers, she was primarily responsible for the care and nurture of the baby during the post-natal period;
b. her employer granted her leave in connection with the birth of her child; and
c. she fulfilled the relevant PRSI contribution conditions under the statutory scheme.

[29] The appellant therefore argued that she had been treated less favourably than mothers in a comparable position who are deemed eligible to benefit under the Maternity Protection Acts and the Adoptive Leave Acts. It was submitted that this had caused financial strain and distress to her and her family.

[30] It was also contended that the respondent had failed to provide her with reasonable accommodation in accordance with s. 4(1) of the Act of 2000 insofar as there had been a failure or refusal to do all that was reasonable to accommodate the appellant's needs, by providing special treatment or facilities, in circumstance where without such special treatment or facilities it was impossible for her to avail of the service provided by the respondent.

[31] The appellant argued that the primary consideration underlying the statutory regime was the facilitation of full-time care of the child by his or her primary carer during the critical period of time following his or her introduction to the family. This was said to be a reflection of the importance attached by the State to the special bond created between the child and the primary carer at this time.

[32] The respondent submitted that statutory schemes such as maternity and adoptive leave were not "services" within the meaning of the Act of 2000. It was therefore argued that the service sought by the appellant did not exist, and that she was expressly seeking a benefit to be extended to her on a discretionary basis, thereby asking the Tribunal to create a new statutory entitlement. It was submitted that it was not within the respondent's power to offer a discretionary payment.

[33] The respondent also contended that the complaint raised issues of constitutional law relating to the definition of motherhood, which lay outside the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.

Decision of the Equality Officer

[34] In a decision issued on the 18th November, 2011, the Equality Officer dismissed the appellant's complaint [see decision number DEC-S2011-053].

[35] Referring to the burden of proof under the Act of 2000, the officer noted that it was for the complainant to set up, in the first instance, a prima facie case by establishing facts upon which she could rely in asserting that she had suffered discriminatory treatment.

[36] The Equality Officer did not accept the respondent's submission that the statutory schemes administered by it were not services, ruling that s. 2(1) of the Act of 2000 did not set out an exhaustive list of services and that financial services or facilities were clearly contemplated. However, she went on:-

> "5.2 … I do accept that the language used in 'available to the public or a section of the public' is clear using everyday language and therefore, in the context of statutory entitlements, applies to actual schemes that are in place. It is clear that the service that the complainant is seeking – maternity leave for a mother who has not carried her own child or adoptive leave for a person who has not adopted her child – does not exist in the statutory scheme and therefore this Tribunal has to find that the complainant has not been refused such a service within the meaning of these Acts.
> 5.3 I accept that the facts of this case do present a compelling complaint. However, I find that the Irish legal system operates a default legal assumption that the person giving birth to a child is the child's legal mother. There is no legal recognition of surrogacy in this jurisdiction and it is clear that this is a matter that will raise a number of complex issues for the legislature to consider in due course. These considerations are not, however, a matter for this Tribunal with its limited jurisdiction. I find that almost all legislation addressed to the regulation of society resorts to some form of classification and such can be used as a classification of inclusion or exclusion for various legislative purposes. There is nothing, in accordance with section 14(1) of these Acts that entitles this Tribunal to find such classification as invidious, unfair or discriminatory. In deciding, as a matter of policy, to establish a special scheme for Maternity and Adoptive Leave, the Oireachtas necessarily had to define the scope and limits of its application. I am satisfied that the definitions currently contained in the statutes do not recognise the situation that the complainant finds herself in and in such circumstances the respondent had no option but to turn down her application."

[37] On the issue of reasonable accommodation, the Equality Officer found that to offer to the appellant special treatment by way of making a payment to her would have been ultra vires the powers conferred upon the respondent by statute.

Decision of the Circuit Court

[38] The hearing before the Circuit Court appears to have been conducted on the basis of the same arguments as those put before the Equality Officer. The decision of Her Honour Judge Lindsay, delivered on the 5th July, 2012, affirmed the finding of that officer.

[39] The judge approached the matter on the basis that she had firstly to decide whether the appellant had a disability. Finding that she had, the next issue was whether there had been discrimination. The test was formulated as follows:-

> "Has the appellant been treated less favourably than a natural mother or an adoptive mother on the grounds that she is not able to have a child and yet she is now responsible for a child which has been born to a surrogate mother and to whom she is the biological mother?"

[40] In relation to the issue of reasonable accommodation she asked whether it was open to the Minister to make special arrangements, and whether not doing so was an act of discrimination:-

> "Therefore there are two matters that I must decide firstly was the appellant treated less favourably than another person is or would be treated in a comparable situation and secondly is it open to the Minister to make a special arrangement.
> The Minister in his defence has stated that he is administering a scheme, in other words a specific benefit for specific persons as is prescribed for him in the [Social Welfare Act 2005]."

[41] Having considered the long title of the Act of 2000, the judge found that the purpose of the legislation was to promote equality and prohibit discrimination:-

> "However, there is no legislative provision for surrogacy in Ireland. The appellant's situation was not envisaged when the Act [of 2000] became law. The Act is quite specific it covers situations where there is discrimination of those within the scope of the Act and not those outside it. Although there may be discrimination in the ordinary meaning of the word and the Minister's decision may seem unfair and unjust he is confined by the terms of the Act and any benefit given to the appellant would be ultra vires. He does have discretion to make a special provision … but to exercise this discretion would be beyond the defined scope of the Act."

[42] She therefore answered the questions posed by finding that the appellant had not been treated less favourably within the meaning of the Act of 2000 and that any action by the respondent by way of special provision would be outside the scope of the Act of 2000 and, accordingly, would be ultra vires.

Appeal to the High Court

[43] Under s. 28(3) of the Act of 2000, the appeal to this court is on a point of law only. There was, in any event, no dispute between the parties on any factual matter.

[44] The points of law raised on behalf of the appellant are pleaded as follows:-

a. that the trial judge erred in law in concluding that, because there is no legislative regulation of surrogacy in Ireland, the appellant's complaint did not come within the scope of the Act of 2000;
b. that the trial judge erred in law in concluding that, because surrogacy had not been envisaged when the Act of 2000 became law, the appellant's complaint did not come within the scope of the Act of 2000;
c. that the trial judge erred in law in the manner in which she concluded that the appellant had not been less favourably treated within the meaning of the Equal Status Acts 2000 to 2011; and
d. that the trial judge erred in law in the manner in which she concluded that the taking of any action by the respondent by way of special provision would be beyond the defined scope of the Act of 2000 and, consequently, ultra vires the powers of the respondents.

[45] The grounds pleaded in support of these propositions included a contention that the Circuit Court Judge had erred in identifying the issues as she did. It is argued that the correct approach is to ask, firstly, whether the appellant has been treated less favourably on a discriminatory ground; secondly, whether (in the case of disability) the appellant has been discriminated against by reason of the failure to make reasonable accommodation including the provision of special treatment or facilities; and thirdly, whether, in the event of a finding that discrimination has occurred, relief can be ordered against the Minister having regard, inter alia, to s. 14(1) of the Act of 2000.

[46] The suggestion is made that the Circuit Court Judge failed to engage with the central argument in the case:-

> "… namely that a discriminatory exclusion from the scope of [the Social Welfare Acts] may itself constitute discrimination within the meaning of the Equal Status Acts 2000 to 2011."

[47] In written submissions for the court, the parties adopted much the same arguments as they had at the earlier hearings. However, it became apparent during the hearing that the respondent had shifted position somewhat. It was now accepted that the respondent does provide a service, with the service in question being described as the operation of the statutory code for the provision of benefits and allowances. The focus of the respondent's case on this aspect moved to an argument that there had been, as a matter of law, no discrimination against the appellant. Reliance was placed on a number of United Kingdom authorities not previously referred to in submissions.

[48] As a matter of fairness, the court adjourned the hearing to give an opportunity to the appellant to consider and respond to this new line of argument. Further oral and written submissions were accordingly made. The appellant maintains an objection to permitting the respondent to put forward a wholly new argument not made at the previous hearings. She says that it was not seriously in dispute, before either the Equality Tribunal or the Circuit Court, that she had been treated less favourably and that the respondent should not be permitted to argue, in this the third stage of the process, that there was no discrimination.

[49] However, the appellant's supplemental submissions do engage with the merits of the respondent's arguments.

[50] The appellant also puts forward an alternative basis for her own case based on the concept of indirect discrimination. She says that at all times her case was that she had been discriminated against within the meaning of s. 3 of the Act of 2000 and that she is therefore entitled to make an argument based on s. 3(1)(c).

[51] The respondent, in turn, has objected to what is perceived as being a new argument, where the complaint at the earlier hearings had been based on a claim of direct discrimination.

[52] After the conclusion of the adjourned hearing, the Supreme Court delivered judgment in M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60, [2014] 3 I.R. 533 and this court afforded the parties an opportunity to file written submissions in relation thereto.

[53] This being an appeal on a point of law, the court has no jurisdiction to determine an issue of law not argued in the court below – see Vavasour v. Northside Centre for the Unemployed Ltd. [1995] 1 I.R. 450, recently approved by the Supreme Court in National Asset Management Agency v. Commissioner for Environmental Information [2015] IESC 51, [2015] 2 I.L.R.M. 165. However, as the latter judgment makes clear, the application of this principle may depend on the formulation of the issue by the parties.

Submissions on behalf of the appellant

[54] Counsel for the appellant says that the scheme as drawn up and as operated by the respondent is discriminatory. If that is so, then it is not an answer to her claim to say that she is not eligible under the scheme. There is no factor bringing the issue within the terms of s. 14 of the Act of 2000, since there is no statutory provision prohibiting the making of a payment to her.

[55] It is submitted that the burden on the appellant is to show that she has been discriminated against by reference to a person in a comparable – not identical – situation.

[56] The appellant compares herself with a mother who has given birth naturally and submits that if she did not suffer a disability and was able to support a pregnancy in the ordinary way, then, having regard to the fact that she fulfils all of the other relevant statutory conditions, there is no question but that she would be entitled to payment for maternity leave in accordance with the Maternity Protection Acts.

[57] It should be noted that in submissions it was maintained by the appellant (on the basis of the High Court decision in M.R. and D.R. v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2013] IEHC 91, [2013] 1 I.L.R.M. 449, and before the delivery of the Supreme Court judgments in that case) that she was the child's mother as a matter of law. However it is a core part of her case that she does not need to establish that status, since she is, in any event, in loco parentis.

[58] A comparison is also made with an adopting mother prevented through disability from producing gametes for gestational surrogacy. Like such an adopting mother, the appellant has not undergone pregnancy but she has responsibility for care of the child following its birth and on a permanent basis into the future. If the appellant's disability was that she was infertile, and her only possibility of becoming a mother was through the process of adoption, she would be entitled to payment for leave from employment under the Adoptive Leave Acts.

[59] The appellant relies on Murphy v. Slough Borough Council [2004] I.C.R. 1163 (also a case involving surrogacy, where the applicant had been refused paid leave by her employer) and the reasoning at p. 1173 therein of Silber J. in the Employment Appeal Tribunal:-

> "39 … the applicant has been treated less favourably than others who gave birth in the conventional way to their own children; 'the reason' for the treatment accorded to the applicant related to her disability, namely her inability to have children. For those reasons we consider that … the decision not to give the applicant paid leave was 'for a reason which relates to the disabled person's disability'".

[60] It is submitted that the court should adopt the line of reasoning followed in this case, which involves stepping back from the "immediate" (or "intermediate") reason (non-eligibility under the statutory criteria) and looking for the "ultimate" reason for the treatment of the complainant (the inability to meet the statutory criteria by reason of disability). However, it is also submitted that the court should treat other United Kingdom authorities on the issue with caution, noting that the legislation is not framed in the same terms.

[61] The appellant alleges that, contrary to s. 4 of the Act of 2000, the respondent has discriminated against her on the ground of disability insofar as it has refused or failed to do all that is reasonable to accommodate her needs by providing special treatment or facilities in circumstances where, without such special treatment or facilities, it is impossible for the appellant to avail of the service in question. The appellant's case is that the service provided by the respondent is payment for leave from employment upon becoming a mother.

[62] The appellant acknowledges the need for evidence of motherhood. In cases of natural birth or adoption this is provided, respectively, through medical certification of pregnancy or a certificate of placement. She submits that the refusal of the respondent to consider or accept alternative evidence of the condition of motherhood results in discrimination against her on account of her disability. In relation to the issue of reasonable accommodation, the appellant points to the fact of her insurance contributions and submits that to accommodate her within the payment regime would not impose any financial burden on the respondent additional to that which would apply if she were capable of pregnancy or had adopted a child. She says that by failing or refusing to find a suitable administrative arrangement which could accommodate her, the respondent has failed to give effect to the spirit of the statutory regime and to ensure full compliance with it.

[63] The fact that the respondent administers a large number of payment schemes without any statutory foundation is highlighted for the purpose of demonstrating that discretionary payments are not necessarily ultra vires the respondent. The schemes referred to deal with a disparate range of areas but, by way of example, the appellant points in particular to the Back to Education allowance. Eligibility for this scheme requires the applicant to be in receipt of jobseekers' benefit or allowance – but these are, under the statutory criteria, available only to persons seeking work. The terms of the scheme permit recipients to retain their benefit while in full-time education. It is, therefore, open to the respondent to put in place a non-statutory payment for a person who does not meet the criteria for the parallel statutory payment.

[64] The appellant emphasises in argument that her challenge does not have the consequence, as contended for by the respondent, of setting aside or invalidating an existing legislative choice. She submits that she is not seeking any broader finding than one to the effect that she has been discriminated against within the meaning of the Act of 2000.

[65] It is also contended that, contrary to the analysis and conclusion of the Circuit Court Judge in this case, the consideration that surrogacy arrangements of this kind may not have been contemplated when the Act of 2000 became law is an irrelevant and incorrect basis for holding that it could not be applicable. It is said that the Act of 2000 is intended to apply across a broad range of human activity, and that it does not matter whether a particular field has or has not already been made the subject of regulation.

[66] It is submitted that the issues giving rise to the situation under consideration affect the appellant only because she is a woman and that therefore she is discriminated against on the ground of gender.

[67] In relation to the "family status" aspect, the appellant submits that she is a person with responsibility for a person under 18 years of age and she is being treated less favourably than other persons with a different family status, in particular those who are or were pregnant and who are thus capable of carrying and giving birth to their children. Such persons are entitled to maternity benefit, but the appellant has no entitlement to that or any similar benefit such as adoptive benefit.

[68] In submissions relating to the applicability of s. (3)(1)(c), the appellant says that a condition (the requirement of certification of pregnancy or adoption) has been applied to her, by virtue of "an apparently neutral provision", with which, because of her disability, it is not possible to comply. She is therefore placed at "a particular disadvantage". On this argument, the consideration that other women who suffer from no disability might choose to avail of surrogacy has no relevance. Such women would be able, if they wished, to comply with the condition but she has no choice.

[69] Counsel for the appellant stresses that she does not seek to attack the validity of the social welfare provisions in question, or to interfere with the rights thereby accorded to other women, or to use the Act of 2000 as if it had the status of the Constitution. Nor does she ask the court to engage in a quasi legislative exercise. Even if the court finds that the respondent had no power to make a payment to the appellant, that does not mean that she is not entitled to redress for having been discriminated against. The Act of 2000 envisages an award of compensation where that has occurred.

Submissions on behalf of the respondent

[70] Counsel for the respondent started with the proposition that under Irish law the mother of a child is the woman who gave birth to it. The fact that the law of the state in which the child was born considers the appellant to be the mother does not alter that position.

[71] It is submitted that, as a government department, the respondent is bound by the Social Welfare Acts as enacted. The Minister must act within the four corners of the Acts, and there is no payment under them to which the applicant is entitled. Section 14 is applicable in this context.

[72] As already noted, the respondent, in this court, altered its previous position somewhat. It was accepted that a service is provided. However, where the appellant characterises the service in question as being the provision of payments for leave for mothers of newly born and newly adopted children, the respondent submits that the proper analysis is this: the respondent provides statutory benefits and allowances, in accordance with a statutory code. The "service" it provides is the operation of that code. The respondent says that the definition of the service is crucial, to avoid the risk that a court might end up ordering the provision of a new service. It is contended that that is, in reality, what the appellant is seeking.

[73] It is submitted that Irish law, as reflected in the legislation, supports mothers and adoptive mothers in particular circumstances. However there would be a policy choice involved in deciding to subvent persons who go through a surrogacy process. There are distinctions between the adoption and surrogacy processes – the former is subject to a clear statutory regime nationally and internationally, while the Oireachtas has made a choice not to make provision in relation to surrogacy.

[74] In answer to the suggestion that the Minister could set up a non-statutory scheme, counsel for the respondent said that there would have to be "considerable doubt" as to whether that would be lawful having regard to the choices already embodied in the legislation. Secondly, he pointed to the fact that the payments in question are benefits (as opposed to allowances), with entitlement being based on contributions. He suggested that it would be unfair to other contributors if any payments were made other than in accordance with statutory conditions.

[75] Counsel for the respondent then went on to deal with the submissions made by the appellant as to the proper approach to analysing a claim of discrimination. It is now submitted that the court should not adopt the reasoning in Murphy v. Slough Borough Council [2004] I.C.R. 1163. This is on the basis that the United Kingdom Employment Appeal Tribunal in that case was following the decision of the Court of Appeal of England and Wales in Clark v. TDG Ltd [1999] 2 All E.R. 977, which was subsequently criticised by the House of Lords in Lewisham LBC v. Malcolm [2008] UKHL 43, [2008] 1 A.C 1399, and is no longer good authority.

[76] In any event, it is submitted that the English authorities deal with "disability-related" discrimination, while the statutory definitions are different in this jurisdiction. When considering whether a person has been discriminated against within the meaning of s. 3 of the Act of 2000, the question is whether there was discrimination "on the ground of" disability, and that requires intent. The "reason" for the treatment must be the "fundamental reason" and must be discriminatory in itself. Here, the fundamental reason has nothing to do with disability, which is irrelevant to the decision that a woman with a child born through surrogacy is not eligible for a benefit. There is, therefore, no discrimination. The result can only be different if the Murphy v Slough Borough Council [2004] I.C.R. 1163 or Clark v. TDG Ltd. [1999] 2 All E.R. 977 line of analysis is followed, as opposed to Lewisham LBC v. Malcolm [2008] UKHL 43, [2008] 1 A.C 1399.

[77] The respondent contends that the appellant is not in a situation comparable in law with that of a woman who gives birth by way of pregnancy and confinement. This is because the latter is given special protection by both Irish and European Union law. Similarly, Irish law gives special protection to adoptive mothers, in circumstances where adoption is closely controlled by law. No such protection is afforded in surrogacy cases.

[78] It is not accepted that any question of discrimination on grounds of gender arises. It is possible for men to have children by surrogacy also, but in no circumstances would a man qualify for the statutory benefit.

[79] The argument in relation to family status is also rejected on the basis, again, that it was not the reason why the appellant could not obtain benefit. Any person exercising parental responsibility would be refused if the child came into his or her care on foot of a surrogacy process. The payment in all cases (for maternity benefit) is conditional on pregnancy and birth. There is no equivalent payment available to persons in loco parentis.

[80] Again, it is not accepted that the reason for refusal was the disability of the appellant, since any parent who has a child by surrogacy will be refused whether disabled or not. Therefore, the fundamental reason for the treatment was not the prohibited ground.

[81] On the question of "reasonable accommodation", the respondent says that the obligation is to take measures that will allow a disabled person access to existing benefits and that it cannot apply so as to require the provision of new ones. It is also inapplicable to a situation where the respondent is obliged to pay benefit to persons who meet the statutory criteria, and does not pay it to those who do not. This course of action is prescribed by statute, and the Act of 2000 cannot be relied upon to invalidate other legislation.

[82] The respondent says that the word "provision" as used in s. (3)(1)(c) cannot be interpreted to include a statutory provision which the Minister is obliged to implement, with the effect that it would be ignored or rendered inoperative if found to be discriminatory. The concept of indirect discrimination therefore has no application. To hold otherwise would be to breach the separation of powers, in that the court would in effect be legislating for rights which the Oireachtas has chosen not to create.

The Supreme Court decision in M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60

[83] The parties filed written submissions in relation to the Supreme Court judgments in M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60, [2014] 3 I.R. 533. This case concerned a claim that the genetic mother of two children born through a surrogacy arrangement should be officially registered, under the provisions of the Civil Registration Act 2004, as their mother. She succeeded in the High Court but the Supreme Court unanimously allowed the appeal, holding that the law as it stands does not permit of an interpretation of the word "mother" as meaning other than the woman who gave birth.

Submissions on M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60 on behalf of the respondent

[84] It is noted throughout the judgments that the Oireachtas has not to date legislated for surrogacy. The respondent submits that the same situation pertains in relation to any issue arising from a surrogate birth, including the payment of maternity benefit. It is submitted that the remedies sought before this court would result in the High Court "legislating" for such rights where the Oireachtas has not chosen to do so, and would involve a breach of the separation of powers. It is also submitted that the judgments make it clear that the courts must respect and implement the legislature's policy choices in this area.

[85] The respondent refers to the following extracts from the judgments.

[86] At pp. 567 and 568 Denham C.J. said:-

> "[111] There have been statutory developments in other jurisdictions to address issues which arise where there has been assisted human reproduction. Legislatures have recognised the need to address issues that now arise as a result of scientific and medical developments enabling children to be born in circumstances such as surrogacy.
> [112] Neither the Status of Children Act 1987 nor the Civil Registration Act 2004, nor any legislation in Ireland currently addresses the issues arising on surrogacy birth of children.
> [113] Any law on surrogacy affects the status and rights of persons, especially those of the children; it creates complex relationships and has a deep social content. It is, thus, quintessentially a matter for the Oireachtas."

[87] Clarke J. said at pp. 674 and 675:-

> "[406] … [T]he sole and exclusive executive power to make legislation under the Constitution is conferred on the Oireachtas (Article 15.2.1º). In that context there are limits to the extent to which it is constitutionally appropriate for the courts to engage in a reinterpretation of the common law where such interpretation might cross the line into legislation and, thus, infringe the constitutionally protected role of the Oireachtas. The application of underlying existing common law principles to new circumstances is one thing. The development of substantially new principles or policies is another.

[407] Thus, the way in which law can change is by means either of a legitimate and permissible evolution of existing common law principles to meet new circumstances and conditions as part of the inherent evolution of the common law, by express legislation, or by means of constitutionally mandated changes resulting from the role of the courts as interpreters of the Constitution..."

He continued at p. 675:-

"[408] … Short of the existing law being found to be in breach of the Constitution, the only proper role of the courts is to play their appropriate part in the evolution of the common law in its application to new conditions and circumstances or to interpret legislation. Even where it is clear that the existing law is no longer fit for purpose it may well be that the only solution lies in legislation. This will particularly be so where any solution to identified problems requires significant policy choices and detailed provisions beyond the scope of the legitimate role of the courts."

[88] MacMenamin J. said at pp. 720 and 721:-

"[543] Even at a time after the possibility of in vitro fertilization was thought of, the same implied understanding of 'mother' is to be found in statutory form. To take further examples s. 28(2) of the Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act 1981 (as amended by s. 19 of the Social Welfare Act 1992) provides:-

'(2) In deciding whether or not to make an order under section 21A of the Family Law (Maintenance of Spouses and Children) Act, 1976 (inserted by the Status of Children Act, 1987) in so far as any such order relates to the payment of expenses incidental to the birth of a child, the Circuit Court or the District Court, as the case may be, shall not take into consideration the fact that the mother of the child is entitled to maternity allowance" (emphasis added).

[544]While it might be said that this provision does not actually preclude another interpretation, it is not easy to ignore the statutory juxtapositions of the terms 'mother of the child' and 'birth of the child'.

[545] The link between motherhood and birth is also to be found in the Maternity Protection Acts 1994 to 2004, designed and intended to protect the rights of both pregnant employees, and employees who have given birth. Section 16 of the Act of 1994 (as amended by s. 10 of the Act of 2004) defines the 'mother' as a person 'who has been delivered of a living child'. The protection extended by the legislation again links or connects pregnancy, birth and motherhood (see also s. 6 of the Act of 2004). These close associations are difficult to ignore."

[89] The respondent concludes in written submissions that:-

"The decision in this case to grant maternity benefit to a woman who has given birth to a child but not to a woman who has a child by way of a surrogacy arrangement reflects and gives effect to the legislative choice and policy in this area. It follows a fundamental principle that the person who gives birth is in law the mother of the child and only she is entitled to benefits which accrue to a mother."

[90] The respondent submits that in light of these judgments it is not open to this court to interpret the relevant legislative provisions in a manner which gives rights to persons who have a child on foot of a surrogacy arrangement, when the Oireachtas has not to date chosen to confer such rights. To do so would be to legislate by interpretation and would infringe the constitutionally protected power of the Oireachtas.

Submissions on M.R. and D.R (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60 on behalf of the appellant

[91] The appellant submits that none of the passages relied upon by the respondent from the decision of the Supreme Court in M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60, [2014] 3 I.R. 533 have the effect contended for by the respondent. The consideration that it is a matter for the Oireachtas to legislate for the complex questions of family and other legal relations that arise from surrogacy arrangements, and that to date the Oireachtas, despite the importance of these matters to society and to the constitutional interests of those affected has not done so, does not have the consequence that the appellant is left outside the legislative scheme of the Act of 2000.

[92] It is submitted that the judgments were given in a context where no provision has been made for surrogacy in this jurisdiction at all, including in respect of benefits equivalent to maternity protection benefits. The general provisions of the Act of 2000 have not been qualified or contradicted or restricted in the manner contended for by the respondent.

[93] The appellant submits that M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60, [2014] 3 I.R. 533 does not advance or in any way support the respondent's argument that this court would be legislating if it were to find in favour of the appellant in this case. That argument, it is contended, remains affected by the same error of law as the Circuit Court Judge fell into in these proceedings, which is the removal from scrutiny of a matter that is prima facie prohibited by the general provisions of equality legislation. The appellant would thereby be deprived of a remedy – which is a limited remedy under and within the Act of 2000 and has no wider legislative effect – on the sole ground that the matter is novel and unregulated or, as found by the Supreme Court, on the grounds that it is no longer novel and ought to be regulated by legislation, but to date has not been.

[94] By making provision for the payment of benefit in particular circumstances, the Social Welfare Acts do not require that persons in comparable situations, but not meeting the precise statutory criteria, be excluded from the possibility of payment either of the benefit in question or of an equivalent payment. The appellant submits that s. 14 does not create a charter to allow the State to discriminate by legislation. Specifically, it does not prohibit the taking of action, not itself prohibited by an enactment, but not falling within the express scope of the governing legislative scheme.

[95] The appellant submits that if a failure to regulate the substantive subject matter underlying an equality claim is adjudged to afford a full defence to such a claim, this would serve only to reward legislative and administrative inaction in a manner which is contrary to the purpose and intent of the Act of 2000.

[96] It is argued that all of the judgments in M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60, [2014] 3 I.R. 533 recognise that the intimate ties between a genetic mother who is bringing up her child born to a surrogate, and that child, are constitutionally underpinned and require legal protection. From this perspective, far from undermining the present claim, the appellant's case that the discrimination that has occurred here falls within the widely defined "family status" ground has become all the more compelling as a result of the Supreme Court judgments.

The United Kingdom authorities

[97] In considering these authorities, which I propose to do chronologically, it is important to bear in mind the fact that the statutory provisions being construed are not identical to those under consideration here and have themselves been amended.

[98] Section 5(1) of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 ("the United Kingdom Act") defined discrimination by an employer against an employee as occurring where, for reasons which related to the employee's disability, the employer treated him less favourably than he treated or would treat others to whom "that reason" did not or would not apply, and could not show that the treatment in question was justified (emphasis added). The distinction drawn in earlier anti-discrimination legislation between direct and indirect discrimination did not feature.

[99] The United Kingdom Act also provided that an employer was under a duty to take such steps as were reasonable to prevent a disabled employee being placed at a substantial disadvantage by reason of any work related "arrangements" made by the employer, or any physical features of the employer's premises. Failure to comply with this duty, without justification, amounted to discrimination under s. 5(2).

[100] Sections 19 and 20 dealt with discrimination in the provision of services. Again, the definition provided that it was discrimination if, for a reason related to a disability, the disabled person was treated less favourably than the service provider treated or would treat others to whom that reason did not or would not apply, and it could not be shown that the treatment was justified.

[101] "Justification" under the United Kingdom Act required showing that there was a reason which was both material to the circumstances of the particular case and substantial.

[102] Clark v. TDG Ltd. [1999] 2 All E.R. 977 was the first decision of the Court of Appeal dealing with this legislation. It concerned an employee whose job involved manual labour and who suffered a work related injury. His employer came to the view that he would not be fit to return to work within a reasonable time and therefore terminated his employment on the basis that he was no longer capable of performing the main functions of his job.

[103] An industrial tribunal held that the employee had a disability and was dismissed for a reason relating to it. However, he had not been subjected to discrimination, in that he was not treated less favourably than the employer would have treated others absent from work, without a foreseeable date of return, for reasons other than disability. This decision was reversed on appeal, and the matter ended up in the Court of Appeal.

[104] The employer's case was that a person to whom "that reason" would not apply would be someone else incapable of performing the main functions of his job for a reason which did not relate to disability.

[105] Giving the judgment of the court, Mummery L.J. said at p. 987 that the phrase "that reason" referred only to the facts constituting the reason for the treatment, and did not include within that reason the added requirement of a causal link with disability – that was more properly to be regarded as "the cause of the reason for the treatment" rather than as in itself a reason for the treatment.

[106] On the issue of the correct comparator, Mummery L.J. referred at pp. 988 and 989 to the example, given during a Parliamentary debate on the issue, of a café refusing to allow dogs, including guide dogs accompanying blind people (it appears that it was intended by Parliament that this would be seen as a prima facie case of discrimination):-

> "It could only be a case of less favourable treatment and therefore a prima facie case of discrimination, if the comparators are 'others' without dogs: 'that reason' for refusing access to refreshment in the café would not apply to 'others' without dogs."

[107] Mummery L.J. also stated at p. 988:-

> "If no dogs are admitted to a café, the reason for denying access to refreshment in it by a blind person with his guide dog would be the fact that no dogs are admitted. That reason 'relates to' his disability. His guide dog is with him because of his disability."

[108] The court therefore considered that the appropriate comparators were employees who were able to perform the main functions of their jobs. The reason for the applicant's dismissal would not apply to them, so he had been treated less favourably than them. They would not be dismissed for "that reason":-

> "However, that does not necessarily mean that [the employee] has been discriminated against. It is open to [the employers] to show that the dismissal is justified, just as it would be open to the café proprietor to justify the exclusion of dogs, including guide dogs with their blind owners."

[109] The matter was remitted for consideration of the issue of justification.

[110] Murphy v Slough Borough Council [2004] I.C.R. 1163 was a decision of the United Kingdom Employment Appeal Tribunal ("EAT"). It concerned a teacher who suffered from a medical condition which meant that a pregnancy would endanger her life. She had a child by a surrogate mother and applied to take paid post-natal leave. Her employer took the view that her situation was comparable to that of an adoptive mother, rather than that of a mother who had given birth – the difference being that paid leave for the former was only a matter of discretion, as opposed to entitlement. Her application was refused because of the school's difficult budgetary situation.

[111] The EAT held that the applicant had been treated less favourably than women who gave birth to their own children; that the reason for that treatment was her inability to have children; and that this "related" to her disability within the meaning of the United Kingdom Act.

[112] In its determination, Clark v. TDG Ltd. [1999] 2 All E.R. 977 was relied upon for a number of aspects. Referring to the example of the guide dog, it was said at p. 1172 that:-

> "38. The task therefore is to isolate the ultimate reason for the conduct complained of (i.e. the disability) and to ignore the immediate cause (i.e. the guide dog)."

[113] Applying this analysis, the EAT found at p. 1173 that:-

> "39. … the applicant has been treated less favourably than others who have given birth in the conventional way to their own children; 'the reason' for the treatment accorded to the applicant related to her disability, namely her inability to have children. For those reasons, we consider … that the decision not to give the applicant paid leave was 'for a reason which relates to the disabled person's disability.'"

[114] However, it went on to find that the financial position of the school was such as to validate the finding of the employment tribunal that the treatment of the applicant, and the decision by the school not to adjust its arrangements, had been justified.

[115] In 2008, the House of Lords considered the issue in Lewisham LBC v. Malcolm [2008] UKHL 43, [2008] 1 A.C 1399. There, a local authority tenant who suffered from schizophrenia sublet his flat in breach of the tenancy agreement. To do so was clearly not in his interest – he thereby lost his security of tenure. The landlord (which had been unaware of the tenant's illness) commenced a process to gain possession on the basis that he had moved out, which was resisted by the tenant on the basis of his disability. The Court of Appeal had held that the landlord's treatment of the tenant was for a reason which related to his disability, and that the fact that the landlord did not know of the disability did not preclude a finding of discrimination.

[116] In allowing the appeal the House of Lords doubted the correctness of Clark v. TDG Ltd. [1999] 2 All E.R. 977 and took a different approach.

[117] Lord Bingham held that the tenant would probably not have behaved so irresponsibly were it not for his illness, but the illness had nothing to do with the landlord's reason for seeking possession. On the question of who the "others" were for the purpose of appropriate comparison, he identified three possible categories: (a) tenants without a mental disability who had sublet a flat and moved out, (b) tenants who had not sublet or moved out, and (c) "some other comparator group". The Clark v. TDG Ltd. [1999] 2 All E.R. 977 analysis would lead to the choice of group (b), but Lord Bingham considered that group (a) was the more natural choice and that Clark v. TDG Ltd. was incorrect. It was clear that the landlord would have claimed possession against any non-disabled tenant who sublet and moved out, so the tenant had not been discriminated against.

[118] Lord Scott of Foscote said at para. 32, p. 1414, that the Clark v. TDG Ltd. [1999] 2 All E.R. 977 analysis "emasculates" the point of the statutory comparison:-

> "32 … What is the point of asking whether a person has been treated 'less favourably than others' if the 'others' are those to whom the reason why the disabled person was subjected to the complained of treatment cannot apply? If a person has been dismissed because he is incapable of doing his job, what is the point of making the lawfulness of his dismissal depend on whether those who are capable of doing their job would have been dismissed?"

[119] He referred to the hypothetical case of the blind man and the guide dog and analysed it as follows at pp. 1415 and 1416:-

> "35 … Would the blind man without his dog have been refused entry? Almost certainly not. The problem was the dog. The dog was the reason for the refusal of entry. That reason was causally connected to the disability, but the disability would have played no part in the mind of the restaurant manager in refusing entry to the dog. The problem, I repeat, was the dog … If he is refused entry it is not because he is blind but because he is accompanied by a dog and is not prepared to leave his dog outside. Anyone, whether sighted or blind, who was accompanied by a dog would have been treated in the same way. The reason for the treatment would not have related to the blindness; it would have related to the dog."

[120] It was accepted by at least some of their lordships that the effect of this judgment was to reduce the protection afforded by the United Kingdom Act, and some misgivings were expressed on this score.

[121] In Aylott v. Stockton on Tees Borough Council [2010] EWCA (Civ.) 910, [2010] I.R.L.R. 994, the issue came before the Court of Appeal again. Mummery L.J. rejected a submission that his judgment in Clark v. TDG Ltd. [1999] 2 All E.R. 977 was still good law, holding at para. 68, p. 1002, that it was overruled by Lewisham LBC v. Malcolm [2008] UKHL 43, [2008] 1 A.C 1399 and was "deceased as a case". However, it is worth noting two observations made at p. 1002 in his judgment.

[122] The first was that Parliament had legislated to, in effect, nullify Lewisham LBC v. Malcolm [2008] UKHL 43, [2008] 1 A.C 1399, by providing in s. 15 of the Equality Act 2010 that:-

> "67 …

'(1) A person (A) discriminates against a disabled person (B) if –
(a) A treats B unfavourably because of something arising in consequence of B's disability, and
(b) A cannot show that the treatment is a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.'"

[123] The second observation was that, after Lewisham LBC v. Malcolm [2008] UKHL 43, [2008] 1 A.C 1399, claimants and their advisers had shifted their focus to the duty to make reasonable adjustments. Mummery L.J. commented that this was, perhaps, what they should have been doing all along, since it was a concept central to the United Kingdom Act. It entailed a measure of "positive discrimination", requiring adjustments to be made for disabled persons that would not be required for others.

European Union law

[124] The parties are agreed that this is not a European Union law case, turning as it does on domestic statutory law. However, the respondent places some reliance on the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union ("CJEU") in Z. v. A. (Case C-363/12) [2014] 3 C.M.L.R. 407 delivered on the 18th March, 2014. In that case a school teacher who, like the appellant in the instant case, was fertile but could not support a pregnancy, had a child born through surrogacy. She sought paid leave equivalent to maternity or adoptive leave and was refused.

[125] Ruling on a reference from the Equality Tribunal, the CJEU held at p. 445 that she had not been discriminated against under the relevant European Union legislation. The refusal of leave would, it considered, have been discrimination:-

"51 … if the fundamental reason for that refusal applies exclusively to workers of one sex."

[126] However, a commissioning father in a surrogacy arrangement would have been treated in the same way.

[127] Indirect discrimination was not established since it had not been shown that a refusal to grant leave put female workers at a particular disadvantage compared with male workers.

Interpretation of the Act of 2000

[128] Having regard to the objectives of the Act of 2000, it must be acknowledged to be a remedial statute. It follows that it must be liberally construed. As described in Dodd, Statutory Interpretation in Ireland (Tottel, 2008) at p. 179:-

> "[6.52] 'Remedial social statutes' and legislation of a paternal character favour a purposive interpretation and are said to be construed as widely and liberally as can fairly be done within the constitutional limits of the courts' interpretive role. This formula has been repeated in a number of cases [citations at fn. 82 p. 179] … Remedial social statutes are enactments which seek to put right a social wrong and provide some means to achieve a particular social result."

[129] Dodd refers to Bank of Ireland v Purcell [1989] I.R. 327, where Walsh J. referred to the Family Home Protection Act 1976 as a remedial social statute and said at p. 333:-

> "This statute is not to be construed as if it were a conveyancing statute. As has been frequently pointed out remedial statutes are to be construed as widely and as liberally as can fairly be done. The first consideration in construing s. 3 is to ascertain the purpose of the section."

[130] In Gooden v St. Otteran's Hospital (2001) [2005] 3 I.R. 617, Hardiman J. said of the Mental Treatment Acts of 1945 and 1953 at p. 639:-

> "I believe however that in construing the statutory provisions applicable in this case in the way that we have, the court has gone as far as it possibly could without rewriting or supplementing the statutory provisions. The court must always be reluctant to appear to be doing either of these things having regard to the requirements of the separation of powers. I do not know that I would have been prepared to go as far as we have in this direction were it not for the essentially paternal character of the legislation in question here…"

Discussion and conclusions

[131] It seems to me that the first question to be addressed is whether or not the provisions of the Act of 2000 are capable of being applied to surrogacy related issues. In this respect I agree with the appellant (and do not understand the respondent to expressly disagree) that the Act of 2000 is intended to cover a broad range of human life and activity, and that its overall purpose is to reduce the social wrong of discrimination based on improper considerations. Having regard to the principles applicable to remedial statutes, it should be construed widely and liberally. I consider that the Circuit Court Judge fell into error in holding that it could not be relied upon in relation to novel factual situations not familiar to the legislature at the time of enactment.

[132] Since it is now accepted that the respondent does provide a service within the meaning of the Act of 2000, the question arises as to the proper definition of that service.

[133] The respondent says that it is the operation of the statutory code of benefits and allowances. I consider this definition to be too restrictive, since it takes no account of the fact that the respondent also administers a large number of non-statutory payment schemes. There is insufficient material before the court to determine the legal basis for each of these schemes, but such case law as there is makes it clear that they must be administered according to generally applicable principles of public law. In my view they would have to be regarded as services to the public within the meaning of the Act of 2000.

[134] However, the proposition that the service in issue in this case is the making of payments to the mothers of newly-born or newly-adopted children is also too restrictive, since it leaves the statutory context for those payments out of account.

[135] I consider that the service provided by the respondent is the administration or operation of the statutory code and of other non-statutory payment schemes.

[136] The statutory provisions at issue in this case relate solely to mothers, whether natural or adoptive. It is clear, in the light of the judgments of the Supreme Court in M.R. and D.R. (minors) v. An tArd Chláraitheoir [2014] IESC 60, [2014] 3 I.R. 533, that the appellant cannot claim the status of mother under Irish law. This situation is no doubt a source of great distress to her but, pending the introduction by the Oireachtas of legislation dealing with this field, it is equally clear from the Supreme Court judgments that it is not for the courts to attempt to resolve the complex questions that need to be addressed.

[137] It follows that the appellant cannot, for the purposes of a claim of discrimination, choose to compare herself directly with the two categories of mother recognised under Irish law – that is, mothers who have given birth and mothers who have adopted. Both of these categories are entitled to social welfare payments that, in the applicable qualification conditions, relate directly to the legal status of motherhood. The appellant does not have that status. If she did, it seems likely that she would have a strong case based on constitutional grounds but that is not what the court is dealing with here.

[138] The appellant has maintained throughout, however, that her case does not depend on the status of motherhood. She says, primarily, that she is a person who is in loco parentis of a child and that she is discriminated against because she has not been pregnant. She also says that she is discriminated against on grounds of disability and gender.

[139] Dealing with the last matter first, I do not think that the claim of gender discrimination would in any event be tenable. It is true that the appellant's medical condition is one that can only affect a woman. However, since no man can qualify for either maternity leave or adoptive leave payments in any circumstances, she has not been treated less favourably than any man is or would be, if he had a child through a surrogacy arrangement or otherwise.

[140] The disability and family status arguments are more complex. Having regard to the purposes of the Act of 2000, and to the observations above, I would be prepared to agree with much of the appellant's submissions. If a complainant can show, by reference to one or more of the statutory grounds upon which discrimination is prohibited, that he or she was treated less favourably than a person to whom those grounds do not apply, it is not in my view necessary to prove actual intent to discriminate on that ground. Thus, in the context of disability, it is not necessary to show that the café proprietor has a hostility to blind people if he or she refuses, without justification, to admit blind people accompanied by guide dogs. The point of the legislation is to ensure that blind people can, as far as practicable, avail of services in the same way as sighted people. The problem as I see it, is not the dog – it is whether a blind person with a guide dog may be refused service without justification. However, I would prefer not to give a definitive view on the issue of the correct interpretation of the section in this case, since I do not consider that it can determine the case.

[141] On the face of it, the appellant has, certainly, been discriminated against because she did not bear her child. As noted above, less favourable treatment on the basis that the complainant had not been pregnant would satisfy one of the statutory grounds. She says that this is a discriminatory exclusion from the social welfare legislation, within the terms of the equal status legislation, and that the refusal of the respondent to grant her an equivalent non-statutory payment is a matter entitling her to compensation.

[142] The difficulty that I have with the appellant's case lies in the fact that the payment, from which she says she has been excluded for discriminatory reasons, is one created by statute. A claim to be legally entitled to compensation necessarily involves a claim that one has been subjected to a legal wrong, but in this particular instance such a wrong can only be established on the assumption that one statute can be held to be legally deficient by reference to another – that is, by reference to the Act of 2000. Despite the submission that she is not to be taken either as attacking the validity of the social welfare legislation, or as attempting to measure those provisions against the Act of 2000 as if it were the Constitution, I cannot see how the appellant can maintain a claim of unlawful discrimination without saying, in effect, that the Social Welfare Act 2005 discriminates unlawfully. In the proceedings as constituted before this court, the only legal standard by which she can make that claim is the standard set by the Act of 2000. Since both are Acts of the Oireachtas, embodying policy choices made by the legislature, it is not open to a court to make a finding of unlawfulness in one on the basis of the policy of the other. There has been no assessment of the constitutionality of the choices made in the social welfare code, which would be the only legitimate basis for such a finding.

[143] For the same reasons I find that the word "provision" in s. 3(1)(c) cannot be interpreted as including a statutory provision. That too would have the effect of elevating the Act of 2000 to all but constitutional level, permitting the legitimacy of all other legislation to be assessed by reference to it.

[144] I should perhaps say that I am not persuaded by the argument made by the respondent that a non-statutory scheme to make provision for women in the appellant's position would be ultra vires. The existence of a broad range of non-statutory schemes demonstrates that the respondent frequently uses such schemes as a flexible alternative, or supplement, to primary legislation, presumably on the basis of appropriate public policy objectives and assessments. I do not think that s. 14 of the Act of 2000 is relevant here. The Social Welfare Acts do not "prohibit" the making of payments other than in accordance with statutory criteria – if they did, all of the non-statutory schemes would be at risk of being found to be ultra vires. I consider that the main difference in relation to a non-statutory scheme would be that it would probably be open to challenge if the Act of 2000 prohibitions on discrimination were contravened.

[145] However, it is not open to a court to hold that the respondent is derelict, either in not legislating or in not creating a scheme in this instance, without holding that the policy choices embodied in the primary legislation are legally deficient. The appellant has argued that the Act of 2000 envisages an order of compensation if discrimination is established, even if the respondent has no legal power to remove or ameliorate the discrimination complained of by way of making a non-statutory payment. Again, that raises the problem of whether the Act of 2000 can be relied upon in this fashion to find that there is discrimination contrary to that Act embodied in another Act. In my view it cannot, whether by this court, or by the Equality Tribunal acting as the body primarily charged with dealing with complaints under the Act of 2000.

[146] It is easy to understand why the appellant feels that she has been treated badly, why the Equality Officer referred to the case as raising "compelling" considerations and why the Circuit Court Judge accepted that the respondent's decision might seem unfair or unjust. However, there is as yet no legislation governing the complex issues that arise in the context of surrogate births. My view is that the Act of 2000 cannot be used to fill the gap.

[147] I therefore propose to dismiss this appeal.

THE HIGH COURT

[2015 No. 76 MCA]

IN THE MATTER OF THE PAYMENT OF WAGES ACT 1991

BETWEEN

DEVIDAS PETKUS, ROMAS PUSVASKIS, ZYDRUNAS ZUKAS, SALUIUS MATULEVICIUS, TADIS DERKANTIS, RAMUNAS NARBUTAS, LAIMONAS SEMETULSKIS, DRAGOS AIONITAOEI, ROLANDAS KAZDAILIS, DARIUS MARTANKUS, ARTUAS GRUNDAI, MINDAUGHAS MILASIUS, SERGIU NOHAI, DUMITRU VATAMANU, MAZVYDAS CEPLIAUSKAS, NERIGUS RAGUCKAS, DEIVIS BALAKAUSKAS, VILIUS CLAUAS, EVALDAS SEAVZEVICIUS, MACIEJ STEGILINSKI AND DARIUS PETKUS

APPELLANTS

COMPLETE HIGHWAY CARE LIMITED

RESPONDENT

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice White delivered on the 20th of January, 2017

1. This is a statutory appeal pursuant to the provisions of the Payment of Wages Act 1991, and O. 84C of the Rules of the Superior Courts.

2. By order of this Court of 19th October, 2015, time was extended to allow the applicants to appeal by way of statutory appeal.

3. A motion was issued on 27th October, 2015, originally returnable for 23rd November, 2015. The motion was grounded on the affidavit of Kieran O'Brien, Solicitor, together with exhibits. A director of the respondent company, Barry Ennis, swore an affidavit on 12th January, 2016, together with exhibits and Mr. O'Brien swore a further affidavit on 5th July, 2016. The matter was heard before this Court on 6th July, 2016, in Kilkenny and judgment was reserved.

4. The applicants seek to set aside the determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal of 13th January, 2015, on the following legal grounds:-

(a) the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in its analysis and application of the evidence to the relevant law;

(b) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in making unsustainable findings of fact and/or findings of fact for which there was no supporting evidence;

(c) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in failing to appropriate differentiate between a reduction and a deduction;

(d) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in finding that the respondent's 10% adjustment to the appellants' pay was a reduction;

(e) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in finding that the respondent's 10% adjustment to the appellants' pay was a reduction and that the Act does not apply to a reduction;

(f) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in failing to find that the respondent's 10% adjustment to the appellants' pay was not a deduction;

(g) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in failing to find that the respondent's 10% adjustment to the appellants' pay was not a deduction and consequently finding that the Act did not apply;

(h) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in failing to consider the entirety of the circumstances of the matter and failed to properly consider or apply the correct interpretation and intention of legislation protecting the payment of wages of workers under the Act and the Constitution; and

(i) that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error in law in setting aside that decisions of the Rights Commissioners and each of the appellants' cases.

History of the Dispute

5. The appellants were all employees of the respondent at the relevant time. The employees allege that the respondent unlawfully deducted 10% from their wages and withdrew a bonus. The employer claimed that due to very difficult economic trading conditions for the respondent that a reduction in wages took place. This commenced in 2009 and that the bonuses were dispensed with in 2010. The appellants made a claim to the Rights Commissioner Service of the Labour Relations Commission covering a period from March 2011 to September 2011.

6. The Rights Commissioner by decision of 30th April, 2013, decided that there was a breach of s. 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991, in that the 10% deduction in their pay was illegal.

7. The Rights Commissioner found that there was no illegal deduction with regard to the bonus and this portion of the claim failed.

8. The respondent appealed to the Employment Appeals Tribunal and the Tribunal in its decision of 13th January, 2005, stated:-

"The Tribunal recognises the inherent difficulty in differentiating a reduction from a deduction. A deduction or reduction of 10%, as in this case, has different implication on the respondent's statutory liabilities. A deduction of 10% would not alter the respondent's statutory liabilities i.e. PRSI, USC, PAYE. However, a reduction does alter their statutory liabilities. It is clear from the payslips exhibited, the respondent's statutory liabilities were altered and, therefore, the Tribunal can only conclude that the 10% adjustment was a reduction. The Act does not apply to a reduction. On that basis, the Tribunal upsets the decisions of the Rights Commissioner under the Payment of Wages Act 1991, cancel the awards made to the respondents."

9. The High Court judgment in McKenzie & Anor v. Minister for Finance & Ors (Edwards J., 30th November, 2010) [2010] IEHC 461, was relied on by the respondent at the Rights Commissioner hearing. The Rights Commissioner, in his decision, took the view that this case concerned expenses and, therefore, it did not refer to wages properly payable as defined in the Payment of Wages Act and thus, did not rely on that judgment.

10. In the relevant contract of employment governing the relationship between the appellants and the respondent, there is no specific reference to the right to deduct wages except at para. 20 where it states "changes to terms of employment, the company reserves the right to make reasonable changes to any of your terms and conditions of employment set out in this contract description and should this occur you will be notified in advance in writing of the nature and date of the change subject to consultation."

The Law

11. Section 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991, states:-

"(1) An employer shall not make a deduction from the wages of an employee (or receive any payment from an employee) unless—

(a) the deduction (or payment) is required or authorised to be made by virtue of any statute or any instrument made under statute,

(b) the deduction (or payment) is required or authorised to be made by virtue of a term of the employee's contract of employment included in the contract before, and in force at the time of, the deduction or payment, or

(c) in the case of a deduction, the employee has given his prior consent in writing to it.

(2) An employer shall not make a deduction from the wages of an employee in respect of—

(a) any act or omission of the employee, or

(b) any goods or services supplied to or provided for the employee by the employer the supply or provision of which is necessary to the employment, unless—

(i) the deduction is required or authorised to be made by virtue of a term (whether express or implied and, if express, whether oral or in writing) of the contract of employment made between the employer and the employee, and

(ii) the deduction is of an amount that is fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances (including the amount of the wages of the employee), and

(iii) before the time of the act or omission or the provision of the goods or services, the employee has been furnished with—

(I) in case the term referred to in subparagraph (i) is in writing, a copy thereof,

(II) In any other case, notice in writing of the existence and effect of the term,

and

(iv) in case the deduction is in respect of an act or omission of the employee, the employee has been furnished, at least one week before the making of the deduction, with particulars in writing of the act or omission and the amount of the deduction, and

(v) in case the deduction is in respect of compensation for loss or damage sustained by the employer as a result of an act or omission of the employee, the deduction is of an amount not exceeding the amount of the loss or the cost of the damage, and

(vi) in case the deduction is in respect of goods or services supplied or provided as aforesaid, the deduction is of an amount not exceeding the cost to the employer of the goods or services, and

(vii) the deduction or, if the total amount payable to the employer by the employee in respect of the act or omission or the goods or services is to be so paid by means of more than one deduction from the wages of the employee, the first such deduction is made not later than 6 months after the act or omission becomes known to the employer or, as the case may be, after the provision of the goods or services.

(a) An employer shall not receive a payment from an employee in respect of a matter referred to in subsection (2) unless, if the payment were a deduction, it would comply with that subsection.

(b) Where an employer receives a payment in accordance with paragraph (a) he shall forthwith give a receipt for the payment to the employee.

(4) A term of a contract of employment or other agreement whereby goods or services are supplied to or provided for an employee by an employer in consideration of the making of a deduction by the employer from the wages of the employee or the making of a payment to the employer by the employee shall not be enforceable by the employer unless the supply or provision and the deduction or payment complies with subsection (2).

(5) Nothing in this section applies to—

(a) a deduction made by an employer from the wages of an employee, or any payment received from an employee by an employer, where—

(i) the purpose of the deduction or payment is the reimbursement of the employer in respect of—

(I) any overpayment of wages, or

(II) any overpayment in respect of expenses incurred by the employee in carrying out his employment, made (for any reason) by the employer to the employee, and

(ii) the amount of the deduction or payment does not exceed the amount of the overpayment, or

(b) a deduction made by an employer from the wages of an employee, or any payment received from an employee by an employer, in consequence of any disciplinary proceedings if those proceedings were held by virtue of a statutory provision, or

(c) a deduction made by an employer from the wages of an employee in pursuance of a requirement imposed on the employer by virtue of any statutory provision to deduct and pay to a public authority, being a Minister of the Government, the Revenue Commissioners or a local authority for the purposes of the Local Government Act, 1941 , amounts determined by that authority as being due to it from the employee, if the deduction is made in accordance with the relevant determination of that authority, or

(d) a deduction made by an employer from the wages of an employee in pursuance of any arrangements—

(i) which are in accordance with a term of a contract made between the employer and the employee to whose inclusion in the contract the employee has given his prior consent in writing, or

(ii) to which the employee has otherwise given his prior consent in writing,

and under which the employer deducts and pays to a third person amounts, being amounts in relation to which he has received a notice in writing from that person stating that they are amounts due to him from the employee, if the deduction is made in accordance with the notice and the amount thereof is paid to the third person not later than the date on which it is required by the notice to be so paid, or

(e) a deduction made by an employer from the wages of an employee, or any payment received from an employee by his employer, where the employee has taken part in a strike or other industrial action and the deduction is made or the payment has been required by the employer on account of the employee's having taken part in that strike or other industrial action, or

(f) a deduction made by an employer from the wages of an employee with his prior consent in writing, or any payment received from an employee by an employer, where the purpose of the deduction or payment is the satisfaction (whether wholly or in part) of an order of a court or tribunal requiring the payment of any amount by the employee to the employer, or

(g) a deduction made by an employer from the wages of an employee where the purpose of the deduction is the satisfaction (whether wholly or in part) of an order of a court or tribunal requiring the payment of any amount by the employer to the court or tribunal or a third party out of the wages of the employee.

(6) Where—

(a) the total amount of any wages that are paid on any occasion by an employer to an employee is less than the total amount of wages that is properly payable by him to the employee on that occasion (after making any deductions therefrom that fall to be made and are in accordance with this Act), or

(b) none of the wages that are properly payable to an employee by an employer on any occasion (after making any such deductions as aforesaid) are paid to the employee,

then, except in so far as the deficiency or non-payment is attributable to an error of computation, the amount of the deficiency or non-payment shall be treated as a deduction made by the employer from the wages of the employee on the occasion."

12. The court accepts the well established principle in relation to an appeal on a point of law that the Superior Courts have repeatedly applied a consistent significant curial deference which is summarised by Hamilton C.J. in Henry Denning & Sons Ireland Limited v. Minister for Social Welfare [1998] 1 I.R. 34, stating:-

> "That the courts should be slow to interfere with the decisions of expert administrative tribunals. Where conclusions are based upon an identifiable error of law or an unsustainable finding of fact by a tribunal such conclusions must be corrected. Otherwise it should be recognised that tribunals which have been given statutory tasks to perform and exercise their functions, as is now usually the case, with a high degree of expertise and provide coherent and balanced judgments on the evidence and arguments heard by them it should not be necessary for the courts to review their decisions by way of appeal or judicial review."

13. In the same case, Keane J. citing with approval the comments of Carroll J. in the High Court, stated:-

> "In an appeal on a question of law the court does not go into the merits of the decision. The primary facts are not in issue. Where there is a question of conclusions and inferences to be drawn from facts (a mixed question of fact and law) the court should confine itself to considering if they are conclusions and inferences which no reasonable person could draw or whether they are based on a wrong view of the law."

14. In the same judgment, Keane J. cited the decision of Kenny J. in Mara (Inspector of Taxes) v. Hummingbird Limited [1982] 2 ILRM 421, when he stated:-

> "If the conclusions from the primary facts are ones which no reasonable commissioner could draw, the court should set aside his findings on the ground that he must be assumed to have misdirected himself as to the law or made a mistake in reasoning. Finally, if his conclusions show that he has adopted a wrong view of the law, they should be set aside."

15. There seems to have been some confusion about the relevance of the McKenzie judgment. At para. 5.8, of his judgment Edwards J. stated:-

"Finally, the Court agrees with the respondents' submission that the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 has no application in the circumstances of this case. First, as has been pointed out, correctly in the Court's view, the reduction in the PDF allowance is not a 'deduction' from wages payable. It is a reduction of the allowance payable. The Act has no application to reductions as distinct from 'deductions'. Secondly, even if that were not so, any alleged breach of the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 is not a justiciable controversy before the High Court in circumstances where that Act sets up a specific enforcement mechanism to be availed of elsewhere in such circumstances."

16. This judgment was considered in a further judgment of the President of the High Court in Earagail Eisc Teoranta v. Doherty & Ors [2015] IEHC 347, the then Kearns P. stated:-

"The Court is also satisfied that the decision in McKenzie is distinguishable from the facts of the present case in a number of respects. The Court accepts the submissions of the respondents that the remarks of Edwards J. in relation to 'reduction v. deduction' issue were obiter. Furthermore, McKenzie related to the reduction in an allowance payable in respect of motor travel and subsistence. The definition of 'wages' in the 1991 Act expressly excludes any payment in respect of expenses incurred by the employee in carrying out his employment and so the finding by Edwards J. that the 'RDF Allowance' did not come within the scope of a deduction under the Act relates to an entirely different situation to that the present case where employees salaries were reduced. I am satisfied therefore that the Tribunal was entitled to proceed to consider the complaints on the basis that the reduction to the employees wages in the present case may have constituted a deduction in breach of the 1991 Act."

17. At the hearing before the Employment Appeals Tribunal, the appellants' representatives SIPTU made a detailed supplementary submission on the effect of the McKenzie case and submitted that Case No. PW86-W87/211, Bessborough Centre Limited v. Long & Ors decision of 13th April, 2013, had been wrongly decided because of an incorrect interpretation of the McKenzie case.

18. This Court can see no reference in the papers placed before the Employment Appeals Tribunal of any argument in relation to statutory liabilities of PRSI, USC and PAYE which was a reason for the Tribunal's differentiation between deduction and reduction.

19. The determination of the EAT is silent on the McKenzie case although the supplementary submissions of the appellants specifically address same. The decision of the Rights Commissioner's was detailed and rejected it as a precedent.

20. The determination did not summarise the evidence adduced by the appellants and the respondent, and did not comprehensively and concisely deal with any issues as to fact, nor did not summarise the legal materials put forward by either party.

21. The entire decision of the Rights Commissioner was under appeal including the failure of the Rights Commissioner to find in favour of the appellants that a bonus was improperly withheld and came within the parameters of Section 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. This was not addressed in the Tribunal decision.

22. The Tribunal did explain this differentiation between a reduction and a deduction. It seems to have followed the obiter comment of Edwards J in McKenzie, but did not set out any of the legal arguments on how it came to differentiate the legal arguments and make its decision.

23. Unfortunately, the McKenzie case has caused particular confusion to the determinations of Employment Appeals Tribunal and Rights Commissioners on the issue of Section 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. This is clear from a number of decisions which have been furnished to the court as follows:-

(i) Bessborough Centre Limited v. Long, Case No. PW86-W87/2011, a decision of the Employment Appeals Tribunal on appeal from the Rights Commissioner decision. The Employment Appeals Tribunal determination is dated 11th April, 2013;

(ii) Santry Sports Injury Clinic and Padden and Ors Pw 251/255/2011 EAT 16th July 2013.

(iii) Hog Heaven Limited v. O'Gorman, Case No. PW774/2012, a determination of the EAT on 3rd March, 2014, on appeal from the Rights Commissioner;

(iv) Hamilton v. Earagail Eisc Teoranta, a decision a Rights Commissioner of 17th May, 2016. (r-15937-pw-15/SR.)

(v) InisBofin Community Services Programme Company Limited v. Burke, Case No. PWD1614, which is an appeal of an adjudication officer's decision. This determination was issued on 18th May, 2016.

24. The EAT determination the subject of this statutory appeal in the opinion of this Court, falls a long way short of the standard this Court would expect in detailing the arguments that have been made and giving reasons, and explaining its decision.

25. I do not accept that the determination of the tribunal, that there was a reduction of wages as distinct from a deduction, is a pure question of fact. It is a mixed question of law and fact. The basis of the conclusion was that a reduction as distinct from a deduction altered the Respondents statutory liabilities. Because an Employer arbitrarily reduces the wages of an employee, without the consent of the employee, and alters the amount of PAYE, PRSI, and USC accordingly does not necessarily remove the reduction from the jurisdiction of the Payment of Wages act 1991, entitling the Employer to ignore it's provisions.

26. It is not a matter for this Court to decide the substantive issue, but for the relevant decision making body set up under the Payment of Wages Act 1991 if a reduction is allowed at all pursuant to the provisions of s. 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991, without the consent of an employee. It is unfortunate that an obiter sentence in a judgment of this Court which did not relate to the payment of wages at all and which was put into practice by way of statutory instrument has caused such confusion.

27. The judgment of Kearns P. in Earagail Eisc Teoranta v. Doherty of 5th June, 2015, has clarified that issue. The McKenzie case is not precedent to allow a reduction of wages which does not offend s. 5 of the Payment of Wages Act 1991.

28. The court is satisfied that the appellants are entitled to succeed in relation to para. (h) of their notice of motion, that is that the Employment Appeals Tribunal fell into an error of law in failing to consider the entirety of the circumstances of the matter and failed to properly consider or apply the correct interpretation and intention of that legislation protecting the payment of wages of workers under the Act and the Constitution.

29. It is, therefore, appropriate to allow the appeal and remit the matter back to the Employment Appeals Tribunal for further determination.

The Board of Management of Malahide Community School, Appellant v. Dawn Marie Conaty, Respondent
[2019] IEHC 486, [2018 No. 301 MCA]

High Court 5 July 2019

Employment – Unfair dismissals – Fixed-term contracts – Waiver of rights – Employment of existing employee with entitlement to statutory protection on fixed-term contract – Agreement purporting to exclude or limit application of Unfair Dismissals Acts – Entitlement to contract out of statutory protections – Whether contract for fixed term – Whether Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 applicable – Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (No. 10), ss. 2(2)(b) and 13.

Section 2(2)(b) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 provides, inter alia:

"(2) Subject to subsection (2A), this Act shall not apply in relation to—

(b) dismissal where the employment was under a contract of employment for a fixed term or for a specified purpose (being a purpose of such a kind that the duration of the contract was limited but was, at the time of its making, incapable of precise ascertainment) and the dismissal consisted only of the expiry of the term without its being renewed under the said contract or the cesser of the purpose and the contract is in writing, was signed by or on behalf of the employer and by the employee and provides that this Act shall not apply to a dismissal consisting only of the expiry or cesser aforesaid."

Section 13 of the 1977 Act provides:

"A provision in an agreement (whether a contract of employment or not and whether made before or after the commencement of this Act) shall be void in so far as it purports to exclude or limit the application of, or is inconsistent with, any provision of this Act."

The respondent was employed as a teacher by the appellant. For two years prior to October 2015, the respondent had been employed by the appellant (without a written employment contract in place) and thus was entitled to the protections afforded to employees under the 1977 Act.

On 22 October 2015 the respondent was required to sign a contract of employment that was stated to cover the term from 8 October 2015 until 30 August 2016. The contract further provided that it might be renewed if the allocated hours specified in the contract continued to be allocated and demand remained for the subjects taught by the respondent.

On the expiration of the contract in August 2016, the appellant purported to dismiss the respondent. The respondent challenged the dismissal and was successful in her claim for unfair dismissal before the Labour Court. The Labour Court rejected the appellant's claim that the respondent had been employed under a fixed-term contract of employment and that, as a result of s. 2(2)(b), the 1977 Act did not apply to her. The appellant appealed on a point of law to the High Court concerning the Labour Court's interpretation and application of s. 2(2)(b).

Held by the High Court (Simons J.), in dismissing the appeal, 1, that a contractual provision that purported to deprive an employee of rights that they had already acquired under the 1977 Act could only be characterised as an agreement that purported to "exclude" or "limit" the application of the Act and was therefore void pursuant to s. 13 of the Act.

2. That s. 2(2)(b) of the 1977 Act allowed for the possibility of an employee, at the commencement of their employment, making an informed decision to waive their statutory rights. It carved out an exception to the general rights under the 1977 Act and fell to be interpreted strictly.

3. That s. 2(2)(b) of the 1977 Act applied only where the "employment" was under a contract of employment for a fixed term, which required an assessment of the contractual arrangements between the parties in the round. Where an employee's initial employment was on the basis of a permanent contract, s. 2(2)(b) could not be relied on by his or her employer.

4. That in order for a contract of employment to come within the exception for fixed-term contracts pursuant to s. 2(2)(b), the language used with respect to identifying the end of the term needed to be unequivocal.

5. That, as a matter of contract law, an employer who requested an employee to agree to inferior terms and conditions, which involved the loss of statutory rights, was required to explain the precise legal effect of those changes to the employee. This was an implied term that was part of the implied obligation of mutual trust and confidence between an employer and employee and was also necessary to reflect the unequal bargaining power between an employer and employee.

Obiter dicta: 1. Notwithstanding that s. 13 of the 1977 Act appeared, on a literal interpretation, to preclude the possibility of an employee ever waiving their rights under the Act, the case law indicated that it was permissible for an employee to make an informed waiver of his or her statutory rights.

Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club [1997] 8 E.L.R. 225 and Sunday Newspapers Ltd. v. Kinsella [2007] IEHC 324, [2008] 19 E.L.R. 53 considered.

2. Whereas a clause confirming that an agreement was in full and final settlement of all claims under the 1977 Act appeared to offend against the literal wording of s. 13 of the Act, on a purposive interpretation, it was open to an employee to waive their right to pursue further proceedings under the Act if that waiver was given on the basis of informed consent. The public interest in ensuring that parties were able to resolve disputes without having to pursue legal proceedings to a conclusion was best advanced by such an interpretation. Furthermore, an agreement to accept a particular amount in full and final settlement of a claim for unfair dismissal, on the basis of informed consent, represented a vindication of the employee's rights under the legislation.

Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club [1997] 8 E.L.R. 225 and Sunday Newspapers Ltd. v. Kinsella [2007] IEHC 324, [2008] 19 E.L.R. 53 approved.

Appeal from the Labour Court

The facts have been summarised in the headnote and are more fully set out in the judgment of Simons J., infra.

By originating notice of motion dated 25 July 2018, the appellant appealed against the determination of the Labour Court dated 29 June 2018.

The appeal was heard on 9 May 2019.

Mark Connaughton S.C. (with him Tom Mallon) for the appellant.

Marguerite Bolger S.C. (with her Padraic Lyons) for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Simons J. 5 July 2019

Summary

[1] This matter comes before the High Court by way of a statutory appeal from the Labour Court. The appeal presents a short point of law as to the entitlement, if any, of an employer and employee to contract out of the statutory protections otherwise provided for under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (as amended) ("the 1977 Act").

[2] The point arises in the following circumstances. The employee ("the teacher") had acquired rights under the 1977 Act by dint of her having had more than one year's continuous service as a teacher at Malahide Community School ("the school"). In October 2015 the school required the teacher to sign a written contract for the balance of the academic year 2015/2016. The written contract presented to the teacher purported to take the form of a "fixed-term" contract for a period of approximately 11 months. The school contends that, by signing this contract, the teacher relinquished the statutory rights she had previously acquired under the 1977 Act. On the expiration of the term of the contract on 31 August 2016, the school purported to dismiss the teacher.

[3] The teacher successfully challenged her dismissal before the Labour Court and has been reinstated. The school has since appealed the Labour Court's determination to the High Court.

[4] The school's grounds of appeal are beguiling in their simplicity. It is said that "fixed-term" contracts are expressly excluded from the application of the 1977 Act by s. 2(2)(b) thereof. This is subject only to the procedural requirements under that section having been satisfied. The procedural requirements are as follows: the contract must be in writing; must be signed by or on behalf of the employer and by the employee; and must provide that the 1977 Act shall not apply to a dismissal consisting only of the expiry of the fixed term. These requirements are said to have been met. It is further submitted that there is no question of the parties having contracted out of the 1977 Act in circumstances where the legislation simply does not apply to "fixed-term" contracts.

[5] In truth, the protection afforded to employees under the 1977 Act is more robust than the school's submission appears to suggest. Freedom of contract is severely restricted by s. 13 of the Act. Any provision in an agreement which purports to exclude or limit the application of, or is inconsistent with, any provision of the 1977 Act is void. The contract of October 2015 falls foul of this section. A contractual provision which purports to deprive an employee of rights which they have already acquired under the 1977 Act can only be characterised as an agreement which purports to "exclude" or "limit" the application of the 1977 Act. But for the offending provision of the contract of October 2015, the teacher would have retained her status as a permanent employee entitled to the full protections of the 1977 Act. Therefore, the relevant provisions of the contract of October 2015 are void.

[6] On its literal meaning, s. 13 precludes an employee from ever contracting out of their rights. However, there is case law which suggests that — at least in the context of settlement agreements — an employee may be entitled to waive their rights on the basis of informed consent. The school cannot avail of this in its appeal. This is because it is common case that the teacher had not been informed that the contract of October 2015 would entail the loss of her acquired rights. Indeed, it appears that both the school and the teacher were labouring under the mistaken belief that the teacher did not have any acquired rights.

[7] (The school principal had explained to the Labour Court that she had mistakenly thought that the teacher's employment for the school years 2013/2014 and 2014/2015 had been on the basis of "fixed-term" contracts. In fact, there was no written contract in place for either year).

[8] The reliance which the school seeks to place on the exception for fixed-term contracts under s. 2(2)(b) is misplaced. This exception requires a consideration of an employee's employment in the round, and the exception cannot apply where the employment had been on a permanent basis. Moreover, for the reasons explained at para. 60 et seq. below, the other requirements of s. 2(2)(b) were not, in any event, satisfied by the contract of October 2015.

[9] The school's appeal will, therefore, be dismissed.

Procedural history

[10] Before turning to consider the substance of the statutory appeal, it is necessary first to say something about the procedural history whereby this appeal came on for hearing before the High Court. In particular, it is necessary to explain that this is, in fact, the second appeal to come before the High Court.

[11] The contract of October 2015, the subject matter of these proceedings, had a purported end date of 31 August 2016. The school did not renew the contract, and the teacher's employment terminated on 31 August 2016.

[12] The teacher then submitted a complaint to the Workplace Relations Commission ("the WRC"). The WRC adjudication officer rejected the complaint on the basis that the dismissal was excluded from the 1977 Act under s. 2(2)(b). The teacher appealed this decision to the Labour Court. The Labour Court made a determination in favour of the teacher, and made an order directing the school to re-engage her in a teaching role from the commencement of the 2018/2019 school year. This determination is dated 22 November 2017. I will refer to this as "the first determination".

[13] The school brought an appeal against the Labour Court's first determination to the High Court. The matter was duly heard by the High Court (O'Regan J.), and, by reserved judgment dated 21 March 2018, the appeal was allowed. See Board of Management of Malahide Community School v. Conaty [2018] IEHC 144.

[14] It seems from the judgment that the High Court took the view that the Labour Court's rationale was not evident from its determination. In particular, the High Court appears to have been concerned that there had been no express reference to s. 13 of the 1977 Act in the operative part of the first determination, and that the rationale for extending the case law in respect of "informed consent" from the context of settlement agreements to fixed-term contracts had not been explained.

[15] Rather than determine the points of law itself, the High Court instead remitted the matter to the Labour Court for reconsideration:

> "30. For the reasons above, I cannot be satisfied that the correct principles of law were applied in the absence of:
>
> 1. an engagement with or consideration of the impact of s. 2(2)(b) on the circumstances before the Labour Court;
> 2. some weighing in the balance of the provisions of s. 2(2)(b); and
> 3. an explanation of the perceived difference between exclusion and waiver identified by the Labour Court in its decision (see paras. 19 and 20(3) hereof) and why notwithstanding such difference the jurisprudence in respect of waiver was sufficient to address the critical/central issue between the parties.
> In these circumstances, I am satisfied that it is appropriate to remit the matter to the Labour Court for reconsideration."

[16] The Labour Court heard further submissions on the remitted appeal (but did not hear any further oral evidence) at a hearing on 12 June 2018. The Labour Court then issued its determination on 29 June 2018. The Labour Court again ruled in favour of the teacher. I will refer to this as "the second determination".

[17] The (second) appeal to the High Court was instituted by way of an originating notice of motion dated 25 July 2018. On the same date, the school issued a separate motion seeking a stay on the implementation of the Labour Court's order directing the re-engagement of the teacher. That application was refused by the High Court (Binchy J.) by order dated 30 July 2018. The substantive appeal subsequently came on for hearing on 9 May 2019.

[18] There was some discussion at the hearing before me as to the implications of the High Court judgment on the first appeal. Counsel on behalf of the teacher submitted that certain issues had been determined conclusively by the High Court in its judgment of 21 March 2018 and that it was inappropriate for the school to seek to re-agitate these issues. It was said that these matters were res judicata. In particular, it was submitted that the High Court had made a finding that the Labour Court, in considering the previous employment history of the teacher as part of its first determination, had acted properly. Reliance was placed in this regard on paras. 22–23 of the High Court judgment, and the reference to there having been "no error of law".

[19] With respect, I think that this might be to read too much into the first High Court judgment. As noted above, the approach adopted by the High Court in March 2018 had been to remit the points of law to the Labour Court for further consideration in circumstances where O'Regan J. was not satisfied that the Labour Court's rationale was evident from its first determination. It does not appear to me that the judgment was intended to determine any of the points of law conclusively.

Labour Court's findings of fact

[20] The originating notice of motion in these proceedings is headed up "In the matter of Section 46 of the Workplace Relations Commission Act 2015". Strictly speaking, however, it appears that the appeal is under s. 10A of the 1977 Act. Nothing turns on this distinction in that the form of appeal under the two sections is identical, i.e. an appeal on a point of law.

[21] The parties to an appeal on a point of law will, generally, be bound by the findings of fact of the Labour Court. The High Court, on an appeal on a point of law, only has a very limited jurisdiction to look behind those findings of fact. See, for example, the judgment of the High Court in Health Service Executive v. Doherty [2015] IEHC 611:

> "29. It is well settled that as a general rule, this court on appeal cannot revisit findings of fact made by the Labour Court, unless they can be shown to have been unsupported by any evidence or are irrational or unreasonable in the light of the evidence before the Labour Court."

[22] See also the judgment of the Supreme Court in National University of Ireland Cork v. Ahern [2005] IESC 40, [2005] 2 I.R. 577 at p. 580:

> "[9] The respondents submit that the matters determined by the Labour Court were largely questions of fact and that matters of fact as found by the Labour Court must be accepted by the High Court in any appeal from its findings. As a statement of principle, this is certainly correct. However, this is not to say that the High Court or this court cannot examine the basis upon which the Labour Court found certain facts. The relevance, or indeed admissibility, of the matters relied on by the Labour Court in determining the facts is a question of law. In particular, the question of whether certain matters ought or ought not to have been considered by the Labour Court and ought or ought not to have been taken into account by it in determining the facts, is clearly a question of law and can be considered on an appeal under s. 8(3)."

[23] The first determination of the Labour Court contains a number of findings of fact which are at least potentially relevant to the application of the provisions of the 1977 Act to the circumstances of the case. In particular, the Labour Court made findings of fact in respect of: (i) the employment history of the teacher with the school prior to her signing the contract in October 2015; (ii) the school principal's understanding of the employment status of the teacher; and (iii) whether the teacher had been advised that, by entering into the contract, she would be relinquishing her acquired rights under the 1977 Act. The Labour Court subsequently relied upon these findings of fact for the purposes of reaching its second determination, i.e. the determination the subject matter of this appeal.

[24] One might have thought that the parties would accept that the appeal before the High Court must be determined by reference to these findings of fact. The parties would, of course, be entitled to make legal submissions to the High Court as to the interpretation and application of the statutory provisions to the factual circumstances as found by the Labour Court. For example, the school maintains that, as a matter of law, the previous employment history is largely irrelevant to the application of s. 2(2)(b).

[25] As it happens, however, the status of the findings of fact is in dispute. The school is sharply critical of the Labour Court for relying on the findings of fact from the first determination for the purposes of its second determination. The gravamen of the criticism seems to be that once the matter had been remitted to the Labour Court pursuant to the High Court order of 23 March 2018, the Labour Court should have conducted a de novo hearing before a differently constituted division of the Labour Court. This, presumably, would have entailed the hearing of oral evidence — again — from the teacher and the school principal. (Both had given evidence at the first hearing.)

[26] With respect, there is nothing in the High Court order of 23 March 2018 which necessitated such an approach on the part of the Labour Court. Had the High Court intended to be prescriptive as to the form of remittal, then this would have been specified in the order. Indeed, it appears from the written legal submissions filed on behalf of the teacher that the school may have canvassed the possibility of including in the order a direction that the remitted appeal should be heard by a different division of the Labour Court, but that the High Court had refused to make such an order, saying that this should instead be left to the discretion of the Labour Court. This narrative has not been challenged by the school.

[27] In the absence of a particular procedure having been prescribed by the order of 23 March 2018, the Labour Court had some flexibility as to the procedure which it adopted, subject always to the overarching obligation that the procedure be fair. There is nothing in the approach adopted by the Labour Court on the resumed hearing which could be characterised as failing to comply with fair procedures. The parties were entitled to make detailed oral and written submissions on the legal issues which had been identified in the High Court judgment.

[28] If and insofar as the criticism is predicated on an argument that the findings of fact in the first determination of the Labour Court had been implicitly set aside by the High Court in its first judgment, such an argument is untenable. It is clear from the judgment of 21 March 2018 that the decision of the High Court was to the effect that the Labour Court had not as yet properly engaged with the legal issues arising. There is nothing in the High Court judgment which suggests that the findings of fact were incorrect. Indeed, the only express reference in the judgment to findings of fact is to the effect that the Labour Court had not erred in its consideration of the prior employment history of the teacher.

[29] At all events, it is clear from the case law cited by the High Court earlier in its judgment that the court was fully aware that findings of fact are not generally amenable to being set aside on a statutory appeal limited to points of law.

[30] One of the curious features of the school's objection is that none of the facts are actually in dispute. The school had conceded at the first hearing before the Labour Court that the teacher had acquired rights under the 1977 Act. This concession was, entirely properly, repeated at the second hearing before the Labour Court. Further, there is no suggestion that the evidence which the school principal had given at the first hearing was incorrect or mistaken. It seems to be accepted, therefore, that the teacher was not advised at the time of entry into the contract in October 2015 that she was relinquishing rights under the 1977 Act. Rather, the position adopted by the school is that there was no legal obligation to provide such advice.

[31] In summary, therefore, the objection to the Labour Court having had regard to the findings of fact from its first determination is untenable.

[32] I have set out the relevant extract of the Labour Court's first determination which records its findings of fact as an appendix to this judgment.

Approach of the Labour Court

[33] The approach adopted by the Labour Court in its second determination was to address the interpretation and application of s. 2(2)(b) first, before turning to a consideration of s. 13.

[34] The Labour Court interpreted s. 2(2)(b) as involving an implicit requirement that a "fixed-term" contract must clearly stipulate in writing what is being waived. On this interpretation, it was not sufficient on the facts of the present case for the contract simply to record that the 1977 Act did not apply. Rather, the written terms of the contract should, it is said, have reflected the fact that the teacher was waiving her acquired rights to permanent employment. See p. 8 of the second determination as follows:

> "Section 2(2)(b) essentially allows an employee who wishes to accept a temporary employment arrangement from an employer to waive his or her rights to protection under the 1977 Act. In a situation where an employee is giving up what would otherwise be very valuable employment protection rights, it is essential that the agreement clearly stipulates in writing what is being waived and that the parties indicate, through their signature, express agreement to it. These conditions must therefore be fully and completely satisfied.
> It is clear on the evidence adduced that at the time the complainant signed the fixed-term contract in issue she was already employed by the respondent on a permanent contract of employment and she enjoyed the full protection of the 1977 Act against unfair dismissal. The purported effect of the impugned contract was to alter her tenure in employment from permanency to a fixed term and to extinguish her acquired entitlement to avail of the protection that the 1977 Act provides."

[35] The Labour Court went on then to conclude that the first decision had made a finding that the teacher had not been aware that she was signing away her rights as a permanent employee:

> "Furthermore, for the reasons outlined in determination UDD1752, the court is satisfied that the complainant was not aware that she was signing away her protection rights under the 1977 Act in October 2015. Nor was she cognisant that her employment status was changing from that of a permanent employee to that of a temporary fixed-term employee. Consequently, it was clear to the court that the conditions necessary to render s. 2(2)(b) of the 1977 Act effective were not satisfied. On that basis the exclusion which permits the non-application of the 1977 Act did not apply to the termination of the complainant's employment."

[36] In summary, the Labour Court determined that s. 2(2)(b) was inapplicable for the following three reasons: (i) there was an absence of informed consent on the part of the teacher; (ii) the reference to the possibility of the contract being renewed meant that the requirement that the termination date be capable of being ascertained was not met; and (iii) the Labour Court was not satisfied that the contract was a bona fide contract as the date of commencement had already passed at the time the contract was signed.

[37] The analysis in the second determination of s. 13 is brief. The Labour Court found that in seeking agreement from the teacher to exclude or limit the application of the 1977 Act, the contract of October 2015 was in breach of s. 13 and therefore void.

[38] The Labour Court concluded that the teacher had been unfairly dismissed when her contract was not renewed on 1 September 2016 and ordered the school to re-engage the teacher from the commencement of the 2018/2019 school year.

Position of the school

[39] The originating notice of motion sets out some 30 grounds of appeal. However, at the opening of the appeal, counsel for the school very helpfully summarised the school's appeal under three broad headings as follows:

(i) The Labour Court erred in its interpretation of s. 2(2)(b) of the 1977 Act. If a contract satisfies the conditions set forth under the section, then the contract is excluded from 1977 Act. The Labour Court erred in introducing an additional condition, namely a requirement for "informed consent".

(ii) The Labour Court erred in relying on s. 13. Section 13 is concerned only with waivers and has no relevance to the exclusionary provisions under s. 2.

(iii) The purported finding that the contract of October 2015 was not a bona fide fixed-term contract is incorrect. The fact that the employment had commenced prior to the contract being signed did not affect its validity. The reference to the possibility of the contract being renewed was merely aspirational, and did not mean that the contract was not for a fixed term.

Position of the teacher

[40] Counsel for the teacher commenced her submission by putting the 1977 Act into its proper context, making reference to principles of Irish constitutional law and of EU law. Counsel cited the Protection of Employees (Fixed-Term Work) Act 2003 (which gives effect to Directive 1999/70/EC), and the principle of EU law that contracts of an indefinite duration are, and will continue to be, the general form of employment relationship between employers and employees.

[41] Counsel then conducted a careful analysis of the 1977 Act. Section 13 applies where an employee has existing rights under the 1977 Act. Every attempt to exclude or limit existing rights under the 1977 Act falls to be considered under s. 13. This is subject to waiver on the basis of "informed consent".

[42] It was submitted that the approach adopted by the Labour Court is consistent with the case law in relation to waivers. Whereas this case law is concerned primarily with settlement agreements on the termination of employment, it is said that the same principles apply to a waiver of rights arising as a result of the entering into of a "fixed-term" contract. Counsel placed particular reliance on the judgment of the Circuit Court in Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club [1997] 8 E.L.R. 225; and the judgment of the High Court in Sunday Newspapers Ltd v. Kinsella [2007] IEHC 324, [2008] 19 E.L.R. 53.

Discussion

Section 13

[43] The starting point for the analysis of this appeal must be s. 13 of the 1977 Act. The section reads as follows:

> "13.—A provision in an agreement (whether a contract of employment or not and whether made before or after the commencement of this Act) shall be void in so far as it purports to exclude or limit the application of, or is inconsistent with, any provision of this Act."

[44] The section imposes a significant restraint on the principle of freedom of contract in the context of employment contracts. The general rule, i.e. that parties of full capacity are free to agree such contractual terms as they wish, is displaced. The restraint is drafted in very broad terms: any purported exclusion or limitation of the application of the 1977 Act is void. The focus is on the "agreement" and its purported effect. The section has retrospective effect, i.e. its application extends even to contracts which had been entered into prior to the commencement of the 1977 Act. All of this reflects the importance which the Oireachtas has attached to the statutory protections against unfair dismissal.

[45] The relevant provisions of the contract of October 2015 read as follows:

> "The temporary contract will commence on ~~30 August 201~~[*] 8 October 2015 and will terminate on 31 August 2016 subject to satisfactory service during the probationary period. The temporary contract may be renewed for a continued period in the event that the allocated hours as specified above continue to be available and the demand for these subjects continues. A contract of indefinite duration will not arise (see Circular 34/2009), if this post is not viable within a reasonable period.
>
> The provisions of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977–1993 or any amendment thereto shall not apply to a dismissal consisting only of the expiry of the said term without it being renewed."
> [*]The date of 30 August 2015 has been scored through in the original, and the date of 8 October 2015 inserted in manuscript.

[46] It may assist in understanding the effect of s. 13 on the contract of October 2015 to take a step back, and to consider briefly what the legal position would have been had the contract of October 2015 baldly stated that the 1977 Act would not apply to the continued employment of the teacher. It is obvious that such a contractual clause would have been void. This is because the teacher had already acquired rights under the 1977 Act by dint of her having had more than one year's continuous service as a teacher at the school. A contractual clause which purported to extinguish those rights would fall foul of s. 13. It would self-evidently purport to "exclude" or "limit" the application of the 1977 Act.

[47] The fact that the actual wording of the contract of October 2015 uses language which appears to echo the waiver for "fixed-term" contracts under s. 2(2)(b) tends to obscure the purported effect of the contract. It is less immediately apparent that acquired statutory rights are being extinguished. Yet this is precisely the purported effect of the contract of October 2015: the teacher is being switched from a permanent contract to a fixed-term contract, with the attendant loss of the protection against unfair dismissal. But for the offending provision of the contract of October 2015, the teacher would have retained her status as a permanent employee entitled to the full protections of the 1977 Act. Therefore, the relevant provisions of the contract of October 2015 are void. An agreement which purports to deprive an employee of rights which they have already acquired under the 1977 Act can only be characterised as an agreement which purports to "exclude" or "limit" the application of the 1977 Act.

[48] The proposition can be tested this way. Suppose that instead of echoing the language of the waiver under s. 2(2)(b), the contract had stated as follows:

"The Unfair Dismissals Acts shall not apply to the dismissal of the employee if, at the date of her dismissal, the employee has less than one year's continuous service with the school under this contract of employment. This is subject to s. 2(4) of the Act."

[49] This form of wording broadly reflects one of the exceptions provided for under s. 2(1). It could not, however, be effective against the teacher precisely because she had already achieved more than one year's continuous service before the contract was entered into. If the school sought to argue that the period of employment should be reckoned from 22 October 2015, such an argument would be rejected on the basis that it ignores the overall employment history. It would be unreal to treat the employment under the contract of October 2015 as a new employment. Put otherwise, the mere fact that the wording of a contractual provision appears to echo a statutory exception or waiver under s. 2 is not proof against that contractual provision being voided under s. 13. The contractual clause will be invalid if it does not reflect the true employment history.

Is waiver of statutory rights possible?

[50] On a literal interpretation, s. 13 of the 1977 Act would appear to preclude the possibility of an employee ever waiving their rights under the legislation. Such an inflexible rule could present difficulties in practice. This is especially so in the context of the settlement of claims for alleged unfair dismissal. An employer who is making a financial payment in accordance with a settlement agreement will wish to ensure that the agreement is in full and final settlement of all claims which the former employee may have arising out of the termination of their employment. A "full and final settlement" clause is standard in most types of settlement agreement, not just those in respect of employment law disputes. If the correct interpretation of s. 13 is that a settlement agreement would be ineffective because it would involve the former employee waiving his or her statutory rights, then this would impact on the ability of parties to compromise claims for unfair dismissal. Rather than settle or compromise claims, the parties would have to pursue legal proceedings to conclusion. This would be so even in circumstances where the employee had the benefit of independent legal advice. This would be contrary to the public interest in that it might overwhelm the Labour Court, and would result in the incurring of unnecessary legal fees.

[51] Precisely because of this practical difficulty, the courts have taken a pragmatic approach to the interpretation of s. 13. Notwithstanding what appears to be the literal interpretation of s. 13, the case law indicates that it is permissible for an employee to make an informed waiver of his or her statutory rights.

[52] The Circuit Court addressed the issue as follows in Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club [1997] 8 E.L.R. 225. On the facts of that case, an employee had entered into an agreement with his former employer accepting certain payments in full discharge of all claims against it. It seems that subsequently the employee sought to pursue proceedings before the Employment Appeals Tribunal. The issue before the Circuit Court was whether the agreement was void by reference to s. 13 of the 1977 Act.

[53] The Circuit Court accepted that, notwithstanding the literal meaning of s. 13, it cannot have been the intention of the legislature to prevent employers and employees from compromising claims under the 1977 Act. The Circuit Court went on to hold that, as with any consent by a person to waive a legal right, the consent must be an informed consent. The judgment goes on to suggest that in order for an agreement to be valid: (i) the agreement must identify the employment protection legislation which is being waived and (ii) the employee should have been advised in writing that he should take appropriate advice as to his rights stating at p. 227:

> "I am satisfied that the applicant was entitled to be advised of his entitlements under the employment protection legislation and that any agreement or compromise should have listed the various Acts which were applicable, or at least made it clear that they had been taken into account by the applicant. I am also satisfied that the applicant should have been advised in writing that he should take appropriate advice as to his rights, which presumably in his case would have been legal advice. In the absence of such advice I find the agreement to be void. My finding that the agreement was void, should not be taken as an indication that the officers of the club behaved improperly, or that they unfairly pressurised the applicant. I am satisfied that they genuinely believed it was in the interests of the club, once a decision to dismiss the applicant had been taken, to ensure a speedy agreed settlement with the applicant."

[54] The principles set out by the Circuit Court in Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club [1997] 8 E.L.R. 225 appear to have been endorsed subsequently by the High Court in Sunday Newspapers Ltd v. Kinsella [2007] IEHC 324, [2008] 19 E.L.R. 53.

[55] It appears that, as a matter of practice, these principles are applied on a regular basis by parties to employment law disputes. It also seems that the approach in both Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club [1997] 8 E.L.R. 225 and Sunday Newspapers Ltd. v. Kinsella [2007] IEHC 324, [2008] 19 E.L.R. 53 is followed by the Labour Court.

[56] The approach had also been endorsed in the leading textbook on dismissal law, Ryan, Redmond on Dismissal Law (3rd ed., Bloomsbury Professional, 2017) at pp. 588–589:

> "[25.54] Section 13 of the 1977 Act renders void any provision in an agreement, whether a contract of employment or not, and whether made before or after the commencement of the Act, to the extent that it purports to exclude or limit the application of, or is inconsistent with, any provision of the Act. This may be relevant where a settlement has been negotiated between an employer and employee. It will not apply, however, where the complainant has had independent advice. An agreement should be regarded as valid where it is entered into by a complainant with full knowledge of the legal position, where statutory entitlements are discussed in the negotiations leading up to the making of the agreement and the compromised settlement can be objectively described as adequate. Apart from a s 13 argument, a settlement arrived at on termination of employment may be the result of duress. If an employee feels that he or she has been forced to sign an agreement, he or she should make a contemporaneous note recording all relevant details." (Footnotes omitted.)

[57] The principle underlying this case law, namely that a person cannot be taken to have waived a statutory right unless they make an informed decision to do so, would appear to apply equally to the advance waiver of rights under s. 2(2)(b).

[58] It is not, strictly speaking, necessary for the purposes of determining this appeal for this court to make a finding as to whether this line of case law is correct or not. This is because even if one accepts that it is, in principle, open to an employee, such as the teacher in this case, to waive her rights, it could only be done on the basis of informed consent. There was no informed consent on the part of the teacher. It is common case that the teacher in this case was not put on notice by the school that she was relinquishing her statutory rights. Indeed, it appears that at the time the contract was entered into in October 2015, both the school and the teacher were labouring under the misapprehension that she had not acquired a right to permanent employment under the 1977 Act.

[59] However, given the importance attached to this line of case law in the practice of the Labour Court, it would be remiss of this court not to raise any concerns which it might have as to correctness of same. Happily, I am in broad agreement with the approach taken in the case law. In particular, I agree that it is open in principle to an employee in the context of the settlement of proceedings for unfair dismissal to confirm that the agreement is in full and final settlement of all claims under the 1977 Act. This is subject always to compliance with the requirements identified in Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club [1997] 8 E.L.R. 225. Whereas a "full and final settlement" clause would appear to offend against the literal wording of s. 13, I am satisfied that, on a purposive interpretation, it is open to employees to waive their right to pursue further proceedings under the 1977 Act if this waiver is given on the basis of "informed consent". I say this for two reasons. First, the public interest in ensuring that parties are able to resolve disputes without having to pursue legal proceedings to a conclusion is best advanced by this interpretation. Secondly, an agreement to accept a particular amount in full and final settlement of a claim for unfair dismissal, on the basis of informed consent, in a sense represents a vindication of the employee's rights under the legislation. The purpose of the legislation is to provide redress in the case of unfair dismissal. If an employee can obtain proper redress without having to pursue legal proceedings to their conclusion, such an outcome is not necessarily inconsistent with the purpose of the legislation.

Section 2(2)(b)

[60] Section 2(2)(b) of the 1977 Act provides as follows:

"(2) Subject to subsection (2A), this Act shall not apply in relation to—

(b) dismissal where the employment was under a contract of employment for a fixed term or for a specified purpose (being a purpose of such a kind that the duration of the contract was limited but was, at the time of its making, incapable of precise ascertainment) and the dismissal consisted only of the expiry of the term without its being renewed under the said contract or the cesser of the purpose and the contract is in writing, was signed by or on behalf of the employer and by the employee and provides that this Act shall not apply to a dismissal consisting only of the expiry or cesser aforesaid."

[61] Section 2(2)(b) allows for the possibility of an employee, at the commencement of their employment, making an informed decision to waive their statutory rights. This waiver must be confirmed by the employee signing a written contract which states that the 1977 Act shall not apply to a dismissal consisting only of the expiry of the fixed term. The provisions of s. 2(2)(b) carve out an exception to the general rights under the 1977 Act. As such, same fall to be interpreted strictly.

[62] There seems to have been much debate between the parties both before the Labour Court and before the High Court on the first statutory appeal as to whether s. 2(2)(b) should be characterised as involving an "exclusion" from the provisions of the 1977 Act, or, alternatively, as involving a form of "waiver". I am satisfied that it should be characterised as a "waiver". This is because in order for the exception — to use a neutral term — to be effective, the contract must record the disapplication of the 1977 Act, and the employee's agreement to same must be confirmed by their signing the written agreement. The exception is not, therefore, automatic, but rather necessitates an informed decision by the employee. Thus, the position can be distinguished from that in respect of the exclusions provided for under s. 2(1) of the Act. These exclusions are triggered by the nature of the identity of the employee, e.g. a person in employment as a member of the Defence Forces, or a person who is employed by a close relative. The exclusions are thus automatic and are not contingent on some step on the part of the employee.

[63] The relationship between s. 2(2)(b) and s. 13 can be summarised as follows. The former allows for the waiver, in advance of the commencement of employment, of rights which would otherwise have accrued under the 1977 Act. The latter, by contrast, protects rights which have already been acquired.

[64] The contract of October 2015 did not satisfy the requirements of s. 2(2)(b) for the following reasons.

(i) Term of contract not certain

[65] The first and most obvious respect in which the contract of October 2015 fails to satisfy the requirements of s. 2(2)(b) is that the requirement that the contract be for a "fixed term" is not met. Leaving aside the provision made separately for a contract for a "specified purpose", which has not been relied upon in this case, the exception under s. 2(2)(b) is only available where a contract of employment is for a "fixed term". This necessitates that the termination date of the contract must be ascertainable from the outset.

[66] Whereas the contract of October 2015 has a nominal termination date of 31 August 2016, this is contingent on future events:

> "The temporary contract will commence on ~~30 August 2015~~* 8 October 2015 and will terminate on 31 August 2016 subject to satisfactory service during the probationary period. The temporary contract may be renewed for a continued period in the event that the allocated hours as specified above continue to be available and the demand for these subjects continues."

[*]The date of 30 August 2015 has been scored through in the original, and the date of 8 October 2015 inserted in manuscript.

[67] As appears, the contract may be renewed if certain objective conditions are met, i.e. the allocated hours continue to be available, and the demand for the two relevant subjects, namely English and religion, continues. The fact that it could not be known at the time that the contract was entered into whether these contingencies would occur has the legal consequence that the contract cannot be regarded as being for a "fixed term".

[68] The submission on behalf of the school that this clause of the contract is "aspirational" only, and should be disregarded for the purposes of determining whether the contract qualifies as a fixed-term contract, cannot be accepted. The statutory requirements that the contract be in writing and signed by the employee emphasise the importance which the Oireachtas attaches to ensuring that an employee must be on notice of the legal effect of the contract. The language of a contract must be unequivocal in order to come within the exemption. The reference to the contingency of the contract being renewed is not something which a reasonable person would discount as merely "aspirational", and, accordingly, of no legal effect.

[69] There is a further difficulty with the contract. The contract was not signed until after the nominated commencement date of 8 October 2015. (The teacher did not sign the contract until 22 October 2015.) Section 2(2)(b) only allows for the possibility of an employee, at the commencement of their employment, making an informed decision to waive their statutory rights. This timing point is of crucial importance. A procedure whereby an employee might be requested to waive their rights during the course of employment would be open to the risk of abuse.

(ii) "Employment" not under fixed-term contract

[70] The exception under s. 2(2)(b) only applies where the "employment" had been under a contract of employment for a fixed term. This requires an assessment of the contractual arrangements between the parties in the round. This approach to interpretation is consistent with the provisions in respect of consecutive fixed-term contracts set out at s. 2(2A). For example, where there has been a temporary break in employment (of less than three months), then it is the totality of the employment arrangements that are looked at.

[71] Where, as in this case, there is a history of employment, regard must be had to same in order to determine whether the "employment" is pursuant to a fixed-term contract. On the facts of this case, the teacher's initial employment had been on the basis of a permanent contract. It cannot be said therefore that her "employment" was under a contract of employment for a fixed term. Rather, the "employment" is properly characterised as one under a permanent contract. Section 2(2)(b) is only available in the case of a first-time employment, or, perhaps, employment pursuant to series of fixed-term contracts.

[72] The school appears to say that it is only legitimate to have regard to the future employment of the employee. If this future employment is to be under a fixed-term contract, then the employer is entitled to avail of the exception. On this interpretation, an employee who had been employed on a permanent basis for a number of years could be moved onto a fixed-term contract with an immediate loss of their acquired rights. Such an interpretation would, self-evidently, be open to potential abuse. The approach contended for by the school is artificial, and would undermine the effectiveness of the legislation.

(iii) No informed consent

[73] It is an express requirement of s. 2(2)(b) that the contract be signed by the employee, and that the contract provide that the 1977 Act shall not apply to a dismissal consisting only of the expiry of the fixed term. The purpose of these procedural requirements is, self-evidently, to ensure (i) that the employee is on notice that protections which would otherwise arise under the 1977 Act are being waived, (ii) that the employee's consent is confirmed by their signature. The principle of "informed consent" as set out in the judgements in Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club [1997] 8 E.L.R. 225 and Sunday Newspapers Ltd. v. Kinsella [2007] IEHC 324, [2008] 19 E.L.R. 53 (discussed above) apply by analogy. A person can only be said to have waived a statutory right if they do so on an informed basis. If one assumes for the moment that — contrary to my finding under the previous headings — it is competent for an employee to waive their right of permanent employment by entering into a fixed-term contract under s. 2(2)(b), it is nevertheless necessary that that waiver be given on the basis of informed consent. There is an implicit obligation on an employer to put an employee on notice that the entering into of a particular contract will entail the loss of statutory rights previously acquired by the employee. A bald statement in the contract to the effect that the 1977 Act does not apply to dismissal consisting only of the expiry of the fixed term would not be sufficient. Rather, the contract would have to include an express acknowledgement to the effect that the employee was relinquishing their acquired right to the protection of the 1977 Act. The formula of words used in the contract of October 2015 is deficient in this regard. It did not put the teacher on notice of the loss of her statutory rights.

[74] Further, it is common case that the teacher was not informed verbally of the loss of her statutory rights. Indeed, both the teacher and the school appear to have been labouring under the misapprehension that the teacher had not acquired rights under the 1977 Act. The school principal had explained to the Labour Court that she had mistakenly thought that the teacher's employment for the school years 2013/2014 and 2014/2015 had been on the basis of "fixed-term" contracts. In fact, there was no written contract in place for either year, and thus reliance could be placed on s. 2(2)(b).

[75] The signing by the teacher of the contract in October 2015 was not sufficient to waive her statutory rights in the absence of informed consent.

[76] Alternatively, lest I be incorrect in my interpretation of s. 2(2)(b), I am satisfied that, as a matter of contract law, an employer who requests an employee to agree to inferior terms and conditions, which involve the loss of statutory rights, is required to explain the precise legal effect of those changes to the employee. This implied term is part of the implied obligation of mutual trust and confidence between an employer and employee. It is also necessary to reflect the unequal bargaining power between an employer and employee.

Summary

[77] In summary, a reasonable person reading the contract of October 2015 would not understand same as entailing the loss of statutory rights, nor, indeed, as being for a fixed term only.

Proposed order

[78] The appeal by the appellant, the board of management of Malahide Community School, is dismissed. The determination of the Labour Court dated 29 June 2018 bearing the reference "UDD1837", is affirmed.

APPENDIX:
Extract from Labour Court's first determination

"Court's findings

On the evidence it is clear that the complainant's prior employment with the respondent was under a permanent contract of employment. That was admitted on behalf of the respondent in the course of the hearing of this appeal. Moreover, it is clear that the complainant resumed working for the respondent in August 2015. At that point her employment was not pursuant to a fixed-term contract and it was undoubtably permanent in nature. What is now contended for by the respondent is that on or about 22 October 2015, at which point the complainant was employed on a permanent contract, she freely and knowingly entered into a contract to retrospectively alter the fundamental nature of her employment from that of permanence to fixed term. It is further contended that, at a point at which she had the full protection of the 1977 Act, she intentionally agreed to forgo that protection.

Having considered the submissions of both parties, the court is of the view that as the complainant was on a permanent contract prior to signing the fixed-term contract, and indeed had already commenced a new school year on that basis at the end of August 2015, the change in employment status in October of that year is very significant and needs to be examined.

The court must examine whether there was any discussion or consideration given to the complainant relinquishing her employment status as a permanent employee and returning on less favourable terms in respect to tenure, thereby placing her outside the protection of the 1977 Act.

It is not disputed that this change in status was ever brought to her attention, indeed the respondent itself was not even aware of her employment status at the time and therefore was not in a position to ensure the complainant gave informed consent. The court is of the view that it is particularly significant that the position as advertised in September 2015 made no reference whatsoever to its fixed term status and the complainant's letter of application similarly makes no such reference, (both were presented to the court at the hearing).

The court cannot accept the respondent's contention that she fully understood the nature of the contract or that she freely entered into it, knowing that it may not be renewed. In any event the contract states that 'the temporary nature may be renewed for a continued period in the event that the allocated hours as specified above continue to be available and the demand for these subjects continues'. The subjects she was teaching were English and religion, it was within the bounds of possibility that the demand for such subjects was likely to continue. However, she was not successful and another teacher with shorter service was successful.

The complainant told the court that she did not have an opportunity to examine the contract and was simply presented with it and asked to sign it. On that basis it is difficult to see how the complainant could have freely entered into such a contract having had full knowledge of its implications. Had she not signed the contract at the time her employment may have been in jeopardy. The court accepts that evidence."

THE HIGH COURT [2020] IEHC 55

IN THE MATTER OF A STATUTORY APPEAL PURSUANT TO SECTION 46 OF THE WORKPLACE RELATIONS ACT 2015

[2019 No. 83 MCA]

BETWEEN

MAREK BALANS

APPELLANT

TESCO IRELAND LIMITED

RESPONDENT

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice MacGrath delivered on the 31st day of January, 2020.

1. This is an appeal on a point of law pursuant to the provisions of s. 46 of the Workplace Relations Act 2015 against a decision of the Labour Court made on 21st January, 2019. The appellant, Mr. Balans, is a night worker employed by the respondent in a distribution centre. Mr. Balans made a number of complaints to an adjudication officer of the Workplace Relations Commission in respect of his employment. The first related to an alleged impermissible deduction from his wages and the operation and application of the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 ("the Act of 1991"), s. 5(6). The second related to his alleged entitlement to be paid a premium for hours worked between Saturday and Sunday and the meaning of that time period under the contract. The third relates to the grievance procedure operated by the respondent. He also made application for extension of time, from six to twelve months, within which to make a claim for compensation.

2. On the 23rd August, 2018, the adjudication officer upheld the appellant's complaint that there had been a breach of the Act. He also recommended that the respondent pay the applicant redress of €1,000 for the manner in which its grievance process was operated. He rejected the application for extension of time and also the contention of the appellant that hours worked between Saturday and Sunday included the hours from midnight on Friday/Saturday until 6 a.m. on Saturday morning. His decision and recommendation were appealed to the Labour Court by both parties.

3. The Labour Court in its principal finding overturned the decision of the adjudication officer and found that no unlawful deduction had been made from the appellant's wages. It held that the rate of pay specified in the plaintiff's contract arose as a result of a computational error. The court also disagreed with the recommendation to pay redress, but the decision of the adjudication officer on all other issues was upheld.

4. A number of grounds of appeal have been advanced on behalf of Mr. Balans:-

i. The Labour Court fell into error in its interpretation of the contract of employment. By interpreting the contract as it has, it is argued that the Labour Court has purported to rectify the contract and thereby exercise a jurisdiction which it does not enjoy.

ii. The Labour Court misinterpreted the meaning of "hours worked between Saturday and Sunday" and held, in error, that the contract precluded Mr. Balans from receiving a 20% premium for hours worked between midnight on Friday/Saturday and 6 a.m. on Saturday mornings.

iii. The Labour Court erred in holding that there was no reasonable cause to justify an extension of the six-month period for the purposes of lodging a claim with the Workplace Relations Commission, and in doing so that it failed to provide adequate reasons for its finding. It is to be observed, that insofar as the latter part of this challenge is concerned (i.e. inadequate reasons), the respondent maintains that the court ought not to entertain such ground as it is not advanced in the notice of motion.

Background

5. In view of the issues raised on this appeal it is relevant to consider the background to the dispute. This is addressed in the affidavit sworn by the appellant on the 27th February, 2019 in support of this appeal and by Mr. Alan Jones, sworn in response on the 9th May, 2019.

6. In 2012 the appellant was employed by the respondent as a night warehouse operative on a part time/short hours contract. He was employed on the night shift, three days a week. In November, 2013 the parties entered into a contract ("the 2013 contract") which in turn was replaced on the 16th June, 2015 by a further contract, the terms of which are the subject matter of this dispute ("the 2015 contract"). This provided for employment on a full time basis. It is suggested by the respondent that the 2015 contract has been superseded by a further contract issued by the respondent on the 11th May, 2017 but which the appellant has refused to sign.

7. The rate of pay as recorded in the 2013 contract was as follows:-

"Payment rates break down as follows:-

- Basic rate - €9.69.
- Hours worked between 22:00 and 06:00 attract a consolidated rate of pay that includes a 20% premium for unsocial hours.
- Hours worked between Saturday and Sunday attract a 20% premium if part of rostered working week."

It was also provided that the rate of pay would be subject to the usual taxation deductions. Thus, under the 2013 contract the appellant was entitled to a basic hourly rate of pay of €9.69 together with a bonus of 20% in respect of unsocial hours and a further premium of 20% in respect of hours worked "between Saturday and Sunday", if part of the rostered working week. In the 2015 contract, the basic rate of pay is stated to be €11.87 per hour. The contract was signed by the parties. The respondent maintains that an error was made in the 2015 contract in that the basic rate was calculated in a manner which incorrectly incorporated the 20% premium for unsocial hours which he had received under the 2013 contract. The applicant maintains entitlement to this rate of pay and 20% premium for unsocial hours based on this figure. He also claims entitlement to further premia based on this figure. Since June, 2015 he has been paid €10.29 per hour, rather than €11.87 as expressly stipulated in the contract.

8. On the 6th October, 2016, Mr. Balans made a complaint under the respondent's internal grievance procedure. On the 24th March, 2017 this was determined not to be well – founded. An internal appeal was dismissed on the 5th May, 2017. On the 14th August, 2017 he made a complaint to the Workplace Relations Commission.

9. The adjudication officer found that the stated €11.87 per hour in the 2015 contract arose as a result of a mistake on the part of the respondent. He continued:-

> "Nevertheless, it is difficult to see grounds why this should be set aside because of such a unilateral mistake. There is nothing unconscionable about a rate of pay of €11.87. I accept the evidence that this was not a prevailing rate of pay in the respondent, but it was the rate of pay inserted into the contract. The complainant did not contribute to the respondent's mistake. Applying the doctrine of mistake, there is no basis to set aside the binding nature of the basic rate of pay as €11.87 per hour."

He found that the rate of €11.87 was properly payable and that the underpayment to the appellant amounted to a deduction within the ambit of s. 5 of the Act.

10. Section 5 of the Act of 1991 prohibits an employer from making deductions except in accordance with the provisions of that section. These include:-

> "(a) the deduction (or payment) is required or authorised to be made by virtue of any statute or any instrument made under statute,

(b) the deduction (or payment) is required or authorised to be made by virtue of a term of the employee's contract of employment included in the contract before, and in force at the time of, the deduction or payment, or

(c) in the case of a deduction, the employee has given his prior consent in writing to it."

The appellant maintains that none of these considerations arise.

11. Section 5(6) provides:-

"(6) Where—

(a) the total amount of any wages that are paid on any occasion by an employer to an employee is less than the total amount of wages that is properly payable by him to the employee on that occasion (after making any deductions therefrom that fall to be made and are in accordance with this Act), or

(b) none of the wages that are properly payable to an employee by an employer on any occasion (after making any such deductions as aforesaid) are paid to the employee, then, except in so far as the deficiency or non-payment is attributable to an error of computation, the amount of the deficiency or non-payment shall be treated as a deduction made by the employer from the wages of the employee on the occasion."

12. Wages is defined in s. 1 of the Act of 1991 as:-

"...any sums payable to the employee by the employer in connection with his employment, including—

(a) any fee, bonus or commission, or any holiday, sick or maternity pay, or any other emolument, referable to his employment, whether payable under his contract of employment or otherwise..."

The Decision of the Labour Court

13. The Labour Court found that the enforcement of contract under common law is not a matter for the Labour Court. To ground a claim under the Act of 1991, the wages concerned must be properly payable. It noted that it had found in a previous decision Department of Public Expenditure v. Brian Collins (PW/18/14), as had the Employment Appeals Tribunal in Aer Lingus v. Matchett (PW/18/18), that an error in the contract does not mean that the rate of pay set out in the contract was properly payable. The Labour Court concluded:-

> "Having regard to the submissions of both parties and the oral submissions made on the day, the court is clear in this case also that the rate of pay set out in the complainant's contract arose due to a computational error and was not properly payable."

14. The Labour court concurred with the adjudication officer on the extension of time issue. It overturned his Recommendation to award compensation under the Industrial Relations Act, 1969 because of the finding that the company's grievance process was procedurally sound. With regard to the hours worked between Saturday and Sunday, the Court concurred with the Decision of the adjudication officer that:-

> "... an additional premium payable for 'Hours worked between Saturday and Sunday', while the wording could be expressed more clearly, does not mean that a premium is payable for hours worked on Saturday mornings."

Submissions made to the Labour Court

15. The occurrence of the stated mistake in the contract is explained at para. 4 of the employer's submissions to the Labour Court which are exhibited to the appellant's affidavit in support of his application to this court. When the respondent's HR administration team drafted the contract of employment for the complainant, they inserted his employee number and the rate of €11.87 per hour which was the consolidated figure of the then basic hourly rate payable of €9.89 together with the 20% premium for unsocial hours. It was submitted to the Labour Court that this was a clear error of an administrative or clerical nature. Reliance was placed by the respondent on the decision in Aer Lingus v. Matchett, where the court had concluded:-

> "...it is clear to the Court that the salary set out in the letter of appointment ... was not the appropriate salary point to pay the Complainant ... and consequently must have been an error on the Respondent's part, therefore, it was not unlawful for the Respondent to deduct the monies."

16. This was relied on as authority for the proposition that an administrative error in a contract of employment should not result in the error being compounded and being applied in practice. It was submitted that the respondent should not be bound by the error especially as it went outside the collective agreement on site and could have far reaching implications for the respondent. The respondent also submitted that the appellant was seeking to be paid 40% higher than other colleague, which would have significant implications for equality in pay in the distribution centre. It was contended that the adjudication officer misinterpreted the provisions of the Act and that the respondent had clearly demonstrated that this was a clerical mistake within the meaning of the section. The correct rate of pay as per the established agreed rates was properly payable and this is what the appellant received. There was therefore no illegal deduction. The amount/rate properly payable under the contract within the meaning of the Act was €9.89 and that it was this amount that the 20% premium applied in the event of the working of unsocial hours. Further submissions were made in respect of the Saturday/Sunday issue and the period of time in respect of which the claim might be made.

17. The essence of the submission made on behalf of Mr. Balans was that he was entitled to be paid his contractual salary subject to any lawful deductions. The contractual hourly rate specified in the contract was €11.87. This was undisputed. Any error which may have been made by the respondent should not entitle it to unilaterally reduce his salary. The subsequent attempt by the respondent to request the employee to sign a new contract illustrated that the employer also believed that it had made an error which had legal effect. Submissions were also made in respect of other two issues.

Submissions to this Court

18. Mr. Kirwan S.C. on behalf of the appellant submits that the Labour Court fell into error as a matter of law in its analysis of the contract and the provisions of the Act of 1991. The Labour Court has no jurisdiction to correct or amend errors or disregard the clear terms of the written contract. If such jurisdiction had been intended to be conferred by the Oireachtas, it would have so provided. Under s. 5(6) of the Act of 1991 the wage properly payable to Mr. Balans was his basic hourly rate of €11.87 together with such further premia to which he may be entitled. Counsel relied on a decision of the EAT in Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] ELR 217, which addressed the meaning of "deductions" in s. 5. The EAT held that while there was no specific definition of deduction in the Act, guidance could be taken form the definition of "wages" in s. 1 and emphasis should be placed on the word "payable". The Tribunal stated:-

> "... if an employee does not receive what is properly payable to him or her from the outset then this can amount to a deduction within the meaning of the 1991 Act. We take payable to mean properly payable. The definition of wages goes on to give examples of types of payments which can amount to wages and states that the payments can amount to wages whether payable under his contract of employment or otherwise ... although in our view it is not simply a matter of what may have been agreed or arranged or indeed paid from the outset but, in the view of the Tribunal, all sums to which an employee is properly entitled."

19. Reliance is also placed on Ministry of Defence v. Country and Metropolitan Homes (Risington) Limited [2002] EWHC 2113. Rectification is a discretionary equitable remedy.

Counsel argued that Matchett is distinguishable. Mr. Matchett had been promoted but his letter of appointment provided for an incorrect pay scale. The case did not concern the plaintiff's contract of employment, rather his letter of appointment, and further, having realised the error, his employer deducted the amount of the overpayment. It is emphasised by counsel that, on the facts, the contract authorised Aer Lingus to make such a deduction. Counsel also argues that the reliance of the Labour Court on its decision in Department of Public Expenditure v. Collins was misplaced and that, in any event, such decision is contrary to the approach adopted by Hunt J. in Babinskas v. First Glass Limited [2016] IEHC 598. It is contended that the Labour Court erred in a manner similar to that which occurred in Babinskas, discussed below, by disregarding Mr. Balans' entitlement to be paid the wage as set out in the contract. It is argued that the respondent has attempted to vary the contract and to require Mr. Balans to enter into a new agreement precisely because the July, 2015 contract of employment is binding on them. There is no error within the meaning of s. 5(6) of the Act. There is nothing computational about deliberately paying someone less than is specified in their contract of employment. This was not a computational error, and to so hold amounts to an error of law. Reliance is placed on Morgan v. Glamorgan County Council [1995] IRLR 68, where Mummery P., in addressing the equivalent legislation in that jurisdiction discussed the meaning of the words "err" and "computation" as follows:-

> "Although the error may be one of 'any description' within the meaning of s.8(4), it must be a) an 'error' on the part of the employer and b) it must be an error which affects 'the computation' of the gross wages. As neither the word 'error' nor the word 'computation' are defined by statute, they must be given their ordinary meaning. In its ordinary and natural meaning an error is a mistake something incorrectly done through ignorance or inadvertence. 'Computation' of wages is a matter of reckoning the amount, of ascertaining the total amount due by a process of counting and calculation."

The court concluded that no error of computation had occurred because the deduction from the applicant's wages arose from a deliberate decision.

20. On the second issue it is submitted that the expression "hours worked between Saturday and Sunday" includes the period between midnight on Friday/Saturday and midnight on Sunday/Monday and that if it was the intention of the respondent to limit the premium payable to specific portions of the weekend, it should have expressly so stated. As there is ambiguity in the wording of the contract, the contra proferentum principle ought to apply and the contract construed against the employer.

21. With regard to the extension of time, it is submitted that the Labour Court was incorrect as a matter of law in holding there was no reasonable cause for extending the time for lodging his complaint to the Workplace Relations Commission. The appellant engaged with the respondent's grievance procedure, including internal appeal procedures, which as a matter of law amounts to reasonable cause. It is further submitted that no reason for this conclusion had been proffered by the Labour Court contrary to requirement for the stating of reasons as held by Kearns P. in Earagail Eisc Teoranta v. Doherty and Ors [2015] IEHC 347. As previously stated, the respondent objects to the court embarking on any consideration of this ground.

22. Mr. Dunne S.C., counsel for the respondent, stresses the limited role of this Court on this appeal. He submits that it is fundamentally misconceived to suggest there is or has been an attempt made to rectify the contract. The Labour Court applied the provisions of the Act, which is a self – contained statutory code. The focus of the inquiry is to establish what wages are properly payable. The applicant could have brought a claim for breach of contract or for specific performance, but he failed to do so. There was no deduction. Counsel submits that when the Act of 1991 is construed as a whole, it is clear that the Oireachtas was aware that mistakes might occur in contractual documentation. This is evident from the provisions of s. 4 which specifically refers to errors or omissions. Section 4(3) of the Act of 1991 provides:-

"(3) Where a statement under this section contains an error or omission, the statement shall be regarded as complying with the provisions of this section if it is shown that the error or omission was made by way of a clerical mistake or was otherwise made accidentally and in good faith."

By virtue of the provisions of ss. 4(1) and 4(2), an employer is obliged to give an employee a statement in writing specifying clearly the gross amount of the wages payable to the employee and the nature and amount of any deduction therefrom. He is also obliged to take such reasonable steps as are necessary to ensure that both the matter to which the statement relates, and the statement are treated confidentially by the employer and his agents and by any other employees. Section 4(2) provides:-

"(2) A statement under this section shall be given to the employee concerned—

(a) if the relevant payment is made by a mode specified in section 2 (1) (f), as soon as may be thereafter,

(b) if the payment is made by a mode of payment specified in regulations under section 2 (1) (h), at such time as may be specified in the regulations,

(c) if the payment is made by any other mode of payment, at the time of the payment."

Section 4(4) provides that an employer who contravenes subs. (1) or (2), shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine.

23. Counsel also submits that the term "wages" within the meaning of the Act is not necessarily to be defined exclusively by reference to the contract of employment. The first step is to determine what wages are properly payable, an exercise which was carried out by the Labour Court. It made a finding of fact that there was an error in the figure set out in the contract, a conclusion to which it was entitled to arrive. This is not an error of law.

24. Mr. Dunne S.C. points out that the appellant was originally employed to work 22.5 hours per week but in 2015 his contract of employment was renewed as his working hour commitment changed significantly. His rate of pay did not alter at that time and it is argued that there is no averment in the appellant's affidavit to the effect that he understood that his rate of pay would have increased or that there was any agreement to that effect. There was no such agreement. The appellant does not contradict the assertion of Mr. Jones that a clerical mistake was made nor was this contradicted before the Labour Court. It is therefore submitted that it was permissible for the court to rely on the provisions of s. 5(6) of the Act. There was a clerical computational error in the calculation of his hourly rate, and this was evident from the material which was opened to the Labour Court. Further, the respondent points to the fact that no complaint was made concerning what he was paid in the period from June, 2015 to the 6th October, 2016. In exercise of its statutory function the Labour Court was entitled to look beyond the terms of the contract as executed by the parties to determine what constitutes wages properly payable. The Act of 1991 confers considerable discretion on the court in the determination of such issues.

25. Counsel thus emphasises the statutory framework of the Act and submits:-

i. The rationale of the Act, as evident from its long title, is to provide further protection to employees in relation to the payment of wages.

ii. The investigation which is required to be carried out, must be viewed in the context of the redress available which is limited to a complaint that the employee's wages had been subjected to unlawful deduction.

iii. Section 5(5) of the Act permits the deduction of overpayment of wages, where such overpayment may have been made for any reason and this clearly includes an error in computation or, it is submitted, an error in the stated wages payable. Thus, the jurisdiction conferred on the Labour Court is an extensive one.

26. Reliance is placed on the decision of the EAT in Sullivan v. Department of Education [1998] ELR 217 and Dunnes Stores (Cornelscourt) Limited v. Lacey [2007] 1 I.R. 478. In Sullivan it was held that emphasis ought to be placed on the expression "properly payable" within the meaning of the Act.

27. With regard to the second issue, the respondent submits that it was within the courts' jurisdiction to make such finding on the evidence. The Labour Court had correctly adopted the reasoning of the adjudication officer on this point. The adjudication officer stated:-

> "Giving these words their ordinary meaning, the premium is paid for hours between Saturday and Sunday, not between Friday and Saturday. The fact of the complainant working the early hours of Saturday morning does not enable him to recover this additional premium pursuant to this provision. This element of the claim is therefore, not well founded."

28. Finally, with regard to the refusal to extend time, it is submitted that the finding of the Labour Court who concurred with the adjudication officer, is unassailable and that no error of law arises. In O'Donnell v. Dun Laoghaire Corporation [1991] I.R.L.M. 301, Costello J., when addressing whether there were good reasons for extending time, stated:-

> "The phrase 'good reasons' is one of wide import which it would be futile to attempt to define precisely. However, in considering whether or not there are good reasons for extending the time, I think it is clear that the test must be an objective one and that the court should not extend the time merely because an aggrieved plaintiff believes that he or she was justified in delaying the institution of proceedings. What the plaintiff has to show (and I think the onus under O. 84, r. 21 is on the plaintiff) is that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford a justifiable excuse for the delay..."

29. Thus, it is submitted that the appellant has not discharged the onus of establishing reasonable cause for extending the time. Further, in the context of statutory appeals such as s. 46 of the Workplace Relations Act 2015, O. 84C of the Rules of the Superior Courts provides for procedures where provision is not made either by the enactment concerned or by another order of the Rules.

30. With regard to s. 4 of the Act of 1991, the adjudication officer considered this section and concluded that it concerned statements of wages paid to employees i.e. payslips. He also expressed the opinion that the section was not justiciable before an adjudication officer and that s. 4(3) offered a good faith defence to employers facing prosecution arising from an error in a payslip or other similar document. He continued:-

> "Section 4(3) cannot be extended to apply to errors relating to wages and statements issued pursuant to s. 3 of the Terms of Employment (Information) Act or in the contract of employment. There is no statutory provision which enables the employer to set aside a contractual term even where there is an error made in good faith."

31. The Labour Court, although noting the argument made by the respondent that the adjudication officer had erred in his interpretation of s. 4(3) of the Act did not address this further in its determination and it does not appear to have formed a basis for any part of its reasoning.

Decision

32. This is an appeal on a point of law pursuant to s. 46 of the Workplace Relations Act 2015. It is not necessary to provide a detailed analysis of the court's role on this appeal as has been discussed in Fitzgibbon v. Law Society [2015] 1 I.R. 156, An Post v. Monaghan [2013] IEHC 404, Dunnes Stores v. Doyle [2014] 25 E.L.R. 184, and Health Services Executive v. Abdel Raouf Sallam [2014] IEHC 298, where Baker J. observed that the High Court must show appropriate curial deference to the Labour Court, but that such deference arises when the Labour Court deploys its particular expertise on industrial relations issues.

33. Thus, the court has a limited role on this statutory appeal which is confined to a point, or points, of law. It must respect the specialist role of the Labour Court. Nevertheless, it may intervene where an error of law has been demonstrated or where a finding of fact has been made which is unsupported by the evidence. To this end, the process by which findings of fact are made may be a question of law. The court's role in the determination of an appeal on a point of law under s. 46 of the Workplace Relations Act, 2015, however, is broader than that which it enjoys on an application for judicial review.

34. Section 5 of the Act of 1991 prohibits the making of deductions from wages save in certain circumstances. Section 5(6) provides that where the total amount of any wages that are paid on any occasion by an employer to an employee is less than the total amount of wages that is properly payable by him to the employee, then, except insofar as the deficiency or non – payment is attributable to an error of computation, the amount of the deficiency or non – payment should be treated as a deduction made by the employer from the wages of the employee on the occasion.

35. Central to the court's analysis must be the concepts of wages properly payable and the circumstances in which, if there is a deficiency in respect of those such payments, it arose as a result of an error of computation.

36. The provisions of s. 5(6) of the Act of 1991 were considered by Finnegan P. in Dunnes Stores (Cornelscourt) Limited v. Lacey [2007] 1 I.R. 478. A Rights Commissioner had found in favour of the respondents holding that the cessation of service pay amounted to an unlawful deduction, which was upheld by the EAT. It was argued that the EAT should address the question of remuneration properly payable to an employee before considering the question of a deduction or whether a deduction was unlawful. Finnegan P. concluded at p. 482:-

> "I am satisfied upon careful perusal of the documents relied upon by the respondents that the same cannot represent the agreement or an acknowledgement of the agreement contended for but rather contain a clear denial of the existence of any such agreement. No other evidence of an agreement was proffered. In these circumstances I am satisfied that the Employment Appeals Tribunal erred in law in failing to address the question of the remuneration properly payable to the respondents, such a determination being essential to the making by it of a determination. Insofar as a finding is implicit in the determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal that the appellant agreed to pay to the respondents service pay and a long service increment, then such finding was made without evidence and indeed in the face of the evidence: I am satisfied that there has been no deduction of pay from the respondents within the terms of the Act of 1991 but rather their remuneration has been unilaterally increased by the appellant making a payment which recognises their long service in excess of that which was payable prior to the 18th September, 2002. In either case there has been an error or law. Accordingly I allow the appeal."

37. This decision supports the proposition that the first matter which should be addressed by the Labour Court is to determine what wages are properly payable under the contract.

38. Both parties rely on the decision of Hunt J. in Babianskas v. First Glass Ltd [2016] IEHC 598, in support of their respective positions. It is appropriate therefore to consider this decision. There, the plaintiff was employed as a lorry driver who made a claim under the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 in respect of annual leave and public holidays. His written contract of employment stipulated that he was entitled to be paid €34,384 per annum, which converted to a weekly wage of €668.75. He was in fact paid €554.48 per week. Hunt J. found that the Labour Court had correctly summarised the substance of the appellant's case as follows:-

"The rate specified in his contract of employment is the rate that is liable to be paid to him in respect of time worked, within the meaning of Regulation 2 and should, on that account, be deemed to be his normal weekly or daily rate for the purpose of calculating his holiday pay."

39. The Labour Court noted that the purpose of the Regulations was to ensure that for annual leave or public holidays an employee received no less or no more than he or she would have received if he or she was working during the period in question. Finding against the appellant in respect of the holiday and annual leave claims, it found that the appropriate reference point for such claims was the lower amount actually received by the employee rather than the higher rate specified in the contract of employment. Hunt J. stated that the Labour Court was required to determine whether the amount liable to be paid was that specified in the contract, or that actually paid to the appellant over a protracted period after the date of the written contract. He continued:-

"In my view, having correctly identified that Regulation 2 was the relevant applicable provision in the case, it did not proceed to provide a clear analysis of the legal basis upon which it considered that the amount liable to be paid was the amount actually paid rather than the higher amount specified in the written contract between the parties."

The starting point is that the appellant was initially liable to be paid the amount stipulated in the written contract, and only became liable to be paid a lesser amount if there was some enforceable variation of that contract, whether by waiver, estoppel or agreement. He continued:-

"The Labour Court simply referred to his apparent acceptance of the lower sum over a long period of time. The protracted acceptance of the lower sum is an undoubted fact, but in my view it was insufficient on its own to permit the Labour Court to decide that the appellant was liable to be paid the lower amount on the basis of a simple extrapolation that the level of liability was fixed solely by the fact that a lower sum was subsequently accepted by him."

40. The learned judge held that the obligation of the Labour Court to ascertain the sum that the appellant was liable to be paid for the purposes of Regulation 2 implied that it had carried out an inquiry and an analysis of the meaning and application of that provision in the context of the facts before it. He continued:-

"The assumption that the relevant sum was the actual amount paid, coupled with a reference to the issue of potential unlawful deductions being determined elsewhere, did not in my view amount to a full consideration of the meaning and application of the term 'liable' in the context of the instant case. There is certainly a serious issue as to whether the term 'sums liable to be paid' is necessarily synonymous with payments actually made."

He found the Labour Court had erred in law by assuming or inferring that the apparent acceptance by the appellant of the lesser sum than that to which he was initially contractually entitled, automatically meant that this was the sum which he was liable to be paid. He considered that the proper and full resolution of this issue required more extensive factual and legal analysis by the Labour Court, not that the final result must necessarily be different. He therefore remitted the matter to the Labour Court for further consideration.

41. Mr. Dunne S.C. submits that Babianskas does not assist Mr. Balans because the court was there concerned with a failure on the part of the Labour Court to properly assess the correct wages paid to the appellant and that the point of law appeal focused on the failure on the part of the Labour Court to properly hear the parties on the significant questions of law at issue and to allow for an adequate challenge of evidence. It is submitted that the Labour Court, in this case, carried out its obligation to conduct an analysis of the wages which were properly due to the appellant. To this end, they engaged with the evidence and concluded that the wages as contained in the contract were incorrectly computed by reference to an error. It is also submitted that there is no criticism that the Labour Court had failed to properly consider the evidence. It had determined that there was no unlawful deduction of wages in circumstances where any such alleged deficiency was due to a computational error. There was adequate material before the Labour Court to come to this conclusion. On the other hand, counsel for the appellant relies on this case as authority for the proposition that the Labour Court had erred in law by disregarding Mr. Balans' contractual entitlement to be paid wages. He calls in aid dicta of Hunt J. that the starting point of legal analysis is that the appellant was initially liable to be paid the amount stipulated in the written contract which could be reduced only if there was some enforceable variation of the contract.

42. I have considered the reasoning of Hunt J. and in my view, there is nothing in this judgment which detracts from what was stated by Finnegan J. in Lacey or inconsistent with the approach which the Labour Court stated it was taking in this case, namely that to ground the claim under the Act of 1991 wages must be properly payable. Thus, in my view, there is nothing incorrect in this approach. It seems to me, however, that where the difficulty arises is that the Labour Court, rather than making the necessary assessment of wages properly payable under the Act of 1991 proceeded to perhaps unwittingly conflate that issue with the separate issue of whether there had been a deduction and whether that deduction came within the exception governed by s. 5(6). In so doing, in the opinion of this court, the Labour Court fell into error in failing to appropriately assess the wages properly payable to the appellant within the meaning of the Act of 1991.

43. Further, I accept counsel for the appellant's submission that in the circumstances of this case any error made in the drafting of the contract is not to be equated with a deficiency or non-payment attributable to a computational error within the meaning of s. 5(6). It does not appear to me that s. 5(6) of the Act was designed to permit the effective rectification of a contract which, on the submission of one of the parties, contains an error.

44. In arriving at its conclusion, the Labour Court relied on Collins and Matchett. In Collins, it was held that to ground the claim in respect of an unlawful deduction under the Act, the wages concerned must be properly payable. The claimant did not dispute that there were agreed General Council Reports setting out how workers in his position should be treated when promoted through an external competition. The Labour Court concluded from the submissions of the parties and the oral submissions made on the day that the rate of pay set out in the contract was not properly payable to the complainant. The decision does not record any further reason for this conclusion and it is unclear whether the arguments raised before this court were aired before the Labour Court in that case. In Matchett, it appears, as submitted by counsel for the appellant, that the contract authorised the deduction.

45. With regard to the second ground of appeal it seems to me that there was adequate material before the Labour Court to determine, as it did, that the phrase "hours worked between Saturday and Sunday" did not mean that the premium was payable for hours worked between midnight on Friday/Saturday and 6 am on Saturday mornings. In my view, on analysis of the documentation before the court, it was entitled to come to this conclusion and no error of law has been identified. Insofar as its contended that adequate reasons were not provided, and in so far as the court is entitled to consider the grounds of appeal being advanced on such ground, given the clear and stated reasons of the adjudication officer, the Labour Court, in my view was entitled to state its agreement with his approach and to concur with his view. It goes without saying, however, that it may not always be sufficient to simply concur with others' reasoning. Much would be dependent on the facts and circumstances of each case.

46. Similar considerations apply to the third ground of the appeal, namely the extension of time. No case is made by the appellant that he was lulled into a false sense of security by engaging in the internal grievance procedure, nor does the appellant claim that he relied on a representation that the respondent would not rely on the time limits specified in s. 41(8) of the Workplace Relations Act 2015. It is clear from the wording of that subsection that the adjudication officer enjoys a discretion to extend the time to entertain a complaint. It provides:-

> "An adjudication officer may entertain a complaint or dispute to which this section applies presented or referred to the Director General after the expiration of the period referred to in subsection (6) or (7) (but not later than 6 months after such expiration), as the case may be, if he or she is satisfied that the failure to present the complaint or refer the dispute within that period was due to reasonable cause."

47. The Labour Court concurred with the decision of the adjudication officer that there was no reasonable cause to justify an extension of the six-month time limit. The adjudication officer also concluded that whatever the shortcomings of the grievance process, they did not prevent the referral of the complaint. Even if this Court were to take a different view to the Labour Court, which adopted the adjudication officer's view, I am not satisfied that any difference of view in this regard could be said to amount to an error of law. In my view there was adequate available material to enable the Labour Court to conclude as it did and to adopt the reasoning of the adjudication officer in this regard. The parties were fully aware of the reasons advanced by the adjudication officer for his decision and in the particular circumstances of this case, the Labour Court is not, in my view, to be criticised for the manner in which it explained its decision by expressing its concurrence with the decision of the adjudication officer. Further, it is matter for the appellant to discharge the onus of proof in this regard and I have seen nothing in this case that might fall foul of the principles outlined by Costello J. in O'Donnell v. Dun Laoghaire Corporation [1991] I.R.L.M. 301, referred to above, or of Laffoy J. in Minister for Finance v. Civil and Public Service Union and Ors [2007] ELR 36, to which the court was also referred.

48. In the circumstances, I allow the appeal on the first ground of appeal and reject the second and third grounds of appeal. The matter ought to be remitted back to the Labour Court for determination.

49. On the evidence presented by the respondent it may be that the stance adopted by the appellant is ultimately found to be without substantive merit, but that is not a matter for the determination by this court and the court is not to be taken as expressing any view on such merits. The court has found that an error of law arises. On reconsideration of the appeal in accordance with the principles outlined in this judgment, it is open to the Labour Court to arrive, or not arrive, at the same conclusion. Further, nothing in this judgment should be taken as affecting the rights and remedies which the parties may have in any other forum.

THE HIGH COURT
JUDICIAL REVIEW

2021 No. 671 JR

BETWEEN

AMMI BURKE

APPLICANT

AND

AN ADJUDICATION OFFICER
THE WORKPLACE RELATIONS COMMISSION

RESPONDENTS

ARTHUR COX LLP

NOTICE PARTY

JUDGMENT of Mr. Justice Garrett Simons delivered on 11 November 2021

INTRODUCTION

1. These judicial review proceedings seek to challenge the manner in which a claim for unfair dismissal has been dealt with. The claim for unfair dismissal had been submitted initially to the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission, who duly referred it to an independent adjudication officer for determination.

2. The claim for unfair dismissal had been part heard, but not yet determined, when the Supreme Court delivered its landmark decision in Zalewski v. An Adjudication Officer [2021] IESC 24; [2021] 32 E.L.R. 213. This decision has significant implications for the hearing and determination of claims under the auspices of the Workplace Relations Commission. Relevantly, the Supreme Court held that, in the case of a claim for unfair dismissal, the absence from the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 of any provision for the administration of an oath, or any possibility of punishment for giving false evidence, was inconsistent with the Constitution of Ireland.

3. The legislation regulating the procedure for unfair dismissal claims has since been amended in an attempt to give effect to the decision of the Supreme Court. Prior to the introduction of this amending legislation, the adjudication officer, who had been assigned to determine the claim the subject-matter of these judicial review proceedings, had notified the parties that the hearing of the claim would have to commence afresh before a different adjudication officer once the (then anticipated) amending legislation had been enacted.

4. The claimant in the unfair dismissal proceedings seeks to challenge the legality of this approach. It is said, variously, that the decision in Zalewski does not apply to claims which were already part heard, and that, in any event, there is no requirement for an oath to be administered in the context of this particular claim for unfair dismissal.

5. The principal reliefs sought in these judicial review proceedings include, inter alia, an order directing the (original) adjudication officer to resume the hearing of the claim, and an order compelling the adjudication officer to direct the disclosure of certain documentation. In oral submission, it was said that this court has a duty to put the adjudication officer back in "her judging box" to hear out the rest of the claim for unfair dismissal.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

6. The applicant for judicial review is a qualified solicitor and had been employed by the notice party, Arthur Cox Solicitors ("the law firm" where convenient). The applicant's employment was terminated summarily in November 2019. The applicant has since brought a claim for unfair dismissal pursuant to the provisions of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977.

7. The procedure governing unfair dismissal claims is prescribed principally under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, and partly under the Workplace Relations Act 2015.

8. The claim for unfair dismissal had been made to the Workplace Relations Commission on 31 January 2020. In accordance with the statutory procedure prescribed, the claim was referred by the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission to an independent adjudication officer for determination. The claim has been part heard, having been before the adjudication officer on five separate occasions between September 2020 and May 2021. It should be explained that on a number of these days the hearing was limited to a matter of hours in compliance with the then applicable covid-related public health measures.

9. This judgment is not concerned with the underlying merits of the claim for unfair dismissal. However, to allow the reader to understand certain of the grounds of judicial review advanced, it is necessary to rehearse one aspect of the claim as follows.

10. It appears that the applicant's former employer, Arthur Cox Solicitors, is seeking to defend the claim for unfair dismissal on the basis of the law firm's dissatisfaction with the applicant's (alleged) conduct and behaviour in the office and her relationship with her colleagues. It further appears that the law firm has sought to place particular reliance on an incident said to have taken place on Monday, 1 April 2019. There had been a conversation on that date between the applicant and a partner at the law firm, Mr. Kevin Lynch. This conversation related to events on the preceding Friday and Saturday. The applicant and Mr. Lynch had been acting on opposite sides of a so-called "Chinese Wall" in respect of a commercial transaction. The applicant maintains that there had been delays on the part of Mr. Lynch's team in progressing the transaction, and that these delays were as a result of Mr. Lynch and members of his team having attended a social event that evening marking the departure of a senior associate from the law firm.

11. The applicant, in her grounding affidavit, has described the conversation on Monday, 1 April 2019 as involving her "respectfully" mentioning to Mr. Lynch that she did not think it acceptable that she had been left in the office until 2 am as a result of his team's delays due to socialising. The applicant has explained, in submission to this court, that Mr. Lynch has described the conversation in very different terms, having told the adjudication officer that she (the applicant) had "shouted" at him on 1 April 2019 and had accused him of delays. Mr. Lynch is also said to have told the adjudication officer that he had never been treated like that in all of his years at the law firm.

12. The parties had given (unsworn) evidence on this issue at a hearing before the adjudication officer on 20 October 2020. It seems that there was a significant dispute at the hearing as to whether the relevant commercial transaction had been completed at 2 am or at 10.30 pm. Mr. Lynch had, seemingly, maintained the position at the hearing that the transaction had been completed at the earlier time. The applicant insisted that the transaction had not closed until 2 am.

13. It has subsequently been conceded on behalf of the law firm that the applicant had been correct in her recollection. This concession is stated as follows in a letter dated 25 March 2021 to the adjudication officer from the solicitors acting on behalf of the law firm:

> "Since the matter was last heard our client has checked their records in respect of the transaction referenced in Ms Burke's letter, and we are happy to confirm that Ms Burke's position is correct, that the particular deal that Ms Burke worked on over 29/30 March 2019 closed at approximately 2 am, and that Mr Lynch was in his evidence confusing this with another matter that also closed on 30 March 2019.
> It was the intention of our client that Mr Geoff Moore, Managing Partner would clarify this matter at the outset of the forthcoming hearing prior to his giving evidence, but as Ms Burke has sought clarity on this matter at this juncture, we are happy to correct the record in this regard."

14. Prior to receipt of this letter, the applicant had made both an oral and a written request to the adjudication officer that relevant emails over a six-hour period on the night of 29 March 2019 be produced. The adjudication officer had declined this request, stating that she did not deem it necessary that these emails be produced to her at this time. The adjudication officer's letter went on to say that if, during the course of the (unfair dismissal) proceedings, it became apparent that she needed sight of these emails, then she would review the matter accordingly.

15. As discussed at paragraph 86 et seq. below, the applicant remains aggrieved at the manner in which the adjudication officer dealt with her request for the disclosure of the emails. It is now said that the content of these emails would have confirmed, first, the time at which the commercial transaction closed; and secondly, that the delay in completing the transaction occurred because Mr. Lynch had been out at a social event marking the departure of a senior associate from the law firm.

16. The hearing of the claim for unfair dismissal had been fixed to resume on 31 March 2021, but had been rescheduled, at the request of the law firm, to 12 May 2021.

17. The Supreme Court delivered its judgments in Zalewski v. An Adjudication Officer on 6 April 2021. Shortly thereafter, on 16 April 2021, the Workplace Relations Commission published a notice on its website outlining certain procedural changes consequent upon the decision of the Supreme Court. Relevantly, the approach to be taken in claims where an adjudication officer determines that there is a serious and direct conflict of evidence between the parties is stated as follows:

> "Cases where there is a serious and direct conflict of Evidence
>
> Save where the investigation or hearing does not amount to the administration of justice (ie in industrial relations disputes), where an Adjudication Officer determines that there is a serious and direct conflict of evidence between the parties to a complaint before him/her, or one emerges in the course of the hearing, the Adjudication Officer will adjourn the hearing to await the amendment of the Workplace Relations Act 2015 and related enactments to grant to Adjudication Officers the power to administer an oath or affirmation, and provide for a punishment for the giving of false evidence.
>
> However, in order to minimise delay to the parties, unless a postponement is granted in advance, all scheduled hearings will commence in the normal manner and proceed to conclusion subject to the requirement that it will be necessary to adjourn where an adjudication officer concludes that it is necessary that an oath or affirmation be administered, as outlined above. Following the judgment, the fact that the parties indicate a view that there is no requirement for an oath to be administered is not > determinative of the question. Adjudication Officers will determine whether they consider the oath to be necessary."

18. Approximately one month later, on 21 May 2021, a revised version of the notice was published on the Workplace Relations Commission's website. Relevantly, this version indicated that the following procedures would apply in respect of part-heard cases:

> "6. Cases part-heard as of 7 April 2021
>
> Where a case commenced prior to 7 April 2021 which has not concluded, and where, inevitably, evidence was heard without an oath or affirmation being administered, the Adjudication Officer will now have to consider whether a serious and direct conflict of evidence arises in the case.
>
> If the Adjudication Officer decides that there is such serious and direct conflict of evidence, then the case will* have to commence afresh before a different Adjudication Officer who will administer the oath or affirmation once the legislation is in place.
>
> Parties will have the opportunity to make submissions before any determination is made on this question. It is intended that part-heard cases will be scheduled for hearing to determine whether there is a serious and direct conflict of evidence. This will be done by the Adjudication Officer who already part-heard the matter and they will decide whether the case can be completed without an oath or affirmation or whether it must start afresh."
>
> *The word "will" has since been amended to "may".

19. The applicant's claim for unfair dismissal had been scheduled to resume on 12 May 2021. There is no transcript of the hearing on that date, but it seems that, having heard submissions from both sides on the implications of the Supreme Court's decision, the adjudication officer had indicated to the parties that there would have to be a fresh hearing of the claim for unfair dismissal by a different adjudication officer.

20. Some two weeks later, on 26 May 2021, the (original) adjudication officer wrote to the parties in the following terms:

> "You will recall that, at the adjudication hearing on 12th May 2021, I drew your attention to the Supreme Court judgment in Zalewski v. Adjudication Officer and WRC, Ireland and the Attorney General [2021] IESC 24 where the Supreme Court found that, where there was a serious and direct conflict of evidence in a case before a WRC Adjudication Officer, evidence must be taken under oath. The Supreme Court found that to do otherwise would be unconstitutional.
>
> The judgment of the Supreme Court is reflected in the WRC web-notice Supreme Court judgment: Impact on WRC Adjudications, the Workplace Relations Act 2015 and related statutes - Workplace Relations Commission which contains information in relation to part-heard cases and cases where there is a direct and serious conflict of evidence.
>
> I would draw your attention to the section of the web-notice concerning part-heard cases which provides that, where a case commenced prior to 7 April 2021 and has not concluded, and where, inevitably, evidence was heard without an oath or affirmation being administered, the Adjudication Officer will now have to consider whether a serious and direct conflict of evidence arises in the case.
>
> I have noted the submissions you made in this regard at the hearing on 12th May 2021 and I have determined that there is a serious and direct conflict of evidence in this case. Accordingly, I am of the view that this case will have to commence afresh before a different Adjudication Officer who will administer the oath or affirmation once the enabling legislation is in place.
>
> I will now inform the Adjudication Services administration section that, in light of the unique circumstances which pertain, I am recusing myself from this case and requesting that will it be scheduled to recommence before a different Adjudication Officer. I am firmly of the view that, in light of the Supreme Court judgment, this is the safest and most prudent course of action.
> I sincerely regret any difficulty that this may cause to the parties, but it is outside our control. However, I wish to reassure you that, once the necessary legislation has been enacted, this case will be scheduled as a priority."

21. It should be explained that the applicant attaches great weight to the fact that the version of the public notice referenced in the above letter is the revised version which had been published a number of days after the hearing on 12 May 2021. The applicant had initially alleged, in her oral submission to this court, that the amended public notice represented an "after the fact clean-up" or a "whitewashing" of the adjudication officer's decision made at the hearing on 12 May 2021.

22. The applicant engaged thereafter in correspondence with the adjudication officer and with other officials of the Workplace Relations Commission. Given the emphasis that the applicant places on it, it is necessary to set out the content of one particular letter verbatim. This is a letter dated 14 July 2021 sent to the applicant by the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission. The operative part of the letter reads as follows:

> "As you will be aware, once a case is assigned to an Adjudication Officer and she or he has seisin of the case: section 40 (8) of the Workplace Relations Act 2015 applies viz. An adjudication officer shall be independent in the performance of his or her functions.
> My understanding is that the Adjudication Officer concerned has indicated to the parties that it would best serve the interests of those concerned that she recuses herself and indeed advised both parties of her decision by letter dated 26 May 2021.
>
> Again, I understand that the Adjudication Officer has indicated that evidence was heard without an oath or affirmation being administered and has come to the view that there is a serious and direct conflict of evidence in this case. In light of the Supreme Court judgment in Zalewski v Adjudication Officer and WRC, Ireland and the Attorney General [2021] IESC 24, an oath or affirmation is required in such circumstances and, given the Adjudication Officer's decision to recuse herself, this matter must commence afresh before a different Adjudication Officer who will administer the oath or affirmation if she or he is of the opinion that such an oath is indeed required.

> The assigning of the complaint to a different Adjudication Officer is in train and the scheduling of the hearing will be done expeditiously once the enabling legislation is in place."

23. I return to discuss this letter at paragraph 75 below.

24. The within proceedings were instituted by way of an ex parte application for leave to apply for judicial review on 19 July 2021. The High Court (Barr J.) granted leave on that date. A number of days thereafter, the applicant applied to the High Court (Simons J.) for a priority hearing of the proceedings. That application for priority had been made ex parte, and the court directed that the application be made on notice to the respondent and notice party on 30 August 2021. On that date, the hearing of the substantive application for judicial review was fixed for a one-day hearing on 20 October 2021. Prior to the hearing date, there was a further application for directions on 15 October 2021.

25. The substantive hearing of the application for judicial review commenced on 20 October 2021, but did not finish on that date. The hearing was adjourned for a number of days to allow the applicant time to review the transcript of the first day's hearing and to finalise her rebuttal points. The applicant completed her reply at a short hearing on 26 October 2021. Judgment was reserved until today's date.

26. It should be noted that the Workplace Relations Commission and the adjudication officer ("the respondents") have chosen to participate in these judicial review proceedings on a limited basis only. The submissions made on behalf of the respondents were directed principally to standing over the correctness of the guidance published on the Commission's website. The respondents largely left it to the notice party, i.e. the applicant's former employer, to respond to the other grounds of challenge.

27. The respondents' approach in this regard is informed by their view that the position of an adjudication officer is analogous to that of a judge of the District Court or the Circuit Court in respect of whose decisions judicial review proceedings have been taken. The respondents rely in this regard on, inter alia, the judgments of the Supreme Court in Noonan Services Ltd v. Labour Court, unreported, 14 May 2004, and Miley v. Employment Appeals Tribunal [2016] IESC 20; [2018] 1 I.R. 787.

WORKPLACE RELATIONS (MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS) ACT 2021

28. The procedures governing a claim for unfair dismissal have now been amended so as to confer an express statutory power to administer an oath and to prescribe penalties for false evidence. These amendments were introduced under the Workplace Relations (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2021.

29. Section 8 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 now includes a new subsection, subsection (14), as follows:

> "(a) An adjudication officer may require a person giving evidence in proceedings under this section to give such evidence on oath or affirmation and, for that purpose, cause to be administered an oath or affirmation to such person.
>
> (b) A person who, in or for the purpose of proceedings under this section, gives a statement material in the proceedings while lawfully sworn as a witness that is false and that he or she knows to be false shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable—
>
> (i) on summary conviction, to a class B fine or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, or both, or
>
> (ii) on conviction on indictment, to a fine not exceeding €100,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years, or both.".

30. This amendment was commenced with effect from 29 July 2021.

DETAILED DISCUSSION

TEMPORAL LIMITS OF SUPREME COURT'S DECISION IN ZALEWSKI

31. The Supreme Court in Zalewski held, by a majority, that the determination of a claim for unfair dismissal involves the administration of justice and that the carrying out of this function by a non-judicial body is permissible under Article 37 of the Constitution of Ireland. The Supreme Court emphasised that the standard of justice administered under Article 37 cannot be lower or less demanding than the justice administered in courts under Article 34.

32. Relevantly, the Supreme Court held that, in the case of a claim for unfair dismissal, the absence of any provision under the then legislation for the administration of an oath, or of any possibility of punishment for giving false evidence, was inconsistent with the Constitution of Ireland.

33. The applicant submits that the finding of unconstitutionality made in Zalewski should not apply to part-heard claims for unfair dismissal in respect of which evidence had been tendered prior to the date of the Supreme Court's decision on 6 April 2021. It is also submitted that the amendments made to the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 by the Workplace Relations (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2021 do not have retrospective effect, i.e. in the sense of applying to extant claims.

34. The applicant advances three principal arguments in support of the proposition that the finding of unconstitutionality should not apply to part-heard claims, as follows. First, it is sought to distinguish a line of case law, running from A. v. Governor of Arbour Hill Prison [2006] IESC 45; [2006] 4 I.R. 88 to Wansboro v. Director of Public Prosecutions [2018] IESC 63;

[2019] 1 I.L.R.M. 305, on the basis that the claim here is a civil matter not a criminal matter. The point is made that a claim for unfair dismissal does not engage the right to personal liberty.

35. Secondly, it is said that the finding of unconstitutionality has caused a disadvantage to the applicant in that the procedural law has changed halfway through her claim for unfair dismissal. This is contrasted with the position of the litigants in the earlier case law, who are said to have been seeking to rely on a finding of unconstitutionality to their benefit.

36. Thirdly, it is sought to draw a distinction between a finding of unconstitutionality based on omission, i.e. the absence of a legislative provision deemed to be constitutionally required, and a finding based on the inclusion of an offending provision.

37. For the reasons which follow, I have concluded that none of these arguments are well founded.

38. The submission that a finding that legislation is unconstitutional operates differently as between civil and criminal proceedings is not borne out by the case law. The Supreme Court held in A. v. Governor of Arbour Hill Prison that, when an Act is declared unconstitutional, a distinction must be made between the making of such a declaration and its retrospective effects on cases which have already been determined by the courts. This is necessary in the interests of legal certainty, the avoidance of injustice and the overriding interests of the common good in an ordered society. Thus, whereas the default position is that a legislative provision which is held to be invalid should be regarded as void ab initio, this is subject to an exception in circumstances where the rights of the parties have already been finally and conclusively determined in legal proceedings.

39. The Supreme Court considered that this exception applies to both civil and criminal proceedings. See, for example, the following passage from the judgment of Murray C.J. in A. v. Governor of Arbour Hill Prison (at paragraph 85 of the reported judgment):

> "Absolute retroactivity based solely on the notion of an Act being void ab initio so as to render any previous final judicial decisions null would lead the Constitution to have dysfunctional effects in the administration of justice. In the area of civil law it would cause injustice to those who had accepted and acted upon the finality of judicial decisions. Rights which had become vested in third parties as a consequence of such decisions would be put in jeopardy. […]".

40. Murray C.J. set out his conclusions on this issue as follows (at paragraphs 114 to 117 of the reported judgment):

> "It follows from the principles and considerations set out in the cases, which I have cited, that final decisions in judicial proceedings, civil or criminal, which have been decided on foot of an Act of the Oireachtas which has been relied upon by parties because of its status as a law considered or presumed to be constitutional, should not be set aside by reason solely of a subsequent decision declaring the Act constitutionally invalid.
>
> The parties have been before the courts, They have, in accordance with due process, had their opportunity to rely on the law and the Constitution and the matter has been decided. Once finality has been reached and the parties have in the context of each case exhausted their actual or potential remedies the judicial decision must be deemed valid and lawful.
> Save in exceptional circumstances, any other approach would render the Constitution dysfunctional and ignore that it contains a complete set of rules and principles designed to ensure 'an ordered society under the rule of law' in the words of O'Flaherty J.

> I am quite satisfied that the Constitution never intended to visit on that ordered society the potential unravelling of judicial decisions over many decades when a particular Act is found unconstitutional solely on the consideration of the ab initio principle to the exclusion of all others."

41. As appears, the exception to the void ab initio principle is expressly stated to apply to both civil and criminal proceedings which have reached finality.

42. In the present case, the applicant's claim for unfair dismissal had not concluded even at first-instance as of the date of the Supreme Court's decision in Zalewski. Even if it had been concluded at first-instance, there would have been a statutory right of appeal against the adjudication officer's determination to the Labour Court. It follows, therefore, that the applicant's claim for unfair dismissal does not come within the exception to the general rule.

43. By contrast, the logic of the applicant's argument is that the adjudication officer should now determine the outstanding claim for unfair dismissal by reference to the unamended version of the legislation, and pursuant to the very procedure which has been found to be unconstitutional. With respect, for the adjudication officer to have adopted this approach, in the particular circumstances of this case, would have resulted in an administration of justice being carried out and concluded in a manner which has been identified as insufficient to ensure that justice is done in cases where there is a serious and direct conflict of fact. (See further paragraph 63 et seq. below).

44. The second argument advanced by the applicant for distinguishing the A. v. Governor of Arbour Hill Prison line of case law seeks to characterise the finding of unconstitutional invalidity as a disadvantage to her. The disadvantage is described principally in terms of delay in the determination of the claim for unfair dismissal, but it is also implied that a fresh hearing would confer some unarticulated advantage on her former employer.

45. The applicant's conception of the rights protected by the finding of constitutional invalidity is too narrow. As is apparent from the discussion at paragraphs 134 to 147 of the majority judgment in Zalewski, the procedural safeguards are intended to ensure that, in the case of a claim for unfair dismissal, the standard of justice administered under Article 37 of the Constitution of Ireland is not lower or less demanding than the justice administered in courts under Article 34. These procedural safeguards are necessary to permit a fair hearing and a proper application of the law. As such, the procedural safeguards are for the benefit of all parties to a claim for unfair dismissal: they are not the exclusive preserve of a claimant.

46. The finding that the previous procedure was deficient, and the subsequent introduction of amending legislation, is undoubtedly to the advantage of all sides, including the applicant. For the reasons explained at paragraph 63 et seq. below, it is essential that evidence in the applicant's unfair dismissal claim be given on oath and that both parties be entitled to defend their position by way of cross-examination on oath. It is inaccurate, therefore, to suggest that the applicant has been disadvantaged by the correction of the deficient procedure or that she is in a materially different position than the litigants in the earlier case law.

47. The third argument advanced by the applicant was that the decision in Zalewski did not apply to pending claims because the finding of unconstitutionality had been based on an omission, i.e. the absence of a legislative provision deemed to be constitutionally required. Other than to assert the proposition, the applicant made no attempt to substantiate this argument.

48. There is no support to be found for this proposition in the case law, as is apparent from the detailed discussion of constitutional lacuna in legislation in the leading textbook on constitutional law, Kelly: The Irish Constitution (Hogan, Whyte, Kenny, and Walsh editors, 5th edition, Bloomsbury Professional, 2018). The learned authors explain, at §§6.2.334 to 6.2.351, by particular reference to Carmody v. Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform [2009] IESC 71; [2010] 1 I.R. 635, the approach that is taken to vindicate constitutional rights in the case of an omission of a procedural requirement from legislation. It is incorrect, therefore, to suggest that it is permissible to continue to rely on an unconstitutional procedure simply because a legislative amendment is required to correct it.

49. It is sufficient to dispose of the applicant's argument to observe that the Supreme Court in Zalewski has ensured the effectiveness of its finding, i.e. that the absence from the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 of any provision for the administration of an oath is unconstitutional, by indicating that proceedings in certain types of claim are precluded pending legislative amendment. See the following passage from the majority judgment of O'Donnell J. (at paragraph 149):

> "These conclusions do not, moreover, appear to have any consequence for decisions already made in other cases under the 2015 Act, nor do they necessarily preclude current proceedings under the Act, even without amendment of the Act. The effect of this decision is that proceedings may be heard in public, and it would appear that it is only in those cases where an adjudication officer concludes that it is necessary that an oath be administered that the flaw in the Act would preclude proceedings pending any considered amendment of the Act.* However, I would hear the parties > further on the question of the precise remedy, and the order to be made."

> *Emphasis (italics) added.

50. This approach is broadly analogous to the approach in Carmody as discussed in the passages from Kelly: The Irish Constitution cited above. Thus, the peculiarity that the unconstitutionality arose as a result of an omission from the legislation—far from telling against the judgment applying to pending claims for unfair dismissal—has precisely the opposite result.

51. The applicant submits that the phrase "preclude proceedings pending any considered amendment of the Act" should be interpreted as meaning that part-heard claims, which involve a serious and direct conflict of evidence, should merely be adjourned until the enactment of amending legislation. Now that the amending legislation has been enacted, it is submitted that such claims should proceed, with the (original) adjudication officers administering oaths as they deem necessary to any witnesses. It is further submitted that if the "abortion" of proceedings, i.e. the recommencement of hearings under a different adjudication officer, had been the judicial intention, then the reference to "preclude ... pending" makes no sense for there would be nothing to await in the amending legislation to affect the part-heard proceedings.

52. With respect, these submissions seek to read too much into this passage of the judgment. As is apparent from the passage itself, and more particularly from the subsequent ruling of the Supreme Court on 15 April 2021, Zalewski v. An Adjudication Officer [2021] IESC 29, the Supreme Court were careful to confine the remedy to the particular circumstances of that case. On the facts of Zalewski, the claim for unfair dismissal had been determined by the adjudication officer and an order of certiorari was sought setting aside that determination. The case was not concerned with a part-heard claim, and the Supreme Court were not, therefore, required to address this specific contingency.

53. The passage at paragraph 149 of the majority judgment in Zalewski simply states that, in those cases where an adjudication officer concludes that it is necessary that an oath be administered, proceedings are precluded pending legislative amendment. This reflects the earlier finding that the structure created by a statutory requirement to give evidence on oath, and the possibility of prosecution for false evidence, is an important part of ensuring that justice is done in cases where there is a serious and direct conflict of evidence. The absence of such a provision from the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 rendered it unconstitutional.

54. The passage does no more than to highlight the potential consequences of the finding of unconstitutionality for current proceedings then pending before the Workplace Relations Commission. The passage does not attempt to anticipate what form a legislative amendment might take: that is a matter for the Oireachtas alone (N.V.H. v. Minister for Justice and Equality (No. 2) [2017] IESC 82). Still less does the passage seek to prescribe what should happen in circumstances where an adjudication officer has already heard unsworn evidence which discloses a serious and direct conflict. Indeed, the passage makes no specific reference to part-heard claims at all.

55. In summary, the fact that the applicant's claim for unfair dismissal had not been subject to a final and conclusive determination prior to the delivery of the Supreme Court's decision in Zalewski has the consequence that the determination of the claim must now be made in accordance with the principles identified by the Supreme Court.

NO LEGITIMATE EXPECTATION OR IMPERMISSIBLE RETROSPECTIVITY

56. The correct interpretation of the amendments introduced under the Workplace Relations (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2021 is that they apply to cases, such as the applicant's part-heard claim for unfair dismissal, which had not been finally and conclusively determined. This does not entail the amending legislation having an impermissible retrospective effect; rather the amendments apply prospectively to cases which have not yet been completed and in respect of which the rights of the parties have not yet been determined.

57. The applicant cannot be said to have any legitimate expectation that her claim for unfair dismissal would be completed under the unamended, invalid version of the legislation. It is long since established that there can be no legitimate expectation that a public authority will act contrary to law (Wiley v. Revenue Commissioners [1994] 2 I.R. 160).

DECISION TO DIRECT THAT HEARING RECOMMENCE

The applicant's position

58. Without prejudice to her principal argument that the judgment in Zalewski does not apply to part-heard claims, the applicant submitted, in the alternative, that the decision to direct that the hearing commence afresh under a different adjudication officer is unlawful. There are a number of related strands to this submission. I address these in sequence below.

59. The first argument is that there is no "serious and direct" conflict of fact such as would justify the taking of evidence on oath. The applicant submitted that there is only one major conflict of evidence, and that is in relation to Mr. Lynch's evidence. It was further submitted that the dispute as to the circumstances surrounding the completion of the commercial transaction on the night of 29 March 2019 is one which will be resolved by requiring Arthur Cox Solicitors to disclose emails for a six-hour period.

60. The applicant appeared to moderate this position somewhat during the course of her reply. In answer to a direct question from the court, the applicant accepted that the content of the emails (if disclosed) would have to be put formally to Mr. Lynch, and he would have to be afforded an opportunity to respond to same. The applicant then submitted that the appropriate course would be for the adjudication officer to serve a statutory notice directing Mr. Lynch to give evidence in the proceedings and to produce the emails sought by the applicant. (The power to serve such a statutory notice is provided for under section 8(13) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977). The applicant also accepted that an oath might be required in relation to the other witnesses on behalf of the law firm.

61. The second and third arguments advanced by the applicant overlap. It is submitted that—even if certain evidence must now be given on oath—there is no requirement for the entire hearing of the claim for unfair dismissal to recommence, still less that such a fresh hearing be before a different adjudication officer.

Findings of the court

62. This court is being invited to set aside a number of procedural decisions made by an adjudication officer in the course of the determination of a claim for unfair dismissal. It should be emphasised that it would be most unusual for this court, in the exercise of its judicial review jurisdiction, to intervene in the proceedings of any tribunal exercising a judicial function prior to the conclusion of those proceedings. I will return to discuss the rationale for this approach, and the appropriate standard of review, at paragraph 109 et seq. below. For present purposes, it is sufficient to note that one practical reason for this approach is that this court, on an application for judicial review, will only have a limited appreciation of what precisely has occurred in the proceedings before that tribunal.

63. There has been scant evidence adduced before this court regarding the proceedings before the adjudication officer. What is apparent, however, from what little has been put before this court is that the claim for unfair dismissal has given rise to significant disputes of fact. It is the applicant's case that one of the principal witnesses on behalf of the law firm has deliberately given false evidence to the adjudication officer. The applicant put the allegation as follows in her oral submissions to this court:

> "Mr. Lynch gave false evidence. He sprung a story. I remember I was sitting in my seat and I was shocked in Lansdowne House on Lansdowne Road. He gave a complete mischaracterisation and false account of events and that account, Arthur Cox [had not] submitted a precis of his evidence, Arthur Cox submitted a legal submission of many pages and there was nothing in there warning me that Mr. Lynch had prepared a story and was going to tell lies in relation to the events of that day."

64. The applicant reiterated this allegation on a number of occasions, referring variously to the "falsification of" and the "fabrication of" Mr. Lynch's evidence. This is, obviously, a very serious allegation to level against any witness, but is especially grave when made against a practising solicitor.

65. This factual controversy can only be properly and fairly resolved by requiring both sides in the unfair dismissal claim to give evidence on oath and to submit to cross-examination on oath. As explained by O'Donnell J. in the majority judgment in Zalewski (at paragraph 144), the significance of evidence on oath is not because of any importance attached to the procedure itself, but because it triggers the power to punish for false evidence and thus provides an incentive to truthful testimony. The judgment also reiterates (at paragraph 145) that the right to cross-examine the opposing party is fundamental to fair procedures, and is one of the rights without which no party could hope to make any adequate defence of their good name.

66. The suggestion that the factual controversy between the applicant and Mr. Lynch can be resolved simply by directing the disclosure of copies of emails exchanged over a six-hour period on the night of 29 March 2019 is incorrect. In the event that the production of the emails sought by the applicant were to be directed, the imperatives of fair procedures dictate that Mr. Lynch would then have to be given an opportunity, under cross-examination, to explain, if that be possible, any matters which might go to the credibility or reliability of his evidence. (See, by analogy, RAS Medical Ltd v. The Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland [2019] IESC 4; [2019] 1 I.R. 63 (at paragraphs 90 to 93)). It is inevitable, therefore, that sworn evidence will be required.

67. It is also incorrect to suggest that there is only one major conflict of evidence and that is in relation to Mr. Lynch's evidence. The applicant herself has asserted that were it to be established that Mr. Lynch had given false evidence, then this would "severely discount" the authenticity and the reliability of the evidence of two other partners of the law firm.

68. Moreover, it is apparent that not only is there a factual dispute as to what occurred on the night of 29 March 2019, there is also a significant factual dispute as to what occurred in its aftermath. As explained at paragraph 11 above, two radically different versions of the conversation on Monday, 1 April 2019 have been given to the adjudication officer, with one side describing it as respectful and the other saying that it involved shouting. It should also be noted that only part of the evidence intended to be called has been heard.

69. Having regard to the serious and direct conflicts of evidence which had emerged at the hearings before the adjudication officer to date, and having regard to the allegation that one witness has deliberately given false evidence to the adjudication officer, there can be no doubt but that the decision to discontinue the hearings, and to direct that this claim for unfair dismissal be heard and determined by a different adjudication officer is legally correct. The determination of the claim for unfair dismissal has potentially grave implications for both parties. It is essential that evidence be given on oath, and that both parties be entitled to defend their positions by way of cross-examination on oath.

70. Any suggestion that the rights of the respective parties would be vindicated by some sort of hybrid hearing, whereby the balance of the evidence would be given on oath, but the unsworn evidence received to date would remain on the record, is misplaced. The same standard—and the same potential penalties—must apply to all of the evidence to be given. It would place a decision-maker in an invidious position if he or she were invited to prefer unsworn evidence to sworn evidence.

71. In order to ensure confidence in the process, it was entirely reasonable to direct that the fresh hearing be conducted by a different adjudication officer. As correctly observed by the Workplace Relations Commission in its submissions to this court, it can readily be anticipated that the hypothetical "reasonable man" would have concerns that an adjudication officer, who has previously heard unsworn evidence in relation to a serious and direct conflict of fact, could already have reached a view on the basis of that unsworn evidence, which view would not necessarily be displaced upon a hearing of the evidence on a sworn basis.

72. It will be a question of fact and degree in any particular case as to whether the nature and extent of the unsworn evidence heard by an adjudication officer is such as to mandate that a claim be heard by a different adjudication officer. The present case, however, lies at the far end of the spectrum in that the allegation is that one of the parties deliberately gave false evidence. It was eminently sensible for the (original) adjudication officer to take the precaution of ensuring that the fresh hearing be before a different adjudication officer who had not had any prior involvement. Even were this decision to be characterised as conservative, it certainly cannot be condemned as unreasonable or irrational. Indeed, there would be much stronger grounds for judicial review had, counterfactually, the (original) adjudication officer decided to retain seisin of such a contentious part-heard claim for unfair dismissal rather than recuse herself.

73. The fact that the hearing will have to recommence will inevitably result in some delay and this is, understandably, a cause of frustration to both sides. It is crucial, however, that justice is not only done, but that it is seen to be done. The determination of a claim for unfair dismissal involves the administration of justice. The Supreme Court emphasised in Zalewski that the standard of justice administered under Article 37 cannot be lower or less demanding than the justice administered in courts under Article 34.

74. As reiterated by the Court of Appeal in Commissioner of an Garda Síochána v. Penfield Enterprises Ltd [2016] IECA 141, considerations such as administrative convenience, efficiency or delay cannot trump the requirement that justice is not only done, but is seen to be done. The decision that the claim for unfair dismissal be heard by a different adjudication officer ensures that there cannot be any question mark over the integrity of the process. Any delay caused is proportionate to this overarching objective. The benefit to the parties in terms of the elimination of any possible perception of predetermination by prior participation significantly outweighs any disbenefit in terms of delay. The Workplace Relations Commission has already indicated that priority will be given to the applicant's claim and the scheduling of the fresh hearing will be done expeditiously.

75. Finally, it should be recorded that there is no basis whatsoever for the applicant's attempted criticisms of the adjudication officer personally. The applicant had alleged that the decision to recuse herself from the fresh hearing of the claim for unfair dismissal was a unilateral decision made by the adjudication officer, separate from any Zalewski considerations, and is "proof" that the adjudication officer was more concerned about the other party and the interests of the other party. The applicant sought to rely in this regard on a selective and misleading reading of the letter of 14 July 2021 from the Director General of the Workplace Relations Commission. The operative part of this letter has been set out in full at paragraph 22 above. As appears therefrom, the recusal and the direction of a fresh hearing are clearly referable to the judgment of the Supreme Court.

76. The applicant had also alleged, in her initial oral submissions to this court, that the adjudication officer, in deciding to recuse herself, had been acting in the interests of a major law firm. This reflects a plea in the statement of grounds that the "only possible explanation" for the abortion of the proceedings and the refusal to direct disclosure is "a desire to protect the interests of" Arthur Cox Solicitors. It has also been pleaded that a reasonable observer would question whether the adjudication officer is recusing herself "for personal reasons, e.g. because she does not wish to direct Arthur Cox to disclose critical evidence or to make a finding of unfair dismissal against a major law firm".

77. It is entirely improper that these allegations should have been made: the adjudication officer's decisions are objectively justified and there is no basis for attributing any ulterior motive to her. The applicant subsequently withdrew the allegations on the second day of the hearing before me, stating that she wished to correct the record and to make it "crystal clear" that she is not alleging bias against either the adjudication officer or the Workplace Relations Commission.

CRITICISM OF THE COMMISSION'S PUBLISHED NOTICES

78. The applicant has sought to criticise the content of the various iterations of the notices published on the Workplace Relations Commission's website following the decision in Zalewski. The criticism, as pleaded in the statement of grounds, had been to the effect that the Workplace Relations Commission had applied an incorrect interpretation of the Supreme Court's decision.

79. In the course of oral submission, however, the applicant sought to advance an additional argument as follows. It was alleged that the notice published on the website was amended on 21 May 2021 to give foundation retrospectively to the adjudicator's decision to direct that the applicant's claim for unfair dismissal be heard afresh by a different adjudication officer. The applicant characterised this as a "whitewash" by the Workplace Relations Commission of an unlawful decision by the adjudication officer, and as a deliberate change of policy intended to affect and frustrate her proceedings.

80. With respect, there is no evidential basis for these allegations. The registrar of the Workplace Relations Commission, in her affidavit of 15 September 2021, has explained the genesis of the revised version of the guidance notice published on the Commission's website as follows:

> "13. I also emphasise to this Honourable Court that the WRC is an organisation driven by a commitment to excellence and in so doing the WRC strives to deliver a service which is fair and effective; in deliberating the implementation of the Supreme Court's judgment, the WRC was acutely cognisant of the impact on parties. I also say and believe that the Guidance arrived at to deal with part-heard cases was the product of a good faith and faithful interpretation of the judgments of the Supreme Court.
> 14. Consequently, on 16 April 2021, the day after the Supreme Court's ruling, the WRC published the first version of the Guidance online, updating parties on the outcome of the Supreme Court judgments and the immediate practical implications for parties. The WRC reflected on the judgments and considered its practical implications, which warranted a more detailed version of the Guidance and an updating of the Guidance insofar as related to part-heard matters in a version published on 21 May 2021.
> 15. I note that the Applicant seems to imply at Ground (E)(35) of the Statement of Grounds that the amendment to the Guidance published on 21 May 2021 arose as a result of the oral arguments made by the Applicant on 12 May 2021 and pleads that it appears that the WRC's interpretation of Zaleswski changed after the Applicant's oral arguments on 12 May 2021. This suggestion is incorrect. The initial version of the Guidance was published the day after the ruling to update parties at that time, but that version necessitated further particulars once the WRC had an opportunity to consider all of the logistical implications of the judgments. I also confirm that I had already envisaged the amendments for part-heard hearings that were introduced in the version of the Guidance published on 21 May 2021 prior to oral arguments being made by the Applicant in her case on 12 May 2021."

81. As appears, the registrar refutes any suggestion that the Workplace Relations Commission's interpretation of Zalewski changed after the applicant's oral arguments on 12 May 2021. The applicant has not sought to cross-examine the registrar on her affidavit.

82. More generally, it should be explained that an adjudication officer is independent in the exercise of his or her functions. Whereas the Workplace Relations Commission provides logistical support and training to adjudication officers, the notices published on the Commission's website in May 2021 did not have any statutory force and were not binding on the adjudication officers. The determination of any particular claim for unfair dismissal—and the making of procedural rulings in respect of such claim—is ultimately a matter for the adjudication officer alone. The adjudication officer to whom the applicant's claim for unfair dismissal had been referred had full jurisdiction to make the decisions that she did, and this jurisdiction was not contingent on the existence of any published policy by the Workplace Relations Commission.

83. The statement of grounds does not seek an order setting aside the published guidance. Indeed, given that the published guidance does not have statutory force, there might well be a question mark as to whether the guidance is amenable to judicial review. At all events, I am satisfied that the version of the guidance as revised on 30 July 2021 correctly identifies the implications of the decision in Zalewski for part-heard claims of unfair dismissal. This version of the guidance differs slightly from that published on 21 May 2021 in that it emphasises an adjudication officer's discretion to direct a fresh hearing, by changing the word "will" to "may" in the sentence "If the Adjudication Officer decides that there is such serious and direct conflict of evidence, then the case will have to commence afresh before a different Adjudication Officer […]".

84. The fact that this additional change was introduced subsequently does not affect the validity of the decision made by the adjudicator on 12 May 2021 and confirmed in her letter of 26 May 2021. This is because, as explained above, the jurisdiction to direct a fresh hearing was not contingent on the existence of any published policy. For the reasons set out at paragraph 63 et seq. above, the decision to discontinue the hearing, and to direct that this claim for unfair dismissal be heard and determined by a different adjudication officer, is legally correct.

85. Finally, the applicant sought to make something of the supposed failure of the Workplace Relations Commission to adduce statistics in respect of the precise number of part-heard claims which had been remitted to a fresh hearing. With respect, the legality of the decision to remit the applicant's claim falls to be assessed solely by reference to the particular circumstances of that claim. The fact—if fact it be—that only a small proportion of claims may have been remitted to a fresh hearing does not affect this analysis.

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS

86. The applicant has sought an order for mandamus compelling the (original) adjudication officer to direct the applicant's former employer to produce certain documents, namely, emails for a six-hour period on the night of 29 March 2019.

Procedural history

87. The applicant had first sought the production of these documents by written request to the adjudication officer dated 23 March 2021. The written request was made some six months after the hearing on 20 October 2020 at which the evidential dispute as to the events on 29 March 2019 and as to the conversation the following Monday (1 April 2019) had arisen.

88. The adjudication officer responded to the written request by letter dated 24 March 2021 as follows:

> "I have considered your request for me to require the Respondent to produce all emails pertaining to the deal that was being closed on 29th and 30th March 2019. I do not deem it necessary that these emails are produced to me at this time.
> If, during the course of the proceedings, it becomes apparent that I need sight of these emails, then I will review the matter accordingly."

89. Thereafter, the applicant's former employer confirmed by letter dated 25 March 2021 that the applicant had been correct in her recollection in respect of the timing of the commercial transaction. The operative part of this letter has already been set out at paragraph 13 above.

90. The applicant reiterated her request for the production of the emails by letter dated 26 March 2021, saying that she was challenging in full Mr. Lynch's evidence in respect of the events that occurred on 29 and 30 March 2019, and that it was essential that the emails be produced to establish the facts of the matter.

91. By letter of the same date (26 March 2021), the adjudication officer confirmed that her position remained unchanged as follows:

> "Further to your letter to me of 26th March 2021, I wish to confirm that my position with regard to your request for me to require the Respondent to produce certain emails remains unchanged from my position as stated in my letter to you of 24th March 2021."

92. The applicant, by letter dated 29 March 2021, made a detailed submission as to why she considered that the production of the emails was necessary.

93. The adjudication officer replied by letter dated 31 March 2021, stating that she would address the matters raised at the outset of the hearing on 31 March 2021. As it happens, the hearing date was postponed at the request of the applicant's former employer. Thereafter, matters were overtaken by events in that the adjudication officer indicated at the resumed hearing on 12 May 2021 that the claim for unfair dismissal would have to be heard afresh.

Applicant's submissions

94. The applicant has made very detailed and comprehensive submissions on this issue. The court has carefully considered all of the submissions made. The summary below is not intended to be exhaustive, but rather is intended to assist the reader in understanding the gravamen of the applicant's complaint.

95. In brief outline, the applicant has argued that an adjudication officer is under an obligation to give the parties to a complaint the opportunity to present any evidence relevant to that complaint. Such evidence is not limited to what the adjudication officer herself considers relevant, but extends to "any evidence" relevant to the dispute. It is further submitted that an adjudication officer does not have an absolute, unqualified or arbitrary power to grant or refuse disclosure of evidence at her will.

96. The refusal to direct the production of the emails is said to represent, in effect, a breach of the rule of audi alteram partem, and to be so serious as to consist of a "complete failure" on the part of the adjudication officer to follow fair procedures.

97. It is further submitted, inter alia, that the emails are crucial to determining the facts of the dismissal, and represent the best evidence that can be obtained in relation to the circumstances of 29 and 30 March 2019.

98. It is then alleged that, by her refusal to direct or even request disclosure, the adjudication officer blatantly favoured the applicant's former employer, Arthur Cox Solicitors, and that the "only possible explanation for the refusal is a desire to protect the interests and position of Arthur Cox".

99. As explained at paragraphs 75 to 77 above, there is no basis whatsoever for the applicant's attempted criticisms of the adjudication officer personally, and the applicant subsequently withdrew this allegation on the second day of the hearing before me.

Findings of the court

100. Section 8(13)(a) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 provides as follows:

> "An adjudication officer may, by giving notice in that behalf in writing to any person, require such person to attend at such time and place as is specified in the notice to give evidence in proceedings under this section or to produce to the adjudication officer any documents in his or her possession, custody or control that relate to any matter to which those proceedings relate."

101. The next subsections, subsections 8(13)(b) and (c), confer certain immunities and privileges on a person served with such a notice, and make it an offence, inter alia, to fail or refuse to produce any document to which the notice relates.

102. As is apparent, a decision as to whether or not to direct the production of documents involves the exercise of a statutory discretion by an adjudication officer. This discretion must, of course, be exercised in accordance with law. Moreover, the exercise of this discretion is, in principle, amenable to judicial review before the High Court.

103. It is important, however, to recognise the gravity of what the applicant is asking this court to do. The applicant seeks to have this court intervene in a part-heard claim for unfair dismissal and to make a significant decision as to how the claim is to be conducted. This is done against a background where the applicant has put only the most limited evidence before the court as to what has occurred before the adjudication officer.

104. For the reasons which follow, I am satisfied that this is not an appropriate case in which to grant mandatory relief of the type sought by the applicant.

105. First and foremost, any complaint in respect of the production of documents has been rendered moot. This court has upheld the validity of the decision that the hearing of the applicant's claim for unfair dismissal should commence afresh before a different adjudication officer. The new adjudication officer will have had no prior involvement in the claim, and it will be open to the applicant to make a fresh request for the production of documents if she considers it necessary. The new adjudication officer will not be bound by any views—preliminary or otherwise—expressed by the original adjudication officer.

106. Secondly, it is obvious from the exhibited correspondence that the original adjudication officer had not reached a concluded view in relation to the production of documents. The adjudication officer had expressly stated that she would review the matter if, during the course of the proceedings, it became apparent that she needed sight of the emails. The adjudication officer had also indicated that she would address the detailed written submission made by the applicant in her letter of 29 March 2021. Matters were, however, overtaken by events.

107. Having regard to the fact that it remained open to the adjudication officer to direct the production of documents, it would be premature to grant judicial review. See, by analogy, Huntstown Air Park Ltd v. An Bord Pleanála [1999] 1 I.L.R.M. 281.

108. Thirdly, judicial review will not normally be granted in circumstances where, first, the decision-making at first instance has not concluded, and, secondly, there is a full right of appeal against the first-instance determination. As this point has relevance to the other relief sought in these judicial review proceedings, it is discussed under a separate, dedicated heading below.

JUDICIAL REVIEW OF INTERIM PROCEDURAL RULINGS

109. For the reasons set out already, I have concluded that the applicant's challenge both to (i) the decision that the claim for unfair dismissal be heard afresh by a different adjudication officer, and (ii) the decision not to direct the production of documents, should be dismissed. This is sufficient to dispose of the within proceedings.

110. It is, however, apposite to make some general observations as to the appropriateness of seeking judicial review of interim procedural rulings made by an adjudication officer in the context of a claim for unfair dismissal. Judicial review is a discretionary remedy and the circumstances in which relief will be refused include those where the application is premature or where there is an adequate alternative remedy prescribed. In most instances, a party will be expected to await the substantive determination of a claim for unfair dismissal before contemplating an application for judicial review. It will only be in exceptional cases that it is appropriate to challenge an interim procedural ruling by way of judicial review. Even in the case of a substantive determination, a party will normally be expected to exhaust their statutory right of appeal to the Labour Court (with a right of appeal thereafter to the High Court on a point of law).

111. The significance of the existence of an appeal to the Labour Court is unaffected by the finding of the Supreme Court in Zalewski to the effect that an adjudication officer is exercising a limited judicial function for the purpose of Article 37 of the Constitution of Ireland. Even in the case of a judicial body, such as the District Court or the Circuit Court, the existence of a statutory right of appeal is something to be considered in determining whether or not judicial review is appropriate. See, generally, the judgments of the Supreme Court in Sweeney v. Fahy [2014] IESC 50 and E.R. v. Director of Public Prosecutions [2019] IESC 86.

112. (As an aside, it should be noted that Mr. Zalewski had not been required to exhaust the procedures under the legislation in circumstances where he challenged the constitutionality of that very legislation: Zalewski v. An Adjudication Officer [2019] IESC 17; [2019] 2 I.L.R.M. 153).

113. There are both principled and practical reasons as to why the statutory procedures (including a statutory right of appeal) should be exhausted before recourse is had to the High Court by way of an application for judicial review. As to principle, the Supreme Court has held, in State (Abenglen Properties Ltd) v. Dublin Corporation [1984] I.R. 381, that where the Oireachtas has provided a self-contained administrative and quasi-judicial scheme, postulating only a limited use of the courts, certiorari should not issue when use of the statutory procedure for the correction of error is adequate (and, indeed, more suitable) to meet the complaints on which the application for certiorari is grounded. Whereas this principle was stated by reference to a form of quasi-judicial decision-making, I am satisfied that similar logic applies to proceedings before an adjudication officer under Article 37. See, by analogy, the approach to criminal proceedings taken in E.R. v. Director of Public Prosecutions [2019] IESC 86.

114. The practical reasons underlying this approach include, first, that the High Court's jurisdiction on judicial review is much narrower than that of the Labour Court on a de novo appeal; and, secondly, that the High Court will not have a full appreciation of the "nuts and bolts" of the proceedings before an adjudication officer. An adjudication officer will normally be much better placed to make procedural rulings. This is not to say that such procedural rulings are immune to appeal or review, but rather to highlight the practical difficulty faced by the judicial review court. In the present case, for example, this court has only been provided with the barest outline of what evidence has been heard before the adjudication officer. It would have been very difficult for this court to reach an informed view on whether the interim decision not to direct the disclosure of the emails was unreasonable or unfair in the absence of a fuller understanding of the detail of the dispute between the parties.

115. Finally, it should be emphasised that, in deciding whether an interim procedural ruling should be set aside, the court of judicial review is concerned with the legality of the ruling. It is not the role of the court of judicial review to micromanage the proceedings before an adjudication officer. The court would have to be satisfied that the ruling was manifestly unfair, unreasonable or otherwise made without jurisdiction before it could set aside an interim procedural ruling.

PARTIES' RELIANCE UPON EXTRANEOUS MATTERS

116. The scope of the High Court's jurisdiction in judicial review proceedings is confined to the grounds specified in the order granting leave to bring judicial review proceedings or any additional grounds arising from an amendment to that order (A.P. v. Director of Public Prosecutions [2011] IESC 2; [2011] 1 I.R. 729).

117. The applicant and the notice party have both raised issues in their affidavits which go well beyond the issues as delimited by the order granting leave. These extraneous matters included, inter alia, an allegation that the adjudication officer had acted improperly and in breach of the Commission's postponement guidelines in granting an adjournment of a five-day hearing scheduled for December 2020, and a counter allegation by the notice party that the applicant and members of her family had behaved unacceptably in the conduct of the hearings before the adjudication officer and had subjected the officer to abusive and oppressive behaviour. None of these matters are relevant to the issues which this court has to decide, and have, accordingly, been excluded from consideration.

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS

118. The procedural requirements identified by the Supreme Court in its landmark decision in Zalewski v. An Adjudication Officer [2021] IESC 24; [2021] 32 E.L.R. 213 apply, in principle, to pending claims for unfair dismissal which had not been subject to a final and conclusive determination prior to the date of the delivery of that judgment. It follows, therefore, that the applicant's part-heard claim for unfair dismissal is subject to those procedural requirements, and now falls to be determined by reference to the amended procedures introduced under the Workplace Relations (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2021.

119. Having regard to the serious and direct conflicts of evidence which had emerged at the hearings before the adjudication officer to date, and having regard to the allegation by the applicant that one witness has deliberately given false evidence to the adjudication officer, there can be no doubt but that the decision to discontinue the hearings, and to direct that this claim for unfair dismissal be heard and determined by a different adjudication officer, is legally correct. The determination of the claim for unfair dismissal has potentially grave implications for both parties. It is essential that evidence now be given on oath, and that both parties be entitled to defend their positions by way of cross-examination on oath. (See paragraphs 62 to 68 above).

120. In order to ensure confidence in the process, it was entirely reasonable to direct that the fresh hearing be conducted by a different adjudication officer who has not heard any of the unsworn evidence previously tendered. Considerations such as administrative convenience, efficiency or delay cannot trump the requirement that justice is not only done, but is seen to be done. (See paragraphs 69 to 77 above).

FORM OF ORDER

121. The application for judicial review is dismissed in its entirety. The parties are directed to file written legal submissions, in the following sequence, as to the appropriate costs order, if any, to be made. The respondents and the notice party are to file their submissions within two weeks of today's date; the applicant will have a further two weeks thereafter to file her submissions. The case will be listed before me on 16 December 2021 at 10.30 am for oral argument on costs.

Appearances

The applicant represented herself
Catherine Donnelly, SC and Sharon Dillon-Lyons for the respondents instructed by the Workplace Relations Commission
Peter Ward, SC and Mairead McKenna for the notice party instructed by Daniel Spring & Co.

NOTICE PARTY

JUDGMENT of Mr Justice Max Barrett delivered on 15th December, 2016.

I. Key Questions Arising

1. If a party and its representative do not turn up for an official hearing and the presiding officer is satisfied that there has been due notification of the hearing, is it a breach of constitutional or natural justice, or the audi alteram partem principle, for the hearing to proceed? If a party participates in proceedings to the extent that it acknowledges and accepts that those proceedings were rightly brought against it, can the party later allege that the proceedings were not so brought? These are key issues arising for resolution in the within application.

II. Background Facts

i. Ms Stewart's Work History.

2. In 1987, Ms Stewart started working at the restaurant in Arnott's department store on Henry Street, in Dublin City Centre. She commenced work as a catering assistant and rose ultimately to become a supervisor/cashier. In May, 2011, the restaurant in Arnott's was taken over and Ms Stewart became an employee of Capital Food Emporium Limited. Difficulties arose in the relationship between employee and employer which Ms Stewart, as will be seen later below, has previously established as having resulted in her constructive dismissal in February, 2012. Following her departure, Ms Stewart invoked the assistance of union officials at SIPTU in a bid to see what could be done about the state of affairs that had arisen between herself and her employer.

ii. The Workplace Relations Complaints Form.

3. With the benefit of SIPTU's advice, on 8th March, 2012, Ms Stewart completed a workplace relations complaints form in which she sought a recommendation under s.8 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 from Mr Walsh, the first respondent, a Rights Commissioner. Among the details provided in the form are the following:

> "Employment Details....
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | My Work Address: | Capital Foods Imporium |
> | Address 2: | Arnotts PLC |
> | Address 3: | Henry Street |
> | Address 4: | DUBLIN 1 |
> | Contact Name: | Mr Michael Andrews.... |
>
> Respondent/Employer's Full Legal Details
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Name/Company: | Mr Michael Andrews, General Manager |
> | Trading as...: | Clodagh McKenna Restaurants |
> | Address 1: | Arnotts PLC |
> | Address 2: | Henry Street |
> | Address 3: | Dublin 1." |

4. The workplace relations complaints form was submitted under cover letter of 12th March, 2012, from SIPTU to the Rights Commissioner Service. On the same date, SIPTU sent a copy of the form to the following person/address:

> Mr Michael Andrews
>
> Capital Food Imporium

t/a Clodagh McKenna Restaurants

Arnotts PLC

Henry Street

iii. Initial interactions with the Rights Commissioner Service.

5. On 22nd March, 2012, the Rights Commissioner Service wrote to SIPTU acknowledging receipt of Ms Stewart's complaint. On the same day, the Rights Commissioner wrote to advise the other side that, absent objection (possible under s.7(3)(b) of the Unfair Dismissals (Amendment) Act 1993), it would proceed to an investigation of the complaint made. This letter, headed "Re Clodagh McKenna Restaurants/Maureen Stewart" was sent to the following person/address

General Manager

Clodagh McKenna Restaurants

Arnotts PLC

Henry Street

Dublin 1.

6. On 5th April, 2012, an entity, it seems a partnership, known as 'ESA Consultants', whose official notepaper bears the following rubric "employee relationship management | health and safety, employment law | safety education and training" wrote to the Rights Commissioner Service. It is not clear to the courts whether ESA is a specialist firm of solicitors or is an entity offering some alternative form of workplace support services. However, under the notably generic heading "Re: Clodagh McKenna Restaurants/Maureen Stewart", ESA indicated as follows in its letter of 5th April:

> "We refer to your letter dated 22nd March 2012 regarding the above matters and we advise that we act on behalf of Capital Food Emporium Ltd.
> We kindly request that any further correspondence in relation to these matters be issued directly to our offices at the above address. Please find enclosed an acceptance to a Rights Commissioner's Investigation...".

7. What would any rational person make of such a letter? It appears to the court that any rational person would understand this letter to mean that when it came to Ms Stewart's complaint her employer was satisfied for the Rights Commissioner to proceed with the investigation at hand and that ESA Consultants were dealing with matters for the employer. A professional lawyer who read the letter would doubtless (a) have noted that ESA Consultants expressly stated themselves to be representing Capital Food Emporium Limited and (b) 'put two and two together' and deduced, correctly, that the legal identity of Ms Stewart's employer was Capital Food Emporium Limited. But we are not all lawyers; and such a deductive exercise would not have advanced matters in any event. After all, the party against whom it was sought to make complaint (Ms Stewart's employer) had been notified of the complaint, had appointed ESA to act on its behalf in the complaints process, and had indicated to the Rights Commissioner Service that it had no objection to the matter proceeding to investigation.

8. On 26th June, 2012, it appears that the Rights Commissioner Service wrote to both SIPTU and ESA indicating that the investigation of Ms Stewart's complaint would be heard at 10 a.m. on 2nd August, 2012, at a stated venue. On 2nd August, 2012, Ms Stewart turned up for the hearing, presumably with her SIPTU representative. However, no-one turned up for the other side. This, the court was advised by counsel for Ms Stewart at hearing, is not un-typical, though off-hand it would seem a little un-typical for professional consultants not to appear for a client at a hearing. Be that as it may, however, on 2nd August, 2012, the Rights Commissioner satisfied himself that the standard notification letter had been sent to ESA and had not been returned by the postal authorities. Having so satisfied himself, the Rights Commissioner then proceeded to hear Ms Stewart's complaint. It was suggested before this Court that rather than just relying on the 'paper trail' before him, the Rights Commissioner could and should have rung ESA to ask if they had got the letter of 26th June and enquired whether they were coming. There was and is no obligation of any nature on a Rights Commissioner so to do. The Rights Commissioner was fully entitled to have regard to the paper record, and he was fully entitled to proceed to hearing having satisfied himself, from the paper record, that a suitable letter of notification had been sent to ESA and not returned by the postal authorities.

iv. After the Rights Commissioner's Hearing.

9. After the hearing of 2nd August, 2012, there appear to have been continuing efforts by SIPTU to contact ESA, who proved strangely uncontactable. Eventually, on 15th August, 2012, a SIPTU official wrote the following letter to the Rights Commissioner under a heading that stated the relevant case number:

"Dear Mr Walsh

Further to the above hearing where neither the employer, nor their Representative showed at the hearing.

I have tried on several occasions to contact the Company Representatives ESA Consultants and have repeatedly got no answer from their telephone number [number stated] being told number not in use.

I would appreciate if you would issue your recommendation on this matter. The Company is Capital Food Emporium Limited T/A Clodagh McKenna Restaurants. The [affected SIPTU] member's name is Ms Maureen Stewart.

Thanking you..."

10. On 6th September, 2012, the Rights Commissioner issued his recommendation. This notes at the outset that "The Rights Commissioner Service of the Labour Relation Commission advised the employer of the date time and venue of the hearing. Neither the employer nor a representative on their behalf attended the hearing." After going through the details of Ms Stewart's complaint, the Rights Commissioner made the following recommendation:

"RECOMMENDATION

Based on the uncontested evidence presented at the hearing, I find that the employer constructively dismissed the claimant. It is clear from the evidence submitted by the claimant that the employer failed to address the claimant's legitimate grievance resulting in causing the claimant stress and isolation in her workplace. The employer also failed to engage with the claimant in a positive manner in relation to her grievances, leaving her no choice but to resign from her employment after 24 years' service.

I recommend that the employer pay to the claimant compensation in the sum of €26,000 for breaches of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977-1993.

This sum should be paid within 6 weeks of the date of this recommendation."

11. On 10th September, 2012, ESA, who had, by this time, clearly received the text of the recommendation, wrote to the Rights Commissioner Service and under the notably generic heading "Re: Maureen Stewart/Clodagh McKenna Restaurants t/a Capital Food Emporium" sought a fresh hearing of matters. The court cannot but note in passing that there is no confusion in this letter as to what matter the recommendation was concerned with. Sender and recipient each knew exactly what matter was in issue. And the heading does not seek to be legally exact in referring to Capital Food Emporium Limited. The letter states, inter alia, as follows:

"We refer to our telephone conversation on Friday 7th September 2012 regarding the above matters and the Rights Commissioner's decision.

We advise that despite the Rights Commissioner Service's records indicating a letter of notification of a hearing date was issued to our offices on 26th June 2012 we confirm that this office and our Client have not received same. We are disappointed with this fact as we have received previous correspondence from the Labour Relations Commissioner notifying us of scheduled or adjourned hearings and we find it unusual that we have not received this letter of the 26th June 2012. We would ask for the Commissioner's understanding and request that another hearing take place."

12. So far as this last request was concerned, this was not possible. The Rights Commissioner Service wrote to ESA on 12th September, 2012, indicating that the letter of 26th June had been sent and that there was no jurisdiction on the part of the Rights Commissioner to convene a new hearing following the issuance of his recommendation. This letter reads, inter alia, as follows:

"...The notification of the hearing was issued on 26th June 2012 (copy enclosed). To date the correspondence to your office has not been returned by An Post.

Please note that once the Rights Commissioner issues his/her findings they do not have the jurisdiction to schedule another hearing in the matter.

If the employer wishes to proceed further, the Recommendation can be appealed to the Employment Appeals Tribunal within 6 weeks of the issue of the Recommendation."

13. The right of appeal to which reference is made arose under the then s.9 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1997-2007.

v. Capital Food Emporium Limited Commences an Appeal.

14. On 21st September, 2012, ESA wrote to the Employment Appeals Tribunal under the heading "RE: Ms Maureen Stewart and Capital Food Emporium Limited, Appeal against Rights Commissioner's Recommendation" indicating that ESA had been instructed by Capital Emporium Limited to appeal the Rights Commissioner's recommendation. Curiously, and perhaps somewhat discourteously, neither Ms Stewart nor SIPTU were copied on this letter. But what is truly notable is that there was clearly no confusion on the part of Capital Emporium Limited that it was the party to whom the recommendation had been directed and that it was the party which enjoyed a consequent right of appeal. Indeed, in the appeal form which accompanied the letter, Capital Emporium Limited stated itself to be the affected employer, Ms Stewart to be the party against whom the appeal was to be brought, and under the hearing "The Reasons for My Appeal Are" addressed substantive concerns regarding the actions of the Commissioner that did not in any way touch upon or flag any confusion arising regarding the identity of the parties involved. Thus the form reads:

> "THE REASONS FOR MY APPEAL ARE...
> [The text that follows is written by hand onto the form]. In the first instance neither the Employer or their advisers, ESA received notice of the hearing date. Nonetheless, the Commissioner failed to take into consideration the fundamental principles of industrial relations and employment legislation. The Claimant is required to prove that her circumstances of employment were such that it was unsafe, so detrimental to her welfare, that having exercised all her rights to include but not limited to raising her complaints before the Labour Relations Commission under the Industrial Relations Acts and having thereof exhausted all avenues, was left with no alternative but to resign from her position. These are well established principles that have been examined at both common law and civil law and case precedent. It should be noted that the claimant has had union support and representation at all material times. She had left the Company on other occasions and was accepted back. The nature of her complaints as to why she left do not support a claim that her employment and the conditions therein were so grievous and repugnant that she had no alternative but to leave her employment. We shall provide further and better particulars in due course and we are seeking that the Division will set aside the Commissioner's decision".

15. An appeal to the Employment Appeals Tribunal, such as that which ESA, in its letter, indicated its client to be desirous of now commencing, takes the form of a de novo appeal on the merits. Thus the appeal very much represents a 'second bite at the apple' so far as an appellant is concerned. As in the covering letter, there is no mention in the above-quoted extract from the form that there is any doubt of any nature as to why Capital Food Emporium Limited has been brought into matters. On the contrary, Capital Food Emporium Limited, acting through ESA, knows perfectly well (i) what is going on, (ii) who Ms Stewart is, and (iii) what it is seeking to achieve via its appeal to the Employment Appeals Tribunal.

vi. Ms Stewart Seeks an Implementation Decision.

16. Unaware that an appeal had been brought by Capital Food Emporium Limited, SIPTU wrote on behalf of Ms Stewart to the Employment Appeals Tribunal on 1st November, 2012, (i) noting that (a) Ms Stewart was satisfied to accept the Rights Commissioner's decision, and (b) that the time for an appeal had passed, and (ii) seeking an implementation decision of the Tribunal in respect of the Rights Commissioner's recommendation. Subsequently, Ms Stewart became aware of Capital Food's appeal when, in a letter dated 27th November, 2012 and sent to her by the Employment Appeals Tribunal under the heading "Appeal of CAPITAL FOOD EMPORIUM LIMITED against the Recommendation of a Rights Commissioner in the case of: MAUREEN STEWART –V- CAPITAL FOOD EMPORIUM LIMITED", the Employment Appeals Tribunal indicated to Ms Stewart that an appeal was being brought by Capital Food Emporium Limited against the Rights Commissioner's recommendation of 6th September, 2012. By letter of 20th December, 2012, SIPTU wrote to the Employment Appeals Tribunal for Ms Stewart and entered an appearance in the appeal on her behalf. The formal notice of appearance contains in prominent text the following words "NOTICE OF APPEARANCE by a party against whom a claim has been lodged under the legislation ticked above [the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2007] by CAPITAL FOOD EMPORIUM LIMITED against MAUREEN STEWART".

vii. Capital Food Emporium Limited Withdraws Its Appeal.

17. Just over a year after the appeal was lodged by Capital Food Emporium Limited, the Employment Appeals Tribunal, in a letter of 15th November, 2013, wrote to Ms Stewart advising that the said appeal would be heard at a stated venue at 10.30 a.m. on 17th December, 2013. Belatedly, Capital Food Emporium Limited now withdrew its appeal. By letter of 16th December, 2013 from the Employment Appeals Tribunal to ESA (and copied by fax of the same day to SIPTU), the Employment Appeals Tribunal noted receipt of a letter from ESA concerning the withdrawal of the appeal and confirming that, in consequence of the withdrawal of the appeal, the file on the matter had been closed by the Tribunal.

viii. Ms Stewart Seeks an Implementation Decision Again.

18. With the Rights Commissioner's recommendation still extant and the appeal against same now abandoned, SIPTU wrote to the Employment Appeals Tribunal on 19th December, 2013, and made fresh application for an implementation decision in respect of the Rights Commissioner's recommendation. By letter of 2nd April, 2014, the Employment Appeals Tribunal advised the parties that the application would be heard at a stated venue at 2.30 p.m. on 29th April, 2014. By letter of 14th April, 2014, ESA wrote to the Employment Appeals Tribunal indicating that Capital Food Emporium Limited would "not be in attendance at the hearing or entertain a claim for enforcement of implementation of a Rights Commissioner's recommendation".

ix. Capital Food Emporium Limited's Explanation for Its Actions.

19. Why did Capital Food Emporium Limited (i) elect to abandon its appeal against the Rights Commissioner's recommendation back in December, 2013, and (ii) decide not to attend the determination hearing in April, 2014? Surprisingly, despite having (a) raised no objection when matters went to the Rights Commissioner, (b) never mentioned this as a ground of objection when it decided to bring its appeal, (c) been at all times and in every respect satisfied to join battle with Ms Stewart as her employer, and (d) enjoying the possibility of a de novo appeal on the merits before the Employment Appeals Tribunal, Capital Food Emporium Limited now indicated a concern as to whether it was affected by the Rights Commissioner's recommendation at all. This is so remarkable a contention at so late a stage in matters that counsel for Ms Stewart, at the hearing of the within application, described Capital Food's behaviour in this regard as a "stunt". That is powerful language; yet sometimes powerful language expresses but a powerful truth. ESA's letter of 14th April, 2014, which sought to explain the actions of Capital Food Emporium Limited states as follows:

"RE: Appeal of Maureen Stewart for Implementation of the Recommendation of a Rights Commissioner Maureen Stewart –v– Capital Food Emporium Ltd & Clodagh McKenna under Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1997-2007...

Dear Sirs...

[W]e advise that we act on behalf of Capital Food Emporium Limited.

In the first instance our Client will not be in attendance at the hearing or entertain a claim for enforcement of implementation of a Rights Commissioner's recommendation as the recommendation was made against several different parties, none of which is our Client.

The Claimant's complaint form submitted by her representative, on 14th March 2012, stated that the complaint was against Mr Michael Andrews, General Manager, t/a Clodagh McKenna. Neither of these are registered as companies nor have they ever employed Ms Stewart. The Rights Commissioner issued a decision against Capital Food Emporium t/a Clodagh McKenna Restaurants, not our Client. There was no application to seek an amendment or change of Respondent's name as set out under the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997, nor was Capital Food Emporium Limited put on notice of such application. Capital Food Emporium Limited does not consent to any change of Respondent and the matters are out of time.

Therefore the Employment Appeals Tribunal does not have jurisdiction to hear or enforce the Rights Commissioner's recommendation.

We have instructed our Clients to consider whatever legal remedy [is] available to them to protect their company.

We trust this clarifies all matters."

x. A Technical Correction.

20. On 29th April, 2014, Ms Stewart's determination application came on before the Employment Appeals Tribunal. As expected, no-one attended for Capital Food Emporium Limited. As it happened, the hearing did not proceed. Instead Ms Stewart was advised that she should make fresh application in the first instance to the Rights Commissioner for him formally to amend the employer's name in his recommendation. This was done and, on 14th May, 2014, the Rights Commissioner Service wrote to SIPTU to confirm that a correction order had been made, amending the employer's name in the recommendation to Capital Food Emporium Limited. It is important to note that in all the circumstances arising this was but the merest of technical changes. The correct party had been notified of Ms Stewart's complaint and the correct party had participated, as employer, in all the interactions that ensued. In what was an employee-employer dispute, employee and employer had at all times been engaged. In making much a-do as to whether the correct party had been involved and engaged and the subject of an adverse recommendation, Capital Food Emporium Limited was, in all the circumstances arising, making much a-do about nothing. But having embarked on its chosen path of action, Capital Food Emporium Limited now persisted. In a letter of 16th May, 2014, to the Rights Commissioner Service, under the notably generic heading "RE: Clodagh McKenna Restaurants/Maureen Stewart", ESA indicated as follows for Capital Food Emporium Limited:

> "We refer to your letter dated 14th May 2014 and we advise that we act on behalf of Capital Food Emporium Limited.
>
> In the first instance the Respondent does not consent to the Correction Order in respect of the Rights Commissioner's Decision of the 6th September 2012 to amend the name of the Respondent to Capital Food Emporium Ltd.
>
> The Respondent was put on notice of a Rights Commissioner hearing date and to this effect they were not in attendance on the day of the hearing. The Claimant sought to amend the Respondent's name before the Rights Commissioner after the fact and before the Employment Appeals Tribunal on enforcing the Rights Commissioner's determination.
>
> The Claimant then sought to amend the Respondent's name without notice to your Client and here again erred by seeking the amendment to some other entity, not our Client. This process of naming the wrong party and in particular by a person who is learned is inexcusable and not without precedent. We refer to the matter of a Supreme Court case: Sandy Lane Hotel Limited –v– Times Newspaper Limited.

Furthermore, in accordance with section 39(3) of the Organisation of Working Time [Act], 1997, the Respondent did not have the opportunity to counter claim the Claimant's complaint under Unfair Dismissals. Therefore the Rights Commissioner does not have consent or jurisdiction to amend the Respondent's name on the Rights Commissioner's decision. In light of this, the Claimant must decide either to have the Unfair Dismissals claim heard before a Rights Commissioner or reject the Correction Order. Should the Claimant refuse, the Respondent will be left with no other alternative but to proceed with civil action for judicial review.

We trust this clarifies all matters."

21. The court turns to the legal arguments raised in the letter later below. Suffice it for now to note that the bringing of a judicial review application by Capital Food Emporium Limited was clearly being contemplated as a possibility, indeed being raised as a threat, as early as 16th May, 2014.

xi. Issuance of the Implementation Decision.

22. Following the issuance of the correction order, there was some to-ing and fro-ing between SIPTU (which, throughout the entire process, appears to have done Trojan work on behalf of Ms Stewart) and the Employment Appeals Tribunal; these interactions concerned the technicalities of seeking an implementation decision and nothing rides on them. The next event of significance was the implementation hearing; this took place on 20th August, 2015. Both Ms Stewart and Capital Food Emporium Limited were represented at this hearing. On 20th October, 2015, the following determination issued from the Employment Appeals Tribunal:

"Determination

Section 7(4)(a) of the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977 to 2007, states:

'Where a recommendation of a rights commissioner in relation to a claim for redress under this Act has not been carried out by the employer concerned in accordance with its terms, the time for bringing an appeal against the recommendation has expired and no such appeal has been brought, the employee concerned may bring the claim before the Tribunal and the Tribunal shall, notwithstanding subsection (5) of this section, without hearing the employer concerned or any evidence (other than in relation to the matters aforesaid), make a determination to the like effect as the recommendation.'.

The Respondent submitted that it had initially not been on notice of the hearing before the Rights Commissioner. It had not been on notice subsequently of an application for a correction order by the Rights Commissioner in relation to the name of the Respondent either. It had initially lodged an appeal to the E.A.T., but had, on legal advice, withdrawn that appeal. The Respondent submitted, notwithstanding that withdrawal of the appeal, that the E.A.T. had no jurisdiction in the matter.

The Tribunal notes that the Respondent was on notice of the correction order of the Rights Commissioner, and had initiated an appeal within time but chose not to pursue that appeal. In the circumstances, the Tribunal is confined to making the order for implementation as sought.

Accordingly, the Tribunal makes a determination to the like effect as the Rights Commissioner recommendation, that the respondent pay the appellant the sum of €26,000 for breaches of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2007."

xii. Judicial Review Application.

23. By notice of motion of 20th January, 2016, Capital Food Emporium (Holdings) Limited (formerly Capital Food Emporium Limited) commenced the within judicial review proceedings seeking, inter alia, the following reliefs: (i) an order of certiorari quashing the Rights Commissioner's recommendation of 6th September, 2012, (ii) an order of certiorari quashing the Employment Appeals Tribunal's determination of 20th October, 2015, (iii) a declaration that the Rights Commissioner acted ultra vires and/or in breach of the requirements of natural or constitutional justice in the manner in which he reached his recommendation of 6th September, 2012, and (iv) a declaration that the Employment Appeals Tribunal acted ultra vires and/or in breach of the requirements of natural or constitutional justice in the manner in which it reached its determination of 20th October, 2015.

III. Some Notable Points Arising

24. It appears to the court that a number of notable points arise from the above description of the background events to the within application:

a. The Initial Complaint Form.

(1) In completing the initial complaint form, Ms Stewart may not have stated the full legal details of her employer but there can have been no doubt – none – that she was seeking redress from her former employer.

b. The Conduct of the Rights Commissioner on 2nd August, 2012.

(2) As mentioned above, once the Rights Commissioner had satisfied himself at the hearing of 2nd August, 2012, that correspondence had been sent to ESA advising of the date, time and venue of the hearing of Ms Stewart's complaint, he was fully entitled to proceed to hearing and to issue a recommendation thereafter. Contrary to the complaint made at the hearing of the within application, there was no obligation on the Rights Commissioner to ring ESA (and/or Capital Food Emporium Limited for that matter) and ask what was happening. There is not even the beginning of a breach of the principle of audi alteram partem, nor any semblance of a breach of the rules of constitutional or natural justice, in the Rights Commissioner's proceeding as he did. The principle of audi alteram partem and the rules of constitutional or natural justice afford one a right to be heard, not a right to hold things up indefinitely until one elects, if one elects, to attend for hearing.

c. Right (and Abandonment) of Appeal.

(3) Insofar as Capital Food Emporium Limited was aggrieved by the decision of the Rights Commissioner, it had remedies galore in the form of a de novo appeal on the merits to the Employment Appeals Tribunal pursuant to the Unfair Dismissals Acts, with onwards appeals into the courts system. But Capital Food Emporium Limited, having elected to commence such an appeal, abandoned it on what can only be described as, with every respect, entirely spurious grounds. There was no impediment to its continuing its appeal, it was clearly the party concerned within the meaning of s.9 and had repeatedly acknowledged and accepted this last fact. Its failure to exhaust this right of appeal is a matter which the court would be entitled to take into account in deciding whether to grant the discretionary relief now sought, if the court considered any basis for such relief to arise, and it does not. The court notes that there is not even the beginning of a breach of the principle of audi alteram partem, nor any semblance of a breach of the rules of constitutional or natural justice when a party who considers some shortcoming to present in the actions of a body or tribunal of first instance avails properly of a right to a full de novo appeal on the merits (and so of the right to have any, if any, error on the part of the body or tribunal corrected) and, having commenced such appeal, later elects of its own free will and for whatever reason, to withdraw from that appeal.

d. Acknowledgement and acceptance that Capital Food was the concerned party.

(4) On 10th September, 2012, ESA wrote, on behalf of Capital Food Emporium Limited to the Rights Commissioner's Service regarding the dispute with Ms Stewart and the Rights Commissioner's recommendation. No issue was taken with the title or name ascribed the employer in that recommendation. ESA sought the "Commissioner's understanding" and expressly requested "that another hearing take place". In doing so, Capital Food Emporium Limited, acting through its agent, clearly acknowledged and accepted that Capital Food Emporium Limited was the party concerned with the employment dispute which formed the subject-matter of the Rights Commissioner's investigation and recommendation. There was no attempt in this correspondence to reserve the rights of Capital Food Emporium Limited as regards, say, the title ascribed it in the recommendation.

On 21st September, 2012, ESA wrote, on behalf of Capital Food Emporium Limited to the Employment Appeals Tribunal enclosing the requisite form necessary to commence an appeal from the Rights Commissioner's recommendation. In doing so, Capital Food Emporium Limited, acting through its agent, again clearly acknowledged and accepted that Capital Food Emporium Limited was the party concerned with the employment dispute which formed the subject-matter of the Rights Commissioner's investigation and recommendation. There was no attempt in this correspondence to reserve the rights of Capital Food Emporium Limited as regards, say, the title ascribed it in the recommendation.

e. Quod approbo non reprobo.

(5) Quod approbo non reprobo. ('That which I approve, I cannot disapprove'). In acting as mentioned at point (4) above, i.e. in (a) acknowledging and accepting that Capital Food Emporium Limited was properly the party concerned with the employment dispute which formed the subject-matter of the Rights Commissioner's investigation and recommendation, and then (b) later seeking to disavow that Capital Food Emporium Limited was properly the party joined to the proceedings, Capital Food committed almost the exact same error that was identified by Henchy J., and reported almost forty years ago, in Corrigan v. The Irish Land Commission [1977] I.R. 317. That was a case in which the applicants appeared before a tribunal whose jurisdiction they later challenged when it gave a decision adverse to them, a sequence of actions that led Henchy J. to observe, at 326, that "That is something the law will not and should not allow. The complainant [or, in the present case, Capital Food Emporium Limited] cannot blow hot and cold; he [it] cannot approbate and then reprobate; he [it] cannot have it both ways". By doing as it did in December, 2013, by withdrawing its appeal against the Rights Commissioner's recommendation on the grounds that it was not the party affected by that recommendation, Capital Food Emporium Limited was seeking to deny what by that time, thanks to its own repeated actions, had become, for it, no longer properly, never mind convincingly, undeniable.

f. Section 39 of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997.

(6) It will be recalled that in its letter of 16th May, 2014, ESA, writing for Capital Food Emporium Limited contended, inter alia, that in making the correction order earlier that month, the Rights Commissioner had breached s.39(3) of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997. This contention, with respect, is wrong. Section 39 of the act of 1997 provides, inter alia, as follows:

>
> (2) A decision (by whatever name called) of a relevant authority under this Act or an enactment or statutory instrument referred to in the Table to this subsection [the said Table includes the Unfair Dismissals Acts] that does not state correctly the name of the employer concerned or any other material particular may, on application being made in that behalf to the authority by any party concerned, be amended by the authority so as to state correctly the name of the employer concerned or the other material particular.
>
> (3) The power of a relevant authority under subsection (2) shall not be exercised if it would result in a person who was not given an opportunity to be heard in the proceedings on foot of which the decision concerned was given becoming the subject of any requirement or direction contained in the decision.
> (4) If an employee wishes to pursue against a person a claim for relief in respect of any matter under an enactment or statutory instrument referred to in subsection (2), or the Table thereto, and has already instituted proceedings under that enactment or statutory instrument in respect of that matter, being proceedings in which the said person has not been given an opportunity to be heard and –

(a) the fact of the said person not having been given an opportunity to be heard in those proceedings was due to the respondent's name in those proceedings or any other particular necessary to identify the respondent having been incorrectly stated in the notice or other process by which the proceedings were instituted, and

(b) the said statement was due to inadvertence, then the employee may apply to whichever relevant authority would hear such proceeding in the first instance for leave to institute proceedings against the said person ('the proposed respondent') in respect of the matter concerned under the said enactment or statutory instrument and that relevant authority may grant leave to the employee notwithstanding that the time specified under the enactment or statutory instrument within which such proceedings may be instituted has expired:

Provided that that relevant authority shall not grant such leave to that employee if it is of opinion that to do so would result in an injustice being done to the proposed respondent.

A number of points might be made as regards the above-quoted text:

(i) s.39(2) of the Act of 1997 expressly contemplates the doing of that which the Rights Commissioner did in May, 2014, viz. the correction of the name of an employer in a previous "decision" (here a recommendation) of the Rights Commissioner.

(ii) there are no time limits imposed by s.39 as regards (a) applying for a correction order, or (b) the making of an order consequent upon such application.

(iii) s.39(2) does not require, nor is it a requirement of natural or constitutional justice, or the principle of audi alterem partem, that there should be a fresh hearing of a relevant authority into the making of an amendment of the style contemplated by s.39(2).

(iv) s.39(3) is an irrelevance in the circumstances arising; this is because the Rights Commissioner, back at the hearing of 2nd August, 2012, satisfied himself that correspondence had been sent to ESA advising of the date, time and venue of the hearing of Ms Stewart's complaint, i.e. he satisfied himself that Capital Food Emporium Limited had been given an opportunity to be heard in the proceedings on foot of which his recommendation was given (and, for the reasons identified by the court previously above, having so satisfied himself, the Rights Commissioner was entitled in the circumstances arising then to proceed with the hearing).

(v) s.39(4) deals with a situation, irrelevant to the within proceedings, whereby the name of a party was inadvertently mis-stated and, as a consequence, the party that ought to have been pursued was not heard. The within application does not concern a situation in which a party that ought to have been pursued was not given an opportunity to be heard. It concerns a situation in which a party that ought to have been pursued was fully aware of the proceedings, acknowledged and accepted that it was the party concerned, and – so the Rights Commissioner found on 2nd August, 2012 – was given an opportunity to be heard.

(vi) the making of the correction order must be viewed in the context of Capital Food Emporium Limited having (a) submitted to the jurisdiction of the Rights Commissioner, (b) sought in its letter of 10th September, 2012, the "understanding" of the Rights Commissioner for the purpose of seeking a re-hearing of the complaint, and (c) confirmed and acknowledged, when lodging its appeal, on 21st September, 2012, that it was the relevant party concerned with the employment dispute.

g. Limited jurisdiction of Employment Appeals Tribunal at implementation hearing.

(7) Following the making of the correction order, Ms Stewart proceeded with pursuing her right to bring the issue of implementing the Rights Commissioner's recommendation before the Employment Appeals Tribunal. The Tribunal's jurisdiction at an implementation hearing is quite constrained by s.8(4)(a) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, as amended by s.7(4)(a) of the Unfair Dismissals (Amendment) Act 1993. Section 8(4)(a) provides as follows:

> "Where a recommendation of a rights commissioner in relation to a claim for redress under this Act has not been carried out by the employer concerned in accordance with its terms, the time for bringing an appeal against the recommendation has expired and no such appeal has been brought, the employee concerned may bring the claim before the Tribunal and the Tribunal shall, notwithstanding subsection (5) of this section, without hearing the employer concerned or any evidence (other than in relation to the matters aforesaid), make a determination to the like effect as the recommendation."

As can be seen, the Employment Appeals Tribunal's jurisdiction pursuant to the above-quoted provision is effectively confined to establishing the objective elements/facts touched upon in the provision, viz. (i) that there is an existing determination of a rights commissioner in favour of a particular person who has brought a claim for redress, (ii) that the recommendation has not been carried out by the employer, (iii) that the time for bringing an appeal against the said recommendation has expired, and (iv) that no appeal has been brought within the time aforesaid. Provided these four elements are satisfied, "the Tribunal shall", i.e. must as a matter of law, "without hearing the employer concerned or any evidence (other than in relation to the matters aforesaid), make a determination to the like effect as the recommendation." It appears to the court that its reading of s.8(4)(a) of the Act of 1977, as amended, finds support in the reading afforded by the Supreme Court, in Hussein v. The Labour Court [2015] IESC 58, to the once almost identically worded (though since amended) s.28(8) of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997. The decision of the Supreme Court in Hussein also lends support to the contention that provided the Employment Appeals Tribunal exercises its powers properly and within the parameters defined by the sections in question, there is no basis for setting aside its ensuing implementation order by way of judicial review application. There is no evidence before the court to suggest that, when dealing with Ms Stewart's application pursuant to s.8(4)(a) of the Act of 1977, as amended, the Employment Appeals Tribunal did not exercise its powers properly or stray beyond the parameters defined by that provision.

h. The Decision in Sandy Lane Hotel [2011] 3 I.R. 334.

(8) It will be recalled that in its letter of 16th May, 2014, ESA, writing for Capital Food Emporium Limited, contended, inter alia, that "naming the wrong party" in Ms Stewart's initial application, "and in particular by a person who is learned is inexcusable and not without precedent. We refer to the matter of a Supreme Court case: Sandy Lane Hotel Limited –v– Times Newspaper Limited." As touched upon elsewhere above, Capital Food Emporium Limited repeatedly accepted and acknowledged that it was the correct party to Ms Stewart's proceedings, at least until it suited it to contend that it was not. Does the decision of the Supreme Court in Sandy Lane Hotel lend any support to the contention that Capital Food Emporium Limited now seeks to make that it was not the subject of the Rights Commissioner's initial recommendation and that this failing effectively taints all that follows in terms of its being a counterparty to Ms Stewart's proceedings?

Sandy Lane Hotel was a case in which two Barbadian companies (Sandy Bay Hotel Limited and Sandy Lane Properties Limited) were owned respectively by two St Lucian companies (Sandy Lane Hotel Limited and Sandy Lane Holdings Limited). In April 1997, Sandy Bay Hotel Limited (one of the Barbadian companies) changed its name to Sandy Lane Hotel Co. Limited. In June 1998, libel proceedings were commenced by Sandy Lane Hotel Limited against, inter alia, Times Newspapers Limited. In point of fact, the proceedings ought to have been commenced by Sandy Lane Hotel Co. Limited. Pursuant to an application heard in November 2005, the High Court allowed a substitution of Sandy Lane Hotel Co. Ltd. for Sandy Lane Hotel Limited. The order of substitution was made pursuant to O.63, r.1(15) of the Rules of the Superior Courts which allows for "the correction of clerical errors". On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the application made before the High Court did not come within this rule. In his judgment, having characterised a clerical error as an error made in a mechanical process, as distinct from an error arising from e.g., lack of knowledge or wrong information, Hardiman J., for the Supreme Court, observed, inter alia, as follows:

> "It appears to me, from a consideration of [the company secretary of Sandy Lane Hotel Ltd.]...that the mistake made in this case is not one which can be described as a clerical error, or anything like it. He [the company secretary] frankly admits that the name 'Sandy Lane Hotel Co.

Limited' was not originally intended to be used in the proceedings. This was because, although he knew of the history of the companies, it was not present to his mind, or to the mind of the lawyers, that the company actually operating the hotel was the Sandy Lane Hotel Co. Limited. This in turn was because, as he very frankly says 'at the time of the change of name in 1997 I thought nothing of the inclusion of the word 'Co.' in the title of the plaintiff.'

This is not, in my view, a clerical error. The error here arose due to a mistaken belief and a failure to ascribe any significance to the change of name in 1997. This is a misguided state of mind with which one cannot have much sympathy, given that it was made by or on behalf of 'a consortium of businessmen', in the course of a complicated series of arrangements made for tax planning purposes, in which they obviously had the benefit of the best legal and taxation advice.

The consortium running the Sandy Lane Hotel were of the view that it was important for corporate or tax planning purposes that the entity operating the hotel should be the Sandy Lane Hotel Co. Limited. Nor did this simply involve a change of name: there was another, completely different, company called the Sandy Lane Hotel Limited. The operating company was a Barbados Company but the latter Company, which appears as plaintiff at present, is a St Lucia Company. The plaintiff's case would in my opinion have been a stronger one if it had simply failed to get the name of the operating company right. But in the events that happened they actually used the name of an entirely different company, which however appears to be the parent company of the operating company. This in my view is not a clerical error or anything similar to a clerical error. It requires, if it is to be remedied, the substitution of a new entity which co-existed the plaintiff at all material times."

It might perhaps be contended that: (a) the Supreme Court's decision in Sandy Lane Hotel is notably harsh, (b) the plaintiff in that case had, to borrow from the wording of Hardiman J. "simply failed to get the name of the operating company right" and that the wrong name used just happened to be the name of another company from a different jurisdiction, and (c) if a 'clerical error' is a mistake made in copying or writing out a document, it is difficult to see how writing out the name 'Sandy Lane Hotel Limited' in lieu of 'Sandy Lane Hotel Co. Limited', when it is the latter company to which one means at all times to refer, is anything other than a clerical error. However, (i) it is not for this Court to address any such contention, and (ii) it appears to this Court that the within case is distinguishable in a number of respects from Sandy Lane Hotel, viz: (A) the appellants in Sandy Lane Hotel contended that Sandy Lane Hotel Limited was not the right party to the proceedings whereas in the within proceedings Capital Food Emporium Limited repeatedly acknowledged that it was the correct party to the within proceedings, until it suited it to seek, entirely unconvincingly, to deny this, (B) the Supreme Court, in Sandy Lane Hotel, appears to have placed no little emphasis on the fact that the basis for the confusion arising derived from "a complicated series of arrangements made for tax planning purposes, in which they [the respondent and those behind it] obviously had the benefit of the best legal and taxation advice" whereas in the within proceedings Ms Stewart is a so-called 'ordinary' person who was acting with the benefit of trade union assistance: she is not a sophisticated commercial group acting with the benefit of 'blue chip' legal and tax advice, and (C) the Supreme Court, in Sandy Lane Hotel, also seems to have had regard to the fact that the company secretary appears to have been, perhaps, somewhat sanguine in terms of seeking to join the right party whereas Ms Stewart has always sought to bring her claim against the correct party and, again, was repeatedly acknowledged and accepted by that party as having pursued the correct party until it elected, unconvincingly, to deny this.

i. Delay.

(9) Finally, the court notes that with regard to the Rights Commissioner's initial recommendation, the representatives of Capital Food Emporium Limited became aware of the making of that recommendation on 7th September, 2012. A period of in excess of three years and four months elapsed between the making of this initial recommendation and the application for leave to bring the within judicial review proceedings. Having regard, inter alia, to the standard timeline contemplated by O.84, r.21 of the Rules of the Superior Courts, the duration of this delay is very considerable, and all the more egregious in the absence, and there is a complete absence, of any convincing explanation or justification. When it comes to the correction order, a period in excess of 20 months lapsed between the making of same and the making of the ex parte application for leave to apply for judicial review. This period too is considerably outside the standard timeline contemplated by O.84, r.21, and again no convincing explanation or justification has been offered for this delay. Moreover, as highlighted elsewhere above, the first threat to seek judicial review appears to have been in the letter of 16th May, 2014, yet Capital Food Emporium Limited waited another 20 months or so before moving the application for leave to apply for judicial review. It is trite law that prescribed time limits exist to bring finality and certainty to administrative decisions. Of course, the courts are ever alive to the possibility that in any one case, a particular delay may be capable of being explained and justified and, in consequence, excused, but the within application does not concern such a case.

IV. Conclusion

25. Having regard to all of the foregoing, the court must respectfully decline to grant any of the reliefs sought by Capital Food Emporium (Holdings) Limited (formerly Capital Food Emporium Limited).

Approved
15/Jul/16

the main proceedings, the court is permitted, by way of modest derogation from the Campus Oil principles, to look to the underlying strength of the respective positions of the parties in the manner indicated by the Supreme Court in Lee. If, as here, the plaintiff's case appears particularly strong, it is only just and equitable that she be granted the interlocutory relief which she seeks, not least where (as here) the point is a net one of construction, not dependent on oral evidence or elaborate argument, and where damages would not be an inadequate remedy.

Conclusions

33. It is for these reasons and having regard to the very special circumstances of this case that I propose to grant the plaintiff an interlocutory injunction restraining the Authority from placing her on administrative leave pending the outcome of her appeal against the disciplinary decision of April 2, 2012.

Allied Irish Banks Plc (respondent/appellant) v Brian Purcell (claimant/respondent): Circuit Court 2011 No. 2674 (Judge Linnane) May 24, 2012 ([2012] E.L.R. 189)

Unfair dismissal – Disciplinary procedure – Conduct of employee – Fair procedures – Natural justice – Reasonableness – Whether dismissal unfair – Whether dismissal disproportionate response – Whether dismissal unreasonable – Whether improper motive – Whether employer acted fairly on the basis of evidence – Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (No 10), s.7(2)(f)

Facts The claimant was the employee of the respondent. As a result of the claimant accessing the bank accounts of a number of his work colleagues, a disciplinary process was entered into which culminated in a decision to terminate the claimant's employment. The claimant exercised his right to appeal this decision on two occasions but the decision to dismiss was upheld.

The claimant then brought a claim of unfair dismissal to the Employment Appeals Tribunal, which found that the respondent's decision to dismiss based on the unauthorised accessing of accounts was a disproportionate response, was unreasonable and was unfair in all the circumstances. The respondent appealed this decision to the Circuit Court.

Held by the Circuit Court (Judge Linnane) in allowing the appeal:

(1) What constitutes misconduct must be decided depending on the circumstances of a particular case. The list of conduct in a disciplinary policy given which merits dismissal is not an exhaustive list but merely guidelines. The fact that the misconduct complained of was not included in the list of misconduct meriting dismissal did not assist the claimant in his claim.

(2) Fair procedures were followed in the disciplinary process and it was conducted in accordance with the principles of natural justice.

(3) It is not for the Employment Appeals Tribunal or the Circuit Court to ask whether it would dismiss in the circumstances or substitute its view for the employer's view. The appropriate approach is to ask was it reasonably open to the employer to make the decision it made. British Leyland UK Ltd v Swift [1981] I.R.L.R. 91 applied

(4) The decision to dismiss was a reasonable one and the dismissal was fair.

JUDGE LINNANE delivered her judgment on May 24, 2012 saying: This matter comes before the court by way of an appeal by the respondent from a determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal (the EAT) dated February 7, 2011. The claimant was an employee of the respondent since 1993. Over a period of two days, March 25 and 26, 2008, on several occasions he accessed the bank accounts of a number of his work colleagues, including his superiors. It was not done for any purpose connected with his work or with consent. This is not in dispute. As a result he was suspended on full pay pending an investigation and by letter of April 23, 2008 he was provided with full details of the allegations against him which the respondent considered to be extremely serious and informed that the matter would be progressed under its disciplinary policy. He was further informed that if the allegations were upheld, disciplinary sanction may be imposed up to and including the termination of his employment. A copy of the disciplinary procedure was furnished, he was informed of the person who would be dealing with the matter and that he was entitled to be represented.

The disciplinary process then followed – in the first investigation there were four meetings at which the claimant was represented by a solicitor for three of those and by his father at the last meeting. The claimant accepted he had accessed the accounts of his colleagues not for any legitimate business purpose in connection with his employment but to find out if they were paid a bonus and what bonuses his colleagues got. This investigation found that the allegations in the letter of April 23, 2008 were proven, that his accessing of the accounts on March 25 and 26, 2008 was not for business use and was inappropriate and as a consequence the decision was made that his employment be terminated. The claimant was so informed of the findings and decision by letter of September 1, 2008 and of his right to appeal the decision.

The claimant exercised his right to appeal that decision and another senior official from the respondent was appointed to deal with same and a hearing took place on October 23, 2008 regarding the allegations in the letter of April 23, 2008. By letter of November 10, 2008, the claimant was furnished with the determination of that appeal. That determination refers to the imperative of customer confidentiality which derives from a fundamental duty of care owed between a bank and its customers. It considered the breach of trust was particularly serious given that the claimant was accessing the private financial information of his own colleagues and the wrongdoing alleged in the letter of April 23, 2008 was sufficiently serious to warrant dismissal. It considered that what he did on March 25 and 26, 2008 constituted a breach of trust between the employer and employee such as to render the continuation of his employment unsustainable and upheld the sanction of dismissal.

The claimant had a further right of appeal under the disciplinary procedure and Mr Peter Ward (now Senior Counsel) was agreed as an independent external person to deal with same. This hearing took place on March 11, 2009. The claimant was represented by Dr Forde SC. Mr Ward dealt with the matter on the basis as to whether the respondent's decision to dismiss was reasonable – that is whether the decision to dismiss was within a band of decisions reasonably open to the employer, was it reasonably open to the respondent to make the decision it made. This was accepted and agreed by the claimant's Senior Counsel as the correct approach. Applying that test and having considered the matter Mr Ward found the decision to terminate by the respondent was a reasonable one and the claimant's employment was then terminated on April 9, 2009. Up to then and during the period of his suspension his salary had been paid.

The claimant then brought a claim of unfair dismissal to the EAT seeking reinstatement. That hearing took place over a number of days and he was represented by Dr Forde SC. The decision of the EAT records that no issue was taken by the claimant with the investigation that was conducted. It also records that an inordinate amount of time was given over by counsel for the claimant to the entwining of the speak-up system with the subsequent events which led to his dismissal, that this was an unnecessary exercise in muddying the waters and that on balance it (the EAT) did not accept that his activation of the speak-up policy had any bearing on the ultimate reasons given for the dismissal. It also accepted that the management decisions made regarding the payment or non-payment of any bonuses predated the activation of the speak-up policy by the claimant.

The EAT found that the decision to dismiss based on unauthorised accessing of accounts – which the claimant admitted to – was a disproportionate response to the claimant's actions and was unreasonable and accordingly the dismissal was unfair in all the circumstances. It found that the response never fell within the bands of reasonableness proportion put forward by the respondent. The EAT felt a more reasonable approach would have been to suspend him without pay for a period of time such as six months. Accordingly it determined that he be re-engaged backdated to six months after the dismissal and paid at the same salary as he had at the date he was dismissed.

At the outset counsel for the claimant made it clear to the court that while he was not claiming that the disciplinary procedure was unfair he would be maintaining that the disciplinary procedure was flawed in that the respondent would not allow on the agenda the claimant's argument that what motivated the decision (to dismiss) was his invoking the speak-up policy and or having sued the respondent. He also submitted that the disciplinary process focused on the accessing of the accounts and that was what the court should focus on. It was further made clear to the court that he would be maintaining that the real reason for the dismissal was due to the litigation which the claimant had brought against the respondent and the whistle-blowing (or invocation of the speak-up policy) and the accessing of the accounts was the pretext to get rid of him.

This was a serious allegation to make and more or less made the claim that the respondent officials acted from an improper motive.

With regard to the litigation in the High Court – the claimant initiated those proceedings (the nature of which this court is not concerned with) in 2003. Since then he accepts that he was promoted and also received bonus payments. Unfortunately those proceedings have not yet concluded or even been set down for hearing at this stage eight years after they commenced. It is accepted that the decisions regarding bonus payments for 2007 were made prior to the claimant invoking the speak-up policy so there is no question that the non-payment of a bonus to the claimant had anything to do with his invocation of the speak-up policy. The concerns he had raised under the speak-up policy were thoroughly investigated and dealt with separately.

It was also argued on behalf of the claimant that while he accepted that what he did was inappropriate, his conduct, i.e. the unauthorised accessing of accounts of his colleagues and obtaining private personal information regarding their bank accounts – was not a matter listed in the respondent's grievance and disciplinary policy which sets out various instances of conduct meriting dismissal. With regard to this point in my view it is clear that the list of conduct given meriting dismissal is not an exhaustive list but merely guidelines. It seems to me that what constitutes misconduct must be decided depending on the circumstances of a particular case and the fact that the unauthorised accessing of accounts is not included in the list of conduct meriting dismissal does not assist the claimant or support his claim that his dismissal was unfair.

In my view it is quite clear that fair procedures were followed in the disciplinary process and it was conducted in accordance with the principles of natural justice. In any event, on this point, at the end of this hearing, counsel for the claimant, in his submissions, conceded that the disciplinary process was not flawed due to the withdrawal towards the end of the hearing of this appeal by the claimant of other claims and allegations he had made against the respondent.

As I have referred to earlier, counsel for the claimant at the outset made it clear that his claim was that the decision to dismiss was based on the claimant's invocation of the speak-up policy and the fact that he had brought proceedings against the respondent in 2003 which are still extant. This was persisted in until towards the end of this appeal hearing and after hearing evidence from various witnesses called by the respondent when the claimant eventually accepted and conceded that these matters had no bearing on and nothing to do with the decision to dismiss him and he withdrew those claims. He agreed that the only issue in the decision to dismiss him was what he admitted to doing in March 2008 – namely accessing the accounts of his colleagues.

Counsel on behalf of the respondent contends that in the event of this court finding the dismissal was unfair, which he does not accept, that re-engagement in the circumstances is not the appropriate remedy due to the complete breakdown in trust and rupturing of the relationship and that it would be unworkable. In relation to any compensation it is argued that the court has to take into account the fact that the claimant has accepted he has not taken any meaningful steps to obtain employment and mitigate his loss which he has a duty to do. It is further submitted that under s.7(2)(f) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, the court can also consider the extent to which the conduct of the employee contributed to the dismissal in dealing with the remedy of compensation.

In the written submissions on behalf of the respondent, reference is made to the following:

Section 6(1) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 states the following:

> "Subject to the provisions of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purpose of this Act, to be an unfair dismissal unless, having regard to all the circumstances, there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal."

Section 6(4) states:

> "Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act, not to be an unfair dismissal, if it results wholly or mainly from one or more of the following:
>
> a) …
> b) the conduct of the employee.
> c) …"

Section 6(7) of the Act of 1977 provides:

> "Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) of this section, in determining if a dismissal is an unfair dismissal, regard may be had if the rights commission, the Tribunal or the Circuit Court, as the case may be, considers it appropriate to do so:
>
> a) to the reasonableness or otherwise of the conduct (whether by act or omission) of the employer in relation to the dismissal, and
> b) to the extent (if any) of the compliance or failure to comply by the employer, in relation to the employee with the procedure referred to in section 14(1) of this Act or with the provisions of any code of practice referred to in paragraph(d) of section 7(2) of this Act."

In both the oral and written submissions made by counsel on behalf of the respondent, reliance is made on the band of reasonableness test – namely the test which counsel for the claimant agreed was the appropriate one to be applied in the hearing of the appeal before Mr Ward. Reference is made to the decision of the Court of Appeal in British Leyland UK Ltd v Swift [1981] I.R.L.R. 91 and the following statement of Lord Denning MR at p.93:

> "The correct test is: Was it reasonable for the employers to dismiss him? If no reasonable employer would have dismissed him, then the dismissal was unfair. But if a reasonable employer might reasonably have dismissed him, then the dismissal was fair. It must be remembered that in all these cases there is a band of reasonableness, within which one employer might reasonably take one view, another quite reasonably take a different view."

It is clear that it is not for the EAT or this court to ask whether it would dismiss in the circumstances or substitute its view for the employer's view but to ask was it reasonably open to the respondent to make the decision it made rather than necessarily the one the EAT or the court would have taken.

Counsel on behalf of the claimant submits that the band of reasonableness test in England is a majority view but not held unanimously, that here the tribunal or the court makes the overall decision whether this dismissal was fair and the test is did the employer act fairly in all the circumstances on the basis of the evidence.

He argues that the conduct here merited a measure short of dismissal.

One of the witnesses called on behalf of the respondent and whose account was one of the many accessed over the course of the two days in question in his evidence referred to the fact that in accessing his accounts, which were joint accounts with his wife who was not employed by the respondent, the claimant would have seen his total financial position, his lifestyle, what both he and his wife earned, what they spent their money on.

As counsel for the respondent puts it, was this such a breach of confidentiality and invasion of privacy as to warrant the ultimate sanction?

Taking into account the circumstances here and the position of trust the claimant as an employee of the respondent was in, in my view the decision made by the respondent to dismiss the claimant was a reasonable one and the dismissal was fair. Accordingly I am allowing this appeal.

Gustave Bigaignon (claimant) v Powerteam Electrical Services Limited (respondent): Employment Appeals Tribunal UD939/2010 (March 21, 2012) ([2012] E.L.R.195)

Unfair dismissal – Misconduct – Proportionality – Breach of drug and alcohol policy – Safety-critical duties – Reasonableness of conduct of employer in relation to dismissal – Whether dismissal proportionate – Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (No. 10), s.6(3)

Facts The claimant was employed by the respondent to carry out maintenance work, at a height, on overhead lines for electrical supply. He agreed to the respondent's policy on drug and alcohol use, which included random testing of employees and made clear that a positive test could result in dismissal. A test was carried out on the claimant under this policy and he tested positive for cannabis. The claimant admitted taking illegal drugs. Following an investigation meeting,

Donal Hurley v. Royal Yacht Club: Circuit Court, (Judge John F. Buckley) 17 June 1997

Issue – Unfair dismissal – Appeal to the Circuit Court – Settlement – Jurisdiction – Section 13 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 (No. 10)

Facts This was an appeal from a determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal which held that the claimant was precluded from pursuing proceedings before the Tribunal by reason of his signing an agreement accepting certain payments in full discharge of all claims against the respondent. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether the appellant was advised that he should take advice.

Held by Judge Buckley in granting the appeal and declaring the agreement to be void: It cannot have been the intention of the legislature to prevent employers and employees from compromising claims under the Act.

(1) The doctrine of informed consent applies to the contracting out provisions and to section 13.

2) The appellant was entitled to be advised of his entitlements under the employment protection legislation. Any agreement or compromise should have listed the various acts which were applicable or at least made it clear that they have been taken into account by the appellant.

(3) The appellant should have been advised in writing that he should take appropriate advice as to his rights

BUCKLEY J delivered his judgment on 17 June 1997 saying: The only issue to be determined by me in this case is as to whether the applicant is precluded from pursuing proceedings before the Employment Appeals Tribunal by reason of his having signed an agreement accepting certain payments 'in full discharge of all claims' against the respondent, It comes before me on appeal from the Employment Appeals Tribunal which held that he was so precluded.

There was some conflict of evidence, minor as to the dates on which certain meetings took place, significant in one respect – as to whether the applicant was advised that he should take advice. The view which I have taken of the case does not require me to make a decision as to which of the accounts is correct.

Counsel directed me to certain decisions of the Employment Appeals Tribunal on the application of section 13 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977. There does not appear to be any reported decision of the Circuit or any higher court on the point. Those decisions, Gaffney and Mulholland v. Fannin Ltd, UD1/1989 and UD1127/1988, Fowler and Bergin v. Hardware Distributors Dublin Ltd, UD 872/873/1984. McMullen v. Joe Keane (Taney) Ltd, UD342/1984, McGrane v. Avery Label Ltd, UD573/1988 and Moran v. Microtherm Ltd, UD343/1982 are not ad idem in the approach they have taken.

There is only one leading case on contracting out in a different area, which seems to me to be of assistance. That case Gatien Motor Co., v. Continental Oil [1979] IR 406. considered the provisions of section 42 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1931 which was in the following terms:

> A contract, whether before or after the passing of this Act by virtue of which a tenant would be directly or indirectly deprived of his right to obtain relief under this Act or any particular such relief shall be void.

The judgments of Griffin J and Kenny J in that case affirmed that the contracting out provision could not apply until the tenant had a right to relief under that Act.

Section 13 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 is in the following terms:

> A provision in an agreement (whether a contract of employment or not and whether made before or after the commencement of this Act) shall be void in so far as it purports to exclude or limit the application of, or is inconsistent with, any provision of this Act.

In the present case it is clear that the applicant, once the respondent decided to dismiss him, was entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Unfair Dismissals Act (and other related employment protection legislation, including the Redundancy Payments Act). Did the agreement completed by the applicant purport to exclude or limit the application of or is it inconsistent with any provision of the Act? It cannot have been the intention of the legislature to prevent employers and employees from compromising claims under the Act. The question which therefore arises is: under what circumstances can claims be legitimately compromised. Not, I think, until the employee is in a proper position to agree to a compromise.

In several areas of the law the Supreme Court has held that any consent by a person to waive a legal right which that person has, must be an informed consent. This doctrine must surely apply to contracting out provisions and to section 13 in particular.

Reviewing the Unfair Dismissals cases it is notable that in Gaffney and Mulholland v. Fannin Ltd the agreement listed four acts under which the applicants may have had rights and the applicants had the benefit of advice from a Trade Union official. This was also the position in Fowler and Bergin v. Hardware Distributors Ltd and in McMullen v. Joe Keane (Taney) Ltd, the matter was settled before a Rights Commissioner.

I am satisfied that the applicant was entitled to be advised of his entitlements under the employment protection legislation and that any agreement or compromise should have listed the various Acts which were applicable, or at least made it clear that they had been taken into account by the applicant. I am also satisfied that the applicant should have been advised in writing that he should take appropriate advice as to his rights, which presumably in his case would have been legal advice. In the absence of such advice I find the agreement to be void. My finding that the agreement was void, should not be taken as an indication that the officers of the club behaved improperly, or that they- unfairly pressurised the applicant. I am satisfied that they genuinely believed it was in the interests of the club, once a decision to dismiss the applicant had been taken, to ensure a speedy agreed settlement with the applicant.

As I have found the agreement to be void, it follows that the applicant will be obliged to return any monies paid to him by the club under the agreement. His substantive claim against the club can now be pursued in the Employment Appeals Tribunal.

Issue – Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973 (No. 4) – Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment (Reference of Disputes) Regulation 1973, SI No 243/73 – Resignation of employee without notice – Dispute - 'In the prescribed manner' – Misconduct

Facts The employer brought a claim alleging that the employee had resigned without the requisite one week's notice. The employee agreed that > dismissed, but ended his employment by agreement when he took retirement. In one sense this may be so, but the claimant argued that this situation was forced on him when the NRB was dissolved and no agreement was reached on his transfer to any of the other bodies. There are other factors involved."

This passage taken in isolation would support the plaintiff's contention. However, later on in the decision there is a specific finding of the Tribunal as follows:

> "We find, therefore, that the reason for the termination of employment was redundancy, and that the claimant is taken to be dismissed for that reason."

It is clear from that passage that the tribunal did indeed address the question of whether the defendant retired or was made redundant. It found that he was made redundant. The earlier passage was merely a statement of the arguments which were to be considered by the Tribunal. The plaintiff's claims on this ground are not sustained.

I will discuss the appropriate order to be made with counsel.

Niaomh Humphries (claimant) v Westwood Fitness Club (respondent): Labour Court No. EED037 ED/02/59 (December 18, 2003), Circuit Court, Dunne J., February 13, 2004 ([2004] E.L.R. 296)

Unfair dismissal – Discrimination on grounds of disability – Whether an eating disorder a disability – Failure to follow proper procedures – Employment Equality Act 1998 (No.21), s.6, s.8(6)(c), s.16(3), s.77

Facts The claimant worked for the respondent as a childcare assistant in a crèche facility operated by them. She developed anorexia which later developed into bulimia. The claimant went on sick leave to undergo treatment. After her return to work, and just as it appeared that her condition had stabilised, a number of incidents occurred which caused the respondent concern in respect of the manner in which she was performing her duties. The claimant received two verbal warnings in respect of these matters. A number of months later the claimant became depressed and requested more time off work as she wished to be readmitted to hospital. At this stage, the respondent, without obtaining medical or psychiatric advice in respect of the claimant's disorder or any form of risk assessment in relation to her condition, formed the view that the claimant was a danger to herself and the children in her care and resolved to dismiss her. The respondent asked the claimant to attend a meeting where she was informed of the decision to dismiss her, and was subsequently sent a letter of dismissal.

Determined by the Labour Court:

(1) That as the claimant's dismissal arose primarily from the respondent's belief that her disorder would impair her ability to carry out the duties for which she was employed, her dismissal was prima facie discriminatory under s.8 of the Employment Equality Act 1998.

(2) There is a complete defence under s.16 of the Employment Equality Act 1998 to a claim of discrimination on grounds of disability under s.8, if it can be shown that the respondent formed a bona fide belief that the claimant was not fully capable of performing the duties for which she was employed.

(3) In order to form such belief, the respondent would normally be required to make adequate enquiries to establish fully the factual position in relation to the claimant's capacity. The nature of the enquiries would depend on the circumstances but would at a minimum involve looking at medical evidence to determine the level of impairment arising from the disability and its duration. If it is apparent that the employee is not fully capable, the respondent is required under s.16(3) to consider what if any special treatment or facilities may be available by which the employee can become fully capable and account must be taken of the cost of such facilities or treatment.

(4) Such enquiry could only be regarded as adequate if the employee concerned is allowed a full opportunity to participate at each level and is allowed to present relevant medical evidence and submissions.

(5) That the appropriate redress is an award of compensation, and having regard to all the circumstances, the sum of €13,000 is the appropriate figure.

No cases are referred to in the determination

The respondent appealed to the Circuit Court.

Held by by Dunne J.:

(1) Anorexia is a disability within the meaning of the Employment Equality Act 1998.

(2) The employer may have legitimate concerns about the employee's ability to undertake the duties attached to her position, but is required to take appropriate medical advice in relation to those concerns prior to dismissing an employee.

(3) The respondent employer did not take such advice, and therefore did not carry out the dismssal in an approprate manner. Accordingly the determination of the Labour Court is affirmed.

The full text of the Labour Court's determination was as follows:

Subject
Alleged unfair dismissal under s.7 of the Employment Equality Act 1998.

Background
The claimant was employed by the respondent as a child-care assistant from October 15, 2000 until June 6, 2002, when she was dismissed. She claimed that her dismissal was wholly or mainly on grounds of her disability and constitutes discrimination within the meaning of s.8 and contrary to s.6 of the Employment Equality Act 1998 (the Act).

The facts
The facts as found by the Court or as admitted can be summarised as follows.

The claimant worked as a childcare assistant in a crèche facility operated by the respondent. Her duties involved the care of young children.

The claimant suffered from anorexia, which later developed into bulimia. She suffered from this condition throughout the period of her employment with the respondent. It is accepted that this disorder constitutes a disability for the purposes of the Act.

During the course of her employment the claimant was hospitalised on a number of occasions. In March 2001 the respondent gave the claimant three months' sick leave in order to allow her to undergo treatment. She was admitted to hospital and was later treated as an outpatient. By June 1, 2001 the claimant was certified as fit to return to work. However, within three weeks she suffered a recurrence of the symptoms of the disorder and was again forced to take sick leave.

The claimant was not paid during her absence on sick leave.

The claimant remained on sick leave until late September, 2001 when she was certified as fit for work. She continued to receive counselling and other outpatient treatment for the disorder. She kept the respondent informed in this regard. It appeared that by December 2001 the claimant's condition had stabilised.

From January 2002 onwards a number of incidents occurred which caused the respondent some concern as to the manner in which the claimant was performing her duties. These matters related to the wearing of jewellery at work (which was not permitted on safety grounds) and alleged erratic behaviour.

The claimant was issued with two verbal warnings in respect of these matters.

On or about the month of May 2002 the claimant became depressed and, it was suggested that she had developed suicidal tendencies. She requested more time off as she wished to be readmitted to hospital. At this stage the respondent had formed the view that the claimant was a danger to herself and the children in her care. The manager of the respondent resolved to dismiss the claimant.

The claimant was asked to attend a meeting with the manager and assistant manager of the respondent on May 27, 2002. At this meeting she was informed that it had been decided to terminate her employment. She was subsequently dismissed by letter dated June 6, 2002. The letter of dismissal stated in the relevant part as follows:

> "With reference to our meeting, I would like to reiterate that we are terminating your employment here at [the respondent's premises]. You were given personal leave on two occasions in the last year as requested by yourself. As discussed, we believe you need an extended period of time to complete the treatment you are receiving for the condition that you have. It is also unsuitable that you would be working in a childcare facility under the present conditions as confirmed by your doctor."

The respondent did not obtain any medical or psychiatric advice in relation to the claimant's disorder nor did they undertake any form of risk assessment in relation to her condition. The respondent told the Court that they had taken the conduct of the claimant, in relation to which the verbal warnings had been issued, into account in deciding to terminate her employment. They had also decided that her disorder rendered her unfit for the duties for which she was employed.

Statutory requirements

Section 6 of the Act provides, in effect, that discrimination shall be taken to occur where, on any of the discriminatory grounds, one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated.

Section 8(6)(c) of the Act provides, in effect, that an employer shall be taken to have discriminated against an employee in relation to conditions of employment, if the employee is afforded less favourable terms, on any of the discriminatory grounds, in respect of, inter alia, dismissal and disciplinary measures.

In the present case it is clear from the letter sent to the claimant dated June 6, 2002, that her dismissal arose wholly or mainly from the respondents belief that the disorder from which she suffered impaired her ability to carry out the duties for which she was employed. Thus she was treated less favourably than a person who did not suffer from a similar disability resulting in the same perceived impairment, would have been treated. It follows that the dismissal was prima facie discriminatory and unlawful.

However a dismissal which appears to be discriminatory within the meaning of s.8 of the Act may be saved by s.16. This section provides, as follows:

> "16.—(1) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as requiring any person to recruit or promote an individual to a position, to retain an individual in a position, or to provide training or experience to an individual in relation to a position, if the individual—
>
> (a) will not undertake (or, as the case may be, continue to undertake) the duties attached to that position or will not accept (or, as the case may be, continue to accept) the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed, or
>
> (b) is not (or, as the case may be, is no longer) fully competent and available to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, the duties attached to that position, having regard to the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed.
>
> (3)(a) For the purposes of this Act, a person who has a disability shall not be regarded as other than fully competent to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, any duties if, with the assistance of special treatment or facilities, such person would be fully competent to undertake, and be fully capable of undertaking, those duties.
>
> (c) An employer shall do all that is reasonable to accommodate the needs of a person who has a disability by providing special treatment or facilities to which paragraph (a) relates.
> (d) A refusal or failure to provide for special treatment or facilities to which paragraph (a) relates shall not be deemed reasonable unless such provision would give rise to a cost, other than a nominal cost, to the employer."

This section, on which the respondent relies, can provide a complete defence to a claim of discrimination on the disability ground if it can be shown that the employer formed the bona fide belief that the claimant is not fully capable, within the meaning of the section, of performing the duties for which they are employed. However, before coming to that view the employer would normally be required to make adequate enquiries so as to establish fully the factual position in relation to the employee's capacity.

The nature and extent of the enquiries which an employer should make will depend on the circumstances of each case. At a minimum, however, an employer, should ensure that he or she is in full possession of all the material facts concerning the employee's condition and that the employee is given fair notice that the question of his or her dismissal for incapacity is being considered. The employee must also be allowed an opportunity to influence the employer's decision.

In practical terms this will normally require a two-stage enquiry, which looks firstly at the factual position concerning the employee's capability including the degree of impairment arising from the disability and its likely duration. This would involve looking at the medical evidence available to the employer either from the employee's doctors or obtained independently.

Secondly, if it is apparent that the employee is not fully capable, s.16(3) of the Act requires the employer to consider what if any special treatment or facilities may be available by which the employee can become fully capable. The section requires that the cost of such special treatment or facilities must also be considered. Here, what constitutes nominal cost will depend on the size of the organisation and its financial resources.

Finally, such an enquiry could only be regarded as adequate if the employee concerned is allowed a full opportunity to participate at each level and is allowed to present relevant medical evidence and submissions.

Conclusions of the Court

In this case the respondent was faced with an employee who was suffering from a disorder which had both psychiatric and physical manifestations. The respondent became concerned that she might not be suitable to remain in charge of young children. The Court accepts that an employer is entitled to take account of possible dangers occasioned by a disability from which an employee suffers (and may be obliged to do so in certain circumstances).

However, in the instant case the respondent made no effort to obtain a prognosis of the claimant's condition. They did not discuss the situation with her before taking a decision on her future. They came to the conclusion that she could not be retained because of her disability without the benefit of any form of professional advice or assessment of the risks associated with her condition.

There were a number of courses of action open to the respondent. They could have had the situation assessed professionally and considered the most appropriate approach to adopt in consultation with the claimant and her medical advisor. Further, the claimant intimated her desire to re-enter hospital for further treatment. A decision on her future could have been deferred and she could have been given a further period of sick leave to undergo this treatment.

Had the claimant been given further leave her progress could have been monitored and her return to work made conditional upon medical certification that she was fully fit to resume her duties. Such evidence could have been required from either her own doctors or nominees of the respondent. The claimant was not paid during absences on sick leave and the respondent accepted that they could have employed a temporary replacement without additional costs.

Determination

The Court is satisfied that the claimant was dismissed wholly or mainly because of her disability. Further it has not been shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the claimant was not fully capable of continuing to perform the duties for which she was employed within the meaning of s.16(3) of the Act.

Accordingly, the claimant is entitled to succeed.

The Court is satisfied that the appropriate redress is an award of compensation for the effects of the discrimination suffered by the claimant.

Having regard to all the circumstances of the case the Court measures the amount of compensation which it considers appropriate at €13,000. An order against the respondent in that amount will be made.

DUNNE J. delivered her judgment affirming the determination of the Labour Court saying: This case came on by way of appeal from the Labour Court in which the Labour Court found that Westwood Health and Fitness Club had dismissed Ms Humphries who was the claimant in the proceedings wholly and mainly because of her disability. The Labour Court also found that it was not shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the claimant was not fully capable of continuing to perform the duties for which she was employed within the meaning of s.16(3) of the Employment Equality Act 1998. The Labour Court was satisfied that the appropriate redress was an award for compensation and measured the amount of compensation which was appropriate as €13,000. The respondent Westwood Club appealed this matter to the Circuit Court.

I am satisfied that the illness anorexia is a disability within the meaning of the Employment Equality Act 1993 and therefore certain statutory provisions come into play. These statutory provisions were considered by the Labour Court when this case was heard before the Labour Court. These provisions required the employer to deal with the plaintiff in a certain manner in accordance with the Employment Equality Act 1998.

During the course of her employment certain situations did arise whereby the employer did make serious attempts to facilitate the plaintiff's illness. To a large extent the employer did bend over backwards to assist and facilitate the plaintiff and this is where I diverge from the decision of the Labour Court. I understand that there were legitimate concerns during a period from January to June 2002 regarding the plaintiff's health. I am in no doubt but that the employer is entitled to have legitimate concerns. I am in no doubt that the employer did in fact have these concerns regarding the plaintiff. However, the way to deal with these concerns was to take medical advice in order to allay those concerns. An employer should take advice from the plaintiff's own doctor or from an independent doctor. The employer had a legal obligation under the Employment Equality Act 1998 to deal with her in that way.

I believe from the evidence of the witness today that the employer had dealt with the matter honestly and openly and that the employer was honest on the day in Court in relation to the lack of procedures followed. However, the employer went about things in entirely the wrong way and in a totally in appropriate manner. In respect of the employer, it has an obligation to put its concerns to the test. If the employer had taken appropriate medical advice it might have come to the view that it could have dismissed the plaintiff and that there was no way of having the plaintiff in its employment, if it had done that things might be very different today.

However, the employer did not carry out the dismissal in an appropriate manner, the employer just jumped the gun and did not follow the correct procedures. The employer has accepted that and has been open and honest about that. If the employer had taken advices it may have in fact been able to keep the plaintiff on, ultimately the problem was that the problem was that the employer went about things entirely the wrong way. In a number of respects it has fallen down in its obligations as employer to the plaintiff. If it had in fact fulfilled those obligations the plaintiff might still be in her job today.

Accordingly, I find no basis for differing from the decision of the Labour Court and affirm the decision of the Labour Court in its entirety. I also affirm the award that was made by the Labour Court of compensation of €13,000. This is an expensive lesson for the defendant but maybe some good will come of it in that procedures within the company will be reviewed in the future.

Barbara Atkinson (plaintiff) v Hugh Carty & Others (defendant): Circuit Court No. 2001/04860 (Delahunt J.) May 6, 2004 ([2005] E.L.R. 1)

Employment equality – Sexual harassment – Independent contractor – Vicarious liability – Safe or proper systems of work – Statutory obligation of Employer – Safety, Health and Welfare at Work Act 1989 (No.7)

Complaints of sexual harassment – Flawed investigation – Contributory negligence – Delay in making employer aware of her difficulties

Facts The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a legal accountant from 1987. Not long after she commenced employment, the plaintiff began to experience problems with an independent contractor who provided accountancy services to the defendant. During the 1990s, an unsafe and unwelcome sexual element began to occur in her relationship with the independent contractor. The problems became more severe, culminating in the plaintiff making a written complaint to the defendant in or around 2000. The plaintiff claimed that the delay in making the complaint was because she felt unable to complain due to the deterioration of her relationship with the managing partner, by whom she felt she was bullied, and on account of the fact that he had a close relationship with the independent contractor. The defendant, on receiving the complaint, adopted a reasonable approach by agreeing to carry out an independent investigation to examine the plaintiff's allegations. However it was then decided that the managing partner would conduct the investigation himself. The plaintiff claimed that the investigation was carried out in a wholly unfair manner in that the managing partner was conducting an investigation into allegations made against a close friend and furthermore that the plaintiff was not afforded full participation in the investigation. The defendant denied all allegations of bullying and argued that the investigation was fully in compliance with the requirements of natural justice.

Held by Delahunt J., in finding for the plaintiff arising from the defendant's breach of statutory and contractual duties:

(1) That the evidence that the plaintiff gave in relation to her difficulties with the independent contractor was credible and that she had suffered a serious case of sexual harassment. The Court was satisfied that the managing partner did not bully the plaintiff in the manner alleged in the course of her employment.

(2) The defendant could not plead immunity from their failure to fulfill their statutory obligation to provide a safe place of work, a safe system of work and a safe working environment simply because the plaintiff failed to make a complaint. There were no adequate procedures in place and this rendered the defendant liable.

(3) The defendant was correctly before the Court as they were responsible for the actions of the independent contractor.

(4) The purported investigation carried out by the defendant was so flawed that it significantly exacerbated the problems for the plaintiff.

(5) The plaintiff was entitled to damages in the amount of €137,000, less a finding of contributory negligence measured at 25%, on account of the plaintiff being aware for a two-year period prior to making a complaint that she was being sexually harassed in the legal sense.

DELAHUNT J. delivered her judgment on May 6, 2004 saying: This matter comes before the court by way of the plaintiff's application for damages for breach of contract, breach of duty including breach of statutory duty and ancillary reliefs arising from her employment with the defendants. The plaintiff relied in particular on the failure of the defendants to provide any safe or proper systems of work for the plaintiff pursuant to the Safety, Health and Welfare at Work Act 1989. A full and comprehensive defence was filed denying all allegations and pleading contributory negligence arising from the plaintiff's claims. It was further denied by the defendants that they were responsible for the acts of an independent contractor, Mr John Mahon, whom the plaintiff claimed sexually assaulted and harassed her during the course of her employment with the defendants. The contributory negligence alleged related to the plaintiff's failure to make any or any adequate complaint to the defendants.

The plaintiff commenced employment with the defendants in or around 1987 as a legal accountant. She was given a document setting out her terms and conditions of employment, however this document was not signed or dated. According to the defendants, the plaintiff was the only employee to receive this document despite there being a statutory obligation for the defendants to provide same to all employees. These terms and conditions of employment required the plaintiff to report to Messers Hugh Carty, John Carty and John Mahon.

The plaintiff began to experience problems with Mr Mahon not long after she commenced employment. Mr Mahon was not an employee of the defendants but an independent contractor who provided accountancy services to the defendants. The practice was for Mr Mahon to call on various days and at various times to the office of the plaintiff. The plaintiff objected to the unannounced and irregular nature of Mr Mahon's visits. However the defendants directed that the plaintiff should comply with Mr Mahon's visits, that they were satisfied with the arrangement they had in place with Mr Mahon and they were entitled to insist on same.

During the 1990s, the plaintiff alleges an unsavoury element commenced concerning her relationship with Mr Mahon when unsafe and unwelcome sexual elements began to occur. In or around 1997–98 these problems became more severe culminating in the plaintiff making a written complaint in or around September 2000 to the defendants. No complaint had been made prior to this date. The plaintiff gave evidence stating that she felt she could not complain due to the deterioration of her relationship with the managing partner, Mr Hugh Carty. She felt that she had been bullied by Mr Hugh Carty and furthermore the fact that Mr Mahon was a close friend of Mr Hugh Carty's meant that she felt unable to make a complaint.

The defendants deny all allegations of bullying. Mr Hugh Carty stated that they had an open door policy in operation in the office and that any member of staff was free to go directly to himself or his secretary at all times in relation to any employment grievance that might arise. This was not contained in any written procedure or policy, however Mr Hugh Carty gave evidence to the effect that the open door policy operated in practice.

I am of the view that the evidence that the plaintiff gave in relation to her difficulties with Mr Mahon is credible. I note that Mr Mahon did not give evidence. However a former employee who was employed at the time that we are concerned with, Ms Mary Kane, did give evidence that corroborated the plaintiff's complaints against Mr Mahon, albeit post-termination of the plaintiff's employment.

However what is of crucial importance here is that an employer is obliged to provide a safe place of work, a safe system of work and a safe working environment. The onus is on the employer by law to provide for same.

I do not accept that the plaintiff was bullied in the course of her employment by Mr Hugh Carty in the manner alleged, but I do believe that the plaintiff suffered a serious case of sexual harassment.

I note that there were no written procedures in place to provide the plaintiff with an avenue to seek redress. It is not sufficient for the defendants to plead that no amount of paper compliance would have helped in the case of the plaintiff. The failure of the defendants to have in place adequate procedures renders them liable and by reason of their failure to fulfill their statutory obligations they are responsible and cannot plead immunity from same simply because the plaintiff failed to make a complaint.

Furthermore I am satisfied that the defendants are responsible for the actions of Mr Mahon and that the defendants are correctly before the court.

In relation to the investigation which the defendant claims they conducted in a manner that complied fully with the requirements of natural justice, this court is of the view that that purported investigation was so flawed that it significantly exacerbated problems for the plaintiff. On September 5, 2000, the defendants adopted what was a perfectly reasonable approach confirmed by the memo of the meeting that took place between Messers Hugh Carty, John Carty and the plaintiff. At the said meeting it was agreed that there would be an independent investigation carried out to examine the plaintiff's allegations. However after this was agreed, Mr Hugh Carty subsequently decided that he would conduct the investigation himself rather than have it independently investigated.

The investigation was flawed for a number of reasons. First, Mr Carty was investigating a close friend. Secondly, the plaintiff was provided no opportunity in the course of the investigation to respond either verbally or in writing to matters arising. Thirdly, the plaintiff was not furnished with details of the responses of any other person interviewed in the course of the investigation. Fourthly, Mr Carty continued with the investigation whilst at the same time having serious professional difficulties with the plaintiff in relation to the running of his office.

I am finding for the plaintiff arising from the defendant's breach of statutory and contractual duties towards her.

However I do have some sympathy for the defendant as the plaintiff failed to make them aware of her difficulties until September of 2000 even though it is clear from her evidence that she was aware in or around 1997 that she was being sexually harassed in the legal sense as a result of information supplied to her by her husband about the sexual harassment policy that applied in his employment. From that time, the plaintiff was in a position to do something as regards the sexual harassment but she failed to do so for another two years.

I am satisfied that the plaintiff has suffered deep psychological trauma which has prevented her from reverting to her qualified employment. Her psychiatrist, Dr Leader, is of the view that the plaintiff will be unable to work in her chosen profession again. Dr Leader also gave evidence stating that the legal process has had a bad effect on the plaintiff in relation to the trauma suffered. I note that Dr Leader's evidence is based on two reviews and no treatment. The defendants' medical advisor is of the view that within a period of nine to 12 months, the plaintiff will recover fully if she continues her treatment.

It would appear that the plaintiff will achieve recovery within a period of five years after her making the complaint to the defendants.

I am therefore assessing damages in the amount of €40,000 for general damages, €79,000 for special damages to date and €18,000 for loss and damage into the future. I am of the view that the plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence arising from her failure to act sooner than she did, and I assess that level of contribution at 25%. I direct that the award should be reduced accordingly.

Costs are to be awarded to the plaintiff.

A stay is to be granted on the order pending an appeal conditional on the sum of €15,000 being paid to the plaintiff before the appeal is lodged.

Arturs Valpeters (complainant) v Melbury Developments Ltd (respondent): Labour Court EDA0917 (September 16, 2009) ([2010] E.L.R. 64)

Employment equality – Race – Less favourable treatment – Entitlement of the Court to take account of the knowledge and experience of its members – Burden of proof – Right to information – Appropriate redress – Appeal against the decision of the Equality Tribunal – Employment Equality Acts 1998 (No.21) to 2007 (No.27), ss.6(2), 8, 74, 76, 83 and 85A

Facts The complainant, a Latvian national, was employed by the respondent as a general operative from May 19, 2005 until April 13, 2007. He claimed that he was treated less favourably than an Irish worker in that:

(a) He was treated as a self-employed sub-contractor rather than an employee engaged on a contract of service,
(b) He received no written contract of employment,
(c) He was not provided with payslips,
(d) He received no health and safety training or no health and safety statement in a language which he understood,
(e) He was not paid in accordance with the registered employment agreement for the construction industry,
(f) He was dismissed from his employment without being afforded the benefit of fair procedures which would have been available to a worker of Irish nationality.

The Equality Officer found that the complainant was an employee on a contract of service but found that the complaints particularised at (b), (c) and (e) had been disposed of under other legislative provisions and that in respect of (a) and (f) the complainant had failed to establish a prima facie case of discrimination and accordingly those complaints could not succeed. In respect of (d), the Equality Officer found that the complainant had been discriminated against on grounds of race and awarded him €500 compensation.

The complainant appealed against the Equality Officer's decision in relation to (a) and (f) and appealed against the quantum of the compensation awarded in respect of (d). There was no cross-appeal by the respondent who did not attend the hearing.

The complainant contended that he was treated badly by the respondent and was so treated because of his race. The solicitor for the complainant contended that the complainant was not in a position to provide evidence concerning how other employees of the respondent were treated and submitted that in such circumstances the Court should apply a "peculiar knowledge principle" so as to place the onus of proving those facts on the respondent.

Determined by the Labour Court in finding that the complainant had failed to establish facts from which discrimination could be inferred and dismissing the appeal, that:

(1) Mere speculation or assertions, unsupported by evidence, cannot be elevated to a factual basis upon which an inference of discrimination can be drawn.

(2) The "peculiar knowledge principle" cannot be applied so as to offset or supplant the clear statutory requirements of the Act in relation to the burden of proof.

(3) Knowledge of how the complainant's fellow workers were treated was not exclusively within the knowledge of the respondent. The workers could have been required to attend the hearing and the complainant could have sought information concerning their employment status under section 76 of the Act.

(4) Where no reply is given or where misleading or equivocal information is provided by an employer under section 76, the Equality Officer or the Court can draw an inference adverse to the respondent.

(5) The Court can rely on the knowledge and experience of its members in concluding facts. In that regard, the Court concluded that the practice of classifying workers as sub-contractors to avoid an employer's responsibilities under employment, tax and social welfare legislation is not confined to workers whose national origin is outside Ireland.

(6) The award of €500 compensation for the respondent's failure to give health and safety training or a health and safety statement in a language which he understood, is adequate in circumstances where the complainant suffered no material or other loss or any inconvenience or upset in consequence of the discrimination.

Subject
1. Appeal under s.83 of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2007-DEC-E2009-019.

Background
2. The worker appealed against the decision of the Equality Officer to the Labour Court on April 1, 2009, in accordance with s.83 of the Equality Acts 1998 to 2007. A Labour Court hearing took place on September 9, 2009 in Waterford. The following is the Labour Court's Determination.

Determination
This is a complaint by Mr Arturs Valpeters (hereafter the complainant) against Melbury Construction Ltd (hereafter the respondent) alleging discrimination on the race ground. The complaint was made under the Employment Equality Acts 1998–2008 (hereafter the Act). The complainant is a native of Latvia. He was employed by the respondent as a general operative between May 19, 2005 and April 13, 2007.

The substance of the complainant's case is that while employed by the respondent he was treated less favourably that an Irish worker would have been treated. In advancing his claim the complainant relied upon the following particulars:

(a) That he was treated as a self-employed sub-contractor by the respondent whereas he was in reality employed under a contract of service;
(b) He received no written contract of employment;
(c) He was not provided with payslips;

(d) He received no health and safety training and did not receive a health and safety statement in a language which he understood;
(e) He was not paid in accordance with the registered employment agreement for the construction industry;
(f) He was dismissed from his employment without being afforded the benefit of any procedures which would have been available to a worker of Irish nationality.

The complaint was investigated by an Equality Officer of the Equality Tribunal pursuant to s.79 of the Act. The Equality Officer found that those aspects of the complaint particularised at (b), (c) and (e) had been disposed of in proceedings under other legislative provisions and did not fall to be decided upon by him.

The Equality Officer was satisfied that at all material times the complainant was an employee of the respondent under a contract of service. On the particulars of the complaints within his jurisdiction the Equality Officer found that in respect to the complaints at (a) and (f) the complainant had failed to establish a prima facie case of discrimination and that those complaints could not succeed.

On the complaint referred to at (d) the Equality Officer held that the complainant was discriminated against in not being provided with a safety statement in a language in which he was competent.

The Equality Officer awarded the complainant compensation in the amount of €500.

The complainant appealed against so much of the Equality Officer's Decision which held that his complaints under (a) and (f) above could not succeed. He also appealed against the quantum of compensation awarded in respect of his complaint particularised at (d) above.

There is no cross-appeal by the respondent.

The respondent, having been duly notified of the time, date and place of the hearing of the appeal failed to appear.

The complainant's case

The gist of the complainant's case is that he suffered loss in respect to social welfare entitlements and the deduction of additional tax in consequence of being classified by the respondent as self- employed. He submitted that an Irish national working in the construction industry would have known the difference between being a self-employed contractor and being an employee. It was submitted on the complainant's behalf that the Court should infer that an Irish worker would not have been subjected to similar treatment.

With regard to the dismissal, the complainant contends that he was not afforded the benefit of any form of procedure before the decision to dismiss him was taken. He claims that an Irish worker would not have been similarly treated.

It was further submitted that the quantum of compensation awarded by the Equality Officer was not adequate or reasonable in all the circumstances of the case.

Conclusions of the Court

Section 85A of the Act provides for the allocation of the probative burden in cases within its ambit. This requires that the complainant must first establish facts from which discrimination may be inferred. What those facts are will vary from case to case and there is no closed category of facts which can be relied upon. All that is required is that they be of sufficient significance to raise a presumption of discrimination. However they must be established as facts on credible evidence. Mere speculation or assertions, unsupported by evidence, cannot be elevated to a factual basis upon which an inference of discrimination can be drawn. Section 85A places the burden of establishing the primary facts fairly and squarely on the complainant and the language of this provision admits of no exceptions to that evidential rule.

In this case it was submitted that the complainant was treated badly by the respondent and the Court was invited to infer that he was so treated because of his race. Such an inference could only be drawn if there was evidence of some weight from which it could be concluded that persons of a different race or nationality were or would be treated more favourably. All that has been proffered in support of that contention is a mere assertion unsupported by any evidence.

Mr Grogan, solicitor for the complainant has pointed to the difficulty for the complainant in obtaining evidence concerning how others were treated. He submitted that in these circumstances the respondent should be required to prove that others were treated similarly to the complainant. In the Court's view such an approach would amount to placing the entire probative burden on the respondent. That would involve an impermissible departure from the plain language and clear import of s.85A of the Act and the Community law provision upon which it is based.

It was further submitted that in circumstances in which the complainant could have no way of knowing whether or not other employees of a different nationality were wrongly treated as sub-contractors the Court should apply what is known as the peculiar knowledge principle so as to place the onus of proving that fact on the respondent. The peculiar knowledge principle is a rule of evidence by which the burden of proofing a fact in issue can, in certain circumstances, be placed on a defendant. It was explained by Palles C.B. in Mahony v Waterford, Limerick and Western Railway Co. [1900] 2 I. R. 273 as follows:

> "I rest my judgment on this:—although it is the general rule of law that it lies upon the plaintiff to prove affirmatively all the facts entitling him to relief, there is a well-known exception to such rule in reference to matters which are peculiarly > within the knowledge of the defendant. In such case the onus is shifted"

The Chief Baron went on to quote from Taylor on Evidence as follows:

> "The second exception to the above-named general rule is that where the subject matter of the allegation lies peculiarly within the knowledge of one of the parties, that party must prove it, whether it be of an affirmative or negative character and even though there be a presumption of law in his favour."

There are difficulties in applying that principle in the instant case. First, it is a common law rule and the Court cannot see how it could be applied so as to offset or supplant the clear statutory requirements of s.85A of the Act. In any event it appears that the application of the peculiar knowledge principle operates similarly to s.85A of the Act in that the existence of the presumed fact must be established in a prima facie way before the onus of proof shifts to the defendant. Secondly in Attorney General (McGowan) v Carville (1961) 95 I.L.T.R. 41, Davitt P. pointed out that the principle operates where the fact in issue is exclusively or almost exclusively with the knowledge of the defendant. In Hanrahan v Merck Sharpe and Dohme [1988] I.L.R.M. 629, Henchy J. made it clear that mere difficulty of proof would not suffice in shifting the burden of proof to the defendant. More recently, in Rothwell v Motor Insurers Bureau of Ireland [2003] 1 I.R. 268, the Supreme Court (per Hardiman J.) approved and applied the dictum of Henchy J in Hanrahan. The Judge further pointed out the presumed fact in issue must be "peculiarly within the range of the defendants capacity of proof".

Knowledge of how the complainant's fellow workers were treated is not exclusively or almost exclusively within the knowledge of the respondent. Nor could it be said that it is peculiarly within the range of respondent's capacity of proof. It is also plainly within the knowledge of those other workers. The complainant could have sought to ascertain from those workers if they were treated as sub-contractors or as employees. If necessary those workers could have been required to attend at the hearing and testify as to how they were treated.

For these reasons the Court cannot accept that the peculiar knowledge principle can avail the complainant so as to relieve him of the obligation to prove the primary facts upon which he relies in accordance with s.85A of the Act.

There is provision for the obtaining of information from a respondent under s.76 of the Act which is intended to be in ease of a complainant who would otherwise be unable to obtain necessary proofs in order to process a complaint under the Act. Where no reply is given or where a misleading or equivocal information is provided the Equality Officer and the Court can draw an inference adverse to the respondent. That procedure was utilised in this case but questions were not put concerning the employment status ascribed to others employed by the respondent.

These observations on the requirement to prove the primary facts relied upon apply with equal force in respect to the complainant's submissions regarding both his claim alleging discriminatory treatment and his dismissal. In neither case is there a scintilla of evidence to show that others of a different nationality to that of the complainant were treated differently in either respect.

In that regard the instant case is readily distinguishable on its facts from that of Campbell Catering v Rasaq [2004] E.L.R. 310, on which reliance was placed by the complainant's solicitor. That case concerned a worker who was dismissed having been accused of stealing goods belonging to her employer. She had not been expressly advised of her right to mount a defence and be represented in a disciplinary inquiry. The respondent contended that the complainant was treated the same as any other worker accused of theft. In considering that point the Court said the following:

> "It is clear that many non-national workers encounter special difficulties in employment arising from a lack of knowledge concerning statutory and contractual employment rights together with differences of language and culture. In the case of disciplinary proceedings, employers have a positive duty to ensure that all workers fully understand what is alleged against them, the gravity of the alleged misconduct and their right to mount a full defence, including the right to representation. Special measures may be necessary in the case of non-national workers to ensure that this obligation is fulfilled and that the accused worker fully appreciates the gravity of the situation and is given appropriate facilitates and guidance in making a defense. In such cases, applying the same procedural standards to a non-national workers as would be applied to an Irish national could amount to the application of the same rules to different situations and could in itself amount to discrimination."

The complainant herein was not accused of any form of misconduct and the question of an investigative or disciplinary procedure did not arise. Consequently the underlying rationale of that decision is inapplicable to the facts of the instant case.

In respect to the complainant's erroneous classification by the respondent as an independent contractor, the Court has been invited to accept, as a notorious fact, that an Irish worker would not have been similarly treated. The Court cannot make such an assumption. From its own experience over many cases it appears to the Court that many employers in the construction industry wrongly classify workers who are in reality employees as sub-contractors as a device to avoid their responsibilities under employment, tax and social welfare legislation. This practice is by no means confined to workers whose national origin is outside Ireland.

It is well established that the Court, as an expert tribunal, is entitled to take account of the knowledge and experience of its members in concluding facts. This was made clear by this Court in Inoue v NBK Designs [2003] E.L.R.

98. That decision echoed a similar approach taken by the Court of Appeal for England and Wales in London Underground v Edwards (No.2) [1998] I.R.L.R. 364 where it was acknowledged that tribunals do not sit in blinkers and are entitled to make use of their own knowledge and experience in the industrial field. Similarly in the Northern Ireland case of Briggs v North Eastern Education and Library Board [1990] I.R.L.R. 181, the Court of Appeal held that tribunals are not debarred from taking account of their own knowledge and experience in formulating decisions. The knowledge and experience of this Court suggests that the complainant's assertion that his classification as a sub-contractor was discriminatory is not well-founded.

In these circumstances the Court is satisfied that the complainant has failed to establish facts from which it may be inferred that his classification by the respondent as an independent contractor, or his dismissal, were on grounds of his race and hence discriminatory. Accordingly the Court is satisfied that the Equality Officer was correct in the conclusion which he reached on these aspects of the complaint.

Quantum

The Equality Officer found that the complainant did suffer discrimination in not being provided with a safety statement in a language which he understood. The respondent has not appealed against that finding and it is not in issue in this appeal. The complainant has, however, submitted that the quantum of the award made by the Equality Officer is inadequate.

There is no evidence of the complainant having suffered any material or other loss in consequence of the discrimination which the Equality Officer found to have occurred. Nor is there evidence that he suffered any inconvenience or upset attributable to the respondent's conduct. In these circumstances the Court is satisfied that the award made by the Equality Officer is adequate.

Determination

For all of the reasons set out above the Court can see no basis upon which it could interfere with the Decision of the Equality Officer. Accordingly the within appeal is disallowed and the Decision of the Equality Tribunal is affirmed.

Teresa Mitchell (appellant) v. Southern Health Board (Cork University Hospital) (respondent): Labour Court AEE/99/8 (15 February 2001)

Employment equality – Discrimination – Access to employment – Whether claimant had established prima facie case of discrimination on grounds of sex – Onus of proof – Gender imbalance on interview board, although undesirable, not of itself sufficient to amount to discrimination – Employment Equality Act 1977 (No. 16), sections 2(a), 3 and 12 – Council Directive 97/80 on the Burden of Proof in Cases of Discrimination Based on Sex, Article 4

Facts The claimant, a locum physician employed by the respondent since 1990, applied for a full-time position in 1994. She was unsuccessful and a male candidate was appointed to the post. She brought a claim to the Equality Officer who found that the respondent did not discriminate against the appellant contrary to the provisions of the Employment Equality Act 1977. The appellant appealed that recommendation to the Labour Court. In her submissions, which were denied by the respondent, the claimant alleged, inter alia, that she had greater experience than the successful candidate, was better qualified than the successful candidate, that discriminatory remarks were made prior to the interview and that her previous experience and academic achievements were ignored at the interview. As a preliminary point, the Labour Court had to determine whether it had jurisdiction to proceed with the substantive complaint or refer the matter back to an Equality Officer who had initially determined that he had no jurisdiction to investigate the substantive complaint according to section 12 of the 1977

Act since the disputed appointment had been made by the Local Appointments Commission.

Determined in dismissing the appeal:

(1) The Court has no statutory authority to refer a complaint back to an Equality Officer when an Equality Officer had made a prior recommendation to the Court and had previously determined that he had no jurisdiction to investigate the substantive complaint under section 12 of the 1977 Act. Accordingly, the Court would proceed to investigate the substantive complaint.

(2) A claimant must prove, on the balance of probabilities, the primary facts on which they rely in seeking to raise a presumption of unlawful discrimination.

(3) Only if these primary facts are established to the satisfaction of the Court, and they are regarded as being of sufficient significance to raise a presumption of discrimination, does the onus shift to the respondent to prove that there was no infringement of the principle of equal treatment. Wallace v. South Eastern Education and Library Board [1980] NI 38; [1980] IRLR 193 followed.

(4) Gender imbalance in an interview board, although highly undesirable, does not, in itself, lead to a prima facie finding of discrimination in every case. Nonetheless, such a practice is potentially discriminatory and can form part of the evidential chain on which a claim of discrimination could be made out. Gleeson v. Rotunda Hospital [2000] ELR 206 considered.

(5) The appellant had not discharged the evidential burden which she carried and the appeal should accordingly be dismissed.

Full text of Labour Court determination:

Background

The full background of the case is set out in the Equality Officer's Recommendation No. EE16/1998.

The appellant was employed as a locum consultant physician in general medicine, diabetes and endocrinology at Cork University Hospital from July 1990 to December 1995. In December 1994, the post she occupied was advertised in a permanent capacity. The appellant applied for the post but was unsuccessful, with a male candidate being appointed to the post.

The Equality Officer in his recommendation found that the Southern Health Board did not discriminate against the appellant, contrary to the provisions of the Employment Equality Act 1977.

The appellant appealed the recommendation to the Labour Court on 23 September 1998, on the following grounds:

(i) the Equality Officer erred in law and in fact in finding that the Southern Health Board did not discriminate against the appellant contrary to section 3 of the 1977 Act;
(ii) the Equality Officer erred in law and in fact in finding that the Southern Health Board was not responsible for the appointment given that the board's chief executive made the appointment following a recommendation from the Local Appointments Commission;
(iii) the Equality Officer erred in law and in fact in not awarding an appropriate remedy to the appellant for the discrimination experienced by her and the consequent distress to her;
(iv) on all grounds submitted during the Equality Officer's investigation and such grounds as may arise during the course of the appeal.

The appellant claims that she:

- had greater experience in general medicine, diabetes, endocrinology and metabolism than the successful candidate (details supplied to the Court) ;
- was better qualified than the successful candidate;
- had more publications, more first authorship, more supervisory authorship, more publications in diabetes than the successful candidate;
- the successful candidate submitted additional data to update his CV on the day of interview;
- there was no correlation between remarks made about candidates at interview and final ranking of these candidates;
- the interviewers did not appear to refer to referees re candidates.

The appellant also claims that she was the subject of discriminatory remarks before the interview. She believes that her experience and academic achievements were ignored at the interview.

The board denies that any discriminatory remarks were made to the appellant, either before or during the interview, or that any sexual discrimination took place. While it accepts that the appellant was sufficiently suitable/experienced/qualified for the post, it asserts that the successful candidate was more suitable/experienced/qualified and that this has been borne out since the appointment.

A Labour Court hearing took place on 28 November 2000. The following is the Court's determination.

Determination

The appellant claims to have suffered discrimination on grounds of her sex in not being appointed to the post of consultant physician in general medicine, diabetes and endocrinology with the Southern Health Board (Cork University Hospital). The selection for the post was carried out by the Local Appointment Commission pursuant to section 14 of the Health Act 1970. The disputed appointment was made in April 1995. The appellant had held the post for the previous five years in a locum capacity.

The appellant made a complaint to the Court pursuant to section 19 of the Employment Equality Act 1977 (the Act) in June 1996. The Court referred the dispute to an Equality Officer for investigation and recommendation. The Equality Officer concluded that section 12 of the Act precluded him from investigating the substance of the complaint, since the disputed appointment had been made on foot of a recommendation made by the Local Appointments Commission. The Equality Officer found that the named respondent, the Southern Health Board, did not discriminate against appellant as it had not made the selection which formed the subject of the complaint. It was against that finding that the appellant appealed to the Court.

The appeal opened before the Court on 24 March 1999. Having received submissions from both parties, the Court issued Determination DEE 992, dated 2 July 1999. In that determination, the Court held that section 22 of the Act did not preclude an investigation of the appellant's complaint under the Act. The Court adjourned the hearing on the substantive complaint, so as to allow the parties to make submissions on how the Court should proceed with the investigation in the light of its findings on the issue of jurisdiction.

The Southern Health Board then appealed the Determination of the Court to the High Court on a point of law. That appeal came on for hearing before Barr J on 25 February 2000. In an ex tempore judgment, the court struck out the proceedings, holding that they were premature since this Court had not made any finding on whether or not the appellant had been discriminated against.

Following the judgment of the High Court, this Court invited the parties to make written submissions on how it should proceed in the investigation of the substantive complaint. Solicitors for the appellant submitted that the Court should refer the dispute back to an Equality Officer for investigation. They claimed that the appellant was entitled to a hearing of all the evidence at first instance before an Equality Officer, with the possibility of a full appeal to the Labour Court. The Southern Health Board did not make any submission on this point.

Having considered the submission received, the Court concluded that it had no statutory authority to refer the case back to an Equality Officer, and was obliged to make a definitive determination on the complaint of discrimination. The Court's reasoning was formulated by way of a preliminary conclusion and was conveyed to the parties by letter dated 21 July 2000. The parties were again invited to make submissions on the view taken by the Court. Neither party demurred from that view.

The substantive case

The submissions of the parties

The appellant's claim is grounded on a number of assertions, namely:

(i) That prior to the interview for the post, a named member of the interview board subjected her to discriminatory remarks.
(ii) That she was better qualified for the post and more experienced than the successful candidate.
(iii) That the interview was not fairly conducted.

Full particulars in relation to each of these assertions were provided to the Court.

The respondent made its submission to the Court without prejudice to its contention that it was not a proper party to the proceedings, as it had not exercised any discretion in the selection or appointment to the disputed post.

The respondent's defence was essentially a contradiction of the appellant's claims. They denied that the named member of the interview board had subjected the appellant to discriminatory remarks, either before the interview or at all. They said that six candidates were interviewed for the post; they were all excellent candidates and each of them was qualified and suitable for appointment. The successful candidate was, however, considered to be outstanding, and for that reason was recommended for appointment.

Onus of Proof

Counsel for both parties made submissions to the Court on how the evidential burden should be applied in this case. Counsel for the appellant submitted that, once the appellant makes out a prima facie case, the onus falls on the respondent to rebut the presumption of discrimination. He relied on the decision of the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal in Wallace v. South Eastern Education and Library Board [1980] NI 38; [1980] IRLR 193.

Counsel for the Health Board submitted that the onus is on the claimant to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that she did suffer discrimination.

Council Directive 97/80 of 15 December 1997, on the Burden of Proof in Cases of Discrimination Based on Sex, sets out the procedural rules to be followed in applying the evidential burden in discrimination cases. Article 4.l of the Directive provides that, where a plaintiff in discrimination proceedings establishes facts from which it may be presumed that there has been discrimination, it shall be for the respondent to prove that there has been no breach of the principle of equal treatment.

This Directive has not yet been transposed into Irish law. The date for implementation is 1 January 2001, and it cannot have direct effect before that date. However, in the preamble to the Directive, it is expressly stated that its provisions are derived from the case law of the ECJ. It would appear, therefore, that the aim of the Directive is to formalise in legislation the case law of the ECJ as it presently stands, rather than to introduce a new procedural requirement.

With regard to the Wallace case, this decision of the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal is of persuasive rather than binding authority. It was, however, followed by this Court in Gleeson v. Rotunda Hospital and Mater Misericordiae Hospital [2000] ELR 206.

Wallace is authority for the proposition that, where it is established that a person suffered discrimination in the filling of a post, the onus shifts to the employer to establish that the discrimination did not arise from the gender of the unsuccessful candidate. To that extent, it is consistent with Article 4 of the Onus of Proof Directive and the case law of the ECJ on which it is based.

On that basis, the Court accepts that the principles set out in Wallace and Article 4 of the Directive provide the appropriate procedural rule to be applied in the present case.

It is necessary, however, to consider the extent of the evidential burden which a claimant must discharge before a prima facie case of discrimination on grounds of sex can be made out. The first requirement of Article 4 of the Directive is that the claimant must 'establish facts' from which it may be presumed that the principle of equal treatment has not been applied to them. This indicates that a claimant must prove, on the balance of probabilities, the primary facts on which they rely in seeking to raise a presumption of unlawful discrimination.

It is only if these primary facts are established to the satisfaction of the Court, and they are regarded by the Court as being of sufficient significance to raise a presumption of discrimination, that the onus shifts to the respondent to prove that there was no infringement of the principle of equal treatment.

Applied to the present case, this approach means that the appellant must first prove as a fact one or more of the assertions on which her complaint of discrimination is based. A prima facie case of discrimination can only arise if the appellant succeeds in discharging that evidential burden. If she does, the respondent must prove that she was not discriminated against on grounds of her sex. If she does not, her case cannot succeed.

The evidence

The original defence made by the respondent was that section 12(3) of the Act precluded an investigation by the Court into the selection by the Local Appointments Commissioners of a person to an office or position. In interpreting the Act in conformity with European law, the Court held in DEE 992 that the Local Appointments Commissioners are immune from liability in a claim of discrimination, but that no such immunity can be extended to the respondent as the prospective employer.

Having so decided, the Court expressed the view that by virtue of section 12(3) of the Act, evidence in relation to the selection process of the Local Appointments Commission might not be compellable in relation to the substantive case. In the event, the Local Appointments Commission co-operated fully with the Court in its investigation of this case and provided the Court (and the parties) with a complete file of all documents in its possession relating to the filling of the disputed post.

These included the curricula vitae of all candidates interviewed for the post, the notes of the interview, and the marking sheet on which the results were recorded. This file also contained a copy of the report of the interview board to the Local Appointments Commission. This report set out the attributes that the board considered necessary for the post, and the reasons for its decision to nominate the successful candidate for appointment.

Oral evidence was given by the appellant and by four witnesses called by the respondent. All of this oral and documentary evidence, together with the demeanour of the witnesses, has been taken into account by the Court in reaching its conclusions,

The appellant gave her evidence with conviction and clarity. She told the Court that some time before the interview a named member of the interview board told her that she had two disadvantages – she is a locum and a woman. In his evidence to the Court, which was given with equal conviction and clarity, the person named strenuously denied having made this or any similar comment. The appellant also told the Court of having mentioned the offending remark to a medical colleague after the result of the competition became known, and of having raised it at a meeting with the hospital administrator some time later. Both persons gave evidence for the respondent, and neither had any recollection of being told of this remark.

The appellant also told the Court of her professional qualifications and experience, including research and publications, which she claimed were superior to that of the successful candidate. She also told the Court that, in her opinion, all but one of the other candidates for the post were unsuitable for appointment.

Medical witnesses called by the respondent, who had participated in the interview board, said that the appellant had different qualifications and experience to that of the successful candidate, but they did not accept that it was of superior quality. These witnesses accepted that the appellant was an excellent candidate. However, they told the Court that the interview board was unanimous in the view that the doctor recommended for appointment was an outstanding candidate.

It was common case that, once it became known that the appellant was not successful in her application for the disputed post, the hospital management sought to retain her valued services. To this end, management attempted to create a restructured post, at a similar level as the locum post that the appellant had occupied, and to which the appellant could be appointed. Whilst this initiative was being actively pursued for some time, it was discontinued when the appellant commenced the present proceedings.

With regard to the interview, the appellant said in evidence that she felt that she was being hurried and that the board seemed uninterested in her work and experience. The members of the board who gave evidence said that the appellant's interview was conducted no differently to that of other candidates.

Conclusions of the Court

The onus of proving the factual basis on which unlawful discrimination may be presumed rests with the appellant.

The Court found the appellant to be an impressive witness. She appeared to have a clear recollection of the disputed events to which she averred. She was also firm in her opinion as to the superiority of her own qualifications and experience relative to that of the successful candidate. These recollections and opinions were, however, unsupported by any evidence beyond that of the appellant herself. They were also hotly contradicted by equally impressive witnesses called by the respondent.

The Court fully accepts that the appellant had provided five years satisfactory service as a locum in the disputed post. The Court also accepts that the appellant might reasonably have expected that her past service and clinical experience would have been a decisive factor in her favour. However, in the Courts view, these considerations could not of themselves establish that the, selection made was so irrational or unfair as to raise a presumption of unlawful discrimination.

Taking the evidence as a whole, the Court has concluded, with some hesitation, that the appellant has not discharged the evidential burden which she carries. Accordingly, her claim cannot succeed.

There is, however, one further aspect of this case on which the court considers it appropriate to comment. The interview board established by the Local Appointments Commission comprised five members, all of whom were men. There was no evidence to indicate that the Commissioners made any effort to secure the services of a suitably qualified woman to serve on the board.

Relying on the determination of this Court in the Gleeson case, counsel for the appellant submitted that such a gender imbalance in the composition of the interview board is sufficient to establish a prima facie case of discrimination. The relevant statement by the Court in Gleeson must, however, be read in context. In that case, the Court found five instances of unfairness in the selection process, the cumulative effect of which resulted in a prima facie finding of discrimination. The composition of the board was but one of these instances.

The Court considers it highly undesirable to constitute an interview board made up entirely of men. This is particularly the case where, as in the medical profession, there is a dominance of men at the most senior professional level. Gleeson cannot be regarded as authority for the proposition that gender imbalance in an interview board must, in itself, lead to a prima facie finding of discrimination in every case. Nonetheless, the Court considers that such a practice is potentially discriminatory and can form part of the evidential chain on which a claim of discrimination could be made out.

The Court would strongly urge all appropriate parties to have full regard to the now accepted need to ensure gender balance at all levels in the process of selection for appointment.

Determination
It is the determination of the Court that the complaint before it is not well founded, and that the appellant did not suffer discrimination within the meaning of section 2(a) of the Employment Equality Act 1977. The complaint herein is dismissed.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal against Rights Commissioner's Decision WT5724/01/MR.

BACKGROUND:

2. The worker claims that he did not receive any holiday/public holiday pay while employed by the Company. The Company states that the claimant was paid holiday pay and public holiday pay under revised contracts of employment which applied from 1st January, 2001.

The worker referred a claim to the Rights Commissioner service on the 6th September, 2001. The worker states that the reason he did not make a claim within the 6 months as specified in Section 27 (4) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997, (the Act) was that he was waiting the results of a test case taken by a fellow employee.

The Rights Commissioner's Decision issued on the 31st December, 2002 as follows:

"In accordance with Section 27 of the Act, I hereby declare that this complaint is out of time."

The worker appealed the Rights Commissioner's Decision on the 9th January, 2003, in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. The Company's case is that the worker's claim is out of time. A Labour Court hearing took place on 22nd April, 2003. The following is the Court's Determination:

DETERMINATION:

Facts.

In this case the respondent made no defence to the claim other than to contend that the complaint was presented out of time.

The factual background to this case, as admitted or as found by the Court, is as follows:

The claimant was employed by the respondent from 1st November 1998 until 1st June 2001. In common with other employees of the respondent he was initially employed on a contract of employment which purported to incorporate an element in his basic pay to cover payment in respect of annual leave and public holidays. On or about January 2000 an employee of the respondent, Mr Martin Treacy, referred a complaint to a Rights Commissioner, pursuant to section 27 of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 (the Act), in which he sought to challenge the validity of these arrangements having regard to the provisions of the Act.

By a decision dated 14th April 2000 the Rights Commissioner held with the claimant in that case and directed that he be paid in respect of the relevant periods of annual leave and public holidays. The respondent appealed that decision to the Court. By Determination DWT017, issued on 31st January 2001, the Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the decision of the Rights Commissioner. In that Determination the Court held, inter alia, that the impugned contractual term was rendered void by the combined effect of section 37 of the Act and Article 7(2) of Directive 93/104/EC on the Organisation of Working Time.

In April 2001 the respondent issued amended contracts of employment to its employees, including the claimant herein, which conformed to the requirements of the Act in respect to holiday entitlements. However, the amended terms were expressly limited in their application to the period from the 1st January 2001 onwards. The contract did provide that the leave year for the purpose of granting leave would be the period specified in section 2(1) of the Act, namely, a period commencing on 1st April in any year and terminating on 31st March in the following year.

The claimant's employment with the respondent terminated on 1st June 2001. On 13th August 2001 he presented a complaint pursuant to section 27 of the Act claiming redress in respect of alleged infringements of his statutory rights in relation to annual leave and public holidays. The complaint was heard by the Rights Commissioner on 1st August 2002.

In his decision issued on 31st December 2002, the Rights Commissioner took the view that the complaint before him was presented outside the time limit specified in section 27(4) of the Act. The Rights Commissioner further held against applying the extended limitation period provided for at section 27(5) of the Act. Accordingly, the Rights Commissioner declined to entertain the complaint. The claimant appealed to this Court.

Application of the Time–Limit.

The respondent contended that since the contract issued to the claimant in April, 2001 provided for compliance with the Act from 1st January 2001, the contraventions of which he complains must relate to a period prior to that date. Consequently, they say, the complaint was made out side the time limit prescribed by section 27(4) of the Act.

It is now clear that the limitation period at section 27(4) starts to run from the date on which the contravention complained of actually occurs. This was made clear by the High Court inRoyal Liver Assurance Limited v Mackin & Others High Court Unreported Lavin J 15th November 2002.The rationale of that decision appears to be that where an employee is granted unpaid annual leave, and brings a complaint seeking payment for that leave in accordance with the Act (as was the nature of the complaint in the Royal Liver case) the limitation period runs from the date on which the payment should have been made.

However in the instant case the complaint predominatly relates to a failure of the respondent to provide the claimant with his statutory entitlement to annual leave rather than a failure to pay for such leave. The respondent's contention that the complaint in that regard is out of time appears to be based on the proposition that the revised conditions of employment issued in April 2001 created a new reference period for holiday purposes commencing on 1st January 2001.

The Court cannot accept that proposition. In advancing that line of argument the respondent is seeking to rely on the strict application of the Act in relation to the limitation period while at the same time seeking to depart from it in relation to the statutory time frame to which the limitation period should be applied.

Section 20 of the Act requires that the leave be granted during the currency of the leave year (except where there is express agreement to an extension). A leave year is defined by section 2(1) as a year commencing on 1st April. The claimant's contract of employment further confirms that the leave year operated by the respondent is the same as that prescribed by statute. The timing of annual leave is, subject to certain qualifications set forth at section 20(1)(a), (b) and (c) of the Act, a matter for the employer and an employee has no general right to insist on holidays at any particular time during the leave year.

Against that background it appears to the Court that where a complaint relates to the failure of an employer to provide an employee with annual leave a cause of action accrues at the end of the relevant leave year (or possibly 20 working days earlier) in which the leave should have been given. It is from then that the limitation period starts to run.

On this construction the complaint herein, in so far as it relates to the failure of the respondent to provide the claimant with 20 days annual leave in the leave year ending 31st March 2001, is not out of time.

The Scope of the Complaint.

The complaint herein relates to alleged continuing contraventions of the Act extending over the entire duration of the claimant's employment with the respondent. Based on the date on which the complaint was presented, section 27(4) of the Act operates, subject to section 27(5), so as to place outside the jurisdiction of the Court all contraventions which occurred before 14th February 2001.

However, section 27(5) of the Act provides discretion to entertain complaints, which are otherwise out of time, in respect of contraventions of the Act which occurred up to 18 months before the date of complaint. That discretion is, however, only exercisable where it is first established that the failure to present the complaint within the 6-month time limit was due to reasonable cause.

Extension of the Time Limit.

Section 27(5) of the Act provides as follows: -

- "Notwithstanding subsection (4) a Rights Commissioner may entertain a complaint under this section presented to him or her after the expiration of the period referred to in subsection (4) (but not later than 12 months of such expiration) if he or she is satisfied that the failure to present the complaint within that period was due to reasonable cause".

It is noted that the standard required by this subsection is that of "reasonable cause". This may be contrasted with the much higher standard of "exceptional circumstances preventing the making of the claim" which is provided for in other employment related statutes. The Act gives no guidance as to the type of circumstances that can constitute reasonable cause and it would appear to be a matter of fact to be decided by the Rights Commissioner (and by extension the Court on appeal) in each individual case.

It is the Court's view that in considering if reasonable cause exists, it is for the claimant to show that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford an excuse for the delay. The explanation must be reasonable, that is to say it must make sense, be agreeable to reason and not be irrational or absurd. In the context in which the expression reasonable cause appears in the statute it suggests an objective standard, but it must be applied to the facts and circumstances known to the claimant at the material time. The claimant's failure to present the claim within the six-month time limit must have been due to the reasonable cause relied upon. Hence there must be a causal link between the circumstances cited and the delay and the claimant should satisfy the Court, as a matter of probability, that had those circumstances not been present he would have initiated the claim in time.

The length of the delay should be taken into account. A short delay may require only a slight explanation whereas a long delay may require more cogent reasons. Where reasonable cause is shown the Court must still consider if it is appropriate in the circumstances to exercise its discretion in favour of granting an extension of time. Here the Court should consider if the respondent has suffered prejudice by the delay and should also consider if the claimant has a good arguable case.

Has the Claimant shown Reasonable Cause?

The claimant told the Court that he had raised the question of his holiday entitlements with members of management on a number of occasions during the year 2000. Specifically he had discussed the matter with a Mr Barber and a Mr Sanky He was told that a test case was pending and that the position would be reviewed when this case was decided. He understood that this to be a reference to Mr Treacy's case. When Mr Treacy's case was decided he was told that the matter was being considered by the company's head office in the UK.

In April 2001 the claimant was presented with a new contract, which provided for paid holidays with retrospective effect to 1st January 2001. However the respondent was still refusing to pay for holidays prior to that date. The claimant said that he became aware that a number of his colleagues had made complaints under the Act in respect of the period prior to 1st January 2001. He told the Court that he contacted the offices of the Labour Relations Commission with a view to making a similar complaint. He received advice which he understood to be that he should await the outcome of the cases already referred.

The respondent denied that they regarded Mr Treacy's case as a test case or that the claimant had been told that his holiday entitlements would be determined by its outcome. Mr Barber did give evidence to the Court in which he said that he believed that the outcome of the Treacy case would affect other employees and that he may have so indicated to the claimant. He did emphasise that this was a personal view and that he was not authorised by the company to give any such assurances to employees nor did he purport to do so. Mr Sanky did not give evidence.

The company accepted that it was not prejudiced in its defence by the delay in the presentation of the claim.

Conclusions of the Court.

The Court is satisfied that when Mr Treacy succeeded in his claim before the Rights Commissioner, his colleagues, including the claimant, would have pursued similar claims had they not been deflected from so doing by the belief that the final outcome of that case would be of general application.

All parties viewed Mr Treacy's case as a test case in the sense that it would decide whether the respondent could fulfil its statutory obligations under the Act by incorporating an element in basic pay to cover holidays. The Court is satisfied that this view was held by some members of management and was conveyed to the workforce including the claimant.

Whilst the appeal in Mr Treacy's case was pending, it was perfectly reasonable for the claimant to suppose that the respondent would comply with the law when its import was finally decided. Thereafter, there was confusion amongst employees, including the claimant, as to whether or not it was necessary for them to make individual claims under the Act or whether a number of cases then in progress would decide the matter. The Court is further satisfied that the claimant was not to blame for this confusion.

Finally, the Court notes that the claimant did not have the benefit of independent professional advice in relation to his rights or on the procedures for the making of complaints under the Act.

In all the circumstance of the case the Court is satisfied that in respect of those contraventions of the Act which occurred up to 12 months after the expiry of the time limit at section 27(4), reasonable cause has been shown for the claimant's failure to present the complaint within that time limit. The Court is further satisfied that the respondent has not suffered any prejudice by reason of that delay and that the claimant has a good arguable case which ought be heard.

The Court therefore determined to entertain all complaints appertaining to contraventions of the Act alleged to have occurred on or after 14th February 2000 (hereafter the relevant period).

The Claimant's Holiday Record.

The respondent's records show that the claimant took annual leave and Public Holidays in the relevant period as follows:

Leave year 2000 – 2001

The records show that in this period the claimant received 4 days annual leave. He did not work on the August Public Holiday, Christmas Day, St. Stephen's Day and New Years Day. On other Public Holidays he did work and received double time. The claimant was not paid in respect of the annual leave which he took (except that on 4th February 2001) nor was he paid in respect of any of the public holidays on which he did not work other than New Years Day 2001.

The claimant was entitled to 20 days in the leave year. On foot of the revised contract issued to him in April 2001, he was paid in respect of leave accruing after 1st January 2001. Hence, he was paid in respect of one-quarter of the leave year and is now entitled to redress in respect the remaining three-quarters of the year. He is therefore entitled to claim redress in respect of 15 days annual leave and 3 Public holidays.

Leave Year 1999 – 2000.

This leave year ended on 31st March 2000 and any contravention of the Act arising from the respondent's failure to provide the requisite statutory leave accrued within the relevant period. However, in so far as the complaint relates to the respondent's failure to pay the claimant in respect of annual leave actually taken on dates prior to the relevant period, it is statute barred and, to that extent, it is not cognisable by the Court.

The records show that in this leave year the claimant received no annual leave. On the Public Holidays on which he worked he received double time. The only Public Holiday on which he appeases not to have worked was the August Public Holiday 1999. However that holiday fell outside of the reference period for this claim. The claimant was entitled to 20 days leave in respect of the leave year and he is entitled to redress for the loss of that leave.

Determination

It is clear from the foregoing, that the claimant did not receive his full entitlements in respect of both annual leave and Public Holidays throughout the relevant period. His complaint is, therefore, well founded. Accordingly the decision of the Rights Commissioner is set aside and the appeal herein is allowed.

Redress

Where a claimant has not received his or her statutory period of leave a claim cannot be made nor can an award be formulated as being for payment in lieu of holidays. Article 7 of the Working Time Directive expressly prohibits the payment of an allowance in lieu of annual leave except where the employment relationship has ended. In such cases the proper award should be in the form of compensation for loss of annual leave. Such an award need not be limited to the value of the lost holidays.

The obligation to provide annual leave is imposed for health and safety reasons and the right to leave has been characterised as a fundamental social right in European Law (see comments of Advocate General Tizzano inR v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, ex parte Broadcasting, Entertainment Cinematography and Theatre Union [2001] IRLR 559which were quoted with approval by Lavin J in the Royal Liver case). InVon Colson & Kamann v Land Nordrhein – Westfalen [1984] ECR 1891the ECJ has made it clear that where such a right is infringed the judicial redress provided should not onlycompensate for economic loss sustained but must provide a real deterrent against future infractions.

In this case the Court is satisfied that the appropriate form of redress is an award of compensation. In considering the element of its award to cover the economic loss suffered by the claimant, the Court has had regard to the rate of pay applicable to the claimant at the material time and the average bonus calculated in accordance with Regulation 3(3)(a) of the Organisation of Working Time (Determination of pay for Holidays) Regulations SI No. 475 of 1997.

Having regard to all relevant considerationsthe Court measures the quantum which is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances at €7,400 and directs the respondent to pay to the claimant compensation in that amount.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal against Rights Commissioner's Decision WT2321/00/FL.

BACKGROUND:

2. The worker concerned was employed by the Company from week ending the 7th of December, 1998, until the 8th of April, 2000, as a Print Technician. The issue before the Court is that the worker concerned was required to work excessive hours without rest breaks. The Company states that all workers are free to take their breaks as and when it is practical.

The issue was referred to a Rights Commissioner for investigation. His decision issued on the 28th of November, 2002. He decided that the employer should pay €1,000 to the claimant in compensation.

The Company appealed the Rights Commissioner's decision to the Labour Court on the 6th of December, 2002, in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. The Court heard the appeal on the 14th of October, 2003, the earliest date suitable to the parties.

DETERMINATION:

The Company appealed two aspects of the Rights Commissioner's decision - his findings and decision under Section 11 and Section 12 of the Act.

The employer submitted that the Company was exempted from the provisions of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997 by virtue of S.I. 21 of 1998 Organisation of Working Time (General Exemptions) Regulations, 1998. The schedule states that "an activity falling within a sector of the economy or in the public service -

(b) the nature of which is such that employees are directly involved in ensuring the continuity of production or the provision of services, as the case may be,

(iii) production in the press....."

The provision of the regulation exempts those activities from the application of Sections 11, 12, and 13. However, these regulations state that a provision specifying a rest period or break equivalent to those provided for in Sections 11, 12 and 13 must be provided.

Paragraph 4 of the regulation provides for compensatory rest periods:-

"if an employee is not entitled, by reason of the exemption, to the rest period and break referred to in Section 11, 12, and 13 of the Act, the employer shall ensure that the employee has available to himself or herself a rest period and break that, in all the circumstances, can reasonably be regarded as equivalent to the first-mentioned rest period and break"

Paragraph 5 of the regulation details the duty of an employer in respect to the health and safety of employees:-

(1) an employer shall not require an employee to whom the exemption applies to work during a shift or other period of work (being a shift or other such period that is of more than 6 hours duration) without allowing him or her a break of such duration as the employer determines.

(2) in determining the duration of a break referred to in paragraph (1) of this regulation, the employer shall have due regard to the need to protect and secure the health, safety and comfort of the employee and to the general principle concerning the prevention and avoidance of risk in the workplace.

The Company is under a duty to ensure that the employee receives his equivalent rest period and breaks. Merely stating that the employee could take rest breaks if they wished and not putting in place proper procedures to ensure that the employee receives these breaks, thus protecting his health and safety, does not discharge that duty.

Having considered the written and oral submissions, and having investigated the details supplied by both parties, the Court is satisfied with the conclusions drawn by the Rights Commissioner that the employer was in breach of Sections 11 and 12 of the Act, in respect of daily rest periods and breaks. The Court is also satisfied that compensatory rest periods equivalent to the rest period and breaks provided for under Section 11 and 12 of the Act were not available to the appellant.

Accordingly, the Court upholds the decision of the Rights Commissioner and the Company's appeal is disallowed.

SUBJECT:

1. Alleged unfair dismissal under Section 77 of the Employment Equality Act,1998

BACKGROUND:

2. The complainant was employed by the respondent as a Child-Care Assistant from 15th October, 2000 until 6th June 2002, when she was dismissed. She claimed that her dismissal was wholly or mainly on grounds of her disability and constitutes discrimination within the meaning of Section 8 and contrary to Section 6 of the Employment Equality Act,1998 (the Act).

The Facts.

The facts as found by the Court or as admitted can be summarised as follows:

The complainant worked as a Child-Care Assistant in a cr�che facility operated by the respondent. Her duties involved the care of young children.

The complainant suffered from anorexia, which later developed into bulimia. She suffered from this condition throughout the period of her employment with the respondent. It is accepted that this disorder constitutes a disability for the purposes of the Act.

- During the course of her employment the complainant was hospitalised on a number of occasions. In March, 2001 the respondent gave the complainant three months sick leave in order to allow her to undergo treatment. She was admitted to hospital and was later treated as an outpatient. By 1st June 2001 the complainant was certified as fit to return to work. However, within three weeks she suffered a recurrence of the symptoms of the disorder and was again forced to take sick leave.

The complainant was not paid during her absence on sick leave.

The complainant remained on sick leave until late September, 2001 when she was certified as fit for work. She continued to receive counselling and other outpatient treatment for the disorder. She kept the respondent informed in this regard. It appeared that by December, 2001 the complainant's condition had stabilised.

- From January, 2002 onwards a number of incidents occurred which caused the respondent some concern as to the manner in which the complainant was performing her duties. These matters related to the wearing of jewellery at work (which was not permitted on safety grounds) and alleged erratic behaviour. The complainant was issued with two verbal warnings in respect of these matters.
    - On or about the month of May, 2002 the complainant became depressed and, it was suggested that she had developed suicidal tendencies. She requested more time off as she wished to be readmitted to hospital. At this stage the respondent had formed the view that the complainant was a danger to herself and the children in her care. The manager of the respondent resolved to dismiss the complainant.

The complainant was asked to attend a meeting with the manager and assistant manager of the respondent on 27th May, 2002. At this meeting she was informed that it had been decided to terminate her employment. She was subsequently dismissed by letter dated 6th June, 2002. The letter of dismissal stated in the relevant part as follows:

- "With reference to our meeting, I would like to reiterate that we are terminating your employment here at [the respondent's premises]. You were given personal leave on two occasions in the last year as requested by yourself. As discussed, we believe you need an extended period of time to complete the treatment you are receiving for the condition that you have. It is also unsuitable that you would be working in a childcare facility under the present conditions as confirmed by your doctor"

The respondent did not obtain any medical or psychiatric advice in relation to the complainant's disorder nor did they undertake any form of risk assessment in relation to her condition.

The respondent told the Court that they had taken the conduct of the complainant, in relation to which the verbal warnings had been issued, into account in deciding to terminate her employment. They had also decided that her disorder rendered her unfit for the duties for which she was employed.

Statutory Requirements.

Section 6 of the Act provides, in effect, that discrimination shall be taken to occur where, on any of the discriminatory grounds, one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated.

Section 8(6)(c) of the Act provides, in effect, that an employer shall be taken to have discriminated against an employee in relation to conditions of employment, if the employee is afforded less favourable terms, on any of the discriminatory grounds, in respect of, inter alia, dismissal and disciplinary measures.

In the present case it is clear from the letter sent to the complainant dated 6th June 2002, that her dismissal arose wholly or mainly from the respondents belief that the disorder from which she suffered impaired her ability to carry out the duties for which she was employed. Thus she was treated less favourably than a person who did not suffer from a similar disability, resulting in the same perceived impairment, would have been treated. It follows that the dismissal was prima facie discriminatory and unlawful.

However a dismissal which appears to be discriminatory within the meaning of Section 8 of the Act may be saved by Section 16. This section provides, as follows:

(1) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as requiring any person to recruit or promote an individual to a position, to retain an individual in a position, or to provide training or experience to an individual in relation to a position, if the individual—

(a) will not undertake (or, as the case may be, continue to undertake) the duties attached to that position or will not accept (or, as the case may be, continue to accept) the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed, or(b) is not (or, as the case may be, is no longer) fully competent and available to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, the duties attached to that position, having regard to the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed.

(2) [Not relevant]

- (3)(a) For the purposes of this Act, a person who has a disability shall not be regarded as other than fully competent to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, any duties if, with the assistance of special treatment or facilities, such person would be fully competent to undertake, and be fully capable of undertaking, those duties.

(c) An employer shall do all that is reasonable to accommodate the needs of a person who has a disability by providing special treatment or facilities to which paragraph (a) relates.(d) A refusal or failure to provide for special treatment or facilities to which paragraph (a) relates shall not be deemed reasonable unless such provision would give rise to a cost, other than a nominal cost, to the employer.

This Section, on which the respondent relies, can provide a complete defence to a claim of discrimination on the disability ground if it can be shown that the employer formed the bona fide belief that the complainant is not fully capable, within the meaning of the section, of performing the duties for which they are employed. However, before coming to that view the employer would normally be required to make adequate enquiries so as to establish fully the factual position in relation to the employee's capacity.

The nature and extent of the enquiries which an employer should make will depend on the circumstances of each case. At a minimum, however, an employer, should ensure that he or she in full possession of all the material facts concerning the employee's condition and that the employee is given fair notice that the question of his or her dismissal for incapacity is being considered. The employee must also be allowed an opportunity to influence the employer's decision.

In practical terms this will normally require a two-stage enquiry, which looks firstly at the factual position concerning the employee’s capability including the degree of impairment arising from the disability and its likely duration. This would involve looking at the medical evidence available to the employer either from the employee's doctors or obtained independently.

Secondly, if it is apparent that the employee is not fully capable Section 16(3) of the Act requires the employer to consider what if any special treatment or facilities may be available by which the employee can become fully capable. The Section requires that the cost of such special treatment or facilities must also be considered. Here, what constitutes nominal cost will depend on the size of the organisation and its financial resources.

Finally, such an enquiry could only be regarded as adequate if the employee concerned is allowed a full opportunity to participate at each level and is allowed to present relevant medical evidence and submissions.

Conclusions of the Court.

In this case the respondent was faced with an employee who was suffering from a disorder which had both psychiatric and physical manifestations. The respondent became concerned that she might not be suitable to remain in charge of young children. The Court accepts that an employer is entitled to take account of possible dangers occasioned by a disability from which an employee suffers (and may be obliged to do so in certain circumstances).

However, in the instant case the respondent made no effort to obtain a prognosis of the complainant’s condition. They did not discuss the situation with her before taking a decision on her future. They came to the conclusion that she could not be retained because of her disability without the benefit of any form of professional advice or assessment of the risks associated with her condition.

There were a number of courses of action open to the respondent. They could have had the situation assessed professionally and considered the most appropriate approach to adopt in consultation with the complainant and her medical advisor. Further, the complainant intimated her desire to re-enter hospital for further treatment. A decision on her future could have been deferred and she could have been given a further period of sick leave to undergo this treatment.

Had the complainant been given further leave her progress could have been monitored and her return to work made conditional upon medical certification that she was fully fit to resume her duties. Such evidence could have been required from either her own doctors or nominees of the respondent. The complainant was not paid during absences on sick leave and the respondent accepted that they could have employed a temporary replacement without additional costs.

DETERMINATION:

The Court is satisfied that the complainant was dismissed wholly or mainly because of her disability. Further it has not been shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the complainant was not fully capable of continuing to perform the duties for which she was employed within the meaning of Section 16(3) of the Act.

Accordingly, the complainant is entitled to succeed.

The Court is satisfied that the appropriate redress is an award of compensation for the effects of the discrimination suffered by the complainant.

Having regard to all the circumstances of the case the Court measures the amount of compensation which it considers appropriate at €13,000. An order against the respondent in that amount will be made.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal under Section 83 of the Employment Equality Act, 1998.

BACKGROUND:

2. The Worker appealed the Equality Officer's Decision in accordance with Section 83 of the Employment Equality Act, 1998 on 7th March, 2008. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 2nd September, 2008.

The following is the Court's Determination:-

DETERMINATION:

Subject:

Appeal under Section.83 of the Employment Equality Acts 1998-2007 against Equality Officer's Decision No. DEC-E2008-002.

Background:

1. The complainant, who is a native of the Republic of Serbia, has claimed that the respondent discriminated against her on the race ground by not paying her the same rate of pay and commission as her chosen comparators. While the respondent accepts that the complainant and her comparators were engaged in like work, it submits that any differences in remuneration were based on grounds other than race.

2. The complainant was employed by the respondent in the position of Advertising Executive with effect from November 2004. She was paid a basic salary of €20,000 per annum. She queried this, as it was lower than the level indicated on the advertisement for the job, but her salary did not increase. She claimed that she could not and did not earn commission on sales, a point contradicted by the respondent.

- Her sales target was €3,200 per week or €166,000 per annum. She left the Company in February 2006 for another job.

3. On 31st March 2006, the complainant referred a complaint under the Acts that she was discriminated against on the race ground despite performing like work with two named comparators (Mr C and Mr W) who were paid more than she was. On 16th March 2007, the case was delegated by the Director of Equality Investigations to an Equality Officer for investigation. A hearing was held on 15th November 2007 and further material was supplied by the parties until 23rd January 2008.

4. In her decision, dated 31st January 2008, the Equality Officer found that there were grounds other than race for the difference in pay between the complainant and her named comparators and accordingly found that the respondent did not discriminate against the complainant on the race ground contrary to Section 29(1) of the Acts in relation to her pay.

5. The Complainant appealed this decision to the Court on 7th February 2008. A Labour Court hearing was held on 2nd September 2008.

Complainants' Arguments:

1. The advertisement for the job indicated that the reward for on-target performance could be as high as €55,000-€60,000 in total earnings, yet, when she queried the low level of pay offered by the respondent, the Managing Director told her it was because she was "not from here" and that her performance would be reviewed with a view to an increase if she performed well. Despite being named "sales person of the month" the following month, this did not happen, despite requests from her. She considered this, in conjunction with the above referral, to be indicative of racial prejudice against her.

2. She had considerable expertise in the field of advertising sales and input to trade magazines both in Botswana and in her native Serbia. She outlined details of her employments to the respondent who made only cursory attempts to verify her experience gave up easily and did not credit her with her level of experience and expertise, nor was this reflected in her salary.

3. She never had a chance to earn commission. There was no reference to commission in her letter of appointment and the only time she allegedly got commission (according to the Company) this was actually a recalculation of her salary based on the difference between a "5-week" and a "4 –week" month. The Company had only just changed from weekly to monthly pay). There was no indication on her payslip at that time that the sum in question (€231) was commission. Her two Irish comparators earned 10% commission on sales and this, indeed, was in their letters of appointment.

4. She was entirely interchangeable with her two comparators and, indeed, the respondent was not querying "like work", yet the comparators had a basic salary of €28,000, plus 10% commission compared to her salary of €20,000 with no commission.

5. She did not even get her basic salary in 2005, as her P.60 shows that she only earned €19,039, a shortfall of nearly €1,000 on her basic salary of €20,000.

6. When an Advertising Sales Executive left, his "leads" were unequally distributed in favour of her comparators and against her, thus widening the pay gap and again showing bias in favour of her Irish comparators.

7. A contention by the respondent that 3 other Advertising Sales Executives were also comparators and had salaries similar to hers is not valid. They could all earn commission (and did) and in one case, the woman mentioned was a relative of the Managing Director and had access to lucrative and regular work from which the complainant was excluded.

Respondent's Arguments:

1. The Managing Director of the respondent Company told the Court that he absolutely refuted the complainant's allegation that she was paid a lower salary or that he said she was "not from here". The respondent is an equal opportunities employer with many non-national employees.

2. There were essentially three levels of basic starting salary - €20,000, €25,000 & €28,000, depending on a successful applicant's verifiable previous experience. He had been unable to satisfactorily verify the complainant's previous experience, despite attempts to contact referees. In the circumstances, she was placed on the basic €20,000 salary and monitored to see how she would succeed against a relatively low sales target. She did not, except on one occasion, reach this target.

3. Her comparators were on higher salaries through a combination of years of service and or verified previous performance/experience. This is how the Advertising Industry has always worked; the better sellers have a higher basic and can then earn more in commission. This is true regardless of factors such as nationality, gender etc. One of her comparators started two years before the complainant on a salary similar to hers and had achieved advancement through experience and performance. The other was an experienced and proven sales executive when he came to the Company. Their targets were a lot higher than the complainant's. There were three others who were comparable comparators also, on similar salaries to the complainant (but only one on a comparably low target). They were all Irish. See table below: -

Name	Start Date	Starting Salary	Annual Target	Actual
Comparator(J.C	November 2002	€20,800	€176,800	2005/ €241,000
Comparator(S.T)	September 2003	€20,800	€176,800	2004/ €110,000
Comparator(G.W	July 2004	€28,000	€252,000	2005/ €132,000
Comparator(D.C)	October 2004	€20,000	€166,000	2005/ €132,000
Comparator(ML)	February 2004	€20,000	€166,000	2005/ €130,000
Comparator(I.S)	November 2004	€20,000	€166,000	2005/ €75,000

4. On the only month during which the complainant earned commission, it was paid to her in the next month's pay cheque (an extra €231). This was not reflected on the payslips as the Company had only changed to monthly pay a month previously and was on a "trial" system of payslips. Payslips now show commission, expressed as such. The complainant's contention that the €231 was "an extra weeks pay" i.e. 5 weeks rather than 4, was untrue. The Annual salary was divided simply into 12 equal moieties.

5. There was no bias involved in any lowering of the complainant's salary below the basic, which was guaranteed. The reason for the shortfall was caused by unauthorised absences/extra holidays (details supplied to the Court).

6. The sales opportunities and the sales leads of departing staff were equally available to all sales staff.

7. There is no built in salary review but salaries are always subject to review and depend on sales targets being met.

8. Commission is calculated as 10% of the amount which sales exceed monthly targets.

The Law:

This claim is, in effect, an equal pay claim. It falls to be decided by reference to the provision of s. 29 of the Act. As the ground relied upon is that of race the provisions of Directive 2000/43/EC (the Race Directive) are also relevant.

Section 29(1) of the Act provides a general entitlement to equal pay as between persons who are differentiated on any of discriminatory grounds and who are engaged in like work. However, subsection (5) of s.29 provides a general saver which allows for the payment of different remuneration to employees on grounds other than the discriminatory grounds. It provides as follows: -

- "nothing in this part shall prevent an employer from paying, on grounds other than the discriminatory grounds, different rates of remuneration to different employee".

Article 2 of the Directive provides that there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination based on racial or ethnic origin. Article 3 (c) of the Directive provides that the prohibition of discrimination contained at Article 2 extends to employment and working conditions, including dismissal and pay.

Section 85A of the Act, as amended, now provides for the allocation of the probative burden as between the parties. It provides, in effect, that where facts are established by or on behalf of a Complainant from which discrimination may be inferred it shall be for the Respondent to prove the absence of discrimination.

The test for applying that provision is well settled in a line of decisions of this Court starting with the Determination inMitchell v Southern Health Board[2001] ELR 201.That test requires the Complainant to prove the primary facts upon which he or she relies in seeking to raise an inference of discrimination. It is only if this initial burden is discharged that the burden of proving that there was no infringement of the principle of equal treatment passes to the Respondent. If the Complainant does not discharge the initial probative burden which he bears, his case cannot succeed.

The application of this test was recently considered by this Court in Determination EDA0821Cork City Council and Kieran McCarthy. In pointing out that the Complainant must not only establish the primary facts upon which he or she relies but must also satisfy the Court that those facts are of sufficient significance to raise the inference contended for, the Court said the following: -

- The type or range of facts which may be relied upon by a complainant can vary significantly from case to case. The law provides that the probative burden shifts where a complainant proves facts from which it may be presumed that there has been direct or indirect discrimination. The language used indicates that where the primary facts alleged are proved it remains for the Court to decide if the inference or presumption contended for can properly be drawn from those facts. This entails a consideration of the range of conclusions which may appropriately be drawn to explain a particular fact or a set of facts which are proved in evidence. At the initial stage the complainant is merely seeking to establish a prima facie case. Hence, it is not necessary to establish that the conclusion of discrimination is the only, or indeed the most likely, explanation which can be drawn from the proved facts. It is sufficient that the presumption is within the range of inferences which can reasonably be drawn from those facts.

InMadarassy v Nomura International plc,[2007] IRLR 246 the Court of Appeal for England and Wales considered how a Court or Tribunal should approach the questions posed by the corresponding provision of UK legislation on the burden of proof. In a judgment concurred in by Laws and Maurice Kay LJJ., Mummery LJ had this to say: -

- Section 63A(2) does not expressly or impliedly prevent the tribunal at the first stage from hearing, accepting or drawing inferences from evidence adduced by the respondent disputing and rebutting the complainant's evidence of discrimination. The respondent may adduce evidence at the first stage to show that the acts which are alleged to be discriminatory never happened; or that, if they did, they were not less favourable treatment of the complainant; or that the comparators chosen by the complainant or the situations with which comparisons are made are not truly like the complainant or the situation of the complainant; or that, even if there has been less favourable treatment of the complainant, it was not on the ground of her sex or pregnancy.

That was a case in which discriminatory treatment on grounds of pregnancy was alleged. Nevertheless the principle enunciated on how the application of the test for determining if the burden of proof shifts is equally applicable in an equal pay claim such as this. What the passage quoted indicates is that the Court should consider the primary facts which are relied upon by the Complainant in their proper context. It also indicates that in considering if the burden of proof shifts the Court should consider any evidence adduced by the Respondent to show that, when viewed in their proper context, the facts relied upon do not support the inference contended for by the Complainant.

In respect to the instant case the Court adopts the approach indicated by Mummery LJ in the passage quoted.

Facts Found by the Court or Admitted:

It is accepted that the Complainant and the cited comparators are engaged in like work within the statutory meaning of that term. It is also admitted that the Complainant and the comparators are remunerated differently.

The Court is satisfied on the evidence adduced that the pay determination system operated by the Respondent is based on assessment of an individuals verifiable prior experience and track record in similar employment. The Court is further satisfied that the Complainant's salary was determined by reference to this criterion

The respondent made some effort to establish the veracity of the complainant's references and previous experience, by making a number of phone calls to Serbia and Botswana. No response was received and the respondent employer did not pursue the matter further.

The Court accepts that it is common practice in the advertising sales industry to remunerate staff by paying a basic salary and commission. This was also the practice of the Respondent.

There is an acknowledgment on both sides that there is a payment of €231 in August 2005 which does not fit within the basic salary structure. The complainant alleges that this is accounted for by the change at that time from weekly to monthly pay. The respondent alleges that it is the only commission earned by the complainant during her period of employment

The sales targets of the comparators who had a higher basic salary were commensurately higher.

There were deductions from the basic salary of the Complainant. However the Court is satisfied that they are accounted for by extra holidays and unauthorised absences.

Court Findings:

The first question which the Court must consider is whether the Complainant has established facts from which discrimination may be inferred. The only fact relied upon by the Complainant in support of her claim is that she is paid less that her comparators and the difference in nationality or ethnic origin as between her and her comparators. However what is alleged in this case is direct discrimination on the race ground in relation to pay. In such cases the application of the test for shifting the burden of proof operates somewhat differently than in cases involving discriminatory treatment or indirect discrimination in relation to pay.

Here there is an acknowledged difference in pay as between the Complainant and her comparators. Such a difference may, in some circumstances, be sufficient to place the probative burden on the employer. Where, however, as in the present case, it is contended that the impugned difference in pay is grounded in factors other than the nationality or ethnic origin of either the Complainant or the comparators, there is an onus on the Respondent to make out that assertion. If the Respondent succeeds in so doing any inference of discrimination which might otherwise arise is thus negated. However, facts may be established from which it could be inferred that the apparently neutral grounds relied upon are a covert means of reducing the Complainant's pay. It might also be established that grounds relied upon constitute a provision, practice or criterion which puts persons of the same nationality or ethnic origin as the Complainant at a particular disadvantage. In either situation a prima facie case of discrimination may arise.

The Court heard evidence that the Complainant was placed on a salary which was within a band of salaries normally applied by the Respondent. She was placed on the lowest band because the Respondent was not satisfied that she had relevant prior experience in a similar role. There was also evidence that employees of Irish nationality who lacked prior experience were similarly placed on the lower pay band. The Court accepts the veracity of that evidence.

The Court also heard evidence that the comparators were on higher salaries than that of the Complainant because of longer service or experience. In that regard the recent Judgment of the ECJ in Case C- 17/05Cadman v Health and Safety Executive[2006] IRLR 969 is apposite. Here, in deciding that differences in pay which are grounded on length of service do not give rise to prima facie discrimination, the Court had this to say: -

- "Since, as a general rule, recourse to the criterion of length of service is appropriate to attain the legitimate objective of rewarding experience acquired which enables the worker to perform his duties better, the employer does not have to establish specifically that recourse to that criterion is appropriate to attain that objective as regards a particular job, unless the worker provides evidence capable of raising serious doubts in that regard"

Having evaluated all of the evidence adduced in this case the Court is satisfied that the difference in pay as between the Complainant and her comparators is grounded on considerations which are wholly unrelated to the nationality and ethnic origin of either the Complainant or the comparators. On that basis the Court must hold that the Respondent has made out a defense under s. 29(5) of the Act. Moreover, there is no evidence from which it could be inferred that the Respondent's pay determination system is a covert means of reducing the Complainant's pay nor is there evidence that it places persons of the Complainant's nationality or ethic origin at a particular disadvantage.

It follows that the Complainant has failed to establish facts from which discrimination may be inferred. Accordingly the Complainant cannot succeed.

Determination

It is the determination of the Court that the claim herein is not well founded. The Complainant's appeal is disallowed and the decision of the Equality Officer is affirmed.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of a Rights Commissioner's Decision R-054076-HS-07/MMG.

BACKGROUND:

2. The Worker appealed the Rights Commissioner's Decision R-054076-HS-07/MMG to the Labour Court on the 12th March 2009, in accordance with Section 29(1) of the Safety, Health and Welfare at Work Act, 2005. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 21st May 2009. The following is the Determination of the Court:-

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Mr Paul O'Neill (the Claimant) against the decision of a Rights Commissioner in his claim of penalisation, by way of dismissal, against his former employer, Toni and Guy, Blackrock Ltd (the Respondent). The claim was made pursuant to s.27 of the Safety Health and Welfare at Work Act 2005 (the Act).

The Complainant was investigated by a Rights Commissioner who found against the Claimant. The Claimant appealed to this Court.

Background.

The Respondent is a hairdressing salon located in Blackrock Co Dublin. It is operated as a franchise. The Claimant was employed by the Respondent in his capacity as a colour technician between 2001 and March 2007 when he was dismissed. The Claimant contends that his dismissal resulted from having raised certain issues relating to health and safety with the Respondent and with the Health and Safety Authority. The Respondent denies that the decision to dismiss the Claimant was influenced by the complaints which he had made. It contends that the Claimant was dismissed for persistent lateness and other acts of misconduct.

Evidence

In evidence the Claimant told the Court that the current franchisees took over the business in or about August 2006. He said that it was necessary to wear latex gloves while handling colouring agents, which contained chemicals. These gloves were supplied by the Respondent. In or about September 2006 the Respondent started to provide staff with cheaper and lower quality gloves. The Claimant told the Court that he regarded these gloves as inadequate on health and safety grounds. He informed Ms McGrath, one of the franchisees, of his concerns in that regard. According to the Claimant Ms McGrath dismissed his concerns in robust language and told him to buy his own gloves. He said that he raised the matter with the Health and Safety Authority and was advised that he should use suitable gloves when working with chemical substances. He made the Respondent aware that he had contacted the HSA in the matter.

It was the Claimant's evidence that he purchased suitable gloves from his own resources which he used in the course of his work. He said that he continued to raise the matter with the Respondent. He also made a complaint to the National Employment Rights Authority.

The Claimant told the Court that prior to these occurrences he had never experienced difficulty in his employment. After having raised his concerns in relation to the health and safety issues the Respondent's attitude towards him changed and he was generally ignored by the franchisees. He said that an issue arose with the Respondent in or about September 2006 when he was approximately ten minutes later for work. Ms McGrath gave him a verbal warning. Sometime later he was unable to report for work through illness and he asked his sister to inform the Respondent. The Respondent took issue with his failure to phone in personally. He said that the Respondent purported to issue him with a written warning in respect of this matter. He refused to accept the warning because he considered it unjustified. He said that he was later accused of stealing stock from the shop.

On 14th March 2007 he was asked to attend a meeting with the franchisees of the business. He was handed a letter of dismissal. He asked the reason for the dismissal but was refused an explanation.

In cross-examination the Claimant denied that he had often left the shop early by the back door. He said that he and others often used the back door when leaving the premises. He accepted that he had left on one occasion early because he had worked from 10am to 8pm without a break. The Claimant also denied that he was aware of issues concerning the loss of stock from the salon.

Ms Audrey McGrath gave evidence. Ms McGrath is a joint franchisee of the business. She told the Court that she took over the business in August 2006. She said that it was necessary to cut back on expenditure and to this end she decided to discontinue the purchase of a particular type of gloves previously supplied to staff. She said that cheaper gloves were acquired and supplied to staff. According to the witness the Claimant objected to using the newly supplied gloves but that she told him that it was necessary to cut back and expressed the view that the gloves provided were adequate for the purposes for which they were required. It was Ms McGrath's evidence that the Claimant used the gloves with which he was supplied without further complaint.

The witness told the Court that the Claimant was persistently late for work and that he had often left the salon early by the back door. He also failed to ring in personally on occasions on which he was unable to attend work due to illness. The Court was also told that stock was being lost and that the Claimant was found to have had a key to the press in which the stock was held.

According to Ms McGrath the Claimant was issued with a verbal warning, a written warning and a final written warning in relation to his time keeping and other matters. However, the Court was told, the Claimant refused to accept these warnings. Ms McGrath said that she consulted with the head office of Toni and Guy and was advised to keep the warnings on file. On the morning of 14th March 2007 the Claimant arrived for work some 20 minutes late. Ms McGrath told the Court that she discussed the situation with her co franchisee, Ms Moloney, and it was decided to dismiss the Claimant. A letter of dismissal was prepared. When the Claimant arrived for work he was summoned to a meeting with the witness and Ms Moloney and given this letter. The Claimant was dismissed with immediate effect and without notice.

The witness could not recall the content of the warnings issued to the Claimant nor the dates on which they were issued. Records of such warnings were not made available to the Court. Ms McGrath also accepted that the decision to dismiss the Claimant was taken before the meeting with him on the morning in question.

In cross-examination the witness told the Court that the Respondent has a health and safety policy but she could not recall what it said in relation to the use of chemicals. The witness also confirmed that the Respondent had a disciplinary policy which, she said, provides for three warnings before an employee can be dismissed.

In reply to questions from the Court the witness said that a warning would normally last for six months during which the employee would be given an opportunity to deal with the issues giving rise to the warning. The witness also agreed that the issue of stock loss had not been a factor leading to the Claimant's dismissal. Ms McGrath said that the reason for the dismissal was the Claimant's poor time-keeping, "sneaking" off the premises by the back door and having others ring in for him when he was sick.

Conclusions of the Court

The law applicable

This matter is before the Court by way of a complaint of penalisation within the meaning ascribed to that term by s. 27 of the Act of 20005. Hence, the Court is not concerned with the fairness of the dismissalper se. Its sole function is to establish whether or not the dismissal was caused by the Claimant having committed an act protected by s.27(3) of the Act.

The relevant statutory provision is as follows: -

- 27.—(1) In this section "penalisation" includes any act or omission by an employer or a person acting on behalf of an employer that affects, to his or her detriment, an employee with respect to any term or condition of his or her employment.(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1), penalisation includes—

(a) suspension, lay-off or dismissal (including a dismissal within the meaning of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2001), or the threat of suspension, lay-off or dismissal,(b) demotion or loss of opportunity for promotion,(c) transfer of duties, change of location of place of work, reduction in wages or change in working hours, (d)imposition of any discipline, reprimand or other penalty (including a financial penalty), and(e) coercion or intimidation.

- (3) An employer shall not penalise or threaten penalisation against an employee for—
  - (a) acting in compliance with the relevant statutory provisions,(b) performing any duty or exercising any right under the relevant statutory provisions,(c) making a complaint or representation to his or her safety representative or employer or the Authority, as regards any matter relating to safety, health or welfare at work,(d) giving evidence in proceedings in respect of the enforcement of the relevant statutory provisions,(e) being a safety representative or an employee designated undersection 11or appointed undersection 18to perform functions under this Act, or(f) subject to subsection (6), in circumstances of danger which the employee reasonably believed to be serious and imminent and which he or she could not reasonably have been expected to avert, leaving (or proposing to leave) or, while the danger persisted, refusing to return to his or her place of work or any dangerous part of his or her place of work, or taking (or proposing to take) appropriate steps to protect himself or herself or other persons from the danger.
- (4) The dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2001, to be an unfair dismissal if it results wholly or mainly from penalisation as referred to insubsection (2)(a).(5)not relevant not relevant [not relevant]

It is clear from the language of this section that in order to make out a complaint of penalisation it is necessary for a claimant to establish that the determent of which he or she complains was imposed"for"having committed one of the acts protected by subsection 3. Thus the detriment giving rise to the complaint must have been incurred because of, or in retaliation for, the Claimant having committed a protected act. This suggested that where there is more than one causal factor in the chain of events leading to the detriment complained of the commission of a protected act must be an operative cause in the sense that"but for"the Claimant having committed the protected act he or she would not have suffered the detriment. This involves a consideration of the motive or reasons which influenced the decision maker in imposing the impugned determent.

Burden of Proof

The act is silent on the question of how the burden of proof should be allocated as between the parties. This question was considered by this Court inDepartment of Justice Equality and Law Reform and Philip Kirwan(Determination HSD082). Here the Court held as follows: -

- It is clear, however, that in the absence of any contrary statutory provision, the legal burden of proof lies on the person who asserts that a particular fact in issue is true (seeJoseph Constantine Steamship Line v Imperial Sheltering Corporation[1942] A.C.154 where this rule of evidence was described by Maugham V.-C. as "an ancient rule founded on considerations of good sense and it should not be departed from without strong reasons")

Later, inFergal Brodigan T/A FB Groundworks and Juris DubinaDetermination (HSD0810) the Court qualified the statement made in theKirwancase as follows: -

- It is, however, settled law that in civil matters there is an exception to this rule known as the peculiar knowledge principle. This is a rule of evidence which provides that where it is shown that a particular fact in issue is peculiarly within a defendant's knowledge the onus of proving that fact rests with the defendant (seeMahoney v Waterford, Limerick and Western Railway Co.[1900] 2.IR 273, per Palles C.B.)

In the instant case what is at issue is the motive or reason for the Claimant's dismissal. That is to be found in the thought process of the decision makers at the time the decision to dismiss the Complainant was taken. That is something which is peculiarly within the knowledge of the Respondent. It would be palpably unfair to expect the Claimant to adduce direct evidence to show that the Respondent was influenced by his earlier complaints in deciding to dismiss him. Conversely, it is perfectly reasonable to require the Respondent to establish that the reasons for the dismissal were unrelated to his complaints under the Act.

Having regard to these considerations, it seems to the Court that a form of shifting burden of proof, similar to that in employment equality law should be applied in the instant case. Thus the Claimant must establish, on the balance of probabilities, that he made complaints concerning health and safety. It is then necessary for him to show that, having regard to the circumstances of the case, it is apt to infer from subsequent events that his complaints were an operative consideration leading to his dismissal. If those two limbs of the test are satisfied it is for the Respondent to satisfy the Court, on credible evidence and to the normal civil standard, that the complaints relied upon did not influence the Claimant's dismissal.

The facts

The Court has carefully considered all of the evidence tendered in this case. In many material particulars there was a significant conflict in the evidence of the Claimant compared to that of Ms McGrath relating to the issuance of warnings and the subject matter of those warnings. The Court is, however, satisfied that the Claimant did make complaints concerning health and safety matters arising from the change in the quality of gloves provided by the Respondent. The Court is also satisfied that following on from those complaints the Respondent appeared to take issue with the Claimant in respect of employment related matters which had not previously been a source of difficulty.

It also appears to the Court that the Respondent adopted a formalistic approach to the use of its disciplinary procedure and appeared to proceed, with inordinate haste, from one stage to the next until the point was reached where the Claimant's employment was terminated. The whole exercise was characterised by an absence of procedural fairness. In these circumstances it is difficult for the Court to avoid the conclusion that the Respondent, whether consciously or unconsciously, was proceeding with a predisposition that the Claimant's employment should be brought to an end.

The Court has no doubt that there were other employment related issues with the Claimant, of which the Respondent has justifiable cause to complain. Nonetheless, the Court is satisfied, as a matter of probability, that, were it not for his complaints regarding health and safety, those issues would not have resulted in his dismissal. Accordingly the Court must hold that the aforementioned complaints were an operative reason for his dismissal and that his complaint of penalisation has been made out.

Determination

The appeal herein is allowed. The decision of the Rights Commissioner is set aside and substituted with a finding that the within complaint is well founded. The Court further determines that the appropriate redress is an award of compensation. The Court measures the amount of compensation which is just and equitable having regard to the circumstances of the case at €20, 000.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of Adjudication Officer Decision No(s) R-153422-TE-15/JT

BACKGROUND:

2.

This is an appeal by Patrick Hall- (hereafter "the Complainant") against the decision of a Rights Commissioner in his claim against his former employer, Irish Water (hereafter "the Respondent")-under the Terms of Employment (Information) Act 1994 -2012 (the Act).

Background

The Complainant was employed by the Respondent in the role of Project Finance Lead. Following an interview for the post, the Respondent wrote to the Complainant by letter dated 25 thJuly 2014 offering him employment with effect from 11thAugust 2014. Under cover of that letter the Complainant was furnished with a document headed "Terms and Conditions of Employment. Project Finance Lead – West". This document set out the terms and conditions applicable to the employment being offered. It was intended to comply with the Respondent's obligations under the Act.

The letter dated 25

thJuly 2014 concluded with an invitation to the Complainant to contact a named person if he wished to discuss or seek clarification on any matter relating to the terms and conditions of the employment. The Complainant signed and returned the document without raising any issue in relation to its content.

The Complainant's contractual salary was fixed at €78,000 pa. He also had the possibility of receiving what is described as an additional award of 14% of salary.

The Claims

Following the termination of the Complainant's employment he instituted proceedings before a Rights Commissioner / Adjudication Officer, claiming that the document containing the particulars of his terms and conditions of employment, with which he had been furnished, did not comply with s. 3 of the Act.

The Rights Commissioner / Adjudication Officer found that there has been a technical contravention of the Act in that the statement did not particularise the times and duration of the rest periods and breaks to which the Complainant was entitled in accordance with S.I.49 of 1998. The Rights Commissioner directed that the Respondent furnish the Complainant with a revised statement containing these particulars. The Respondent did not cross-appeal against that finding and has complied with the direction of the Rights Commissioner / Adjudication Officer.

The Complainant appealed to this Court. The only redress sought by the Complainant in his appeal is an award of compensation.

The Appeal

In grounding his appeal the Complainant contends that the statement with which he was provided did not comply with the Act in the following respects: -

- 1. The address of the Respondent was not provided
  2. The statement did not specify the pay reference period for the purpose of the National Minimum Wage Act 2000 (the Act of 2000).
  3. The statement did not expressly state that the employee may request a statement of his average earnings pursuant to s.23 of the Act of 2000.
  4. The statement provides that the leave year is to run in tandem with the calendar year whereas the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 provides that a leave year runs from 1st April to 31st March.
  5. The statement did not comply with S.I 49 of 1998 in that it did not specify the times and duration of rest period and breaks.

Position of the Parties

The Complainant did not give evidence and his case was advanced on his behalf by his solicitor by way of submissions only. It is accepted that the Complainant did not suffer any monetary loss or any other form of material detriment or prejudice in consequence of the claimed contraventions of the Act. His claim is based solely on his complaint that the Respondent did not provide all of the information that the law obliged it to provide.

The Respondent denies that it contravened the Act in the manner alleged. It further submitted that if there were contraventions (which is denied) they were due to inadvertence and had no practical significance for the Complainant. The Respondent accepts that S.I. 49 of 1998 was not technically complied with but it pointed out that this omission was corrected following the recommendation of the Rights Commissioner. On that point, the Respondent relies on the absence of any detriment to the Complainant flowing from the omission from the statement of a reference to the time and duration of rest periods and breaks in accordance with sections 11, 12, and 13 of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997.

The Law

Section 3 of the Act, as amended, provides: -

- Written statement of terms of employment
  (1) An employer shall, not later than 2 months after the commencement of an employee's employment with the employer, give or cause to be given to the employee a statement in writing containing the following particulars of the terms of the employee's employment, that is to say—
    - (a) the full names of the employer and the employee,
      (b) the address of the employer in the State or, where appropriate, the address of the principal place of the relevant business of the employer in the State or the registered office (within the meaning of theCompanies Act, 1963),

      (c) the place of work or, where there is no fixed or main place of work, a statement specifying that the employee is required or permitted to work at various places,

      (d) the title of the job of nature of the work for which the employee is employed,

      (e) the date of commencement of the employee's contract of employment,

      (f) in the case of a temporary contract of employment, the expected duration thereof or, if the contract of employment is for a fixed term, the date on which the contract expires,

      (fa)a reference to any registered employment agreement or employment regulation order which applies to the employee and confirmation of where the employee may obtain a copy of such agreement or order

      (g) the rate or method of calculation of the employee's remuneration, and the pay reference period for the purpose of the National Minimum Wage Act 2000

      (ga)that the employee may, under section 23 of the National Minimum Wage Act 2000, request from the employer a written statement of the employee's average hourly rate of pay for any pay reference period as provided in that section

      (h) the length of the intervals between the times at which remuneration is paid, whether a week, a month or any other interval,

      (i) any terms or conditions relating to hours of work (including overtime),

      (j) any terms or conditions relating to paid leave (other than paid sick leave),

      (k) any terms or conditions relating to—

        - (i) incapacity for work due to sickness or injury and paid sick leave, and
          (ii) pensions and pension schemes,

          (l) the period of notice which the employee is required to give and entitled to receive (whether by or under statute or under the terms of the employee's contract of employment) to determine the employee's contract of employment or, where this cannot be indicated when the information is given, the method for determining such periods of notice,

      (m) a reference to any collective agreements which directly affect the terms and conditions of the employee's employment including, where the employer is not a party to such agreements, particulars of the bodies or institutions by whom they were made.

  (2) A statement shall be given to an employee under subsection (1) notwithstanding that the employee's employment ends before the end of the period within which the statement is required to be given.
  (3) The particulars specified in paragraphs (g), (h), (i), (j), (k) and (l) of the said subsection (1), may be given to the employee in the form of a reference to provisions of statutes or instruments made under statute or of any other laws or of any administrative provisions or collective agreements, governing those particulars which the employee has reasonable opportunities of reading during the course of the employee's employment or which are reasonably accessible to the employee in some other way.

(4) A statement furnished by an employer under subsection (1) shall be signed and dated by or on behalf of the employer.

(5) A copy of the said statement shall be retained by the employer during the period of the employee's employment and for a period of 1 year thereafter.

(6)

- (a) The Minister may by order require employers to give or cause to be given to employees within a specified time a statement in writing containing such particulars of the terms of their employment (other than those referred to in subsection (1)) as may be specified in the order and employers shall comply with the provisions of such an order.
  (b) The Minister may by order amend or revoke an order under this subsection, including an order under this paragraph.

(7) This section (other than subsection (6)) shall not apply or have effect as respects contracts of employment entered into before the commencement of this Act.

S.I 49 of 1998, Terms of Employment (Additional Information) Order 1998, provides, at Regulation 3(1), as follows: -

- In relation to an employee who enters into a contract of employment after the commencement of this Order, the employee's employer shall, within two months after the employee's commencement of employment with the employer, give or cause to be given to the employee a statement in writing containing particulars of the times and duration of the rest periods and breaks referred to in sections 11, 12 and 13 of the Act that are being allowed to the employee and of any other terms and conditions relating to those periods and breaks.

The Act was transposed in domestic law to give effect to Directive 91/533/EEC on an employer's obligation to inform employees of the conditions applicable to the contract or employment relationship. Article 2 of the Directive provides: -

- An employer shall be obliged to notify an employee to whom this Directive applies, hereinafter referred to as 'the employee', of the essential aspects of the contract or employment relationship.

It is trite law that in construing a provision of national law enacted to transpose a directive a Court or Tribunal must do so, as far as possible, in light of the wording and purpose of the Directive so as to produce the result envisaged by the Directive.

Each of the Complaints Considered

The Court has considered each of the complaints raised by the Complainant and has concluded as follows:

- 1.Failure to provide the Respondent's address.
  The statement provided to the Complainant clearly does contain details of the Respondent's registered address. That was accepted on behalf of the Complainant in the course of the hearing.

  2.The statement did not specify the pay reference period for the purpose of the National Minimum Wage Act 2000.

  - The document furnished did not contain such a statement. However, the Complainant's contractual salary was set at five times the national minimum wage. A statement of the type envisaged by s.3(1)(g) of the Act could not have had any practical significance in the circumstances of the Complainant. Nor is it suggested by him that the omission of such a statement had any practical significance in the circumstances of his employment.

  3.The statement does not expressly state that the employee may request a statement of his average earnings pursuant to s.23 of the Act of 2000.
  Section 23(2) of the Notional Minimum Wage Act 2000 provides: -

  - An employee shall not make a request under subsection (1) in respect of any pay reference period during which the hourly rate of pay of the employee was on average not less than 150 per cent calculated in accordance withsection 20, or such other percentage as may be prescribed, of the national minimum hourly rate of pay or where the request would be frivolous or vexatious.

    In the circumstances of the Complainant's employment (in which his salary was fixed at over 500% of the national minimum wage) this information, if furnished, could have no practical significance. The Complainant was precluded by s.2 of the Act of 2000 from seeking a statement pursuant to s.23 of that Act and any such request, if made, could only be frivolous or vexatious.

  4.The statement provides that the leave year is to run in tandem with the calendar year whereas the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 provides that a leave year runs from 1st April to 31st March.

  - Section 3(1)(j) of the Act provides that the statement furnished to the employee must provide information onany terms or conditions relating to paid leave (other than paid sick leave).The statement provided did contain information on the terms and conditions relating to annual leave. If it is suggest that the contractual provisions in the Complainant's contract of employment in relation to annual leave contravened the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 that is a matter that could only be adjudicated upon in proceedings under that Act.

  5.The statement did not comply with S.I 49 of 1998 in that the statement did not specify the duration of rest period and breaks.

  - The statement provided that the Complainant's normal hours of work were to be from 9am to 5pm over a 35 hour week. It is perfectly obvious what his rest periods were intended to be. While it is factually correct to say that the statement did not specify the duration or times of breaks it is an affront to common sense and reason to claim that a person in a senior position, such as that in which the Complainant was employed, could suffer any form of detriment from not being told when or for how long he could take a break in the course of his working day. Moreover, the Complainant accepts that he took breaks and that he had adequate rest periods and that he did not suffer any prejudice or detriment in consequence of this omission.

The Rights Commissioner / Adjudication Officer recommended that the Respondent correct this omission and it was so corrected.

Discussion

As appears from the above, these complaints are wholly devoid of any substantive merit. The State has already incurred the costs associated with providing the Complainant with a hearing of these complaints at first instance and it is now obliged to incur the cost in time and expense of providing him with a full appeal before a division of the Court. That takes no account of the cost incurred by the Respondent in defending this case, both at first instance and now on appeal. The combined associated costs of processing and hearing these complaints is grossly disproportionate to any value that could have accrued to the Complainant if the technical infringements of which he complains had not occurred. Moreover, the letter of offer furnished to the Complainant dated 25

thJuly 2014 invited him to contact a named person if he wished to discuss or seek clarification on any of the terms proffered. The Complainant signed the statement without demur and returned it to the Respondent. Neither then or at any subsequent time did he request further or better particulars on any matter pertaining to his employment. The Court has no doubt that had he sought further information on any matter pertaining to his employment, including the matters which form the subject of his present complaints, it would have been provided by the Respondent.

In the circumstances of this case that represents an unacceptable squandering of public resources. It is a manifest absurdity to suggest, as the Complainant does, that these contraventions, if such they are, could or should be met with an award of monetary compensation. That is particularly so in circumstances in which the matters now complained of could easily have been rectified by a simple request to the Respondent to provide any further information that the Complainant considered necessary.

De Minimis rule

It is an established principle of the common law that a Court should not squander its resources in dealing with claims that are without substance because the contraventions complained of had no practical consequence for the plaintiff. This principle is encapsulated in the Latin maxim de minimis non curat lex(the law does not concern itself with trifles). The classic statement of where this principle should be applied is contained in the judgment of Henchy J. in the Supreme Court's decision inMonaghan UDC v Alf-a-Bet Publications Ltd. [1980] I.L.R.M. 64, at page 69. Henchy J articulated a generally applicable test in the following terms: -

- "In such circumstances, what the Legislature has, either immediately in the Act or immediately in the regulations, nominated as being obligatory may not be depreciated to the level of a mere direction except on the application of thede minimisrule. In other words, what the Legislature has prescribed, or allowed to be prescribed, in such circumstances as necessary should be treated by the courts as nothing short of necessary, and any deviation from the requirements must, before it can be overlooked, be shown, by the person seeking to have it excused, to be so trivial, or so technical, or so peripheral, or otherwise so insubstantial that, on the principle that it is the spirit rather than the letter of the law that matters, the prescribed obligation has been substantially, and therefore adequately, complied with."

The Court is satisfied that, in the circumstances of this case, any deviations that may have occurred from what the strict letter of s. 3 of the Act, or from what the statutory instrument at issue prescribes, are so trivial, technical, peripheral or otherwise so insubstantial as to come within the de minimisrule. There can be no doubt that the Respondent provided the Complainant with all the information that he required in relation to the essential elements of the terms and conditions attaching to his particular employment. What is complained of is a failure to provide information on matters that had no practical significance in the context of the employment that he was offered and accepted.

Finally, the Complainant's solicitor calls in aid what he describes as " the principles in Von Colson and Karmann". The import of the submission on this point appears that even if no measurable loss or detriment was suffered by the Complainant compensation should nonetheless be awarded for a failure to provide a statement that complied with the Act in every particular. The reference tothe principles in Von Colson and Karmannis understood to be a reference to the principles adumbrated by the CJEU (formally the ECJ) in in case C-14/83Von Colson and Karmann v Land Nordrhein-Westfahlen[1986] C.M.L.R 430 on the criteria to be applied in measuring the quantum of compensation to be awarded in cases in which the principle of equal treatment between men and women is found to have been infringed. The import of that decision was recently comprehensively reviewed by this Court in Labour Court Determination DWT15125,C and F Tooling Limited and Jason Cunniffe. Here the Court stated as follows: -

- That case[Von Colson]needs to be understood in the context of the factual matrix in which it was decided. It concerned female social workers who had applied for posts at a male prison in West Germany. The authorities appointed two male candidates with lesser qualifications to those posts. The German Labour Court found that there had been discrimination and awarded the plaintiff's compensation pursuant to s.611a(2) of the German Civil Code. That section purported to implement Council Directive 76/207 on the implementation of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment. The Court found that that section only enabled it to award reimbursement of travelling expenses incurred by the Complainants in pursuing their applications for the posts.

The CJEU pointed out that the Directive did not prescribe the range of sanctions that should be applied in cases where discrimination was found to have occurred. However the Court went on to say that if a Member State chooses to penalise infringements of the prohibition of discrimination by an award of compensation, such compensation has to be adequate in relation to the damage sustained and that it must have a deterrent effect. The Court pointed out that compensation has to be more than merely nominal damages which the German law provided in restricting compensation to the reimbursement of travelling expenses incurred by a candidate who was discriminated against in the filling of the post.

The formulation used by the Court in answer to the third question posed by the referring Court is as follows: -

- Although Directive 76/207/EEC, for the purpose of imposing a sanction for the breach of the prohibition of discrimination, leaves the member-States free to choose between the different solutions suitable for achieving its objective, it nevertheless requires that if a member-State chooses to penalise breaches of that prohibition by the award of compensation, then in order to ensure that it is effective and that it has a deterrent effect, that compensation must in any event be adequate in relation to the damage sustained and must therefore amount to more than purely nominal compensation such as, for example, the reimbursement only of the expenses incurred in connection with the application. It is for the national court to interpret and apply the legislation adopted for the implementation of the directive in conformity with the requirements of Community law,in so far as it is given discretion to do so under national law.

Like every case, the decision in Von Colson is authority only for what it decided. While in the passage quoted above the Court referred to where a Member State chooses to penalise breaches of a Directive with an award of compensation that cannot be taken to mean that a statutory tribunal, such as this Court, can purport to apply a sanction in the nature of punishment for a contravention of the law. In our law, punishment for illegality can only be imposed by the ordinary courts and not by statutory tribunals exercising limited civil jurisdiction. It follows that any compensatory redress awarded by this Court must remain within the bounds of what is capable of being redressed by compensation. That includes any present or future loss suffered by the Claimant as well as any loss, damage inconvenience or expense which flows from the wrong which he or she suffered.
The decision in

Von Colsonis not authority for the proposition that the Complainant should be awarded compensation in circumstances where he clearly suffered no present or future detriment from any of the omissions ofwhich he complains.
Right to Redress

Section 7(2) of the Act provides as follows in relation to redress: -

- A recommendation of a rights commissioner under subsection (1) shall do one or more of the following:
  - (a) declare that the complaint was or, as the case may be, was not well founded,

(b)
(i) confirm all or any of the particulars contained or referred to in any statement furnished by the employer under section 3, 4, 5 or 6, or

(ii) alter or add to any such statement for the purpose of correcting any inaccuracy or omission in the statement and the statement as so altered or added to shall be deemed to have been given to the employee by the employer,

- (c) require the employer to give or cause to be given to the employee concerned a written statement containing such particulars as may be specified by the commissioner,
  (d) order the employer to pay to the employee compensation of such amount (if any) as is just and equitable having regard to all the circumstances, but not exceeding 4 weeks remuneration in respect of the employee's employment calculated in accordance with regulations undersection 17 of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, and the references in the foregoing paragraphs to an employer shall be construed, in a case where ownership of the business of the employer changes after a contravention to which the complaint relates, as references to the person who, by virtue of the change, becomes entitled to such ownership.

In this case the only redress sought by the Complainant is an award of compensation. Such an award can only arise where the complaints made are well founded. Moreover, it should be emphasised that compensation, if any, must be within the bounds of what is fair and equitable having regard to all the circumstances. On any reasonable view, even if the complaints herein were well founded in the technical sense, the dictates of fairness or equity could not justify an award of compensation in the circumstances of this case.

DETERMINATION:

The Court can see no reasonable or justifiable basis upon which it could interfere with the recommendation of the Rights Commissioner / Adjudication Officer. The within appeal is without merit and it is dismissed. The recommendation of the Rights Commissioner / Adjudication Officer is affirmed.

Signed on behalf of the Labour Court

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of Adjudication Officer's Decision No.ADJ00001367

BACKGROUND:

2. The Employer appealed the Decision of the Adjudication Officer in accordance with the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977 to 2015. A Labour Court hearing took place on 13th July, 2017. The following is the Determination of the Court:

DETERMINATION:

Background to the Appeal

This appeal is brought on behalf of DHL Express (Ireland) Limited ("the Appellant") against the decision of an Adjudication Officer (ADJ00001367, dated 30 January 2017) under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 ("the Act"). The Notice of Appeal was received by the Court on 20 February 2017. The Court heard the appeal in Dublin on 13 July 2017.The Appellant called three witnesses: Ms Lorna Quinlan, Mr Alan Butler and Mr Michael Farrell. Mr Coughlan ("the Respondent") gave evidence on his own behalf and did not call any other witness.

The Respondent had been employed by the Appellant as a courier/van driver for some 11 years up until he was summarily dismissed on 24 November 2015 as a consequence of an incident involving his van that had occurred on 19 October 2015. He was paid €692.72 gross per week. He referred a complaint under the Act to the Workplace Relations Commission on 14 January 2016. The Adjudication Officer assigned to hear the matter determined that "the sanction of dismissal for gross misconduct was disproportionate having regard to all the circumstances." She awarded re-instatement with effect from 28 September 2016 (the date of hearing at first instance).

The Respondent has had a number of incidents in the past (in 2012 and 2013) that resulted in some damage to the Appellant's company vehicle. The Respondent received a written warning for the 2012 incident and a final written warning for the 2013 incident. Both written warnings were active for a period of 12 months from the date they were applied to the Respondent. Following the 2013 incident, the Respondent successfully availed of a driver's retraining course (paid for by the Appellant) and did not have any further incidents for a period of some two years until 19 October 2015.

On 19 October 2015, the Respondent returned to the Appellant's Cork depot in his seven-metre van. There was an articulated truck parked adjacent to the entrance to the depot with the result that the space available to vehicles entering or leaving the premises was extremely narrow. The driver of the truck was present at the entrance. The Respondent believed that that driver beckoned at him to continue to drive his van through the available gap. In doing so, the Appellant scraped one side of the van, causing some damage to it. The Complainant immediately brought the incident and the damage to his manager's attention. The Appellant told the Court that it cost €2,500.00 to repair the damage.

An investigation meeting took place on 4 November 2015 in the course of which CCTV footage recorded at the time of incident was reviewed. The footage proved to be of no assistance as it did not record either the incident itself or the actions of the other driver whom the Respondent believed had gestured at him to continue driving the van into the depot yard. That driver was also interviewed. His version of events was that he had no recollection of directing the Appellant to continue driving into the yard on 19 October 2015. The Respondent admitted at the meeting that he had misjudged the space available to him when trying to drive into the depot compound between the parked truck and the fencing on the other side of the entrance. The investigation was conducted by Mr Gary Molloy, the Service Centre Manager at the Appellant's Cork depot.

Mr Molloy wrote to the Respondent on 12 November 2015 with the outcome of the investigation. He states as follows in this letter:

- 'In summary you misjudged the space when trying to drive past a truck parked at the gate of the Cork depot and consequently caused significant damage to the driver's side of the van when you collided with the fencing. You are therefore requested to attend a disciplinary hearing in regard to the aforementioned incident.Please be advised that the above incident could be considered Gross Misconduct under 5.4.3 of the company's disciplinary process:"Failure to protect and safeguard company property"And a disciplinary hearing could result in disciplinary action up to and including your dismissal from the company"'.

The disciplinary hearing was conducted by Mr Alan Butler, an Area Operations Manager with the Appellant. It took place on 16 November 2015. The Respondent was represented at the meeting by his SIPTU Representative. It is common case that the Respondent once again at this meeting accepted responsibility for his actions on 19 October 2015. However, extensive reference was made by Mr Butler to the Respondent's past driving incidents and the final written warning he had received in 2013, notwithstanding the fact that this warning had expired some 12 months previously.

By letter dated 24 November 2015, Mr Butler informed the Respondent that he was being summarily dismissed with immediate effect for gross misconduct. The following paragraph from the letter of dismissal echoes the language used in the letter inviting the Respondent to the disciplinary hearing:

- 'This is a most serious situation from the company perspective and having carefully considered the facts of the case and the representations made by yourself and [PO's] (colleague), the company has taken the view that there is no other alternative in this case except to terminate your employment for reasons under Gross Misconduct where it has been determined that you failed to protect and safeguard company property.'

However, and of some significance in the Court's view, the letter appears to recite a number of additional grounds to justify the Appellant's decision to dismiss the Respondent, including by reference to the Respondent's previous incidents with the van in respect of which the warnings he had received had clearly expired:

- •'It is the company's opinion that you were driving carelessly and your poor judgment caused over €2,500 of damage to the driver's side of the van when you collided with the fencing.
  •This is an extremely serious issue in light of your history with causing damage to both the company van and customer property.

  •The company has previously provided you with substantial training and has gone to extensive efforts to ensure that you were driving in a safe manner.

  •The company has serious concerns about your ability to safely carry out your duties as a driver and can't trust that you won't have a similar lapse in judgment which may result in further damage or potential injury to yourself or others.

  •The company cannot accept this level of negligence and poor judgment from a driver who takes a van on public roads on a daily basis.'

The penultimate paragraph of Mr Butler's letter to the Respondent advises him that as his behaviour is deemed to constitute 'Gross (sic) misconduct manifesting itself in an ongoing basis' his employment is to be terminated with immediate effect. In short, the Respondent was summarily dismissed without notice or payment in lieu of notice.

The Respondent appealed from this decision by letter dated 25 November 2015 to Mr Michael Farrell, Head of Operations. In setting out the basis for his appeal, the Respondent raised concerns about the company's apparent reliance on previous incidents to justify his summary dismissal. Mr Farrell replied with his decision on the appeal by letter dated 15 December 2015 in which he states the following:

- 'Whilst I appreciate the point you have made that this latest incident was just an error of judgement, I do not accept that we cannot and should not consider the other serious incidents that you have been involved in over recent years. As a responsible organisation we have made every effort to assist you through retraining in an effort to address any driving skills; however, we now need to recognise the duty of care we have to the public, other staff and to you yourself. With that in mind I feel I must uphold the finding of dismissal in the letter dated 24th November 2015.'

Evidence Given by the Appellant's Witnesses

Ms Lorna Quinlan, a HR Business Partner with the Appellant, gave evidence in relation to the Appellant's Disciplinary Procedure and the fact that it is a procedure agreed jointly with SIPTU. She told the Court that the duration for which a final written warning remains live on an employee's record in accordance with the Disciplinary Procedure is twelve months. She also gave evidence in relation to the practice whereby the Appellant's Facilities Department in Dublin retains records of road traffic accidents involving vehicles in the Appellant's fleet which are used to calculate drivers' safe driving bonus. On cross-examination, Ms Quinlan accepted that she had no access to the records retained by the Facilities Department and therefore could not give evidence in relation to the relative cost of the damage that may have been caused by other drivers to company vehicles in 2015 vis-�-vis the damage estimated at €2,500.00 caused by the Respondent on 19 October 2015. Neither was the witness able to confirm or deny that other sanctions short of summary dismissal had been considered in the Respondent's case.

Mr Alan Butler, Area Operations Manager, gave evidence of his role in the disciplinary process involving the Respondent in late 2015. He told the Court that he met with the Respondent and his representative on 16 November 2015. He said he gave the Respondent an opportunity to recount his version of the incident of 19 October 2015. Mr Butler informed the Court that has was fully aware of the Respondent's previous incidents of poor driving causing damage to a company vehicle as in the normal course the local Station Manager reports such matters routinely to the Area Manager. He went on to tell the Court that he made the decision to summarily dismiss the Respondent for the following reasons:

- •As Area Manager, he had to be sure that a driver of a large company vehicle, such as the one assigned to the Respondent, was capable of driving such a vehicle safely;
  •He had a responsibility to ensure the safety of the public in the circumstances;

•He had concerns about the Respondent's capability as a driver arising from the poor judgement he had displayed on 19 October 2015 when he attempted to drive his vehicle through a very small gap which the Respondent had acknowledged in the course of the disciplinary meeting and had apologised for.

Mr Butler told the Court that he formed the view that the only option open to the Appellant at that stage was to dismiss the Respondent. He said that the company had offered the Respondent the following options following the 2013 incident: redundancy; redeployment to a job in the warehouse; or a driver's retraining programme. The Respondent chose the latter option. Mr Butler told the Court that these options could not be offered to the Respondent following the October 2015 incident because the company had lost trust in the Respondent by that stage.

On cross-examination, Mr Butler was asked why – if it was the case that he posed such a risk to the public – the Respondent was allowed to continue to drive for the company for a period of some two weeks following the 19th of October before he was eventually suspended. In reply, Mr Butler said that the local manager in place at the Cork depot at the time was inexperienced and unaware of the correct procedure whereby he was required to report such incidents up the line. Mr Butler also confirmed, in response to a question from the Respondent's representative, that he had not taken a written statement from the other driver that the Respondent believed had gestured at him to continue driving his van through the available gap on 19 October 2015. Nevertheless, he told the Court that he had preferred that driver's version of events over the Respondent's. Mr Butler also stated that his decision to summarily dismiss the Respondent was not based on the value of the damage he had caused to the company van but on his poor judgement on the date in question. He accepted that the Respondent hadn't set out to deliberately damage company property. However, the poor judgment displayed by the Respondent, according to the witness, caused him to have concerns about public safety should the Respondent be permitted to continue driving on the company's behalf. When asked by the Court, whether or not he had considered the possibility of dismissing the Complainant on notice, Mr Butler- in confirming that he hadn't done so - made an admission to the effect that he wasn't aware that this was an option open to him.

Mr Michael Farrell, Head of Operations, was the third witness called on behalf of the Appellant. This witness, as previously noted, conducted an appeal from Mr Butler's decision to summarily dismiss the Respondent. He confirmed to the Court that prior to hearing the appeal he had been aware of the historical incidents involving the Respondent's driving. His evidence was that the incident of 19 October 2015, in light of those earlier incidents, caused him to have great concerns about the risk posed by the Respondent's driving for the safety of the public. In his view, the most recent incident involving the Respondent demonstrated the latter's inability to drive a vehicle with sufficient care and judgement. The witness stated that he believed it was appropriate to consider an employee's entire relevant employment history in the context of a disciplinary process, notwithstanding that – as in the Respondent's case – any and all previous disciplinary warnings had lapsed by the passage of time. When asked about the 2013 options given to the Respondent and why they were not offered again, Mr Butler was adamant that it had been made clear in 2013 that those options comprised 'a once-off offer'.

The Respondent's Evidence

The Respondent gave evidence in relation to his efforts to mitigate his loss following his dismissal. He told the Court that in the period since October 2015 he has applied for some 23 or 24 jobs without success. He applied for various roles including that of courier, driver, general operative, cleaner and store person. The Respondent was called to a small number of interviews by named employers but no job offer ensued from any of them. He commenced on a Community Employment Scheme in May 2017 as a result of which his weekly payment from the Department of Social Protection is increased by €22.00.

Discussion and Decision

Ground or Grounds for Dismissal?

It is evident, from a comparison of the letter inviting the Respondent to the disciplinary meeting with the letter, authored by Alan Butler, setting out the outcome of that disciplinary meeting that the Respondent was in fact confronted with multiple allegations at the disciplinary meeting that had not been advised to him in advance of that meeting. It follows that the Appellant based its decision to summarily dismiss the Respondent (and continues to defend that decision) on numerous grounds not referred to at all at the investigation stage or in Mr Molloy's letter inviting the Respondent to the disciplinary meeting. This is indeed confirmed by Mr Butler's direct evidence to this Court.

Likewise, it would appear from Mr Farrell's letter setting out his decision on the internal appeal, that his decision to confirm Mr Butler's decision to summarily dismiss the Respondent was based on the company's 'need to recognise the duty of care we have to the public, other staff and to you yourself.' This is also altogether different from the subject of the disciplinary process notified to the Respondent in Mr Molloy's letter of invitation to the disciplinary meeting wherein Mr Molloy stated the allegation which the Respondent was being invited to meet was 'failure to protect and safeguard company property'.

Gross Misconduct?

As recited previously, the incident which gave rise to the chain of events that culminated in the Respondent's summary dismissal for gross misconduct occurred on 19 October 2015 when he accidently, and through an error of judgement, caused damage to a company van to the tune of €2,500.00. The established jurisprudence in relation to dismissal law in this jurisdiction takes a very restricted view of what constitutes gross misconduct justifying summary dismissal. This is evidenced, for example, by the determination of the Employment Appeals Tribunal inLennon v BredinM160/1978 (reproduced at page 315 of Madden and KerrUnfair Dismissal Cases and Commentary(IBEC, 1996)) wherein the Tribunal states:

- 'Section 8 of the Minimum Notice and Terms of Employment Act 1973 saves an employer from liability for minimum notice where the dismissal is for misconduct. We have always held that this exemption applies only to cases of very bad behaviour of such a kind that no reasonable employer could be expected to tolerate the continuance of the relationship for a minute longer; we believe the legislature had in mind such things as violent assault or larceny or behaviour in the same sort of serious category. If the legislature had intended to exempt an employer from giving notice in such cases where the behaviour fell short of being able to fairly be called by the dirty word 'misconduct' we have always felt that they would have said so by adding such words (after the word misconduct) as negligence, slovenly workmanship, bad timekeeping, etc. They did not do so.'

This Court finds that the grounds that the Respondent was advised were to form the basis of a disciplinary action against him – viz. 'failure to protect and safeguard company property' – considered in the context of the events of 19 October 2015, does not come within the category of 'very bad behaviour of such a kind that no reasonable employer could be expected to tolerate the continuance of the relationship for a minute longer', described above by the Tribunal. In any event, the uncontested evidence before the Court was that the Appellant allowed the Respondent to continue driving his company vehicle for some two weeks after the 19 October 2015 before he was suspended.

Proportionality of Sanction?

It follows, from the Court's discussion above that the Respondent's failure to properly judge the width of the gap through which he was attempting to drive the Appellant's van on 19 October 2015 cannot reasonably be considered to amount to gross misconduct justifying the imposition of a sanction of summary dismissal. In this regard, therefore, the Court finds that the sanction of summary dismissal imposed on the Respondent by the Appellant was disproportionate and unwarranted in all the circumstances.

Failure to Consider Alternative Sanctions

Both Mr Butler and Mr Farrell stated in their evidence to the Court that they did not consider imposing any lesser sanction on the Respondent. In fact, Mr Butler told the Court that he was unaware that he could have imposed a sanction of dismissal on notice. It follows that the Appellant did not give due consideration to imposing an alternative and more proportionate sanction on the Respondent. Likewise, the Appellant's failed to offer the Respondent an opportunity to contribute to the cost of the repairs to the company van necessitated by his error of judgement.

Undue Weight Placed on Previous Incidents Involving the Respondent's Driving

As stated previously in this determination, the Respondent had had a number of incidents in the past (in 2012 and 2013) that resulted in some damage to the Appellant's company vehicle. He received a written warning for the 2012 incident and a final written warning for the 2013 incident. Both written warnings were active for a period of 12 months from the date they were applied to the Respondent and each expired thereafter in accordance with the Appellant's Disciplinary Policy. However, it is abundantly clear from the correspondence opened to the Court and from both Mr Butler's and Mr Farrell's evidence that the Appellant's decision to summarily dismiss the Respondent was, nevertheless, informed to no small extent by those previous incidents and associated which clearly provides for the expungement of disciplinary warnings on their expiry.

For all of the above reasons the Court finds that the Respondent's dismissal was unfair within the meaning of the Act.

Award

Having regard to the totality of evidence adduced by the Parties at the hearing, including the Respondent's evidence in relation to his loss to date attributable to his dismissal and his efforts to mitigate that loss, the Court awards the Respondent €72,042.88 by way of compensation, being the equivalent of 104 weeks' remuneration. As the award is made by way of compensation for loss of earnings it is subject to income tax.

The decision of the Adjudication Officer is, therefore, varied accordingly.

The Court so determines.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal under Section 83 of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2008

BACKGROUND:

2. The worker appealed her case to the Labour Court on the 6th August, 2010. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 10th May, 2011. The following is the Court's determination:

DETERMINATION:

- This is an appeal by Ms Anne Hurley against the decision of the Equality Tribunal in her complaint of victimisation against County Cork VEC under the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2008.
  Introduction

This is a determination of the Court on preliminary issues raised in the course of the hearing of the appeal. The Court is satisfied that the determination of these issues by way of a preliminary ruling could be determinative of the whole case.There are some unusual aspects to this case which should be recorded in some detail. The Complainant who was originally represented by a firm of solicitors appeared in person at the hearing, on 10th May, 2011, having apparently lost the services of her solicitors. At the commencement of the hearing the Complainant was invited to apply for an adjournment if she felt that she might obtain representation from an alternative source. The Complainant told the Court that she wished to proceed.It was clear from the written submission filed by the Respondent that it would be contending that many of the incidents relied upon by the Complainant as constituting victimisation occurred outside the time limit prescribed by s. 77 of the Act and were therefore statute barred. The Court suggested that this point could be considered as a preliminary matter. In that regard the Court suggested that occurrences outside the time limit could only be considered if the last act relied upon was within the time limit and the other acts complained of were sufficiently connected to the final act so as to make all of them part of a continuum. A further issue arose as to whether occurrences not referred to in the Complainant's original complaint, and occurrence after the complaint had been presented, could be relied upon.The Court suggested to the parties that an occurrence after the complaint had been presented could not have been comprehended by the claim and could not be relied upon for the purpose of obtaining redress. It did, however, indicate that evidence in relation to these later incident, which was relevant and probative in relation to the earlier occurrences, could be admitted in respect of those earlier incidents.The Court proposed to the parties that it should proceed with the preliminary point in relation to the time limit only. It proposed that for that purpose the Complainant should adduce evidence in relation to the occurrences that were within the time limit. It suggested that if these occurrences were found to be acts of victimisation the Court would hear evidence in relation to all of the occurrences relied upon. If, however these occurrences where found not to have involved victimisation the complaint relating to the earlier occurrences could not be entertained having regard to s.77(5) of the act as the most recent occurrences would have been outside the time limit.Counsel for the Respondent agreed with this proposal. The Complainant was asked to consider this proposal and the Court rose for 30 minutes in order to allow her an opportunity of so doing. On resumption of the hearing the Complainant indicated her agreement to proceed in the manner suggested by the Court.It was submitted by Counsel for the Respondent that the two occurrences about which there was no issue as to admissibility related to the filling of posts in Bandon Macroom School Completion Project (January 2008) and Clonakilty Community College (May 2008). It was proposed that evidence should only be taken in relation to these incidents. Again the Complainant agreed to confine her evidence to these two occurrences for the purpose of the preliminary investigation.The Complainant gave her evidence in relation to these occurrences and did not call any other witnesses. The Respondent presented its evidence by calling two witnesses. Following short closing statements the Court reserved its decision and the hearing terminated. The Court indicated that it would give its determination in writing on the preliminary question and depending on its determination the hearing might or might not be resumed. The Complainant did not raise any objection to the process adopted nor did she seek to adduce evidence in relation to any other matter.Later that day the Complainant contacted the Secretary to the Court and expressed concern that she had not properly presented her case. She claimed that the two occurrences which had been identified and in relation to which she had given evidence were not the 'final acts of victimisation' and she wished to rely on two later occurrences for the purpose of the preliminary issue. The Complainant then attended personally at the Court and presented the Court Secretary with a written document setting out her position in relation to these matters and asking that the case be reopened. The Court wrote to the Complainant asking her to particularise the additional evidence that she wished to produce including the identity of any witness that she wished to call. The document presented by the Complainant together with the Court's reply thereto was copied to the Respondent. The Solicitor for the Respondent replied objecting to a reopening of the case.Further correspondence ensued between the Court and the Complainant in relation to this matter. In the course of this correspondence the Court indicated that it would consider reopening the case if the Complainant provided written details of the additional evidence that she wished to adduce in relation to the matters in issue at this stage in the appeal, namely whether she was subjected to an act of victimisation in the six-month period prior to the date on which the within complaints were presented to the Equality Tribunal. It was pointed out to the Complainant that the Court could not accept mere assertion or hearsay. The Complainant was also asked to provide the names of additional witnesses that she wished to proffer together with a statement of the evidence that the proposed witnesses would give.At all times the Respondent objected to the matter being reopened and claimed that to do so would be fundamentally unfair to the Respondent.In a document submitted to the Court under cover of a letter dated 5th July, 2011, the Complainant set out details of the additional evidence that she now wished to adduce. It is clear from that document that the Complainant wishes to give further evidence in relation to a matter in respect to which she has already given evidence at the hearing of 10th May, 2011, namely the filling of a post at Bandon / Macroom Completion Project. Furthermore, the Complainant indicated that she wishes to give evidence in relation to events which she claim to be acts of victimisation that occurred after her complaint was made to the Equality Tribunal. No details were provided of the nature of that evidence or its relevance or probative value to the preliminary point now before the Court.The Complainant also indicated that she wishes to call two witnesses both of whom where present in Court on 10th May but were not called by the complainant to give evidence on that occasion. Both of these witnesses had submitted statements of the evidence they proposed to give. Conscious of the fact that the Complainant is a lay litigant and without prejudice to the Respondents contention that the case could not be reopened the Court reviewed these statements and in the view of the Court they are comprised almost entirely of hearsay, assertion and expressions of opinion. Any evidence given on the basis of these statements could not assist the complainant in advancing her complaint.Again in ease of the Complainant the Court has also examined the written submissions originally filed on behalf of the Complainant by her former legal advisers. While reference is made therein to the filling of posts and to competitions in which the Complainant participated unsuccessfully in July, 2008, and in September, 2008, the Court cannot identify any admissible evidence of probative value in these submissions which could avail the Complainant in advancing her claim.In considering whether or not to allow the case to be reopened the Court must balance two conflicting considerations. On the one hand it is anxious to ensure that an unrepresented party is given the maximum latitude to present her case as she wishes. On the other hand the Court must ensure that the Respondent does not suffer an injustice by being required to incur additional inconvenience and expense in having to defend ill defined and apparently tenuous complaints.Having regard to all the circumstances of the case and in light of the strong objections of the Respondent, the Court decided that there is an insufficient basis upon which the reopening of the case would be justified. Accordingly, what follows is the determination of the Court formulated on the basis of the submissions advanced and the evidence adduced at the hearing held on 10th May, 2011.

Background

The Complainant is a qualified second level teacher. She completed a Higher Diploma in Education in English and C.S.P.E in 2003. She has since obtained a Modular Certificate in Dyslexia in 2004 and a Diploma in Teaching Children with Special Educational Needs.The Complainant worked in a number of substitute teaching positions in various primary schools in the period 1998 to 2001. Having obtained the Higher Diploma in Education the Complainant obtained temporary employment with the Respondent as a resource teacher during the academic year 2003 – 2004. Her temporary contract with the Respondent was not renewed and this gave rise to a complaint under the Act. This complaint was dealt with by the Equality Tribunal through a process of mediation. The matter was resolved through this process in 2006 on confidential terms.Since the resolution of that complaint the Complainant has sought several teachings posts with the Respondent but has been unsuccessful on each occasion. The Complainant believes that her failure to obtain further employment with the Respondent is related to the proceedings which she previously brought.The Complainant referred a complaint to the Equality Tribunal on 11th June, 2008, alleging that she had been victimised within the meaning of s.74(2) of the Act by being denied employment with the Respondent.

Provision of information

By way of a preliminary issue the Complainant told the Court that she had requested certain information from the Respondent which she regarded as essential if she was to adequately present her claim. She said that this information related to the marks issued to the candidates in various competitions in which she had participated. She said that she had also requested interview notes and the marking scheme used in these competitions. The Court was asked to direct the production of documents containing this information.Counsel for the Respondent told the Court that a statutory questionnaire had been served on the Respondent and such information as was available was furnished. Counsel told the Court that interview notes were not retained but that other information had been furnished to the Complainant's former Solicitors.Without reaching any conclusion on whether or not the information had been provided, the Court asked that the Respondent furnish the Complainant with copies of such documents as were available. The Court rose so as to allow these documents to be furnished and for the Respondent to examine the documents.The Court is satisfied that such documents in the possession of the Respondent as are material to the case were provided to the Complainant either before the hearing or in the course of the recess.

Position of the parties

The essence of the Complainant's case is that she was unsuccessful in applications for employment which she made in March, 2007, June, 2007, July, 2007, on two occasions in August 2007, September 2007, January, 2008, May 2008 and July 2008. It is the Complainant's case that the incidents cited were all part of a continuing act of victimisation because of the earlier proceedings which she brought against the Respondent.By way of preliminary objection, the Respondent contends that the complaints of victimisation, in so far as they relate to events which occurred before 12th December, 2007, are outside the time-limit prescribed by s.77(5) of the Act and are statute barred. The Respondent further contends that the incidents referred to by the Complainant which occurred in May 2008 and July 2008 were not referred to in her complaint to the Equality Tribunal and cannot now be proceeded with. The Respondent accepts that the complaint, in so far as it relates to the decision not to appoint the Complainant to a post in January, 2008, is within the time limit but it contends that there is no evidence to connect that decision which either the earlier decisions impugned or with her previous complaint under the Act.Without prejudice to its submissions in that regard, the Respondent denies that the Complainant was victimised in the manner alleged or at all. The Respondent contends that on each occasion the posts in issue were filled on the basis of the merit of the candidates as determined by an interview board. The Respondent further contends that those involved in the interview process had no knowledge of the previous proceedings taken by the Complainant.

Consideration of the preliminary objection

The various posts at issue in this case were filled by differently constituted interview boards. If the filling of each of these posts was put in issue in this appeal a considerable number of witnesses would be required to give evidence and a significant number of documents would have to be produced and examined. Conversely, if the appeal could be disposed of by considering only the conduct of those competitions held within the time limit the hearing could be significantly abridged.The Court suggested to the parties that in these circumstances it might be convenient to deal with the time limit issue as a preliminary matter. Both parties indicated their agreement to this approachThe Court proceeded accordingly.

Application of the Time Limit

Section 77(5)(a) of the Acts provides: -

- (a) Subject to paragraph (b) , a claim for redress in respect of discrimination or victimisation may not be referred under this section after the end of the period of 6 months from the date of occurrence of the discrimination or victimisation to which the case relates or, as the case may be, the date of its most recent occurrence.

Section 77(6A) provides: -

- For the purposes of this section —
  (a) discrimination or victimisation occurs—
    - (i) if the act constituting it extends over a period, at the end of the period,
    - (ii) [not relevant]
      - (iii) [not relevant]

Subsection (5) and subsection (6A) of s.77 deal with different forms of continuing discrimination or victimisation. Under subsection (6A), an act will be regarded as extending over a period, and so treated as done at the end of that period, if an employer maintains and keeps in force a discriminatory regime, rule, practice or principle which has had a clear and adverse effect on the complainant (Barclays Bank plc v KapurIRLR 387). This subsection would apply where, for example, an employer maintains a discriminatory requirement for access to employment or promotion. In the case of victimisation, it would apply, for example, where an employer pursues a policy or practice of not affording certain benefits to employees who brought equality claims. In such a case the time limit will only run from the time that the policy or practice is discontinued. Hence an aggrieved party could maintain a claim in respect of acts or omissions which occurred in pursuance of the policy or practice regardless of when the act or omission occurred. There is, however, authority for the proposition that an act occurring after the presentation of the Complainant's complaint may not be taken into account when determining whether there was a continuing act.The decision of the Court of Appeal for England and Wales inRobertson v Bexley Community Centre[2003] IRLR 434, concerned a claim of racial discrimination by Mr Robertson under the Race Relations Act 1976, which contains similar provisions as to time limits as our Act, except that the standard time limit is three months rather than six-months as provided for by our Act. The salient facts of this case are as follows: -The Complainant was subjected to racial abuse by a work colleague, Mr Pankhurst, in April 1999. He made a complaint to his employer, Bexley Community Centre. The matter was resolved by Mr Pankhurst making an apology in writing to Mr Robertson, which Mr Robertson accepted.Other issues arose in relation to Mr Robertson's employment which resulted in disciplinary action being taken against him by his employer. On 4th October he made a complaint to an Employment Tribunal alleging that he was the victim of racial discrimination. He relied on the racial abuse to which he had been subjected by Mr Pankhurst and the subsequent disciplinary action taken against him by his employer.On the day after he filed his complaint, a meeting was held between Mr Robertson and Mr Pankhurst which was described as a "reconciliation meeting". At this meeting Mr Robertson was again subjected to racial abuse by Mr Pankhurst .At the hearing of his claim it was found that the complaints in relation to the disciplinary action taken against Mr Robertson were without foundation. It was accepted that the racial abuse which occurred in April 1999 amounted to unlawful discrimination but as this had occurred outside the three –month time-limit prescribed by the UK Race Relations Act 1976 that aspect of the claim could not be entertained. An issue then arose as to whether the later incident in which Mr Robertson had been subjected to racist abuse, on the day after he presented his complaint, could be taken into account for the purpose of showing a continuing contravention of the Act. At first instance the Employment Tribunal held that it could not. On appeal the EAT took a different view. On Further appeal the Court of Appeal restored the original decision of the Employment Tribunal.In considering this point Auld LJ, with whom Chadwick and Newman LJJ agreed, said the following, (at par 10): -

- "On the following day, 5 October, the planned reconciliation meeting between the two men took place. But it was a dismal failure. Mr Pankhurst was racially abusive to Mr Robertson and refused to shake his hand. The Community Centre immediately set in train procedures to discipline him for that, but he pre-empted that outcome by resigning on the following day. Those events of 5 and 6 October, postdating, as they did, Mr Robertson's application to the employment tribunal, were not and could not be considered as part of his application. If he had wished to have them considered, he could have issued a fresh application asking the tribunal to dispense with service and hear the complaints in both applications at the same time. But he did not do that.

Later, at par 21, the Judge said: -

- "There was, contrary to Mr Robertson's submissions, no evidence that his employer, the Community Centre, had acquiesced in, or condoned, Mr Pankhurst's behaviour at any time. And, in any event, the Appeal Tribunal was not entitled to take 5 October 1999 incident into account in considering whether there was a continuing act. That behaviour took place, as I have said, after the date of Mr Robertson's application, and could not properly be taken into account for the purpose of determining whether the complaint was out of time. Though it may be that it could have been relevant to the second and quite distinct issue whether it was just and equitable to consider the claim out of time (seeDin (Ghulam) v Carrington Viyella Ltd (Jersey Kapwood Ltd)[1982] IRLR 281 EAT, and alsoPonsford-Jones v Hampshire Education Authority and another(unreported, 25 November 1997)).

Subsection (5) of s.77 deals with a situation in which there are a series of separate acts or omissions which, while not forming part of regime, rule, practice or principle, are sufficiently connected so as to constitute a continuum. The circumstances in which a corresponding provision of UK law can come into play was considered by the Court of Appeal inArthur v London Eastern Railway Ltd[2007] IRLR 58. Here the Court was concerned with a claim of victimisation in the form of a series of acts directed against the complainant, some inside the three-month time limit provided at s.48 of the UK Employment Rights Act 1996, (which corresponds to s.77(5) of our Act) and some outside that limit. In considering if the time-limit in respect of all of the acts relied upon stated to run from the last such act Mummery LJ said (at para 30,31): -

- The provision in s.48(3) regarding complaint of an act which is part of a series of similar acts is also aimed at allowing employees to complain about acts (or failures) occurring outside the three-month period. There must be an act (or failure) within the three-month period, but the complaint is not confined to that act (or failure.) The last act (or failure) within the three-month period may be treated as part of a series of similar acts (or failures) occurring outside the period. If it is, a complaint about the whole series of similar acts (or failures) will be treated as in time.The provision can therefore cover a case where, as here, the complainant alleges a number of acts of detriment, some inside the three-month period and some outside it. The acts occurring in the three-month period may not be isolated one-off acts, but connected to earlier acts or failures outside the period. It may not be possible to characterise it as a case of an act extending over a period within s.48(4) by reference, for example, to a connecting rule, practice, scheme or policy but there may be some link between them which makes it just and reasonable for them to be treated as in time and for the complainant to be able to rely on them.

It is clear for the passage just quoted that in order for acts or omissions outside the time limit to be taken into account there must have been acts or omissions of victimisation (or discrimination) within the time limit. There can be practical difficulties in applying that provision. There must be some reality in the claim that acts of victimisation actually occurred within the limitation period. Otherwise a complainant could revive a claim which had been extinguished by the time limit simply by raising an additional related claim, no matter how tenuous, within the time limit.Nature of the Complainant's claim

The gist of the Complainant's case appears to be that the Respondent had adopted a policy of denying her further employment because of her earlier claim under the Act and that each of the refusals upon which she relies are mere manifestations of that policy. If she is correct in that assertion her claim would fall to be decided by application of s.77(6A) of the Act and the time limit would run only from the time when the policy was discontinued.It appears to the Court that the pursuance of a policy of victimisation against the Complainant would have involved a conspiracy between various employees of the Respondent and a number of different independent interview boards. It is for the Complainant to produce credible evidence from which the existence of such a conspiracy could be inferred. Neither in her oral evidence nor in her written submissions to the Court has the Complainant offered any evidence from which the Court could draw such an inference. In that regard the Court could not accept that the mere coincidence of her having brought a claim under the Act, and her subsequent failure to obtain employment through open competition, is a sufficient basis from which to draw an inference of victimisation. Accordingly, the Court cannot accept that the acts or omissions complained of can be regarded as a continuum for the purpose of s.77(6A)The Court then considered if all of the incidents relied upon could be regarded as part of a continuing act of victimisation for the purpose of s.77(5) of the Act. In that regard, applying the principles identified above to the instant case, it appears that the admissibility of the claim in so far as it relates to alleged acts of victimisation in the period before 12th December, 2007, depends upon the validity of the claims of victimisation which allegedly occurred in the period after that date. Their admissibility is also dependent upon some link being established between the occurrences outside the time limit, and those inside the limitation period, which makes it just and reasonable for them to be treated as part of a continuing act upon which the Complainant can rely.In relation to the occurrences upon which the Complainant seeks to rely which occurred after her claim was presented to the Equality Tribunal on 11th June 2008, the positions is substantially different. The decision inCounty Louth VEC v The Equality Tribunal and Pearse Brannigan, Unreported, High Court, McGovern J. 24th July 2009, is clear authority for the proposition that a claim under the Act may be amended so as to rely on additional acts or omissions which occurred before the claim was initiated provided that the nature of the claim remains the same. In this case the Complainant is seeking to rely on incidents which occurred after her claim was presented for the purpose of obtaining redress. The decision inRobertson v Bexley Community Centreindicates that this is not permissible.The Court did, however, indicate in the course of the hearing that it would hear any evidence which the Complainant wished to tender, in relation to later incidents, which had probative value in relation to the incidents which are encompassed by her claim.The admissibility of Complainant's claim of victimisation in the filling of posts in the period before 12th December, 2007, is dependent upon there having been an act of victimisation in the filling of posts after that date and before her claim was presented. In these circumstances the Court put it to the parties that it should proceed to hear evidence in relation to the Complainant's claim in so far as it relates to the filling of posts in January 2008 and May 2008; that it should reserve its decision on those claims and in the event that it upholds those claims it would reconvene the hearing so as to deal with the other aspects of the claim. On this proposal if the Complainant did not succeed in relation to these claims, those outside the time limit would be statute barred.Following a recess to allow the parties to consider this proposal the Court was informed by the Complainant and by Counsel for the Respondent that they were agreeable to proceed in the manner proposed by the Court.

The Evidence

The Complainant gave evidence in relation to both incidents. In relation to the incident in May 2008 the Complainant told the Court that she checked the Respondent's website and found application forms in relation to a number of teaching posts including one in respect to a resource teacher. The Complainant downloaded the form and sent an e-mail to the school in question asking when the post would be advertised and what the closing date was to be.The Complainant received a reply to the effect that there was in fact no vacancy for a resource teacher and the reference to this post was removed from the website. The Complainant said that other posts referred to on the website were subsequently advertised and filled. The Complainant told the Court that she believed that the Respondent had decided not to fill the resource teacher post because it was the one for which she was most qualified.In relation to the incident in January 2008, the Complainant told the Court that she applied for a position with the Bandon – Macroom School Completion Programme. She was told that she was unsuccessful and that her nominated referees had not replied to requests from the Respondent for references. The Complainant said that she believed that this failure was a major reason for the rejection of her application. The Complainant said that she had reason to believe that the Respondent had never written to her nominated referees requesting a reference. She said that she was relying on this failure as constituting an act of victimisation.In relation to the May incident evidence was given on behalf of the Respondent by Ms Anne Dunne who is Principal of Clonakilty Community College. This witness told the Court that at the time in question the Collect was carrying work on its website and certain tests were being performed. As part of this process forms were placed on the website for the purpose of testing if they could be downloaded. The witness told the Court that there never was a vacancy for a resource teacher and it is not the practice of the College to employ teachers solely in that role.Ms Dunne told the Court that she sent an e-mail to the Complainant on 15th May 2008 pointing out that the website was under reconstruction. She also pointed out that there may be vacancies later in the year and that these would be advertised. The witness said that some posts were subsequently advertised but since no vacancy for a resource teacher existed such a post was not advertised. The witness told the Court that she had no knowledge of the Complainant having previously taken proceedings against the Respondent.Mr Kevin Earlie, who was Local Coordinator- Bandon – Macroom Schools Completion Programme, gave evidence in relation to the posting of a letter to persons nominated as referees by the Complainant. This witness referred the Court to copies of two letters addressed to the nominated referees, dated 20th December 2007, seeking references for the Complainant. The witness told the Court that he typed the letters and placed them in the post on the day they were written. No reply was received to either letter. It was Mr Earlie's evidence that the failure of the referees to respond was not a factor which influenced the decision not to appoint the Complainant to the post under consideration. He said that it was his practice only to follow up requests for references in the case of an applicant whom the Respondent proposes to employ.

Conclusion of the Court

On the evidence adduced there is no basis whatsoever upon which the Court could conclude that the either of the incidents relied upon by the Complainant within the time limit were acts of victimisation. Accordingly, the Court must conclude that no acts capable of constituting victimisation occurred in the period of six-months ending on the date on which she presented her claim to the Equality Tribunal. Accordingly, even if the Complainant's case were to be taken at its height in relation to all other incidents relied upon, they are outside the time limit prescribed by s.77(5) and are statute barred.For all of the reasons the set out in this Determination the within appeal cannot succeed and the decision of the Equality Tribunal is affirmed.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of an Adjudication Officer's Decision No r-156397-wt-15/RG

BACKGROUND:

2. An Adjudication Officer hearing took place on 23 September 2015, and 1 December 2015 , and a Decision was issued on 27 January 2016.

The Worker appealed the Decision of the Adjudication Officer to the Labour Court on 11 February 2016, in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. A Labour Court hearing took place on 22 March 2016.

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Ms Ewelina Gacek (the Appellant) against a decision of an Adjudication Officer / Rights Commissioner on a claim brought by her against her former employer, Gino's Italian Ltd (the Respondent), under the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1977 – 2015 (the Act).

The Adjudication Officer / Rights Commissioner found that the Appellant's claim was well founded in part.

The Appellant was employed by the Respondent from July 2014 until her employment terminated on 19 thMay 2015. A complaint under the Act was made to the Labour Relations Commission on 15thMay 2015.

Preliminary issue

The Respondent drew the Court's attention to a confirmation in the Appellant's appeal documentation that a claim was being pursued by the Appellant in relation to personal injuries. That confirmation was phrased as follows:

- "Claimant is pursuing a personal injuries claim in relation to a burn injury which she sustained at work, an attributes same to the Respondent's negligence and breach of duty, including the breaching of the Acts herein".

The Respondent asserted that the factual matrix for liability in respect of the personal injury claim is the same as that of the within matter. The Respondent requested the Court to adjourn the hearing of the within appeal pending the completion of the personal injuries litigation.

The Court has considered this request in detail. The Court understands that no procedures have as yet been progressed to the point where the Appellant's Personal Injuries action is before another Court, Tribunal or other adjudicative forum. The Appellant confirmed to the Court her wish to proceed with her Appeal before this Court.

The Court considers that the within Appeal is properly before it and that no circumstance arises whereby this Court should not proceed to hear this matter. It will be a matter for any other Court, Tribunal or adjudicative body considering any future litigation founded on the same factual matrix as that before this Court to consider any issue for that forum that might be raised by the Respondent consequent on this Court's exercise of its jurisdiction.

Discussion and Conclusions

The Respondent contended to the Court that the Appellant was the manager of the Store and as such was responsible for ensuring compliance with the Act. The Court finds that the responsibility for ensuring compliance with the Act rests with the employer. That responsibility extends to the Appellant notwithstanding that she was a manager employed by the Respondent.

Section 11 of the Act

The Appellant made a complaint on 15

thMay 2015 to a Rights Commissioner as regards an alleged breach of Section 11 of the Act. The cognisable period for the complaint as regards daily rest is therefore 16thNovember 2014 to 15thMay 2015. The within complaint however relates to the period from 6thto 18thMarch 2015. The Appellant supplied payslips setting out her working hours. The employer was not in a position to supply records of the Appellant's working hours for the material dates.

Section 11 of the Act provides that

- 'An Employee shall be entitled to a rest period of not less than 11 consecutive hours in each period of 24 hours during which he or she works for his or her employer'.

The Court finds that the Respondent breached the Act at Section 11 in the cognisable period.

Section 12 of the Act

The Appellant made a complaint on 15

thMay 2015 to a Rights Commissioner as regards an alleged breach of Section 12 of the Act. The cognisable period for the complaint as regards daily rest is therefore 16thNovember 2014 to 15thMay 2015.

The Act at Section 12 provides as follows:

- 12.—(1) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 4 hours and 30 minutes without allowing him or her a break of at least 15 minutes.
  (2) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 6 hours without allowing him or her a break of at least 30 minutes; such a break may include the break referred to in subsection (1).

  (3) The Minister may by regulations provide, as respects a specified class or classes of employee, that the minimum duration of the break to be allowed to such an employee under subsection (2) shall be more than 30 minutes (but not more than 1 hour).

  (4) A break allowed to an employee at the end of the working day shall not be regarded as satisfying the requirement contained in subsection (1) or (2).

The Appellant confirmed to the Court that her complaint as regards Section 12 of the Act related to the period from 16 thNovember 2014 to 15thMay 2015. She was unable to specify the detail of dates on which she alleges that breaches of the Act occurred during this period.

The Respondent did not provide the Court with records of the breaks taken by the Appellant during the cognisable period.

The Court finds that the respondent breached the Act at Section 12 in the cognisable period.

Section 13 of the Act

The Appellant made a complaint on 15

thMay 2015 to a Rights Commissioner as regards an alleged breach of Section 13 of the Act. The cognisable period for the complaint as regards daily rest is therefore 16thNovember 2014 to 15thMay 2015.

Section 13 of the Act provides as follows:

13.— (1) In this section "daily rest period" means a rest period referred to in section 11 .

- (2) Subject to subsection (3), an employee shall, in each period of 7 days, be granted a rest period of at least 24 consecutive hours; subject to subsections (4) and (6), the time at which that rest period commences shall be such that that period is immediately preceded by a daily rest period.
  (3) An employer may, in lieu of granting to an employee in any period of 7 days the first-mentioned rest period in subsection (2), grant to him or her, in the next following period of 7 days, 2 rest periods each of which shall be a period of at least 24 consecutive hours and, subject to subsections (4) and (6)—
    - (a) if the rest periods so granted are consecutive, the time at which the first of those periods commences shall be such that that period is immediately preceded by a daily rest period, and
      (b) if the rest periods so granted are not consecutive, the time at which each of those periods commences shall be such that each of them is immediately preceded by a daily rest period.

  (4) If considerations of a technical nature or related to the conditions under which the work concerned is organised or otherwise of an objective nature would justify the making of such a decision, an employer may decide that the time at which a rest period granted by him or her under subsection (2) or (3) shall commence shall be such that the rest period is not immediately preceded by a daily rest period.

(5) Save as may be otherwise provided in the employee's contract of employment—

- (a) the rest period granted to an employee under subsection (2), or

(b) one of the rest periods granted to an employee under subsection (3),

- shall be a Sunday or, if the rest period is of more than 24 hours duration, shall include a Sunday.
  (6) The requirement in subsection (2) or paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (3) as to the time at which a rest period under this section shall commence shall not apply in any case where, by reason of a provision of this Act or an instrument or agreement under, or referred to in, this Act, the employee concerned is not entitled to a daily rest period in the circumstances concerned.

The Appellant contended that she worked 13 consecutive days from 6 thto 18thMarch 2015. The Respondent did not dispute that contention.

The Court finds that the respondent breached the Act at Section 13.

Determination

The Court determines that the complaints under sections 11, 12 and 13 of the Act are well founded. The Court measures the level of compensation which is just and equitable in all of the circumstances at €2,250.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal Of Adjudication Officer Decision R-151162-PD-14/SR

BACKGROUND:

2. The Worker appealed the decision of the Adjudication Officer to the Labour Court on the 12 May 2015. A Labour Court hearing took place on 6 April 2016 and was resumed on 9 August 2016. The following is the Court's Determination:

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Ms Anna Monaghan against the Decision of a Rights Commissioner (now known as an Adjudication Officer) in her claim of penalisation against her former employer Aidan & Henrietta McGrathPartnership under Section 12(1) of the Protected Disclosures Act, 2014 (the Act). The Adjudication Officer held that Ms Monaghan's issues with her employer were not related to any "protected disclosures" as defined by the Act and accordingly held that there was no "penalisation" as defined by the Act.

For ease of reference the parties are given the same designation as they had at first instance. Hence Ms Anna Monaghan will be referred to as "the Complainant" and Aidan & Henrietta McGrathPartnership will be referred to as "the Respondent".

Background

The Complainant was employed as a Care Assistant with the Respondent from 17th August 2010. Her employment terminated on 5th December 2014.

Aras Chois Fharraige Nursing Home is based in Co. Galway and was established in its current format by the Respondent in 2009. It cares for 42 residents and has 40 employees.

The claim was referred to the Labour Relations Commission (now known as the Workplace Relations Commission) on 14th November 2014.

Summary of the Complainant's Case

Mr Peter Daly, B.L., instructed by Kilfeather & Company, Solicitors, on behalf of the Complainant submitted that the Complainant made a protected disclosure to the Respondent and to the Health Information and Quality Authority(HIQA), in consequence of which she was penalised by being intimidated, bullied, alienated, harassed, victimised and placed on suspension and that these actions constituted penalisation of her within the meaning of Section 12 of the Act.

Mr Daly stated that the Complainant made a number of telephone calls to HIQA to report matters which she considered were having a serious and detrimental effect on patients at the Respondent's nursing home. He said that these calls were made on the following dates:- 28th March 2014; 31st March 2014; 2nd April 2014; 7th April 2014 and 1st May 2014. He submitted that the Respondent became aware that the Complainant had made these calls when HIQA visited the nursing home on 14th May 2014.

Furthermore, at a meeting with the Respondent on 29th April 2014, the Complainant outlined details to management of alleged wrongdoings regarding patient care. Mr Daly submitted that these events come within the definition of "protected disclosures" within the meaning of the Act. He said that the Complainant informed her colleagues at a meeting on 4th April 2014 that she had disclosed information to HIQA and that the Complainant herself had informed management of this when HIQA visited the nursing home on 14th May 2014. He said that as a result of these protected disclosures the Complainant was subjected to penalisation by the Respondent.

Therefore, Mr Daly submitted that there was a causal link between the protected disclosures and the detrimental treatment the Complainant was subjected to in the aftermath of the visit by HIQA at the nursing home on 14th May 2014.

Summary of the Respondent's Position

The Respondent was represented by Purdy Fitzgerald Solicitors. Mr Alastair Purdy represented the Respondent on the first day of the hearing before the Court and Ms Síobhan McGowan represented the Respondent on the second day.

Mr Purdy referred to the complaint made by the Complainant's representative to the Labour Relations Commission dated 13thNovember 2014, in which it referred to the disclosure made to the employer on 5thMay 2014 and the penalisation complained of which consisted of (a) suspension from duty on basic pay only from 20thJune 2014 to 7thNovember 2014 and (b) suspension without pay from 7thNovember 2014. Mr Purdy submitted that the letter dated 5thMay 2014 referred to the Respondent was in reality a grievance complaint made by the Complainant rather than a "protected disclosure". In addition he submitted that the issues raised in that letter do not come within the definition of "relevant wrongdoings" as defined by Section 5(3) of the Act. Therefore he contended that the Complainant had failed to satisfy the requirements of the Act.

Notwithstanding the above he contended that the suspensions (which he said were paid suspensions) referred to were entirely unrelated to her alleged protected disclosure. He said that the first period of suspension arose on foot of the findings of an investigation carried out to examine,inter alia, the complaints she referred to in her letter dated 5thMay 2014. Mr Purdy stated that the investigator's report found that a number of the persons interviewed had indicated that the Complainant might have been motivated by malice when she made her complaints regarding the conduct of a fellow colleague. The report recommended that the allegations of malice should be the subject of a further investigation and in the meantime the Complainant should be suspended. Mr Purdy said that in order to facilitate this investigation and in line with the Respondent's best practice, the Complainant was suspended on pay.

He said that the second period of suspension arose as the Complainant unreasonably refused to furnish the Respondent with various pieces of documentation in order to comply with applicable legal and regulatory matters including the Health Act 2007 (Care and Welfare of Residents in Designated Centres for Older Persons) Regulations 2013.

In summary, Mr Purdy submitted that there was no causal link between the alleged protected disclosures and the periods of suspension. He submitted that the allegations of intimidation, bullying, alienation, harassment and victimisation were not included in the original claim but had been "added" to the claim during the hearing before the Adjudication Officer held on 16thFebruary 2015 and were accordingly out of time and therefore statute barred.

Witness Evidence

Evidence was given under oath on behalf of the Complainant by the following:-

- The Complainant;Ms Kathleen Larkin, colleague of the Complainant; andMs Kathleen Gallagher, colleague of the Complainant

Evidence was given under oath on behalf of the Respondent by the following:-

- Mr Aidan McGrath, Registered ProviderMs Patricia Folan, Matron & Registered Person in Charge

The Facts

The material facts as admitted by the parties or as found by the Court are as follows:-

On 30thMarch 2014 the Complainant advised the Matron of the difficulties with a named supervisor regarding her daughter's hours (her daughter was a student Care Assistant in the nursing home at the time).

The Complainant also brought to the attention of the Matron certain concerns regarding the treatment of patients and asked for a meeting of care staff to discuss the matter. The Matron agreed to this. However, the Complainant organised a meeting of Care Assistants on 4thApril 2014 in a local pub, without the Matron's knowledge. Between 6 and 8 Care Assistants attended the meeting. The issues discussed included reference to a named supervisor and her instructions regarding the care of residents. A number of days later when she became aware that a meeting had taken place, the Matron made enquiries of a number of those who attended, including the Complainant, as to the issues discussed at the meeting and was informed what had taken place.

The Complainant told the Court that after the meeting on 4thApril 2014 she was isolated and supervised in the course of her work having heretofore worked on her own. On 29thApril 2014 she was called to an appraisal meeting during which she was told that she was a trouble maker and should have followed procedures. She told the Court that the isolation continued after the appraisal meeting. The Complainant stated that she made a number of calls to HIQA including a call on 14thMay 2014, the day HIQA visited the nursing home.

The Registered Provider, Mr McGrath, told the Court that he decided to hold a meeting with the Complainant as the Matron was unable to resolve the issues she had discussed with the Complainant. He held a staff appraisal meeting with the Complainant on 29thApril 2014. During the first hour of the meeting, the discussion was focused on the issue of the Complainant's daughter's hours. The Complainant then raised concerns regarding the care of the residents and alleged abuse by the same supervisor. At this point in the meeting Mr McGrath decided to call the Matron in to the meeting and the meeting lasted a further hour discussing these issues. Mr McGrath asked the Complainant to put her concerns in writing which she did in a letter dated 5thMay 2014.

Mr McGrath told the Court that having received this letter, which was described as a grievance letter, in accordance with the required regulations he notified HIQA of the Complainant's written complaint on 12thMay 2014. He completed NF06 form on 14thMay 2014 and emailed it to HIQA at 3.53pm that day, informing HIQA that it had initiated a Provider Lead Investigation into the matters raised in her grievance and had placed the alleged abuser on extended leave.

HIQA inspectors made an unannounced visit to the nursing home that evening at around 5.30pm.

The draft report of the Provider Lead Investigation was issued to the Complainant on 20thJune 2014, and she was invited to give comments on the report within four days. The report found that here were several allegations of malice from different staff members regarding the Complainant's motivation in making the complaints and held that in the interest of fairness that this should be dealt with in a separate investigation. It recommended that as there was no evidence to substantiate the allegations made against the supervisor she should be recalled to work. In addition it recommended that the Complainant should be temporarily suspended on pay pending the further investigation.

By letter dated 20thJune 2014, from Ms Folan the Complainant was placed on suspension due to the recommendations made in the report and the issues raised during the investigation itself.

By letter dated 15thAugust 2014, the Complainant, along with all other staff, was requested to complete certain regulatory forms. When the Complainant failed to do so, further letters were sent to her on 29thSeptember 2014, 28thOctober 2014 and by 7thNovember 2014 when the Complainant had still not completed these forms, she was placed on suspension pending the outcome of a disciplinary meeting to be held on 14thNovember 2014.

Statutory Provisions

The Protected Disclosures Act became law on 15thJuly 2014. The Act has retrospective effect, therefore a disclosure made before the date of the Act may be a protected disclosure. The Act provides for a tiered disclosure regime and encourages a worker to make a disclosure to his/her employer or a responsible person in the first instance. It provides that a worker may make a protected disclosure to his/her employer where he/she reasonably believes that information being disclosed shows or tends to show wrongdoing.

The Act defines a protected disclosure at Section 5 as follows:-

Protected disclosures

5. (1) For the purposes of this Act "protected disclosure" means, subject to subsection (6) and sections 17 and 18 , a disclosure of relevant information (whether before or after the date of the passing of this Act) made by a worker in the manner specified in section 6 , 7 , 8 , 9 or 10 .

(2) For the purposes of this Act information is "relevant information" if—

- (a) in the reasonable belief of the worker, it tends to show one or more relevant wrongdoings, and(b) it came to the attention of the worker in connection with the worker's employment.

(3) The following matters are relevant wrongdoings for the purposes of this Act—

- a)that an offence has been, is being or is likely to be committed,b)that a person has failed, is failing or is likely to fail to comply with any legal obligation, other than one arising under the worker's contract of employment or other contract whereby the worker undertakes to do or perform personally any work or services,c)that a miscarriage of justice has occurred, is occurring or is likely to occur,d)that the health or safety of any individual has been, is being or is likely to be endangered,e)that the environment has been, is being or is likely to be damaged,f)that an unlawful or otherwise improper use of funds or resources of a public body, or of other public money, has occurred, is occurring or is likely to occur,g)that an act or omission by or on behalf of a public body is oppressive, discriminatory or grossly negligent or constitutes gross mismanagement, orh)that information tending to show any matter falling within any of the preceding paragraphs has been, is being or is likely to be concealed or destroyed.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3) it is immaterial whether a relevant wrongdoing occurred, occurs or would occur in the State or elsewhere and whether the law applying to it is that of the State or that of any other country or territory.

(5) A matter is not a relevant wrongdoing if it is a matter which it is the function of the worker or the worker's employer to detect, investigate or prosecute and does not consist of or involve an act or omission on the part of the employer.

(6) A disclosure of information in respect of which a claim to legal professional privilege could be maintained in legal proceedings is not a protected disclosure if it is made by a person to whom the information was disclosed in the course of obtaining legal advice.

(7) The motivation for making a disclosure is irrelevant to whether or not it is a protected disclosure.

(8) In proceedings involving an issue as to whether a disclosure is a protected disclosure it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that it is.

Conclusions of the Court

- Protected Disclosure

The protection provided under the Act is afforded to persons who have made a protected disclosure within the meaning of the Act.Section 12(1) of the Act provides :-

- 12. (1) An employer shall not penalise or threaten penalisation against an employee, or cause or permit any other person to penalise or threaten penalisation against an employee, for having made a protected disclosure.

The Court must first establish that a protected disclosure has been made before it can examine whether a penalisation within the meaning of the Act has occurred.

A Protected Disclosure as defined by the Act at Section 5 is a disclosure of relevant information. The Act at Section 2 clarifies that information is relevant information if

- (a) in the reasonable belief of the worker, it tends to show one or more relevant wrongdoings, and (b) it came to the attention of the worker in connection with the worker's employment.

The Respondent contended that the Complainant's letter dated 5thMay 2014 was in the nature of a grievance and does not come within the definition of a protected disclosure. A grievance is a matter specific to a worker whereas a protected disclosure is where a worker had information about a relevant wrongdoing. In this case, the Act was not in force when the Complainant made her alleged disclosure. There is no impediment on such a disclosure being encompassed by the protections of the Act where the Court is satisfied that it comes within the definition of a protected disclosure.

The Court was faced with a direct conflict of evidence on whether or not the Respondent was aware of the fact that the Complainant had made telephone calls to HIQA in the period from 28thMarch 2014 to 1stMay 2014. However, having considered the evidence, the Court is satisfied that it was accepted by both parties that at the appraisal meeting held on 29thApril 2014, the Complainant informed the Respondent of information concerning alleged wrongdoings regarding patient care which she reasonably believed was occurring within the nursing home and which had come to her attention in connection with her employment. These concerns related to alleged health and safety risks to residents. On that basis the Court is satisfied that the Complainant made a protected disclosure on 29thApril 2014 within the meaning of Section 5(3)(d) of the Act.

The Court must now consider whether or not she was penalised for having made such a protected disclosure.

The Act is a new piece of legislation with limited case law, however, the provisions regarding penalisation are broadly similar to those provided in the Safety Health and Welfare Act, 2005. As this Court pointed out inO'Neill v Toni and Guy Blackrock Limited[2010] E.L.R. 21, it is clear from the language of Section 27 of the 2005 Act that in order to make out a complaint of penalisation it is necessary for a complainant to establish that the detriment of which he or she complains was imposed"for"having committed one of the acts protected by Section 27(3) of the 2005 Act. Thus the detriment giving rise to the complaint must have been incurred because of, or in retaliation for, the Complainant having committed a protected act. This suggests that where there is more than one causal factor in the chain of events leading to the detriment complained of the commission of a protected act must be an operative cause in the sense that"but for"the Complainant having committed the protected act he or she would not have suffered the detriment. This involves a consideration of the motive or reasons which influenced the decision maker in imposing the impugned detriment.

The Court is of the view that theToni and Guycase involved penalisation under the 2005 Act, nevertheless, the general principle enunciated in that case remains valid in the case under consideration.

- Allegations of Penalisation(i)intimidation, bullying, alienation, harassment, victimisation

The Respondent submitted to the Court that certain allegations of penalisation, i.e. allegations of being intimidated, bullied, alienated, harassed, victimised were submitted out of time. The complaint to the Workplace Relations Commission did not refer to these allegations of penalisation. However, for the sake of completeness, the Court has considered the allegations.

The Court is satisfied that the meeting in the pub on 4thApril 2014 could not be held to be a protected disclosure to her employer or other responsible person within the meaning of Section 6 of the Act as there was such disclosure, it follows therefore that a complaint of penalisation could not be sustained in such circumstances. The telephone calls which the Complainant said she made to HIQA could come within the definition of protected disclosures, however, based on the evidence given by both sides, the Court is of the view that due to the conflicting evidence furnished it is not convinced that there is sufficient evidence to support the Complainant's allegations that she was treated in such an alleged manner following either the making of such calls or the 29thApril 2014 meeting. Accordingly, there is no basis to conclude that penalisation occurred as outlined above.

- (ii)Suspension from 20thJune to 7thNovember 2014

The Respondent in its submission and in evidence before the Court unequivocally denied the allegations relied upon by the Complainant in advancing her case in regard to penalisation when she was placed on suspension from 20thJune 2014 and again on 7thNovember 2014. The Court notes that the investigator's report was issued in its draft form and the parties were invited to make comments on it within four days.

The reference to malice in the report related to an allegation by the Complainant's colleagues regarding her motives in making complaints of abuse and wrongdoings. The draft report contained a recommendation to the Respondent to temporarily suspend the Complainant pending a further investigation into the allegations of malice. The Court finds that the Complainant's reporting of abuse and wrongdoings lead to the investigation being carried out, as a result of which the Complainant was placed on suspension on 20thJune 2014 on the day the draft report was circulated and before she had an opportunity to makes comments on its findings.

In her evidence to the Court Ms Larkin, a Care Assistant in the nursing home, said that when the Complainant was placed on suspension, she enquired of Matron when she would be returning to work. The Matron responded by saying "over my dead body will she be in this home again". In her evidence the Matron disputed this contention and said that the response she gave was that the Complainant was not on duty and she had no idea when she would be back. On this point, the Court has to determine whether it prefers the testimony of Ms Larkin or that of the Matron. Ms Larkin impressed the Court as a reliable witness who gave her evidence honestly and to the best of her ability. When taken in the context of the evidence as a whole,there was also a consistency in her testimony which coincided with evidence given in other aspects of the evidence adduced. For that reason, on balance, the Courthas come to the conclusion that the testimony of Ms Larkin was more reliable.

The Court notes that no investigation into the allegations of malice took place. Mr McGrath said that the reasons for not conducting such an investigation were related to advice he received from the Complainant's trade union representative in a letter dated 30thJune 2014, yet the Complainant continued on that suspension until 7thNovember 2014, when she was placed on further suspension for purported alternative reasons.

By letter dated 28thNovember 2014 the Respondent's legal representatives wrote to the Complainant's Solicitor's to inform them that that having taken the time to consider the matter the Complainant had "no case to answer" in respect to the matters outlined in the investigator's report and the matter was now at an end.

The question arises as to whether or not the Complainant would have been placed on suspension on 20thJune 2014 had it not been for the protected disclosure made to her employer on 29thApril 2014. In considering this question the Court must consider the motives which influenced the Respondent to place her on suspension at that time. While the Registered Provider advised the Court that HIQA would expect him to act on the investigator's recommendations, the Court is of the view that the suspension of the Complainant by the Registered Provider was influenced by the complaints made by her prior to and in the course of the investigation. The undue haste which the suspension was effected without giving the Complainant an opportunity to comment on the report (having been invited to do so) and before the final report was issued on 15thJuly 2014 reinforces the Court's view that there was a causal connection between the making of the complaints by the Complainant and her suspension. Finally, the comment made by the Matron to Ms Larkin is noteworthy in that it is illustrative of a mindset on the part of the Respondent towards the Complainant.

In such circumstances, the Court must find that the making of a protected disclosure to her employer was an operative reason for placing the Complainant on suspension from work for the period from 20thJune until 7thNovember 2014. The Court finds that the detriment giving rise to the complaint incurred because of, or in retaliation for, the disclosure of information related to the alleged abuse and alleged wrongdoings regarding patient care made by the Complainant on 29thApril 2014. For all of the forgoing reasons,the Court is satisfied that were it not for that complaint the Complainant would not have been placed on suspension.

- (iii)Suspension from 7thNovember 2014

Evidence was submitted to the Court by the Respondent to substantiate its position that the second period of suspension from 7thNovember 2014 was directly related to the Complainant's failure to furnish it with various pieces of documentation as required to comply with applicable legal and regulatory matters as outlined above. To this effect, the Complainant had received a number of letters between 15thAugust 2014 and 28thOctober 2014 giving her a warning that if she did not complete the forms she would be liable to be placed on suspension pending the outcome of a disciplinary meeting to be held on 14thNovember 2014.

Although there was communication between the Respondent and the Union on the issue, the Complainant did not deny that such documentation was not furnished in accordance with the Respondent's requirements as outlined above.

The Court finds the Complainant's suspension from work from 7th November 2014 was wholly unrelated to the protected disclosure made and that the Respondent was not motivated in doing so by the Complainant having committed a protected act.

Determination

For the reasons referred to herein the Court is satisfied that the Complainant was penalised when she was placed on suspension for the period from 20th June until 7th November 2014 for having committed a protected act under the Act. The Court orders the Respondent to pay her the sum of €17,500 in compensation for the detriment suffered.

Accordingly, the Court varies the Decision of the Adjudication Officer and the appeal is allowed in part.

The Court so Determines.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of Rights Commissioner's Decision R-137528-WT-13/GC and R-137529-WT-13/GC.

BACKGROUND:

2. The Worker appealed the Rights Commissioner's Decision to the Labour Court in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997 on the 1st May, 2014. The Court heard the appeal on the 25th June, 2014. The Employer was not present and was not represented at the hearing. The following is the Determination of the Court:

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Igor Mrzljak (hereafter the Claimant) against the decision of a Rights Commissioner in his claim against his former employer, Paris Bakery & Pastry Limited (hereafter the Respondent) under the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 (the Act).

Background

The Claimant was employed by the Respondent in his capacity as a waiter. His employment commenced on or about 16thApril 2013 and ended on or about 10thAugust 2013. The Claimant brought claims before a Rights Commissioner alleging contraventions of various provisions of the Act by the Respondent in relation to his employment. They included a claim that he was penalised by the Respondent contrary to s.26 of the Act. The Rights Commissioner found that the claims were well founded in part. In so far as is material for present purposes the Rights Commissioner found that the Claimant's claim of penalisation contrary to s.26 of the Act was not well- founded. It is against that aspect of the Rights Commissioner's decision that the Claimant appealed to this Court.

The Appeal

The Respondent did not appear and was not represented at the hearing of the appeal. The Court is satisfied that the Respondent was informed of the date time and place at which the appeal would be determined.

Sworn evidence was tendered by the Claimant, the substance of which was as follows.

According to the Claimant he commenced work at or about 11am on Saturday 10thAugust 2014. He expected to finish at 11pm that night. The Claimant worked alone in the restaurant area of the Respondent's premises on the night in question and he was so overworked that he was unable to take a break of any kind. He was not offered the opportunity to take a break and no assistance was made available to him. At or about 3pm on the day in question the proprietor of the Respondent entered the restaurant and spoke to the Claimant in demeaning and insulting language. The Claimant responded by informing the proprietor that he was working alone and did not receive a break at work. He informed the proprietor that he was entitled to receive a break.

According to the Claimant he was followed by the proprietor who then head-butted him without warning. He left the premises and did not return.

The Claimant reported the assault to the Gardai. He later confirmed his report in writing (a copy of which was put in evidence).

On these facts the Claimant contends that he was constructively dismissed by the Respondent for having opposed by lawful means an act which is unlawful under the Act, namely a requirement that he work for more than 4 hours and 30 minutes without a break.

Conclusions of the Court

Section 26 of the Act provides: -

- 26.—(1) An employer shall not penalise an employee for having in good faith opposed by lawful means an act which is unlawful under this Act.
  - (2) If a penalisation of an employee, in contravention of subsection (1), constitutes a dismissal of the employee within the meaning of the Unfair Dismissals Acts, 1977 to [2007], relief may not be granted to the employee in respect of that penalisation both under this Part and under those Acts.

The term "dismissal" is not defined by the Act. However, the reference in subsection (2) of s.26 of the Act to the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 to 2007 suggests that the term should be given the same meaning as it ascribed to it by those Acts.

Section 1 of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 -2007 defines dismissal as: -

- (a) the termination by his employer of the employee's contract of employment with the employer, whether prior notice of the termination was or was not given to the employee,

(b) the termination by the employee of his contract of employment with his employer, whether prior notice of the termination was or was not given to the employer, in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been entitled, or it was or would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment without giving prior notice of the termination to the employer, or

(c) the expiration of a contract of employment for a fixed term without its being renewed under the same contract or, in the case of a contract for a specified purpose (being a purpose of such a kind that the duration of the contract was limited but was, at the time of its making, incapable of precise ascertainment), the cesser of the purpose;

Paragraphs (b) and (c) of this definition are relevant in the instant case. Paragraph (b) applies where an employer behaves in a way that amounts to a repudiation of the contract of employment. It was described by Lord Denning M.R. inWestern Excavating (ECC) Ltd v Sharp[1978] I.R.L.R. 332 as follows:

- "If the employer is guilty of conduct which is a significant breach going to the root of the contract of employment, or which shows that the employer no longer intends to be bound by one or more of the essential terms of the contract, then the employee is entitled to treat himself discharged from any further performance".

Where an employer commits a repudiatory breach of contract the employee is entitled to accept the repudiation and consider him or herself dismissed. However, not every breach of contract will give rise to repudiation. It must be a breach of an essential term which goes to the root of the contract.

Paragraph (c) of the definition deals with a situation in which the employer conducts his or her affairs in relation to the employee, so unreasonably that the employee cannot fairly be expected to put up with it any longer. Thus, an employer's conduct may not amount to a breach of contract but could, nonetheless, be regarded as so unreasonable as to justify the employee in leaving there and then.

In this case the conduct of the proprietor of the Respondent in perpetrating a serious and unprovoked assault on the Claimant had the effect of undermining the duty of mutual trust and confidence which lies at the root of every contract of employment. It was also conduct that was so unreasonable that no employee could be expected to tolerate it any further. Consequently, whether by reference to paragraph (b) or paragraph (c) of the statutory definition the conduct of the Respondent constituted a dismissal of the Claimant.

The Court is fully satisfied on evidence that the Respondent's conduct a direct result of the Claimant's complaint at being required to work without being afforded the breaks to which he was lawfully entitled. Consequently, it amounted to penalisation within the statutory meaning of that term.

Determination

For the reasons set out above the Claimant is entitled to succeed in his appeal. The appropriate form of redress is an award of compensation. The Court measures the quantum of compensation that is fair and equitable in the circumstances at €10,000. The Respondent is directed to pay the Claimant compensation in that amount.

The decision of the Rights Commissioner is varied in terms of this Determination.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of Adjudication Officer's Decision No: ADJ-00000217

BACKGROUND:

2. The Complainant appealed the Decision of the Adjudication Officer to the Labour Court in accordance with Section 9(1) of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 to 2015 on 21 June 2016. A Labour Court hearing took place on 23 November 2016. The following is the Determination of the Court:

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Mr Emmanuel Ranchin against the decision of an Adjudication Officer under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 – 2015 in a claim of constructive dismissal by his employer Allianz Worldwide Care S.A. The Adjudication Officer held against him and found that he had voluntarily resigned his employment on 25th June 2015. Mr Ranchin appealed against that decision.

For ease of reference the parties are given the same designation as they had at first instance. Hence Mr Emmanuel Ranchin will be referred to as "the Complainant" and Allianz Worldwide Care S.A will be referred to as "the Respondent".

Background

The Complainant was employed as a Project Manager from May 2012, he tendered his resignation on 25th June 2015 and finished working on 31st July 2015. He had previously withdrawn his resignation which he tendered in February 2015. In an exit interview in July 2015 he informed management that the reason for his resignation was due to bullying by his manager. He referred his complaint to the Workplace Relations Commission on 15th October 2015.

Summary of The Complainant's Case

The Complainant alleged that up until the end of 2014 his work was highly rated as "Exceeds Expectations" however, that year he was rated as "Fully Meets Expectations", which was a lower level rating. He said that he tried to discuss this with his managers but was faced with a bullying nature from his direct line manager, who would not provide any constructive input, would not communicate vital information and treated him with passive aggressive contempt on a regular basis.

Later that year the Complainant said that after he had a one to one performance planning and review meeting with his direct line manager on 24th June 2015, where he was subjected to further bullying he resigned the following day. At the exit interview when he mentioned that he had been the subject of bullying, Management supplied him with a copy of its anti-bullying policy and he was invited to submit a formal complaint, which would be investigated. He submitted a formal complaint under the Respondent's Anti-Bullying Policy on 18th August 2015. He received a report on the outcome of the investigation in December 2015, which had been conducted in September 2015. He said that at no stage was he notified or approached by the Company for a submission or for feedback during the course of the investigation.

He submitted that the Company's attitude to suggestions, constructive engagement was always to talk down issues, brush them aside and ignore genuine concerns, treating them with promises that things would change, but these promises were not acted upon. Therefore he left his employment to focus on rebuilding his career.

Summary of The Respondent's Case

The Respondent submitted that the Complainant voluntarily resigned from the Company. It submitted that the Complainant raised the issue of bullying for the first time within the written exit interview form after he tendered his resignation. He was invited to make a formal complaint, an investigator was appointed. The Complainant's complaint was not upheld and the final investigation report was issued on 11th November 2015. It was not appealed.

The Respondent said that following the Complainant's 2014 rating under the PMAD performance rating system he spoke to Ms L, his direct line manager's superior, as he was unhappy with his rating. The rating did not change as a result of this discussion and the Complainant resigned on 24th February 2015. He was invited to re-consider his position and to submit a grievance if he wished, which he did. This was investigated but was not upheld. He was invited to appeal but declined, accepting that the grievance was handled in a fair and professional manner.

The Respondent said that it made a number of attempts to reconcile issue with the Complainant, to no avail and he tendered his resignation on 25th June 2015 and worked until 31st July 2015. In his resignation letter, he referred to his grievance complaint and said:-

"We all agreed on the 2014 rating itself and move on. All agreed also to keep engaging and talk through issues to promote a healthy working environment".

Prior to his resignation the Complainant was involved in meetings with management to work towards the goal of a "healthy working environment". However, the Respondent stated that this task was made difficult by his refusal to agree any performance targets for 2015. It submitted that even if the Complainant established that the Respondent had in some way acted unreasonably, the Complainant must still satisfy the second arm of the test for constructive dismissal and show that in tendering his resignation he also acted reasonably and that he exhausted the internal procedures available to him.

The Law

Section 1 of the Act defines constructive dismissal as follows:-

- "the termination by the employee of his contract of employment with his employer, whether prior notice of the termination was or was not given to the employer, in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been entitled, or it was or would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment without giving prior notice of the termination to the employer"

Section 6(1) of the Act states

- 6.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an unfair dismissal unless, having regard to all the circumstances, there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal.

Issues for the Court

As the Complainant is alleging constructive dismissal therefore the fact of dismissal is in dispute, the onus of proof rests with the Complainant to establish facts to prove that the actions of the Respondent were such as to justify him terminating his employment.

Section 1 of the Act envisages two circumstances in which a resignation may be considered a constructive dismissal. This arises where the employer's conduct amounts to a repudiatory breach of the contract of employment and in such circumstances the employee would be "entitled" to resign his position, often referred to as the "contract test". This requires that an employer be"guilty of conduct which is a significant breach going to the root of the contract of employment, or which shows that the employer no longer intends to be bound by one or more of the essential terms of the contract, then the employee is entitled to treat himself as discharged from any further performance"as held in Western Excavating (ECC) Ltd v Sharp [1978] IRL 332.

Secondly, there is an additional reasonableness test which may be relied upon as either an alternative to the contract test or in combination with that test.This test asks whether the employer conducted his or her affairs in relation to the employee so unreasonably that the employee cannot fairly be expected to put up with it any longer,if so he is justified in leaving.

The question for the Court to decide is whether, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been entitled, or it was or would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment.

In this case the Complainant resigned his position by letter dated 25thJune 2015. In his submission the Complainant stated that instead of giving his three months' contractual notice, he gave four weeks' notice:-"having been through a grievance process in March 2015, following disagreement over my 2014 year end appraisal and with the manner in which my manager was behaving .....I had no intention of giving the company more than 4 weeks".

While the Complainant's resignation letter dated 25thJune 2015 is long and detailed, he at no point stated that he was being bullied. Neither was bullying mentioned in a letter sent to the Respondent by his Solicitor dated 24thJuly 2015, prior to his departure from the Company. He made no complaint of bullying; he did not seek to invoke the Respondent's Dignity at Work Policy. The Complainant's resignation letter outlined the difficulties he encountered at the one-to-one PMAD monthly meeting held the day before, when his direct line manager asked him"how do you think you are managing your projects".He said that she followed this remark by informing him of complaints which had been raised about him. He found her demeanour passive aggressive and said that he felt incapable of doing his work properly and his self-confidence was gone. Consequently he was now calling a halt to all this. He said that he could go on but it was best for him"just give up".

The Court notes that the letter of resignation discloses no allegation of bullying. Instead it conveys the Complainant's dissatisfaction with (i) his performance rating at the end of 2014; (ii) the one-to-one performance meeting held with his line manager the day before and (iii) generally with his working conditions, whereby his project sponsor had not been replaced since April 2015, no decision making by management, weekly reports unread, formats and structure constantly changing.

Following the tendering of his resignation he informed the Respondent that the reason he resigned was due to the bullying he encountered by his line manager. At the conclusion of his exit interview he said"I can honestly say I am very sad that the bullying situation I found myself entangled with could not be addressed and that the only option left for me was to resign..... I will now be seeking legal advice regarding next steps."

The Complainant in his evidence to the Court accepted that he did not invoke the Respondent's Dignity at Work Policy prior to his resignation. He accepted that he was aware that such a policy existed and that he had been supplied with a copy of the policy at his induction. When he formally notified the Respondent of such an allegation having tendered his resignation, he was informed how to progress such a complaint through the policy, the Respondent followed up on his complaint, carried out an investigation and issued a report to him.

Findings of the Court

In reaching its conclusion the Court has taken account of the written submission of the parties and has had full regard to the evidence adduced in the course of the appeal. The net issues for consideration is whether the Complainant's employment came to an end in circumstances of dismissal within the meaning of the statutory definition of that term contained at section 1(1)(b) of the act.

The Court notes that having raised a formal grievance regarding his performance rating in February 2015 the matter was dealt with through the Respondent's Grievance Procedures. At that time he received notification of his performance rating and as he was dissatisfied with the rating given to him, he tendered his resignation on 24thFebruary 2015. The Respondent then engaged in discussions with him in an effort to resolve matters. He then rescinded his resignation and raised a formal grievance which was investigated in accordance with the Respondent's Grievance Procedure. He expressed satisfaction with the process stating that it was professional and fair, despite the fact that it did not result in an outcome in his favour and he revoked his resignation at that time. Furthermore, he agreed to move on and to engage in a process at the time to address his concerns, to move forward and to embark on the task of building a positive work environment. The Respondent told the Court that every effort was made to address the Complainant's concerns however; this task was made more difficult by his refusal to agree any performance targets for 2015.

Evidence was given to the Court from the Head of Marketing and from the Head of HR. They both told the Court that meetings were held with the Complainant in an effort to address his work related concerns and he was invited to consider alternative roles if he was unhappy in his present role.

In constructive dismissal cases, the Court must examine the conduct of both parties. In normal circumstances a complainant who seeks to invoke the reasonableness test in furtherance of such a claim must also act reasonably by providing the employer with an opportunity to address whatever grievance they may have. They must demonstrate that they have pursued their grievance through the procedures laid down in the contract of employment before taking the step to resign:Conway v Ulster Bank LimitedUDA474/1981.

The Complainant told the Court that he accepted that he did not raise a grievance with the Respondent prior to tendering his resignation in June 2015, he accepted that this was one last resort he could have invoked however, he decided not to as he said that he did not have faith in the Respondent dealing with his grievances or bullying allegations. Furthermore, if he reported it to the Respondent, he said that he felt that he could not continue to work alongside the person he was accusing of bullying while the matter was being investigated.

The Court finds it difficult to accept as valid that he had no faith in the Respondent's ability to deal with his grievances and/or allegation of bullying as he had already invoked the Respondent's Grievance Procedure only a few months earlier. He described that process as positive and professionally conducted and he was willing to try to move on in the aftermath of that process. The Court cannot accept that the Complainant's grievances could not have been dealt with in a similar manner in June 2015. InBeatty v Bayside SupermarketsUD142/1987, in referring to the existence of grievance procedures in a company the Employment Appeals Tribunal held:-

- "The Tribunal considers that it is reasonable to expect that the procedures laid down in such agreements be substantially followed in appropriate cases by employer and employee as the case may be, this is the view expressed and followed by the Tribunal in Conway v Ulster Bank Limited 475/1981. In this case the Tribunal considers that the procedure was not followed by the claimant and that it was unreasonable of him not to do so. Accordingly we consider that applying the test of reasonableness to the claimant's resignation he was not constructively dismissed".

On the other hand inAllen v Independent Newspapers (Ireland) Limited[2002] ELR 84 the Employment Appeals Tribunal held that it was not unreasonable in the circumstances for the complainant not to have faith in the employer's ability to properly or effectively address her grievances. However, in the instant case, the Court is not satisfied that there were factors present which might excuse the Complainant's failure to formally complain to the Respondent before resigning. The Respondent had a grievance procedure in place; the Complainant was aware of it and had used it only a few months earlier, and found it a fair process. As a result of that latter process every effort was being made by management with his cooperation to move forward and to embark on the task of building a positive work environment.

The Court is of the view that the Respondent cannot be deemed to have failed to take steps to remedy a situation where the Complainant raised no grievance and in such circumstances his work related concerns cannot be converted into the "conduct of the employer" such as to render it impossible for him to continue in employment and be used to ground a complaint of constructive dismissal within the meaning of the Act.

Determination

In all the circumstances, the Court cannot find that the Respondent's conduct was unreasonable or could justify the Complainant's terminating his employment by way of constructive dismissal nor was it such as to show that it no longer intended to be bound by one or more of the essential terms of his contract of employment.

The Court determines that the Complainant's complaint is not well founded. The appeal is rejected. The decision of the Adjudication Officer is affirmed.

The Court so Determines.

SUBJECT:

1. Unfair Dismissal.

BACKGROUND:

2. The case concerns a claim by the Claimant that he was unfairly dismissed.

The Employer's said it was entitled to dismiss the Claimant during his probationary period by the giving of notice to that effect, as provided for in his contract of employment.

The Claimant referred this dispute to the Labour Court on the 13th August 2018 in accordance with Section 20(1) of the Industrial Relations Act, 1969 and agreed to be bound by the Court's Recommendation.

A Labour Court hearing took place on the 28th September 2018.

WORKER'S ARGUMENTS:

3. 1. The Claimant said he was headhunted by the Employer to accept a role as General Manager of the Hotel.

2. He moved from Dublin to Kenmare to take up the role in January 2018.

3. He was dismissed without warning on 27th April 2018 by the Managing Director.

EMPLOYER'S ARGUMENTS:

4. 1. The Employer disputed that the Complainant had been headhunted.

2. The Managing Director was entitled to dismiss the Claimant.

3. The contract of employment unequivocally provides that either party can terminate the contract by giving written notice during the probationary period.

RECOMMENDATION:

The matter before the Court was brought under Section 20(1) of the Industrial Relations Act 1969 and concerns a claim of unfair dismissal.

The Claimant alleged that he was headhunted by the Respondent to accept a role as General Manager of the Hotel. He said that following negotiations on his terms and conditions of employment he moved from Dublin to Kenmare and commenced in the role on 29thJanuary 2018. The Claimant maintained that he was dismissed without warning on 27thApril 2018 when the Managing Director called him to a meeting and informed him that"this was not working out"and asked him to leave with immediate effect.

The Respondent did not appear before the Court, however, it was represented by its legal representatives, who disputed that the Claimant had been headhunted. The Respondent's Solicitor submitted that the Respondent was entitled to dismiss the Claimant during his probationary period by the giving of notice to that effect, as provided for in his contract of employment.

The Court has given careful consideration to the submissions of both parties. The Court notes that the Claimant was furnished with a 36-month fixed term contract, which provided that"All dismissals will be carried out in accordance with the Provisions of Part Two of this Contract".Part Two of the contract outlines the disciplinary procedures, which includes:- the carrying out a full investigation before dismissal; being informed of the reasons for the dismissal; the right to reply; the right to be accompanied at meetings and the right to appeal a decision to dismiss.

Having considered the positions of both sides, the Court is of the view that the procedures adopted in the termination of the Claimant's employment were seriously flawed. He was not afforded fair procedures in accordance with the Code of Practice on Grievance and Disciplinary Procedures S.I. No. 146 of 2000.

Where an employee is considered unsuitable for permanent employment, the Court accepts that an employer has the right, during a probationary period, to decide not to retain that employee in employment. However, the Court takes the view that this can only be carried out where the employer adheres strictly to fair procedures.

In the particular circumstances of this case, there is no reason to doubt the Claimant's assertion that his reputation was seriously damaged by the actions of the Respondent. The Court has consistently held the view that it is imperative that an employer in a dismissal case must not only show that there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal but also that fair and proper procedures were followed before the dismissal takes place. This requirement of procedural fairness is rooted in the common law concept of natural justice.

The Court is satisfied that the Claimant was not provided with details of any performance issues; no warning was given that his employment was in jeopardy; he was not afforded the right to representation; he was not provided with reasons for his dismissal and he was not afforded an opportunity to reply. Therefore, the Court is satisfied that he was denied natural justice.

In all the circumstances of this case and bearing in mind the level of remuneration the Claimant was earning, the Court recommends that the Respondent should compensate the Claimant by the payment of €90,000.00 to be accepted in full and final settlement of the claim.

The Court so Recommends.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of Adjudication Officer Decision No et-154650-ee-15/FP.

BACKGROUND:

2. On the 21 January 2016 the Employer referred the dispute to the Labour Court in accordance with Section 77 (12) of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011 as amended. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 9 June 2016. The following is the Determination of the Court:

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Salesforce.com (the Respondent) against the decision of an Adjudication Officer to grant Ms Alli Leech (the Complainant) an extension of time in which to initiate her claim that the Respondent discriminated against her contrary to the Employment Equality Acts 1998-2015 (the Act)

The appeal is before the Court under s.77(12) of the Act. Consequently the only issue for determination by the Court is whether the Adjudication Officer was correct in granting an extension of time.

The substantive claim to which this application relates was presented to the Equality Tribunal on 18thFebruary 2015. The Complainant gave the date of the most recent occurrence of the discrimination alleged as 19thFebruary 2014. Hence, if that was the date of the occurrence of the event, or the omission, giving rise to the claim, the six-month time limit prescribed s.77(5)(a) of the Acts expired on 18thAugust 2014.

Section 77(5)(b) of the Act provides, in effect, that the time for presenting a claim under the Act may be extended for reasonable cause shown for a period up to but not exceeding 12 months from the date of the occurrence of the event giving rise to the claim. That 12 month extended period, assuming that time started to run from 19thFebruary 2014, would have expired on 18thFebruary 2015, the day the claim was presented.

Background

The Complainant alleges discrimination relating to a promotional opportunity.

The Complainant was pregnant from February to November 2014 and stated to the Court in evidence that issues associated with her pregnancy were such that on medical advice she sought at all times to avoid stressful situations. She stated to the Court that initiating a complaint with the Equality Tribunal would be a stressful situation which she sought to avoid.

The Complainant stated to the Court in evidence, and provided a medical document to support that evidence, that within 10 days of the birth of her child in November 2014 she fractured her wrist and was placed on an opioid medicine.

The Complainant attended for work throughout the period from February 2014 to the commencement of her statutory period of maternity leave on 29thSeptember 2014. During that period she made a grievance complaint to the Respondent on 25thMarch 2014 alleging discrimination arising from the events which form the basis for the within complaint. That grievance was processed internally within the Respondent company and the Complainant was found to have made out her case. That process concluded in May 2014.

The Legal Principles

The issue arising in this appeal is whether reasonable cause has been shown for an extension of time.

The established test for deciding if an extension should be granted for reasonable cause shown is that formulated by this Court in Labour Court Determination DWT0338CementationSkanska (Formerly Kvaerner Cementation) v Carroll. Here the test was set out in the following terms: -

- It is the Court's view that in considering if reasonable cause exists, it is for the claimant to show that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford an excuse for the delay. The explanation must be reasonable, that is to say it must make sense, be agreeable to reason and not be irrational or absurd. In the context in which the expression reasonable cause appears in the statute it suggests an objective standard, but it must be applied to the facts and circumstances known to the claimant at the material time. The claimant's failure to present the claim within the six-month time limit must have been due to the reasonable cause relied upon. Hence there must be a causal link between the circumstances cited and the delay and the claimant should satisfy the Court, as a matter of probability, that had those circumstances not been present he would have initiated the claim in time.

In that case, and in subsequent cases in which this question arose, the Court adopted an approach analogous to that taken by the Superior Courts in considering whether time should enlarged for 'good reason' in judicial review proceedings pursuant to Order 84, Rule 21 of the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986,. That approach was held to be correct by the High Court inMinister for Finance v CPSU & Ors[2007] 18 ELR 36.

The test formulated inCementationSkanska (Formerly Kvaerner Cementation) v Carrolldraws heavily on the decision of the High Court inDonal O'Donnell and Catherine O'Donnell v Dun Laoghaire Corporation[1991] ILRM 30. Here Costello Costello J. (as he then was) stated as follows:

- -The phrase 'good reasons' is one of wide import which it would be futile to attempt to define precisely. However, in considering whether or not there are good reasons for extending the time I think it is clear that the test must be an objective one and the court should not extend the time merely because an aggrieved plaintiff believed that he or she was justified in delaying the institution of proceedings. What the plaintiff has to show (and I think the onus under O. 84 r. 21 is on the plaintiff) is that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford a justifiable excuse for the delay.

It clear from the authorities that the test places the onus on the applicant for an extension of time to identify the reason for the delay and to establish that the reason relied upon provides a justifiable excuse for the actual delay. Secondly, the onus is on the applicant to establish a causal connection between the reason proffered for the delay and his or her failure to present the complaint in time. Thirdly, the Court must be satisfied, as a matter of probability, that the complaint would have been presented the complaint in time were it not for the intervention of the factors relied upon as constituting reasonable cause. It is the actual delay that must be explained and justified. Hence, if the factors relied upon to explain the delay ceased to operate before the complaint was presented, that may undermine a claim that those factors were the actual cause of the delay. Finally, while the established test imposes a relatively low threshold of reasonableness on an applicant, there is some limitation on the range of issues which can be taken into account. In particular, as was pointed out by Costello J in the passage quoted above, a Court should not extend a statutory time limit merely because the applicant subjectively believed that he or she was justified in delaying the institution of proceedings.

The Factors Relied Upon

The Complainant gave oral evidence concerning medical issues arising during her pregnancy. She supplied medical documents which outlined the nature of her interaction with her GP Service throughout the period of her pregnancy and up to 28thNovember 2014. In addition the Complainant supplied medical documentation recording the dates of her interaction with her Consultant throughout her pregnancy together with a medical note describing a visit by her to a hospital in April 2015.

The Complainant told the Court that in April or May of 2014 a Doctor in her GP Service advised her to avoid stressful situations during her pregnancy. She told the Court that on the basis of that advice she decided not to make a complaint to the Equality Tribunal until after the birth of her child.

The Complainant told the Court that consequent upon her breaking her wrist within ten days of the birth of her child she was placed on morphine by her doctor in late November 2014 and that as a result she was not in a position to make a complaint to the Equality Tribunal until 18thFebruary 2015.

It was the Complainant's evidence that during the period following the incident in February 2014 she always intended to make a complaint outside the respondent Company but refrained from doing so initially on the basis of the advice given to her by a Doctor in her GP service in April or May 2014 and ultimately as a result of the implications of her sustaining a wrist injury in November 2014.

Conclusion

The Court has applied the test formulated inCementation Skanska (Formerly Kvaerner Cementation) v CarrollDWT0338 to the Complainant's explanation for the delay in instituting the within complaint.

The Court notes that no medical evidence has been supplied which supports the contention that a Doctor in the Complainant's GP Service advised her in April or May 2014 to avoid stressful situations. In fact the evidence presented to the Court,which the Complainant told the Court was a comprehensive record of her attendance at her GP service during her pregnancy, does not record any visit by the Complainant to her GP service in April or May 2014. Neither does the medical information supplied to the Court make any reference after March 2014 to stress related concerns.

The Court has been supplied with medical evidence dated November 2014 confirming that the Complainant had been prescribed an opioid product. No independent medical evidence has been supplied to explain how that prescription affected the Complainant's capacity to make a complaint to the Equality Tribunal between November 2014 and 18thFebruary 2015.

In considering this appeal, the Court should ask itself if a reasonably diligent person, in the same circumstances as the Complainant and having the same state of knowledge of the material facts, would have delayed in pursuing a claim under the Act for the reasons advanced by her. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case the Court has concluded that it must answer that question in the negative.

The Court accepts that the Complainant was pregnant from February 2014 to November 2014. However no clear evidence has been presented to the Court to support the contention that the Complainant's medical advice during her pregnancy was such as to cause her to refrain from making a complaint to the Equality Tribunal in that period. Neither does the Court accept that the making of such a complaint could reasonably be seen to be significantly more stressful than the making of the internal complaint which was made and processed between March and May 2014. `

The Court also accepts that the Complainant suffered a serious wrist break in November 2014. The Court has not been provided with medical evidence to support the contention that the nature of the treatment of the Complainant's wrist injury was such as to justify a delay of approximately three months in making a complaint to the Tribunal from November 2014 to 19th February 2015.

Outcome

For all of the reasons referred to herein and based on the evidence before it, the Court has concluded that the Complainant has failed to establish a causal connection between the factors relied upon by her and the delay in presenting the within claim. Accordingly the Court must hold that the Complainant has failed to adequately explain the delay and provide a justifiable excuse for the delay. It follows that the Court cannot uphold the decision of the Adjudication Officer, which it must set aside.

Disposal

The appeal is allowed and the decision of the Adjudication Officer is set aside and substituted with this Determination.

Signed on behalf of the Labour Court

Kevin Foley

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal Of Adjudication Officer Decision No ADJ-00006952

BACKGROUND:

2. This is an appeal of an Adjudication Officer's Decision made pursuant to Section 7(1) of the Payment of Wages Act 1991. The appeal was heard by the Labour Court on the 31 October, 2017 in accordance with Section 44 of the Workplace Relations Act 2015. The following is the Court's Determination:

DETERMINATION:

Determination

This is an appeal by Bord Gais Energy Ltd against an Adjudication Officer's Decision ADJ-00006952 given under the Payment of Wages Act 1991(the Act) in a claim by Mr Thomas that he suffered an unlawful deduction from his wages when he was not paid his 2016 bonus. The Adjudication Officer found in favour of the workers claim and directed that the Bonus be paid as soon as is practicable.

In this Determination the parties are referred to as they were at first instance. Hence Bord Gais is referred to as the 'Respondent' and Mr Thomas as 'the Complainant'.

Background

The Complainant is a former employee of the Respondent. He ceased employment with them on 6th January 2017. The Respondent operates a Performance Related Award (PRA) scheme and any payments arising from that scheme are normally paid in the February following the year under assessment. One of the requirements of the scheme is that in order to receive an award you must still be in employment on the date that payment is to be made. The date of payment can vary because the scheme includes a number of factors such as corporate performance and business unit performance. The payments in previous years have been made in mid-February or early March. The complainant believes that excluding people who have resigned from receiving a payment is unfair and discriminatory particularly as pro rata payments are made to people who retire or commence work during a review period. The Complainant worked for the full year of the review January 2016- December 2016. He left the employment in January 2017 and therefore did not receive any payment under the PRA scheme

Complainant's case

The Complainant's case is that he is entitled to the bonus for 2016 and that the non- payment of same by the Respondent was an illegal deduction from his wage and a breach of the Act. The scheme allows for payment to workers who retire, or are on long term sick leave on a pro rata basis and the same formula should apply to a worker who resigns. He believes that clause 61 of the "Bord Gais Introduction of a Market Bases Reward Model FAQ's" is unfair and discriminatory.

The Complainant also argued that the respondent did not fully comply with the scheme themselves when they asked him and the rest of his business unit to write their objectives retrospectively therefore they have the flexibility to deviate from the scheme if they want.

Respondent's case

The Complainant has been with the company for a number of years and during that period he was promoted on a number of occasions. On each occasion he was promoted it was a contractual requirement that he participate in the PRA scheme. It is not disputed by the Complainant that he was familiar with the requirements of the scheme. Therefore he would have known when he handed in his notice with a termination date in early January that he would not qualify for the PRA payment even though his performance was assessed for that period.

It is the respondent's position that the Complainant's contract clearly states that payment of the PRA is solely at the discretion of the company and is dependent on compliance with the criteria established by the Company. The requirement to be still in employment at the time of payment of award is one such criteria.

The Respondent in support of their argument citedSullivan v Department of Education [1998] 9 E.L.R. 217where "payable" was defined to mean "properly payable" and argues that the PRA only became properly payable if you were still in employment at the time of payment or were covered by one of the exemptions in the scheme.

They distinguished this case from the case ofCleary & Ors v B&Q LTD [2-16] 27 ELR 121on the basis that the respondent in that case was relying on a general variation clause. Whereas in this case the Complainant did not meet one of the criteria of the scheme.

The applicable law

Section 5 of the Payment of Wage Act 1991 deals with regulation of certain deductions made and payments received by employers, section5(6) states;

- "Where—
  - (a) the total amount of any wages that are paid on any occasion by an employer to an employee is less than the total amount of wages that is properly payable by him to the employee on that occasion (after making any deductions therefrom that fall to be made and are in accordance with this Act), or
    (b) [....]

then, except in so far as the deficiency or non-payment is attributable to an error of computation, the amount of the deficiency or non-payment shall be treated as a deduction made by the employer from the wages of the employee on the occasion".

Discussion

There was no dispute on the facts of this case. Both parties accepted that one of the criteria attaching to the PRA scheme was, that to benefit you must be in employment at the payment date. Nor was it disputed that the Complainant's contract set out the circumstances in which the PRA became payable including the following phrase "...your eligibility for such a PRA payment in any year shall be considered and determined in accordance with the criteria established by the company".

The question that arises is whether, or not the PRA payment was properly payable to the complainant. In considering that question the Court places considerable weight on the fact that the complainants contract sets out the eligibility requirements for payment of the PRA and that the Complainant confirmed in evidence that he was aware that one of the criteria of the scheme required that he be in employment on the date of payment.

Conclusion

In all the circumstances of this case and on the evidence before it the Court is satisfied that the Complainant did not meet the criteria to be eligible for a payment under the scheme. Therefore, the bonus arising from the PRA scheme was not "properly payable" and no contravention of the Act occurred.

Finding

The within appeal is allowed and the decision of the Adjudicator is set aside.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal Against Rights Commissioner Decision R-141336-Wt-13/Rg & R-140684-Wt-13/Rg

BACKGROUND:

2. The Worker appealed the Rights Commissioner's Decision to the Labour Court on 23rd July, 2014. A Labour Court Hearing took place on 4th September, 2014. The following is the Labour Court's Determination:

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Tomas Valent (hereafter the Claimant) against the decision of a Rights Commissioner in his claim under the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 against his employer, Viking Security Limited (hereafter the Respondent).

While other matter were before the Rights Commissioner the only point pursued in the appeal relates to the findings of the Rights Commissioner in relation to Claimant's contractual obligation to work on Sundays and whether his rate of pay took that obligation into account.

The Claimant commenced employment with the Respondent on or about 27thSeptember 2012 and he remains in that employment.

The Complaint

In effect, the Claimant contends that the Respondent contravened s.14(1) of the Act in relation to his employment. That Section provides: -

- 14.—(1) An employee who is required to work on a Sunday (and the fact of his or her having to work on that day has not otherwise been taken account of in the determination of his or her pay) shall be compensated by his or her employer for being required so to work by the following means, namely—
  - (a) by the payment to the employee of an allowance of such an amount as is reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, or(b) by otherwise increasing the employee's rate of pay by such an amount as is reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, or(c) by granting the employee such paid time off from work as is reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, or(d) by a combination of two or more of the means referred to in the preceding paragraphs.

The Claimant is paid a rate of €10.00 per hour for all hours worked. He is regularly required to work on Sundays. He does not receive additional payments when he works on a Sunday, for which he was paid €10.01 per hour.

Position of the Parties

The Respondent contends that the obligation to work on a Sunday was taken into account in the determination of the Claimant's rate of pay. The Court was referred to a document entitled" Viking Security Limited Terms of Employment Security Personnel". In relevant part this document provides as follows: -

- SalaryYour salary will be based on agreed rates or future rates if any set out by the Security Industry Joint Labour Committee. Employees who work on Sunday or unsocial hours will be paid a premium as set out by the Security Industry Joint Labour Committee if applicable. Viking Security will comply fully with any directive set out by the Security Industry Joint Labour Committee, a copy of which is posted on our company board. Currently agreed salaries are above the minimum wage and incorporate a Sunday premium.

The Respondent relies on this document as evidence that the rate of €10.00 paid to the Claimant takes account of his obligation to work on Sundays.

The Claimant told the Court in sworn evidence that the only document in relation to his conditions of employment that he received at the commencement of his employment was one headed "Letter of Engagement". This document, in relevant part, provides as follows: -

- I the undersigned understand that as and from my commencement of employment as a Security Officer I will be paid €10.00 per hour. I have read and fully understand my conditions of employment

It was the Claimant's evidence that he requested copies of his conditions of employment on several occasions but it was only in November 2013 that the document relied upon by the Respondent was furnished to him.

It was submitted on behalf of the Claimant that the only document that he received at the commencement of his employment was the Letter of Engagement which merely specified his rate of pay and made no reference to an obligation to work on Sundays or to payment for working on Sundays.

Discussion

Section 14(1) of the Act provides, in effect, that an employee who is required to work on a Sunday is entitled to an additional benefit in respect of that requirement where "the fact of his or her having to work on that day has not otherwise been taken account of in the determination of his or her pay".What is intended by this provision is that a worker who is obliged to work on a Sunday is entitled to compensation for that obligation in the form of a benefit which he or she would not receive it they were not so obligated. As is clear from the opening words of s.14(1), in brackets, that compensation can take the form of an enhanced rate of pay over and above that which he or she would have received if the obligation to work on Sunday was not present. Not only must an additional benefit be provided but that benefit must be reasonable in all the circumstances. That entitlement is one of substance which a Rights Commissioner, and this Court on appeal, is obliged to vindicate.

The Court is aware from its own knowledge and experience that the normal mode of compliance with s.14(1), in the case of hourly paid workers, is to pay a premium on the basic rate in respect of each Sunday worked. Indeed, in the security sector that was the mode of compliance historically prescribed in the Employment Regulation Order for the sector before the statutory basis upon which those Orders were made was rendered void following the decision of the High Court inJohn Grace Fried Chicken Ltd v Catering JLC & Ors[2011] 3 IR 211. It remains the normal mode of compliance for those employees of the Respondent whose contracts of employment were concluded before the High Court delivered judgment in that case.

The decision inJohn Grace Fried Chicken Ltd v Catering JLC & Orsdid not impact on the entitlement of workers previously covered by Employment Regulation Orders to the benefit of s.14(1) of the Act. But it allowed for a mode of compliance other than the payment of a premium for work actually performed on a Sunday.

The question that arises in this case is whether the requirement to work on Sunday was taken into account in determining the Claimant hourly rate of €10.00. That rate was unilaterally determined by the employer and it is for the employer to show that at the time of its determination it contained an element intended to compensate the employee for the requirement to work on Sunday. In the Court's view it is insufficient for the employer to simply say (as the Respondent does in this case) that because the rate exceeds the national minimum wage it compensates for Sunday working. If such a contention were to be accepted the effectiveness of the statutory provision would be seriously undermined in the case of all workers whose pay exceeds the statutory minimum.

In practice the Court can only be satisfied that an employee has obtained his or her entitlement under s.14(1) of the Act where the element of compensation for the obligation to work on Sundays is clearly discernable from the contract of employment or from the circumstances surrounding its conclusion. Where an hourly rate is intended to reflect a requirement for Sunday working that should be identified and clearly and unequivocally specified at the time the contract of employment is concluded either in the contract itself or in the course of negotiations.

In this case the Claimant gave sworn evidence that he only received the document relied upon by the Respondent containing a statement to the effect that his rate of pay took account of the obligation to work on Sunday in November 2013, over 12 months after his employment commenced. The document that he received and signed on the commencement of his employment did not mention the obligation to work on Sunday nor did it indicate in any way that his rate of pay reflected such an obligation. It was also accepted that the computation of the rate was neither explained to the Claimant nor discussed with him in the course of negotiations prior to the conclusion of his contract of employment. Moreover, no evidence was proffered to show that a rate of €10.00 per hour exceeds the rate generally applicable to Security Officers who do not work on Sundays in this or other employments within the sector.

Conclusion

For all of the reasons set out herein the Court does not accept that the Respondent has complied with s.14(1) of the Act in relation to the Claimant. Accordingly, the Claimant is entitled to succeed in this appeal.

In the course of his evidence the representative of the Respondent accepted that following the striking down of the ERO for the sector certain employers (excluding the Respondent) entered into a collective agreement with a trade union representing workers in the sector which provided, in effect, for a Sunday premium of time-plus-one-third. Section 14(3) of the Act obliges the Court to have regard to any such collective agreement in determining the value or minimum value of compensation for Sunday working that is reasonable in all the circumstances.

The Court measures the level of compensation for working on Sundays that is reasonable in all the circumstances at time-plus-one-third for each hour worked on a Sunday. The Respondent is directed to pay the Claimant a premium in that amount. Having regard to the time limit specified in s.27 of the Act, the Respondent is further directed to pay the Claimant arrears of Sunday premium, so calculated, for each Sunday on which he worked in the six months prior to the date on which the within claim was presented to the Rights Commissioner.

The appeal is allowed and the decision of the Rights Commissioner is substituted with the terms of this Determination.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal against Rights Commissioner's Decision WT6732/01/MR.

BACKGROUND:

2. The worker claims that he had not received holiday pay or public holiday pay in respect of the bulk of his employment and that the Company is in breach of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. The Company claims that the worker had been paid holiday pay and public holiday pay under revised contracts of employment which applied from 1st January 2001 onwards.

The worker referred a claim to the Rights Commissioner service on the 13th October, 2001. The reason for the worker's failure to formally submit a complaint within the period required by Section 27 sub-section 4 of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997 was because he genuinely believed that this employer would recognise and honour the workers entitlements to paid annual leave and paid public holiday leave as provided for under Section 20 and 21 of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997, once the outcome of Labour Court appeal was known in the case of determination number DWT017. The worker regarded that case to be a test case and believed that the outcome if successful from the workers point of view would be honoured by the employer.

A Rights Commissioner's hearing took place on the 9th April, 2003 and his decision was issued on the 28th April, 2003 as follows:

"In accordance with Section 27 of the Act, I hereby declare that this complaint is out of time."

The worker appealed the Rights Commissioner's Decision on the 6th June, 2003, in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. The Company claims that if the worker case is based on the outcome of determination DWT017 dated 31st January, 2001, than time should run from that date. On that basis the Company submit that the worker's claim is statute barred. A Labour Court hearing took place on 1st June, 2004. The following is the Court's Determination:

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by the worker against the decision of the Rights Commissioner in WT6732/01/MR who found that the complaint under the Organisation of Working Time Act was out of time in accordance with Section 27 of the Act.

Counsel for the appellant submitted a case concerning the company's failure to comply the following provisions of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997:

(a) Sections 19, 20 and 21 dealing with an employee's entitlement to pay annual leave as well as an employee's entitlement in respect of public holidays.

(b) Section 14 which deals with Sunday work.

(c) Section 15 dealing with weekly working hours.

(d) Counsel also stated that the employer has failed to comply with and honour the terms of Programme for Prosperity and Fairness (PPF) by failing to make the appropriate pay awards to the employee as recommended under the terms of the programme during the time the employee was employed by the employer.The Court pointed out to Counsel that other than (a) these matters were not the subject of the Rights Commissioner's recommendation and could not therefore be the subject of a Labour Court appeal. Furthermore, a failure to honour the terms of the PPF is not a matter within the remit of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. Consequently, the Court will only deal with item (a).

In this case the respondent contended that the complaint was presented out of time and is therefore statute barred. It submitted that the six months period provided by section 27 (4) of the Act, begins to run on the 31st day of January 2001, being the date that the Labour Court issued Determination DWT017. Alternatively, if the annual leave period, as defined by section 2 (i) of the Act as 1st April, is taken to mean the 31st March 2001, then the claim may begin to run from that date and consequently the claim of the appellant is also statute barred.

The claimant in this case was employed by the respondent from 1st November 1998 until 28th September 2001. In common with other employees of the respondent he was initially employed on a contract of employment, which purported to incorporate an element into his basic pay to cover payment in respect of annual leave and public holidays. On or about January 2000 an employee of the respondent, Mr. Martin Tracey, referred a complaint to a Rights Commissioner, pursuant to section 27 of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 (the Act), in which he sought to challenge the validity of these arrangements.

By a decision dated 14th April 2000, the Rights Commissioner held with the claimant in that case and directed that he be paid in respect of the relevant periods of annual leave and public holidays. The respondent appealed that decision to the Court. By Determination DWT017, issued on 31st January 2001, the Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the decision of the Rights Commissioner. In that Determination, the Court held,inter alia, that the impugned contractual term was rendered void by the combined effect of section 37 of the Act and Article 7(2) of Directive 93/104/EC on the Organisation of Working Time.

On April 2001 the respondent issued amended contracts of employment to its employees which conformed to the requirements of the Act in respect to holiday entitlements. However, the amended terms were expressly limited in their application to the period from the 1st January 2001 onwards. The contract did provide that the leave year for the purpose of granting leave would be the period specified in section 2(1) of the Act, namely, a period commencing on 1st April in any year and terminating on 31st March in the following year.

The claimant's employment with the respondent terminated on 28th September 2001. On 24th October 2001, he presented a complaint to a Rights Commissioner pursuant to section 27 of the Act claiming redress in respect of alleged infringements of his statutory rights in relation to annual leave and public holidays. The complaint was heard by the Rights Commissioner on 9th April 2003.

The Scope of the Complaint.

The complaint herein relates to alleged continuing contraventions of the Act extending over the entire duration of the claimants employment with the respondent. The Court is satisfied that the claim in respect of the leave year 1st April 2001 to 31st March 2002 was presented within the time limit prescribed by section 27(4) of the Act. Consequently the Court overturns the Rights Commissioner's decision issued on 28th

April 2003. The Rights Commissioner declined to apply the extended time limit permitted by section 27(5) and so declined to entertain the complaints in respect of previous leave years. Consequently in this appeal the first issue to be decided is whether the benefit of section 27(5) can be afforded to the claimant so as to give the Court jurisdiction to adjudicate on his complaint.

Extension of the Time Limit.

Section 27(5) of the Act provides as follows: -

- "Notwithstanding subsection (4) a Rights Commissioner may entertain a complaint under this section presented to him or her after the expiration of the period referred to in subsection (4) (but not later than 12 months of such expiration) if he or she is satisfied that the failure to present the complaint within that period was due to reasonable cause".

It is noted that the standard required by this subsection is that of "reasonable cause". This may be contrasted with the much higher standard of "exceptional circumstances preventing the making of the claim" which is provided for in other employment related statutes. The Act gives no guidance as to the type of circumstances that can constitute reasonable cause and it would appear to be a matter of fact to be decided by the Rights Commissioner (and by extension the Court on appeal) in each individual case.

It is the Courts view that in considering if reasonable cause exists, it is for the claimant to show that there are reasons, which both explain the delay and afford an excuse for the delay. The explanation must be reasonable, that is to say it must make sense, be agreeable to reason and not be irrational or absurd. In the context in which the expression reasonable cause appears in the statute it suggests an objective standard, but it must be applied to the facts and circumstances known to the claimant at the material time. The claimant's failure to present his or her claim within the six-month time limit must have been due to the reasonable cause relied upon. Hence, there must be a causal link between the circumstances cited and the delay and the claimant should satisfy the Court, as a matter of probability, that had those circumstances not been present he would have initiated the claim in time.

In the context in which the expression reasonable appears in the statute it imports an objective standard, but it must be applied to the facts and circumstances known to the claimant at the material time.

The length of the delay should be taken into account. A short delay may require only a slight explanation whereas a long delay may require more cogent reasons. Where reasonable cause is shown the Court must still consider if it is appropriate in the circumstances to exercise its discretion in favour of granting an extension of time. Here the Court should consider if the respondent has suffered prejudice by the delay and should also consider if the claimant has a good arguable case.

Has the Claimant shown Reasonable Cause?

The claimant told the Court that the question of holiday entitlements became a live issue amongst the respondent's workforce after the decision of the Rights Commissioner in Mr. Tracey's case. The claimant had discussed the matter with Mr. Steve Barber and Mr. Mark Sanky (both of whom are managers with the respondent) and had been advised that Mr. Tracey's case was a test case and that when this was finally determined the outcome would be applied to all employees.

Following the determination of Mr. Tracey's appeal the claimant submitted that it was a widely held view amongst the workforce that it was unnecessary to make an individual claim to the Labour Relations Commission, as a number of claims already submitted would be treated as test cases.

The respondent has consistently denied that they regarded Mr. Tracey's case as a test case or that the claimant had been told that his holiday entitlements would be determined by its outcome. Neither Mr. Barber nor Mr. Sanky were present in Court to give evidence. The respondent contends that in any event, given that the determination of the Court in Mr. Tracey's case was made on 31st January 2001, then the time period should run from that date.

Conclusions of the Court.

The Court is satisfied that when Mr. Tracey succeeded in his claim before the Rights Commissioner his colleagues, including the claimant, would have pursued similar claims had they not been deflected from so doing by the belief that the final outcome of that case would be of general application.

All parties viewed Mr. Tracey's case as a test case in the sense that it would decide whether the respondent could fulfil its statutory obligations under the Act by incorporating an element in basic pay to cover holidays. The Court is satisfied that this view was held by some members of management and was conveyed to the workforce including the claimant.

Whilst the appeal in Mr. Tracey's case was pending it was perfectly reasonable for the claimant to suppose that the respondent would comply with the law when its import was finally decided. Thereafter, there was confusion amongst employees, including the claimant, as to whether or not it was necessary for them to make individual claims under the Act or whether a number of cases then in progress would decide the matter.

Finally, the Court notes that the claimant did not have the benefit of independent professional advice at the time, in relation to his rights or on the procedures for the making of complaints under the Act.

In all the circumstance of the case the Court is satisfied that in respect of those contraventions of the Act which occurred up to 12 months after the expiry of the time limit at section 27(4), reasonable cause has been shown for the claimants failure to present the complaint within that time limit. The Court is further satisfied that the respondent has not suffered any prejudice by reason of that delay and that the claimant has a good arguable case which ought be heard.

The Court, therefore, determines to entertain all complaints appertaining to contraventions of the Act alleged to have occurred on or after 25th April 2000 (hereafter the relevant period).

The Claimant's Holiday Record.

The leave year 2000 to 2001 ended on 31st March 2001. Hence any contravention of the Act arising from the respondent's failure to provide the claimant with the requisite leave in respect of that leave year accrued within the relevant period. Further, any contravention arising from the respondent's failure to pay the respondent in respect of outstanding holidays on the cesser of his employment accrued within the permitted time limit under section 27 (4). However, in so far as the complaint relates to the respondents failure to pay the claimant in respect of annual leave or public holidays actually taken on dates prior to the relevant period, it is statute barred and, to that extent it is not cognisable by the Court.

Leave Year 2000 - 2001

The records show that in this period the claimant received 20 days leave, however, as the annual leave was not paid the claimant is entitled to redress for the loss of the annual leave.

In relation to public holidays, only those, which fell after 25th April 2000 and prior to 31st March 2001, can be taken into account in the claim before the Court. From the records, it appears that he did not receive an entitlement in respect of one public holiday in that period, which fell on 17th March 2001, consequently the claimant is entitled to redress for this loss.

Leave Year 2001 - 2002

The appellant confirmed for the Court that he received his full paid annual leave entitlement and public holiday entitlement for the leave year 2001 to 2002 and the records show that a termination payment in respect of outstanding holidays for the amount of £6119.04 was paid on 4th October 2001.

Determination

It is clear from the foregoing that the claimant did not receive his full entitlements in respect of both annual leave and a public holiday for the leave year 2000 - 2001. This complaint is, therefore, well founded.

Redress

As the claimant received his statutory period of leave but did not receive payment in accordance with the provisions of section 20 and 21 of the Act, then he is entitled to seek redress under the Act. Article 7 of the Working Time Directive expressly prohibits the payment of an allowance in lieu of annual leave except where the employment relationship has ended. In such cases the proper award should be in the form of compensation for loss of annual leave. Such an award need not be limited to the value of the lost holidays.

The obligation to provide annual leave is imposed for health and safety reasons and the right to leave has been characterised as a fundamental social right in European Law (see comments of Advocate General Tizzano inR v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, ex parte Broadcasting, Entertainment Cinematography and Theatre Union [2001] IRLR 559which were quoted with approval by Lavin J in the Royal Liver case). InVon Colson & Kamann v Land Nordrhein – Westfalen [1984] ECR 1891the ECJ has made it clear that where such a right is infringed the judicial redress provided should not only compensate adequately for economic loss sustained but must provide a real deterrent against future infractions.

In this case the Court is satisfied that the appropriate form of redress is an award of compensation. In considering the element of its award to cover the economic loss suffered by the claimant the Court has had regard to the rate of pay applicable to the claimant at the material time and the average bonus calculated in accordance with Regulation 3(3)(a) of the Organisation of Working Time (Determination of Pay for Holidays) Regulations SI No. 475 of 1997.]

The Court measures the quantum which is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances at €3800 and directs the respondent to pay to the claimant compensation in that amount.

Accordingly, the decision of the Rights Commissioner is set aside and the appeal is allowed.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of Adjudication Officer Decision No:ADJ-00009617 CA-00012611-005

BACKGROUND:

2. The Employee appealed the Decision of the Adjudication Officerto the Labour Court on 27 December 2018 in accordance with Section 8(A) of the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 to 2015. A Labour Court hearing took place on 24 September 2019. The following is the Determination of the Court:-

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Mr. Vasile Matieu against the Decision of an Adjudication Officer ADJ-00009617 CA-00013611-005, dated 13thDecember 2018 under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 – 2015 ("the Acts") in a claim of unfair dismissal against his former employer, named as Auto Depot Tyres Limited. The Adjudication Officer held that the Complainant had wrongly named the employer, therefore he held that he lacked jurisdiction to investigate the complaint.

For ease of reference the parties are given the same designation as they had at first instance. Hence Mr. Vasile Matieu will be referred to as "the Complainant" and Auto Depot Tyres Limited will be referred to as "the Respondent".

The Complainant made a complaint to the Workplace Relations Commission that the Respondent was in breach of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977- 2015, the Payment of Wages Acts, 1991 – 2015, the Terms of Employment (Information) Acts, 1994 – 2014 and the Organisation of Working Time Acts, 1997 – 2015.

The Complainant submitted his claims under the Acts to the Workplace Relations Commission ("WRC") on 18thJuly 2017.

Preliminary Issue

Ms. Aoife Sheehan, B.L., instructed by Hanley & Lynch Solicitors, on behalf of the Respondent, raised a preliminary issue that the Complainant was never employed by the Respondent. She contended that the correct name of the Complainant's employer was Auto Depot Limited. Whilst she confirmed that Mr. Finbarr Sullivan was a Director of both Auto Depot Limited and Auto Depot Tyres Limited the two were separate legal entities, she stated that the latter had never traded and had never had any employees. Ms. Sheehan said that this fact was made known to the WRC by letter dated 29thMarch 2018 and was conceded by the Complainant as his representative wrote to the WRC on 1stJune 2018 appearing to concede that the named Respondent had been incorrectly joined to the proceedings and sought to add Auto Depot Limited as a second Respondent to the complaint.

Mr. Marius Marosan on behalf of the Complainant argued that a lack of a contract of employment, payslips etc to assist in identifying the correct name of the Respondent led to the difficulties identified by Ms Sheehan. When searching the Companies Registration Office , Mr. Marosan said that he could find only one company registered at the Complainant's workplace address, that of Auto Depot Tyres Limited.

Summary of Mr Finbarr Sullivan's Evidence on the Preliminary Issue

Evidence was given by Mr Finbarr Sullivan on the preliminary issue. He told the Court that he was a director of Auto Depot Tyres Limited, a company which was set up to diversify from Auto Depot Limited as he was splitting from his partner in the latter company. However, he said that Auto Depot Tyres Limited was a dormant company, registered in March 2016, it did not trade, and had no employees at any time. He said that was he also a Director of Auto Depot Limited (he has since left that company, and although still a Director, he has not worked in the company since October 2018).

Mr. Sullivan told the Court that the Complainant had been employed by his father who was the sole shareholder in Kingpin Tyres Limited, which was based at the same location as a branch of Auto Depot Limited in Straffan, Co Kildare, as a separate unit. Mr. Sullivan described himself as a "silent" Director of Kingpin Tyres Limited, but he said he had no practical involvement with that company otherwise. He said that the Complainant was employed by Kingpin Tyres Limited from 2007 until he joined Auto Depot Limited on 2ndNovember 2015, as Kingpin Tyres Limited was not doing well at that time and the Complainant was seeking employment.

Mr. Sullivan accepted that the Complainant was employed by Auto Depot Limited from 2ndNovember 2015 until early February 2017 as a tyre fitter, firstly at the garage in Straffan and latterly at the garage in Tallaght. Mr. Sullivan said that he was the Manager at the Tallaght garage, when the manager at the Stafffan garage asked him to take the Complainant on as he was seeking a move from Straffan and he took him on in Tallaght around November/December 2016.

The witness was asked about a letter that the Complainant received from the Department of Social Protection which stated that there were no social insurance contributions records on his behalf in the Department. Mr. Sullivan said that all PAYE/PRSI deductions/payments were made in respect of the Complainant during that time and forwarded to the appropriate authorities. The Complainant was furnished with P60's for 2015, 2016 and 2017. Mr. Sullivan said that each of these stated that this employer was Auto Depot Limited. He said that the Complainant was also furnished with a P45 on the cessation of his employment, though he accepted that the P45 omitted to include the name of the employer. He said the P45 did include the employer's tax registration number. He said that he had asked his accountant to check the matter, and on checking with the Revenue Commissioners he was satisfied that all was in order and printed out the appropriate information from ROS (copy supplied to the Court).

The witness was asked about the notification from the WRC regarding the Complainant's claim under the Acts, dated 18th July 2017. He said that he did not specifically recall receiving it but knows that he passed it on to his Solicitors. He said that he did not know why he didn't take issue with the name of the employer on the WRC documentation at the time of receipt but was satisfied that it was in the hands of his Solicitors at that point. He said that he received further communication from the WRC in March 2018 and that letter was also forwarded to his Solicitors who responded at that point to inform the WRC that the Complainant had never been employed by Auto Depot Tyres Limited. Mr. Sullivan said that he had had a WRC inspection around that time and was actively co-operating with the inspector.

Mr. Sullivan accepted that he did not furnish the Complainant with a contract of employment or any written statement setting out his terms and conditions of employment. When questioned about payslips he said that all employees, including the Complainant, received payslips on a regular basis which contained the name of the employer, Auto Depot Limited, (copies supplied to the Court).

Summary of the Complainant's Evidence on the Preliminary Issue

The Complainant told the Court that he was hired by Mr. Sullivan Junior to work for Mr. Sullivan Senior in 2007. He said that he worked for both Mr Sullivan Snr and Jnr in two different garages in the same courtyard in Straffan, until he transferred to Tallaght. However, he said that he was never informed that he was transferring employment from one company to another. He said that there was no change in his terms and conditions of employment, his rate of pay remained the same, however, he said that he never received any payslips and was paid in cash. He said that he did receive P60's but did not read them. The Complainant said that he was always seeking to be regularised in his employment but that never happened.

Court's Findings on the Preliminary Issue

With regard to the issue of the correct Respondent in this case, Ms. Sheehan submitted to the Court that the only mechanism available to the Complainant to substitute a correct respondent for an incorrect respondent are the provisions of Section 39 of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997, and in particular, Subsection (4) of that Section. Ms. Sheehan submitted that no application had been made under Section 39 and that it was therefore not open to the Court to substitute another party for the named respondent.

Section 39 of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997 provides, in relevant part, as follows:

- "39.—(1)In this section " relevant authority" means a rights commissioner, the Employment Appeals Tribunal or the Labour Court.(2) A decision (by whatever name called) of a relevant authority under this Act or an enactment [or statutory instrument] referred to in the Table to this subsection that does not state correctly the name of the employer concerned or any other material particular may, on application being made in that behalf to the authority by any party concerned, be amended by the authority so as to state correctly the name of the employer concerned or the other material particular.
  3) The power of a relevant authority under subsection (2) shall not be exercised if it would result in a person who was not given an opportunity to be heard in the proceedings on foot of which the decision concerned was given becoming the subject of any requirement or direction contained in the decision.(4) If an employee wishes to pursue against a person a claim for relief in respect of any matter under an enactment [or statutory instrument] referred to in subsection (2), or the Table thereto, and has already instituted proceedings under that enactment [or statutory instrument] in respect of that matter, being proceedings in which the said person has not been given an opportunity to be heard and—
  - (a) the fact of the said person not having been given an opportunity to be heard in those proceedings was due to the respondent's name in those proceedings or any other particular necessary to identify the respondent having been incorrectly stated in the notice or other process by which the proceedings were instituted, and(b) the said misstatement was due to inadvertence, then the employee may apply to whichever relevant authority would hear such proceedings in the first instance for leave to institute proceedings against the said person ("the proposed respondent") in respect of the matter concerned under the said enactment [or statutory instrument] and that relevant authority may grant such leave to the employee notwithstanding that the time specified under the said enactment [or statutory instrument] within which such proceedings may be instituted has expired: Provided that that relevant authority shall not grant such leave to that employee if it is of opinion that to do so would result in an injustice being done to the proposed respondent."

As is clear from the wording of subsection (4), these provisions are intended to provide a mechanism by which fresh proceedings can be instituted against an employer which was incorrectly identified in an original complaint. This subsection does not deal with the amendment of either proceedings or a decision. Nor does it allow for the substitution of one respondent for another. This subsection applies to situations in which a complaint is initiated against a wrong party as respondent and the complainant wishes to initiate a fresh complaint concerning the same matter against the correct respondent. What this subsection provides is that, in these circumstances, the complainant may apply to the tribunal of first instance, an Adjudication Officer in this case, for leave to re-initiate proceedings against the correct respondent. That is a stand-alone process and if leave is granted, the Complainant can re-submit his or her complaint afresh. In order to grant leave to an employee to invoke these provisions, the Adjudication Officer will have to be satisfied that the conditions specified in the subsection are met.

The Court must therefore respectfully disagree with Ms. Sheehan's characterisation of the Section 39(4) process. It is not a process for amending proceedings or substituting parties. It is a process whereby a tribunal at first instance, being satisfied that certain conditions have been met, can grant a Complainant leave to initiate a fresh complaint against the correct respondent without falling foul of applicable limitation periods. In any event, no application under Section 39 was made by the Complainant at first instance.

There being no specific statutory mechanism open to this Court in dealing with an appeal to substitute a correct respondent for an incorrect one, the Court must therefore consider whether or not it is legally permissible for the Court to accede to the Complainant's application to substitute in the correct respondent in this case.

This Court in a Decision under the Employment Equality Acts dated 30th June 2015,Travelodge Management Limited -v- Sylwia Wach EDA1511, reviewed the main relevant authorities on this subject. The Court noted the decision of the High Court inCounty Louth VEC v Equality Tribunal[2009] IEHC 370 in which McGovern J. set out the following principle of law: -

- If it is permissible in court proceedings to amend pleadings where the justice of the case requires it, then, a fortiori, it should also be permissible to amend a claim as set out in a form such as an originating document before a statutory tribunal, so long as the general nature of the complaint remains the same.

The ratio of that case was that the procedures adopted by statutory tribunals in relation to the amendment of non-statutory forms used in the initiation of claims should not be more stringent than those that apply in the ordinary courts.

The Court also reviewed the case ofSandy Lane Hotel Limited v Times Newspapers Limited [2011] 2 I.L.R.M 139, a case in which Kearns P. in the Supreme Court would not allow the amendment of a name fromSandy Lane Hotel Ltd(a company in St. Lucia) toSandy Lane Hotel Co Ltd(a company in Barbados) and relied on the"long established principle that a court will not add a defendant.....if the action against that party is quite clearly statute barred".

Noting the divergent decisions on the subject, and with particular reliance on theSandy Lanecase, the Court concluded in theTravelodgecase that it could not add or substitute a party to proceedings where the limitation period in the action has expired as against that party.

Bearing in mind the differing authorities, the Court notes the more recent High Court case inCapital Food Emporium (Holdings) Limited -v- Walsh & Others (2016) IEHC 725.This case was an unfair dismissal claim referred by a former employee of Capital Food Emporium to the Rights Commissioner. The representative for the employer acknowledged receipt of the complaint under the Unfair Dismissals Act, 1977 but failed to attend the Rights Commissioner hearing. A recommendation was issued, and the employer appealed it to the EAT and then withdrew the appeal before the hearing. The former employee applied to the EAT seeking implementation of the Rights Commissioner's recommendation and at that stage the representative of Capital Food Emporium Ltd notified that the recommendation was made against the wrong employer. After an application under Section 39 of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 the Rights Commissioner issued a correction order amending the name to the correct employer's name. The former employee then applied to the EAT for implementation of the recommendation which was granted. Capital Food Emporium Ltd., then applied for a judicial review on a number of grounds including that the Rights Commissioner and the EAT acted ultra vires.

InCapital Food Emporium, Barrett J distinguished, in a number of significant respects, theSandy Lanecase, a case in which this Court inTravelodgeplaced considerable significance. Barrett J. stated:

- "it appears to this Court that the within case is distinguishable in a number of respects from Sandy Lane Hotel, viz: (A) the appellants in Sandy Lane Hotel contended that Sandy Lane Hotel Limited was not the right party to the proceedings whereas in the within proceedings Capital Food Emporium Limited repeatedly acknowledged that it was the correct party to the within proceedings, until it suited it to seek, entirely unconvincingly, to deny this, (B) the Supreme Court, in Sandy Lane Hotel, appears to have placed no little emphasis on the fact that the basis for the confusion arising derived from " a complicated series of arrangements made for tax planning purposes, in which they [the respondent and those behind it] obviously had the benefit of the best legal and taxation advice " whereas in the within proceedings Ms Stewart is a so-called 'ordinary' person who was acting with the benefit of trade union assistance: she is not a sophisticated commercial group acting with the benefit of 'blue chip' legal and tax advice, and (C) the Supreme Court, in Sandy Lane Hotel, also seems to have had regard to the fact that the company secretary appears to have been, perhaps, somewhat sanguine in terms of seeking to join the right party whereas Ms Stewart has always sought to bring her claim against the correct party and, again, was repeatedly acknowledged and accepted by that party as having pursued the correct party until it elected, unconvincingly, to deny this."

Applying this approach to the within case, this Court notes the following:

(A)

- a.Mr. Sullivan accepts that as a company director of Auto Depot Tyres Ltd he received notification, by letter dated 19thJuly 2017 from the Workplace Relations Commission (WRC), of the Complainant's complaints under the various statutes. He told the Court that Auto Depot Tyres Ltd had been incorporated by him for a certain purpose, which did not ultimately transpire, and the company was effectively dormant and never traded nor employed anyone.b.The notification from the WRC was received by him at the registered address for Auto Depot Tyres Ltd at Unit 5 Cookstown Industrial Estate in Tallaght. This was also the trading address of the Tallaght branch of Auto Depot Ltd, which was also Mr. Sullivan's business and of which he was a company director. The Tallaght branch of Auto Depot Ltd was the business where the Complainant physically worked at the time of the termination of his employment on 10thFebruary 2017 and which was his employer at that time. The Court notes that unlikeSandy Lane, where the two different legal entities were each in a different jurisdiction (one in St. Lucia, the other in Barbados), the legal entities here were both Mr. Sullivan's, both were incorporated in the same jurisdiction and indeed both shared an address in common with one entity trading from it and the other registered at it.
  c.From 19thJuly 2017, Mr. Sullivan was on notice of employment complaints from one of his former employees, albeit that he had employed the employee through a different legal entity, Auto Depot Ltd. It is not disputed that he knew precisely who the complaints were being made by and what those complaints related to and that he had previously employed that person at one of his companies.

  d.Mr. Sullivan told the Court in evidence that when he received the complaints, he"didn't realise that he wasn't the employer". In other words, he believed himself to be the employer. He told the Court that he passed the documentation on to his solicitors.

  e.The parties were notified in January 2018 of a hearing before an Adjudication Officer on 12thFebruary 2018. Up to that point, no issue regarding the correct respondent was notified by Mr. Sullivan to either the Complainant or the WRC. That hearing did not proceed, and a new hearing date of 5thApril 2018 was subsequently arranged.

  f.It was not until 29thMarch 2018, eight months after he was notified of the complaints and seven days before the rescheduled hearing, that an email was sent to the WRC by Mr. Sullivan's solicitors alleging that an incorrect respondent had been impleaded.

  g.Mr. Sullivan, though his solicitor, raised the incorrect respondent issue in March 2018 at a point in time over twelve months after the termination of the Complainant's employment in February 2017 and some eight months after being notified of the complaints.

  h.Mr. Sullivan, who in his capacity as owner and director of Auto Depot Ltd was the Complainant's employer, appeared at the Adjudication Officer hearing on 5thApril 2018 represented by his solicitor and Counsel. It was not accepted by Mr. Sullivan that he was the correct respondent and it was argued that Auto Depot Tyres Ltd was a stranger to any employment proceedings instituted by the Complainant. Mr. Sullivan, as the Complainant's former employer, was in a position to produce P60 documents to the Court from Auto Depot Ltd which showed that the Complainant had been employed by that entity.

(B)

- a.The Complainant was not represented by solicitor or counsel in these matters. Nor was he represented by a trade union official. The Court understands that Mr. Marosan was assisting the Complainant in a personal capacity. PerSandy Lane, the Complainant is an"'ordinary' person"and"is not a sophisticated commercial group acting with the benefit of 'blue chip' legal and tax advice".
- b.In evidence before the Court, Mr. Sullivan confirmed that, contrary to statutory requirements, the Complainant was never provided with a written statement of his terms and conditions of employment. Such a statement, if it had been provided, would have provided the Complainant with details of the correct identity of his employer, including the address. Mr. Sullivan told the Court that from 2007 until November 2015, the Complainant was employed by an entity called Kingpin Tyres Ltd, the principal of which was Mr. Sullivan's father, but of which Mr. Sullivan Jnr. was a company director. He told the Court that he took the Complainant in to the employment of his company, Auto Depot Ltd, due to the trading difficulties being experienced by his father's company. There was no evidence before the Court that the Complainant received any documentation relating to the transfer of his employment from Mr. Sullivan Snr. to Mr. Sullivan Jnr.

- c.Mr. Sullivan submitted that from November 2015 onwards the Complainant was provided with weekly payslips. He stated that the payslips identified the legal entity which employed the Complainant, Auto Depot Ltd. Following a break in the proceedings at the hearing before the Court, copies of such payslips were obtained from a firm of accountants who deal with Mr. Sullivan's payroll and were produced to the Court. Mr. Sullivan added that the Complainant had received P60's which identified his employer. In evidence before the Court, the Complainant strongly refuted that he ever received any payslips. The Court was told that these documents were being sighted for the first time at the Court hearing.

- a.With the assistance of Mr. Marosan, the Complainant made efforts to identify the entity whom he believed to be his employer.b.A Companies Registration Office Search was undertaken. The "Auto Depot" entity which the Complainant identified as his employer was the one which was registered at the address where he had worked, the Tallaght address, at the time of the termination of his employment.
  c.The Complainant was doing the best he could with the information and resources that he had at his disposal. Regard must also be had to the fact that he appeared to be at a significant disadvantage concerning the absence of the company documentation which should have been provided to him for referral in order to avoid exactly the circumstances which the Complainant found himself in.

Having regard to the foregoing and relying in particular on the High Court decision inCapital Food Emporium, the Court is fully satisfied that the correct employer has been pursued by the Complainant. The Court is further fully satisfied that the respondent party that appeared before the Court was the Complainant's employer. That party was fully aware of the Complainant's complaints to the WRC from July 2017. He knew precisely from whom the complaints were and to what the complaints referred. The respondent party has had a full opportunity to be heard and to answer those complaints. The Court is therefore equally satisfied that the employer will suffer no prejudice or injustice by its decision on this preliminary matter.

In arriving at this conclusion, the Court is also conscious of the High Court Judgment inO'Higgins -v- University College Dublin & Another (2013) 21 MCAwherein Mr Justice Hogan held:"Even if the wrong party was, in fact, so named, no prejudice whatever was caused by reason of that error (if, indeed, error it be)…. In these circumstances, for this Court to hold that the appeal was rendered void by reason of such a technical error would amount to a grossly disproportionate response and deprive the appellant of the substance of her constitutional right of access to the courts."

Declining jurisdiction in these circumstances would certainly amount to a"grossly disproportionate response"as envisaged inO'Higgins.

The Court is further satisfied that this approach is in line with the generally accepted principle that statutory tribunals, such as this Court, should operate with the minimum degree of procedural formality consistent with the requirements of natural justice. On that point the decision of the Supreme Court inHalal Meat Packers (Ballyhaunis) Ltd v Employment Appeals Tribunal[1990] I.L.R.M 293 is relevant. Here Walsh J stated, albeit obiter, as follows: -

- This present case indicates a degree of formality, and even rigidity, which is somewhat surprising. It is a rather ironic turn in history that this Tribunal which was intended to save people from the ordinary courts would themselves fall into rigidity comparable to that of the common law before it was modified by equity.

Accordingly, the Court considers the erroneous inclusion of 'Auto Depot Tyres Ltd' on the WRC complaint form to be no more than a technical error. The Court is fully satisfied that the Respondent's name can simply be amended on the paperwork to reflect its correct legal title, that of 'Auto Depot Ltd'.

The Court will now proceed to consider the substantive matters referred to the Court.

CLAIM UNDER THE UNFAIR DISMISSALS ACTS 1977-2015

Having dispensed with its investigation on the preliminary issue, the Court proceeded to hear the complaint of alleged unfair dismissal under the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977-2015 ("the Acts". Without prejudice to its position on the preliminary issue, on behalf of the Respondent Ms. Sheehan presented the Respondent's case on the substantive issues.

At the outset of that hearing, Mr. Marosan informed the Court that the Complainant's claim was one of constructive dismissal, as the Complainant accepted that he resigned his employment in February 2017.

Summary of the Complainant's Evidence on the Unfair Dismissals Claim

The Complainant recounted for the Court his evidence of his last day at work. He said that on that morning he had a quarrel with his manager, Mr. Finbarr Sullivan, regarding his lack of a contract of employment, he said that Mr. Sullivan shouted at him. The Complainant said that he got into his car and went home. He said that the following day Mr Sullivan sent him a text message to tell him to stay at home and he would send him his P45. The witness said that he did not reply to that message. He could not recall the date this took place, but it was sometime in early February 2017. He said that the quarrel concerned his request for a contract of employment which he had been seeking for some time.

In cross examination the witness was asked if it was a pay-rise rather than a contract of employment that he had been asking for since January 2017. He disputed this and said it was a contract of employment. It was put to the witness that he had deliberately caused disruption to the business on the day in question, that he had parked a company van at the entrance to the garage thereby preventing customers from entering. It was also put to him that after the quarrel with Mr Sullivan he had taken his belongings, told him that he was leaving and never coming back, and he left the premises. The witness disputed these events.

The witness told the Court that he left his employment due to the actions of the Respondent in not supplying him with a contract of employment. He accepted that he never raised a formal written grievance, however, he said that he raised the matter with Mr. Sullivan and another Partner/Manager. He said that shortly afterwards he secured alternative employment as a welder on a higher rate of pay and with a contract of employment.

Summary of Mr. Finbarr Sullivan'sEvidence on the Unfair Dismissals Claim

Mr. Sullivan told the Court that the Complainant ceased employment with him on either 8th or 9thFebruary 2017. He recounted the events of that day as he recollected them. He said that at around 10am that morning when he was on duty with three fitters, including the Complainant, and the garage was very busy, he asked the Complainant to move a Company van out of customers way. He said that the Complainant moved the van however, he parked it in a location which blocked three customers' cars so that they could not gain entry and one customer could not exit the garage. Mr. Sullivan said that he could not understand why he did this. He said that they had quarrelled about pay as the Complainant was asking for more money. Mr. Sullivan said that he had spoken to the other Directors about the Complainant's pay rate but as an increase in pay had been given in the past year, the Complainant was told his pay rate would be reviewed in six-month's time, but he was not happy about that. Mr Sullivan said that during this exchange, the Complainant told him that he was going home, the money was s…t and that he did not want to work for him any longer and was leaving. Mr. Sullivan said that he tried to plead with the Complainant not to leave, the garage was very busy at the time and he told him that they would talk later. He said that the Complainant was adamant that he did not want to work there anymore and he then proceeded to get his belongings and leave. The witness said that his father arrived on the scene and also asked the Complainant not to leave, however, the Complainant said that he would not be returning unless Mr. Sullivan paid him more money and then he left. Mr. Sullivan said that he tried to contact the Complainant on a number of occasions later that day to plead with him to return to work, but he got no answer.

Mr. Sullivan said that the following day he sent a text message to the Complainant to say that he was sorry that he was leaving like this and wished him all the best. He told him that he accepted his resignation and would arrange to send him his P45. He said that he never heard from him again until he was inspected by the WRC Inspector. Mr. Sullivan said that up until the Complainant walked out of his job, he had had good relationships with him.

Mr. Sullivan denied that the Complainant ever asked him for a contract of employment.

The Law Applicable

Section 1 of the Act defines constructive dismissal as follows:-

- "the termination by the employee of his contract of employment with his employer, whether prior notice of the termination was or was not given to the employer, in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been entitled, or it was or would have been reasonable for the employee, to terminate the contract of employment without giving prior notice of the termination to the employer"

Section 6(1) of the Act states

- 6.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the dismissal of an employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an unfair dismissal unless, having regard to all the circumstances, there were substantial grounds justifying the dismissal.

Section 1 of the Act envisages two circumstances in which a resignation may be considered a constructive dismissal. This arises where the employer's conduct amounts to a repudiatory breach of the contract of employment and in such circumstances the employee would be "entitled" to resign his position, often referred to as the "contract test". This requires that an employer be"guilty of conduct which is a significant breach going to the root of the contract of employment, or which shows that the employer no longer intends to be bound by one or more of the essential terms of the contract, then the employee is entitled to treat himself as discharged from any further performance"as held inWestern Excavating (ECC) Ltd v Sharp[1978] IRL 332.

Secondly, there is an additional reasonableness test which may be relied upon as either an alternative to the contract test or in combination with that test. This test asks whether the employer conducted his or her affairs in relation to the employee so unreasonably that the employee cannot fairly be expected to put up with it any longer, if so, he/she is justified in leaving.

Conclusions of the Court on the Unfair Dismissal Claim

There is no suggestion in the instant case that the Respondent repudiated the Complainant's contract of employment. Rather, it is submitted, the Complainant was entitled to terminate his contract of employment by application of the reasonableness test. The Complainant claimed that he was constructively dismissed as he was seeking to have his employment regularised and he was asking to be furnished with a contract of employment from the Respondent.

The question for the Court to decide is whether, because of the conduct of the Respondent, the Complainant was or would have been entitled, or it was or would have been reasonable for him, to terminate his employment.

In constructive dismissal cases, the Court must examine the conduct of the parties. In normal circumstances a complainant who seeks to invoke the reasonableness test in furtherance of such a claim must also act reasonably by providing the employer with an opportunity to address whatever grievance they may have. They must demonstrate that they have pursued their grievance through the procedures laid down in the contract of employment before taking the step to resign:Conway v Ulster Bank LimitedUDA474/1981.

The Court accepts that there can be situations in which a failure to give prior formal notice of a grievance will not be fatal seeLiz Allen v Independent Newspapers [2002] 13 ELR 84, Moy v Moog Ltd, [2002] 13 ELR 261 and Monaghan v Sherry Bros [2003] 14 ELR 293. See also the Determination of this Court inNew Era Packaging v A Worker [2001] ELR 122. However, in this case, there is a conflict of evidence over the nature of the Complainant's grievance with the Respondent.

On the one hand the Complainant says that it related to the non-furnishing of a contract of employment and his efforts to regularise his employment status. It is clear that the Complainant received a letter from the Department of Social Protection which stated that there were no records of PRSI contributions paid on his behalf. By contrast, Mr. Sullivan stated that for the period of time the Complainant was employment with him, all statutory deductions were made, this was supported by documentary evidence. Furthermore, there was a conflict of evidence in relation to the rate of pay the Complainant stated on average he earned €572 per week, some in cash and the rest paid into his bank account. However, the Court notes that the Complainant was inconsistent in his evidence on this point and also told the Court that he was always paid in cash, with no payslips provided. Mr. Sullivan said that the Complainant was paid €390 per week plus tips and provided copies of his payslips and P60's which indicated all deductions made and specified details of his earnings, this was supported by documentary evidence.

On the other hand, Mr. Sullivan said that the quarrel on the day in question concerned his request for a pay increase which he had been asking for since January 2017. Mr. Sullivan informed him that he could not give him an increase at that time and stated that the position would be reviewed in six months.

From the evidence tendered by the Complainant, the Court has found no evidence to indicate that the Complainant acted in a reasonable manner and made reasonable efforts to address his grievances before resigning. Furthermore, the Court is satisfied that there was no evidence of behaviour by the employer such as would justify a finding of constructive dismissal.

Having examined the facts as presented, the Court fails to see how any of the assertions made meets the standard of reasonableness required to substantiate a claim of constructive dismissal.

Determination

For all the reasons set out above, the Decision of the Adjudication Officer is varied. The Court hereby amends the Respondent's name to reflect its correct legal title, that of 'Auto Depot Ltd'.

Having examined the complaint of constructive dismissal under the Acts, the Court finds that the complaint was not well-founded and must fail.

Accordingly, the Complainant's appeal is not allowed.

The Court so Determines.

CLAIM UNDER THE PAYMENT OF WAGES ACT, 1991-2015

This is an appeal by Mr. Vasile Matieu against a decision of an Adjudication Officer ADJ-00009617 CA-00013611-003, dated 13thDecember 2018, under the Payment of Wages Act, 1991 ("the Act").

The Adjudication Officer held that the Complainant had wrongly named the employer, therefore he held that he lacked jurisdiction to investigate the complaint.

For ease of reference the parties are given the same designation as they had at first instance. Hence Mr Vasile Matieu will be referred to as "the Complainant" and Auto Depot Tyres Limited will be referred to as "the Respondent".

The Complainant submitted his claim under the Acts to the Workplace Relations Commission on 18thJuly 2017.

The Claim

The Complainant claimed that his former employer had breached the Act when he was not paid his statutory minimum notice entitlement on the termination of his employment.

Conclusions of the Court

The Court, consequent on a separate claim under the Unfair Dismissals Act 1977 – 2015 notes that the Complainant terminated his own employment and claimed that he was constructively dismissed. In such circumstances, the Court finds that the Complainant had no entitlement to notice when he terminated his own employment.

Determination

For all the reasons set out above under the unfair dismissals case, the Decision of the Adjudication Officer is varied. The Court hereby amends the Respondent's name to reflect its correct legal title, that of 'Auto Depot Ltd'.

The Court finds that there was no unlawful deduction from the Complainant's wages within the meaning of Section 5 of the 1991 Act. Therefore, the Court finds that the complaint was not well-founded and must fail.

Accordingly, the Complainant's appeal is not allowed.

The Court so Determines.

CLAIM UNDER THE TERMS OF EMPLOYMENT (INFORMATION) ACT, 1994-2014

This is an appeal by Mr. Vasile Matieu against a decision of an Adjudication Officer ADJ-00009617 CA-00013611-001, dated 13thDecember 2018, under theTerms of Employment (Information) Act, 1994 – 2014 ("the Acts").

The Adjudication Officer held that the Complainant had wrongly named the employer, therefore he held that he lacked jurisdiction to investigate the complaint.

For ease of reference the parties are given the same designation as they had at first instance. Hence Mr. Vasile Matieu will be referred to as "the Complainant" and Auto Depot Tyres Limited will be referred to as "the Respondent".

The Complainant submitted his claim under the Acts to the Workplace Relations Commission on 18thJuly 2017.

The Claim

As it is common case that the Complainant did not receive a written statement of his terms of employment, the Court finds that the Complainant's claim is well-founded.

Determination

For all the reasons set out above under the unfair dismissals case, the Decision of the Adjudication Officer is varied. The Court hereby amends the Respondent's name to reflect its correct legal title, that of 'Auto Depot Ltd'.

The Court determines that the Respondent (Auto Depot Limited) has breached the Act at Section 3 and orders it to pay to the Complainant the sum of €1,560.00 (four weeks' pay) in compensation, being the amount, the Court considers to be just and equitable in all of the circumstances.

The Decision of the Adjudication Officer is varied accordingly.

The Court so Determines.

CLAIM UNDER THE ORGANISATION OF WORKING TIME ACT, 1997-2015

This is an appeal by Mr. Vasile Matieu against a decision of an Adjudication Officer ADJ-00009617 CA-00013611-004, dated 13thDecember 2018 under the Organisation of Working Time Act ('the Acts').

The Adjudication Officer held that the Complainant had wrongly named the employer, therefore he held that he lacked jurisdiction to investigate the complaint.

For ease of reference the parties are given the same designation as they had at first instance. Hence Mr. Vasile Matieu will be referred to as "the Complainant" and Auto Depot Tyres Limited will be referred to as "the Respondent".

The Complainant submitted his claim under the Acts to the Workplace Relations Commission on 18thJuly 2017.

The period encompassed by the claim is the period 19thJanuary 2017 to 18thJuly 2017.

The Complainant alleges that he was regularly required to work 52 hours per week, in excess of the statutory maximum working week, therefore he alleged that the Respondent was in breach of Section 15 of the Acts.

This allegation was disputed by the Respondent, who maintained that the Complainant consistently worked 39 hours per week.

Summary of the Complainant's Evidence on the Organisation of Working Time Claim

The Complainant told the Court that he regularly worked six days per week, from 9am to 6pm Monday to Friday and 9am to 4pm on Saturdays and sometimes in excess of those hours for which he was not paid and sometimes worked on Sundays. He said that he opened up the garage before starting times and held the keys. He said that he would start work between 8am and 9am on occasions. He said that he could not recount the hours he worked in his last week of employment. He said that his amount of pay varied and that he would receive some in cash and the rest in his bank account. He said he was paid €11.00 per hour.

Summary of Mr. Finbarr Sullivan'sEvidence on the Organisation of Working Time Claim

Mr. Sullivan told the Court that the normal opening hours of the garage are 9am to 6pm, Monday to Friday and 9am to 4pm on Saturdays. He said that the Complainant was rostered to work Mondays, Tuesdays and Fridays from 9am to 6pm, he worked Saturdays from 9am to 4pm and worked a half day on either Wednesdays or Thursdays. Therefore, Mr Sullivan said that he was rostered to work 39 hours per week less breaks however, he was paid for 39 hours per week at a rate of €10.00 per hour. Mr Sullivan said that since the Complainant was employed by Auto Depot Limited from 2ndNovember 2015 until his resignation in February 2017 he was never paid in cash, his wages were always paid into his bank account on a weekly basis and payslips were handed to him every week or so (copies supplied to the Court). The witness said that the Complainant was never given keys to the premises. He said that the garage religiously opened and closed at the same time every day, every week, no overtime was ever worked, and it was never open on a Sunday.

The witness told the Court that all employees, including the Complainant's hours were written in a Daybook.

The Law Applicable

Section 15 of the Act provides:

- "Weekly Working Hours
  (1) An employer must not permit an employee to work, in each period of 7 days, more than an average of 48 hours, that is to say an average of 48 hours calculated over a period (hereafter in this section referred to as a "reference period") that does not exceed—
    - (a) 4 months, or
      (b) 6 months—
      - (i) in the case of an employee employed in an activity referred to in paragraph [3, points (a) to (e)] of Article 17 of the Council Directive, or
        (ii) where due to any matter referred to in section 5, it would not be practicable (if a reference period not exceeding 4 months were to apply in relation to the employee) for the employer to comply with this subsection, or

      (c) such length of time as, in the case of an employee employed in an activity mentioned in subsection (5), is specified in a collective agreement referred to in that subsection.

  (2) Subsection (1) shall have effect subject to the Fifth Schedule (which contains transitional provisions in respect of the period of 24 months beginning on the commencement of that Schedule).
  (3) The days or months comprising a reference period shall, subject to subsection (4), be consecutive days or months.

  (4) A reference period shall not include—

- (a) any period of annual leave granted to the employee concerned in accordance with this Act (save so much of it as exceeds the minimum period of annual leave required by this Act to be granted to the employee),
  (aa) any period during which the employee was absent from work while on parental leave, force majeure leave or carer's leave within the meaning of the Carer's Leave Act 2001,

  (b) any absences from work by the employee concerned authorised under the Maternity Protection Acts 1994 and 2004, or the Adoptive Leave Acts 1995 and 2005, or

  (c) any sick leave taken by the employee concerned.

(5) Where an employee is employed in an activity (including an activity referred to in subsection (1)(b)(i))—

- (a) the weekly working hours of which vary on a seasonal basis, or
  (b) as respects which it would not be practicable for the employer concerned to comply with subsection (1) (if a reference period not exceeding 4 or 6 months, as the case may be, were to apply in relation to the employee) because of considerations of a technical nature or related to the conditions under which the work concerned is organised or otherwise of an objective nature, then a collective agreement that for the time being has effect in relation to the employee and which stands approved of by the Labour Court under section 24 may specify, for the purposes of subsection (1)(c), a length of time in relation to the employee of more than 4 or 6 months, as the case may be (but not more than 12 months).”

Conclusions of the Court on the Organisation of Working Time Claim

There was a sharp difference in the evidence tendered by the Complainant and that of Mr. Sullivan on many of the material points in issue in this case. Under cross-examination, the Complainant amended his earlier evidence where he said that he was only paid in cash and confirmed that he had, in fact, been paid at least a portion of his wages into his bank account by credit transfer.

In evaluating the evidence, the Court finds the Complainant’s evidence somewhat inconsistent, hesitant and less forthright. By contrast, the evidence tendered by Mr Sullivan was credible and consistent. Overall the Court has reached the conclusion that the evidence tendered by Mr Sullivan was substantially correct and should be preferred.

The basic issue in question was whether or not the Complainant had worked in excess of 48 hours on average in breach of Section 15 of the Acts. After careful consideration of all the facts, the Court, finds no evidence to support that contention.

Determination

For all the reasons set out above under the unfair dismissals case, the Decision of the Adjudication Officer is varied. The Court hereby amends the Respondent’s name to reflect its correct legal title, that of ‘Auto Depot Ltd’.

Having examined the complaint of a breach of Section 15 of the Acts, the Court finds that the complaint is not well-founded.

Accordingly, the Complainant’s appeal is not allowed.

The Court so Determines.

1. Interpretation of an REA

BACKGROUND:

2. An application was made on behalf of the Worker under the provisions of Section 33 (1) of the Industrial Relations Act, 1946. It is the Workers claim that he is covered by the Construction Industry Registered Employment Agreement. The Company disputed this claim. It is the Company's position that the Worker was never engaged in any work categorised under the Construction Industry Registered Employment Agreement.

A Labour Court hearing took place on the 16th July, 2010.

DECISION:

Having carefully considered the submissions of both parties the Court notes that the relevant Registered Agreement contains dispute resolution procedures for dealing with issues of this nature which should have been utilised in this case. The Court is not prepared to insert itself into the procedural process in a situation where the dispute procedures have been bypassed.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal under Section 83 of the Employment Equality Act, 1998 - DEC-E-2003/052

BACKGROUND:

2. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 26th of October, 2004. The following is the Court's determination:

DETERMINATION:

Mr O (the complainant) claims that he was discriminated against on grounds of disability by his former employer, (the respondent). The complainant was employed by the respondent in a specialist occupation. On or about April, 2002, he was admitted to hospital suffering from a psychiatric illness. The complainant was discharged from hospital in June, 2002, and was advised by his psychiatrist that he could return to work, preferably on a phased basis. The respondent did not allow the complainant to return to work. The complainant was referred to a psychiatrist nominated by the respondent and later to an occupational physician. He was eventually allowed to return to work on 9th October, 2002.

The complainant contends that the respondent's failure to allow him to return to work on a phased basis constituted a failure to accommodate his needs by providing special treatment or facilities, as required by Section 16(3)(b) of the Employment Equality Act, 1998 (The Act).

The complaint was referred to the Equality Tribunal pursuant to Section 77 of the Act and was investigation by an Equality Officer who found that the respondent did discriminate against the complainant in the manner alleged. She awarded the complainant compensation in the amount of €8,000. The complainant also alleged that he had been harassed by the respondent, contrary to Section 32 of the Act, and that he had been victimised within the meaning of Section 74(2) of the Act when the respondent ceased paying him sick pay and making VHI contributions on his behalf. The Equality Officer found against the complainant on these issues.

The respondent appealed against so much of the Equality Officer's decision as found it liable for discrimination against the complainant on the disability ground. There was no cross appeal by the complainant. Accordingly, the only matter for determination by this Court is whether the complainant was discriminated against in the manner in which he was treated by the respondent, in respect of his return to work, following his discharge from hospital.

The complainant also brought a claim alleging that he had been constructively dismissed by the respondent on grounds of his disability. Since the claim heard by the Equality Officer and the dismissal claim being heard at first instance by the Court are grounded on interrelated facts the Court, with the consent of the parties, determined to hear both cases together. However, since they constitute separate referrals, and are subject to separate avenues of appeal, the Court decided to issue separate Determinations in each case. For the sake of completeness, all of the evidence and submissions relative to both issues are summarised in this Determination.

This Determination relates to the respondent's appeal of the Equality Officer's decision.

Complainant's Case:

The complainant had been employed by the respondent for fourteen years in a specialist occupation (details of which were provided to the Court). On or about the 25th March, 2002, he became ill and was absent on sick leave until 8th April of that year. Following his return to work, his condition again deteriorated and on the 15th April, 2002, he spoke to Mr H (a partner with the respondent) about his illness. Mr H arranged for him to be examined by a doctor as a result of which he was admitted to a Hospital. He remained as an in-patient in the hospital until 6th June, 2002, when he was discharged. During this period he was under the care of Dr. L a consultant psychiatrist.

The complainant was advised by his doctors that he should return to work on a phased basis. On or around the 14th June he had a discussion with Mr H in relation to his possible return to work and he requested that he be allowed to do so on a phased basis, as proposed by his doctor. He told the Court that this meeting had taken place outside working hours in a local pub. The complainant felt that Mr H was agreeable to his proposal. The complainant indicated to Mr H that he would visit the workplace informally on Friday 21st June 2002 with a view to resuming work on a phased basis on the following Monday, 24th June.

On 18th June, 2002, Mr H advised the complainant by phone that the respondent wanted a written report regarding his condition prior to his return to work. This was confirmed in writing by letter of the same date. By letter dated 20th June, 2002, a Dr. F who was registrar to Dr. L (the complainant's consultant psychiatrist) issued a letter advising that the complainant was fit to return to work but should do so on a phased basis. The complainant delivered this letter to Mr H when he visited the workplace on the 21st June. The complainant told the Court that he was shocked by Mr H's treatment of him on that date. The complainant said that Mr H had become hostile to the proposal that he would return to work on a phased basis and that his demeanour towards him was antagonistic.

The complainant returned to work as agreed on Monday 24th June and he continued to work as normal hoping to speak with Mr H (who was then absent on sick leave) on the following day about the detail of his proposed phased return to work. He did inform Mr M (a partner with the respondent) that he would be attending hospital on 26th, 27th and 28th of June and that he would be taking one week's holidays the following week.

On the 25th June Mr H meet with the complainant and expressed dissatisfaction with the fact that he would not be returning to work full time. Following his return from holidays, the complainant resumed work on the 9th July. He met with Mr B (who is a partner with the respondent) who informed him that he would not be allowed return to work on a phased basis. The complainant recalled that Mr B also informed him that neither he nor Mr H considered the complainant fit to return to work. The complainant was instructed to attend for examination by a Dr S, a consultant psychiatrist, on the 11th July and not to attend work again until after that examination. The complainant further recalled that Mr B indicated that the respondent could not continue paying him his wages while he was on sick leave. The claimant attended Dr S on the 11th July. On the 15th July he referred a complaint alleging discrimination on grounds of disability to the Office of the Director of Equality Investigations arising from the respondent's failure to allow him return t work. It is this complaint that forms the subject matter of these proceedings.

On the 18th July, the complainant received a letter from Mr B of the same date stating that Dr S had advised that he was not fit to return to work and that his salary would cease with effect from 19th July. The complainant told the Court that he was extremely distressed by the respondent's treatment of him. He attended Dr. L on the 19th July who prescribed anti-depressants. He again attended Dr. L on 25th July and on the 1st August. On 1st of August, Dr. L certified the complainant fit to return work on a full time basis.

Having been so certified, the complainant contacted the respondent on the 2nd August and spoke to Mr M. He told Mr M that he had been certified to return to work on a full-time basis and that he would be doing so with effect from Monday 5th August. Later on the same day the complainant received a letter from the respondent (dated 2nd August) delivered by courier requesting that he agree to be examined by an occupational medical specialist nominated by the respondent. He was instructed not to return to work until this specialist had completed his report.

The complainant attended for examination by Dr. D on 13th August. By letter dated 23rd August, the respondents advised the complainant that because his medication had been changed, it was Dr. D's opinion that he should not resume work until he had been reviewed again by Dr. L.

The complainant again consulted Dr L, who confirmed that he was fit to resume work. He received a written certificate to this effect dated the 23rd September and posted it to the respondent on that day. By letter dated 27th September the respondent informed the complainant that he could return to work on the 9th October.

The complainant returned to work on the 9th October. He told the Court that he was called to a meeting in the boardroom with Mr H and Mr B. He claims to have been subjected to aggressive and hostile treatment by them. He specifically recalled that Mr B raised issues concerning a job which he had undertaken the previous year. The complainant said that he was given a new job description and told that he would no longer deal with clients. He received no indication that this decision might be reviewed in the future. The complainant was also told that his work would be monitored. He had been shown a job description by Dr D but had not had an opportunity to study it. He had never agreed to its terms. The complainant was then given work with deadlines which he regarded as unreasonable.

The complainant told the Court that he felt demeaned by the manner in which the respondent treated him on his return to work. By the second day he felt under stress and feared that he would suffer a relapse of his illness. Mr H and Mr B were ignoring him. He felt that the respondent did not want him back at work and he experienced feelings of apprehension. The complainant told the Court that these events led him to a point where he believed that he had no option but to resign from his employment. He discussed the matter with his wife. She had recently been made redundant and it was not easy to contemplate both of them being unemployed. Nonetheless, the complainant came to the view the situation in which he had been placed was intolerable and would be detrimental to his health and well-being. He decided to resign and did so on 11th October.

In cross-examination the complainant agreed that he had not raised the treatment about which he now complains with the respondent before his resignation. He said that this was because he had been advised by his Doctors not to become involved in argument or confrontation. The complainant also agreed that he had taken almost two days to complete the project which he had been assigned on 9th October and that the respondent had not passed any remark in that regard.

Evidence was also received from MrMcQwho is a former colleague of the complainant. This witness worked for the respondent between 1996 and 2000 in a similar specialist occupation as that of the complainant. He told the Court that he was treated well by his former employer. He found the complainant to be a good colleague and good at his job. His recollection was that the complainant had no difficulty working with clients. He described the working environment with the respondent as very pressurised. He said that the relationship between the partners and their employees was productivity rather than people driven. The witness recalled that employees were required to meet high standards of performance and were often publicly dressed -down by the partners. He said that some employees would answer back but that the complainant rarely did so. He described the management style as blunt and graphic. His recollection was that the complainant had particular difficulties relating to Mr B and it was decided that the complainant's reporting relationship should be directed more towards Mr H. The witness told the Court that he was aware that the complainant suffered from a stress related illness and he thought that the management of the partnership were also aware of this fact.

In cross-examination the witness agreed that he had left his employment with the respondent on good terms. He also agreed that he had never made any formal complaint about the way in which the complainant was being treated.

Evidence was also given by Ms. K who was employed by the respondent between 1993 and 1998. She said that the management style in the employment could be argumentative and that Mr. B was given to shouting at and bullying employees. She said that this approach was adopted consistently with everybody. She said that Mr. B ranted and raved at the complainant regularly when there was no need to do so. The witness knew that the complainant was ill but she didn't know the nature of his illness.

In cross-examination the witness said she remained in the employment for four and a half years as she had just returned from Australia and needed a job. She agreed she had never made any formal complaint in relation to the behaviour of any member of management. She also agreed that she had never sought alternative employment during this time.

The complainant's case is that the respondent failed to accommodate his needs by allowing him to return to work on a phased basis. This, he claims, resulted in him being out of work unnecessarily for over three months. The complainant further contends that another employee, with a different disability, was accommodated in returning to work on a part-time basis and that the less favourable treatment afforded to him constituted discrimination.

The Respondent's Case:

Evidence was given on behalf of the respondent by Mr. B, Mr. H and Mr M. who are partners in the business and also by Ms. H who is also a partner and financial controller with the respondent. Evidence was also received from Dr. S and Dr. D.

The Court was told in evidence that the complainant was absent on sick leave for protracted periods in the past. He went on sick leave on the 25th March, 2002, and returned on 8th April, 2002. One the 15th April, 2002, the complainant informed Mr. H that he was extremely unwell. He further advised Mr. H that his general practitioner had arranged an appointment for him at a hospital in the following month. Mr. H was so concerned as to the complainant's state of health that he informed Mr. B immediately. Mr. B arranged for the complainant to attend his own doctor on that day. This doctor was of the opinion that the complainant's condition was sufficient to warrant his immediate admission to hospital.

After his discharge from hospital the complainant met with Mr. H on 14th June to discuss his return to work. Mr. H's recollection is that the complainant was extremely agitated at this meeting and he informed Mr. H that he was suffering from memory loss. At this meeting the complainant indicated his intention to return to work on 21st June. Mr. H was of the view the complainant's condition had not ameliorated and was still severe. Mr. H recalled the complainant mentioning that he wished to return to work part-time but he had given no commitment that this could be facilitated.

Subsequently, at the respondent's request, the complainant gave his consent for the release of his medical records and information on his condition and prognosis. Mr. B spoke to Dr. F, a register to Dr. L, by telephone and requested a report on the complainant's condition. Dr. F then issued a letter addressed "to whom it may concern" dated 20th June, 2002, in which she stated that the complainant should be able to return to full time employment as in the past. She went on to say that it would be preferable if he could do so on a phased basis.

Mr. H told the Court that he discussed the complainant's proposed return to work with the other partners of the firm. They were of the view that a phased return was not viable, having regard to the nature of the work at which the complainant was employed. Following this discussion, he telephoned the complainant and told him not to come into work on the 21st of June. Notwithstanding this instruction, the complainant returned to work on 21st June at approximately 12:30pm and remained at work for approximately 2 hours. Mr. H spoke to the complainant at this point and said that he could not take responsibility for his return to work. Mr. H indicated to the complainant that he had to attend a meeting and that they would speak again when the meeting concluded. However, the complainant departed before this meeting ended.

Later that evening, the complainant telephoned Mr. H and apologised for leaving. He indicated his intention to return to full-time employment on the following Monday. The complainant also told Mr. H that he (the complainant) would take full responsibility for his return to work full-time. The complainant attended for work on Monday 24th June and also on the next day. The respondent formed the view that the complainant was incapable of performing any meaningful work on these occasions. The respondent also contends that the complainant posed a serious risk to their enterprise while simultaneously exposing himself to an exacerbation of his symptoms.

Mr. M told the Court in evidence that the complainant was skilled at his occupation and that he was on friendly terms with him. He said that in the nature of the business in which the respondent was engaged, those in the position of the complainant frequently had to work to deadlines. He said that whilst the complainant generally worked to deadlines he occasionally panicked if his work fell behind. Mr. M said that the only occasion on which he recalled the complainant making a complaint concerning his working conditions was when he asked that the requirement for him to report to Mr. B be changed. This was addressed and from then on the complainant reported mainly to Mr. H. In relation to his return to work on 24th June, Mr M recalled that the complainant spent the time filing and appeared unable to do any work at his specialist occupation. He said that the complainant had seemed confused. The complainant told Mr M that he was taking holidays but appeared unsure as to where he was going.

The complainant was on holidays from 1st to 8th July. The respondent says that when the complainant returned to work on the 9th July the partners decided to refer him to Dr S, a consultant psychiatrist. The complainant attended Dr. S on the 11th July. It was Dr. S's opinion that the complainant was suffering from an illness (details of which were provided to the Court) to the point that he was unable to do his job. Furthermore, Dr. S was of the view that while the complainant had made some response to treatment, he had not activated a significant level of remission to return to his position with the respondent. Dr. S did advise that the complainant be seen by an Occupational Health Physician and, in accordance with that advice, the respondent referred him to Dr. D. Dr. D was of the opinion that as the complainant's medication had been changed by his consultant psychiatrist he should not return to work until he was further assessed by his own psychiatrist.

The respondent acknowledged that the complainant had sought to return to work on a phased basis. It is their position that such an arrangement was wholly impractical having regard to the nature of the business in which they are engaged. The partners of the respondent told the Court that the complainant's job was such that it would not be practical for one person in his position to start a project and then pass it over to another. They said that any attempt at introducing part-time working in this area would be wholly disruptive of the business. They did accept that they had not discussed the complaint's proposal for a phased return to work with him or with his medical advisors.

The witnesses for the respondent categorically denied that the atmosphere in the workplace or the respondents management style was as described by witnesses for the complainant.

Ms. H gave evidence in relation to the complainant's sick leave record (which was detailed in the respondent's written submission). The record showed that in the year 2002 the complainant has 115 days sick leave, 45 days of which were unpaid. He had varying levels of absence in other years due to illness. During 1995, 1997, and 1998 he also had periods of unpaid sick leave. The witness did, however, accept that on those occasions the complainant asked not to be paid. Ms. H also told the Court the complainant had withdrawn from the firm's group VHI scheme in August, 2002, while on sick leave. She said that had the complainant not withdrawn from the scheme the respondent would have continued paying his contributions. The respondent did continue to pay his pension contributions during the period in which he was on unpaid sick leave.

Ms. H also referred to the evidence given by witnesses for the complainant in relation to the working atmosphere in the firm. She refuted the evidence given that the atmosphere was oppressive or unpleasant. She said that she had never found it so. This witness told the Court that the evidence given by Ms. K, which she totally refuted, shocked her.

This witness also referred to the position of another employee who was allowed time off to recover from illness. She recalled that this employee was recovering from alcoholism and was allowed to take half days off to attend counselling. This was on the basis that the time lost would be worked up at other times. Ms. H also told the Court that this employee worked in a different capacity to that of the complainant and his absences were less disruptive of the business.

Finally, the complainant returned to work on the 9th October, 2002, having been certified to do so by his consultant psychiatrist. He was asked by the receptionist to meet with Mr. H and Mr. B in the boardroom but he did not attend. Instead, he went to the kitchen to drink tea. The complainant was again invited to attend in the boardroom which he duly did. In their evidence, Mr. H and Mr. B recalled that the complainant was welcomed back to work and told of the respondent's satisfaction that his Doctor now considered him fit for work. The complainant was then furnished with a job specification and was told that it was expected that he would conform to its provisions. The Court was told that this job specification had previously been presented to the complainant during his consultation with Dr. D.

It was accepted that the complainant was told that he should have no further contact with clients and that queries should, in future, be channelled through another employee. It was the respondent's evidence that contact with clients was a minor part of the complainant's responsibilities and the change was necessitated by the complainant's admission that he was suffering from memory loss. The respondent contends that this adjustment was in ease of the complainant. The respondent further accepts that the complainant was told that his work would be monitored. They say, however, that he did not demur from this proposal.

Mr. M gave evidence of having assigned a small project to the complainant which, he said, was to ease him back into his work regime. He was given a deadline of 4.5 hours to complete the project, which would normally take 2 to 3 hours. It was Mr M's recollection that the complainant accepted the deadline. The complainant failed to complete the project until 10.45 on the following day. The work which he presented was of poor quality and was not acceptable to Mr M. He was asked to rectify the work and he finally presented the completed project at 3.45 pm on 10th October. On 11th October the complainant was assigned a project which he was asked to complete in one hour. This was double the time which a project of this type would normally take. The complainant passed this project to another employee without having undertaken any work himself.

The respondent says that at 11.45 on 11th October the complainant met with Mr. H and Mr B, at his request. He presented a letter of resignation addressed to Mr. B alleging unreasonable behaviour and referring to a hostile atmosphere in the office. When asked to elaborate on the content of the letter the complainant declined to do so and left the premises.

The respondent contends that there was no basis in fact for the complainant's assertions and that he had not previously complained about the matters referred to in the letter.

It is the respondent's case that the complainant was manifestly incapable of working at his occupation at all times material to his complaint concerning the respondent's refusal to allow him to resume work. The respondent further contends that it acted responsibly in referring the complainant to specialist medical practitioners before allowing him to return to work and that he was treated with every consideration by the firm during his illness. In these circumstances, the respondent contends, there is no basis for his complaints of discrimination.

Medical Evidence.

Evidence was given by the complainant general practitioner Dr. McM, and also by Drs L, S and D. In the case of the latter two Doctors the substance of their evidence was contained in written reposts which were available to the Court and fully considered by it. The Court does not consider it appropriate to recite the content of these reports in this determination. However Dr. McM, the complainants GP, and Dr. L told the Court that the respondent did not seek their advice on matters related to the complainant's return to work. Dr. S also told the Court that he had not been specifically asked to advise on any special measures which should be taken in relation to the complainant's return to work.

In was put to Drs. McM and L in cross-examination that the complainant has been certified by Dr. F (registrar to Dr L) as suffering from a particular illness which was not disclosed to the respondent at the material time or in earlier proceedings. Dr McM told the Court that he had never diagnosed the complainant as suffering from this illness. Dr L was also of opinion that the complainant did not have the condition referred to, notwithstanding the stated opinion of Dr. F.

Findings of Fact

Having reviewed all of the evidence adduced, which is summarised in the preceding paragraphs, the Court has, as a matter of probability, reached the following findings of fact in relation to the complaint to which this determination relates:

- The Court accepts that the working environment with the respondent was pressurised and that a least one of the partners would, at times, publicly remonstrate with staff in robust language. The testimony of two independent witnesses, Mr. McQ and Ms. K who gave evidence on behalf of the complainant, supports this conclusion. Nonetheless, there is no evidence to suggest that the respondent was other than a reasonable employer in its overall dealings with its staff. In the case of the complainant, he appears to have been content in his employment for over 14 years. He had extended periods of sick leave in respect of which he received his full pay, except on those occasions on which he declined to accept his salary, believing that he would be under less pressure to return if he was no paid. No issue was taken with the complainant concerning the length or frequency of his absences on sick leave.When the complainant indicated that he had difficulty in his reporting relationship to Mr B it was agreed that he should generally report to Mr H instead. Mr H befriended the complainant during times of personal difficulty for him and he did not disagree with the suggestion that Mr. H had provided him with a shoulder to cry on. Further, when his state of health deteriorated in April, 2002, the respondent arranged for him to be admitted to hospital and one of the partners drove him there. The partners also remained in contact with the complainant's wife to check on his progress.
    - The respondent contends that at all material times it treated the complainant sympathetically and with consideration in relation to his illness. The Court accepts that at the commencement of his illness the respondent did provide commendable assistance to the complainant. However the respondent's later treatment of the complainant could not be so characterised.

- On his discharge from hospital, the complainant was advised by his consultant psychiatrist that he was fit to resume work but that his return should be phased. The complainant proposed to Mr H that he would return on that basis when they met on 14th June 2002. There appears to have been little in the way of detailed discussion between the parties as to what might have been involved in a phased return to work. Mr H regarded the complainant's demeanour at this meeting as agitated and confused. Yet, what he said at this meeting were the only representations received from the complainant before the partners of the respondent decided that it was not practicable to accommodate his request.
- On the evidence before it, the Court is satisfied that the respondent had a marked reluctance to accommodate the complainant in returning to work. He had been certified as fit to resume work (albeit on a phased basis) by his own doctors. Nonetheless the respondent, as was its right, sought a second opinion from Dr S. Dr S was furnished with a document detailing the full extent of the complainant's duties and was asked if he was fit to discharge those duties. The consultant was not asked to advise on what, if any, modifications in those duties might facilitate the complainant in returning to work. On receipt of that consultant's report, the respondent wrote to the complainant on the 18th July 2002, to the effect that, in the consultant psychiatrist's opinion, he (the complainant) was not fit to return to work. He was also advised that his salary would cease from the following day.
- In fact, the consultant psychiatrist did not completely rule out the complainant's return to work. He stated in his report that if there was a different job available to the complainant, whereby he could do some routine work which did not involve a high level of critical or analytical mental ability and which did not require him to be aware of other people's emotional boundaries, then he would benefit from a gradual return to work in such a situation. The respondent never sought to develop that aspect of the consultant psychiatrist's advice or to examine the possibilities of providing the type of work referred to in the report.
- The complainant visited his own doctor on the 1st August and was certified as fit to return to work on a full time basis. However this was not acceptable to the respondent who referred him to an occupational medical specialist, Dr D (as had been recommended by the respondents consultant psychiatrist) for further examination. This second examination was not conclusive, and the doctor in question simply recommended that the complainant return to his own consultant psychiatrist (who had already certified him as fit for a return to work) because his medication had been changed. Again, Dr D's opinion was sought on the complainant's capability to perform the full range of duties specified in the job description which the respondent provided. He was not asked to advise on what adjustments might facilitate the complainant's return to work
- The partners of the respondent told the Court that it was not practical to allow the complainant to return to work part-time having regard to the nature of the work in which he was involved. However, the Court is satisfied that little serious consideration was given to what, if any, adjustment could be made so as to accommodate the complainants request. In that regard, the Court notes that the job description provided to the complainant on his return to work states that projects may need to be completed in a matter of hours or can take months to complete. It is noteworthy, moreover, that when the complainant finally returned to work in October, 2002, he was assigned projects of short duration.The Court is satisfied, as a matter of probability, that he respondent did not seriously consider whether arrangements could be devised whereby the complainant could return to work on a phased basis. Moreover, it is clear from the evidence that the respondent did not seek professional advice from either the consultants which it nominated, or from the complainant's own Doctors, concerning possible adjustments which could be made in the work regime of the complainant so as to ameliorate his difficulties and facilitate his early return to work, nor did they discuss the matter with the complainant in any serious sense.
- The respondent said that the complainant suffered from a particular personality defect (details of which were provided) which had a lasting effect. They rely on the discharge note issued by the registrar of the complainant's consultant to suppose this submission. They say that the content of this note was not disclosed and that the complainant had concealed the true nature of his illness. The consultant told the Court that the complainant was never diagnosed with this condition. In the Court's view little turns on this issue. However, for the sake of completeness, the Court has considered this matter and has come to the view that the complainant does not suffer from the type of disorder referred to by Dr F.
- The complainant also referred to the treatment of a former colleague who was allowed to take a series of half days off work while he was recovering from illness. This individual was in a different occupational category to that of the complainant and it is the respondent contention that the work pattern agreed with him did not disrupt the business of the respondent.The arrangements put in place to facilitate this person were devised in discussion with him and were implemented on a mutually acceptable basis. By contrast, the respondent never engaged in discussion with the complainant in respect of his request for a phased return nor did it seek to identify an acceptable basis upon which it could be accommodated.

The Law.

The complainant's case is based on the assertion that the respondent did not do all that was reasonable to accommodate his needs by providing special treatment or facilities so as to facilitate his return to work on or after 9th July, 2004. The complainant also contends that he was discriminated against in being treated differently than another employee of the respondent who was facilitated in phased return to while coping with a different disability.

This latter point can be shortly addressed. Section 6(1)(g) of the Act provides that discrimination on the disability ground occurs where a person with a disability is treated less favourably than a person without a disability or a person with a different disability. The respondent contends that the other employee with whom the complainant draws comparison was capable of doing the job for which he was employed part-time whereas the complainant was not. Whether or not this is a good defence turns on the interpretation and application of section 16 of the Act.

The duty to provide special treatment or facilities, for which the complainant contends, is derived from section 16 of the Act. It provides as follows:

- 16.—(1) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as requiring any person to recruit or promote an individual to a position, to retain an individual in a position, or to provide training or experience to an individual in relation to a position, if the individual—

(a) will not undertake (or, as the case may be, continue to undertake) the duties attached to that position or will not accept (or, as the case may be, continue to accept) the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed, or(b) is not (or, as the case may be, is no longer) fully competent and available to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, the duties attached to that position, having regard to the conditions under which those duties are, or may be required to be, performed.(2) [Not relevant]

- (3) (a) For the purposes of this Act, a person who has a disability shall not be regarded as other than fully competent to undertake, and fully capable of undertaking, any duties if, with the assistance of special treatment or facilities, such person would be fully competent to undertake, and be fully capable of undertaking, those duties.

  (b) An employer shall do all that is reasonable to accommodate the needs of a person who has a disability by providing special treatment or facilities to which paragraph (a) relates.

  (c) A refusal or failure to provide for special treatment or facilities to which paragraph (a) relates shall not be deemed reasonable unless such provision would give rise to a cost, other than a nominal cost, to the employer.

The nature and extent of an employer's duty to an employee with a disability was recently considered by this Court inDetermination EDA0413 – An Employer and A Worker,issued on 15th November, 2004. In this case the Court stated as follows:

- "Unlike the other discriminatory grounds prescribed by the Act, the law does not regard the difference between a person with a disability and others as irrelevant. Baroness Hale of Richmond stated the position thus in relation to the corresponding UK provisions in the recent House of Lord decision inArchibald v Fife Council [2004] IRLR:

- "But this legislation is different from the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Act 1976. In the latter two, men and women or black and white, as the case may be, are opposite sides of the same coin. Each is to be treated in the same way. Treating men more favourably than women discriminates against women. Treating women more favourably than men discriminates against men. Pregnancy apart, the difference between the genders is generally regarded as irrelevant. The 1975 Act, however, does not regard the difference between disabled people and others as irrelevant. It does not expect each to be treated in the same way. It expects reasonable adjustments to be made to cater for the need of disabled people. It necessarily entails an element of more favourable treatment…."

Later in the Determination, in relation to the effect of section 16, the Court stated as follows:

- "Prima facie, subsection (1)(b) of this section allows an employer to treat a person with a disability less favourably than others. An applicant for employment who has a disability may be turned down if they are not fully capable of carrying out all the duties attached to the job for which they applied. An applicant for promotion or for training may likewise be rejected on the same grounds. If an existing employee, by reason of disability, is no longer fully able to do the job for which he or she was employed they can lawfully be dismissed for lack of capacity. Moreover, in certain circumstances, the contract of employment may come to an end by operation of law due to frustration.""Subsection 1(b) is, however, qualified by subsection (3). This subsection provides that a person with a disability is to be regarded as fully capable and fully competent to undertake the duties of a post if with the benefit of special treatment they would be fully capable and fully competent to do so. The subsection goes on to impose a duty on employers, where it is reasonable to do so, to provide special treatment for persons with disabilities, or to provide them with special facilities, so as to render them fully competent and capable of doing the job required of them."

- "The provision of special treatment or facilities is not an end in itself. It is a means to an end and that end is achieved when the person with a disability is placed in a position where they can have access to, or as the case may be, participate in, or advance in employment or to undergo training. This can involve affording the person with a disability more favourable treatment than would be accorded to an employee without a disability. Thus it may be necessary to consider such matters as adjusting the person's attendance hours or to allow them to work partially from home. The duty to provide special treatment may also involve relieving a disabled employee of the requirement to undertake certain tasks which others doing similar work are expected to perform. The scope of the duty is determined by what is reasonable, which includes consideration of the costs involved. This is an objective test which must have regard to all the circumstances of the particular case (seeBritish Gas Services Ltd v McCaull [2001] IRLR 60)"

The Court adopts that reasoning in its approach to the instant case.

Consequence of failure to Provide Reasonable Accommodation.

In this case it is necessary to consider the legal consequences of an employer's failure to fulfil the duty imposed by section 16(3). It is clear from the Act as a whole that a failure to provide reasonable accommodation in accordance with this section does not, in or of itself, constitute discrimination. Discrimination, for the purpose of the Act, is defined by section 6. That definition does not include any reference to a failure to fulfil the duty imposed by section 16(3). Further, there is nothing in the Act which gives an independent cause of action for an employer's failure to provide special treatment of facilities in accordance with that subsection.

It appears to the Court that the purpose and effect of section 16(3) is to be found in a reading of section 16 as a whole. As was pointed out inDetermination EDA0413 – An Employer and A Worker, section 16(1)(b), prima facie, allows an employer to treat a disabled employee less favourably than others in respect to access to employment if he or she is not capable of fully carrying out the duties of the post in question. Thus, in an appropriate case, this subsection can provide a full defence to a claim alleging discrimination on the disability ground. That defence is, however, qualified by section 16(3)(a). This subsection, in effect, provides that a person with a disability is not to be regarded as other than fully capable of carrying out the duties of a post if, with the assistance of special treatment or facilities, they would be fully capable of carrying out those duties. Section 16(3)(b) then goes on to impose an obligation on employers to do what is reasonable to provide such treatment or facilities.

Considered in this context, the effect of a failure to fulfil the duty imposed by section 16(3)(b) is to negate reliance on section 16(1)(b) as a defence to a claim of discrimination to which that subsection relates rather than to provide a separate cause of action for the failure itself.

Scope of the Duty Imposed by Section 16(3).

InMid Staffordshire General Hospitals NHS Trust v Cambridge [2003] IRLR 566the EATfor England and Wales considered an appeal from the decision of an Employment Tribunal in which it was held that the obligation imposed on an employer by section 6(1) of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (which corresponds to S16 of the Act) included an obligation to carry out a proper assessment of the disabled employee's needs. In the headnote of the report the following statement of the law appears:

- "A proper assessment of what is required to eliminate a disabled person's disadvantage is a necessary part of the duty imposed by S.6(1), since that duty cannot be complied with unless the employer makes a proper assessment of what needs to be done. The submission that the tribunal had imposed on the employer an antecedent duty which was a gloss on s.6(1) could not be accepted. The making of that assessment cannot be separated from the duty imposed by s.6(1), because it is a necessary precondition to the fulfillment of that duty and therefore part of it…"

That reasoning is based on the corresponding UK statutory provision which is somewhat differently worded to its Irish equivalent. It is, however, authority for the proposition that an employer must make adequate enquires so as to be in possession of all material information concerning the needs of an employee with a disability before taking decisions which are to the employee's detriment. It is persuasive in the context of the instant case and the Court adopts it as equally applicable in identifying the scope of an employer's duty to a disabled employee under section 16(3) of the Act.

Conclusion

It is clear that when the complainant returned to work he was not fully capable of undertaking the duties attached to his occupation on a full – time basis. In these circumstances, the respondent would, prima facie, be entitled to rely on section 16(1) in defending its decision not to allow the complainant back to work. However, that defence could not be relied upon if, with the assistance of special treatment, the complainant would have been capable of resuming work.

Both his own psychiatrist and Dr S believed that the complainant would have benefited from certain adjustments in his normal work arrangements. His own doctors were of the view that a phased return would be desirable. Dr S was of the view that if his duties were modified the complainant would benefit from a gradual return to work. Whilst Dr. S went on to say that since this was not available the complainant could not return to work at that time. However, the possibility of providing such a facility was never considered by the respondent.

It is clear that the respondent wanted the complainant to return to work full-time and fully fit or not at all. It believed that a phased return was impractical. Yet it is clear from the evidence that the respondent had no clear understanding of what was meant by a phased return or of the duration over which it might extend. The decision inMid Staffordshire General Hospital Trustindicated that the duty of an employer to do all that is reasonable to accommodate the needs of an employee with a disability includes the obligation to make an adequate assessment of what is required to meet those needs. That necessarily involves ascertaining the detail of what is required and giving bona fide consideration to how it might be achieved.

On the facts found and set out elsewhere in this Determination, the Court cannot accept that the respondent gave any adequate consideration to providing the complainant with the type of special treatment which would have allowed him to resume work following his discharge from hospital. In these circumstances the respondent cannot rely on section 16(1) of the Act in defending the complainant claim. Consequently, the Court holds that the complainant was discriminated against on grounds of his disability when he was treated differently to employees without a disability, and an employee with a different disability, in not being allowed to resume work following his return from holidays on 9th July 2002. Accordingly, the complainant is entitled to succeed.

It is noted that the Equality Officer also had regard to the events surrounding the complainant's return to work on 9th, 10th and 11th of October, 2002, and held that the conduct of the respondent on those dates constituted a further infringement of section 16(3) of the Act. In the Courts view these events should, more properly, be considered in the context of the complainant's claim that he was constructively dismissed on grounds of his disability, which is the subject of a separate Determination (EED0410) of the Court.

Determination

The Court finds that the respondent did discriminate against the complainant on grounds of his disability when it refused to allow him to resume employment between 9th July, 2002, and 9th October, 2002. The Equality Officer awarded the complainant compensation in the amount of €8,000 for the effects of the discrimination. Whilst the Determination of the Court is based on findings which are somewhat different to those reached by the Equality Officer, the Court is none the less satisfied that the award made by the Equality Officer is appropriate.

Accordingly, the decision of the Equality Officer is affirmed and the appeal is disallowed.

SUBJECT:

1. Alleged unfair dismissal under Section 77 of the Employment Equality Act, 1998

BACKGROUND:

2. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 26th of October, 2004. The following is the Court's determination:

DETERMINATION:

Mr O (the complainant) claims that he was discriminated against on grounds of disability by his former employer (the respondent) by being constructively dismissed from his employment.

The complainant was employed by the respondent in a specialist occupation. On or about April, 2002, he was admitted to hospital suffering from a psychiatric illness. The complainant was discharged from hospital in June, 2002, and was advised by his psychiatrist that he could return to work, preferably on a phased basis. The respondent did not allow the complainant to return to work. The complainant was referred to a psychiatrist nominated by the respondent and later to an occupational physician. He was eventually allowed to return to work on 9th October, 2002.

The complainant contends that on his return to work he was told that he would not be allowed access to the respondent's clients and that his work would be monitored. He further claims that he was treated with hostility by the respondent. The complainant resigned from his employment on 11th October, 2002, in circumstances which, he claims, amounted to a constructive dismissal. He brought a claim before the Court pursuant to Section 77 of the Employment Equality Act, 1998, (the Act).

The complainant also brought a claim alleging that he had been discriminated against on grounds of his disability during the currency of his employment when the respondent failed to facilitate his return to work following his discharge from hospital. That claim was referred to the Equality Tribunal and was heard by an Equality Officer who held with the complainant. The respondent then appealed to this Court. Since the claim heard by the Equality Officer and the dismissal claim being heard at first instance by the Court are grounded on interrelated facts, the Court, with the consent of the parties, determined to hear both cases together. However, since they constitute separate referrals, and are subject to separate avenues of appeal, the Court decided to issue separate Determinations in each case.

The submissions made by the parties on both issues and all of the evidence adduced at the combined hearing are summarised in the Determination of the appeal against the decision of the Equality Officer, Determination DEC E 2003/052 entitled Mr O and an Employer, Number 1. This Determination should, therefore, be read in conjunction with that determination.

Facts.

Based on the submission of the parties and on the evidence adduced, the Court, as a matter of probability, has reached the following findings of fact material to the complainant's dismissal claim.

- The Court accepts that the working environment with the respondent was pressurised and that a least one of the partners would, at times, publicly remonstrate with staff in robust language. The testimony of two independent witnesses, Mr McQ and Ms K who gave evidence on behalf of the complainant, supports this conclusion. Nonetheless, there is no evidence to suggest that the respondent was other than a reasonable employer in its overall dealings with its staff. In the case of the complainant, he appears to have been content in his employment for over 14 years. He had extended periods of sick leave in respect of which he received his full pay, except on those occasions on which he declined to accept his salary, believing that he would be under less pressure to return if he was not paid. No issue was taken with the complainant concerning the length or frequency of his absences on sick leave.When the complainant indicated that he had difficulty in his reporting relationship to Mr B it was agreed that he should generally report to Mr H instead. Mr H befriended the complainant during times of personal difficulty for him and he did not disagree with the suggestion that Mr H had provided him with a shoulder to cry on. Further, when the complainant's state of health deteriorated in April, 2002, the respondent arranged for him to be admitted to hospital and one of the partners drove him there. The partners also remained in contact with the complainant's wife to check on his progress.
    - The respondent contends that at all material times it treated the complainant sympathetically and with consideration in relation to his illness. The Court accepts that at the commencement of his illness the respondent did provide commendable assistance to the complainant. However, its later treatment of the complainant could not be so characterised.The Court has found that the respondent failed to do all that was reasonable to accommodate the complainants needs by providing him with special treatment or facilities so as to enable him to return to work on a phased basis. Moreover, after his discharge from hospital, the respondent appears not to have had any personal contact with the complainant. Apart from one meeting with Mr H on 14th June, 2002, the respondent communicated with the complainant by letter. These letters, which were delivered by courier, were terse and business like. They contain no expression of interest in his state of health or enquiry as to his well-being.

- On his return to work on 9th October, 2002, the complainant attended a meeting with Mr H and Mr B. At this meeting he was presented with a job description which defined in detail the role and responsibilities attaching to his job. Whilst this job description was provided to an occupational medical specialist (to whom the complainant was referred by the respondent), and was shown by him to the complainant, the Court is satisfied that over his 14 years with the respondent, the complainant had never previously been given a detailed job description. The complainant was also told that he could no longer deal with clients. The respondent told the Court that because of the complainant's illness this limitation was considered necessary in order to protect the interest of their business.The complainant had suffered from an anxiety related illness for some time and there was no evidence before the Court that his illness had in any sense adversely affected the relationship between him and the clients with whom he dealt. The respondent contends that this change was made because the complainant suffered from memory loss. The evidence does not support this. While the complainant may have presented with this symptom in the period before his hospitalisation, the evidence indicates that it was no longer a problem by the time he returned to work. In his report to the respondent, Dr S (the psychiatrist nominated by the respondent) stated that he had given the complainant a Mini Mental State test and that this showed that his memory function was reasonably good. There was no mention of memory deficiency in the report prepared by Dr D (the second specialist nominated by the respondent). Moreover, the complainant received no indication that this was a temporary restriction or that the position would be reviewed at a later stage.The complainant described the atmosphere at the meeting of the 9th October as antagonistic. The Court believes, as a matter of probability, that the meeting was business like and formal and was intended to redefine the working relationship between the respondent and the complainant. The Court further accepts the complainant was told that his standard of performance would have to improve relative to what it was previously. In that context he was told that the respondent would be monitoring his work. The complainant also told the Court, and the Court accepts, that he was ignored by Mr H and Mr B over the following two days.In the Court's view the respondent's approach to the complainant on his return to work was not indicative of a caring or sympathetic attitude towards an employee who had been absent from work with a serious psychiatric illness.
- The Court also accepts that on his return to work the complainant felt that he was not wanted and that the respondent was intent on making his life difficult. This perception was evidenced by the demeanour of the partners of the respondent towards the complainant and by what was told at the meeting on the morning of 9th October. The complainant testified that he felt demeaned and threatened and that he became concerned that he might suffer a relapse of his illness. The Court accepts the general thrust of the complainant's evidence in this respect and it further accepts that there was a reasonable basis for those concerns.After the second day the complainant discussed the situation with his wife and decided to resign. He had been absent from work since early the previous June. He had been without pay since 19th July. His wife had been made redundant and he was the only breadwinner in his family. He had spent the previous three months actively tying to resume his employment, partially because he wanted to work but mainly because he needed an income. He had 14 years' service with the respondent and a history of illness. Because of his health record, his prospects of obtaining alternative employment would have been limited.
- Against that background, the complainant's resignation might appear to have been an irrational and inexplicable act. The respondent suggested that the complainant was intent on resigning at the time he returned to work and that he contrived to lay the basis for a claim against the respondent in the manner of his resignation. The Court can see no basis for this suggestion and it is rejected. In the Court's view, what occurred on 11th October is more consistent with the complainant's explanation of why he resigned, and the Court accepts that what he told the Court on this point is substantially correct.
- The Court also attaches significance to the respondent's decision to accept the complainant's resignation there and then. In evidence, the partners of the respondent accepted that the complainant's resignation had the appearance of an impulsive or irrational act. They knew the nature of the complainant's illness and of his emotional vulnerability. In the Court's view, a reasonable employer would have paused before accepting a resignation in these circumstances and might have contacted the employee later to ascertain the reason for the resignation or to provide an opportunity for the employee to recant.From all the surrounding circumstances, and in particular from the respondent's response to the complainant's resignation, the Court has come to the view, as a matter of probability, that at that stage, the respondent was, at best, indifferent as to whether or not the complainant remained in its employment. The Court is further satisfied that the complainant had perceived this to be the position.

The Law Applicable.

Section 2(1) of the Act defines a dismissal as including:

- "[T]he termination of a contract of employment by the employee (whether prior notice of termination was or was not given to the employer) in circumstances in which, because of the conduct of the employer, the employee was or would have been entitled to terminate the contract without giving such notice, or it was or would have been reasonable for the employee to do so....”

This definition is practically the same as that contained at section 1 of the Unfair Dismissals Acts 1977 –2001 and the authorities on its application in cases under that Act are apposite in the instant case. It provides two tests, either or both of which may be invoked by an employee. The first test is generally referred to as the “contract” test where the employee argues “entitlement” to terminate the contract. The second or “reasonableness” test applies where the employees asserts that in the circumstances it was reasonable for him or her to terminate the contract without notice.

The contract test was described by Lord Denning MR inWestern Excavating (ECC) Ltd v Sharp [1978] IRLR 332as follows:

- “If the employer is guilty of conduct which is a significant breach going to the root of the contract of employment, or which shows that the employer no longer intends to be bound by one or more of the essential terms of the contract, then the employee is entitled to treat himself discharged from any further performance”

This passage describes a situation in which an employer commits a repudiatory breach of contract. In such circumstances, the employee is entitled to accept the repudiation and consider him or herself dismissed. However, not every breach of contract will give rise to repudiation. It must be a breach of an essential term which goes to the root of the contract. This is a stringent test which is often difficult to invoke successfully.

There is, however, the additional reasonableness test which may be relied upon as either an alternative to the contract test or in combination with that test. This test asks whether the employer conducts him or her affairs in relation to the employee, so unreasonably that the employee cannot fairly be expected to put up with it any longer. Thus, an employer’s conduct may not amount to a breach of contract but could, none the less, be regarded as so unreasonable as to justify the employee in leaving. Further, the employer may commit a breach of contract which may not be of such a nature as to constitute repudiation, but is so unreasonable as to justify the employee in resigning there and then.

Finally, the authorities indicate that what is reasonable is pre-eminently a question of fact and degree to be decided having regard to all the circumstances of the particular case.

Conclusion.

It is not suggested that the respondent breached any express term in the complainant’s contract of employment. It is, however, settled law that every contract of employment contains an implied term that the parties will maintain mutual trust and confidence in their working relations with each other.

On the facts which it has found, and set out in this determination, (and in Determination EDA0419) the Court is satisfied that the respondent conducted itself in relation to the complainant in a manner which was destructive of a relationship of mutual trust and confidence. Whilst the conduct of the respondent may not, itself, have amounted to a repudiatory breach of the employment contract, the Court is satisfied that, having regard to the complainant’s undoubted emotional and psychological vulnerability at the material time, the conduct of the respondent was so unreasonable as to justify the complainant in resigning there and then.

Counsel for the respondent submitted that the complainant’s failure to make any complaint in relation to his treatment, prior to his resignation, is fatal to his claim of constructive dismissal. The Court accepts that in normal circumstances a complainant who seeks to invoke the reasonableness test in furtherance of such a claim must also act reasonably by providing the employer with an opportunity to address what ever grievance they may have. However, there is authority for the proposition that this is not a fixed or universally applicable rule and that there can be situations in which a failure to give prior formal notice of a grievance will not be fatal (seeLiz Allen v Independent Newspapers [2002] 13 ELR 84, Moy v Moog Ltd, [2002] 13 ELR 261 and Monaghan v Sherry Bros [2003] 14 ELR 293. See also the Determination of this Court inNew Era Packaging v A Worker [2001] ELR 122).

There are a number of factors which, in the exceptional circumstances of this case, excuse the complainant’s failure to formally complain to the respondent before resigning. Firstly, the respondent did not have a grievance procedure in place. Secondly, the offending conduct was perpetrated by the principals of the respondent who knew or ought to have known what its likely impact would be on the complainant having regard to his temperament and mental fortitude. Thirdly, the complainant condition was such as to require him to avoid confrontational or stressful situations and this was known or ought to have been known to the respondent.

Determination

Having regard to the foregoing, the Court is satisfied that the complainant's employment with the respondent came to an end in circumstances amounting to a dismissal within the meaning of section 2(1) of the Act. The Court is further satisfied that the dismissal was on grounds of the complainant's disability. Accordingly, the Court holds that the respondent did discriminate against the complainant herein in terms of section 6(2)(g) and contrary to section 8 of the Act.

The Court further determines that the appropriate redress is an award of compensation. The complainant did not obtain alternative employment but started in business on his own account. He had little in the way of earnings in the first year but is now deriving an income. The complainant's gross salary with the respondent was €41,900. The complainant had 15 years' service with the respondent, and the loss of the accrued value of this service must be reflected in measuring the quantum of compensation.

The Court considers that the claimant should receive an award in an amount equal to one year's pay in respect of the economic loss attributable to his dismissal. The Court is further satisfied, on the evidence as a whole, that the complainant suffered stress, anxiety and indignity in consequence of the discrimination to which he was subjected. Further, it is well settled that an award of compensation for the effects of discrimination should not be confined to economic loss but should contain an element which is dissuasive of future infractions of the principal of equal treatment. Accordingly the Court awards additional compensation in the amount of €8,000 under these headings.

An order will be made direction the respondent to pay to the complainant compensation in the amount of €49,900, in accordance section 82(1)(c) of the Act.

SUBJECT:

1. Time limit (hearing arising from EET022)

BACKGROUND:

2. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 6th of April, 2004. The following is the Court's decision:

DECISION:

The applications now before the Court are in respect of ten individual cases, which, it is agreed between the parties, are representative of some 500 other individual claims referred to the Court outside the time limit prescribed by Section 19(5) of the Employment Equality Act, 1977. In each case the Court is asked to extend that time limit.

Each of the claims arises from the decision of the European Court of Justice in the case ofGerster v Freistaat and Bayern [1997] ECR 15273, in which judgement was delivered on the 2nd October 1997. It is claimed that by reason of the decision in that case, the previous practice of the respondent in crediting job-sharers with 0.5 years service, for promotional purposes, for each actual year of service was unlawful. The respondent discontinued the practice complained of in February, 1998. Following the referral of these cases, the Court discussed with the parties the procedural steps that should be followed in processing applications for an extension of time. It was agreed that a number of sample cases would be selected and processed on the understanding that the decision of the Court in respect of those cases could facilitate the parties in determining which, if any, of the remaining cases are admissible. It was further agreed that in each case the reasonable cause replied upon would be the decision inGerster. In that regard, the then Chairman of the Court wrote to the parties on 10th June, 1998, in the following terms:-

- "That the principle "reasonable" cause in every case will be that the Gerster decision changed the jurisprudence in Equality cases, and the claims are based on this new jurisprudence which was not available to the claimants for promotion prior to 2nd October 1997".

In the same letter the Chairman went on:-

- "It is, however, important that the test case or cases only rely on the facts of the Gerster decision as the reason why no application was made earlier than the 2nd October 1997".

This matter was previously dealt with by the Court in Determination EET/022, which was subsequently appealed by the respondent herein on a point of law. The High Court allowed the appeal and by consent ordered that the matter be remitted to the Labour Court for the determination of the following issues in the light of such agreed facts, affidavits or oral evidence as may be adduced by either party in respect of any or all of the ten claimants.

- "Whether in light of the factual position as agreed or determined by the Labour Court in respect of all or any of the ten complainants the decision of the European Court of Justice in Gerster v Freistaat Bayern Case-C-1.95 [1997] ECR15273 constituted reasonable cause to extend time within the meaning of Section 19(5) of the Employment Equality Act, 1998".

The Court was subsequently informed that evidence would be adduced by each of the applicants by way of affidavit.

Background to the Issue:

The applicants in these proceedings are all civil servants and are employed by various government departments. At various times they participated in a job sharing scheme introduced by the respondent in 1984. Under this scheme, the attendance liabilities associated with a single, full-time post are shared equally between two officers. The pay and other benefits attaching to the post are also shared equally between the two participants. Crucially, as far as the present proceedings are concerned, the scheme provided that each 12 month period spent on a job-sharing contract would accrue as 6 months' service for purposes of seniority and promotion.

It is common case that the vast majority of civil servants who participated in the job-sharing scheme are women.

The European Court of Justice gave judgement in theGerstercase in October 1997. In a preliminary ruling under Article 117(234) of the treaty, the Court held that a system of pro-rating service for promotional purposes, similar to that operated by the respondent, was contrary to Directive 76/207 (Equal Treatment Directive). Each of the applicants seeks to rely on that decision in the proposed proceedings against the respondent.

The Evidence:

Affidavits showing cause for the delay in presenting these applications were sworn by each of the representative applicants and opened to the Court. Their content can be summarised as follows:

- Affidavit of Lorraine PhibbsMs Phibbs was promoted to Clerical Office Programmer in November, 1986. She commenced job sharing in 1998. In July, 1990, the issue of her promotion to Senior Programmer was discussed. The deponent was informed that it would be necessary for her to resume working full time and that she would not be eligible to reapply for job-sharing for the period of one year. She refused the promotion as she was expecting her second child in September in 1990.Ms. Phibbs was promoted to Senior Programmer on the 7th December, 1992, conditional upon her resuming full-time employment. She again resumed working on a job-sharing basis on 18th January, 1993, and she has not been offered any promotion since that date. A male colleague, with whom she was concurrently appointed as a Senior Programmer was promoted to Executive Officer, Junior Systems Analyst in May, 1995, and is therefore entitled to a technical allowance which no longer applies to the post. Ms Phibbs further averred that in December, 1997, a colleague who was promoted to Senior Programmer approximately six months after she was promoted, was subsequently promoted to Executive Officer, Junior Systems Analyst.The deponent was promoted to Executive Officer Junior Systems Analyst in July 1998, which was backdated to 1997. However she does not qualify for the technical allowance.Ms Phibbs averred that she was unhappy about the pro-rata calculation of her service and thought it unfair but that she was not aware that it might be unlawful. She said that in October, 1997, she became aware, as a result initially of discussions amongst her work colleagues, of theGersterdecision of the European Court of Justice which received wide publicity at that time. She considered that the decision might be relevant to her service as a job-sharer and she contacted her Union, the CPSU. Her Union subsequently lodged a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977, on her behalf on the 27th January, 1998.Affidavit of Louisa HeneghanMs Heneghan commenced employment as a Clerical Assistant in the Revenue Collector Generals Office in 1976. She transferred to Customs and Excise in Tullamore in 1983 as a Departmental Clerical Assistant and was subsequently promoted to Departmental Clerical Officer in November, 1991. She had been job-sharing since 1986.Ms Heneghan averred that she obtained the required standard in the Indoor Officer qualifying examination on 18th October, 1995. This is a requirement for promotion to Indoor Officer. A second requirement is to have the prescribed service. The deponent applied on 14th November, 1995, for promotion to Indoor Officer. Her application was refused, as she did not have the required service because she had been job-sharing between 1991 and 1995.Ms Heneghan averred that she was unhappy about the way her service was calculated and she raised the matter with her Trade Union in 1996. She was informed by her Union that under the job-sharing scheme job-sharing service was halved. She understood that the scheme was agreed between her Trade Union and her employer and she therefore assumed that it was lawful, if unfair.She went on to say that in October, 1997, she became aware, as a result of television reports, of the judgement in theGerstercase and, as she considered it might have implications for her employment, she contacted her Trade Union for more information. Following advice from her Trade Union, the CPSU, she subsequently instructed them to lodge a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977, which they did on the 8th January, 1998.Affidavit of Kathleen DurkanMs Durkan was appointed as a Staff Officer with the Department of the Environment on 31st July, 1989. She commenced job-sharing on 7th September, 1992, and was subsequently promoted to Executive Officer on 10th April, 2000.Ms Durkan averred that she was classified as being not suitable for promotion to Executive Officer on or about 8th June, 1995, because her job-sharing service was calculated on a pro-rata basis and was deemed insufficient.The deponent further averred that in October, 1997, she became aware, as a result of media coverage, of the Gerster decision of the European Court of Justice which received wide publicity at that time. She says that the case was also covered in her Trade Union Magazine. Ms Durkan considered that the decision might be relevant to her service as a job-sharer and she contacted her Union, the CPSU. The Union subsequently lodged a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977, on her behalf on the 27th January, 1998.In her Affidavit, the deponent stated that an equality claim was lodged on her behalf by her Trade Union in October, 1995, in respect of the pro-rata calculation of her service while on maternity leave. However, the Union withdrew her claim in October, 1999. After the hearing, the Court raised a query with Ms Durkan's Trade Union in relation to this averment. A supplemental Affidavit sworn by this applicant was subsequently filed with the Court dated 2nd July, 2003.In her supplemental Affidavit, the applicant averred that in 1993, whilst still job-sharing, she took a period of maternity leave for which she was paid at the normal job-sharing rate. She subsequently initiated a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977, seeking full pay in respect of this period. The claim was subsequently withdrawn in October, 1999, after a number of similar claims failed either before an Equality Officer and the Labour Court on appeal. She said that this matter is of no relevance to the application herein and was referred to in her original Affidavit for the sake of completeness.Affidavit of Terezina BoyleMs Boyle was recruited as a Clerical Assistant job-sharer in 1985 and remained job-sharing in the Department of Foreign Affairs until 1987. She transferred to a full-time post as a Clerical Assistant in 1987 and was promoted to Clerical Officer in the Department of Social, Community and Family Affairs in Letterkenny in 1991.Ms Boyle applied for promotion to Clerical Officer pursuant to the provisions of circular 15/90. The service requirement was four years. She averred that the personnel section of the Department in which she worked advised her that job-sharing service of two years counted as one year for promotional purposes and that her overall service at that point amounted to three years and 340 days.Ms Boyle averred that she was recruited as a job-sharer and that when she was recruited she was informed of the conditions of her employment as a job-sharer and she signed all entry dockets as such. She further says that she was made aware when commencing employment as a job-sharer that her conditions of employment would be pro-rata with that of full time employees. She says she was unhappy about the pro-rata calculation of her service and she thought it unfair

but that it was explained to her by a member of the staff of the Civil Service Commission that it was a condition of her employment under the job-sharing scheme. Ms Boyle did not approach her employer or her Trade Union, as she understood that the said conditions of employment were agreed between the Department of Finance and her Trade Union.In October, 1997, she became aware, as a result of newspaper and television reports, of the judgement in theGerstercase. She made enquires of her Trade Union Representative shortly afterwards and was informed that a circular would be issued which would clarify the significance of the decision. In or around January, 1998, she became aware as a result of information from her Trade Union, the CPSU, of the implications of theGersterjudgement for job-sharers service and she considered that the judgement might have implications for her employment. She then contacted her Trade Union and subsequently instructed them to lodge a claim, on her behalf under the Employment Equality Act, 1977 which they did on the 2nd of February, 1998.Affidavit of Elizabeth MonaghanMs Monaghan has been employed as a Clerical Officer in the Department of Agriculture since September, 1993. She participated in a job-sharing arrangement from 1st September, 1993, until the 1st December, 1997. The deponent is currently employed as a Clerical Officer acting up to Executive Officer.Ms. Monaghan applied for promotion to Staff Officer and to Executive Officer in August, 1996. Her application was refused as she was deemed not to have the required service because she had been job-sharing. The deponent consulted her Trade Union in this matter who advised that the Department was correct in calculating her service pro-rata. Ms Boyle accepted this advice. She further confirmed that it was through a circular dated 13th August, 1996, notifying her of the competition to fill promotional vacancies that she became aware that the pro-rata calculation of her service while job-sharing would render her ineligible to compete for these posts. She considered this to be unfair.The deponent appealed the decision in a letter dated August, 1996, a copy of which was exhibited. In a reply, a copy of which was also exhibited, she was advised that the pro-rata calculation of service under the job-sharing scheme was mandatory and that the Department had no discretion to change it. In light of this letter, the deponent came to the view that the situation could not be altered. Although she was unhappy about the way her service was calculated she assumed it was lawful, if unfair.On or about October, 1997, Ms Monaghan became aware, as a result of newspaper reports, of theGersterdecision of the European Court of Justice, which received wide publicity at that time. She considered that the decision might be relevant to her service as a job-sharer and she wrote to the personnel division of the Department by letter dated the 5th October, 1997, requesting a review of her situation. She received a reply by letter dated 31st October, 1997, stating that the matter was receiving attention. A copy of that letter was exhibited. Shortly thereafter she contacted her Union the CPSU. The Union subsequently lodged a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977, on her behalf on the 27th January, 1998.Affidavit of Rosanna KearnsMs Kearns commenced employment with the Department of Social & Family Affairs in October, 1986, as a graduate Executive Officer. She worked full time until December, 1991, when she availed of the job-sharing scheme in order to take care of her three children. She continued job-sharing for six years until December, 1997, when she returned to full time employment.Ms. Kearns averred that during the time in which she was job-sharing, she was credited with six months service for seniority purposes for each year of service. At the time of making her claim of discrimination in 1998, she was still an Executive Officer after almost twelve years in the Department. Full-time colleagues who had entered the Department at the same time as her were promoted on seniority after between 9/10 years service.The claimant was aware that when job-sharing she would only receive six months credit for seniority purposes for each year. This rule was set out in the job-sharing circular and she understood that both her employer and her Trade Union accepted the pro-rata principle.The deponent averred that it was only after theGersterdecision of the European Court of Justice that she came to realise that she was being discriminated against. Her realisation was confirmed in Department of Finance Circular 4/98 dated the 10th February, 1998. A copy of this circular was exhibited by the deponent. Ms Kearns subsequently contacted her Union, the CPSU. The Union then lodged a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977 on her behalf on the 27th January, 1998.Affidavit of Sharon DoyleMs Doyle commenced employment in the Office of Public Works as a Clerical Assistant and she participated in the job-sharing scheme between 1989 and 1995. Ms Doyle averred that a colleague who commenced employment on the same day as her was promoted to Clerical Officer on a seniority/suitability basis on 12th January, 1990. She further averred that she was not promoted due to the fact that the time which she spent job-sharing only accrued at half its full value for the purpose of promotion.The claimant was aware that while job-sharing her service would be halved and she assumed that this complied with the law.Ms Doyle said she was unaware that this practice was unlawful until she read a Union circular following theGersterdecision of the European Court of Justice. Ms Doyle then contacted her Union, the CPSU. The Union subsequently lodged a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977.Affidavit of Maria CurleyMs Curley commenced employment as a Clerical Officer Programmer in the Revenue Commissioners in September 1979 and was promoted to Executive Officer in February 1989.Ms Curley averred that in 1990 the Department of Finance entered into an agreement with her Trade Union that Executive Officers who worked in the I.T section and who met certain criteria would be paid a gratuity of £1,750. This agreement also stated that a two year qualifying period and a one year earning period would be required before the gratuity would be paid. The Department of Finance also ruled that a job-sharer would also have to work twice the qualifying period for half the gratuity.The deponent says that her Union challenged this matter on her behalf. The Revenue Commissioners confirmed that a job sharer would have to work four years for the qualifying period and two years for the earning period and would receive only half of the gratuity. Ms Curley's Union's representations to the Revenue Commissioners were on the basis of unfairness rather than on the basis of it being discriminatory within the meaning of the Employment Equality Act, 1977.During her time as a job sharer, Ms. Curley knew that she was being given 6 months' credit for each 12 months' actual service for seniority purposes as per the rules of the job-sharing scheme set out in the Department of Finance circular. She averred that she was not aware of the equality legislation and, furthermore, it was only after theGersterjudgement in the European Court of Justice that she came to realise that she was being discriminated against. Her realisation was confirmed by the Department of Finance Circular 4/98 which she exhibited with her affidavit. Ms Curley subsequently contacted her Union, the PSEU, which lodged a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977, on her behalf on the 12th February, 1998.Affidavit of Margaret O'KeeffeMs O'Keeffe commenced job sharing as an Executive Officer on the 26th April, 1993 and continued in that capacity until 24th March, 1998. She was informed by the Department by which she was employed on the 22nd June, 1997, that she had been assigned to the Executive Officer higher scale with effect from 1st October, 1996. Under the Union's restructuring agreement with the Department, 25% of Executive Officers are assigned to the higher scale.On or around the 15th July, 1997, the deponent was informed verbally by Mr Dave Hanley, Assistant Principal of the Personnel Division, that due to an error her record on the seniority list had not been adjusted because of her job sharing. When it was adjusted she was not entitled to the higher scale and this was not then granted to her.The deponent knew that as a job sharer she was credited with 6 months' service per actual year of service for seniority purposes and for the purpose of promotion and/or the purpose of obtaining the higher scale as set out in the Department circulars. She understood that both her employer and her Union accepted this application of the pro-rata principle.Following publicity surrounding of theGersterjudgement in the European Court of Justice, the deponent contacted her Union, the PSEU. The Union lodged a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977, on her behalf on the 27th July, 1998.Affidavit of Bernadette HalpinMs Halpin commenced employment as a Clerical Assistant in 1979. She was appointed to the Revenue Commissioners. In 1983 she was promoted to the grade of Tax Officer and then in 1986 she passed the Higher Tax Officer Qualifying Examination.Ms Halpin commenced job sharing on the 17th April, 1989, under the terms of the job sharing circular. She continued job sharing until 25th October, 1993. She understood, as per the circular, that her service for seniority purposes would be on a pro-rata basis and, in effect, this meant that over her period as a job sharer she would, for seniority purposes, fall behind full-time workers who were appointed to their grade at the same time or after her.The deponent commenced a career break on the 25th October, 1993, and returned to work in April, 1994, on a full time basis. On 13th February, 1995, she recommenced job sharing and was promoted to Higher Tax Officer on 7th May, 1998. She continued to job share in the new grade.Ms Halpin averred that the seniority list did not indicate the location at which the Officer was serving and that job sharers were not separately identified as such on the seniority list. Therefore, it was virtually impossible for her to keep track of her position on the list. At a later stage, seniority lists denoted job sharers by an asterisk but the acting seniority positions on the list were not adjusted to take account of the job sharing period. At a later date, Revenue adjusted the seniority list to take account of the period of job sharing in respect of full time staff. This adjustment was only made at the date of issue of the seniority list.Ms Halpin further averred that the seniority list was not freely available in the Revenue Tax Offices. Information could only be obtained from the personnel department and information was only provided on the inquirers own position. The full seniority list was only provided to her Union on a confidential basis. To the best of the deponent's knowledge the seniority lists were not regularly updated and were issued only on an annual basis. She believed that it was unfair that she lost seniority but she believed that this was an inevitable result of job sharing.In October, 1997, theGerstercase was reported in National and Union newspapers. She then contacted her Union, IMPACT, and they subsequently lodged a claim under the Employment Equality Act, 1977 on her behalf. The deponent further averred that as a direct result of theGersterdecision she was promoted on the 7th May, 1998. She estimates that she would have been promoted in 1983/1984 had job sharing been treated in the same regard as full service.

Evidence Adduced on behalf of the Respondent:

- Affidavit of Marie McLaughlinMs McLaughlin is a Principal Officer within the civil service and is assigned to the Equality Unit of the Department of Finance. She had caused certain enquires to be made with relevant Government Departments and considered their responses for the purpose of making her affidavit.Ms McLaughlin referred to the previous hearing before the Labour Court and to the subsequent proceeding before the High Court. She then went on to refer to the affidavits sworn by the applicants herein and to respond to those affidavits.The deponent referred to the affidavit of Elizabeth Monaghan who averred that in August, 1996, she had appealed against the decision deeming her ineligible to compete in a certain competition because her service while job sharing was calculated pro-rata with that of full-time Officers. Ms McLaughlin further referred to the affidavit of Ms Maria Curley who confirmed that she had made representations objecting to the manner in which her service as a job sharer was treated for the purpose of becoming eligible for the I.T gratuity.Finally, the deponent pointed out that while each of the applicants had clarified that they were aware of the manner in which job sharing service was calculated, they had not exhibited the standard job-sharing contract into which they had entered. Ms McLaughlin pointed out that this contract specifically stated that the job sharing position was approved under the terms of circular 3/84 a copy of which was enclosed with each standard contract. Each job sharer was required to sign a form of undertaking stating that she had read the circular 3/84 (a copy of which was exhibited with the affidavit).Ms

Mac Laughlin then made a number of corrections in relation to matters of detail in the affidavits of four of the claimants.

Based on the foregoing the Ms McLaughlin asserts:

- Each of the applicants was aware of the manner in which job sharers were treated for the purpose of seniority by virtue of circular 3/84 ("the job sharing scheme"). Ms McLaughlin further asserts that each of them was aware of the factual scenario which is alleged to have arisen by virtue of the application of the job sharing scheme which in turn gave rise to the alleged difference in treatment. Ms McLaughlin went on to say that the applicants were aware of the underlying facts in respect of which they all complain. What the claimants were not aware of was that the bringing of a claim in relation to this factual situations to the European Court of Justice was likely to be successful.It was pointed out that these factual assertions allowed the respondent to contend at the previous hearing of this matter before the Court that, as a matter of law, ignorance of ones legal position could not constitute justification for the extension of a time limit. The fact that the claimants are now aware, on the basis of the decision inGerster, that their claim could be successful, is not, the respondent contends, a basis for extending the time limit prescribed by Section 19(5).The respondent contended that each of the applicants has now clarified that she was aware that service of job-sharers for seniority purposes was calculated pro-rata. In addition, each of the applicants was aware that they were either excluded from a particular competition by virtue of not being eligible due to the manner in which seniority was calculated or that their colleagues who were more junior in years of seniority were being promoted ahead of them. In that regard, the respondent pointed out that certain applicants went so far as to take issue with the discrimination to which they were allegedly subjected.

Findings of Facts:

On the evidence adduced, the Court is satisfied that at the time they entered into the job sharing scheme, and at all material times thereafter, each of the applicants was aware of the terms and conditions under which the job sharing scheme applied. As appears from the affidavit of Ms McLaughlin, each of the applicants entered into a standard form contract which specifically provided that the job sharing position was approved under the terms of circular 3/84. Furthermore, a copy of that circular was enclosed with the standard contract and every job sharer was required to sign an undertaking stating that she had read the contends of circular 3/84. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the Court accepts that each of the applicants signed this form of undertaking.

Appendix A of circular 3/84 provides, in relation to promotion, as follows

- "Job sharing staff will be eligible for promotion on the same basis as full time staff, subject to the following conditions-

(i)for the purpose of the service requirements governing promotion, each year of service in a job sharing capacity will be reckoned as the equivalent of 6 months service in a full time capacity.

(ii)While it may be possible in some cases for officers to continue to serve in a job sharing capacity on promotion, an offer of promotion will normally be conditional on the officer concerned undertaking to perform the duties of the higher grade on a full time basis".

It is against that background that the respondent contends that the applicants were aware of the underlying facts of which they now complain. They say that what the claimants were not aware of was that the bringing of a claim in relation to these facts could ultimately succeed. The Court accepts the substance of the respondent's submission in this respect.

It is also evident on the face of circular 3/84 that the job sharing scheme was introduced by the Minister for the Public Service in 1984 in conformity with a Government decision to that effect. It is, in the Court's view, self evident that in introducing the scheme the Minister for the Public Service and the Government believed that its terms complied with the States obligations under European Law and in particular the State's obligation to faithfully implement Article 5 of Directive 76/207/EEC (The Equal Treatment Directive).

It is also apparent from the evidence that while the decision to introduce the job-sharing scheme was taken by the Minister for the Public Service in conformity with a government decision, it was, in effect, accepted by the Trade Unions representing Civil Servants. The Court is further satisfied that in accepting the scheme, including the impugned provision on the calculation of service, the unions did not believe that it offended against the principal of equal treatment as between men and women.

Date when the Time Limit starts to run:

Section 19(5) of the Employment Equality Act, 1977 provides: -

- "Save only where a reasonable cause can be shown, a reference under this section shall be lodged not later than 6 months from the date of the first occurrence of the act alleged to constitute the discrimination."

The act alleged to constitute the discrimination complained of was the respondent's alleged failure to consider the applicants for promotion (or other benefits) for which they would otherwise have been eligible had their service not been pro-rated. It is the respondent's contention that it is from this date that the time limit prescribed by Section 19(5) starts to run and not the date on which they had actual or imputed knowledge that the practice contravened European Law. This point is rightly conceded by the Unions and is fully accepted by the Court.

Consequently, the time limit must be measured from the date on which the first act of alleged discrimination occurred in each case. Since all of the applications now under consideration were presented more than six months from that date they are each out of time and statute barred unless a reasonable cause can be shown as to why the time for the making of the claims can be enlarged. Whether or not reasonable cause has been shown is, therefore, the net question for consideration by the Court.

Reasonable Cause:

The principles which should be applied by the Court in deciding if reasonable cause exists so as to justify the extension of the time limit appears not to have been considered by the Superior Courts. Counsel for the respondent did, however, refer the Court to authorities dealing with the enlargement of time for bringing judicial review proceedings pursuant to Order 84, Rule 21 of the Rules of the Superior Courts which, it was submitted, could be applied by analogy. Here, a relatively short time limit is also provided within which an applicant must move. However, the High Court may extend time where there is "good reason to do so". What is meant by the term "good reason" was considered by the High Court inO'Donnell v Dun Laoghaire Corporation [1991] ILRM301.Here Costello J stated as follows: -

- "The phrase "good reason", is one of wide import which it would be futile to attempt to define precisely. However, in considering whether or not there are good reasons for extending the time I think it is clear that the test must be an objective one and the Court should not extend the time merely because an aggrieved plaintiff believed he/she was justified in delaying the institution of proceedings. What the plaintiff has to show(and I think the onus under Order 84, Rule 21 is on the plaintiff) is that there are reasons which both explain the delay and afford a justifiable excuse for the delay".

Counsel for the respondent also referred to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case ofDeckra Eireann Teo v Minister for the Environment [2003] 2IR 270which, it was submitted, is authority for the proposition that a party must move as rapidly as possible in challenging the decision of a public authority. This was a case involving an application for judicial review under Order 84A of the Rules of the Superior Courts 1986.

Here, the applicant was an unsuccessful tenderer for the operation of a new national car testing system. The applicant was informed on the 24th November, 1998, that it was intended to award the contract to another tenderer. On the 25th March, 1999, the applicant instituted proceedings against the respondent. The relevant Rule under which the application was brought provides that a review of a decision to award a public contract shall be made at the earliest opportunity and in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the application first arose, unless the Court considers that there is good reason for extending such a period.

As was pointed out by Denham J, the time constraints in this rule reflect the objective in the law and policy of the European Union and was intended to give effect to Council Directive 89/665/EC which provides, in effect, that decisions taken by contracting authorities must be reviewed as rapidly as possible. There is no corresponding requirement in the Employment Equality Act, 1977 or in Directive 76/207/EC. Consequently, the dictum inDeckrato the effect that a party must move rapidly against a public authority is not applicable in this case.

The respondent also contends that ignorance of ones legal position as distinct from the underlying facts which may constitute the alleged wrongful act, cannot, as a matter of law, constitute a justification for the extension of a time limit. In support of that proposition, the Court was referred to the decision of Carroll J inMurphy v Ireland [1996] 3 IR 30.In that case, the plaintiff was a County Engineer with a local authority who was convicted by the Special Criminal Court of a scheduled offence under the Offences Against the State Act 1939. Following his conviction, the plaintiff was required to forfeit his post with the local authority pursuant to Section 4 of the 1939 Act. Some years later the plaintiff claimed damages for breach of his right to earn a livelihood and his right to fairness and fair procedure.

Two years earlier, the Supreme Court had held inCox v Ireland [1992] 2 IR 503that Section 4 of the 1939 Act, which was the basis for the forfeiture of the plaintiff's post, was unconstitutional. One of the issues which arose was whether or not the Statute of Limitations Act 1957, which provided for a six year limitation period for actions founded in tort, could be relied upon against the plaintiff.

The plaintiff argued that the wrong at issue was a continuing wrong and that the plaintiff did not realise the wrong done to him until the Supreme Court decision inCox v Ireland. In rejecting this argument Carroll J stated as follows: -

- "There is no substance in the plaintiffs arguments that there was no cause of action until he knew that Section 4 of the Act of 1939 had been held to be unconstitutional. He had the right to bring proceeding once he was notified that his job was forfeited but he had to bring such action within the statutory period. The forfeiture complained of was a single act and not a continuing wrong.

It was submitted by the respondent that similar reasoning ought to be applied in this case.

Murphy v Irelandwas a case which primarily concerned the application of the Statute of Limitations Act, 1957. It established that the limitation period starts to run from the date of the occurrence of the act giving rise to the action rather than from the date on which the plaintiff first knew he had a cause of action. That principle is not in contention in this case. The applicants accept that the time limit under Section 19(5) started to run from the various dates on which the applications were denied an opportunity to apply for promotion and not from the date of theGersterdecision. The second principle to emerge from theMurphy v Irelandcase is that the Statute of Limitations Act 1957 acts as an absolute bar to the bringing of proceedings outside of the statutory limitation period. That is clearly not the case under the Employment Equality Act, 1977, since there is express provision for the enlargement of time where reasonable cause is shown. Consequently, the Court is satisfied that the decision inMurphy v Irelandcan be distinguished from the instant case.

Another area where assistance can be obtained in approaching the present application is in relation to the attitude of the Courts to the extension of time for applications pursuant to the Arbitration Acts 1954-1980. Here, Order 56, Rule 4 provide that an application to set aside the award of an Arbitrator must be brought within 6 weeks from the date in which the decision is communicated to the parties or such further time which may be allowed by the Court. A test for deciding when an enlargement of time should be granted under a corresponding UK provision was laid down in the case ofCitland Limited v Kanchan Oil Industries PVT Limited [1980] 2 Lloyd's Reports. Here Mustill LJ said

- The reported case shows that the period can, in appropriate circumstances, be enlarged. It is often convenient for the purpose of discussion to extract from these decisions a list of factors that are relevant to the question of whether an extension should be granted. Such a list does not lay down a rigid test. The only criterion is whether the interest of justice requires that the time limit should be enlarged and the weight to be given to each factor would depend on the circumstances of each case".

In the Irish case ofBord Na Mona v Sisk and others, [1990] 1 IR 85,the approach of Mustill LJ was adopted. Here Blayney J laid down five criteria which should be considered in deciding on an application for an extension of time. They are:

1. Desirability of adhering to the time limits as prescribed by the Rules of Court

2. The likelihood of prejudice to the party opposing the application if the time is extended.

3. The length of the delay by the applicant

4. Whether the applicant has been guilty of unreasonable or culpable delay.

5. Whether the applicant has a good arguable case on its merits.

In this case, the Court also made it clear that the weight to be given to each of these criteria can vary greatly from case to case.

Whilst these cases are not directly apposite in the present case they are illustrative of the approach taken in broadly similar applications and offer some guidance as to criteria that should be applied in the instant case.

English Case Law.

There are a number of English authorities on the extension of the time limit for the bringing of unfair dismissal proceedings, which could usefully be considered in the present context. The Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 provided, in effect, that a complaint of unfair dismissal had to be presented to an Industrial Tribunal within three months of the dismissal. However, the Tribunal was empowered to extend the time where "it was not reasonably practicable" for the claimant to present his or her complaint in time. InBodha v Hampshire Area Health Authority [1982] ICR 200it was held that the expression used in this statute imposed a standard which lies somewhere betweenreasonableon the one hand andreasonably capable physically of being doneon the other. It is, however, a somewhat higher standard than that of reasonable cause.

The English Court of Appeal considered the circumstances in which the discretion to extend the time should be exercised by Industrial Tribunals in a number of cases. The first such case was that ofDedman v British Building and Engineering Appliances Ltd [1973] IRLR 379. Here the dismissed employee consulted his solicitor within the time limit but the solicitor did not tell him that the claim must be made within that time. In relation to the approach which should be adopted Lord Denning MR said:

- "In my opinion the words "not practicable" should be given a liberal interpretation in favour of the man. My reason is because a strict construction would give rise to much injustice which Parliament cannot have intended."

Whilst the Court of Appeal has given some guidance as to the type of circumstances in which an extension should be granted, it has emphasised that the essential question of what is reasonably practicable is one of fact to be decided by the Industrial tribunal. InWalls Meat Co Ltd v Khan[1978]IRLR 499, Shaw LJ stated the position thus:

- 'It seems to me axiomatic that what is or is not reasonably practicable is in essence a question of fact. The question falls to be resolved by finding what the facts are and forming an opinion as to their effect having regard to the ordinary experience of human affairs. The test is empirical and involves no legal concept. Practical common sense is the keynote and legalistic footnotes may have no better result than to introduce a lawyer's complications into what should be a layman's pristine province. These considerations prompt me to express the emphatic view that the proper forum to decide such questions is the Industrial Tribunal, and that their decision should prevail unless it is plainly perverse or oppressive. S.88 of the Employment Protection Act 1975 provides for appeal to the Appeal Tribunal only on questions of law.'

In the same case Lord Denning MR considered the circumstances in which ignorance of the time limits could be a justifiable excuse. He said:

- 'I would venture to take the simple test given by the majority in Dedman's case [1973] IRLR 379. It is simply to ask this question: Had the man just cause or excuse for not presenting his complaint within the prescribed time? Ignorance of his rights -- or ignorance of the time limit -- is not just cause or excuse, unless it appears that he or his advisors could not reasonably be expected to have been aware of them. If he or his advisors could reasonably have been so expected, it was his or their fault, and he must take the consequences. That was the view adopted by the Employment Appeal Tribunal in Scotland in House of Clydesdale Ltd v Foy [1976] IRLR 391 and in England in Times Newspapers Ltd v O'Regan [1977] IRLR 101 -- a decision with which I agree.

The position was considered again by the Court of Appeal inPalmer and Saunders v Southend –on –Sea Borough Council[1984] 1 All ER 945. Here the Court again pointed out that the discretion to extend time is a matter which turns on questions of fact and is within the province of the Industrial Tribunal. The position was summarised by May LJ as follows:

- What, however, is abundantly clear on all the authorities is that the answer to the relevant question is pre-eminently an issue of fact for the Industrial Tribunal and that it is seldom that an appeal from its decision will lie. Dependent upon the circumstances of the particular case, an Industrial Tribunal may wish to consider the manner in which and reason for which the employee was dismissed, including the extent to which, if at all, the employer's conciliatory appeals machinery has been used. It will no doubt investigate what was the substantial cause of the employee's failure to comply with the statutory time limit; whether he had been physically prevented from complying with the limitation period, for instance by illness or a postal strike, or something similar. It may be relevant for the Industrial Tribunal to investigate whether at the time when he was dismissed, and if not then when thereafter, he knew that he had the right to complain that he had been unfairly dismissed; in some cases the Tribunal may have to consider whether there has been any misrepresentation about any relevant matter by the employer to the employee. It will frequently be necessary for it to know whether the employee was being advised at any material time and, if so, by whom; of the extent of the advisors' knowledge of the facts of the employee's case; and of the nature of any advice which they may have given to him. In any event it will probably be relevant in most cases for the Industrial Tribunal to ask itself whether there has been any substantial fault on the part of the employee or his advisor which has led to the failure to comply with the statutory time limit. Any list of possible relevant considerations, however, cannot be exhaustive and, as we have stressed, at the end of the day the matter is one of fact for the Industrial Tribunal taking all the circumstances of the given case into account.

The Law Applicable

Having considered the authorities referred to, it appears to the Court that it is for the applicants to show that there are reasons which both explain the delay and which afford an excuse for the delay. The Court must also be satisfied that the explanation offered is reasonable, that is to say, it must be agreeable to reason and not be irrational or absurd. This is essentially a question of fact and degree to be decided by applying common sense and normally accepted standards of reasonableness. The standard is an objective one but it must be applied to the facts known to the applicants at the material time.

While it is not expressly provided in the Act, it seems implicit that even where reasonable cause is shown the Court should go on to consider if there are any countervailing factors which would make it unjust to enlarge the time limit. These factors would include those identified inBord na Mona v Sisk, namely, the degree of prejudice which may have been suffered by the respondent (or third parties) in consequence of the delay, the length of the delay, whether the applicant has been guilty of culpable delay and whether the applicant has a good arguable case on its merits.

The explanation offered by the applicants for not initiating their claims before the decision inGersteris that they did not know that the rules of the job-sharing scheme constituted unlawful discrimination or that they had a cause of action against the respondent in European Law. It has been suggested that this type of explanation is acceptable where the applicant or his or her advisors could not reasonably have been expected to be aware of their rights (Walls Meat Co Ltd v Khan). A similar view appears to have been taken by Costello J (as he then was) inO'Donnell v Dun Laoghaire Corporation.

Conclusions of the Court

The job sharing scheme giving rise to these applications was introduced by the Minister of the Public Service on foot of a Government decision. An integral part of that decision was that service for promotion purposes would be calculated on a pro rata basis. The conditions of service applicable to Civil Servants are regulated through sophisticated and highly formulised arrangements involving consultation between the government as an employer and the recognised Civil Service Trade Unions. It was within these arrangements that the impugned conditions relating to promotions were effectively agreed.

Any reasonable person would have accepted that, in introducing the provision now impugned, the Government must have believed that it was acting in conformity with the obligations of the State under National and European Law. Moreover, such a person would have been reinforced in that view by the knowledge that their Trade Unions shared the Government's view as to the legality of applying service pro rata.

As appears from the affidavits opened to the Court, all of the applicants believed that the system of pro rating their service was unfair but none of them considered that it might be unlawful. Some of the applicants raised the issue with their employer while others raised it with their Trade Union. In all cases, they were told that the calculation of service pro rata was standard and, by implication, could not be challenged. While individuals may not have been happy with the advice which they received it was, in the Court's view, perfectly reasonable for them to have accepted that the advice was nonetheless sound in terms of the options available to them.

This factual background provides a reasonable explanation and a justifiable excuse as to why the applicants did not take the initiative, before the decision inGerster,to challenge the Government as an employer alleging that the job-sharing scheme offended against European Law. Even if they did suspect that the scheme did offend against employment equality law (and there is no evidence to suggest that they did) it is highly unlikely that any of the applicants would have been in a position to take on the financial and other hazards associated with bringing such an action which, in all probability, would have ended in the ECJ. The decision in theGerstercase brought about a significant change in these circumstances in that the Trade Unions, realising that the state of the law was not as they and the Government had understood it to be, felt able to pursue the present cases before this Court.

In light of the decision inGersterthere is no doubt that the applicants have a good arguable case on its merits, which in the interest of justice should be heard. Moreover, it is accepted by the respondent that they have not suffered any prejudice as a result of the delay in that all witnesses and records necessary to defend all and every action are still available.

In all the circumstances of the case, the Court believes that reasonable cause has been shown as to why the within complaints were not made within the limitation period prescribed by Section 19(5). The Court determines that the time for bringing these complaints should be enlarged and that they are, accordingly, in time and should be referred to the Director of Equality Investigations for investigation and recommendation

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal under Section 83 of The Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2007.

BACKGROUND:

2. A Government Department appealed the Decision of the Equality Tribunal DEC-E2007-025 to the Labour Court on the 27th June, 2007, in accordance with Section 83 of the Employment Equality Act, 1998 - 2007. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 10th March, 2009.

The following is the Determination of the Labour Court:-

DETERMINATION:

Introduction

This is an appeal by the Minister for Justice Equality and Law Reform against the decision of the Equality Tribunal in a complaint of discrimination brought by a Worker under the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2007 (the Act). In this determination the parties are referred to using the designation prescribed by s.77(4) of the Act. Hence the Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform is referred to as the "Respondent" and the Worker is referred to as the "Complainant".

Background

The factual background in which this case arose is not seriously in dispute and can be briefly stated. The Complainant is a prison officer. She commenced her employment in that capacity on 7th October 2002. Her employment was subject to a probationary period of two years.

From January 2003 onwards the Complainant took successive periods of sick leave all of which were supported by medical certificates. By the time her probationary period was due to expire in October 2004, the Complainant had accrued 70 days sick leave. In consequence of this level of sick leave the Prison Governor extended the Complainant's probationary period by a further six months. The Complainant's extended period of probation was due to expire in February 2005. At that time the total sick leave, which the Complainant had accrued since the commencement of her employment, was 158 days. On that account the Prison Governor again extended her probation by a further six months. At the end of this further period the Complainant was confirmed in her appointment.

The certified reason for most of the Complainant's absences was "work related illness"or"work related depression / stress".The Complainant also furnished the Respondent with a letter from her General Practitioner, dated 6th September 2004, wherein it was stated that the Complainant was suffering from"anxiety and sleeping difficulties as a result of abuse and bullying at work".

The Complainant had complained to the Prison Governor that she was being bullied and abused by a fellow female prison officer. The management of the prison investigated this complaint. The investigation concluded that the Complainant had not been subjected to bullying behaviour as alleged.

In or about the month of October 2004 the Prison Governor caused an advertisement to be posted in the prison inviting applications for the post of acting clerk 2 in the general office and stores area of the prison. At that time the Complainant was absent on sick leave. She was not notified of the vacancy. On 18th October 2004 the Prison Governor sanctioned, with immediate effect, appointments to the temporary post which was the subject of the advertisement.

The Complainant contends that she suffered, and continues to suffer from a depressive illness which is a disability within the meaning ascribed to that term by s.2 of the Act. She contended that the Respondent discriminated against her on the disability ground in (a) extending her probationary period and (b) in failing to provide her with an opportunity to compete for the temporary clerical post which became vacant in or about October 2004.

The complaint was referred to the Equality Tribunal and was investigated by an Equality Officer. The Equality Officer found that the Respondent had discriminated against the Complainant in extending her probation. But she found that the Respondent's failure to inform the Complainant of the temporary vacancy in the general office did not amount to discrimination. The Complainant was awarded compensation in the amount of €8,000 for the effects of the discrimination that she was found to have suffered.

The Respondent appealed to this Court.

Position of the parties.

The Complainant.

The Complainant contends that at the times material to the case she suffered from a depressive illness. This, she contends, is a condition, illness or disease that affects a persons thought process, perception of reality, emotions or judgment and which results in disturbed behaviour. It was therefore submitted that the Complainant's condition comes within the definition of the term"disability"which the Act itself provides. In reliance on previous decisions of this Court the Complainant contends that it is not open to the Court to go outside the statutory definition in deciding what constitutes a disability.

While the Complainant contended before the Equality Officer that she was treated less favourably than another prison officer without a disability in being deprived of the opportunity to apply for the temporary clerical officer post, she did not pursue that contention before this Court. She contends, however, that she was brought to less favourable conditions of employment because of her disability in having her probation extended.

The Complainant further contends that the quantum of compensation awarded by the Equality Officer is now inadequate in all the circumstances of the case.

The Respondent.

The Respondent conceded that the Complainant was subjected to less favourable treatment in having her probation extended. However it denies that this amounted to unlawful discrimination because, it is contended, the condition from which the Complainant suffered does no amount to a disability within the statutory meaning. The Respondent conceded thatclinicalormanicdepression amounts to a disability. But it submitted that the Complainant's General Practitioner diagnosed her condition aswork related depression/stressand that this, in the Respondent's submission, cannot amount to a disability for the purposes of the Act.

The issues before the Court

Having regard to the position adopted by the parties there are two net issues before the Court, namely whether the Complainant suffered from a disability at the material time and, if so, whether the quantum of compensation awarded by way of redress is adequate in the circumstances of the case.

The evidence.

Prof. Patricia Casey gave evidence on behalf of the Respondent. Prof. Casey is Professor of Psychiatry at University College Dublin and is Consultant Psychiatrist at the Mater Misericordiae Hospital Dublin.

Prof Casey told the Court that she had reviewed a number of documents relating to the Complainant's condition. These included copies of the sick notes provided by the Complainant's GP and reports on her condition prepared by Dr Gillian Byers, Consultant Psychiatrist, Blackrock Clinic. Dr Byers report was prepared at the request of the Complainant's Solicitors.

The import of Prof. Casey's evidence was that the Complainant suffered from a condition properly described as adjustment disorder rather than a depressive illness. The witness told the Court that adjustment disorder represents a position mid way between normal distress or unhappiness and clinical depression. It is, the Court was told, an exaggerated form of unhappiness.

According to Prof. Casey the term adjustment disorder is used to describe the overall reaction of individuals to situation or events which threaten to disrupt their physical or psychological wellbeing, referred to as stressors. The symptoms overlap with those of depressive illness. In consequence adjustment disorder is often conflated with depressive illness. It was Prof Casey's evidence that what distinguishes a depressive illness from an adjustment disorder is whether the symptoms persist after the removal of the stressor.

The Court was told that the prognosis for adjustment disorder is excellent since it resolves spontaneously when the stressor is removed. Further, those who suffer from adjustment disorder are not at risk of further psychiatric illness. Prof Casey's evidence was that antidepressants do not impact on the symptoms of adjustment disorder but tranquillizers do lead to relief.

Prof Casey gave it as her opinion that adjustment disorder could not be properly classified as a disability since it involves a normal human reaction to stressful or unpleasant circumstances.

In relation to the instant case, Prof Casey told the Court that according to the reports which she had seen the Complainant's difficulties arose from her experience of being bullied at work and her disappointment at not being promoted. Moreover, the witness said, thirteen medical certificates were provided by the Complainant's GP all of which, save one, gave the reason for the absences to which they related as"work related depression". The one exception gave the reason as"work related stress".

Prof. Casey noted that the Complainant's GP had initially prescribed antidepressants and that this medication had limited effect. Subsequently the Complainant was prescribed another antidepressant with a small dose of sedative and that on this combination the Complainant had improved. The witness further noted that Dr Byers had found that the Complainant's mood is euthymic whilst she is off work.

Having regard to all of these factors Prof. Casey gave it as her opinion that the condition from which the Complainant suffered should properly be classified as adjustment disorder rather than a depressive illness. The witness based her opinion on the fact that the cause of the condition could be traced to a particular set of circumstances which she experienced at work and that the symptoms ceased when she was removed from the stressor causing her condition. The witness was further influenced in her opinion by the fact that the Complainant had not responded positively to antidepressants but had responded when she was placed on sedatives.

In response to questions from the Court Prof. Casey accepted that adjustment disorder was a condition or illness which could produce symptoms identical to those characterising depressive illness. In that regard the witness accepted that the condition could give rise to at least some of the effects referred to at paragraph (e) of the statutory definition of disability.

Dr Gillian Byers gave evidence on behalf of the Complainant. Dr Byers is a Consultant Psychiatrist who carries on practice at the Blackrock Clinic in Dublin. Dr Byers told the Court that the Complainant was referred to her for assessment in relation to the within proceedings. The witness saw the Complainant on 25th May 2005.

Dr Byers outlined the psychiatric symptoms with which the Complainant presented. These symptoms are recorded in a report from the witness dated 1st July 2005, which was put in evidence. It is unnecessary for the Court recite those symptoms in this Determination. Based on her assessment Dr Byers concluded that the Complainant has suffered a depressive episode with marked features of anxiety.

Dr Byers gave it as her opinion that the distinction between adjustment disorder and depressive illness is often one of degree. In the instant case the witness was satisfied that the symptoms with which the Complainant presented placed her in the depressive illness category. Dr Byers was referred to paragraph (e) of the definition of disability contained at s.2 of the Act and she agreed that the symptoms displayed by the Complainant comported with the provisions of that paragraph.

The Court was told that the Complainant remains on treatment for her condition although the circumstances initially giving rise to her difficulties have since been resolved. Dr Byers opined that the Complainant's depressive episode has incompletely resolved and that she remains vulnerable to further episodes of depression in the future.

Dr Patrick O'Mathuna gave evidence. Dr O'Mathuna is a General Practitioner who has treated the Complainant since July 2004. This witness gave evidence of his assessment of the Complainant's condition and the treatment which he prescribed. Dr O'Mathuna diagnosed the Complainant as suffering from depression and anxiety secondary to bullying at work. The witness told the Court that he prescribed antidepressants and referred the Complainant for counselling. He said that the Complainant condition went beyond mere stress or unhappiness at her work situation. Dr O'Mathuna told the Court that he would not prescribe antidepressants to patients who were merely suffering from negative feelings or unhappiness at a particular situation or occurrence. He said that he was satisfied that the Complainant suffered from a depressive illness and that he had treated her accordingly.

The witness told the Court that as of October 2008 the Complainant continues to receive treatment for stress, depression and anxiety. She remains on medication for depressive illness (details of which was provided to the Court). The Court was told that when the Complainant stopped her medication the symptoms of which she originally complained returned.

Conclusions of the Court

The Law

In light of concessions made by the parties the only issue which the Court must decide is whether the condition from which the Complainant suffered is a disability within the statutory meaning ascribed to that term. That is a mixed question of law and fact which turns on the true construction of paragraph (e) of the definition of disability contained at s.2 of the Act and the application of that definition to the facts as admitted or as found by the Court. The statutory definition provides: -

- "disability" means—
  - (a) [not relevant]
    (b) [not relevant]

    (c) [not relevant]

    (d) [not relevant]

    (e) a condition, illness or disease which affects a person's thought processes, perception of reality, emotions or judgement or which results in disturbed behaviour,

It is noteworthy that the definition is expressed in terms of the manifestations or symptoms produced by a particular condition, illness or disease rather than the taxonomy or label which is to be ascribed thereto. Further, the definition does not refer to the extent to which the manifestations or symptoms must be present. However, ade minimisrule must apply and effects or symptoms, which are present to an insignificant degree, would have to be disregarded. Moreover, the classification of a condition, illness or disease as a disability is not limited by its temporal affect on the sufferer. This is clear from the definition which provides that it:-

- "shall be taken to include a disability which exists at present, or which previously existed but no longer exists, or which may exist in the future or which is imputed to a person"

It is now well settled that where a terms used in a statute is defined by the statute itself a Court cannot look outside that definition in construing that term. As this Court stated inGemma Leydon Customer Perceptions Ltd,Determination EED0317 and again in

A Worker v A Government Department17 ELR 225: -

- It is settled law that where a statute defines its own terms and makes what has been called its own dictionary, a court may not depart from the definition given by the statute and the meaning assigned to the words used in the statute. (See the decision of the Supreme Court in Mason v Levy [1952] I.R. 40.)

Hence the question for the Court is whether the condition from which the Complainant suffered had any of theeffectsor symptoms referred to at par (e) of the statutory definition.

The Complainant condition.

The Court heard expert evidence in relation to the Complainant's condition. The witnesses who gave that evidence are eminent practitioners in the field of psychiatric and general medicine. They differed on whether the condition from which the Complainant suffered should be classified as adjustment disorder or a depressive illness. They agreed, however, that the symptoms of both conditions overlap and in many respects they are the same. It is accepted that depressive illness or clinical depression is a disability within the statutory meaning. It would appear to follow that adjustment disorder, which manifests itself in the same symptoms as depressive illness, should be likewise classified as a disability.

However, Mr Kerr B.L. for the Respondent argued that a strictly literal interpretation of the statutory definition would produce the result that mere unhappiness or ordinary stress or disappointment which effects a person's emotions would have to be classified as a disability. This, it was submitted, would be an absurd result. There is considerable cogency in that argument.

The Court must take the definition of disability as it finds it. Further, as the Act is a remedial social statute it ought to be construed as widely and as liberally as possible consistent with fairness (seeBank of Ireland v Purcell[1989] IR 327). Nevertheless no statute can be construed so as to produce an absurd result or one that is repugnant to common sense. That common law rule of construction has now been given statutory effect by s.5(1) of the Interpretation Act 2005. It would appear to the Court that if the statute were to be construed so as to blur the distinction between emotional upset, unhappiness or the ordinary human reaction to stressful situations or the vicissitudes of life on the one hand, and recognised psychiatric illness on the other, it could be fairly described as an absurdity. But it is not necessary for the Court to reach a concluded view on that point in the instant case because the Complainant is not contending for such an interpretation of the statute.

The case advanced on the Complainant's behalf is that she suffered and continues to suffer from a depressive illness of a type which is a known psychiatric disability. In advancing that argument her Counsel, Ms McKenna B.L., relied upon the evidence given by Dr Byers and Dr O'Mathuna. In considering the expert evidence tendered the Court notes that Prof. Casey, through no fault of her own, did not have an opportunity to examine the Complainant. Dr Byers did have such an opportunity. Furthermore Dr O'Mathuna has been involved in the care of the Complainant since July 2004. Both Dr Byers and Dr O'Mathuna are satisfied, as a matter of professional opinion, that the Complainant suffers from a depressive illness rather than adjustment disorder. Moreover, it emerged from Dr O'Mathuna's evidence that the Complainant continues to show symptoms of her illness notwithstanding the removal of the circumstances giving rise to her condition. This, on the evidence before the Court, is more suggestive of depressive illness than of an adjustment disorder.

In these circumstances the Court is satisfied, as a matter of probability, that the Complainant did suffer from a depressive illness. It is also satisfied that this condition is a disability for the purposes of the Act. Accordingly the Court is satisfied that the findings of the Equality Tribunal are correct.

Quantum of compensation

Ms McKenna B.L. submitted that having regard to the manner in which the appeal had been run by the Respondent the Complainant was obliged to incur significant additional expense in advancing her case. Counsel submitted that this should be taken into account in measuring the quantum of compensation to which the Complainant is entitled.

Mr Kerr B.L. on behalf of the Respondent pointed out that the Court cannot incorporate an award of costs into any redress which it might order. Counsel submitted that the Complainant had not suffered any actual or potential financial loss in consequence of having her probation extended. He submitted that in these circumstances the award of €8,000 made by the Equality Officer is adequate.

The jurisdiction of the Equality Tribunal, and of this Court on appeal, to award redress is grounded on s. 82 of the Act. Section 82(1)(c) of the Act provides that the Court may make an order for compensation for the effects of acts of discrimination. Where this mode of redress is decided upon the Court is required to follow the decision of the ECJ inVon Colson andKamann[1984] ECR 1891. Here the ECJ held that the sanction for breaches of Community rights must be effective, proportionate and dissuasive. This means that the compensation awarded must fully compensate the complainant for the economic loss which he or she sustained as a result of the breach of his or her Community rights. It must also contain an element that reflects the gravity of the infringement and acts as a disincentive against future infractions.

The Court has no jurisdiction under either the Act or the dicta inVon Colson andKamanntomake an award of costs or an order for the recovery of expenses incurred in the prosecution or defence of a case under the Act. The Court accepts that the Complainant was required to incur additional costs in providing medical reports and expert evidence in order to meet the case made by the Respondent. However it has no jurisdiction to increase the award made by the Equality Officer in order to allow for recovery of all or part of those costs.

It is accepted that the Complainant suffered no pecuniary loss or other disadvantage in terms of her conditions of employment in consequence of the discrimination which she suffered. In these circumstances the Court is satisfied that the award of €8,000 made by the Equality Officer is appropriate and that it adequately meets the criteria enunciated by the ECJ inVon Colson.

Determination

The appeal herein is disallowed and the decision of the Equality Tribunal is affirmed.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal under Section 83 of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011.

BACKGROUND:

2. This is an appeal under Section 83 of the Employment Equality Acts, 1998 to 2011. A Labour Court hearing took place on 5th January, 2012 and 27th February, 2012. The following is the Court's Determination.

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Trailercare Holdings Limited against the decision of the Equality Tribunal in a complaint by Deborah Healy made under the Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2011 (the Acts). Ms Healy contends that she was discriminated against by her former employer, Trailercare Holdings Limited, on grounds of gender and disability in relation to her conditions of employment. It is further alleged that she was dismissed on grounds of pregnancy and that she was victimised by her former employer for having sought advice from the Equality Authority.

In line with the normal practice of the Court the parties are referred to herein as they were at first instance. Hence Trailercare Holdings Limited, which is the appellant in this case, is referred to as the Respondent. Ms Healy is referred to as the Complainant.

The Respondent denies all of the Complainant's claims.

The complaints were investigated by the Equality Tribunal and in a decision dated 23rdJune 2011 the Equality Officer found that the complaints had been made out. The Equality Officer directed the Respondent to pay the Complainant compensation in the amount of €40,000 for the discrimination which he found to have occurred. He awarded additional compensation in the amount of €10,000 in respect of victimisation. The Respondent was further directed to pay interest at the Courts rate in respect of the award for discrimination from the date on which the complaint was presented to the Equality Tribunal (being 24thJanuary 2008) until the date of payment. The Equality Officer also made ancillary orders directing the Respondent engage an appropriate person to undertake a programme of training in matters relating to employment equality law and requiring all persons employed by the Respondent to participate in such training.

The Respondent appealed to the Court by notice dated 14thJuly 2011.

Background

The background against which this dispute arose, as admitted or as found by the Court, can be summarised as follows:

The Respondent is a cold, chill and storage Company and is also involved in other ancillary activities. Its principal facility is located at Ballymount in Dublin.

The Complainant commenced employment with the Respondent on 9thOctober 2006 as a personal assistant / bookkeeper. She was furnished with a contract of employment in writing on 28thNovember 2006. Her salary on the commencement of the employment was fixed at €28,000 per annum. This was later increased to €30,000, after the Complainant had been in the employment for two months and one month earlier that was provided for in a commitment given to her on recruitment.

On or about 10thApril 2007 the Complainant informed the Respondent that she was pregnant. She further advised the Respondent that she would require time off to attend anti-natal hospital appointments. The Respondent asked the Complainant to furnish it with information in writing concerning the legal entitlements of pregnant employees. The Complainant took issue with this instruction and told her manager that it was the Respondent's responsibility to inform itself on these matters.

Issues arose between the Complainant and the Respondent in relation to the scheduling of her hospital appointments. The Respondent wanted the Complainant to arrange these appointments at times that were least disruptive of its business. The Complainant was unable to change the appointments from the times given by the hospital. Issues also arose concerning sick leave taken by the Complainant in relation to her pregnancy and the payment for these absences. The Complainant suffered complications in her pregnancy resulting in impaired mobility. The Complainant contends that the Respondent failed to provide her with reasonable facilities to accommodate this disability. Issues also arose between the parties in relation to certain changes in the physical environment in which the Complainant was required to work, which she contends, adversely impacted on her condition.

It is common case that the interaction between the parties on these matters caused their working relationship to deteriorate.

In or about August 2007 a further issue arose between the Complainant and her then employer concerning what the Complainant regarded as the Respondent's failure to include her in a performance appraisal for the purpose of assessing a pay increase. The Complainant also took issue with the Respondent's failure to pay her a holiday bonus to which she considered herself entitled. The Complainant consulted the Equality Authority on this matter and communicated with the Respondent by e-mail reciting the advice that she had obtained. The Managing Director took exception to the Complainant having raised the matter of the bonus with a statutory agency. While the Complainant was paid the bonus the Respondent decided to discontinue these payments for all employees because of what had occurred and informed the Complainant's work colleagues accordingly. The Complainant asserts that in consequence of the Respondent's actions she was subjected to adverse treatment by her work colleagues and that this amounted to victimisation by the Respondent.

A further issue arose between the Complainant and her manager concerning the completion of a form for the purpose of claiming maternity leave. The form was given to the Respondent for completion in mid-July 2007 and was not completed 27thAugust 2007. This for was due to be returned to the Department of Social Protection by 3rdSeptember 2007. The Complainant contended that the completion of the form was being unduly delayed. The manager took the view that she was being pressurised to deal with the matter immediately before she went on annual leave and in circumstances in which she was trying to deal with other pressing issues.

On 7thSeptember 2007 the Complainant was asked to attend a meeting with the Managing Director and a Director of the Respondent at 5.20pm, some ten minutes before she was due to finish work and commence her annual leave. At this meeting the Complainant was informed that her employment was being terminated with immediate effect due to redundancy. The Complainant was due to commence her maternity leave shortly after her return from leave. The Respondent offered to pay the Complainant her full salary, including four weeks' pay in lieu of notice, up the end of October 2007 when her maternity leave was due to commence.

The Respondent contends that a genuine situation of redundancy existed at the material time in consequence of staff reorganisation and that the dismissal of the Complainant arose solely because of the redundancy. The Complainant contends that her dismissal was on grounds of her pregnancy or matters related thereto.

Position of the Parties

The Respondent

Evidence was given on behalf of the Respondent by Ms Collette McCrann who is a Director of the Respondent and by Mr William Fleming who is Managing Director of the Respondent. Their evidence can be summarised as follows:

Evidence of Ms McCrann

This witness outlined the history of the Complainant's employment with the Respondent. She was the Complainant's immediate manager. According to Ms McCann the Complainant's work performance was entirely satisfactory and she characterised the working relationship between them as excellent.

The witness confirmed that in early April 2007 the Complainant told her that she was pregnant. She congratulated her and wished her well. The witness said that she had three pregnancies while employed by the Respondent but had not dealt with any other pregnant employees. The witness thought that she should obtain advice on the Complainant's entitlements, and the Respondents responsibilities, in relation to her pregnancy as it was some time since she had been required to familiarise herself on such matters. Two days after she was told of the Complainant's pregnancy the witness asked the Complainant to go to the computer and run off the relevant information on the Citizens Information Centre website. According to Ms McCrann the Complainant said that this was information that the witness should have and she seemed annoyed at being asked to obtain the information. The witness said that it was necessary to update the Respondent on its legal responsibilities and that this would help her to understand the Complainant's entitlements. The Complainant obtained the information and furnished it to the witness.

Turning to the Complainant's hospital visits, Ms McCrann recalled an occasion on which the Complainant told her that she would have to leave at 1.pm to attend a hospital visit. The witness asked the Complainant if it would be possible for her to arrange visits on her way into work. She pointed out to the Complainant that they were a small company and the timing of her appointments could cause the Respondent considerable inconvenience and disruption. The Complainant reacted very badly to this suggestion. The Complainant said that she had a right to go whenever she wished. The Complainant told her that she had to accept whatever appointments were offered by the hospital. The witness suggested to the Complainant that if she (witness) could speak with the appropriate person in the hospital it might be possible to arrange the appointments at a time which was less disruptive of the business. The Complainant objected to the witness adopting such a course. From then on the appointments went ahead as arranged by the Complainant and the witness did not pursue the matter further. Ms McCrann denied having told the Complainant that she would have to arrange her hospital visits around the needs of the Respondent's business. She said that her comment in that regard was merely a suggestion. The witness was asked if she had told the Complainant that she (witness) would have to talk to Mr Fleming about the Claimants hospital appointments. She said that she had not.

The witness was asked if she had told the Complainant that the time spent attending hospital appointments would have to come out of her holidays. The witness denied having said that. She said that she accepted that the Complainant was entitled to time off for hospital appointments.

The witness said that there were about 7 seven appointments, none of which were stopped.

The Court was told that shortly after the initial discussion concerning her hospital appointments the Complainant started to communicate with the witness by e-mail. She regarded that as strange. The witness recalled another occasion on which the Complainant came into her and demanded that her maternity form be completed. That was late in the pregnancy. The witness said that she felt that their relationship deteriorated after that.

When asked to comment on the Complainant's complaint that she was subjected to criticism concerning her work the witness denied that the Complainant has been subjected to any criticism.

The witness acknowledged that the Complainant had been absent from work due to morning sickness but denied that she had taken issue with her absences. In particular, the witness denied that she had told the Complainant that morning sickness was unacceptable as an excuse for not coming to work.

The witness was asked if a risk assessment had been undertaken. She said that there were no risks which could have posed a hazard to the Complainant. The witness described the physical layout of the premises. She said that there was an office on the ground floor in which the Complainant worked. She said that the Complainant was not required to move around the premises. The witness told the Court that she was never made aware that there was a possibility that the Complainant would have to use crutches due to a pregnancy related complication.

In relation to the maternity benefit form, the witness said that the Complainant gave her the form in or about mid-July 2007 and asked her to complete it. On or about 27thAugust the Complainant came back to ask her about the form and demanded that it be filled in immediately. At the time the witness said that she was busy and did not have the time to fill in the form. She told her that she would deal with it as soon as possible. At the time the witness was going on holidays. She told her that it would be dealt with when she returned from holidays. The witness said that the maternity benefit form was filled in by a colleague the next day.

While Ms McCrann acknowledged that the relationship between her and the Complainant has deteriorated she did not know why that had occurred.

In dealing with the circumstances surrounding the termination of the Complainant's employment, Ms McCrann provided the Court with details of changes in the structure of the Respondent's business activities that occurred in 2007. She said that the caf€ business had closed down resulting in financial loss to the Respondent. It also had an involvement in a social housing project in the UK and this too had performed badly. Certain contracts in which the Respondent was involved were also lost in this period. The witness also described changes in staff structure that had occurred at the material time. She said that a paper business that the Respondent operated on the north side of the city had been relocated to the facility in Ballymount in which she worked and that the manager of that facility, Mr C, was relocated there. This person took over some of the administration work in which the witness had been involved. The Respondent also agreed to employ a warehouse manager, Mr E, in or around August 2008, to take over the role previously undertaken by other staff members who had left the employment, although this person actually commenced employment after the Complainant's dismissal. Apart from working in the forecourt this person also took over some of the office administration work previously undertaken by the witness. According to Ms McCrann, as a result of these changes her work load had significantly diminished and there was insufficient work in the administration of the business for herself and the Complainant. The Court was told that in these circumstances it was decided that the Complainant's role should be taken over by the witness, as she had previously undertaken these duties, and it was decided to make the Complainant redundant.

The witness recalled the events of 7th September 2007. She told the Court that the Complainant was summoned to a meeting at approximately 5.20 in the afternoon. The witness accepted that the Complainant was not given notice of this meeting. Mr Fleming, the Managing Director, and the witness were present at this meeting. The Complainant was told of the difficulty that had arisen and of the decision to make her redundant. The Complainant asked if her husband, who was waiting outside the premised to collect her from work, could attend the meeting. The Respondent agreed that he could.

At the meeting the Complainant was told that because of the staffing and business changes described she would be taking over the Complainant's role. The Complainant was told that she would not be required to work out her notice and that she could clean out her desk and leave that evening. The Respondent agreed to pay the Complainant up to the expected commencement date of her maternity leave, including one month's pay in lieu of notice. When asked why the Complainant had not been warned of the impending redundancy the witness said that the Complainant should have known that there was a falloff in her work and the redundancy should not have come as a surprise to her. The witness agreed that no one else was considered for redundancy. She said that it was the Complainant's job that had become redundant. The witness also agreed that she never considered retraining the Complainant to take on the role for which the new warehouse manager had been employed.

The witness said that the administration work associated with the caf business was a significant consideration in the decision to employ the Complainant. It closed some two months after the Complainant commenced employment. They had been trying to hold on for as long as possible. The witness said that there was also a significant amount of administrative work associated with the social housing projects and this too had diminished. The witness agreed that the caf business had been in decline for some time before the Complainant was employed.

The witness agreed that Mr E was employed after the Complainant was let go but she maintained that he did not do the comparable work to that of the Complainant.

Evidence of William Fleming

Mr William Fleming, who is Managing Director of the Respondent, gave evidence.

Mr Fleming referred the Court to a document which he had prepared headed'Operational and Staff Changes in Trailercare Holdings'dated 7thSeptember 2007. This document, which was put in evidence, set out the operational and staff changes upon which the Respondent relied in making the Complainant redundant. It was created for the purpose of the meeting with the Complainant at which her employment was terminated and it was given to her at the meeting of 7thSeptember 2007. Mr Fleming took the Court through the detail contained in the document.

This witness said that the paper business, formally located on the north side of the city was transferred to the Ballymount site. Mr C, who managed that business, transferred to Ballymount. He was a senior person in the Company and his relocation resulted in some restructuring of working arrangements. This document also referred to the loss of the Respondent's biggest customer, which accounted for approximately 65% of the Respondent's business. The caf business operated by the Respondent had also closed. The Respondent had an investment in social housing and it was found that this was not working out with the result that the Respondent was forced to sell on a number of properties.

The witness said that there were other significant changes in staffing arrangements around that time. The most significant of these changes was the arrival of Mr C. According to Mr Fleming both he and Ms McCrann had managed the various aspects of the Respondent's business ventures that had gone into decline. Mr C had managed the paper business.

Mr Fleming referred to other changes. He said that in the first quarter of 2007 the warehouse manager, Ms F, had left the employment. He had tried to bring in people who were not experienced in warehousing to replace Ms F. He had recruited a Mr S and a Ms G but that did not work.

Changes were made in the reporting structures within the business during 2007. Mr C took over responsibility for administration and that released Ms McCrann from those duties. Furthermore, the loss of the main business of the major customer, previously referred to, reduced the administrative requirements of the business. During this time the Respondent did take on a driver. Ms G, who was employed to replace Ms F, left the employment in July of that year. The witness told the Court that he then decided that the business needed a good warehouse manager. He approached the manager of a company with which the Respondent did business (Mr E) and asked him if he would take on the role of warehouse manager. Terms were agreed on which Mr E would join the Respondent. While terms were agreed in or about August of that year Mr E's commencement date was to be in September.

Dealing with the basis for the decision to make Complainant redundant, the witness said that when Mr E agreed to join the business it became clear that Ms McCrann would be released from a significant amount of her workload. The Respondent had incurred a significant trading loss, of the order of €500k, in the year up to 30thJune 2007. According to the witness some remedial action was required to deal with the situation that had emerged. There was a requirement for administrative work and the Complainant had done that job well. It was clear, however, that Ms McCrann was being freed of much of her workload. They were then faced with a situation in which there were two people able to do the same job and only one was required. In these circumstance the decision was taken to make the Complainant redundant and for Ms McCrann to take over her role. Mr Fleming told the Court that having come to that decision he decided that it would be best to tell the Complainant sooner rather than later. He arranged to meet the Complainant on the evening of 7thSeptember and inform her of the decision. The pivotal consideration in arriving at that decision was that Ms McCrann had become free to take over the role of the Complainant.

The Complainant was given a letter dated 7thSeptember 2007 informing her that her employment was terminated with immediate effect and that payment in lieu of notice would be provided.

Mr Fleming accepted that the difficulties in the trading position of the Respondent were apparent at the time the Complainant was employed. When asked to what degree the losses incurred by the business had influenced the decision to make the Complainant redundant, Mr Fleming told the Court that this was not a material consideration. Mr Fleming also agreed that Mr E had in fact commenced employment with the Respondent after the Complainant had been made redundant. He agreed that Mr E was the effective replacement for Ms F. He said that he had not considered assigning this role to Ms McCrann so as to avoid making the Complainant redundant nor had he considered assigning this role to the Complainant and providing her with any necessary training. Mr Fleming also accepted that another contract had been obtained after the loss of the major customer previously referred to in his evidence.

Turning to the remedial work undertaken at the Robinhood premises, Mr Fleming told the Court that the building was flooded in or around July 2007. Ground floor offices were principally affected. It became necessary to take up carpets and replace them. Around the same time it was decided to change the layout of the office and this involved the demolition of a wall. The work extended over a two week period. According to Mr Fleming during the demolition and reconstruction work a strong plastic cover was used to prevent dust and other building particles from entering the office area where staff, including the Complainant, worked. Re-painting work was undertaken at weekends when the premises were not being used by staff. The witness accepted that there was a noticeable smell of paint in the office and an extractor fan was used to ameliorate this smell. The witness accepted that the Complainant had raised issues with him concerning the physical state of the building at that time but he was satisfied that adequate measures had been taken to eliminate any inconvenience or discomfort occasioned by the works.

With reference to the Complainant's requirement to use crutches in consequence of her pregnancy related condition, Mr Fleming said that she had never actually used them at work. He said that the Complainant never had to use stairs in the course of her work. The witness accepted that approximately two weeks before she left the employment the Complainant had told him that she would probably be required to use crutches because of a pregnancy related complication. He said that there were no hazards or dangers affecting the Complainant in the workplace and there was no need to involve her in undertaking a safety assessment.

Turning to the Complaint's complaints at not being given a performance related pay increase in 2007, the witness said that the use of that term was somewhat of a misnomer. It was not the practice of the Respondent to assess the performance of staff for the purpose of awarding pay increases. He said that the business is driven by the demands of customers and this, rather that the individual performance, determined the level of productivity. The witness said that almost without exception he personally decided what increases, if any, should be applied. He generally took into account the financial circumstances of the business and the increases in the cost of living since the last increase in deciding on adjustments in pay. The review date was 30thJune each year. He said that any increase decided upon did not apply to staff members with less than a full year's service. It was Mr Fleming's evidence that the reason for not including the Complainant in the review at 30thJune 2007 was that she did not have the requisite full years' service at that point. The witness accepted that two named workers, with less than a full years' service, had received increases of €4,000 each in July 2007. Mr Fleming said that the two workers in question were initially employed at €2 per hour less than the standard rate for their job and he had promised to bring their rate up to the standard rate subject to satisfactory service. He felt compelled to honour his word in that regard. The witness denied that the Complainant had received a commitment to a salary review.

In relation to what was described as a holiday bonus, Mr Fleming told the Court that it was his practice to make special payments to staff when they went on their annual holidays as a 'thank you' gesture. He said that these were small amounts of around €100. They were paid personally by the witness in cash from his own resources and not from the Company accounts. Mr Fleming characterised these payments as gratuitous and informal. Staff did not have a contractual entitlement to these payments.

Mr Fleming told the Court that he became aware that in or about 9th August 2007 the Complainant mentioned to Ms McCrann that she was not included in a pay review and had not been paid a bonus. The witness was on holidays at that time. According to Mr Fleming only one employee, who had less than one year's service was paid a bonus that summer and that was in error. He said that Mr C did not understand the basis for these payments and had paid a bonus to a named employee with less than the required service without the witness's knowledge.

The Complainant insisted that this matter be dealt with and had sent an e-mail to the Respondent stating that she had consulted the Equality Authority in the matter and believed that she was entitled to receive the payment. Mr Fleming paid the Complainant the disputed bonus but he accepted that he felt aggrieved that she had raised the matter with a statutory authority. He said that had she come to him directly he would have paid the bonus.

It was Mr Fleming's evidence that because the Complainant had elevated the question of the bonus to what he described as 'another level' he was forced to reconsider his pervious practice in this matter and decided that the payment of bonuses would have to be discontinued. Some weeks later he informed all staff accordingly. He said that he informed staff that a situation had arisen whereby the informal practice could not continue and in consequence the bonuses would no longer be paid. He said that he had not mentioned the Complainant's name in the course of his discussions with other staff and he was not aware that she had been 'victimised' by others in consequence of what he had told them. When reminded that in his evidence to the Equality Officer he said that he had told the staff that the matter had been raised with the Equality Authority, the witness accepted that this was probably what he had said.

In dealing with the Complainant's complaints concerning the Respondent's attitude towards her hospital appointments, the witness accepted that the pattern of the Complainant's absences did cause difficulty between Ms McCrann and the Complainant. Nevertheless the Complainant was facilitated in attending all of the appointments that she needed to attend. Mr Fleming told the Court that he was very hurt by the assertion that the Complainant was told that the time attending at the hospital would have to come out of her holidays. He said that the Complainant was paid in respect of all of the time spent attending hospital. The witness told the Court that the Company did not have a sick-pay arrangement and it was normal policy that when staff were absent through illness they were offered the opportunity to have the absence treated as holidays rather than suffering a loss of pay.

Mr Fleming agreed that in or about May 2007 he held a meeting with the Complainant and Ms McCrann to discuss the Complainant's grievances concerning the hospital visits. He told the Court that he considered Complainant was being unreasonable in not trying to arrange these visits around the requirements of the business. He felt that there was an onus on an employee in the circumstances of the Complainant to help a small business in minimising disruption caused by attending such appointments.

The Complainant

Evidence of the Complainant

The Complainant told the Court that she commenced employment with the Respondent in October 2006 as a bookkeeper and as personal assistant to Mr Fleming and Ms McCrann

The Complainant recalled meeting with Ms McCrann on 10th April 2007 and informing her that she was 11 weeks pregnant. She informed Ms McCrann that she would require time off to attend hospital appointments. On or about 24th April 2007 Ms McCrann asked the Complainant how she wanted to be paid for these absences. Ms McCrann told her that if she wanted to be paid the time would have to be taken as holidays. The Complainant told Ms McCrann that she was entitled to be paid for these visits. Ms McCrann then told her to print off the relevant information on pregnancy related entitlements from the Citizens Information Centre's web-site. She remarked to Ms McCrann that she should be aware of her obligations as an employer but she nevertheless printed off the information and gave it to Ms McCrann. `Ms McCrann told her that she would have to talk to Mr Fleming about the hospital visits

In the course of her enquiries the Complainant became aware that she was obliged to give her employer two weeks' notice in writing of anti-natal appointments. She sent an e-mail to Ms McCrann providing details of her next hospital appointment. According to the Complainant, Ms McCrann took issue with her for communicating in that way.

The Court was told that in or about April 2007 issues again arose around the Complainant's hospital appointments. Ms McCrann told the Complainant that she would have to arrange appointments around the Company's work requirements. The Complainant told Ms McCrann that she was attending the hospital as a semi-private patient and that she would have to take the appointments that she was offered. Ms McCrann suggested that she could contact the hospital to see if more suitable times could be arranged. The Complainant said that she explained to Ms McCrann that this would be pointless as there was no scope for flexibility having regard to her status as a semi-private patient.

The Complainant told the Court that she suffered from morning sickness from early in her pregnancy. She recalled that on one occasion she had come to work but was ill during the course of the day. She informed Ms McCrann that she would have to go home. According to the Complainant Ms McCrann became very annoyed and told her that morning sickness was unacceptable as an excuse for not being at work. She said that she then visited her GP who placed her on certified sick leave for one week.

The Complainant said that she did attend all of her hospital appointments and confirmed that she was paid in respect of the absences concerned. She did not accept that the issues around these absences had been satisfactorily resolved. According to the Complainant, on each occasion on which she informed the Respondent of an impending appointment Ms McCrann's demeanour was one of annoyance. She also told the Court that at a meeting with Mr Fleming, held on 24thMay 2007, she was again told that she should arrange her hospital appointments around the needs of the business.

The Complainant told the Court that in the initial stages of her employment the relationship between her and her managers was excellent. She recalled that when she moved house the Respondent provided her with the use of a trailer and storage facilities. She said that she got on well with colleagues in the office although she was advised by Ms McCrann that she should not be too familiar with colleagues in view of the sensitive nature of her work in so far as it involved the payroll. She helped out in the caf€ business and in other areas of the Respondent's business outside of her main duties. According to the Complainant, the relationship went downhill after the issues arose concerning her hospital visits.

In relation to staff changes, the Complainant recalled that Ms G came to work with the Respondent in or about July 2007 as warehouse manager. The Complainant was asked to show Ms G what she did despite having previously been told by Ms McCrann that her work was of a confidential nature. Around that time the Complainant formed the view that she was effectively being asked to train Ms G to do her job. It was the Complainant's evidence that as well as her normal duties she had taken over the major part of the job previously undertaken by Ms F, the previous warehouse manager, apart from overseeing work undertaken in the yard of the premises.

In dealing with the events of 7thSeptember 2007, the Complainant recalled that she was going on holidays at the end of that day and that she had been extremely busy in the preceding period. She was due to finish work at 5.30 and her husband had called to the premises to drive her home. At 5.20pm she received a call to attend a meeting with Mr Fleming in his office. She had no prior indication of what the meeting was about. She was given the document referred to by Mr Fleming in his evidence and told that she was being dismissed for reasons of redundancy. She was told that Ms McCrann was to take over her role within the employment. The Complainant told the Court that she was devastated and found it difficult to take in what was happening. She asked if her husband, who was waiting outside in their car, could attend the meeting. It was agreed that he could attend and she went outside and asked him to join them. She said that Mr Fleming told her that she was to finish on that day and that she would be paid up to the end of October when she was due to commence maternity leave. She had no prior warning that redundancy was being considered. There had been no fall-off in the work in which she was engaged and in fact she was busier than ever in the previous number of weeks.

The Complainant gave it as her opinion that she could have undertaken the job that Mr E was employed to do. This was effectively the role previously undertaken by Ms F, the major part of which she was already doing. It was put to the Complainant that the Respondent's case was that this role involved driving a forklift truck and lifting heavy boxes. She said that she had never seen Ms F driving a forklift truck although she understood that she may have been required to lift boxes but this would have rarely arisen.

The Complainant went on to detail to the Court the nature and effect of the pregnancy related disability which she developed in mid-2007. In or about July of that year she was required to wear a special belt for support. Both Mr Fleming and Ms McCrann were aware of her disability and its affects. She was in considerable pain at that time but she got on with her work. Contrary to Mr Fleming's evidence, the Complainant said that she was asked to use the stairs five or six times a day. She was never asked to undergo a risk assessment at that or any other time.

In dealing with the renovations at the office the Complainant said that while she was on leave the premises had been flooded, she thought from the overflow of a stream at the back of the premises. The carpets were destroyed but still on the floor. There was also a smell of sewerage in the offices. She could not remain in her normal place of work and went to sit in the kitchen. Ms McCrann came in a said that she needed to get back to her desk. The remedial work did not commence until approximately two weeks after the damage was caused. It was then decided to take down a wall in the office. The Complainant recalled that the office area was covered in dust and there was a very strong and unpleasant odour throughout her work area. The Complainant asked Ms McCrann if she could move but was told that she was being ridiculous. The Complainant raised the matter with Mr Fleming who said that he would get extractors and keep the windows open. She felt nauseous and uncomfortable in consequence of the environment in which she was required to work.

In relation to the July appraisal and the bonus issue, the Complainant said that when she accepted employment with the Respondent she was offered a salary of €28,000 per year. Her previous employment had been as an assistant manager of a restaurant where her salary was €30,000 per annum and she was somewhat unhappy with the amount offered. She was told that her salary would be reviewed after three months. Some two months after she commenced employment she was told that the Respondent was very happy with her performance and her salary was increased to €30,000. She was assured by Ms McCrann that she would be included in the July appraisal. The Complainant went on holidays in July. On her return she was asked by colleagues if she had received a holiday bonus and if she had been included in the July appraisal. She raised the matter with Ms McCrann whose response was that she did not like her attitude. She then contacted the Equality Authority by phone and obtained advice. She did not take a note of the name of the person to whom she spoke. On or about 13thAugust 2007, as a result of the advice that she received, she sent an e-mail to the Respondent on the matter. Mr Fleming called her up to his office and expressed his annoyance at her for having raised the matter with the Equality Authority. Mr Fleming told her that the bonus was not paid because she had less than one year's service. The Complainant told the Court that she had never previously heard that a full year's service was a condition for payment of the bonus. She said that she was aware that the bonus varied in amount and she thought that this was related to service. She gave an example of one employee who, to her knowledge, had received a bonus of €300. Having raised the matter Mr Fleming then gave the Complainant a cheque which the Complainant thought was for around €130.

In reply to a question from the Court the Complainant said that the cheque was drawn on the Respondent's account. It was pointed out to the Complainant that in his evidence Mr Fleming had said that bonuses were paid in cash and from his own resources. The Complainant said that she had a clear recollection of the payment being by way of a Company cheque. The Complainant also told the Court that in the course of her work she had seen at least some bonus payments being processed through the payroll.

On the following day the Complainant was approached by named colleagues who were angry and remonstrated with her for having had the bonus payments taken from them. As a result of what they said to her the Complainant became aware that Mr Fleming had immediately gone to other employees and informed them that the bonus was being withdrawn. As a result of what had been conveyed to them by Mr Fleming her colleagues were aware that the bonus was being withdrawn because she had contacted the Equality Authority in the matter. The Complainant was reminded that in his evidence Mr Fleming had told the Court that it was some weeks after her meeting with him that he had spoken to other employees on this matter. The Complainant said that she was sure that it was on the following day that she had the encounter with her colleagues.

Issues arising

The issues arising for decision in this case are, firstly, whether the Complainant was dismissed solely on grounds of redundancy, as contended for by the Respondent, or whether the dismissal was tainted by discrimination on gender grounds by reason of the Complainant's pregnancy; secondly, whether the Complainant was discriminated against on gender grounds by reason of pregnancy in relation to her conditions of employment in the attitude adopted by the Respondent towards her anti-natal hospital appointments and in the failure of the Respondent to attend to her application for maternity benefit in a timely manner and in failing to provide her with a safe place of work having regard to her pregnancy related disability; thirdly whether she was victimised by the Respondent for having consulted the Equality Authority in relation to the bonus payment. While there are significant questions of law arising in the case these are essentially questions of fact and degree to be determined on the evidence. The Court has carefully evaluated all of the testimony proffered in the case and had taken account of the demeanour of the witnesses in giving their evidence. The Court has also taken account of the many documents put in evidence.

The law applicable

Protection of Women during Pregnancy

In a line of authorities starting with the decision in C-177/88,Dekker v Stichting Vormingcentrum voor Junge Volwassenen[1990] ECR 1-3841 the Court of Justice of the European Union (formally the ECJ) has made it clear that since pregnancy is a uniquely female condition any adverse treatment of a woman on grounds of pregnancy is direct discrimination on ground of her sex. Thus, the law of the European Union recognises the reality that to treat a woman less favourably because she is pregnant is to discriminate against her because she is a woman. That can never be justified. Issues such as disruption caused to an employer's business or costs associated with accommodating a pregnant woman in employment are, as a matter of Union law, wholly irrelevant.

Since the decision inDekkerthe protection afforded to pregnant women in employment has been strengthened considerably in the case law of the CJEU and in the legislative provisions of the European Union. Equality on grounds of gender is now expressly guaranteed by Article 23 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. Article 33.2 of that Charter also incorporates the prohibition of dismissal on grounds of pregnancy established in jurisprudence of the CJEU. It provides: -

- To reconcile family and professional life, everyone shall have the right to protection from dismissal for a reason connected with maternity and the right to paid maternity leave and to parental leave following the birth or adoption of a child.

The Charter is now incorporated in the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (the Lisbon Treaty) and has the same legal standing as all preceding and current Treaties. It can thus be properly regarded as part of the primary legislation of the European Union.

The jurisprudential principle that discrimination on grounds of pregnancy constitutes direct discrimination on grounds of sex is now codified in Directive 2006/54/EC on the Principle of Equal Treatment of Men and Women (the Recast Directive). This Directive provides, at Article 2. 2 (c), that any less favourable treatment of a woman related to pregnancy or maternity leave within the meaning of Directive 92/85/EEC constitutes unlawful discrimination for the purpose of that Directive.

Directive 92/85/EEC (the Pregnancy Directive) provides a comprehensive legal framework in which special protection is afforded to the safety health and welfare of pregnant women in employment. Article 4 of the Directive places an obligation on employers to assess risks that may be imposed on pregnant women in employment and requires them to address any risks identified. Article 9 of the Directive provides pregnant women with a right to time off work, without loss of pay, to attend anti-natal examination if such examination must take place during working hours. Article 10 of the Directive is of particular and far reaching significance. It provides: -

- In order to guarantee workers, within the meaning of Article 2, the exercise of their health and safety protection rights as recognised under this Article, it shall be provided that:
- 1.Member States shall take the necessary measures to prohibit the dismissal of workers, within the meaning of Article 2, during the period from the beginning of their pregnancy to the end of the maternity leave referred to in Article 8 (1), save in exceptional cases not connected with their condition which are permitted under national legislation and/or practice and, where applicable, provided that the competent authority has given its consent;
- 2.If a worker, within the meaning of Article 2, is dismissed during the period referred to in point 1, the employer must cite duly substantiated grounds for her dismissal in writing;3.Member States shall take the necessary measures to protect workers, within the meaning of Article 2, from consequences of dismissal which is unlawful by virtue of point 1.

The underlying rationale for the prohibition of dismissal on grounds of pregnancy is discernible from recital 15 of the Directive which provides: -

- "Whereas the risk of dismissal for reasons associated with their condition may have harmful effects on the physical and mental state of pregnant workers, workers who have recently given birth or who are breastfeeding; provision should be made for such dismissal to be prohibited"

The importance of this latter provision, in deciding cases within the ambit of the Equal Treatment Directive, has been emphasised by the CJEU on a number of occasions. Most recently in case C-232/09Danosa v LKB Lizings SIA[2011] CMLR 45, at 60, the Court said: -

- "It is precisely in view of the harmful effects which the risk of dismissal may have on the physical and mental state of women who are pregnant, have recently given birth or are breastfeeding, including the particularly serious risk that pregnant women may be prompted voluntarily to terminate their pregnancy, that, pursuant to Article 10 of Directive 92/85, the EU legislature provided for special protection for women, by prohibiting dismissal during the period from the beginning of pregnancy to the end of maternity leave"

The Court then continued at par 61 of the report: -

- "During that period, Article 10 of Directive 92/85 does not provide for any exception to, or derogation from, the prohibition on dismissing pregnant workers, save in exceptional cases not connected with their condition, provided that the employer gives substantiated grounds for the dismissal in writing"

It is noteworthy that in reaching its decision inDanosathe CJEU, at par 71 of its Judgment, had regard to Article 23 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.

In Case 406/06Paquay v Soci�t� d'architectes Hoet + Minne SPRL[2007] ECR 1-8511, the Court pointed out that in accordance with its case law the prohibition of less favourable treatment, including dismissal, on grounds of pregnancy comes within the ambit of both the Equal Treatment Directive and the Pregnancy Directive. As the Court pointed out at par 29 of the report: -

- BeforeDirective 92/85came into force, the Court had already held that, under the principle of non-discrimination and, particularly,Articles 2(1)and5(1) of Directive 76/207, protection against dismissal should be granted to women not only during maternity leave, but also throughout the period of the pregnancy. According to the Court, a dismissal occurring during those periods affects only women and therefore constitutes direct discrimination on the grounds of sex (see, to that effect, Case C-179/88 Handels- og Kontorfunktion�rernes Forbund [1990] ECR I-3979, paragraph 15; Case C-394/96 Brown [1998] ECR I-4185, paragraphs 24 to 27; and McKenna , paragraph 47).

The importance of providing real and effective redress in cases where the rights of pregnant workers are infringed was emphasised by the Court at pars 45 -47 of its judgment inPaquay. Here the Court said: -

- 45However, the objective is to arrive at real equality of opportunity and cannot therefore be attained in the absence of measures appropriate to restore such equality when it has not been observed. Those measures must guarantee real and effective judicial protection and have a real deterrent effect on the employer (Marshall , paragraph 24).46Such requirements necessarily entail that the particular circumstances of each breach of the principle of equal treatment should be taken into account. Where financial compensation is the measure adopted in order to achieve the objective previously indicated, it must be adequate, in that it must enable the loss and damage actually sustained as a result of the discriminatory dismissal to be made good in full in accordance with the applicable national rules (Marshall , paragraphs 25 and 26).47It is necessary to recall that, in accordance withArticle 12 of Directive 92/85, Member States are also bound to take the necessary measures to enable all workers who consider themselves wronged by failure to comply with the obligations arising from that directive, including those arising from its Article 10, to pursue their claims by judicial process.Article 10(3) of Directive 92/85specifically states that Member States shall take the necessary measures to protect pregnant workers or those who have recently given birth or are breastfeeding from the consequences of dismissal which is unlawful by virtue of paragraph 1 of that provision.

- 49While recognising that the Member States are not bound, underArticle 6 of Directive 76/207orArticle 12 of Directive 92/85, to adopt a specific measure, nevertheless the fact remains, as is clear from paragraph 45 of the present judgment, that the measure chosen must be such as to ensure effective and efficient legal protection, must have a genuine dissuasive effect with regard to the employer and must be commensurate with the injury suffered.

Also of relevance, in the context of the appropriate form of redress, particularly in cases involving discriminatory dismissal, is the decision of the CJEU inMarshall v (No 2) Southampton and South-West Hampshire Area Health Authority[1993] IRLR 445 which was referred to in the passage fromPaquay, recited above. Here, at paragraph 31, the Court said: -

- "With regard to the second part of the second question relating to the award of interest, suffice it to say that full compensation for the loss and damage sustained as a result of discriminatory dismissal cannot leave out of account factors, such as the effluxion of time, which may in fact reduce its value. The award of interest, in accordance with the applicable national rules, must therefore be regarded as an essential component of compensation for the purposes of restoring real equality of treatment."

It abundantly clear from these authorities, and from the legislative provision of the European Union, that women are to be afforded special protection from adverse treatment, and in particular from dismissal on account of their condition, from the commencement of their pregnancy until the end of their maternity leave. The entitlement to that protection is to be regarded as a fundamental and inviolable right within the legal order of the Union which the Courts and Tribunals of the Union must vindicated within the limits of their jurisdiction. It seems equally clear that where a pregnant woman is dismissed during this period of special protection the employer bears the burden of proving, on cogent and credible evidence, that the dismissal was in no sense whatsoever related to her pregnancy. This is a matter that the Court will consider further in addressing the application of the burden of proof in cases such as the instant case.

Burden of Proof

Section 85A of the Act now provides for the allocation of the probative burden as between the Complainant and the Respondent in cases coming with its ambit. This section provides, in effect, that the Complainant bears the initial burden of proving facts from which discrimination may be inferred. If those facts are established, and if they are regarded by the Court as of sufficient significance to raise an inference of discrimination, the onus passes to the Respondent to show that the principle of equal treatment was not infringed in relation to the Complainant.

Where the probative burden shifts the Respondent must show a complete dissonance between the discriminatory ground relied upon and the impugned conduct or omission. Thus, inWong v Igen Limited[2005] IRLR 258 (a decision of the Court of Appeal for England and Wales), Peter Gibson LJ pointed out that where the Respondent fails to show that the discriminatory ground was anything other than a trivial influence in the impugned decision the complaint will be made out.

As was pointed out by this Court in Determination EDA0821,Kieran McCarthy v Cork City Council, at the initial stage the complainant is merely seeking to establish a prima facie case. Hence, it is not necessary to establish that the conclusion of discrimination is the only, or indeed the most likely, explanation which can be drawn from the facts proved. It is sufficient that the presumption is within the range of inferences which can reasonably be drawn from those facts.

For reasons already mentioned in this Determination, the special protection afforded to pregnant woman against dismissal in European law requires that where a pregnant woman is dismissed the employer must bear the burden of proving that the dismissal was grounded on exceptional circumstances unrelated to pregnancy or maternity. Hence, in every case in which pregnancy related dismissal is in issue, the factual combination of the dismissal and the woman's pregnancy must, in and of itself, place the onus of proving the absence of discrimination firmly on the Respondent.

However, for reasons that follow, there is a significantly broader factual matrix in the instant case from which the existence of discrimination on grounds of pregnancy can be inferred.

The facts

The Court heard evidence from two witnesses on behalf of the Respondent and from the Complainant herself. Overall the Court found the evidence tendered by the witnesses for the Respondent unsatisfactory and lacking in candour in many material respects. By contrast the Court found that the Complainant gave honest evidence to the best of her recollection. Where there is conflict in that evidence tendered on behalf of the Respondent and that tendered by the Complainant, the Court prefers the evidence tendered by the Complainant.

It is clear from the evidence that in the initial stages of her employment the working relationship between the Complainant and her employers was positive and cooperative. After the Complainant informed the Respondent of her pregnancy that relationship deteriorated to the point where the dominant disposition of the Respondent towards the Complainant descended into one of enmity.

It is clear from the evidence that the reason for this deterioration stemmed from the Complainant's insistence on exercising her legal right to take time off work to attend anti-natal hospital appointments and her insistence on being paid for these absences. In that regard the Court accepts as a fact that both Ms McCrann and Mr Fleming believed that the Complainant was acting unreasonably in not arranging her hospital appointments around the convenience of the Respondent's business and that her instance on being paid for the time in question, rather than taking it as holidays, placed an undue burden on the Respondent. While the Respondent had no choice but to allow the Complainant to attend these appointments during normal working hours the Court accepts the Complainant's evidence that throughout the period in question she was made to feel uncomfortable at so doing and that her manager displayed her displeasure on each occasion on which she was informed of an impending visit.

The Court is also satisfied that the Respondent displayed a total lack of consideration for the Complainant physical condition during what it knew was a difficult pregnancy. It failed to undertake any meaningful risk assessment or to discuss with her adjustments that could be made in the duties that she was required to undertaken or in the physical environment in which she was required to work.

The Court also accepts as a fact that the Complainant was promised that her salary would be reviewed in June 2007 and that the Respondent resiled from that commitment. The Court believes, as a matter of probability, that this was because of various issues that were inexorably connected with the Complainant's pregnancy. The Court also accepts that the Respondent failed to attend to the completion of the Complainant's application for maternity benefit in a timely manner. This caused the Complainant undue anxiety and distress. The relevant form merely required the Respondent to answer six basic questions and the Court finds it impossible to accept Ms McCrann's evidence that she was too busy to attend to the form, particularly in light of her claims that her work load had diminished around that period to the point that she was able to take over the Complainant's role.

In all of these issues the Court is satisfied that the Complainant was discriminated against in respect to her conditions of employment.

In relation to the events surrounding the bonus payments, it is clear that the Complainant believed that she was being denied this payment for reasons related to her pregnancy. She sought advice from the Equality Authority, as was her right. She was forthright in informing her employer of the import of the advice that she had received and of the source of that advice. In his evidence to the Court Mr Fleming did not seek to disguise his annoyance at what the Complainant had done. He then withdrew the benefit of this bonus from all other employees and the Court has no doubt that the manner in which he conveyed that decision to other staff members pointed to the Complainant as being responsible for bringing it about. Inevitably, those from whom the benefit was withdrawn vented their anger at the Complainant and caused her further distress. The Court cannot accept that Mr Fleming did not appreciate or intend what were the natural and probable consequences of his actions.

The Court is satisfied that the actions of Mr Fleming in this regard constituted an act of victimisation directed against the Complainant for seeking to assert a right under the Act.

The most serious issue arising in this case relates to the decision to dismiss the Complainant and in the manner of its implementation. As previously adverted to in this determination, the law recognises that during pregnancy women are physically and emotionally vulnerable and the effects of dismissal can have a particularly deleterious effect on their physical and mental health. It is for that reason that the law provides special protection to pregnant women against dismissal except in exceptional circumstances. It is for the Respondent to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that such exceptional circumstances existed in this case. In the Court view it has wholly failed to discharge that burden.

At the time of her dismissal the Complainant was due to commence maternity leave and would have been absent from her employment for a period of a least six months during which she would not have been paid. At the time of her dismissal she was paid her full salary up to the time that her maternity leave was due to commence. There could be no justification for dismissing the Complainant at that time regardless of what circumstances may have existed. However, on the evidence, the Court is not convinced that a genuine situation of redundancy existed at the material time. While there was some restructuring in the staffing arrangements, they did not, in fact, result in the Respondent having fewer employees. At the time of the Complainant's dismissal the Respondent was in the process of recruiting a new employee and no consideration whatsoever was given to assigning the role to be undertaken by that person to either Ms McCrann or to the Complainant. On this point the Court accepts the Complainant's evidence that she had previously undertaken a substantial part of the job to which the new employee was assigned.

The manner in which the dismissal was implemented is a serious aggregating factor in this case. The decision to dismiss the Complainant must have been in the contemplation of the Respondent for some time yet the Complainant was given no prior indication of what was to occur. She was informed of her dismissal some ten minutes before she was due to finish work and go on annual leave. She was merely informed of the decision and given no opportunity to make representations on her own behalf. In the Court's view no reasonable employer, acting bona fide, would have behaved in such a manner.

Having regard to all the evidence Court cannot accept that the decision to dismiss was taken solely on grounds of redundancy. In these circumstances the Court must conclude that the Respondent was motivated by consideration of the Complainant's pregnancy or by matters related thereto.

Conclusion

For all of the reasons set out herein the Court is satisfied that Complainant was discriminated against on grounds of her gender, that she was victimised and that she was subjected to a discriminatory dismissal. Accordingly, the Court affirms the decision of the Equality Tribunal and the Respondent's appeal is disallowed.

Redress

In relation to redress, the Court affirms the award of compensation in the amount of €40,000 for the effects of the discrimination suffered by the Complainant. The Court also affirms the award of €10,000 for the victimisation suffered by the Complainant.

The Court also affirms the decision of the Equality Officer directing the Respondent to pay interest at the Court rate on the compensatory award for the effects of the discrimination suffered (€40,000) in respect of the period beginning on 24thJanuary 2008, being the date on which the within complaint was presented to the Equality Tribunal, and ending on the date of payment.

For the avoidance of doubt, no part of the awards made is in respect of remuneration.

The Court further affirms the ancillary order made by the Equality Officer at paragraph 6.8 of his decision.

SUBJECT:

1. Appeal of Adjudication Officer's Decision No: ADJ-00001463.

BACKGROUND:

2. The Employer appealed the decision of Adjudication Officer to the Labour Court on 11 August 2016. A Labour Court hearing took place on 5 April 2017. The following is the Court's Determination:

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Connaught Airport Development Ltd t/a Ireland West Airport Knock against the decision of an Adjudication Officer of the Workplace Relations Commission under the Employment Equality Acts 1998 – 2011(the Acts). Mr John Glavey complained that he was subjected to discriminatory treatment on the age ground in terms of Section 6(2)(f) of the Acts and contrary to Section 8 of the Acts when his former employer imposed a mandatory retirement age of 65 years.

For ease of reference, the parties will be referred to as they were at first instance, therefore Connaught Airport Development Ltd t/a Ireland West Airport Knock will be referred to as "the Respondent" and Mr John Glavey will be referred to as "the Complainant".

The Adjudication Officer held that the Complainant had established aprima faciecase of discrimination on the ground of age, and held that his complaint of discrimination was well founded. He awarded reinstatement and required the Respondent to pay the Complainant compensation in the sum of €6,500 for the effects of discrimination.

The complaint was referred to the Workplace Relations Commission on 20thJanuary 2016.

Background

The Complainant was employed as a Senior Bar Tender within the catering department of the Airport until his retirement on 6 January 2016. He was initially employed by Campbell Catering at the Airport from 1991 until 2003 and transferred to the employment of the Respondent in 2003 under the European Communities (Protection of Employees on Transfer of Undertakings) Regulations 2003(the Regulations) when the Airport's catering staff was taken over by the Respondent.

The Respondent is a regional airport which opened in May 1986 and is now the fourth largest airport in Ireland directly employing 159 staff and additional temporary staff in the summer season. It directly employs all staff involved in the day to day running of the airport. The critical operational functions include, Air Traffic Control; Fire and Security; Airline Ground Handling Services; Aircraft Refuelling and Technical and Navigation Services. Other commercial functions include Retail and Catering services.

Summary of the Complainant's Case

Ms Martina Weir, SIPTU on behalf of the Complainant submitted that the Complainant had been discriminated against as his employment was terminated when he reached his 65th birthday. Ms Weir clarified for the Court that the redress sought by the Complainant is the award of €6,500 in compensation as decided by the Adjudication Officer.

Ms Weir submitted the following points in support of the claim:-

- •Neither the Campbell Catering contract of employment nor the Respondent's contract of employment post the transfer furnished to him in 2006 contained a retirement age. The latter contract was the subject of negotiations between the Respondent and SIPTU and resulted in the final proposals being balloted upon by those employees, including the Complainant, who transferred to the Respondent in 2003.•It came as a surprise to the Complainant when the Respondent informed him that he would be retiring in January 2016.•Negotiations conducted between 2004 and 2006 concluded in an agreement to harmonise the terms and conditions of employment of former Campbell Catering's staff with existing terms for established Airport employees. However, the new contracts issued did not fix a retirement age, despite the Respondent having the opportunity to do so.•While the Complainant was aware of retirements from the Airport he may not necessarily have been aware of the ages of the retirees. There were at least two employees who were retained beyond their 65th birthdays.•The Complainant is fit and well and had no difficulty carrying out the duties associated with his job. Therefore there is no justification for a mandatory retirement age in this situation.•The Government has increased the age for receipt of the state pension to 66 years; there is a requirement on those between 65 and 66 years to be available for work. Therefore there can be no justifiable objective reason for the Respondent's decision to place the Complainant in such a position, and no legitimate aim or objective, can be served which could not be achieved by allowing the Complainant to remain until he reaches 66 years.•The Complainant is one of a few who hold a 39 hour per week contract of employment whereas new recruits are on temporary and/or part-time contracts, and this seems to be the influencing factor in the decision taken by the Respondent, as opposed to the aim of freeing up positions for younger people entering the employment.•The Complainant is not a member of an occupational pension scheme and will not qualify for the state pension until he reaches 66 years. While the Respondent introduced an occupational pension scheme in 2010, the Complainant did not join as it was his belief that he would not gain any benefit from it.

Summary of the Respondent's Position

Ms Mary Fay, B.L., instructed by Pembroke Solicitors, on behalf of the Respondent, disputed the claim that the Complainant was discriminated against on the age ground.

Ms Fay submitted the following points in support of the Respondent's position:-

- •The Respondent's age of retirement of 65 years had been justified within the meaning of section 34(4) of the Acts and Article 6 of the Directive 2000/78/EC "Establishing a General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Education" (the Directive), and that the means chosen by the Respondent are both appropriate and necessary for achieving that aim.•It was an express term of the Complainant's terms and conditions of employment with Campbell Catering that employment would not continue past an employee's 65th birthday. The Complainant signed and accepted these terms in 1998. While all Campbell Catering employees who transferred to the Respondent pursuant to the Regulations in 2003 did so on their existing terms and conditions, some of those terms were revised pursuant to a collective agreement reached with SIPTU in 2004. All affected employees including the Complainant were issued with new contracts of employment.•An occupational pension scheme has been available to all hourly paid employees, including the Complainant, since 2011 which provides for employees to make a contribution of 5% to the scheme and the Respondent makes a matching contribution. All employees of the Respondent were notified of the introduction of the scheme and the pension provider gave presentations to the staff in 2010. Prior to 2011 the Respondent facilitated all employees wishing to make arrangements for a private pension through a PRSA. The Complainant elected not to make contributions to a PRSA or the occupational pension scheme once established.•The Respondent strives for cohesion throughout the workforce and has one universal retirement age for all staff. This ensures consistency amongst all of its employees and creates certainty in succession planning for the airport.•This certainty allows it to plan ahead to find suitable replacements for workers who leave or are coming up to retirement.•It allows the Respondent to avoid the need to terminate an employment contract in situations which are humiliating for workers by reasons of their advanced age, thus preserving their dignity and avoiding humiliation and the need to avoid costly disputes about capacity or underperformance.•Having a retirement age at 65 years allows it to free up positions so that younger workers can enter the Respondent workforce and have a defined career path where their ambitions can be realised. The lack of new young entrees to the airport would have an adverse effect not only on the catering department, but on all departments within the Respondent, especially critical ones like the fire service, security, ground services and customer service. This would not only have an effect on productivity but also on health and safety.•While it is accepted that the new contract did not contain a mandatory retirement clause, it is submitted that such a clause should be implied as it has been the accepted custom and practice of the Respondent since 1986 for employees to retire when they reach the age of 65, save in the most limited and exceptional of circumstances. The Complainant would have been aware, or ought reasonably to have been aware of this.McCarthy v HSE[2010] ELR 165;andSweeney v Aer Lingus Teo[2013] 24 ELR 162.•The two exceptions related to (i) an employee who worked in retail retired in July 2009 at age 65, approximately 11 months post her 65th birthday. This arose in exceptional circumstances due to operational requirements at that time as passenger numbers increased by 73,080 from 2007 to 2008 and (ii) an employee, who was compulsorily retired at age 65, was re-engaged on a fixed term contract in exceptional circumstances relating to work for a stand-alone capital runway overlay project and his salary was reclaimed from the Department of Transport.•The Respondent fully believes in creating promotional opportunities for more junior staff and its preference is always to promote from within. Job vacancies are posted internally first, as internal promotion is good for staff morale.•The sharing of employment opportunities is particularly relevant in the instance case as the Respondent is the main employer in the area at a time when employment opportunities in the area are limited.To free up jobs so that younger workers can enter to the workforce and younger workers have an opportunity for advancement / promotion.•The Respondent endeavours to establish a balanced age workforce to ensure motivation and dynamism are at the core of each department. This can be increased with the prospect of promotion within each department. The staff turnover rate for permanent employees is very low, average turnover rate from 2013 to present is 2.7%.

In support of her contention that there were objective grounds for the imposition of a retirement age, Ms Fay relied upon a number of cases,viz.Palacios de la Villa v Cortefiel Services SA(Case c-411/05) [2007] ECR 1-8531wherethe Court of Justice accepted Spain's justification for a compulsory retirement age of 65, namely that retirement ages assisted in promoting employment for younger people, particularly in difficult economic circumstances. Similarly, inDomnica Petersen v Berufungsausschuss fur Zahnarzte fur den Bezirk Westfalen-Lippe(Case c-341/08) [2010] ECR 254the Court of Justice appeared to accept that sharing out of employment between the generations (in this case through the forced retirement at 68 of the exercise of the activity of a public panel dentist in Germany) was not precluded by Article 6(1) if, taking into account the situation in the labour market concerned, the measure was appropriate and necessary for achieving that aim.

InRosenbladt v Ollerking Gebaudereinigungsge GmbIta referral concerning a provision for compulsory retirement at age 65 in a collective agreement for the commercial cleaning sector, the Court of Justice held that the aims of sharing employment between the generations, making it easier for younger workers to find work, particularly, at a time of chronic unemployment and not requiring employers to dismiss employees on grounds of incapacity, which might be humiliating, were in principle capable of objectively and reasonably justifying a difference in treatment on grounds of age.

Also,John Roche v Complete Bar SolutionsDEC-E2013-197where similar arguments regarding certainty in business planning and encouraging staff morale by using consequential vacancy as an internal promotion opportunity was accepted by the Equality Tribunal as justifying a retirement age of 65 in respect of the Respondent's business servicing equipment in licenced premises.

Evidence

Mr Eoin Flanagan, HR Manager:

Oral sworn evidence was given by Mr Eoin Flanagan, HR Manager since 2014, gave evidence on behalf of the Respondent. He said that while the Respondent does not have a policy on retirement age, the custom and practice had been that all employees retire at age 65 years. He said that it was "a given" that employees retire at 65 years. He said that all contracts of employment for all new employees state a retirement age of 65 years.

Mr Flanagan said that the Complainant was invited to attend all retirement functions of employees who retired. He referred to the two exceptions and said that there were exceptional circumstances in those cases. The first was kept on due to the significant increase in the volume of passengers at the time and the second was brought back from retirement to undertake a special project (upgrade of a runway), which was funded externally.

Mr Flanagan said that approximately half of the Respondent's employees are on full time contracts and the remainder are on part time contracts. All vacancies are advertised internally as the Respondent has a policy to promote from within. He outlined for the Court the various roles within the airport, i.e. those in critical functions and those in commercial/retail functions and number of employees in each role. He stated that there was interchangeability within the roles within each of the functions.

In cross examination, Mr Flanagan said that the Complainant was replaced by a person on an "if and when" contract, a part time casual contract on a fixed term basis, renewable every six months. He was placed on the new entrants' scale which is a five point scale. Mr Flanagan said that he was not given a permanent contract as it is the Respondent's policy for new starters to be put on a part time casual contract. Where such contracts are renewed for a period of four years then employees are given a contract of indefinite duration. All new contracts since 2014 now contain reference to a retirement age of 65 years. However, Mr Flanagan told the Court that as the Complainant's replacement is on a fixed term contract, it does not contain such a reference.

Mr Flanagan said that the Complainant's job was not advertised internally; instead his replacement was recruited into the job having submitted a CV to the Respondent at an earlier stage. As he was employed elsewhere at the time, he did not commence employment with the Respondent until 16 May 2016 and in the meantime the Complainant's hours were distributed among other employees.

Mr John McCarthy, Operations and Commercial Manager

Mr John McCarthy, Operations and Commercial Manager had previously been employed as a Unit Manager with Campbell Catering based at the Airport. Prior to the transfer in 2003, he became an employee of the Respondent. He then became responsible for the pending arrival of catering staff to the airport in 2003. He said that it was clear that 65 years was the retirement age in Campbell Catering and in the airport that would have been known. He said that during the negotiations with SIPTU, the issue was never raised.

Mr McCarthy said that with 14 departments across the airport it is important to have cohesion; therefore a common retirement age is required. He said that as the airport is very heavily regulated it suits to have a retirement age of 65 years and the Respondent has been operating on that basis for the past 10 years.

The Law Applicable.

Section 6(1) of the Employment Equality Acts 1998 and 2004 (the Act) provides, in relevant part, as follows: -

- "(1) For the purposes of this Act and without prejudice to its provisions relating to discrimination occurring in particular circumstances discrimination shall be taken to occur where—
    - (a) a person is treated less favourably than another person is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation on any of the grounds specified in subsection (2) (in this Act referred to as the 'discriminatory grounds')which—(i) exists,(ii) existed but no longer exists,(iii) may exist in the future, or(iv) is imputed to the person concerned,

Section 34(4) of the Act provides for certain savings and exceptions relating to the family, age and disability grounds. Subsection (4) of that Section provides: -

- (4) Without prejudice to subsection (3), it shall not constitute discrimination on the age ground to fix different ages for the retirement (whether voluntarily or compulsorily) of employees or any class or description of employees.

Subsection (3) deals with occupational benefit schemes and is of no relevance to the issues arising in this case.

The Act gave effect in domestic law to Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (the Directive). Recital 14, 25 and Articles 2 (5), 4(1) and 6 (1) of the Directive are of particular relevance to the instant case.

Recital 14 provides: -

- "This Directive shall be without prejudice to national provisions laying down retirement ages."

Recital 25 provides: -

- The prohibition of age discrimination is an essential part of meeting the aims set out in the Employment Guidelines and encouraging diversity in the workforce. However, differences in treatment in connection with age may be justified under certain circumstances and therefore require specific provisions which may vary in accordance with the situation in Member States. It is therefore essential to distinguish between differences in treatment which are justified, in particular by legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and discrimination which must be prohibited.

Article 4(1) of the Directive provides as follows

- "Notwithstanding Article 2(1)and 2(2),Member States may provide that a difference in treatment which is based on a characteristic referred to in Article 1 shall not constitute discrimination where, by nature of the particular occupational activities concerned or of the context in which they are carried out, such acharacteristic constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement, provided that the objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate."

Article 6 (1) of the Directive provides: -

- Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that differences of treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination, if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary.

Issues for Consideration by the Court

- Existence of a contractual retirement age

Section 34(4) of the Act,prima facie,allowed the Respondent to fix a retirement age without contravening the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age. The jurisprudence of the CJEU on the circumstances in which compulsory retirement is saved by Article 6 of the Directive is relevant only if the Court finds that a retirement age was in fact fixed by the Respondent and that the retirement age applied to the Complainant.

InEaragail Eisc Teoranta v Richard LettEDA1513 the Court held that as a matter of general principle, a termination of employment by way of retirement should be distinguished from a dismissal on grounds of age. A retirement occurs where the employment comes to an end pursuant to a condition of employment which limits an employee's tenure to the point at which they attain a specified age. It held that a term of employment regarding a retirement age, within the provision of Section 34 (4) of the Act, can be provided in an employee's conditions of employment either expressly or by implication, or it can be provided by incorporation where some other document or instrument, of which the employee had notice, can be read in conjunction with the formal contract of employment. The Court further accepts that an employer's employment policy in relation to retirement can take effect as a contractual condition of employment which is,prima facie,protected by Section 34(4) of the Act. However, in the Court's view that could only arise where the policy is promulgated in such a manner that the employees to whom it applies either knew, or ought to have known, of its existence.

On that point the judgment handed down by Hedigan J inMcCarthy v HSE[2010] 21 ELR 165 is instructive. In that case a public servant sought to challenge a decision of the HSE requiring her to retire at age 65. The HSE, in common with all public sector employments, maintained an employment policy requiring employees to retire at age 65, in line with certain statutory provisions. Ms McCarthy claimed that the policy did not apply to her because she had never been informed that she would be required to retire at that age and no such term was included in her contract of employment.

It is noteworthy that rather than relying on the existence of the policy,per se,the approach taken by the Court was to consider if the employer's policy on retirement took effect as an implied term in the applicant's contract of employment. Having reviewed the evidence and the submissions made by the parties Hedigan J said: -

- "In addressing the substantive issues raised, the crux of the application lies in whether the retirement age of 65 could be viewed as having been implied into the contract as submitted by the respondent. Two alternative approaches were suggested utilising the "officious bystander test" on the one hand and implication by custom on the other. It is my opinion that in the circumstances of the case, the former provides a more suitable formula to determine whether such a term has been implied, although there is necessarily a large degree of overlap. The court is of the opinion that such a term should indeed be implied into the applicant's conditions of employment. The applicant is a highly intelligent woman who is legally qualified. It is difficult to accept that she had no knowledge of the retirement age applicable in that part of the public service in which she worked. Furthermore, irrespective of any actual knowledge of this fact, I would consider the dicta of Maguire P. in O'Reilly that anyone concerned "should have known of it or could easily have become aware of it" to be particularly apt in this case. Moreover in addition to the broad awareness of the retirement age among most working adults, the applicant may be deemed as "on notice" that there was an applicable retirement age by virtue of the superannuation scheme. The superannuation scheme, of which she was a member, made reference to the existence of a retirement age, and more specifically, a cut-off for contributions at age 65. I therefore find that such a term can be implied into the terms and conditions of employment."

Again inShirlaw v Southern Foundaries Ltd[1939] 2 K.B. 206, the Court held that a term as to retirement age may be implied in the contract by application of the so called "officious bystander" test. Here the test was set out in the following terms: -

- "Prima facie that which in any contract is left to be implied and need not be expressed is something so obvious that it goes without saying that if, while the parties were making the bargain, an officious bystander were to suggest some express provision for it in the agreement they would testily suppress him with a comment 'Oh of course'."

A term can also be implied in the alternative, and somewhat overlapping, 'custom and practice' test adopted in this jurisdiction by Maguire P in

O'Reilly v Irish Press[1937] 71 I.L.T.R 194. Here it was held that the practice must be: -

- "…so notorious, well-known and acquiesced in that in the absence of agreement in writing it is to be taken as one of the terms of the contract between the parties…it is necessary in order to establish a custom of the kind claimed that it be shown that it was so generally known that anyone concerned should have known of it or easily become aware of it."

It seems to the Court that this custom and practice test can appropriately be applied in considering if the policy of an employer took effect as a contractual term or a condition of employment. The terms of a pension scheme may also be relied upon as either implying a term as to retirement or by incorporating the terms of the scheme into the contract. A crucial consideration in addressing the question of incorporation or implication is whether the employee knew, or ought to have known, of the term contended for.

Findings of the Court

It is accepted that the Complainant's contract of employment with the Respondent did not contain any express term as to retirement age.The Respondent relied on the Campbell Catering contracts which stated:-

- "the minimum age of employment is 18 years of age and employment shall not continue beyond the 65thbirthday."

The Court notes that the terms and conditions of employment of those employees who transferred from Campbell Catering in 2003 were the subject of negotiations between the Respondent and SIPTU, and resulted in enhanced terms for the former, including the Complainant. These terms were eventually balloted upon and agreed in 2004. Each of the employees affected, including the Complainant were issued with new contracts of employment incorporating all the revised terms in October 2006. However, it contained no provision regarding retirement age, despite the Respondent having the opportunity to do so.

In 2010 the Respondent and the Union were before the Court under the Industrial Relations Acts, where the Union sought the introduction of a defined contribution pension scheme for hourly paid employees at the airport, in line with that in existence for management and salaried staff. The Court recommended the introduction of a defined contribution pension scheme which was duly introduced. This scheme provided for a normal retirement age of 65 years and was open to any employee interested in joining the scheme to opt into it. For reasons outlined to the Court, the Complainant decided not to join. Likewise the Court notes that despite having the opportunity to do so the Respondent did not revise the Complainant's contract to include the provisions of the pension scheme thus incorporating its terms into the contract.

The Court notes that the contract of employment issued to the Complainant's replacement does not contain a retirement age; however, it does make reference to the option to join the pension scheme.

The Court notes that the first retirement that occurred in the Respondent was in November 2006, after the Complainant transferred over to the Respondent and after he was supplied with new terms and conditions that had been the subject of negotiations between the Respondent and SIPTU and which he was required to ballot on. There have been 10 retirements since 2006, two of whom worked beyond their 65thbirthday due to exceptional circumstances.

Having regard to the all the circumstances, the Court cannot accept that the Complainant had knowledge of a retirement age of 65 years. The Respondent had ample opportunity to inform the Complainant of a requirement that he retire at age 65. No evidence was adduced of the Complainant having been so informed or having been provided with any document from which such a requirement could have been discerned. There was no express term in his conditions of employment requiring him to retire at age 65 years and, in the Court's opinion, no such term can be regarded as having been implied or incorporated on any of the accepted tests.

In these circumstances the Court must hold that the Respondent had not fixed a retirement age in respect of the Complainant and that he was dismissed because of his age. Therefore, the Court finds that the Respondent cannot avail of Section 34(4) of the Act. In such circumstances it is not necessary for the Court to consider Respondent's arguments of objective justification for a retirement age of 65 years.

Determination

For the reasons set out above, the Court finds that the Complainant herein was dismissed by the Respondent by reason of his age, and that this dismissal constituted an act of discrimination within the meaning of Section 6(2)(f) of the Act. Therefore the Respondent's appeal is disallowed.

Having been told that the Complainant was not seeking reinstatement, the Court determines that the appropriate form of redress is an award of compensation pursuant to Section 82(1)(c). Therefore the Court orders the Respondent to pay the Complainant the sum of €6,500 for the effects of the Act of discrimination.

The Decision of the Adjudication Officer is varied accordingly.

The Court so determines.

SUBJECT:

1. Appealing against a Rights Commissioner's Decision r-090719-wt-10/DI.

BACKGROUND:

2. The Company provides enterprise web content management systems and solutions to medium and large sized organisations. The Complainant, Ms Yinka Rahman, worked as a Project Co-ordinator for Terminal Four Solutions Limited, the Respondent, from 18th August 2008 until 25th November 2009. Her normal hours of work were 9.00 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. Monday to Friday.

On March 19th 2010, Ms Rahman lodged a complaint with the Labour Relations Commission alleging breaches of Section 11, 12 and 13 of the Act by the Respondent in respect of her employment with Terminal Four Solutions Ltd. The Respondent rejected the complaints as untrue and unfounded.

A Rights Commissioner conducted an investigated into the complaints made. He rejected the complaints in respect of Sections 11 and 13 of the Act. He upheld the complaint under Section 12 of the Act and awarded the Complainant €1,750.00 in compensation for the denial of her rights under that Section of the Act.

It is this Decision that was appealed by the Respondent to the Labour Court in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997 on the 12th April, 2011. The Court heard the appeal on the 13th July, 2011, the earliest date suitable to the parties.

EMPLOYEE'S ARGUMENTS:

3. 1. The general practice was that Employees were free to take breaks as and when it was practical to do so. However, it was frowned upon if you took breaks when you were working on something important.

2. During my time working with the Company I was often required to work excessive hours without taking breaks.

COMPANY'S ARGUMENTS:

4. 1. The period from 20th September, 2009 to 25th November, 2009 can only be considered in this case as only contraventions that occurred during the six months prior to the referral which is dated 19th March, 2010 are at issue. At no stage during her employment did the Claimant raise any grievance that she was not getting her breaks as per Section 12 of the Act.

2. The Claimant referred numerous cases under various pieces of legislation. The records show that some of the allegations are untrue, this calls into question the veracity of her claim under Section 12 of the Act.

DETERMINATION:

This case comes before the Court pursuant to Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 (the Act)The Labour Court considered the appeal on 13th July in accordance with the provisions of Section 28(1) of the Act.

The Law

Section 11 provides

- An employee shall be entitled to a rest period of not less than 11 consecutive hours in each period of 24 hours during which he or she works for his or her employerSection 12 provides12(1) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 4 hours and 30 minutes without allowing him or her a break of at least 15 minutes(2)An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 6 hours without allowing him or her a break of at least 30 minutes; such a break may include the break referred to in subsection (1)(3) The Minister may by regulations provide, as respects a specified class or classes of employee, that the minimum duration of the break to be allowed to such an employee under subsection (2) shall be more than 30 minutes (but not more than 1 hour)(4) A break allowed to an employee at the end of the working day shall not be regarded as satisfying the requirement contained in subsection (1) or (2)

Section 13provides

13.—(1) In this section "daily rest period" means a rest period referred to insection 11

(2) Subject to subsection (3), an employee shall, in each period of 7 days, be granted a rest period of at least 24 consecutive hours; subject to subsections (4) and (6), the time at which that rest period commences shall be such that that period is immediately preceded by a daily rest period

(3) An employer may, in lieu of granting to an employee in any period of 7 days the first-mentioned rest period in subsection (2), grant to him or her, in the next following period of 7 days, 2 rest periods each of which shall be a period of at least 24 consecutive hours and, subject to subsections (4) and (6)

a) if the rest periods so granted are consecutive, the time at which the first of those periods commences shall be such that that period is immediately preceded by a daily rest period, and

b) if the rest periods so granted are not consecutive, the time at which each of those periods commences shall be such that each of them is immediately preceded by a daily rest period

(4) If considerations of a technical nature or related to the conditions under which the work concerned is organised or otherwise of an objective nature would justify the making of such a decision, an employer may decide that the time at which a rest period granted by him or her under subsection (2) or (3) shall commence shall be such that the rest period is not immediately preceded by a daily rest period

(5) Save as may be otherwise provided in the employee's contract of employment

- (a) the rest period granted to an employee under subsection (2), or
  (b) one of the rest periods granted to an employee under subsection (3) shall be a Sunday or, if the rest period is of more than 24 hours duration, shall include a Sunday

Section 25 of the Act provides

25.—(1) An employer shall keep, at the premises or place where his or her employee works or, if the employee works at two or more premises or places, the premises or place from which the activities that the employee is employed to carry on are principally directed or controlled, such records, in such form, if any, as may be prescribed, as will show whether the provisions of this Act are being complied with in relation to the employee and those records shall be retained by the employer for at least 3 years from the date of their making

Complainant's position

(2) The Minister may by regulations exempt from the application of subsection (1) any specified class or classes of employer and regulations under this subsection may provide that any such exemption shall not have effect save to the extent that specified conditions are complied with

(3) An employer who, without reasonable cause, fails to comply with subsection (1) shall be guilty of an offence

(4) Without prejudice to Subsection (3), where an Employer fails to keep records under Subsection (1) in respect of his or her compliance with a particular provision of this Act in relation to an Employee, the onus of proving, in proceedings before a Rights Commissioner or the Labour Court, that the said provision was complied with in relation to the Employee shall lie on the Employer

Complainant's case

The Complainant submitted that in the course of her employment with the respondent she was often required, contrary to Section 12 of the Act, to work in excess of 4.5 hours without a break. She said that Employees were free to take breaks but it was frowned upon if one did so whilst working on an important task.

She submitted that she was required to travel long distances to meet clients and that time spent travelling to and from such meetings was not considered working time. She said this travel regularly resulted in her not being in a position to avail of her daily rest period of 11 hours between successive shifts contrary to Section 11 of the Act.

Respondent's position

The Company policy on breaks was that all staff were entitled to a 45 minute break for lunch. This policy was outlined in Complainant's contract of employment and in the Office Procedures Manual that was supplied to all staff in the Company.

The Company had a relaxed policy towards staff taking breaks. A fully equipped kitchen was provided and there was in practice no restriction on staff going to the kitchen to make tea or coffee etc at any time during the day.

The Complainant kept records of the time she spent on company assignment that showed she took her lunch break every day and indeed exceeded the 45 minute break on a regular basis.

These records do not record the short tea and coffee breaks that the Complainant regularly availed of. In this regard Ms Laura Murphy, the Complainant's manager, told the Court that she distinctly remembers the Complainant leaving her desk to take tea/coffee breaks during the day and to take her lunch at a time of her own choosing each day.

Whilst the Employer did not keep records in the format required by Section 25 of the Act the evidence available to the Court is sufficient to discharge the burden of proof of compliance with the Act placed on the Employer by that Section.

Findings of the Court

The Respondent has admitted that it did not, contrary to Section 25 of the Act, keep records in the prescribed form "as will show whether the provisions of this Act are being complied with in relation to the employee"

Consequently, pursuant to Section 25 (4) of the Act "the onus of proving, in proceedings before a rights commissioner or the Labour Court, that the said provision was complied with in relation to the employee shall lie on the employer."

The Court finds that the records of work performed by the complainant submitted to the Court by the Employer are not sufficient to discharge the onus of proving compliance with the provisions of the Act. Those records were •not designed to record the Complainant's time at work

•are not consistent with other records of the Employees movements provided to the Court by the Employer

•not signed or otherwise approved by the Respondent

•internally inconsistent in some respects

Consequently they cannot be relied upon to prove compliance with the provisions of the Act.

The Court further finds that the evidence by Ms Murphy was not sufficiently precise to enable discharge the obligation of proving compliance with the provisions of the Act.

The Court finds that the evidence of the Complainant regarding the alleged breaches of Sections 11 and 13 of the Act established no prima facie case for consideration by the Court.

Section 11

The Court accepts the evidence of the Company that there was no occasion on which the Complainant was denied her entitlement to 11 consecutive hours rest in any period of 24 hours. The one occasion contended for by the Complainant did not fall within the statutory time limit for bringing a complaint pursuant to Section 11 of the Act.

Section 13

The Complainant told the Court that she was not required to work weekends. Consequently no breach of Section 13 of the Act arises in this case.

Section 12

The Court finds that on the balance of probabilities there were occasions on which the complainant was not in a position to take her rest breaks pursuant to Section 12 of the Act. The Court further finds that the burden of proving compliance with this Section of the Act has not been discharged by the Respondent either by way of the documentation provided to the Court or by the submissions made to it on the Respondent's behalf or by the evidence presented to it by the company representatives Ms Dempsey and Ms Murphy.

Accordingly the Court upholds the complaint under Section 12 of the Act.

Remedy

Taking all of the evidence into account and the Decision of the ECJ in relation to the level of award that should be made in cases where a personal right established under a Directive of the European union has been denied to an individual, cf(C – 14/83 Von Colson and Kamann v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen [1984] ECR 1891),Court finds that the Rights Commissioner's Decision in this case should be upheld.

2. The Worker appealed the Decision of the Equality Officer to the Labour Court on the 19th September, 2014. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 27th January, 2015. The following is the Court's Determination:-

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Travelodge Management Limited against the decision of the Equality Tribunal in a claim of discrimination and victimisation by Sylwia Wach (represented by SIPTU). The Complainant succeeded at first instance and was awarded total compensation in the amount of €63,000. There is a cross appeal by the Complainant which relates to an unsuccessful application made to the Equality Officer to amend the name of the Respondent.

The Respondent did not appear at the hearing before the Equality Officer nor did it file a submission.

The claims are made on grounds of gender, family status and race. The Complainant is of Polish nationality

As is the normal practice of the Court the parties are referred to herein as they were at first instance. Hence Ms Wach is referred to as the Complainant and Travelodge Management Limited is referred to as the Respondent.

There is a net issue in the case, namely, whether the Respondent employed the Complainant at any time material to her claim.

Position of the parties

The Respondent contends that the Complainant was employed by a company named Smorgs (Ireland) Limited. That company has since transferred its business to a company named Smorgs ROI Management Limited. Travelodge Management Limited is a company incorporated under the Companies Acts which has, since these proceedings commenced, changed its name to Smorgs Property Holdings Limited.

Evidence was given by Mr Richard O'Sullivan, who is a director of Smorgs ROI Management Limited in which he told the Court that the aforementioned company is the Complainant's employer. The Court was told that at the time material to these claims her employer was Smorgs (Ireland) limited. That company carried on business under the registered business name of 'Travelodge'. The business of Smorgs (Ireland) Limited was transferred to Smorgs ROI Management Limited and the Complainant's employment transferred to that company pursuant to the European Communities (Protection of Employees on Transfer of Undertakings) Regulations 2003 (S.I.131/2003)

The Complainant's cross appeal relates to the refusal of the Equality Tribunal to amend the name of the Respondent. It appears from the decision of the Equality Officer that the Complainant's representative contended that since the initiation of the claim the Respondent had changed its name and that it transpired that the Respondent was a subsidiary of a larger company.

The Equality Officer found that the Respondent was correctly identified as the Complainant's employer at the time the complaint arose and that it was her employer within the meaning of the Acts (see pars 4.1 and 4.2 of the decision)

SIPTU, on behalf of the Complainant, told the Court that all of the employment related documentation provided to the Complainant gave the name of her employer as 'Travleodge', or 'Travel Lodge'. Following a search of the Companies Registrations Office the Complainant's representative identified a company named Travelodge Management Limited, the Respondent herein, which, it was assumed, was the legal designation of the employer.

It appears that sometime in 2011 a colleague of the Complainant, in the same employment, had occasion to initiate proceeding against her employer pursuant to the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997and impleaded the Respondent. SIPTU acted for the Complainant in that case. The Respondent engaged with the Labour Relations Commission and attended a hearing before a Rights Commissioner in that complaint without objection. The matter was settled between the Respondent and the Complainant in that case.

The Complainant had occasion to initiate proceedings against her employer in 2012 pursuant to the Maternity Protection Act 1994 and the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997. The Respondent, Travelodge Management Limited t/a Travelodge Waterford was impleaded as the employer in that case. The Respondent was professionally represented in relation to that case and its representative engaged with the Union and the LRC, on behalf of the Respondent, as the Complainant's employer without demur.

A settlement was reached in that case the terms of which were reduced to writing in a document dated 5thNovember 2012. The document is headed"Settlement Agreement between Travelodge Management Limited and Sylwia Wach" It goes on to record that Travelodge Management Limited agreed to pay the Complainant compensation for not having received a premium for Sunday working and that the Complainant agreed to withdraw her claim under the Act of 1997 in consideration of that payment.

SIPTU further pointed out that the Respondent corresponded with the Equality Tribunal in respect of the within claim and did so without raising any objection to being impleaded as the Complainant's employer.

The Union relied on s.88 of the Act which provides in relevant part as follows: -

- (2) By notice in writing to the parties, the Director or, as the case may be, the Chairman of the Labour Court may correct any mistake (including an omission) of a verbal or formal nature in a decision or determination under this Part.
  (3) In this section "the parties "means—
  - (a) in the case of a decision under section 79, the complainant and the respondent as defined in section 77(4),
    (b) in the case of a determination under section 83, the parties to the appeal,

    (c) in the case of a decision under section 85, the Authority and the persons referred to in subsection (2)(b) and (c) of that section, and

    (d) in the case of a decision under section 86 or a determination under section 87, the complainant and the respondents, within the meaning of section 86.

  (4) If any person who participated in an investigation under section 79 or 86 is not correctly identified in the resulting decision or determination, the correction of that error shall be regarded as falling within subsection (2).

Discussion

Records obtained from the Companies Registration Office show that the Business Name 'Travelodge' was designated to Smorgs (Ireland) Limited on 1stJanuary 2003.

The Respondent, in its appeal, seeks to have the decision of the Equality Tribunal set aside as having been made against an entity that was not the Complainant's employer. In its cross-appeal the Union seeks, in effect, to have the name of the Respondent amended to Smorgs (Ireland) Limited, or to Smorgs ROI Management Limited. The Court was informed that the Complainant has now initiated fresh proceedings before the Equality Tribunal in respect of this matter against the aforementioned company or companies.

The Complainant appears to have applied to the Equality Officer to amend the proceedings so as to correctly name the intended Respondent. That application was grounded on a belief that the Respondent herein had changed its name or that it is a subsidiary of another company. The Equality Officer correctly held that in either case a change in the name of the Respondent for the purposes of his investigation was unnecessary.

The Respondent failed to appear before the Equality Tribunal. But that was not because it regarded itself as a stranger to the proceedings. Rather, it claims that this arose through inadvertence.

The Court has no doubt that the Complainant named the wrong Respondent in her claim as a result of abona fidemistake. That state of affairs may well have been compounded by the fact that the Respondent appears to have held itself out as the Complainant's employer in earlier proceedings. Moreover, the Respondent accepted proceedings in the within case and failed to deny that it was the Complainant's employer until the initiation of this appeal, some 30 months after the claim was first initiated.

The only evidence before the Court is that the Complainant was never employed by Travelodge Management Limited. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary that must be accepted. Consequently, the only question that the Court must decide is whether the entity that is the actual employer can be substituted for the entity impleaded in the claim.

The Complainant relies on s.88 of the Act in urging the Court to amend the proceedings. In the Court's view s.88 is not intended to deal with a situation such as that which arose in this case. That section is intended to enable the Court (or the Equality Tribunal) to amend a determination or a decision, as the case may be, where an error of a formal or verbal nature appears on the face of a written determination or decision. That can include a formal or verbal error in the name of a party that participated in the investigation.

What is in issue in this case does not involve a formal or verbal error. Nor does the Complainant's application relate to a Determination issued by the Court. The wrong Respondent was impleaded and the Union's application is to amend the claim by substituting another legal person for the Respondent cited. In the Court's view that goes beyond was intended by s.88 of the Act.

The decision of the High Court inCounty Louth VEC v Equality Tribunal[2009] IEHC 370 is a seminal case on the question of when proceedings before a statutory tribunal can be amended. In that case McGovern J set out the following principle of law: -

- If it is permissible in court proceedings to amend pleadings where the justice of the case requires it, then, a fortiori, it should also be permissible to amend a claim as set out in a form such as an originating document before a statutory tribunal, so long as the general nature of the complaint remains the same.

Theratioof that case appears to be that the procedures adopted by statutory tribunals in relation to the amendment of non-statutory forms used in the initiation of claims should not be more stringent than those that apply in the ordinary courts. That is in line with the generally accepted principle that statutory tribunals, such as this Court, should operate with the minimum degree of procedural formality consistent with the requirements of natural justice. On that point the decision of the Supreme Court inHalal Meat Packers (Ballyhaunis) Ltd v Employment Appeals Tribunal[1990] I.L.R.M 293 is relevant. Here Walsh J stated, albeit obiter, as follows: -

- This present case indicates a degree of formality, and even rigidity, which is somewhat surprising. It is a rather ironic turn in history that this Tribunal which was intended to save people from the ordinary courts would themselves fall into rigidity comparable to that of the common law before it was modified by equity.

It is also relevant that the Court of Justice of the European Communities held in Case C-326/96Levez v TH Jennings (Harlow Pools) Ltd[1998] E.C.R. I-7835 (at par 18) and in Case 268/06IMPACT v Minister for Agriculture and Food[2008] 19 ELR 181 (at par 46) that the well-established principle of equivalence requires that the detailed procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding an individual's rights under Union law must be no less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions

Order 15, Rule 13 of the Rules of the Superior Courts (S.I. No.15 of 1986) makes provision for the amendment of proceeding initiated in the High Court in which parties are improperly named. It provides: -

- "No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or non-joinder of parties, and the Court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The Court may at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the Court to be just, order that the names of any parties improperly joined, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, be struck out and that the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added...."

It could cogently be argued that in keeping with the decision inCounty Louth VEC v Equality Tribunal, and by application of the principle of equivalence, the Court should not adopt a more stringent stance in relation to the substitution of parties that is available in the High Court pursuant to that rule.

The authorities on the application of O.15 r.13 of Rules of the Superior Court were considered by Kearns P. inSandy Lane Hotel Limited v Times Newspapers Limited[2011] 2 I.L.R.M 139. While that case was ultimately dealt with by application of O.15 r 2 of the Rules, (which concerns adding a person as plaintiff) in the course of his judgment the President conducted an extensive and instructive analysis of the case law on the application of O.15 r 13.

Having considered the judgment of Geoghegan J. in Kennemerland Group v Montgomery[2000] 1 I.L.R.M. 370, the President referred to a long established principle that a court will not add a defendant under Ord.15, r.13 if the action against that party is quite clearly statute barred Later in the course of his judgment the President stated : -

- Order 15, r.13 concerns the procedure for adding, substituting or striking out a party. The names of any parties may be added, whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or "whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter".
  There are, however, two important distinctions between Ord.15, r.2 and Ord.15, r.13. First, in relation to r.13, it is not necessary for the applicant to establish that a bona fide mistake occurred. Secondly, where a court makes an order pursuant to Ord.15, r.13 the proceedings against the new party are deemed to have commenced only on the date of the making of the order adding that party. This may, therefore, have significant implications concerning the computation of the relevant limitation period in accordance with the Statute of Limitations 1957 (as amended). Ord.15, r.2 does not contain such a provision, however, it nonetheless contains the requirement that the mistake be one of a bona fide nature.

From its reading of that judgment it appears to the Court that while there are some apparently divergent decisions on this subject, the preponderance of authority is that the Superior Courts will not add or substitute a party to proceedings where the limitation period in the action has expired as against that party. It appears to the Court that even if it had a discretion analogous to that available to the Superior Courts under O.15 r13 of the Rules of the Superior Courts, (and the Court makes no such finding) it would not be appropriate to exercise that discretion in this case. The applicable statutory time-limit prescribed is that prescribed by s.77(5) of the Act. The section provided that a complaint under the Act must be referred to the Equality Tribunal within a period of six months from the occurrence of the event giving raise to the complaint, with a possibility of an extension of a further six months for reasonable cause shown.

Prima facie, the time limit has passed in this case but whether that is or is not the case would depend on other considerations. In that regard it is noted that the Complainant has instituted fresh proceedings against her actual employer. It will be a matter for the Equality Tribunal in considering that claim to decide whether the claim is statute barred as against the Respondent in that case. It would be inappropriate to pre-empt the decision of the Equality Tribunal on that point, which can be appealed by either party to this Court.

Outcome

It is clear on the only evidence available that Travelodge Management Limited, the Respondent herein, was not the Complainant's employer at any time material to this claim. For all of the reasons set out herein the Court has come to the conclusion that, notwithstanding thebona fidesof the mistake in this case, and the other circumstances referred to in the course of this Determination, the Court it cannot substitute Smorgs (Ireland) Limited or Smorgs ROI Management Limited for the Respondent against which the case was taken.

In these circumstances the Court considers that it has no option but to find that the Respondent herein has no liability to the Complainant under the Act. Consequently the decision of the Equality Tribunal cannot stand and must be set aside.

Determination

The Respondent's appeal is allowed and the decision of the Equality Tribunal is set aside.

SUBJECT:

1. Appealing Against A Rights Commissioner's Decision r-139806-wt-13/JT

BACKGROUND:

2. A Rights Commissioner hearing took place on the 23 April, 2014, and a Decision was issued on the 16 September, 2014.

The Worker appealed the Decision of the Rights Commissioner to the Labour Court on the 23 October, 2014, in accordance with Section 28(1) of the Organisation of Working Time Act, 1997. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 8th April, 2015.

DETERMINATION:

This is an appeal by Dinesh Kumar (hereafter the Claimant) against the decision of a Rights Commissioner in his claim against his former employer, Nutweave Limited t/a Bombay Pantry (hereafter the Respondent), under the Organisation of Working Time Act 1997 (the Act). The claim relates to an alleged failure of the Respondent to afford the Claimant breaks in accordance with s.12 of the Act.

The claim was taken before the Rights Commissioner in conjunction with a claim under s. 20(1) of the Industrial Relations Act 1969 and both matters were heard together. A single "recommendation" issued. The Rights Commissioner did not expressly make a decision on the claim under the Act in terms required by s.27(2) of the Act. However the Court assumes that what the Rights Commissioner erroneously referred to as his 'recommendation'was intended to constitute his decision.

Period covered by the claim

The claim was presented to the Rights Commissioner in November 2013. Consequently the period cognisable for the purposes of the case is between April 2013 and November 2013.

Position of the Parties

It was the Claimant evidence that he did not obtain breaks during the time in issue. He told the Court that he prepared food which he consumed while continuing to work. He said that he rarely received more than 5 minutes break.

Evidence on behalf of the Respondent was given by Mr Ray McGuinness who was the Claimant's manager during the material time. He told the Court that the Claimant was employed at this time as a curry chef. He alternated in that position with another chef. According to Mr Mc Guinness, employees of the Respondent, including the Claimant, generally started work at 3pm. They then worked up to 10pm or 10.30 pm depending on the day of the week. Normally a meal was prepared around 4pm and all employees took a break together at around 4.30pm. The premises in which the Claimant was employed is a take- out restaurant and it remained open during that period. If a customer called to the premises they would have to be attended to. This could involve an interruption in the break. The Court was told by Mr McGuinness that if the Claimant's break was interrupted he would obtain a compensatory break at the end of his shift.

The Respondent accepted that during the period cognisable by the within claim it did not maintain records of breaks in accordance with s.25 of the Act.

The Law

Section 12 of the Act, the application of which is in issue in this case, provides as follows: -

- 12.—(1) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 4 hours and 30 minutes without allowing him or her a break of at least 15 minutes.
  (2) An employer shall not require an employee to work for a period of more than 6 hours without allowing him or her a break of at least 30 minutes; such a break may include the break referred to in subsection (1).

  (3) The Minister may by regulations provide, as respects a specified class or classes of employee, that the minimum duration of the break to be allowed to such an employee under subsection (2) shall be more than 30 minutes (but not more than 1 hour).

  (4) A break allowed to an employee at the end of the working day shall not be regarded as satisfying the requirement contained in subsection (1) or (2).

For the purposes of the Act a break is a period which the worker knows in advance will be uninterrupted, which is not working time and which he or she can use as he or she pleases (see dicta to that effect of Peter Gibson LJ inGallagher v Alpha Catering services t/a Alpha Flight Services[2005] I.R.L.R.102).

The expression "working time" is defined by s.2(1) of the Act as follows: -

- working time" means any time that the employee is—

- (a) at his or her place of work or at his or her employer's disposal, and
  (b) carrying on or performing the activities or duties of his or her work,

In case C-302/98Sindicato de Medicos de Asistencia Publica (SIMAP) v Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valenciana[2000] E.C.R. I-7963 the CJEU pointed out that a period during which a worker is required to resume his or her duties immediately he or she is required to do so is to be regarded as working time.

The provisions of s.25 of the Act are also relevant in considering this claim. That section provides: -

- .—(1) An employer shall keep, at the premises or place where his or her employee works or, if the employee works at two or more premises or places, the premises or place from which the activities that the employee is employed to carry on are principally directed or controlled, such records, in such form, if any, as may be prescribed, as will show whether the provisions of this Act are being complied with in relation to the employee and those records shall be retained by the employer for at least 3 years from the date of their making.
  (2) The Minister may by regulations exempt from the application of subsection (1) any specified class or classes of employer and regulations under this subsection may provide that any such exemption shall not have effect save to the extent that specified conditions are complied with.

  (3) An employer who, without reasonable cause, fails to comply with subsection (1) shall be guilty of an offence.

  (4) Without prejudice to subsection (3), where an employer fails to keep records under subsection (1) in respect of his or her compliance with a particular provision of this Act in relation to an employee, the onus of proving, in proceedings before a rights commissioner or the Labour Court, that the said provision was complied with in relation to the employee shall lie on the employer.

- The Organisation of Working Time (Records) (Prescribed Form and Exemptions) Regulations 2001 (S.I. 473 of 2001) prescribes the form in which records are to be maintained for the purpose of subsection (1) of that section.
  It is accepted by the Respondent that it did not keep records in the statutory form during the period cognisable in this case. Consequently, by operation of subsection (4) of s.25 the Respondent bears the burden of proving compliance with s.12 of the Act in the period with which the Court is concerned.

Conclusion

- Taking the evidence tendered on behalf of the Respondent at its height the following facts emerge: -
  - •The Claimant commenced work at 3pm each afternoon. He had a break at or about 4.30pm. He then continued working until 10pm or 10.30 pm.•During his break he was required to resume his duties if a customer called to the restaurant and required service.
    •He received a further break at the end of his shift

Section 12(1) provides that an employee shall not be required to work for a period of more than 4.5 hours without a break of at least 15 minutes. Assuming that the Claimant had a 15 minute break at 4.30 (and for reasons that follow the Court does not accept that he had) he was then required to work for a period of at least 5 hours 15 minutes without a break. Section 12(4) makes it clear that a break given at the end of a shift does not meet the requirements of subsection (1) of that section.

It is also clear that during the period that purported to be a break at 4.30pm the Claimant was at the Respondent's disposal and could be required to resume his duties if so required. That could not amount to a break within the statutory meaning ascribed to that term.

Outcome

For the reasons set out herein the Court is satisfied that the within claim is well-founded. Accordingly, the decision of the Rights Commissioner cannot stand and the Claimant is entitled to succeed in his appeal.

Redress

The Court considers that the appropriate mode of redress is an award of compensation. The Court measures the amount of compensation that is fair and equitable in all the circumstances at €2,000. The Claimant is awarded compensation in that amount.

Disposal

The decision of the Rights Commissioner is set aside and substituted with the terms of this Determination.

SUBJECT:

1. Alleged unfair dismissal under Section 77 of the Employment Equality Act 1998.

BACKGROUND:

2. The complainant was employed by the Company from the 17th of August, 2000 until the 27th of November, 2000 when he was dismissed. He claims he was discriminated against on grounds of race. He referred the complaint to the Labour Court in accordance with Section 77 (2) of the Employment Equality Act, 1998. A Labour Court hearing took place on the 10th of February, 2004.

DETERMINATION:

Mr Massinde Ntoko (the complainant) is a native of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He was assigned to work for Citibank (the respondent) on the 17th August 2000 by an employment agency, CPL Resources Ltd. His employment was terminated on the 27th November 2000 for allegedly making a personal telephone call on the respondents telephone system. The complainant contends that his dismissal was on grounds of his race and that this constitutes unlawful discrimination in terms of Section 6 of the Employment Equality Act 1998, (the Act) contrary to Section 8 of the Act.

Submissions:

The submissions of the party, which were supported by oral evidence, can be summarised as follows: -

The Complainants Case:

The complainant told the Court that he was employed in the sorting and distribution of post. He was referred to Citibank by CPL because he spoke French. He told the Court that he was on three months probation and that he had been advised by CPL that his performance was satisfactory and that he would be retained by the respondent.

On the evening of the 24th November the complainant received a telephone call on his mobile phone. He told the caller that he would ring them back at 5:30pm, which was after working hours. He did not have access to a phone at his own work station but he asked a colleague, Mr Gregory Pepin, for permission to make the call from his phone. The respondent had a log in system in operation on its phone system and Mr Pepin's phone was already logged in. He told the complainant he could make the phone call and showed him how to log out of the system when he completed his call.

While the complainant was engaged in making the call he was approached by Ms Kathy Olesen, a manager with the respondent, who asked him what he was doing. He responded that he was making a private telephone call. Ms Olesen informed him that it was the respondent's policy that employees were not allowed use the phones for private purposes. He then terminated the phone call and logged out. The complainant told the Court that two other employees were engaged in making private telephone calls at that point and that this was not commented on in any way by Ms Olesen. On the following Monday morning, 27th of November, he was approached by Ms Jean Fitzhenry, the assistant manager, who informed him that Ms Olesen was furious over the incident on the previous Friday and that he was being dismissed.

The complainant told the Court that at no stage had he ever been informed that it was contrary to company policy for employees to make private phone calls. He said he had never received any induction training from the respondent nor had he been given an employee handbook or details of the respondent's disciplinary code. He did not believe that he was doing anything wrong in making a personal telephone call and that he understood that it was permissible to do so provided the call was made outside of working hours. The call was international and lasted for 24 minutes. He said that he was not given any opportunity to explain the circumstances in which he came to make the call or to make any representations in his own defence.
